In resolution 1996/43 of 26 July, the Council considered that the strengthening of collaboration between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions required an integrated approach, encompassing a closer policy dialogue at the intergovernmental level on relevant areas of international development policy issues, taking into account the respective competencies of each party (see PART THREE, Chapter II).

Agenda for development

The Ad Hoc Open-ended Working Group of the General Assembly on an Agenda for Development, established in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 830], continued in 1996 to elaborate an agenda for development—an integrated approach to the wide range of economic and social issues dealt with by the United Nations—originally proposed in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 15]. The Secretary-General in May 1994 presented a wide-ranging document, "An agenda for development" [A/48/935], presenting initial approaches and broad themes to be pursued. The Working Group in 1996 held four sessions, from 22 January to 1 February, from 20 to 31 May, from 17 to 21 June, and from 3 to 6 September [A/50/45].

At the January/February session, the two Vice-Chairmen presented a document containing a revised synthesis for three chapters of the agenda—chapters I (setting and objectives) and II (policy framework, including means of implementation), and a first synthesis for chapter III (institutional issues and follow-up). In May, the Working Group had before it conference room papers containing paragraphs of chapters I and II as amended and/or accepted by the Group and a revised synthesis text by the Vice-Chairmen on chapter III. In June, the Working Group continued its examination of chapters I and II only. In September, the Working Group considered proposed amendments to outstanding paragraphs and agreed paragraphs in all three chapters and continued its examination of chapter III.

At its meeting on 6 September, the Working Group recommended to the Assembly a draft decision, adopted by the Assembly on 16 September (decision 50/490), by which it noted the Working Group's report and decided that its work should continue at the Assembly's fifty-first session, with a view to concluding it as soon as possible, and reporting thereon to the Assembly during that session.

The Secretary-General in August [A/51/319] reported on the provisions of General Assembly resolution 50/227 on further measures for the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields. By the resolution, the Assembly stated that, in the context of the discussions on an agenda for development, a close review should be made of the relationship of the Economic and Social Council with the specialized agencies. The Council should provide overall guidance and coordination to the UN development system, identify points of duplication with funds and programmes and make recommendations. The Assembly emphasized that issues relating to the strengthening of the relationship between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions, and possibly the World Trade Organization, should be particularly considered in the context of the deliberations on the agenda for development. The Assembly also stated that the structure and functioning of the Secretariat, including the economic and social departments and the question of establishing a post of Deputy Secretary-General for International Cooperation and Development, should be considered in the High-level Open-ended Working Group on the Strengthening of the United Nations System and the Open-ended Working Group on an Agenda for Development.

By decision 51/445 of 16 December, the Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's August note.

Implementation of the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation and the International Development Strategy

In response to General Assembly resolution 49/92 [YUN 1994, p. 762], the Secretary-General in August reported [A/51/270] on implementation of the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries [GA res. S-18/3], and the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade (the 1990s) [GA res. 45/199], both of which were adopted by the Assembly in 1990.

Policy concerns addressed in the report focused on the increased globalization and liberalization of the world economy, the continuation of relatively high real interest rates in industrialized countries, the resurgence of faith in the efficacy of the market, and the emergence of a new orthodoxy as to what constituted an effective development policy.

The report described trends in the world economy during the first half of the 1990s, noting a clear-cut slowdown from the growth rates of the 1980s. Despite more sluggish global growth, however, developing countries as a whole had made substantial progress during the first half of the decade; as a group, they had grown at almost three times their annual average rate of growth of per capita gross domestic product (GDP) in the 1980s, namely, 2.9 per cent per annum compared with 1 per cent per annum in the period 1981-1990. Nevertheless, those averages masked great variations in individual situations.

The report went on to discuss the role of the international environment in accelerating the development of the developing countries in the areas of trade; and debt, capital flows and aid. It also considered the development of the least developed countries (LDCs), whose economic performance continued to be a matter of deep concern for the international community, and special measures on their behalf.

As to the role of the UN system, the report stated that, both through global conferences and other activities, it had been a major actor in promoting a holistic approach to development by linking social, economic and environmental considerations as the foundation for policy and action.

The report concluded that, since the adoption of the Declaration and the Strategy, there appeared to have been a growing convergence of opinion as to what constituted an "appropriate" economic development strategy. For example, in pursuing reform, a distinction had to be drawn between the attainment of macroeconomic stability—a requirement even in the short run—and achieving structural reform—a long-run necessity. Also, "getting prices right" might be a necessary condition for development success, but was by no means sufficient. Further, it appeared that the sequencing of reform was an important consideration. Perhaps most importantly, it had become increasingly evident that to be successful in the longer run, policies needed to focus not just on growth but on improving the lot of the population at large as well. No country was a "blank canvas" waiting to be converted into a market economy. A number of countries faced external constraints, such as poor export prices or a heavy debt burden, which were resistant to short-term palliatives.

In reality, the report stated, very little was conclusively known about the determinants of economic growth. Although the question had been asked whether the high growth rates in the East Asia region should be attributed to productivity gains or to factor accumulation, there was no categorical answer. One thing that was known was that technological progress was the only possible way for an economy to achieve a sustained rate of growth of output per person.

Since the adoption of the Declaration and the Strategy, UN global conferences had resulted in international agreements on strategies for their areas of concern and had identified a wide range of supportive measures and actions. Inevitably, there had been considerable overlap in the content of those agreements. However, since they pointed to a growing international convergence of views on the necessary ingredients for development, they had refined and advanced the Declaration and the Strategy. Those views were being distilled by the Ad Hoc Open-ended Working Group of the General Assembly on an Agenda for Development and it seemed likely that action taken as a result of that work would call for follow-up by the Assembly. The Assembly might wish, said the report, to combine future review and appraisal of the Declaration and the Strategy with follow-up to the work on an agenda for development. The Assembly might also wish to undertake forward-looking reviews of selected new and emerging trends and issues that could be taken into account in national and international development strategies.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/173.

Implementation of the commitments and policies agreed upon in the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, and implementation of the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the importance and continued validity of the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, contained in the annex to its resolution S-18/3 of 1 May 1990, and the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, contained in the annex to its resolution 45/199 of 21 December 1990,

Recalling its resolutions 46/144 of 17 December 1991, 47/152 of 18 December 1992, 48/185 of 21 December 1993 and 49/92 of 19 December 1994 on the implementation of the Declaration and the Strategy,

Aware that the Declaration, the Strategy and the ongoing discussion on an agenda for development are mutually supportive and closely interlinked,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries and the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade;

2. Recognizes the need to strengthen the implementation of the Declaration and the Strategy in the remaining years of the 1990s so as to ensure that the Decade will indeed be one of accelerated development, in particular in the developing countries, and strengthened international economic cooperation;

3. Calls upon Member States to identify and take follow-up actions on those commitments and agreements that are not fully implemented and on the constraints to implementation;

4. Recognizes the need to provide particular support to those least developed countries suffering from a deteriorating economic situation;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a progress report on the implementation of the Declaration and the Strategy, with particular emphasis on their relationship with and impact on development trends, and on emerging experiences with and consensus on development strategies;

6. Encourages Member States to provide, as and when available, reports and papers relevant to the implementation of the commitments and policies agreed upon in the Declaration and the Strategy in order to assist the Secretary-General in preparing the report called for above;

7. Calls for the review and appraisal of the Declaration and the Strategy to be coordinated with the follow-up work on major United Nations conferences and the ongoing discussion on an agenda for development.

General Assembly resolution 51/173

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/604/Add.1) without vote, 25 November (meeting 36); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.32), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica for Group of 77 and China (A/C.2/51/L.13); agenda item 96 (a).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 17, 18, 20-27, 34, 36; plenary 86.

Development through partnership

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/122 [YUN 1995, p. 831], the Secretary-General submitted an October note on renewal of the dialogue on strengthening international economic cooperation for development through partnership. He noted that the Assembly had agreed to hold a two-day high-level dialogue during its fifty-first session on the theme of the social and economic impact of globalization and interdependence and their policy implications, the modalities of which were to be decided in the context of the outcome of the work of the Ad Hoc Open-ended Working Group of the General Assembly on an Agenda for Development. Since an agenda had yet to be finalized, however, the arrangements for such a meeting would have to be deferred pending the document's completion. Since the high-level dialogue would require a series of preparatory meetings, the Secretary-General recommended that it be deferred until the latter part of the fifty-second session.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/174.

Renewal of the dialogue on strengthening international economic cooperation for development through partnership

The General Assembly,

Noting with interest the efforts of the Secretary-General to encourage a constructive dialogue for enhancing development and to facilitate actions in that regard,

Taking into consideration the note by the Secretary-General,

1. Reaffirms its resolutions 48/165 of 21 December 1993, 49/95 of 19 December 1994 and 50/122 of 20 December 1995 on renewal of the dialogue on strengthening international economic cooperation for development through partnership;

2. Reaffirms the importance of the dialogue on economic and development issues between the developed and the developing countries;

3. Agrees to defer the holding of the high-level dialogue for a period of two days until the fifty-second session of the General Assembly—the date, modalities and focus of the discussion to be decided by the President of the General Assembly through consultation with Member States, bearing in mind General Assembly decision 50/490 of 16 September 1996 and taking into account the progress and results achieved in the work of the Ad Hoc Open-ended Working Group of the General Assembly on an Agenda for Development, on the theme of the social and economic impact of globalization and interdependence and their policy implications—and requests the Secretary-General, in close cooperation with Governments, all relevant parts of the United Nations system, relevant organizations and other development actors, to make initial preparations for such a dialogue;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session a report on the implementation of the present resolution, including further recommendations for enhancing the dialogue and an assessment of the ongoing efforts for its strengthening, such as the outcome of the discussions in the Ad Hoc Open-ended Working Group, possible future themes for dialogue, and proposals to convene special sessions of the General Assembly on major issues relevant to the dialogue on international economic cooperation for development, including those identified in the agenda for development;

5. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session, under the appropriate item, the sub-item entitled "Renewal of the dialogue on strengthening international economic cooperation for development through partnership".

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/604/Add.2) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.52), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica for Group of 77 and China and Colombia (A/C.2/51/L.21); agenda item 96 (b).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 17, 18, 20-27, 34, 37; plenary 86.

Economies in transition

In response to General Assembly resolution 49/106 [YUN 1994, p. 763], the Secretary-General submitted an August report [A/51/285] on the integration of the economies in transition into the world economy. The report described the overall setting in countries making the transition from centrally planned to market economies and the progress being made towards integrating them.

Despite severe problems, there had been a marked improvement in macroeconomic performance in the preceding two years. There was a steady expansion of trade throughout Eastern Europe in 1994-1995. The volume of Eastern European exports rose by 9 to 11 per cent in 1995, while imports rose by some 16 to 19 per cent. In the Russian Federation and most other members of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), however, the "transition depression" of output continued in 1995.

Most Eastern European countries and the Baltic States had made considerable progress in integrating into the world financial markets. Eastern Europe received significant capital inflows in three consecutive years, with inflow in 1995 reaching a record $31 billion. The chief destinations were the Czech Republic, Hungary and Poland, and the bulk was from private sources. There were also large inflows into the Baltic States in 1995, but progress in CIS had been slower. The credibility of economic reform programmes appeared to explain most of the large differences between the Eastern European countries in their ability to attract foreign investment. Generally, those countries receiving little private capital also failed to obtain much official finance, the exception being the Russian Federation, which drew $5.4 billion from IMF in 1995 and also appeared to have used guaranteed export credits heavily.

Regarding technical cooperation involving the economies in transition and developing countries, the report focused on the work of the two regional commissions—the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) and the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP)—that had provided assistance for the transition process. The report also described cooperation with relevant subregional groupings, international institutions and other organizations. Information received from agencies and organizations on their role in assisting the economies in transition during the transformation and integration process was summarized.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/175.

Integration of the economies in transition into the world economy

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions 47/187 of 22 December 1992, 48/181 of 21 December 1993 and 49/106 of 19 December 1994,

Reaffirming also the need for the full integration of the countries with economies in transition into the world economy,

Noting the progress made in these countries in achieving macroeconomic stabilization in the course of structural reforms, which require more active investment policies,

Noting also the aspiration of the countries with economies in transition towards the further development of regional and interregional cooperation,

Recognizing the need to ensure favourable conditions for market access of exports from these countries, in accordance with multilateral trading agreements,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Welcomes the measures undertaken by the organizations of the United Nations system to implement resolution 49/106, and calls upon those organizations to continue to conduct analytical activities and to provide policy advice and technical assistance to the economies in transition on the social and political framework for economic and market reforms, in particular in regard to the development of the necessary conditions for attracting foreign investments;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session.

General Assembly resolution 51/175

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/604/Add.3) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); 48-nation draft (A/C.2/51/L.17), orally revised; agenda item 96 (c).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 17, 18, 20-27, 32, 37; plenary 86.

Rural development

ACC Subcommittee. The Subcommittee on Rural Development of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) held its twenty-fourth session in Geneva from 15 to 17 May [ACC/1996/11]. It considered a report on the issue of micro-financing and rural credit prepared by the UN Department for Development Support and Management Services, based on information obtained from member organizations.

The Subcommittee also had before it the reports of the Panel on Monitoring and Evaluation (Paris, 24-25 April) and the Working Group on Industrial Contribution to Rural Development (Geneva, 13-14 May). Also before the Subcommittee were reports by agencies on rehabilitation of returnees in rural areas; development and application of socio-economic indicators to assess progress in rural development; institutional frameworks for promoting rural-urban linkages; livelihoods, fragile ecosystems and rural development; and learning in rural areas. The Subcommittee heard presentations from the World Bank regarding "Vision to action in the rural sector", an ongoing work to reorient and revitalize the role of the World Bank in rural development, and from the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) on "Building partnerships and coalitions for rural development".

With regard to the World Food Summit, to be held in November 1996 (see PART THREE, Chapter XIII), the Subcommittee made comments and recommendations to strengthen further the Summit's draft policy statement and plan of action with regard to improving the access of the poor to food, primarily through enhancing their agricultural productive capacity and/or strengthening their food purchasing power.

The ACC Consultative Committee on Programme and Operational Questions at its ninth session (New York, 16-20 September) [ACC/1996/16] reviewed the report of a consultant on the Subcommittee's role and functioning and recommended to ACC the dissolution of the Subcommittee in favour of alternative informal coordinating mechanisms.

FAO report. In response to a 1981 request [YUN 1981, p. 400], the Secretary-General submitted to the Economic and Social Council in June 1996 a fourth progress report [E/1996/70] on the review and analysis of agrarian reform and rural development, prepared by FAO in collaboration with other concerned bodies and organizations of the UN system. The report gave an overview of the implementation of the Programme of Action adopted by the 1979 World Conference on Agrarian Reform and Rural Development [YUN 1979, p. 500] and discussed access to land natural resources, inputs, markets and services; rural people's participation in development and policy-making; women in agriculture and rural development; and education, training and extension services.

The experience of the 1990s, the report said, had heightened the need to augment current understanding of the relationship between civil society and the private sector. Economic restructuring had proven problematic; without "safety nets", liberalization could lead to either the marginalization or complete exclusion of the rural poor from the benefits of political life and economic reform. The most disadvantaged population in the world today, the report went on, was composed of rural women in developing countries. Economic and political liberalization had the potential to act as a vehicle for poverty alleviation and eventual eradication. Policy interventions compatible with both political and economic liberalization of the market were rapidly developing.

By decision 1996/232 of 23 July, the Council took note of the report.

Industrial development cooperation

In response to General Assembly resolution 49/108 [YUN 1994, p. 764], the Secretary-General in September reported [A/51/340] on industrial development cooperation, summarizing major trends in industrial development in the developing countries; reviewing why industry continued to be a key instrument in economic and social development and why industrial development cooperation was needed to support industrial development in the developing countries; and assessing major issues that constituted the current agenda for industrial development cooperation.

In a section on the role of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) in international industrial development cooperation, the report provided a synopsis of programmatic and managerial reforms undertaken by UNIDO; reviewed UNIDO's seven thematic priorities (strategies, policies and institution-building for global economic integration; environment and energy; small and medium enterprises; innovation, productivity and quality for international competitiveness; industrial information, investment and technology promotion; rural industrial development; and Africa and LDCs: linking industry with agriculture) and the activities undertaken for each priority; gave information on the UNIDO contribution to major UN conferences; and described UNIDO's coordinating role in the UN system.

A central theme of the report was that international industrial cooperation remained an essential dimension of the overall development process. Industrial development was a means for achieving overall economic and social development, not an end in its own right. With the achievements in industrialization in past decades and the growth of trade and international investment flows, some parts of the developing world had made significant progress; however, major challenges remained for the greater number of developing countries. Those challenges were increasingly urgent, as competitive pressures and the requirements of technological change threatened to widen the gap between advantaged and disadvantaged nations. Although the process of industrialization was increasingly market-driven, and markets required strengthening in many instances, Governments continued to have a decisive role in furthering sustainable industrial development. Efforts were required to overcome market deficiencies; create and upgrade institutions; augment the supply of skilled labour; and support policy-making to promote internationally competitive industries, technological development and necessary infrastructure.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/170.

Industrial development cooperation

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Declaration on International Economic Cooperation, in particular the Revitalization of Economic Growth and Development of the Developing Countries, the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, and the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, Recalling also its resolution 49/108 of 19 December 1994 on industrial development cooperation,

Taking note of the declaration adopted by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Group of 77 and China at their twentieth annual meeting, held in New York on 27

September 1996, the communique of the Meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs and Heads of Delegation of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries to the fifty-first session of the General Assembly, issued on 25 September 1996, the Midrand Declaration, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its ninth session, and the conclusions of the summit meeting of seven major industrialized countries, held at Lyon, France, from 27 to 29 June 1996,

Noting the far-reaching implications of the process of globalization, trade liberalization and rapid technological change for the economic prospects of the developing countries and the economies in transition,

Reaffirming the importance of promoting industrialization as an essential element in the sustained economic growth and sustainable development of developing countries, as well as in the eradication of poverty, facilitating social integration, the integration of women into the development process and the creation of productive employment,

Stressing the need for enhanced international, regional and subregional cooperation in the field of industrial development and the important role played by the United Nations system, in particular the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, in this regard,

Recognizing the increasing role of the business community, including the private sector, in enhancing the dynamic process of the development of the industrial sector,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Welcomes the major programme of reform and restructuring process undertaken by the United Nations Industrial Development Organization;
3. Reiterates the importance of cooperation and coordination within the United Nations system in providing effective support to the industrial development of the developing countries, and calls upon the United Nations Industrial Development Organization to continue carrying out its central coordinating role in the field of industrial development in the overall context of existing coordinating mechanisms in the United Nations system, inter alia, the Administrative Committee on Coordination and the resident coordinator system, so as to enhance the effectiveness, relevance and development impact of such support;
4. Emphasizes the importance of a favourable international and national environment for the industrialization of developing countries, and urges all Governments to adopt and implement development policies and strategies that promote, within a framework of transparent and accountable industrialization policies, inter alia, enterprise development, foreign direct investment, technological adaptation and innovation, expanded access to markets and the effective use of official development assistance to enable developing countries to enhance an environment attractive to investment so as to augment and supplement domestic resources for the expansion, diversification and modernization of their industrial productive capacity, in the context of an open, equitable, non-discriminatory, transparent, multilateral and rule-based international trading system;
5. Reiterates the importance of technology transfer to the developing countries as an effective means of international cooperation in the field of industrial development;

6. Recognizes the continuing use of official development assistance also for industrial development in the developing countries, and calls on the donor countries and the recipient countries to continue to cooperate in their efforts to achieve greater efficiency and effectiveness of official development assistance resources devoted to industrial development cooperation;

7. Welcomes, in addition, the use of innovative funding modalities, including, inter alia, co-financing schemes and trust funds, debt-equity swaps, as appropriate, and other debt relief measures, industrial joint venture schemes, enterprise-to-enterprise cooperation and venture capital funds for industrial development, in particular in the developing countries;

8. Calls upon the international community and the relevant organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, in particular the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, to support the efforts of the developing countries to intensify and expand industrial cooperation among themselves with respect to, among other things, trade in manufactured products, industrial investments and business partnerships, as well as industrial technology and scientific exchanges;

9. Requests the United Nations Industrial Development Organization, in cooperation with the relevant organizations of the United Nations system, to undertake, in the context of supporting South-South cooperation, an in-depth assessment and further analysis of best practices in the field of industrial policies and strategies and their relevance in particular regional and country situations, and lessons learned in the field of industrial development, so as to provide practical insights and ideas—such cooperation should better enable developing countries to benefit from each other's successful experiences in the formulation of their industrial policies and strategies—and also requests the United Nations Industrial Development Organization to submit a report thereon to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session;

10. Also requests the United Nations Industrial Development Organization to expand and enhance its interaction with the business community, including the private sector, in assisting the development of the industrial sector in the developing countries and economies in transition, in particular in the field of small and medium-sized enterprise development, and welcomes the creation by the United Nations Industrial Development Organization of the International Business Advisory Council;

11. Invites Member States and relevant organizations of the United Nations system to extend support to the successful implementation of the Alliance for Africa's Industrialization, launched on 23 October 1996 at Abidjan, by Governments of African countries and the private sector, which aims at accelerating the pace of Africa's industrialization through industrial capacity-building, including the agro-industrial field, and partnerships between Governments of African countries and the private sector at the national, sub-regional, regional and international levels;

12. Emphasizes the importance of the integration of the informal sector into industrial development cooperation, as well as the necessity for the development of human capacities, in particular strengthening women's economic capacity and providing business services to women;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the implementation of the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 51/170

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/603) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.46), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica for Group of 77 and China and Colombia (A/C.2/51/L.12); agenda item 95.

Coercive economic measures

At the request of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya [A/51/193], a supplementary item, entitled "Elimination of coercive economic measures as a means of political and economic compulsion", was included in the agenda of the General Assembly's fifty-first session.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 27 November, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/22.

Elimination of coercive economic measures as a means of political and economic compulsion

The General Assembly,

Guided by the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, particularly those which call for the development of friendly relations among nations, and the achievement of cooperation in solving problems of an economic and social character,

Recalling its numerous resolutions in which it called upon the international community to take urgent and effective steps to end coercive economic measures,

Gravely concerned over the recent enactment of extra-territorial coercive economic laws in contravention of the norms of international law and the aims and purposes of the United Nations,

Believing that the prompt elimination of such measures is consistent with the aims and purposes of the United Nations and the relevant provisions of the World Trade Organization,

1. Reaffirms the inalienable right of every State to economic and social development and to choose the political, economic and social system which it deems most appropriate for the welfare of its people, in accordance with its national plans and policies;

2. Calls for the immediate repeal of unilateral extra-territorial laws that impose sanctions on companies and nationals of other States;

3. Calls upon all States not to recognize unilateral extraterritorial coercive economic measures or legislative acts imposed by any State;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session a report on the implementation of the present resolution;

5. Decides to include in the agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Elimination of coercive economic measures as a means of political and economic compulsion".

Sustainable development

Commission on Sustainable Development

The Commission on Sustainable Development held its fourth session in New York from 18 April to 3 May 1996 [E/1996/28]. A high-level meeting with ministerial participation was held from 1 to 3 May, during which the Commission finalized its work programme covering 1993 to 1996 and discussed preparations for the special session of the General Assembly, to be held in 1997, to discuss the implementation of Agenda 21 (see below). The Commission's Ad Hoc Inter-sessional Working Group on Sectoral Issues (New York, 16 February-1 March) [E/CN.17/1996/6] discussed protection of the oceans and of the atmosphere (see PART THREE, Chapter VII).

Reports before the Commission dealt with a variety of subjects, including: trade, environment and sustainable development (see PART THREE, Chapter IV); integrating environment and development in decision-making; institutional arrangements to follow up the UN Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED); protection of the atmosphere; protection of the oceans; the Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Panel on Forests (see PART THREE, Chapter VII); and demographic dynamics and sustainability (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII).

Other matters considered by the Commission included: changing consumption and production patterns; capacity-building; financial resources and mechanisms for sustainable development (see below), as well as sectoral issues; combating poverty; the transfer of environmentally sound technologies; and small island developing States.

By decision 1996/231 of 11 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Commission's report on its fourth session [E/1996/28] and approved the provisional agenda for the fifth (1997) session.

Changing consumption and production patterns

In a report to the Commission on Sustainable Development [E/CN.17/1996/5 & Add.1], the Secretary-General reviewed progress made in implementing the objectives set out in chapter 4 of Agenda 21, adopted by UNCED in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 672], on changing consumption and production patterns. The report contained an overview of key issues in the five elements of the work programme adopted by the Commission in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 839], drew conclusions relevant to policy and presented a number of recommendations for consideration by the Commission.

The report stated that consumption and production were the essence of economic activity; they involved the use of natural resources, their transformation into products and services and their ultimate disposal or dissipation into the environment as wastes. Traditionally, as economies expanded, overall levels of resource use and waste generation rose. It was now widely believed that modern consumption patterns were not compatible with long-term sustainability. In the 1960s and 1970s, concerns centred around the belief that economic growth was inherently limited by the finite nature of fossil fuel energy, minerals and other non-renewable resources. That "no-growth" position had since been largely discredited on the grounds that it failed to give due weight to the ability of markets to stimulate technological substitutes as scarcities emerged. Concern had shifted to other potentially limiting factors, notably: the degradation of renewable resources, particularly agricultural land; the accelerating rate of species loss; and the accumulation of emissions and wastes in the environment, with negative consequences for human health and possible ecological impacts, many of which represented largely unknown risks.

Agenda 21 stated that "the major cause of the continued degradation of the global environment is the unsustainable pattern of consumption and production, particularly in industrialized countries" and called on developed countries to take the lead in promoting and achieving more sustainable consumption patterns. The main focus of the policy response to the Agenda 21 challenge continued to be on production and the traditional polluting sectors of industry, transport and agriculture. In addition to command-and-control regulation of processes and products, much innovative policy research and development centred on creating an incentive framework for the more efficient utilization of resources and the development of closed-loop production/consumption systems that prevented the escape of wastes into the environment. The concept of eco-efficiency, which was concerned with maximizing the productivity of energy and material inputs in order to reduce resource consumption and pollution/waste per unit output, was seen as a promising short- to medium-term strategy, appropriate in both developed and developing countries, for maintaining economic growth and competitiveness while achieving improved environmental quality (the double dividend).

Many policy makers recognized, however, that changing consumption and production patterns would involve going beyond policies targeted on producers and intended to encourage eco-efficient practices in production. In the longer term, progress would depend on more fundamental changes in the lifestyle of consumers in developed countries. That was mainly because consumers represented the demand side of the economy and their preferences and choices largely determined the behaviour and output of other economic agents; and the Western consumer lifestyle served as a model and inspiration to millions of people in poorer countries.

Achieving sustainable development at a global level would depend on the development trajectory followed by developing countries, the current consumption levels of which were relatively very low. It was therefore essential that richer nations could demonstrate that resource-efficient, low-pollution lifestyles were both feasible and desirable. At the same time, efforts to change current consumption and production patterns should not hinder the development prospects of developing countries—for example through the creation of new barriers to trade.

Also before the Commission was the report of the Ad Hoc Inter-sessional Working Group on Finance and Changing Consumption and Production Patterns (New York, 4-8 March) [E/CN.17/1996/7], which contained recommendations relating to chapters 4 (on changing consumption patterns) and 33 (on financial resources and mechanisms) of Agenda 21. A symposium on sustainable production and consumption patterns was held in Brasilia, Brazil, from 25 to 28 November [E/CN.17/1997/19].

In a decision on changing production and consumption patterns [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/13)], the Commission recommended that measures for changing those patterns worldwide should take into account, as appropriate, the need for improved market access, particularly for developing countries and countries with economies in transition, for more sustainably produced goods and services. The Secretariat was asked to compile information on measures taken by Governments, the private sector, trade unions and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in response to the priorities set out in chapter 4 of Agenda 21, and the Commission decided to review that information at future sessions.

In the same decision, the Commission urged Governments to continue efforts to achieve more sustainable patterns of production and consumption and to reduce pollution and the generation of waste; explore the implications of eco-efficiency for policy development and implementation; analyse and implement optimal mixes of regulatory, voluntary, economic and social instruments and measures to make production and consumption patterns more sustainable; establish and implement policies for procuring environmentally sound and otherwise sustainable products and services for use within Governments; and facilitate the participation of major groups, particularly NGOs, women, youth and trade unions, in developing and implementing policies for promoting sustainable consumption and production patterns.

The Commission also called on international organizations to strengthen their work in support of national initiatives by undertaking sound analyses of projected trends in consumption and production patterns and their policy implications, the implications of eco-efficiency for policy development, and the merits and drawbacks of the different types of instruments available to achieve changes in consumption and production patterns; to consider undertaking policy-relevant studies of the possible impacts for developing countries of changes in consumption and production patterns in developed countries; to establish or contribute to an information clearing house on new and innovative policies for more sustainable consumption and production patterns; and to support Governments in initiatives to improve their environmental performance with regard to materials and energy efficiency, waste management and pollution prevention, procurement and investment policies, and the continued integration of environmental policy with economic and other policies.

Major groups were encouraged to cooperate with Governments in designing and implementing innovative policies and mixes of instruments to achieve changes in consumption and production patterns, and to assist the United Nations in revising the 1985 Guidelines for Consumer Protection [GA res. 39/248] to include aspects of more sustainable consumption and production patterns. Business and industry were specifically called on to continue exercising environmental responsibility by developing and implementing the concept of eco-efficiency and to help design optimal mixes of instruments for achieving more sustainable patterns.

Capacity-building in developing countries

In a March report on capacity-building for sustainable development [E/CN.17/1996/15], the Secretary-General enumerated the main ideas behind the concept of capacity-building—the process and means through which national Governments and local communities developed the necessary skills and expertise to manage their environment and natural resources in a sustainable manner. Capacity-building entailed strengthening peoples' ability to achieve sustainable livelihoods; a cross-sectoral multidisciplinary approach to planning and implementation; emphasis on organizational and technological change and innovation, as well as on the need to build social capital; and developing the skills and performance of both individuals and institutions.

Progress made in capacity-building since 1994 included greater national capacities for designing national plans, a wider involvement of non-State actors, a deeper understanding in the international community of capacity development issues, more focus on the demands of users, improved aid coordination and donor collaboration, more capacity investments on regional and global levels, and a greater role for information technology. Constraints were institutional—highly compartmentalized organizations in the public sector, difficulty in promoting decentralization, continuation of sectoral thinking and acting, lack of sufficient accountability and responsiveness, a shortage of financial and skilled human resources, poor salary and working conditions, and lack of a performance culture in many development organizations. New constraints being imposed on donor agencies limited their ability to respond creatively to demands for greater participation and control over development programmes that were coming from partner countries.

The report examined four current issues related to capacity-building for sustainable development: restructuring of donor agencies; development of tools and methodologies to support capacity-building; need for improved performance and results on capacity programmes; and institutional sustainability.

Four key issues presented to the Commission on Sustainable Development for consideration were: level of donor support, the process of collaborative learning and action, the need for donor collaboration, and the need for developing countries to focus more intently on capacity issues.

In a decision on national mechanisms and international cooperation for capacity-building in developing countries [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/12)], the Commission urged Governments and international organizations to share experiences in capacity-building and to assist the developing countries through strengthened international cooperation programmes for sustainable development. It called on them not only to enhance co-ordinated efforts to assist developing countries in their own capacity-building efforts, but also to encourage the active involvement of non-State actors, including NGOs, the private sector and other major groups. The Commission encouraged UN programmes and funds to continue to assist developing countries to strengthen their capacities in planning and policy-making for sustainable development through consultative processes, and requested UNDP to disseminate further the results of programmes and evaluations of its Capacity 21 projects undertaken at the country level.

Financial resources and mechanisms

In a report on financial resources and mechanisms for sustainable development [E/CN.17/1996/4 & Add.1], the Secretary-General described progress made in implementing chapter 33 of Agenda 21 (financial resources and mechanisms). It was stated that the report had benefited from preparations for the Third Expert Group Meeting on Financial Issues of Agenda 21 (Manila, Philippines, 6-8 February) [E/CN.17/1996/28].

With regard to mobilizing national financial resources for sustainable development, the report noted that, as in other investment decisions of the private sector, risk perception played a major role in environmental investments. Private firms could not be sure that Governments would enforce regulations and not arbitrarily change them; in addition, they often lacked access to information about new technologies and did not necessarily consider cleaner production by means of a more efficient use of raw materials as a sufficient incentive to invest. Implementing enabling policies, therefore, needed to be put high on the agenda in both developed and developing countries: negative incentives in the form of regulations, taxes, charges, tradable permits and penalties for non-compliance were essential. Also, a broad range of positive incentives could boost private-sector finance, particularly financial incentives, incentives for creating or changing markets, and incentives for reducing market risk. Institution-building and campaigns for changing consumption and production patterns could also play a major role, the report stated. International organizations could stimulate private-sector investment in sustainable development, particularly through projects for creating or changing markets, reducing market risks or financing global benefits, such as the phasing-out of ozone-depleting substances. In that connection, promising initiatives were under way dealing with forests, energy, new and renewable sources of energy, biodiversity and greenhouse gas mitigation.

Concerning innovative mechanisms for financing the protection of the global environment, the report stated that, in addition to such mechanisms as international environmental agreements and the Global Environment Facility, other mechanisms in the form of global taxes and user charges for financing global environmental efforts were being discussed.

The report contained a number of recommendations for the Commission's consideration. The Commission adopted a decision [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/14)] in which it underlined the urgent need to fulfil all financial commitments of Agenda 21, especially those contained in chapter 33. It stressed the importance of donor countries promoting greater public awareness of commitments concerning official development assistance (ODA) as set forth in chapter 33, and emphasized the need to improve the effectiveness of ODA by various means, including the leveraging of private-sector investments from national and external sources. While acknowledging the positive aspects of the expansion of external private capital flows to some developing countries, the Commission stressed its concern at the volatility of such flows, which had a negative effect on the efforts of developing countries to achieve sustainable development.

As to mobilizing national financial resources for sustainable development, the Commission emphasized the importance of the participation of the private sector, in particular through increased investments. To further promote private-sector participation, the Commission called for greater use of innovative mechanisms, such as build-operate-transfer and similar mechanisms for financing infrastructure projects for sustainable development. The privatization of public enterprises and contracting out of services should also be encouraged as appropriate.

With regard to financing the transfer of environmentally sound technologies (ESTs), the Commission emphasized that such financing should come from national and external resources and innovative mechanisms. Technology transfer efforts should be enhanced within a stable, predictable national and international economic and regulatory environment that would ensure the identification and development of markets for ESTs.

In discussing practical steps towards resolving the issues before it, the Commission called attention to the need for further studies, the desirability of strengthening cooperation and the necessity of improving the exchange of information.

Inter-Agency Committee

The ACC Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development (IACSD) held two sessions in New York in 1996. At its seventh meeting (5, 6 and 8 February) [ACC/1996/1], IACSD considered preparations for the April/May session of the Commission on Sustainable Development; support for Agenda 21, particularly coordination and planning at the national level; UNCED follow-up at the regional level; planning for the 1997 special session of the General Assembly to review the implementation of Agenda 21; and the reports of its subsidiary bodies.

At its eighth meeting (10-12 July) [ACC/1996/12], IACSD considered preparations for the Commission's 1997 session; streamlining of requests for national reports; a review of its own functioning (the outline of a draft statement to be submitted by ACC to the Assembly's 1997 special session was agreed); and reports of its subsidiary bodies.

High-level Advisory Board

The High-level Advisory Board on Sustainable Development held two sessions in New York in 1996. At its fifth session (29-31 January) [E/CN.17/1996/31], the Board examined three topics: the impact of the global multimedia communications revolution on sustainable development; sustainable energy and transport systems; and the Board's role in the 1997 review of progress achieved in the implementation of the 1992 Rio Commitments (the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, Agenda 21, and the Non-legally Binding Authoritative Statement of Principles for a Global Consensus on the Management, Conservation and Sustainable Development of All Types of Forests) [YUN 1992, p. 670].

On communications, the Board agreed that modern telecommunications and information technologies that were broadly accessible could promote sustainable development by promoting economic growth, providing access to information, promoting civil society and reducing energy-consuming travel. Although such new technologies, with their relatively low cost, allowed developed countries to "leapfrog" older, more expensive technologies, they also posed risks, such as promoting consumerism, allowing multinational companies to exploit local situations through better information, overwhelming people with floods of information and reducing cultural diversity. The Board agreed that every country should encourage modern information technologies and should educate the general public to enable households and businesses to benefit from globalization.

With regard to energy and transportation, the Board noted that fossil fuels provided 85 per cent of world commercial energy and 97 per cent of fuel used in transportation. Although most consumption took place in developed countries, future growth was projected to occur in developing countries, where 2.5 billion people still had little access to commercial energy. Lack of energy was a barrier to socio-economic development, but production and consumption patterns contributed to many environmental problems. Concerns over long-term availability of fossil fuels had given way to those regarding the contribution of carbon dioxide emissions to global warming. The Board agreed that there was great potential for increasing energy efficiency and alleviating the environmental impacts of fossil fuels. It also agreed that the main obstacle to the wide use of energy-efficiency measures and renewable sources of energy was the competitive advantage of fossil fuels, which was likely to prevail as long as their environmental costs were not internalized. Transportation accounted for 24 per cent of world commercial energy demand, and demand was expected to continue to grow, especially in developing countries. Some estimates suggested that the social and environmental costs of existing transportation patterns were equal to or greater than fuel costs. The Board urged Governments to report on progress in responding to the Commission for Sustainable Development's recommendations to eliminate lead from petrol. Policies for sustainable energy and transportation could focus on three main objectives: reducing emissions from transportation systems; shifting to transportation systems with lower emissions; and reducing the demand for transportation. Greater attention needed to be paid to measures to discourage private transportation and encourage the use of public transportation. Since international competition could be an obstacle to adopting environmental policies, more effective and stringent regulation and environmental standards for transportation systems needed to be implemented or coordinated at the international level. The Board agreed that further attention should be paid to a number of questions: limiting the growth of air traffic; incentives for more efficient and cleaner cars; encouragement of least-cost planning/demand-side management schemes to stimulate energy efficiency; and internationally agreed environmental taxation schemes.

As to the 1997 review of the implementation of the Rio Commitments, the Board decided that it would contribute by taking initiatives to generate debate on their implementation in the constituencies of Board members and by preparing a report for submission to the Commission on Sustainable Development in 1997.

At its sixth session (4-6 September) [E/CN.17/1997/10], the Board focused on the organization and content of the report to be prepared for the 1997 review of the implementation of the Rio Commitments. It agreed that the report would focus on sustainable development in three critical sectors—energy, transport and water.

Special session to review Agenda 21 (1997)

Commission on Sustainable Development. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 50/113 YUN 1995, p. 840], the high-level segment of the Commission on Sustainable Development addressed matters related to the special session of the General Assembly, scheduled to be held in 1997 to undertake an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 672]. The Commission had before it a report [E/CN.17/1996/25] of the Secretary-General on preparations for the special session, describing action taken with regard to substantive issues, both within and outside the Commission, to implement Agenda 21. The report also addressed the need for a sectoral perspective and discussed issues of process.

In a 3 May summary [E/1996/28] of the high-level segment, the Commission Chairman stated that there was broad consensus that the special session should not attempt to renegotiate Agenda 21 or other intergovernmental agreements in the field of sustainable development, but should rather concentrate on their further implementation. A number of objectives were highlighted: to revitalize and energize commitment to the concept of sustainable development, ensure a central place for it on the political agenda, and reinforce momentum for its implementation at the international, national and local levels; to recognize the failure to meet certain goals and identify reasons for that; to boost implementation of the Rio Commitments by identifying innovative approaches to cooperation and financial assistance and concrete proposals for action; to define priorities for the period beyond 1997; and to raise the profile of issues that had not been sufficiently addressed by UNCED or in areas where significant developments had taken place. Reflecting on the implementation of Agenda 21 objectives, participants in the high-level segment noted the continuing need to strengthen mechanisms within the UN system that helped to integrate environmental concerns more fully into regular decision-making processes. They stressed the importance of involving major groups both in the preparations for the 1997 special session and in the session itself.

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General in October reported [A/51/420] on preparations for the special session. He described action taken by the Commission on Sustainable Development at its 1996 session (see above) and by the Commission Bureau, which met in New York on 15 July and decided that the special session should result in the adoption of an agreed statement or a declaration. The format and structure of a final document and its main elements were to be discussed by the Ad Hoc Inter-sessional Working Group of the Commission in February/March 1997.

The report enumerated activities carried out by IACSD, UN organizations and bodies, the High-level Advisory Board on Sustainable Development, Governments and major groups, and also made proposals for the organization of the special session.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/181.

Special session for the purpose of an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 47/190 of 22 December 1992, in which it decided to convene, not later than 1997, a special session for the purpose of an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21,

Reaffirming its resolution 50/113 of 20 December 1995, as the agreed basis that determines the modalities for the preparations for the special session, including the relevant role of the Commission on Sustainable Development, as the functional commission of the Economic and Social Council mandated to follow up the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, as well as the role of other relevant organizations and bodies of the United Nations system,

Strongly reaffirming that the special session for the overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21 will be undertaken on the basis of and in full respect of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development,

Taking note of the progress report of the Secretary-General on the state of preparations for the 1997 special session, and taking into account the views and concerns expressed by delegations to the Commission on Sustainable Development at its fourth session, the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1996 and the Second Committee of the General Assembly at its fifty-first session,

1. Decides to convene the special session envisaged in its resolution 47/190 for a duration of one week, from 23 to 27 June 1997, at the highest political level of participation;

2. Decides also that the Commission on Sustainable Development will devote the forthcoming meeting of its Ad Hoc Open-ended Inter-sessional Working Group, to be held from 24 February to 7 March 1997, to preparing for the special session, and that the Commission will devote its fifth session, to be held from 7 to 25 April 1997 as a negotiating meeting, to final preparations for the special session for the overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21;

3. Recognizes the important contributions made by major groups, including non-governmental organizations, at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development and in the implementation of its recommendations, and the need for their effective participation in preparations for the special session, as well as the need to ensure appropriate arrangements, taking into account the practice and experience gained at the Conference, for their substantive contributions to and active involvement in the preparatory meetings and the special session, and in that context invites the President of the General Assembly, in consultation with Member States, to propose to Member States appropriate modalities for the effective involvement of major groups in the special session;

4. Decides to invite States members of the specialized agencies which are not members of the United Nations to participate in the work of the special session in the capacity of observers;

5. Stresses that there should be no attempt to renegotiate Agenda 21, the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, the Non-legally Binding Authoritative Statement of Principles for a Global Consensus on the Management, Conservation and Sustainable Development of All Types of Forests or other internationally recognized intergovernmental agreements in the field of environment and sustainable development, and that discussions at both the preparatory meetings and the special session should focus on the fulfilment of commitments and the further implementation of Agenda 21 and related post-Conference outcomes;

6. Requests the Secretariat to provide all relevant reports called for in General Assembly resolution 50/113, including all other reports related to the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, for consideration by the Ad Hoc Open-ended Inter-sessional Working Group of the Commission on Sustainable Development and by the Commission at its fifth session, in accordance with the six-week rule and preferably not later than 15 January 1997;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that preparations for the comprehensive report are conducted in accordance with paragraph 13 (a), (b), (c) and (d) of Assembly resolution 50/113;

8. Invites the Secretary-General to include in the reports requested in Assembly resolution 50/113 for the preparation of the special session information on the application of the principles contained in the Rio Declaration, and invites the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme to include in its report to the General Assembly at its special session information and views on ways to address, in a forward-looking manner, national, regional and international application of these principles and the implementation of Agenda 21 in the interrelated issues of environment and development;

9. Decides to consider at its special session, inter alia, the application of the principles of the Rio Declaration at all levels—national, regional and international—and to make relevant recommendations thereon;

10. Requests that other contributions to the special session, in addition to those identified in its resolution 50/113, include submissions from relevant bodies and organizations of the United Nations, including the Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Panel on Forests of the Commission on Sustainable Development and the Global Environmental Facility, information on the outcomes of United Nations conferences held since the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, such as the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States, regional and subregional conferences, summits and other inter-sessional meetings on sustainable development organized by countries, and information on the activities of relevant United Nations conventions on the environment and development and the global freshwater assessment, and that account be taken of the activities organized by major groups, including business and industry and non-governmental organizations;

11. Requests the Secretary-General, in the report on cross-sectoral issues of Agenda 21 for the special session, to give special consideration, without prejudice to other priority issues that may be identified in the preparatory process, to combating poverty and to health, financial resources and mechanisms, education, science, transfer of technology, consumption and production patterns, trade, environment and sustainable development, major groups, demographic dynamics, capacity-building and decision-making;

12. Also requests the Secretary-General, in the reports for the special session, to give consideration, where appropriate and without prejudice to other priority issues that may be identified in the preparatory process, to linkages between the cross-sectoral issues of Agenda 21 and relevant sectoral issues;

13. Welcomes the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), held at Istanbul from 3 to 14 June 1996, and its relevance to the field of sustainable development, calls for effective interaction and exchange of information on work carried out by the Commission on Sustainable Development and the Commission on Human Settlements, and invites the Commission on Human Settlements to make a contribution to the special session in connection with the implementation of the Habitat Agenda adopted in Istanbul;

14. Invites Governments and regional organizations to cooperate with the Secretary-General in preparing country profiles for review at the fifth session of the Commission on Sustainable Development, as envisaged in paragraph 13 of General Assembly resolution 50/113;

15. Also invites Governments to assist developing countries, particularly the least developed among them, in participating fully in the special session and its preparatory process, and to make timely contributions to the Trust Fund for Support of the Work of the Commission on Sustainable Development;

16. Requests the Secretary-General to enhance the public information programme of the United Nations so as to raise global awareness in a balanced manner, in all countries, of both the special session and the work undertaken by the United Nations in the follow-up to the Conference, and invites all Governments to promote widespread dissemination, at all levels, of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, and to make voluntary contributions to support the public outreach activities of the United Nations for the special session;

17. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the sub-item entitled "Special session for the purpose of an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21", and requests the Secretary-General to submit to it at that session a report on the special session.

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/605/Add.2) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.41), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica for Group of 77 and China, and Colombia for Movement of Non-Aligned Countries (A/C.2/51/L.9); agenda item 97 (b).

Eradication of poverty

Commission on Sustainable Development. In a February 1996 report [E/CN.17/1996/9], the Secretary-General described progress during the preceding year in implementing the goals of chapter 3 of Agenda 21 (combating poverty), with special reference to the Commission's 1995 recommendations [YUN 1995, p. 841]. He summarized the outcomes of major UN conferences held between 1991 and 1996 with regard to that subject, and reviewed progress achieved in reducing poverty by Governments, through international cooperation and activities of UN agencies, and by major groups. He also described opportunities and constraints faced in the implementation of Agenda 21's chapter 3. The report also suggested that the Commission might wish to recommend that national strategies for poverty eradication include linkages to environmental issues.

In a decision on combating poverty [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/2)], the Commission urged Governments to formulate or strengthen national strategies to eradicate absolute poverty and reduce overall poverty. It recommended that Governments integrate environmental issues in such strategies and ensure that they were related to national sustainable development strategies, while recognizing that economic growth was a fundamental element of sustainable development. The Commission suggested to the Economic and Social Council that, in its future work, the Commission should focus its attention on links between poverty and the environment.

Commission for Social Development. The Commission for Social Development held a special session in 1996 (New York, 21-31 May) [E/1996/29], at which it discussed strategies and actions for the eradication of poverty, in accordance with a 1995 Economic and Social Council decision [YUN 1995, p. 1121]. It had before it a report [E/CN.5/1996/3] of the Secretary-General on policy and programme considerations in the formulation of integrated strategies for poverty eradication, meeting the basic human needs of all and promotion of self-reliance and community-based initiatives. The Secretary-General summarized the main recommendations of the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1113] in regard to poverty eradication and outlined policy options for consideration by public authorities and other social actors.

The Commission adopted a resolution on strategies and actions for the eradication of poverty [E/1996/29 (res. S-1996/1)], by which it urged Governments to integrate poverty eradication strategies into overall development policies that took into account a people-centred and equitable process in which the ultimate goal of economic and social policies should be to better the human condition, responding to the needs and maximizing the potential of all members of society.

The Commission reaffirmed that human resources development was an essential part of poverty reduction strategies, which should also be based on strengthening the productive capacities of people living in poverty through the promotion of job training and job-creating activities and wider access to productive resources, as well as through programmes and policies directed towards the stimulation of productive employment, labour-intensive development and improvements in productivity.

The Commission stressed that Governments, in partnership with civil society and all other development actors (including NGOs and people living in poverty and their organizations), should cooperate to meet basic human needs—such as income, resources, education, health care, nutrition, shelter, sanitation and safe water—particularly of people living in poverty and vulnerable and disadvantaged groups. The Commission also stressed the need for Governments and international institutions or organizations to examine how the rapid globalization of the world economy and the increased liberalization of trade were affecting the ability of States to design and implement effective strategies for eradicating poverty and to provide a stable legal framework that would create an enabling environment to achieve social development and to meet the basic human needs of all, in order to prevent greater inequality between different sectors of society.

Governments were urged to promote and attain the goals of eradicating illiteracy, achieving universal and equitable access to quality education, and attaining the highest standard of physical and mental health. They were also called upon to encourage international organizations, particularly international financial institutions, to support those objectives and integrate them into policy programmes and operations.

The Commission invited all UN specialized agencies, funds, programmes and related organizations, including the Bretton Woods institutions, to strengthen and adjust their activities, programmes and strategies, with a view to achieving the overall goal of eradicating poverty. The UNDP Administrator was invited to examine the options for continuing such programmes as the Poverty Strategies Initiative during the UN Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006), so as to help developing countries, particularly African countries and LDCs, elaborate national plans, and formulate and implement replicable projects, to eradicate poverty.

Coordination of poverty eradication activities. In accordance with a 1995 decision [YUN 1995, p. 844], the Economic and Social Council considered the question of coordination of UN system activities for poverty eradication during its coordination segment (1-3 and 26 July). It had before it a report of the Secretary-General [E/1996/61], in which he discussed coordinated UN support and availability of resources for poverty eradication activities at the field level. A number of recommendations were presented to the Council relating to defining a poverty eradication strategy; moving towards a common country assessment of poverty; making better use of the country strategy note and the resident coordinator system; and improving cooperation with the Bretton Woods institutions. The report also described progress being made in mainstreaming the gender perspective in UN poverty eradication activities, and made recommendations for integrating the gender perspective into the follow-up to UN conferences, as well as into the work of the Council itself.

In an effort to assist the Council to promote harmonized and integrated consideration of poverty eradication at the intergovernmental level, particularly within its subsidiary machinery, the Secretary-General also made recommendations for an integrated review by the Council with respect to refocusing the work of some functional commissions on core aspects of poverty eradication.

On 26 July, the Council adopted agreed conclusions [A/51/3/Rev.1 (agreed conclusions 1996/1)] in which it recognized that the goal of poverty eradication represented a major challenge for the UN system. It stated that the participation of the system, including UN funds, programmes and specialized agencies, in the overall efforts of poverty eradication was aimed at assisting Member States in translating the global goals and commitments of international conferences into concrete actions, especially at the country level. The conclusions covered the issues of coordinated UN support and availability of resources for poverty eradication activities at the field level; mainstreaming the gender perspective in UN poverty eradication activities; and a harmonized and integrated approach to intergovernmental consideration of poverty eradication.

UNDP activities. In his annual report covering 1996 [DP/1997/16], the UNDP Administrator stated that the Programme's attempts to concentrate on poverty eradication within sustainable human development during the year had included strengthening policy analysis on the complex links between economic policy decisions and poverty eradication. It was widely acknowledged that poverty was multidimensional and country-specific; the constraints on eradicating it existed at the conceptual, analytical and operational levels. Sharpening UNDP's focus on poverty eradication involved finding appropriate sustainable human development entry points in varying country situations and continual improvement of methodologies for analysis and response. As Capacity 21 assistance had shown, nationally owned analysis and learning-by-doing were vital, but involving the poor in the design of strategies to improve their well-being implied investment in time. A first set of training packages and guidelines for poverty situation analyses, issued in 1996, was being reviewed and refined, based on country experience.

Strategic actions to be taken included: continuing work focusing on poverty eradication, taking into account the specificity of programme countries; completing work under the 1996-1997

UNDP Plan, e.g., the compilation and sharing of best practices through modern information networks; closer collaboration with other UN agencies, notably within the context of indicators of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), UNDP and the World Bank task force on poverty; and the development of actions specified by the change management exercise, "UNDP 2001" (see PART THREE, Chapter II).

International Year and UN Decade for the Eradication of Poverty

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/107 [YUN 1995, p. 844], the Secretary-General submitted a report [A/51/443] in October on the observance of the International Year for the Eradication of Poverty in 1996 and the proclamation of the first UN Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006). The report summarized action taken by the UN system in observance of the Year, noting that the Copenhagen Declaration and Programme of Action, adopted at the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1114], provided the substantive framework for the activities in observance of the Year and for planning UN efforts in support of the first Decade and beyond. The report also described initiatives taken in and by the UN system to lay the foundation for a long-term programme of support for the Decade's goals and objectives, and made a number of suggestions for Assembly consideration concerning action in support of the Decade.

The Assembly also had before it a report [A/51/348] of the Secretary-General on implementation of the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development, which described action taken within and outside the UN system relating to the International Year and the Decade (see PART THREE, Chapter IX).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/178.

First United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/183 of 21 December 1993, 49/110 of 19 December 1994 and 50/107 of 20 December 1995 related to the observance of the International Year for the Eradication of Poverty and proclamation of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty, and all other relevant resolutions relating to international cooperation for the eradication of poverty in developing countries,

Recognizing that the international community, at the highest political level, has already reached a consensus on and committed itself to the eradication of poverty through declarations and programmes of action of the major United Nations conferences and summits organized since 1990, particularly the World Summit for Social Development and the Fourth World Conference on Women, Expressing serious concern that more than 1.3 billion people in the world, a majority of whom are women, live in absolute poverty, especially in developing countries, and that the number of such people continues to increase,

Welcoming the formulation of direct programmes of poverty eradication by some developing countries at the national level,

Having considered the reports of the Secretary-General on the observance of the International Year for the Eradication of Poverty and proclamation of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty and on the implementation of the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development,

Recognizing that investment in human capital and domestic and international policies supportive of economic and social development are essential prerequisites for the eradication of poverty,

Noting the activities to eradicate poverty carried out by countries, by organizations and bodies of the United Nations system and by organizations, associations, institutions and entities of civil society, within the framework of the International Year for the Eradication of Poverty, and the coordinated implementation of and follow-up to the results of the major United Nations conferences and summits organized since 1990 in the economic, social and related fields,

Noting also the action to be taken within the framework of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006),

Recalling its resolution 50/161 of 22 December 1995, in which it decided to hold a special session in the year 2000 for an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development and to consider further actions and initiatives, inter alia, towards the eradication of poverty in the world,

Taking note of the agreed conclusions on coordination of the United Nations system activities for poverty eradication, adopted by the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1996, as well as of the outcome of the sessions of relevant functional commissions of the Economic and Social Council in 1996,

1. Expresses its solidarity with people living in poverty in all countries and reaffirms that the satisfaction of basic human needs is an essential element of poverty eradication, those needs being closely interrelated and comprising nutrition, health, water and sanitation, education, employment, housing and participation in cultural and social life;

2. Also expresses its solidarity with those suffering from a lack of control over resources, including land, skills, knowledge, capital and social connections, and calls for particular actions to provide appropriate social services to enable vulnerable people and people living in poverty to improve their lives, to exercise their rights and to participate fully in all social, economic and political activities and to contribute to social and economic development;

3. Decides that the theme for the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty shall be "Eradicating poverty is an ethical, social, political and economic imperative of humankind", and also decides to adopt the logo for the Decade as proposed in the report of the Secretary-General;

4. Recommends that, within the context of overall action for the eradication of poverty, special attention should be given to the multidimensional nature of poverty and to the national and international framework conditions and policies that are conducive to its eradication, which should aim at the social and economic integration of people living in poverty and the promotion and protection of all human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, including the right to development;

5. Also recommends that the causes of poverty be addressed in the context of sectoral strategies such as those on environment, food security, population, migration, health, shelter, human resources development, fresh water, including clean water and sanitation, rural development and productive employment, and by addressing the specific needs of vulnerable groups, all of which should aim at the social and economic integration of people living in poverty;

6. Decides that the themes for 1997 and 1998 shall be "Poverty, environment and development" and "Poverty, human rights and development", respectively; the themes for the remaining years of the Decade will be decided every two years, commencing in 1998, at the fifty-third session of the General Assembly;

7. Also decides that the objective of the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty is to achieve the goal of eradicating absolute poverty and reducing overall poverty substantially in the world, through decisive national actions and international co-operation in implementing fully and effectively all agreements, commitments and recommendations of major United Nations conferences and summits organized since 1990 as they relate to poverty eradication;

8. Invites all donors to give high priority to the eradication of poverty in their assistance budgets and programmes, on either a bilateral or multilateral basis, and also invites the relevant funds, programmes and agencies of the United Nations system to support developing countries, particularly African countries and the least developed countries, in their efforts to achieve the overall goal of eradicating poverty and ensuring basic social services, by supporting national efforts to formulate, coordinate, implement, monitor and assess integrated poverty strategies, including capacity-building, and by supporting efforts to empower people living in poverty;

9. Stresses that international cooperation and assistance are essential to supporting the efforts of developing countries, particularly African countries and the least developed countries, to meet the goal of eradicating poverty, and stresses at the same time that, at the request of Governments, the United Nations system should provide technical assistance in further developing and sustaining national capacities to gather and analyse information and to develop indicators for poverty analysis;

10. Calls upon all Governments and the United Nations system, in particular the relevant funds, programmes and agencies, to promote an active and visible policy of mainstreaming a gender perspective and to use gender analysis as a tool for the integration of a gender dimension into the planning and implementation of policies, strategies and programmes on poverty eradication;

11. Stresses that during the Decade and beyond, people living in poverty and their organizations should be empowered by being fully involved in the setting of targets and in the design, implementation, monitoring and assessment of national strategies, activities and programmes for poverty eradication and the development of community bases, ensuring that such programmes reflect their priorities;

12. Encourages developing countries, particularly African countries and the least developed countries, to mobilize domestic and external resources for poverty eradication activities and programmes and to facilitate their full and effective implementation;

13. Recommends that all Governments formulate or strengthen integrated poverty eradication strategies and policies and implement national poverty eradication plans or programmes, in a participatory manner, to address the structural causes of poverty, encompassing action on the local, national, subregional, regional and international levels, and stresses that those plans or programmes should establish, within each national context, strategies and affordable time-bound goals and targets for the substantial reduction of overall poverty and the eradication of absolute poverty;

14. Recognizes the need to increase the share of funding for social development programmes, in particular basic social programmes, commensurate with the scope and scale of the activities required to achieve the objectives and goals set out in commitment 2 of the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and chapter II of the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development, relating to the eradication of poverty;

15. Reaffirms, in this context, that developed countries should, as soon as possible, strive for the fulfilment of the agreed target of 0.7 per cent of their gross national product for overall official development assistance and, where agreed, within that target, earmark 0.15 to 0.20 per cent of gross national product for the least developed countries;

16. Also reaffirms the agreement on a mutual commitment between interested developed and developing country partners to allocate, on average, 20 per cent of official development assistance and 20 per cent of the national budget, respectively, to basic social programmes, and notes with interest the consensus reached at Oslo on 25 April 1996 on this matter;

17. Welcomes the recent initiatives of the Bretton Woods institutions, including the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative, and the ongoing process at the international level regarding debt relief, as appropriate, for developing countries, and calls upon the international community, including international financial institutions, to implement fully and effectively all initiatives that will contribute to a durable solution of the debt problems of developing countries, in particular African countries and the least developed countries, and thus support their efforts to eradicate poverty;

18. Reaffirms that the international community, including multilateral financial institutions, should consider further measures to facilitate the access of developing countries, particularly African countries and the least developed countries, to international markets, in order to enable them to implement fully and effectively their national anti-poverty activities and programmes;

19. Urges the international community to reduce, as appropriate, excessive military expenditures on and investments in arms production and acquisition, consistent with national security requirements, in order to increase resources for social and economic development, in particular to poverty eradication programmes in developing countries, particularly African countries and the least developed countries;

20. Calls upon all States, particularly donor countries, to contribute substantially to the Trust Fund for the Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development, established under the authority of the Secretary-General, which includes in its activities support for activities related to the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty;

21. Invites the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme to continue, as a contribution, inter alia, to the Decade, the effort launched in 1996 with the Poverty Strategies Initiative, in order to strengthen assistance in the elaboration of national plans, programmes and strategies to eradicate poverty in developing countries, particularly African countries and the least developed countries, and calls upon all countries to contribute to the Initiative;

22. Welcomes the agreed conclusions on the coordination of United Nations system activities for poverty eradication, adopted by the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1996, and calls for their full and effective implementation by organizations of the United Nations system;

23. Notes with interest the initiative to convene a micro-credit summit in Washington, D.C., from 2 to 4 February 1997, to focus on the importance of increasing access to micro-credit and related financial services for self-employment and income-generating activities for people living in poverty, in particular women in developing countries, and calls upon all Governments, the United Nations system, including the Bretton Woods institutions, and the relevant actors of civil society to participate actively in the summit so as to contribute to its successful outcome and to support the development, implementation and management of micro-credit programmes in developing countries;

24. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to provide the Secretariat entity entrusted with the task of system-wide promotion of and follow-up to activities and programmes of the Decade with adequate human and financial resources within the regular budget of the United Nations to enable it to discharge fully and effectively its functions and responsibilities;

25. Also requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the reports to be prepared for the 1997 special session of the General Assembly for the purpose of an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21 give due attention to the issue of poverty eradication;

26. Further requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the overall assessment of the implementation of the programme for the observance of the International Year for the Eradication of Poverty, taking into account progress being made in the implementation of the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development, including recommendations for possible actions and initiatives in relation to the Decade;

27. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session an item entitled "First United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006)".

General Assembly resolution 51/178

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/604/Add.6) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.51), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica for Group of 77 and China (A/C.2/51/L.18); agenda item 96 (f).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 17, 18, 20-27, 32, 37; plenary 86.

Science and technology for development

The Commission on Science and Technology for Development did not meet in 1996. However, inter-sessional activities were carried out on information and communication technologies, scientific and technological aspects of sustainable energy systems, gender issues, technological capacity-building, and coordination of science and technology for development.

The Bureau of the Commission held two meetings in 1996 (Islamabad, Pakistan, March; Bucharest, Romania, November), at which it discussed in detail its 1995 recommendations [YUN 1995, p. 849], as endorsed by the Economic and Social Council in July of that year [YUN 1995, p. 850].

Technology transfer

Commission on Sustainable Development.

The Secretary-General presented to the Commission on Sustainable Development a report [E/CN.17/1996/13] on the transfer of environmentally sound technologies (ESTs), cooperation and capacity-building, which provided an update on steps taken and results achieved in implementing the work programme on the transfer of EST, approved by the Commission in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 854]. The work programme focused on three related areas: improving access to and dissemination of information on EST; capacity-building and institutional development; and financial and partnership arrangements. Based on national information and on information supplied by regional and international organizations, the report set out a series of recommendations and proposals for action, among other things aimed at cleaner production technologies and more efficient production systems emphasizing pollution prevention and minimization of waste. ISO 14000—the international environmental management standards established by the International Organization for Standardization (ISO)—had considerable potential to stimulate the adoption of environmental management standards and practices among enterprises throughout the world, on a voluntary basis, the report stated. Partnerships between the private and public sectors should be encouraged as a means to agree on and achieve environmental goals and objectives and to demonstrate the economic and environmental benefits that could accrue through the application of ESTs and cleaner production methods, with a view to enhancing eco-efficiency concepts. A number of recommendations for action by Governments were suggested for Commission consideration.

In an addendum [E/CN.17/1996/13/Add.1] to that report, the Secretary-General focused on the assessment of experiences gained, results achieved and problems encountered in implementing specific elements of the work programme on EST transfer, with a view to identifying key issues for further Commission consideration.

In a 3 May decision [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/10)], the Commission urged Governments of developed and developing countries and countries with economies in transition to adopt appropriate environmental legislation to enhance the successful dissemination of ESTs in their own countries. They were also encouraged to develop and implement a mix of policy measures, including regulations and economic instruments and incentives to stimulate the adoption of cleaner production technologies and improved, more efficient systems of production that emphasized pollution prevention and waste minimization and recycling, with particular attention to the adoption of such systems by small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs).

The Commission also encouraged the greater use of partnership arrangements in and between the private and public sectors as a means to achieve commonly agreed environmental goals; urged countries, international and business organizations to share information on the use and effectiveness of policy measures adopted by Governments and the private sector to promote, develop or create greater demand for technology and technological innovations aimed at changing methods of production, including improving efficiency in the use of energy and natural resources and reducing pollution and waste; called on Governments of developing countries and countries with economies in transition to strengthen EST support structures, including technical advisory or consultancy services, marketing support, legal advice, research and development and laboratory facilities and services; and urged Governments, in cooperation with business and industry, to apply appropriate measures to assist local companies to gain access to financial markets to facilitate technological cooperation and technology transfer.

The Commission invited the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) to continue to develop an EST information system network and to keep the Commission informed of its progress, and invited UNEP to consider developing and maintaining a catalogue of EST-related information systems and eventually to make such a catalogue publicly available. Business and industry, including transnational corporations, were invited to take steps to facilitate the access of SMEs to financial markets and ESTs and to promote capacity-building, particularly in developing countries.

In 1996, the Division on Science and Technology and the Division on Transnational Corporations and Investment of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) issued a study titled Promoting the Transfer and Use of Environmentally Sound Technology: A review of policies [Sales No. E.96.II.D.4].

Economic and social trends and policy

Economic surveys and trends

The World Economic and Social Survey 1996 [Sales No. E.96.II.C.1], prepared by the Department for Economic and Social Information and Policy Analysis and issued in mid-1996, observed that, although the world economy was on a slowly accelerating growth path, it had not yet attained the more rapid and sustainable rate of growth of which it was capable. However, such growth appeared to be on the horizon for 1997.

The world's gross output of goods and services was expected to increase by about 2.5 per cent in 1996 for the third year in a row. That was a lower rate of expansion than the world average of the 1980s, but represented a considerable improvement compared with the first three years of the 1990s. A year earlier, a somewhat higher growth rate—3.25 per cent—had been forecast for 1996, a rate that was expected to be attained in 1997. The acceleration had been postponed by a slower growth trajectory of the developed economies in 1995 and 1996 than had been foreseen earlier.

In the developed economies, the cyclic upswing in economic activity lost some momentum in 1995. The slowdown in Australia, Canada, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States was not unexpected, as those countries were the first to emerge from the previous recession. In continental Europe, however, the recovery of 1994 and early 1995 virtually stalled in late 1995. Indeed, there was a significant drop in activity at that time in several countries, including Belgium, France, Germany, Sweden and Switzerland. At the same time, after four years of almost no growth in output, the Japanese economy started to show signs of recovery. The increase in real gross domestic product (GDP) in the industrialized countries, although more synchronized, was expected to remain quite low. The Western European economy was forecast to grow by almost 1.5 per cent in 1996, while Japan and the United States were expected to see growth rates of about 2 per cent. With moderate growth, consumer price inflation was likely to remain under 2.5 per cent during 1996—a rate roughly in line with the long-run target for inflation being followed by the major central banks. Increased output had not led to commensurate increases in real wages—a major factor in holding inflation to a low level. However, restraint in wage increases meant that consumer spending had not played as large a role in stimulating economic growth as in previous economic cycles. Persistently high unemployment and growing income inequality were related concerns for policy makers. Among the seven major industrialized countries, only in the United Kingdom and the United States had the unemployment rate been below its 1980s average. The situation was particularly serious in Western Europe, where the unemployment rate rose from 8 per cent in 1991 to 11 per cent in 1994, a level from which it had barely receded.

Total output of the countries of Central and Eastern Europe and the successor States of the former USSR measured one third less in 1995 than in 1990. However, 1996 was expected to mark the end of economic contraction and the resumption of economic growth in transition economies as a whole. All Central and Eastern European transition economies and those of the Baltic States had begun growing by 1994, and many had strong rates of growth in 1995, with further strong growth forecast for 1996. The situation had been much more difficult in the countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), where output continued to decline in 1995, albeit less rapidly than in earlier years. Only the beginnings of growth were foreseen in 1996. Indeed, there was so much uncertainty surrounding that prospect that a further contraction of output would not be surprising, the Survey stated. In Central and Eastern European countries, consumer demand, initially satisfied by imports, was increasingly being met by domestic production. Investment was picking up, as was industrial productivity. However, the unemployment picture remained serious and inflation rates, although falling, remained high. As a result of inflows of foreign exchange, either as portfolio investment or foreign direct investment, foreign-exchange reserves in most countries of the region had jumped.

The Russian Federation had also made remarkable progress: inflation had fallen, foreign-exchange reserves were high and private economic activity was advancing strongly. Nevertheless, little economic growth was forecast for 1996 and continued decline could not be completely ruled out. If uncertainty in the business community over future economic policy was reduced and the country invested the considerable resources that were leaving or being held in the form of foreign exchange, the outlook would be much brighter. Indeed, the human resources and much of the infrastructure that was so essential for economic growth were, for the most part, readily available in the Russian Federation. In contrast, short-term prospects for resumed economic growth were minimal in many other CIS countries.

In 71 of the 93 developing countries whose data were regularly monitored, GDP per capita rose in 1995; 75 countries were expected to belong to that group in 1996. That represented a substantial rise from 50 countries in 1993. Rising per-capita output was not a phenomenon limited mainly to China and the rapidly growing economies of South and East Asia. The least developed countries (LDCs) in particular had made significant gains in 1995 and were expected to advance further in 1996.

The gain in the number of countries having rising per-capita GDP had been most pronounced in Africa, where output grew 2.76 per cent in 1995, about equal to the population growth. The region was expected to see an increase in GDP per capita in 1996 for the first time since 1985. Prospects had improved under favourable external conditions and ameliorated policy environments. Also, after droughts in 1995, good rainfall had returned to northern and southern Africa and a favourable 1996 agricultural season was predicted, except in countries affected by civil strife. Despite overall performance, most African countries were still among the poorest in the world. The improved economic performance during 1995-1996 was as yet a short-term phenomenon and, unless it continued, would not be sufficient to alleviate significantly poverty, deteriorated social conditions and high unemployment rates.

In Latin America and the Caribbean, the regional GDP had increased by less than 1 per cent in 1995, well below population growth, and prospects for 1996 were for a mild recovery with growth not expected to exceed 2.5 per cent. On the positive side, inflation had fallen to 25 per cent by the end of 1995, the lowest for 22 years, and further slowing of inflation was expected during 1996. Although Mexico's financial crisis was contained through international and domestic efforts, its negative consequences were the interruption of the economic recovery that the region had been experiencing since 1991. In several of the Caribbean island economies, economic growth slowed down due to a combination of adverse weather conditions affecting the tourism industry and agriculture, energy shortages that constrained manufacturing output, and austere fiscal and monetary policies to control inflation. However, growth had picked up in the Dominican Republic and resumed in Cuba and Haiti.

Following a year of near stagnation in 1994, economic growth in West Asia recovered and reached 3.1 per cent in 1995. Oil-importing economies expanded at a rate of 6.4 per cent, while the oil-exporting economies grew 2.6 per cent. Higher oil prices and export revenues boosted economic recovery in most oil exporters; however, efforts to implement economic reforms and reduce budget deficits, while reducing fiscal imbalances, restrained growth in most of them. In the oil-importing countries, strong growth in private investment and consumption helped to boost economic recovery, while reports of progress towards peace in the Middle East stimulated growth of new investment, tourism and construction, particularly in Israel, Jordan and Lebanon.

In South and East Asia, growth was expected to moderate slightly to 6 per cent in 1996 from 7 per cent in 1995. The reversal in the trend of accelerating growth since 1992 was largely the result of a deceleration in economic expansion in most of the high-growth countries—Indonesia, Malaysia, the Republic of Korea, Singapore and Thailand. Of other economies in the region, those of Hong Kong and Taiwan Province of China were expected to maintain their 1995 rates of growth of 5 to 6 per cent in 1996, and the positive economic growth of India, the Philippines and Viet Nam was expected to continue. However, growth in Bangladesh, Pakistan and Sri Lanka was likely to be restrained by political instability. The expected deceleration in the high-growth economies was the result of tightening monetary policies implemented in 1995. Several years of continued high growth had resulted in increasing upward price pressure; the changing policy stance was directed at slowing economic expansion to a more sustainable rate with lower inflation and reduced current-account deficits.

During 1995, China maintained a contractionary policy stance and its economic growth rate slowed to 10 per cent, while inflation slowed also. It adopted a relatively tight monetary policy to curb inflation. The rise in retail sales slowed, and the rate of inflation was reduced to about 17 per cent from 24 per cent in 1994.

In a note giving an update of the world economy [E/1997/INF/1], the Secretary-General stated that finally the world economy was growing as fast as it had in the 1980s. With low inflation in most countries, growth might also be more sustainable. In many countries, however, there was not yet enough growth to reduce poverty and unemployment adequately. GDP of developed economies grew slightly faster in 1996 than the 2 per cent forecast, mainly due to a stronger-than-expected recovery in Japan (3.6 per cent). The economic growth of developing countries was also slightly stronger than the 5.5 per cent anticipated. Transition economies did not realize an expected first increase in aggregate GDP of the decade. While most European economies grew and some quite rapidly, Bulgaria slipped into a steep recession. The Russian Federation did not post the positive growth numbers anticipated, although several Central Asian economies did.

The Trade and Development Report, 1996 [Sales No. E.96.II.D.6], produced by UNCTAD, stated that growth of 4 per cent in developing countries as a whole (excluding China) in 1995 continued to outpace that of developed countries (2 per cent). The gap was considered likely to widen in 1996, if most regions maintained or improved their growth performance. Only a relatively modest recovery was expected in Latin America, where repercussions of the Mexican peso crisis in 1995 proved to be much deeper than anticipated. In contrast, growth in developing African countries in 1995 was not only broadly based but also the highest for the region since the beginning of the decade. Growth in developing countries in Asia continued to be outstanding throughout 1995, accelerating to 6.3 per cent, excluding China, which continued to be one of the fastest-growing economies in the world, with a growth rate of more than 10 per cent for the fourth year in succession.

Human Development Report 1996

The complex relationship between economic growth and human development was explored in the Human Development Report 1996, prepared by UNDP. Noting that human development was the end and economic growth a means, the Report observed that the purpose of such growth should be to enrich people's lives. However, recent decades had shown that there was no automatic link between growth and human development and, even when links were established, they could be eroded unless regularly fortified by skilful and intelligent policy management.

Growth had been failing over much of the past 15 years in about 100 countries, the populations of which comprised almost a third of the world's people. In addition, the links between growth and human development were failing for people in the many countries with lopsided development—with either good growth but little human development, or good human development but little or no growth.

The Report concluded that more economic growth, not less, would generally be needed as the world entered the twenty-first century. But more attention had to go to the structure and quality of that growth to ensure that it was directed to supporting human development, reducing poverty, protecting the environment and ensuring sustainability.

The Report ranked 174 countries in its human development index, which measured human development by combining indicators of life expectancy, educational attainment, income and others.

Development planning and public administration

Development planning

In accordance with a 1995 Economic and Social Council request [YUN 1995, p. 860], the Committee for Development Planning (CDP) held its thirtieth session in 1996 (New York, 28-29 May) [E/1996/76], at which it reviewed its terms of reference and methods of work and discussed arrangements for future work.

With regard to the terms of reference, CDP members attached particular importance to assessing world development trends and prospects; identifying national and international policies that would enhance the ability of developing countries and economies in transition to participate effectively in a globalizing world economy and achieve the goals agreed at UN global conferences; and undertaking periodic reviews of the list of least developed countries (LDCs) and the criteria used for identifying them.

Pending a fuller review of its methods of work at its thirty-first (1997) session, CDP agreed to continue its practice of holding plenary sessions of up to one week, for which preparations would be made by up to three working groups.

The Committee decided to prepare for its 1997 session by convening three working groups, on the topics of: rethinking the impact of globalization on development (Working Group I); re-examining stabilization, structural adjustment and economic reform in the context of globalization (Working Group II); and a general review of the list of LDCs (Working Group III). Working Group II met from 18 to 20 December 1996.

By decision 1996/229 of 11 July, the Council took note of the CDP report on its thirtieth session.

Public administration

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 49/136 [YUN 1994, p. 777], the General Assembly from 15 to 19 April 1996 held plenary meetings devoted to public administration and development. The meetings were designed to analyse the role of public administration in a changing environment, based on an analysis of the role of the public sector, as well as to review the activities of the UN programme in that field. The Assembly had before it the report of the Group of Experts on Public Administration and Finance on its twelfth (1995) meeting [YUN 1995, p. 861] and the report of the Secretary-General on public administration and development [A/50/847-E/1996/7]. Both reports had been considered earlier by the Economic and Social Council, which had transmitted them to the Assembly by decision 1996/215 of 2 April 1996.

The Secretary-General's report, submitted in response to General Assembly resolution 49/136 [YUN 1994, p. 777], noted that the 1990s had presented new and perplexing challenges for public administration and finance systems of Governments worldwide. Mercurial domestic influences and unpredictable external factors had combined to create, for a significant number of Governments, a difficult environment that constrained decision-making and compromised performance improvement. Diverse national circumstances had generated a condition of permanent crisis management in the public sector and a need to establish a framework for stable and sustainable human development. Those challenges required a targeted, pragmatic and well-defined framework for institutional strengthening and capacity-building in support of governance and effective administrative and financial management systems.

In describing United Nations activities in public administration and development, the report reviewed UN mandates, elaborated some exemplary programmes of assistance, and gave an overview of the contributions of other organizations in the UN system concerned with public administration.

Addressing the context and dynamics of public administration and development, the report stated that, historically, the United Nations programme in public administration and finance had played a leading role in facilitating exchanges of ideas, experiences and innovations among Member States in the field of public administration and development. Consideration had to be given to: enabling conditions for development; implementing recommendations of the world conferences of the 1990s; implementing the 1995 recommendations of the Group of Experts on Public Administration and Finance [YUN 1995, p. 861]; and the importance of capacity-building in public administration.

As to strengthening the role of the United Nations in public administration and development, the report described some challenges facing the Organization and put forward recommendations for action, including those for national Governments.

The Assembly also had before it reports of the following regional meetings on public administration and development: the Interregional Seminar on the Role of Public Administration in Developing Infrastructure and Protecting the Environment (Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 6-9 March 1996) [A/50/904]; the Regional Conference on the Role of Public Administration in Promoting Economic Reform in Eastern and Central European Countries (Berlin, 24-26 January 1996) [A/50/917]; the Interregional Conference and Workshop on Public Administration and Social Development (Stockholm, Sweden, 16-20 October 1995) [A/50/919]; the Regional Meeting on Public Administration and Development in Africa: from Structural Adjustment to Improved Efficiency in Government (Windhoek, Namibia, 25-27 March 1996) [A/50/920]; the Interregional Technical Meeting on Restoring Government Administrative Machinery in Situations of Conflict (Rome, Italy, 13-15 March 1996) [A/50/921]; and the Regional Conference on the Role of Public Administration in Promoting Economic Development in Asia (Manila, Philippines, 18-20 March 1996) [A/50/929]. By a 3 April letter [A/50/918], the United Arab Emirates transmitted a report by the Arab Administrative Development Organization on administration and development in the Arab countries.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 19 April, the General Assembly adopted resolution 50/225.

Public administration and development

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Tangier Declaration, adopted by the Pan-African Conference of Ministers of the Civil Service held in Morocco on 20 and 21 June 1994,

Recalling also its resolution 49/136 of 19 December 1994 on public administration and development,

Recalling further Economic and Social Council decision 1996/215 of 2 April 1996,

Bearing in mind the rapid pace and interdependence of global, political, social and economic developments, and their implications for all countries, particularly the developing countries, and that there is a critical need for improved efficiency and effective public institutions, administrative procedures and sound financial management to harness these challenges in support of sustainable development in all countries,

Affirming that States have the sovereign right and responsibility to decide, in accordance with their own development policy, strategies, needs and priorities, on their public administration management based on the rule of law,

Acknowledging the diversity of experiences in public administrative systems as well as the political, social and economic circumstances of each country,

Recognizing that effectiveness of government requires an efficient and effective public administration in all countries that is responsive to the needs of the people, promotes social justice, ensures universal access to quality services and productive assets and creates an enabling environment for sustainable people-centred development,

Reaffirming the importance of enhancing the quality of public administration based, inter alia, on the participatory approach to development,

Recognizing the role of the United Nations in assisting Governments, at their request, in ensuring the maintenance of essential basic government services and functions during times of crisis and in developing strategies for rebuilding a viable public administration in countries undergoing post-conflict rehabilitation and reconstruction,

Taking note of the fact that the United Nations system, responding to requests from interested Member States, has contributed in support of their public administration to include wider aspects of governance, including democratic, legal and judiciary reform, and strengthening of the civil society,

Recognizing that Governments in all countries should make their procedures transparent in order to avoid and combat all acts of corruption,

Emphasizing the benefits to all countries of exchanging experiences and views in order to promote better understanding and applications of various roles and functions of government and public administration, and enhancing international cooperation in this field, including such exchanges within the context of South-South and interregional cooperation,

Recognizing the important role of the public sector in the development process and stressing the need to improve development and management of its human resources through, inter alia, appropriate national incentive measures,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on public administration and development and of the proposals contained therein;

2. Takes note also of the report of the Group of Experts on Public Administration and Finance;

3. Takes further note of the reports of the regional meetings on public administration and development;

4. Recognizes that there exist challenges and trends variously facing national Governments in the field of public administration;

5. Reaffirms that democracy and transparent and accountable governance and administration in all sectors of society are indispensable foundations for the realization of social and people-centred sustainable development;

6. Underlines the importance of transparent and accountable governance and administration in all public and private national and international institutions;

7. Recognizes that there is a need for public administration systems to be sound, efficient and well equipped with the appropriate capacities and capabilities through, inter alia, capacity-building, promotion of transfer, access and utilization of technology, establishment or improvement of training programmes for public service, strengthening of partnership of the public sector with the private sector and civil society, as well as providing an enabling environment for private sector activities, as appropriate, promotion of the role and involvement of women in public administration, and development of cross-sectoral gender-sensitive and multi-disciplinary capabilities, which supports all phases of the development process as well as the promotion of opportunities for all to participate in all spheres of the public sector;

8. Reaffirms that Governments in all countries should promote and protect all human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to development, bearing in mind the interdependent and mutually reinforcing relationship between democracy, development and respect for human rights, and should make public institutions more responsive to people's needs;

9. Invites Governments to strengthen their public administrative and financial management capacities through public-sector administrative and management reform, with emphasis on enhanced efficiency and productivity, accountability and responsiveness of the public institutions, and encourages, where appropriate, decentralization of public institutions and services;

10. Recognizes the importance of the major United Nations conferences and urges the development of the necessary capabilities to enable public administration to implement the commitments agreed upon in an effective and coordinated manner;

11. Confirms the importance of and calls for enhancement of the effectiveness of United Nations activities in the area of public administration and development;

12. Stresses the importance of an increased synergy, cooperation and coordination between United Nations funds and programmes, the specialized agencies, the United Nations Secretariat and the Bretton Woods institutions to ensure that the substantive and technical capacity of the United Nations system is optimized;

13. Acknowledges that the role of United Nations activities and programmes in public administration and development is to assist Governments, at their request, to improve their responsiveness to meet the basic needs of all, as well as to achieve sustainable development in all countries; the United Nations should focus its activities in the following areas as recommended by the Group of Experts on Public Administration and Finance in its report:

(a) Strengthening government capacity for policy development, administrative restructuring, civil service reform, human resources development and public administration training;

(b) Improving performance in the public sector;

(c) Financial management;

(d) Public-private interaction;

(e) Social development;

(f) Developing infrastructure and protecting the environment;

(g) Government legal capacity;

(h) Post-conflict rehabilitation and reconstruction of government machinery;

(i) Management of development programmes;

in this context, the United Nations should carry out these activities through pooling and facilitating access to information in public administration, promoting training and research in public administration and finance at all levels, advocacy and exchange of experiences, advisory services, technical assistance, capacity-building and human resources development;

14. Requests the United Nations to develop strategies, at the request of interested countries, for rebuilding a viable public administration in countries undergoing post-conflict rehabilitation and reconstruction;

15. Invites the Bretton Woods institutions and all relevant United Nations agencies and bodies to assist, at their request, Member States involved in economic restructuring programmes to pursue national policies aimed at improving the development and management of their human resources through, inter alia, appropriate measures;

16. Recognizes the increased national efforts of Member States in providing adequate financial and other resources for the strengthening of their public administration;

17. Invites the international community to create an enabling international environment and to consider providing adequate financial and other resources for programmes of assistance to support national efforts in enhancing the effectiveness of public administration in developing countries and countries with economies in transition;

18. Recommends that the Secretary-General take appropriate measures in order to ensure maximum coordination of activities of the United Nations system in the field of public administration and development;

19. Calls upon the Secretary-General to ensure ways of strengthening the coordination, coherence and harmonization of the management and implementation of the operational activities of the United Nations system in the field of public administration and development;

20. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session, through the Economic and Social Council, a report on public administration and development containing information on the implementation of the present resolution.

19 April 1996 Meeting 112 Adopted without vote

20-nation draft (A/50/L.69/Rev.1 & Rev.1/Add.1); agenda item 12.

Meeting numbers. GA 50th session: plenary 105-112.

Developing countries

Least developed countries

UNCTAD action. At its October 1996 session, the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board (TDB) conducted the sixth annual review of progress in implementing the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries (LDCs) for the 1990s, adopted in 1990 by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries (Paris Conference) [A/CONF.147/18] and endorsed by the General Assembly later that same year [GA res.45/206].

TDB had before it The Least Developed Countries 1996 Report [Sales No. E.96.II.D.3], which focused on key developmental issues confronting the 48 countries on the United Nations list of LDCs—Afghanistan, Angola, Bangladesh, Benin, Bhutan, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Kiribati, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Liberia, Madagascar, Malawi, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Mozambique, Myanmar, Nepal, Niger, Rwanda, Samoa, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sudan, Togo, Tuvalu, Uganda, United Republic of Tanzania, Vanuatu, Yemen, Zaire and Zambia.

The Report reviewed recent developments in LDCs, their short-term outlook and prospects for growth. It noted that LDC growth performance had improved markedly in 1995, and that continued improvement was forecast for 1996. Most notable was the increase of the average gross domestic product (GDP) growth rate of LDCs in Africa, from less than 0.6 per cent over the period 1990-1994 to 2.2 per cent in 1995. Most Asian LDCs continued to record a marked upsurge in their development performance, with estimated growth of 4.6 per cent in 1995. The performance of LDCs in the Pacific islands was less satisfactory; they attained GDP growth rates of only 1.2 per cent in 1994, with little improvement expected in 1995. In Haiti, shortages in electricity supply and slow progress in the disbursement of external aid already committed hampered the recovery of the economy, which had contracted by more than 10 per cent in 1994.

In describing recent trends in external finance and debt, the Report stated that while LDCs had been affected by stagnation in official development assistance (ODA), they had captured little of the increase in private capital flows to developing countries that had taken place in the first half of the 1990s. Many LDCs were debt-distressed and had adopted a policy of refraining from new borrowing on non-concessional terms. Together, overall ODA scarcity and the continuing high debt-servicing burden threatened to diminish seriously the net transfer of resources to LDCs.

The Report also analysed selected issues in the context of interdependence, examined the implications for LDCs of the processes of globalization and liberalization, and presented a set of national policies and international support measures to enhance the capacity of LDCs to benefit from globalization and liberalization. The issue of financial-sector reform in LDCs was also examined.

An addendum to the Report [TD/B/42(2)/11/Add.1] reviewed the implementation of the Programme of Action in the field of external finance and debt and focused on policies relevant to strengthening the capacity of LDCs to participate in the multilateral trading system.

In agreed conclusions of 18 October [A/51/15, vol. II (agreed conclusions 435(XLIII)], TDB reaffirmed the outcomes of the 1995 Mid-term Global Review of the Implementation of the Programme of Action for LDCs [YUN 1995, p. 863] and of the ninth session of UNCTAD (UNCTAD IX) (see PART THREE, Chapter IV) as they related to LDC trade and trade-related issues. It stated that integration of LDCs into the world economy and the international trading system would entail the development of export capacities to produce tradable goods and services on a competitive basis, and, in that regard, the UNCTAD Secretary-General was encouraged to elaborate UNCTAD-wide integrated country-level programmes for selected LDCs by pooling the contributions of its Divisions, in accordance with the priorities identified by the countries concerned. UNCTAD should collaborate with other concerned organizations in the design and implementation of those activities to ensure coherence in policy advice and support. The Board asked the UNCTAD secretariat and the TDB Commissions to pay particular attention to the special needs of LDCs. The Commissions should highlight results of particular relevance to those countries when presenting their reports to the Board.

UNDP action. In a note to the Executive Board of UNDP and the United Nations Population Fund [DP/1996/24], the UNDP Administrator referred to a request from Namibia [DP/1996/24/Add.1] for special status equivalent to that of an LDC. He gave the background to Namibia's request, noting that the country had become independent in 1990 after 70 years of colonial rule under apartheid South Africa and since then had been faced with the challenge of remedying the apartheid legacy. He also observed that while the average GDP per capita exceeded the values normally used by the Committee for Development Planning when identifying LDCs, the relatively high figure did not reflect the Namibian reality in terms of poverty and social and human development.

By a 15 May decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/30)], the Executive Board recognized the similarities of the economic and social development in Namibia and those of LDCs and decided to extend to Namibia for three years, starting in 1997, special status equivalent to that given to LDCs.

Island developing countries

Implementation of the Programme of Action

Commission on Sustainable Development action. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 49/122 [YUN 1994, p. 784], the Commission on Sustainable Development (New York, 18 April-3 May) reviewed the progress achieved and steps taken to implement the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States (SIDS), adopted in 1994 by the Global Conference on the subject [YUN 1994, p. 783]. As agreed by the Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development in 1995, the Commission had before it reports on seven issues identified in the Programme of Action: management of natural and environmental disasters [E/CN.17/1996/20/Add.1]; sustainable development of energy resources [E/CN.17/1996/20/Add.2]; sustainable tourism development [E/CN.17/1996/20/Add.3]; maritime transport [E/CN.17/1996/20/Add.4]; sustainable development of air transport [E/CN.17/1996/20/Add.5]; development of communications [E/CN.17/1996/20/Add.6 & Corr.1]; and coastal area management [E/CN.17/1996/20/Add.7]. An overview report [E/CN.17/1996/20] presented recommendations which, if implemented along with those in the Programme of Action, would enhance sustainable development in each sector.

Also in response to General Assembly resolution 49/122 [YUN 1994, p. 784], the Secretary-General submitted a report on current donor activities in support of sustainable development in SIDS [E/CN.17/1996/21]. The report analysed the main trends in external assistance flows to those countries from bilateral and multilateral sources and delineated factors discernible at the global, regional and national levels that could have a bearing on the provision of assistance. It also highlighted commitments of assistance, by purpose and disbursements, of donor and recipient countries.

In aggregate, SIDS attracted net ODA (grants plus concessional loans) from all bilateral sources of approximately $1.3 billion in 1991, which declined in the two following years, but rose to $1.9 billion in 1994. The apparent recovery in 1994 was mainly due to unusually large disbursements to a few countries, particularly Haiti. Multilateral disbursements, after increasing 9 per cent in 1992 from the 1991 level, declined in 1993 but recovered in 1994 to slightly above the 1991 level. Multilateral flows were more evenly distributed than bilateral flows.

As requested in General Assembly resolution 49/100 [YUN 1994, p. 782], the Commission convened the High-level Panel Meeting on Island Developing Countries (New York, 22-23 April) [E/CN.17/1996/IDC/3], which concentrated on the implications for SIDS of trade liberalization and the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations (see below).

In a 3 May decision [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/16)], the Commission noted that current trends of trade liberalization and globalization were bringing new challenges as well as possible opportunities to SIDS. It urged the international community to recognize the inherent weakness of those countries and recommended the provision of adequate support for them to meet adjustment costs as well as their information, human and technology needs, in order to enable them to sustain the development of their exports while maintaining the integrity of their natural resource base.

Recognizing the coordinating role of the Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development (DPCSD) in implementing the Programme of Action, the Commission recommended that the Secretary-General: take into account the need to continue substantive secretariat support to intergovernmental and inter-agency processes related to the implementation of the Programme of Action; ensure that DPCSD continue to act as a liaison and focal point for agencies of the UN system, as well as other relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, on matters related to the Programme of Action; and request DPCSD to look into the modalities for mobilizing resources for effective implementation of the Programme of Action. The Commission stressed the important role that the private sector could play in investment for sustainable development in SIDS, particularly in the infrastructure and tourism sectors.

Recalling that SIDS were particularly vulnerable to global climate change and sea-level rise, the Commission welcomed the growing number of ratifications of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (see PART THREE, Chapter VII). It called on the international community to support SIDS in their efforts to adapt to the sea-level rise that would be experienced as a result of greenhouse gases that had already been emitted into the atmosphere.

Noting that during the preceding two-year period, due to major natural disasters, SIDS had experienced catastrophes of national proportions because of their small size and fragile ecosystems, the Commission recognized that the most effective strategy for responding to natural disasters was through regional cooperation as an integral part of sustainable development frameworks, with international support. Therefore, the Commission: encouraged Governments of SIDS to further increase their efforts towards subregional, regional and interregional cooperation; supported implementation of the Yokohama Strategy and Plan of Action, adopted by the 1994 World Conference on Natural Disaster Reduction [YUN 1994, p. 851], called on Governments to support the facilitation of an effective synergy between the implementation of Agenda 21, adopted by UNCED in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 672], the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of SIDS [YUN 1994, p. 783] and the Yokohama Strategy and Plan of Action; and invited Governments to consider establishing an informal open-ended working group within the 1989 International Framework of Action for the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction [GA res. 44/236], with a view to ensuring full integration and participation of SIDS in the mapping of a concerted strategy for disaster reduction into the twenty-first century. The international community was called upon to support the efforts of SIDS directed towards: mobilizing additional resources to address urgent disaster reduction requirements; improving access to disaster and warning information; providing technical, financial and expert support for the establishment of a mechanism for interregional cooperation and the exchange of information among SIDS on disaster reduction; and targeting research and further development in various areas for building risk-reduction capacities.

As to coastal and marine resources, the Commission stressed that, for SIDS, effective coastal-zone management was a prerequisite for sustainable development. It recommended that, in developing integrated national coastal-area management strategies and plans, Governments should ensure that all steps were taken with the active participation of the private sector and local communities. To assist national authorities in designing and implementing integrated coastal-area management plans, international organizations should develop guidelines for specific sub-sectors such as tourism, fisheries, agriculture and forestry, which were among the main users of coastal areas.

With regard to energy resources, the Commission noted that SIDS continued to be heavily dependent on conventional sources of energy, although, as a group, the total consumed by SIDS was a small percentage of world consumption. Due to the small quantities involved, the cost per capita was relatively high and use was generally inefficient. The international community was called on to support commercial energy development in SIDS based on those environmentally sound renewable sources with demonstrated viability, in order to improve the efficiency of existing technologies and end-use equipment based on conventional energy sources, as well as to assist in financing investments to expand energy supplies beyond urban areas. Noting that many SIDS continued to depend on biomass fuels, the Commission encouraged projects to ensure a sustainable fuelwood industry.

The Commission recognized the continued importance of tourism as one of only a few development options for many SIDS, both as a dynamic sector and as one that could stimulate growth in others. SIDS were encouraged to pursue policies of sustainable tourism development by: diversifying the tourism product; strengthening linkages of other economic sectors with tourism; investing in data collection on all indicators of benefits and costs necessary for cost-benefit analysis in order to carry out evaluations of the contribution of tourism to the domestic economy; and developing a multidisciplinary approach for the rigorous vetting of tourism development proposals. The international community was called on to provide assistance to improve and develop basic physical infrastructures in SIDS, such as airports, harbours, roads, telecommunications systems and freshwater systems.

Bearing in mind the resource constraint for expanding and modernizing the telecommunications network in SIDS, the high per capita cost of infrastructure due to small market size and the lack of economies of scale, the Commission encouraged SIDS to continue their telecommunications development and to improve facilities and availability. The international community was called on to assist SIDS in identifying the most feasible ways to secure financial assistance from different sources, and the World Bank and the regional development banks were invited to finance telecommunications development systematically. The Commission proposed a study of the impact on SIDS of changes taking place in the regulation of air transport and stated that more regional cooperation regarding the regulatory aspects of air transport should be pursued.

Noting that maritime transport continued to represent an important lifeline to other markets for SIDS, the Commission encouraged the modernization of fleets through appropriate investment incentives and innovative measures. It called on the international community, in view of the large investments involved in developing infrastructure and acquisition of the means of maritime transport, to support the efforts of SIDS at the national and regional levels.

Report of Secretary-General. In response to General Assembly resolution 50/116 [YUN 1995, p. 875], the Secretary-General submitted a September report [A/51/354] on action taken at the international, regional and national levels to implement the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of SIDS. The report took account of the deliberations and decisions of the Commission on Sustainable Development at its 1996 session (see above) and described activities undertaken by organs, organizations and bodies of the UN system since 1995 in the context of the Programme of Action. It also included information on activities undertaken at the regional level by non-UN intergovernmental regional bodies and by the Governments of a number of SIDS at the national level.

The report concluded that much of the effort by UN organizations to implement the Programme of Action since mid-1995 had been directed at strengthening institutional and human-resource capacity. A number of initiatives had been taken to deal with the consequences of climate change and sea-level rise, signalling a growing recognition of the critical nature of such phenomena for SIDS. The high level of regional activity was especially notable, with the regional commissions and several non-UN regional and subregional intergovernmental bodies responding with new programmes and activities aimed mainly at waste management, capacity-building, water and sanitation, disaster preparedness and management of coastal areas. Based on the limited information obtained from national sources, it seemed that a number of SIDS had begun to implement parts of the Programme of Action that had especially high priority at the national level, including institution-building, particularly the strengthening of legislative frameworks; waste management; coastal area management; and, to a lesser extent, the preservation of biodiversity. The report stated that the cumulative record of implementation by the UN system indicated that insufficient attention was being paid to some priority areas of the Programme of Action, particularly transport and communications, tourism, energy, science and technology, biodiversity resources, and climate change and sea-level rise.

The information contained in the report supported recommendations for future action to implement the Programme of Action contained in a 1996 Commission on Sustainable Development decision [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/16)] (see above). It was recommended that, in addition to endorsing that decision, the General Assembly might wish to request the Committee for Development Planning (CDP) to examine the report and recommendations of the expert group meeting on a vulnerability index for SIDS, to be held in 1997, and also request CDP to make recommendations for consideration in 1998 by the Assembly.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/183.

Implementation of the outcome of the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 49/100 and 49/122 of 19 December 1994 and 50/116 of 20 December 1995, on or related to the implementation of the outcome of the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States, and reaffirming Commission on Sustainable Development decision 4/16 on the review of the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States,

Reaffirming that, because the development options of small island developing States are limited, there are special challenges to devising and implementing sustainable development plans, and that small island developing States will be constrained in meeting such challenges and overcoming obstacles to sustainable development without the active support and cooperation of the international community,

Stressing the need for greater attention to priority areas of the Programme of Action, particularly climate change and sea-level rise, energy resources, tourism resources, biodiversity resources, transport and communications and science and technology,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on action taken at the international, regional and national levels, inter alia, by the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to implement the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States, and welcomes in particular the action that has been taken by the Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development of the Secretariat to support the system-wide implementation of the Programme of Action;

2. Stresses the importance of maintaining the Small Island Developing States Unit within the above-mentioned Department, and requests the Secretary-General to maintain the Unit at an appropriate level of staff and improve the structure and organization of the Unit, in accordance with resolution 49/122;

3. Welcomes the work being done by the regional commissions to support activities to coordinate the outcome of the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States;

4. Takes note of the decisions of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, at its ninth session, related to programme support for small island developing countries, within the framework of the Programme of Action, and requests the Secretary-General to implement fully the relevant provisions of resolution 49/122;

5. Calls upon Governments, as well as the organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, other intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations, to continue to implement fully all the commitments and recommendations that were made at the Global Conference, and to continue to take the necessary actions for effective follow-up to the Programme of Action, including action to ensure the provision of the means of implementation under chapter XV thereof;

6. Recognizes the importance of the technical assistance programme, known as SIDSTAP, and the information network for small island developing States, known as SIDSNET, in the overall implementation of the Programme of Action, takes note of the progress made by the United Nations Development Programme in implementing resolution 49/122, and requests the Programme, in cooperation with Governments, to continue its actions to implement fully all provisions in order to operationalize the two mechanisms;

7. Takes note of the support that has been provided by the Commission on Sustainable Development to following up the implementation of the Programme of Action in accordance with resolution 49/122 and the Programme of Action itself, and invites the Commission at its fifth session to continue its support for and attention to the Programme of Action, as an integral part of the preparations for the special session of the General Assembly to be held in June 1997;

8. Requests that, in the context of the special session of the General Assembly, specific modalities be recommended for examining all outstanding chapters of the Programme of Action and for undertaking the full review of the Programme of Action in 1999;

9. Welcomes the inclusion of the development of a vulnerability index for small island developing States as part of the work programme of the Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development for 1996-1997, and in this regard requests the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the United Nations Environment Programme, other relevant United Nations organizations and non-United Nations organizations, to prepare a report based on the views of relevant experts on the vulnerability index, in 1997;

10. Requests the Committee for Development Planning, at its thirty-second session, to formulate its views and recommendations on the above-mentioned report, in order to submit those views to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session, through the Economic and Social Council, and to make this information available to the Commission on Sustainable Development;

11. Requests the Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development, in its coordinating role, to look into appropriate modalities for mobilizing resources for the effective implementation of the Programme of Action and provide information thereon;

12. Requests closer collaboration and greater transparency between the Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development and the United Nations Development Programme for effective implementation of SIDSTAP, and requests detailed information to be made available to Governments on actions taken to this effect;

13. Welcomes the report of the High-level Panel Meeting on Island Developing Countries on the challenges faced by island developing countries, particularly in the area of external trade, considered by the Commission on Sustainable Development at its fourth session;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to seek the views of Governments on the creation of an informal open-ended working group within the existing International Framework of Action for the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction, with the membership of all concerned States, including all relevant sectors in disaster reduction, with a view to ensuring full integration and participation of small island developing States in the mapping of a concerted strategy for disaster reduction into the twenty-first century and in improving access to disaster and warning information in order to enhance the capability of small island developing States with respect to disaster management;

15. Stresses that small island developing States are particularly vulnerable to global climate change and sea-level rise, and that the potential effects of global climate change and sea-level rise are increased strength and frequency of tropical storms and inundation of some islands, with loss of exclusive economic zones, economic infrastructure, human settlements and culture, and urges the international community to support small island developing States in their efforts to adapt to the sea-level rise that will be experienced as a result of the impact of greenhouse gases that have already been emitted into the atmosphere;

16. Calls upon the international community, including the Global Environment Facility, within the framework of its operational strategy, to support commercial energy development in small island developing States based on those environmentally sound renewable sources with demonstrated viability, to support improvement of the efficiency of existing technologies and end-use equipment based on conventional energy sources, and to assist with the financing of investments necessary to expand energy supplies beyond urban areas;

17. Also calls upon the international community, where appropriate, to support the efforts of and to provide assistance to small island developing States with respect to improving and acquiring, through appropriate investment incentives and innovative measures, the means of maritime transport and development of infrastructure in small island developing States, such as airports, harbours, roads and telecommunications;

18. Welcomes actions at the national and regional levels by small island developing States, and invites all Governments, with the assistance of international and regional organizations, to provide information on all of their major activities under the Programme of Action so as to enable an adequate review of the actions taken at the national and regional levels;

19. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the plans, programmes and projects for the sustainable development of small island developing States that have been implemented in response to the Programme of Action, as well as those that are under implementation and those that are envisaged for implementation within five years of the date of the report;

20. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session, under the item entitled "Environment and sustainable development", the sub-item entitled "Implementation of the outcome of the Global Conference on the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States";

21. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session a progress report on the particular actions taken to implement the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 51/183

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/605/Add.4) without vote, 2 December (meeting 38); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.35), based on informal consultations on draft by Canada, Costa Rica for Group of 77 and China, and Colombia for Non-Aligned Movement (A/C.2/51/L.7); agenda item 97 (d).

Measures in favour of island developing countries

In response to General Assembly resolution 49/100 [YUN 1994, p. 782], the Secretary-General submitted a note [A/51/255] transmitting a report by the UNCTAD secretariat on specific measures in favour of island developing countries. The report outlined the policy recommendations of the High-level Panel on Island Developing Countries, convened by the Commission on Sustainable Development (New York, 22-23 April), grouping them under the following topics: new approach to island-specific characteristics; sustainable development strategies; alleviating the intrinsic handicaps of island developing countries; liberalization, globalization and sustainable development; enhancing the use of current trading opportunities; taking advantage of new trading opportunities; promoting a favourable environment to enhance specialization; developing sectoral information; regional and international support measures; and the role of UNCTAD.

The report also presented information received from States members of UNCTAD and from international and intergovernmental organizations on actions taken and policies adopted in favour of island developing countries. It also reviewed UNCTAD work on the specific needs and problems of those countries.

In decision 51/442 of 16 December, the Assembly took note of the UNCTAD secretariat report.

Land-locked developing countries

In resolution 51/168 of 16 December, the General Assembly invited donor countries and multilateral financial and development institutions to provide newly independent and developing landlocked States in Central Asia and their transit developing neighbours with appropriate financial and technical assistance for the improvement of the transit environment for those countries (see PART THREE, Chapter V).

Chapter II

Operational activities for development

In 1996, the overall income of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP)—the central funding body of the UN system for providing technical assistance to developing countries—reached $1,751 million, up from $1,624 million in 1995. Voluntary contributions to the UNDP general fund, which accounted for $848 million of the total, represented 49 per cent of income versus 57 per cent in 1995. The decline was offset by a relative increase in resources mobilized for specific activities, which accounted for 45 per cent of UNDP income in 1996.

During the year considerable progress was made in transforming the Programme's new focus—achieving sustainable human development—into reality. Activities were concentrated in the areas of poverty eradication; employment and sustainable livelihoods; the advancement and empowerment of women; and the sustainable management of environmental resources. The objectives of UNDP were embodied in a mission statement, which was endorsed by the Executive Board of UNDP/United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) in May. That statement stressed that national priorities constituted the frame of reference for national programming of operational activities for development within the UN system.

The Department for Development Support and Management Services of the United Nations delivered technical cooperation programmes in the areas of public administration and development management, energy, the environment and assistance to countries in crisis. The United Nations Capital Development Fund, which funded small-scale projects totalling $50 million in 1996, shifted its focus from infrastructure projects to reducing poverty through the promotion of good governance, a dynamic private sector and the participation of civil society in development initiatives. The Special Unit for Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries provided support to developing countries in its priority areas of trade and investment, macroeconomic policy development and coordination, poverty eradication and management of the environment.

As a separate entity within the United Nations as of 1995, the United Nations Office for Project Services executed development projects worth $433 million in 1996. During the year, it acquired new business amounting to $534 million, of which 37 per cent was funded by UNDP.

The United Nations Volunteers (UNV) marked its twenty-fifth anniversary in 1996 and moved its headquarters to Bonn, Germany. A total of 3,242 UNV specialists and fieldworkers from 137 countries served in 140 nations during the year.

System-wide activities

Operational activities segment of the Economic and Social Council

The Economic and Social Council, at its 1996 substantive session (New York, 24 June-26 July) [A/51/3/Rev.1], considered the question of operational activities of the United Nations for international development cooperation. Among the documents before the Council was a June report [E/1996/64 & Add.1-3 & Add.2/Corr.1,2] of the Secretary-General on progress on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/120 [YUN 1995, p. 883], which dealt with the triennial policy review of operational activities for development of the UN system. The addenda to the report gave summaries of decisions adopted by the executive boards of the UN funds and programmes and of actions taken by UN organizations, and comprehensive statistical data on operational activities for development in 1994.

Describing steps taken by the UN system to implement the policy review and identify areas of progress and practical difficulties, the report focused on three areas that had been identified by the Assembly for consideration by the Council in 1996: issues of simplification and harmonization; common premises and administrative services; and monitoring and evaluation.

The Secretary-General reported that, on 23 December 1995, he had designated the UNDP Administrator as the Special Coordinator for Economic and Social Development. In that capacity, he assumed the lead role within the United Nations in the following areas: supporting the Secretary-General in his role as Chairman of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC); enhancing the coordination of development activities; and promoting an integrated follow-up, at the operational level, of recent global conferences and related ACC agreements and arrangements. Those responsibilities were distinct and separate from his role as UNDP Administrator.

The Secretary-General annexed to his report a management process for the implementation of Assembly resolution 50/120 and an ACC statement in which the United Nations system endorsed the management process and committed itself to implementing the resolution (see below).

In connection with the focal issue of simplification and harmonization of rules and procedures, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council provide guidance on the speed and scope of procedures being undertaken by the UN system, particularly in adapting rules and procedures to national requirements. Reporting formats, reporting requirements, monitoring and evaluation systems and financial years differed from donor to donor, which had become a burden on the limited human resources of most developing countries. It was important to further define common programming frameworks and to harmonize methodologies in order to take full advantage of the harmonization of programme cycles.

In an effort to arrange common premises and administrative services as requested by the General Assembly, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council provide further guidance, particularly on the question of common and shared services (in such areas as telecommunications and office automation, accounting and financial services, personnel, document centres, transport, maintenance, procurement, security, diplomatic pouch and travel support).

Appropriate monitoring and evaluation instruments continued to be a concern, and further work was needed to assess the impact of operational activities by establishing the essential baseline data needed and mechanisms for collecting such data. A number of institutions had been working on the elaboration of indicators of performance.

As to the country strategy note process, the report stated that 14 countries had formally adopted such a note, an increase of five since 1995. Final drafts were being considered for approval in another five countries and preliminary drafts had been prepared in eight. Of 138 countries for which information was available, 88 had declared their intention to pursue the process and the majority of those were already fully involved in formulation. The Secretary-General recommended that the existing guidelines on the country strategy note should be reviewed. A workshop to finalize new guidelines was envisaged for early 1997.

A number of developments had taken place in field-level coordination. Organizations of the UN system had been asked to provide specific suggestions on strengthening the resident coordinator system and a number of issues had been identified. The Secretary-General suggested that a more detailed assessment of the functioning of field coordination could be prepared and that the Council might indicate specific areas for which information was required.

In accordance with a request contained in resolution 50/120, the Secretariat was planning a system-wide evaluation of the impact of operational activities for development and the Secretary-General reported on progress made. It was anticipated that four impact evaluations would be completed for the 1998 triennial comprehensive policy review. Together with other information, including from Governments and from relevant evaluations done within the UN system or by Governments, they would form a basis for an overall assessment of operational activities within the UN system.

In an overview of resource trends, the report stated that contributions for operational activities for development through the UN system increased in 1994 over 1993 ($5.5 billion, compared to $5 billion). However, the 1994 total was still below that of 1992. Moreover, a drop of $5.6 billion had occurred in contributions for the operational activities of specialized agencies, in both assessed and extrabudgetary contributions. Total net official development finance fell to $66 billion in 1994, after remaining relatively constant at around $70 billion between 1990 and 1993. As had been strongly reaffirmed in resolution 50/120, the impact of operational activities of the UN system had to be enhanced by a substantial increase in their funding on a predictable, continuous and assured basis.

Management process. Annexed to the Secretary-General's report was the text of a management process for the implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/120. It identified actions that the UN system could undertake, in collaboration with recipient Governments, in order to strengthen its operational activities to better support national development priorities and objectives. The process covered the principal provisions of the resolution: programme development and implementation; field-level coordination; management and programme support; impact assessment; and resources, funding system and statistical reporting. It focused on common areas of work and did not touch on the wide range of individual actions undertaken by the funds, programmes and specialized agencies of the UN system.

The Special Coordinator for Economic and Social Development had sought to determine what kind of support the UN system could be ready to provide, in the form of financing resident coordinator system activities at the country level, staff secondment to support the resident coordinator system, or any other means relevant to strengthening common endeavours.

ACC action. At its first regular session of 1996 (Nairobi, Kenya, 28-30 April) [ACC/1996/4], ACC adopted a statement supporting implementation of resolution 50/120. It recognized the crucial role that the UN system could play in assisting developing countries to take the lead in managing their development process. All members of ACC committed their secretariats to cooperate with each other and with their national counterparts with a view to achieving consistency and efficiency in the UN system response to the challenge.

In order to ensure the best possible support to recipient countries in their development efforts, ACC agreed to strengthen collaboration through the resident coordinator system. In that regard, ACC stated its intention to issue updated guidelines on the functioning of that system and to issue clear instructions to country representatives. It was particularly important to ensure that all parts of the UN system worked on the basis of a mutually agreed common understanding of the principal components of resolution 50/120. Therefore, a series of updated guidelines would be developed on the country strategy note process, the programme approach and national execution, as well as the functioning of the resident coordinator system. In addition, the work of the ACC task forces on the coordinated follow-up to international conferences would be translated into operational guidance for the resident coordinator system. ACC also agreed to strengthen the monitoring and evaluation of operational activities and to achieve the impact assessment called for in resolution 50/120. In order to achieve optimal use of resources, efforts towards the sharing of premises and services at the country level would be enhanced.

ACC adopted the statement on the proposal of its Consultative Committee on Programme and Operational Questions (CCPOQ) (Geneva, 11-15 March) [ACC/1996/7].

In his report, the Secretary-General recommended that the Council take note of the ACC statement and the management process. He also suggested that the Council call on Governments in a position to do so to contribute to the different mechanisms set up to facilitate the implementation of resolution 50/120, and its monitoring and evaluation, in particular through the UNDP support to the Resident Coordinator Fund and the United Nations Trust Fund for Case Studies on Operational Activities.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 26 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/42.

Progress on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/120

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 44/211 of 22 December 1989, 46/219 of 20 December 1991, 47/199 of 22 December 1992 and 50/120 of 20 December 1995, in which the Assembly invited the Council, at its substantive session of 1996, to consider, inter alia, the issues of harmonization and administrative services, common premises and monitoring and evaluation, on the basis of progress reports by the Secretary-General, including appropriate recommendations,

Recalling also General Assembly resolutions 48/162 of 20 December 1993 and 50/227 of 24 May 1996,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on progress on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/120 on the triennial policy review of operational activities for development of the United Nations system, and on the management process for implementation requested in paragraph 52 of that resolution,

1. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General;
2. Strongly reaffirms that the efficiency, effectiveness and impact of the operational activities of the United Nations system must be enhanced by, inter alia, a substantial increase in their funding on a predictable, continuous and assured basis, commensurate with the increasing needs of developing countries, as well as through the full implementation of General Assembly resolutions 47/199, 48/162, 50/120 and 50/227;
3. Reaffirms the need for simplification and harmonization of rules and procedures in order to increase the overall effectiveness, efficiency and impact of the operational activities for international development of the United Nations development system, as well as the need to facilitate and increase national execution, bearing in mind the need not to overburden the host Government, and to this end, the United Nations development system is requested to report to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1997 on progress made towards the following:

(a) Improving the definition and guidelines for the programme approach, bearing in mind the need to further simplify and harmonize procedures and to allow sufficient flexibility for their application at the field level;

(b) Promoting a common understanding of capacity-building concepts and their operationalization, as well as on ways of enhancing the sustainability of capacity-building;

(c) Facilitating and increasing synergies between the activities of the funds and programmes of the United Nations system through the use of harmonized and synchronized programming and, as far as possible, enhancing collaboration in all areas of programming, including evaluations and mid-term reviews;

(d) Developing and implementing an agreed methodology to establish common country databases in consultation with national Governments;

4. Urges the funds and programmes of the United Nations system to finalize work on the harmonization of their budget presentations in time for a final decision to be made by their respective executive boards in advance of the biennium 1998-1999 and to include in this work a common presentational framework for the budget based on agreed definitions and usage of budget terms and the identification of additional steps required for further harmonization and improved transparency;

5. Emphasizes the need to accelerate efforts to complete a common manual based both on a building-block approach and on a need to integrate and clarify existing guidelines, including the operationalization of the outcomes of the recent series of major United Nations conferences;

6. Expresses concern at the lack of progress made towards the use of common administrative services, and requests the funds and programmes of the United Nations system, with due concern given to effectiveness, efficiency and the impact of their activities, to:

(a) Simplify and harmonize administrative and financial procedures in a systematic way and at all levels, so that common administrative services can be established where feasible;

(b) Work towards increased delegation of decision-making authority and accountability to the country level and, where appropriate, the regional level, and their harmonization among funds and programmes;

(c) Set measurable targets and time-frames for the achievement of common administrative services, including the identification of priority areas for enhanced efforts, such as telecommunications, and financial- and personnel- related services;

(d) Develop guidelines on how to establish and operate a common services account;

7. Reaffirms the need to raise the target for common premises on a case-by-case basis, taking into account cost-benefit analysis and operational sustainability, using lessons learned during the implementation of this request and avoiding an increased burden on host countries; requests the funds and programmes of the United Nations system to develop a plan of action, administrative arrangements and a time-frame for the implementation of this request; and encourages the United Nations specialized agencies and regional offices to share those common premises where practicable;

8. Stresses the importance of strengthening the monitoring and evaluation activities of the United Nations development system; also stresses the significance of promoting at the country level, under the leadership of Governments, close monitoring and evaluation collaboration among national Governments, the United Nations development system and relevant development partners and, in this context, reiterates the need for the United Nations development system to support, when requested by Governments, the strengthening of national evaluation capacities; and requests that joint evaluations of operational activities, including thematic evaluations and coordinated programme reviews, be undertaken, making the fullest possible use of national capacity in this area;

9. Reaffirms the need for the United Nations development system to increase its consideration and application of lessons learned from monitoring and evaluation activities, and calls for a system-wide effort to monitor and report on the frequency and quality of programmed and completed evaluations, the identification and use of lessons learned and the number of joint evaluations planned and undertaken;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that the Council and the governing bodies of individual funds and programmes and specialized agencies are provided with information on evaluation activities that is quantifiable and comparable and that specifies an evaluation's type, coverage, scope, timing and compliance;

11. Urges all funds, programmes and agencies of the United Nations development system to identify measurable targets to strengthen their monitoring and evaluation capabilities, to incorporate those targets into their respective management plans to implement resolution 50/120 and to intensify their cooperation in the development of monitoring and evaluation methodologies;

12. Requests the Secretary-General, in his progress report on the implementation of resolution 50/120, for submission to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1997, to consider, inter alia, capacity-building, field- and regional-level coordination and resources; and also requests the Secretary-General, in the context of field- and regional-level coordination, to highlight the problems encountered, make appropriate recommendations and discuss the functioning of thematic groups and field-level committees, and, in regard to resources, to include an analytical assessment of the implications on operational activities for development of the recent trends in core and non-core resources and to make recommendations on how to increase core resources and effectively implement section I of annex I to General Assembly resolution 50/227.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/42

26 July 1996 Meeting 52 Adopted without vote

Draft by Canada (E/1996/L.45), orally revised following informal consultations; agenda item 4 (a).

By decision 1996/310 of 13 November, the Council decided on the themes for the segments of its 1997 substantive session. The theme for the operational activities segment was entitled "Funding for operational activities for development: implementation of General Assembly resolution 50/227", which dealt with the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields (see PART FIVE, Chapter I).

UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board action. By a 29 March decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/21)], the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board requested the Administrator to report to its third regular session on efforts to follow up on General Assembly resolution 50/120 on the triennial policy review, particularly paragraph 38 in which the Assembly invited the UN system to provide support to the resident coordinator system in view of the fact that the Office of United Nations System Support and Services (OUNS) was serving as the focal point in support of the resident coordinator system. The Administrator was also asked to review the proposed organizational structure of OUNS and to report thereon at the third regular session.

The Board approved on a provisional basis the proposal relating to OUNS contained in the 1996-1997 budget estimates report considered in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 897].

The Board, at its third regular session, had before it the Administrator's conference room paper on OUNS activities in support of the resident coordinator system, in which he described UNDP work in follow-up to international conferences and the UN System-wide Special Initiative for Africa (see PART THREE, Chapter III).

On 13 September [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/41)], the Board urged the Administrator to redouble his efforts to obtain more support for OUNS, while expecting full cooperation from other bodies of the UN system.

Common premises and services

In May 1996 [A/51/124-E/1996/44], ACC issued comments on the 1994 report of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on UN system common premises and services in the field [A/49/629]. ACC's policy on the issue, which had been under continuous review within the UN system for a number of years, had been to support, whenever possible, common premises to be shared among UN agencies and programmes. Although it agreed that there should be financial benefits from sharing services and premises, ACC cautioned against undue reliance on the cost/benefit analyses put forward in the JIU report. It also expressed concern about entering into long-term financial commitments at a time when the financial situation of many organizations was precarious. ACC suggested that the common premises programme should proceed on the basis of rigorous financial analysis on a case-by-case basis, and future construction programmes should be undertaken based on written agreements between the participating organizations.

In connection with a JIU recommendation that General Assembly resolutions relating to common premises and services in the field be submitted to the governing bodies of specialized agencies, which should provide legislative authority to their secretariats, ACC considered that it had sufficient legislative authority to participate, in so far as practicable, in any programme for common premises or services in the UN system. As for the JIU proposal that the United Nations draft a new standard representation agreement for all UN system field representations, some ACC members believed that might lead to renegotiating or cancelling agreements previously reached by various UN organizations and programmes. Concerning the JIU proposal that a subcommittee be set up to work out a programme for common premises and services, ACC believed that its existing subsidiary machinery, in particular CCPOQ, should continue to address such questions.

By decision 1996/227 of 10 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's note [E/1996/43] drawing the Council's attention to the JIU report and the ACC comments thereon.

Coordination of policy and programming frameworks

By a 31 October note [A/51/636-E/1996/104], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council the JIU report on coordination of policy and programming frameworks for more effective development cooperation. The report analysed the cost and workload implications for the host Governments and cooperating partners of the plethora of development frameworks which created serious aid coordination bottlenecks in the developing countries. It outlined the coordination responsibilities and capacities of host Governments, as well as development aid policies of major bilateral donor Governments which affected development coordination at field and headquarters levels.

Within the UN system, the main coordination mechanisms were the resident coordinator system, the country strategy note (CSN) and the programme approach, which were interrelated; they had been identified as the most appropriate means to achieve the integration of external inputs with national development processes. It was recommended that host Governments, with the assistance of resident coordinators, ensure that the CSN process was used effectively and consistently by all external development partners. The CSN framework should replace other multisectoral programming frameworks at the country level in order to reduce costs and workloads. The design and preparation of the CSN should be updated by ACC, the report said.

Each organization should periodically evaluate its technical assistance policy and programming framework to establish their cost-benefits for the host countries and for the organizations themselves. Another recommendation called for

ACC to standardize formats for field data collection and evaluation system-wide. Other recommendations included the establishment of a database on development information in the resident coordinator's office, field-level coordination committees, and regional coordination of development frameworks.

JIU also suggested that the Economic and Social Council should enhance system-wide coordination and oversight functions by exploring the feasibility of expanding joint sessions of the executive boards of UN programmes and funds for considering specific coordination issues, including CSNs and country programmes.

Internal oversight mechanisms

The Secretary-General submitted a draft report [DP/1996/16] on enhancing the internal oversight mechanisms in operational funds and programmes to the Executive Director of UNFPA, the Executive Director of the United Nations Office for Project Services (UNOPS) and the Administrator of UNDP. It was circulated at the second regular session of the Executive Board of UNDP and UNFPA (25-29 March). The draft report, prepared by the Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS) in response to General Assembly resolution 48/218 B [YUN 1994, p. 1362], considered 13 operational funds and programmes, all of which, with the exception of the World Food Programme (WFP), were audited by the United Nations Board of Auditors. Eight of the 13 funds and programmes were already serviced by OIOS, but five (UNDP, UNICEF, UNFPA, UNOPS and WFP) had internal oversight functions separate from OIOS.

After a survey and analysis, OIOS made recommendations on monitoring functions, inspection, investigation services, cooperation among the heads of the oversight units, implementation of recommendations of the oversight units, and periodic reporting to governing bodies. OIOS also recommended that a report be submitted to the General Assembly with summary records on internal oversight issues of each operational fund and programme, so that the General Assembly could monitor oversight activities of the individual organizations. In view of its increased responsibilities, OIOS said it should have the authority to obtain relevant information from the internal oversight entities or the concerned executive heads, and the right to comment on oversight activities.

Following informal discussions, the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board decided not to adopt a decision on oversight services in funds and programmes. It would, however, convey the results of its discussion to OIOS.

Coordination of activities between the UN development system and the Bretton Woods institutions

As it had decided in its resolution 1995/50 [YUN 1995, p. 880], the Economic and Social Council, at the high-level meeting of the operational activities segment, focused on strengthening collaboration between the UN development system and the Bretton Woods institutions (the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank Group—the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Development Association, the International Finance Corporation, the Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency and the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes). In June, the Secretariat submitted a note [E/1996/72 & Corr.1] to the Council on strengthening such collaboration in the areas of social and economic development at all levels, including the field level. It was noted that a broad reform process had been initiated within the UN system in the economic and social area. Issues concerning the relations of the Bretton Woods institutions with the rest of the system were an important part of negotiations and discussions in that process, including ongoing negotiations on an agenda for development (see PART THREE, Chapter I). The report, therefore, focused on the state of cooperation in a number of specific areas and on practical issues that the Council might wish to discuss as a further contribution to the broader reform process.

The report described the evolving relationship between the UN development system and the Bretton Woods institutions, noting that, as a result of the admission of countries of the former USSR and of Eastern Europe to the Bretton Woods institutions in the early 1990s, they had achieved almost identical membership to that of the United Nations. Technical assistance, long the mainstay of the UN system, was a major and growing part of the World Bank's portfolio of activities.

The report went on to summarize the current status of collaboration between UN funds and programmes and the Bretton Woods institutions and between the specialized agencies and those institutions. Examples of practical collaboration included cooperation in the follow-up to global conferences; initiatives in support of development in Africa; statistics; agricultural research; training and research in tropical diseases; the Global Environment Facility; and post-conflict peace-building.

With regard to strengthening collaboration at the country level, the report observed that that was perhaps the greatest need and potential. Country-level collaboration was taking place in a number of areas: poverty reduction; capacity-building; human development; complementing and mitigating the effects of structural adjustment programmes; the Joint and Co-sponsored United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS; policy dialogue; the country strategy note and policy framework papers processes; the resident coordinator system; aid coordination; country missions; connectivity at the country level; and the programme approach.

The record of cooperation between the Bretton Woods institutions and the UN system was extensive, the Secretariat said, involving several major joint initiatives. The Bank, the IMF and the UN system had forged close links around specific themes, such as social development, environment, population and reproductive health, and HIV/AIDS.

What was needed was to transform the ad hoc and selective approach into a more structured provision of support, at the request of Governments, based on mutual comparative advantages and expanded into new areas. Eradicating mass poverty, stimulating economic growth and capacity-building, trade efficiency and promoting employment were some of the areas for strengthened future cooperation. Such cooperation needed to be sustained and should include all stages from policy formulation to project monitoring and evaluation.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 26 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/43.

Strengthening collaboration between the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 50/120 of 20 December 1995 on the triennial policy review of operational activities for development of the United Nations system and 50/227 of 24 May 1996 on further measures for the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields,

Recognizing the importance of strengthening the collaboration between the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions at the intergovernmental, intersecretariat and country levels,

Recognizing also the importance of joint initiatives between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions in coordinating efforts for the implementation and follow-up of the commitments of the major United Nations international conferences and summits,

Reaffirming that the recipient Government should play a leading role in the overall coordination of collaboration at the country level,

Concerned about the potentially serious impact on development of the decline in resources allocated to the operational activities for development of the United Nations system,

Concerned also about the incomplete fulfilment of commitments to the tenth replenishment of the International Development Association, and hoping that adequate resources will be made available for the eleventh replenishment,

Taking into account the ongoing deliberation on an agenda for development in which issues relating to the strengthening of the relationship between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions are being addressed,

Recalling Chapters IX and X of the Charter of the United Nations, with particular reference to the provisions setting forth the powers and functions of the Economic and Social Council with respect to making recommendations and coordinating United Nations system activities within the scope of its competence,

Reaffirming the importance of strengthening cooperation, communication and collaboration between the Council and its relevant subsidiary bodies, on the one hand, and the Bretton Woods institutions, on the other, in order to maximize the effectiveness of their respective development programmes and activities,

Noting the need to improve the Council's high-level sessions with the international financial and trade institutions by better preparing for and focusing the high-level dialogue, thereby advancing such cooperation, communication and collaboration and enhancing the quality, outcomes and value of the exchange of views,

1. Takes note of the note by the Secretariat on the coordination of activities on a system-wide basis: strengthening collaboration between the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions in the areas of social and economic development at all levels, including the field level;

2. Considers that the strengthening of collaboration between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions requires an integrated approach, encompassing a closer policy dialogue at the intergovernmental level on relevant areas of international development policy issues, taking into account their respective competencies;

3. Looks forward to the report and accompanying recommendations to be prepared jointly by the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions in accordance with paragraph 86 of annex I to General Assembly resolution 50/227, on an early exploratory review to assess mechanisms, programmes and relationships at the field, headquarters and intergovernmental levels, with a view to identifying areas in which communication, cooperation and coordination could be improved;

4. Recommends the scheduling of a high-level special meeting at a time proximate to the semi-annual meetings of the Bretton Woods institutions with a view to benefiting, to the extent possible, from ministerial participation and from the participation of heads of financial and trade institutions and other relevant organizations, as called for by the General Assembly in paragraph 88 of annex I to resolution 50/227;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to consult the heads of the financial institutions by early 1997 in order to explore the possibilities and practical modalities of scheduling such a meeting: at a session of the Council to be held in early 1997, the Council should discuss the format, timing and possible agenda for the first such meeting;

6. Decides to explore concrete modalities for strengthening the exchange of information on development issues between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions;

7. Also decides that, prior to the annual high-level policy dialogue between the Council and the international financial and trade institutions, and allowing sufficient time for preparation, the Secretariat should communicate to the financial and trade institutions a report on the relevant issues to be discussed at the session, with a primary focus on the agreed theme and that communication should be prepared in part based on the submission of issues and questions that Member States could be invited to suggest to the Secretariat, which would then be taken into account in the preparation of the Secretariat's report to the institutions;

8. Recommends, in order to better focus the policy dialogue, exploring the possibility of having joint reports prepared by the Secretariat, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the Bretton Woods institutions and the World Trade Organization;

9. Invites the financial and trade institutions participating in the high-level segment of the Council in 1997 to furnish relevant reports and studies on the selected theme, within their respective mandates and areas of expertise, and on important developments in the world economy and in international economic co-operation;

10. Invites the Bretton Woods institutions to strengthen their cooperation with the Secretariat on issues falling within their respective competencies, such as multilateral external debt, challenges and opportunities of global financial integration and financing for development;

11. Decides to encourage cooperative working relations between the relevant units of the Bretton Woods institutions and the regional commissions, including, inter alia, improved arrangements for data collection and information exchange;

12. Also decides that full implementation of existing agreements, the strengthening of existing mechanisms and the exploration of new avenues and mechanisms of cooperation between the Bretton Woods institutions and other bodies of the United Nations system should be encouraged and undertaken within the framework provided by the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council through, inter alia, participation in relevant meetings, information-gathering, information exchange, research, policy analysis and operational activities;

13. Stresses that the recipient Government should play a leading role in the overall coordination of the collaboration between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions at the country level and that this collaboration should be on the basis of country-driven activities;

14. Also stresses that the fundamental characteristics of the operational activities of the United Nations system should be, inter alia, their universal, voluntary and grant nature, their neutrality and their multilateralism, as well as their ability to respond to the needs of developing countries in a flexible manner; and that they should be carried out for the benefit of the developing countries, at the request of those countries and in accordance with their own policies and priorities for development, and that the United Nations development system should take into account the specific needs and requirements of the countries with economies in transition;

15. Considers that efforts should be made to promote, in consultation and agreement with Governments, complementarity between the country strategy notes, where they exist, the policy framework papers of the Bretton Woods institutions and the World Bank's country assistance strategies;

16. Emphasizes that the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions should expand, whenever appropriate, their collaboration in co-financing field programmes and projects and should continue to explore innovative ways to combine and maximize their resources, under the overall guidance of the national Governments, in support of development activities at the field level;

17. Invites the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions to improve their co-operation in the preparation, discussion and follow-up of round-table meetings and consultative groups to promote policy discussions, as appropriate;

18. Stresses that the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions have to take full account of the exchange of experiences and lessons learned and that, in the course of their work, staff exchanges and information-sharing, in particular the sharing of evaluation methodologies and results, should be encouraged.

Adopted without vote

Draft by Vice-President (E/1996/L.48), based on informal consultations on drafts by Costa Rica, for Group of 77 and China (E/1996/L.20), and by United States (E/1996/L.22); agenda item 4 (b).

Financing of operational activities

During 1995 [E/1997/65/Add.4 & Corr.1], the most recent year for which complete figures were available, expenditures by the UN system on operational activities, excluding loans and grants through the World Bank Group, totalled $4.86 billion, compared with $4.61 billion in 1994 and $4.87 billion in 1993. That amount was distributed in development grants through UNDP or UNDP-administered funds ($1.26 billion), UNFPA ($231 million), UNICEF ($803 million), WFP ($1.1 billion), and specialized agencies and other organizations from regular budgets and extrabudgetary sources ($1.42 billion).

In addition, concessional loans of $165.3 million were disbursed by the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD), and a total of $136.9 million was provided through UNDP/UNOPS in services engaged by Governments receiving loans and credits from international development banks or resources from bilateral donors.

By region, expenditures on operational activities went to Africa (42 per cent of total expenditures), Asia and the Pacific (26.2 per cent), Latin America and the Caribbean (21.3 per cent), Western Asia (5.3 per cent) and Europe (5.2 per cent).

Contributions from Governments and other sources for operational activities of the UN system, including IFAD but excluding the World Bank Group, totalled $5.6 billion in 1995, compared with $5.59 billion in 1994 and $5.11 billion in 1993.

The 1996 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities (New York, 4-5 November) [A/CONF.180/3] received pledges for 1997 by a number of Governments to UN programmes and funds concerned with development and related assistance. It took note of the fact that several Governments were not in a position to announce their contributions but would communicate their pledges to the Secretary-General after the Conference, as soon as they were in a position to do so.

In an October note to the General Assembly [A/CONF.178/2], the Secretary-General gave a statement of contributions (as at 30 June 1996) pledged or paid at the 1995 Pledging Conference to 28 funds and programmes. The total came to $1.16 billion, with an estimated $529 million designated for UNDP.

Technical cooperation through UNDP

The Administrator of UNDP, in his annual report covering 1996 [DP/1997/16 & Add.1-8], said that the year was productive in consolidating achievements in reorienting UNDP and defining further changes needed. Progress was made towards the objectives of the UNDP Plan (1996-1997), which responded to UNDP Executive Board and General Assembly legislation to revitalize the United Nations and consolidate the role of UNDP as its sustainable human development (SHD) arm. The main goal of development cooperation—and the central mission of UNDP, he said—was to help countries to eradicate poverty and make human development sustainable.

Poverty eradication remained the most urgent global challenge, the Administrator said. Despite efforts to improve human development over the previous three decades, it was estimated that almost one third of the developing world's populations lived on less than $1 per day. To meet the challenge, UNDP was committed to helping countries to achieve SHD by building capacity for: poverty eradication; employment and sustainable livelihoods; the advancement and empowerment of women; and the sustainable management of environmental resources. None of those was obtainable without sound, responsive governance. Within that framework, it was central to UNDP's role to assist poor families to find opportunities and access to assets such as credit, skills, legal rights, jobs, environmental and energy services, and links with domestic and international markets. Building sustainable livelihoods, addressing such consequences of crises as the need to reintegrate demobilized soldiers, and expanding capacity for governance and community self-management were important curative or preventive forms of development. Furthermore, the Administrator said, UNDP needed to be able to respond rapidly to the opportunities and uncertainties of globalization, growing interdependence between nations, rapid developments in information technology and the increasing importance of private financial flows to developing countries.

In supporting country-defined priorities with regard to poverty eradication, UNDP's focus in 1996 was on: implementing a new resource distribution formula assigning more resources to the most needy countries (nearly 90 per cent of core resources went to low-income countries, home to 90 per cent of the world's poor); fine-tuning the objectives of ongoing programmes through mid-term reviews and evaluations and ensuring that new projects were aimed at SHD; and focusing advisory notes and country cooperation frameworks on poverty eradication. In 1996, 39 per cent of core funding went to poverty eradication and livelihoods for the poor; 32 per cent to governance; and 21 per cent to the environment. Sharpening the UNDP focus on poverty eradication involved finding appropriate SHD entry points in varying country situations and continual improvement of methodologies for analysis and response. A first set of training packages and guidelines for poverty situation analyses was issued in 1996 and was being refined based on country experience.

UNDP targeted increased resources to gender equality in 1996, strengthened country office capacity (by field advisers, training and review of the experience of 20 country offices), and developed gender-sensitive indicators for analysis and performance measurement.

UNDP targeted environment concerns in the following areas: sustainable agriculture and food security; water resources and the aquatic environment; energy needs of the poor; and forest management. During the year, achievements included support, through the Office to Combat Desertification and Drought, to 43 countries to help implement the 1994 United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, Particularly in Africa [YUN 1994, p. 944]; launching an initiative for sustainable energy to analyse energy-poverty linkages and new technologies; helping Governments to integrate environment and poverty concerns into national development plans; and promoting cooperation with the private sector to reduce pollution problems.

In countries in crisis and special circumstances, UNDP was seeking to be an effective development partner, working in close collaboration with the UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs, which coordinated humanitarian activities. In bridging relief and development, UNDP also worked closely with UNHCR, UNICEF and WFP. There was a growing understanding that development did not cease during emergencies, and that SHD should continue during relief efforts. In times of crisis, UNDP concentrated its efforts in the following main areas: support to emergency interventions; programming for peace and recovery; resettling uprooted populations; reintegrating demobilized soldiers; demining operations; rebuilding institutions and improving governance; organizing national elections; and managing the delivery of programme aid. A total of $36.6 million went to 32 interventions in 1996.

Resources. Annual contributions to UNDP core resources over the fifth programming cycle (1992-1996) fluctuated from a high of $1,178 million in 1992 to $903 million in 1995 and $852 million in 1996. Pledges for 1997 indicated that core resources would be slightly above the 1996 level. Overall resources, core plus non-core, grew from $1,739 million in 1992 to $1,925 million in 1995. The estimate for 1996 was $2,000 million. Core resources remained the primary means for impartial and universal multilateral assistance and were the foundation of the UNDP resource base. However, traditional donor countries, faced with budgetary constraints, had not expanded core funding, resulting in a ceiling on growth. Substantial commitments from donor Governments and multilateral institutions had been made at round-table meetings, where pledges were made for countries such as the Congo ($900 million), Rwanda ($617 million) and Sierra Leone ($231 million). As a new avenue for broadening the UNDP financial base, the Executive Board had enabled UNDP to embark on partnerships in development with the private sector. Funding initiatives and guidelines had been prepared for country offices entering into private-sector funding partnerships.

Advocacy and building partnerships. In 1996, UNDP implemented its first communication and advocacy strategy, which aimed to raise public appreciation of UNDP activities within the framework of the UN role in development. Country-level public affairs initiatives gave higher visibility to the UN system and UNDP. Almost all country offices appointed a public affairs officer and most produced national communication and advocacy strategies. Public affairs training workshops were held for country-level representatives and public relations officers, and a manual was issued. Special activities such as press briefings, seminars and television/radio presentations focused on the International Day for the Eradication of Poverty (17 October).

Evaluation and efficiency. A total of 117 UNDP-funded project evaluations were conducted during 1996 and recorded in the Central Evaluation Database (CEDAB). Six strategic evaluations and one country programme evaluations were initiated. The following programme elements were considered necessary for success: the participation of beneficiaries in formulating and implementing activities; realistic programme objectives; benchmarks against which to measure progress; the sharing of lessons learned and evaluation findings with programme countries and country offices; and monitoring and evaluation as instruments to improve programmes and as instruments of accountability. UNDP made efforts to improve evaluation by: closer tracking of evaluation compliance; expanding dissemination of evaluation findings by developing CEDAB to make it more user-friendly; building capacity for evaluation and use of lessons learned through regional workshops in which government officials participated; revising UNDP guidelines on monitoring and evaluation (to be distributed in 1997); training staff to strengthen evaluation operationally; and improving ways of assessing performance impact.

To increase organizational efficiency, UNDP implemented a biennial budget strategy for cost reduction, the third of its kind since 1992. During the 1992-1997 period, UNDP reduced its administrative budget in real terms by more than 15 per cent and reduced staff at headquarters by 32 per cent and total regular staff by 15 per cent. Information systems were upgraded in 1996 and a human resources strategy was launched to develop skills to meet development challenges. Accountability for the use of UNDP resources was strengthened, with more vigorous monitoring improving the rates of compliance with recommendations of the Board of Auditors from 52 per cent in 1995 to 61 per cent in 1996.

UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board

In 1996, the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board held three regular sessions (New York, 15-19 January, 25-29 March and 9-13 September) and its annual session (Geneva, 6-17 May) [E/1996/33].

At the first regular session, the Board adopted 12 decisions, one of which [dec. 96/12] gave an overview of the decisions adopted at that session. By another decision [dec. 96/05], the Board requested UNDP and UNFPA to ensure that the content of their reports to the Economic and Social Council enabled the Council to compare their achievements and identify problems and recommend action on issues relating to allocation of resources, harmonization of procedures and budget presentation, common administrative services and premises, and monitoring and evaluation, and to agree on a common format and structure for their 1996 reports. The Board, in a third decision [dec. 96/06], requested UNDP and UNFPA to establish a working group on document distribution issues, in collaboration with UNICEF. Other January decisions are dealt with below, apart from three covering UNFPA (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII) and one on the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) (see PART THREE, Chapter X).

At its second regular session in March, the Board again adopted 12 decisions. The Board encouraged the Administrator to present an information and publication policy so that account would be taken of the need to prioritize UNDP publications with special attention to the risk of duplication with other UN publications and UNDP's financial and human constraints [dec. 96/22]. The Board also gave an overview of its decisions at that session [dec. 96/24]. Other decisions are dealt with in this chapter, except for four relating to UNFPA (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII), two relating to health issues (see PART THREE, Chapter XIII) and one relating to the programme of assistance to the Palestinian people (see PART ONE, Chapter VI).

At its annual session in May, the Board adopted 10 decisions, one of which was on matters relating to its rules of procedure, documentation and functioning [dec. 96/25]. Another gave an overview of decisions adopted at the session [dec. 96/34]. Other decisions are covered in this chapter, apart from three relating to UNFPA (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII) and one on extending special status to Namibia (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

At its third regular session in September, the Board adopted 12 decisions, mostly on financial and administrative questions (see below). The Board set guidelines for UNDP documentation [dec. 96/45] and gave an overview of decisions adopted at the session [dec. 96/46]. One decision related to health policy (see PART THREE, Chapter XIII) and another dealt with UNIFEM (see PART THREE, Chapter X).

By decision 1996/228 of 10 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board's reports on its 1996 annual session and its first and second regular sessions [E/1996/33]. It also took note of the Secretary-General's reports containing a summary of decisions adopted by the executive boards of UN funds and programmes and of actions by UN organizations on operational activities of the UN system for development [E/1996/64/Add.1 & 3].

UNDP operational activities

Country and intercountry programmes

At its first regular session in January [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/12)], the Executive Board approved the first country cooperation framework (CCF) for Bangladesh [DP/CCF/BGD/1] and took note of the extension of the fifth country programme for Fiji and for Tonga. The Board also took note of the programme objectives for Aruba [DP/1996/5] and for Trinidad and Tobago [DP/1996/6], and took action on special programme assistance to Bosnia and Herzegovina (see below under "Europe and CIS"). By another decision [dec. 96/01], it approved continued funding of assistance to Myanmar [DP/1996/4] and authorized the Administrator, on a project-by-project basis, to approve projects for a total amount not exceeding $52,076,000 during 1996-1997.

In September [dec. 96/46], two first CCFs were introduced and approved—for China (1996-2000) [DP/CCF/CPR/1] and for Viet Nam (1997-2000) [DP/CCF/VIE/1]. Both documents reflected a transformation in the role of UNDP, particularly with regard to its focus on poverty eradication. The frameworks had been developed through consultation with all relevant ministries as well as with civil society organizations, academia, the UN system and bilateral aid organizations, and with reference to the mid-term review process. A Board mission had visited China in February 1996.

Mid-term reviews. The Board, at its second regular session in March, considered the Administrator's February overview report [DP/1996/12] on mid-term reviews. The report was the fifth and final in a series responding to a 1992 UNDP Governing Council (the Executive Board's predecessor) request [YUN 1992, p. 559] that the Administrator report on mid-term reviews of the fifth cycle (1992-1996) country and intercountry programmes undertaken between 1993 and 1995. The report covered the main issues emerging from the reviews, with reference to four specific items: experiences with national execution; national capacity-building; the new support-cost arrangements; and the programme approach. Seven mid-term reviews were carried out in 1993, followed by 14 in 1994 and 82 in 1995; 28 were due to be completed in 1996. In general, the mid-term review process was considered beneficial and instructive by those concerned, namely, the Government, UNDP, other UN agencies and bilateral donors and non-governmental organizations (NGOs). It afforded an opportunity for stock-taking and focused on the programme's relevance and likelihood of achieving desired results. For the most part, fifth cycle country and inter-country programmes were consistent with broad national development priorities and the priorities of the Executive Board.

From the review process, UNDP had learned that the modalities of national execution and the programme approach were useful in fostering ownership and integration of external cooperation into national programmes. UNDP was making an effort to reduce the reported complexity and administrative burden without compromising financial and substantive accountability. Under the new programming arrangements, periodic monitoring and reviews of cooperation frameworks would emphasize the likely impact or sustainability of the results of UNDP-supported activities, requiring clearer operational guidance on defining performance measures specifically linked to determining progress and prospects for sustainability in human and institutional capacity development.

The Board also had before it mid-term reviews of: the fifth country programmes for Brazil, the Lao People's Democratic Republic and Romania; the fourth country programme for Mozambique; and the first country programme for Yemen [DP/1996/12/Add.1-5].

The Board took note of the overview report on mid-term reviews and of the mid-term reviews of the five country programmes [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/24)].

Country programmes by region

Africa

Through its Regional Bureau for Africa, UNDP provided support for the development of economic management capacity in 36 countries in 1996 [DP/1997/16/Add.1 (Part I)]. That assistance was instrumental in the design and implementation of sound macroeconomic policies in sub-Saharan Africa, where more than 40 countries had embarked on economic reform programmes. The average annual economic growth rate in the region reached 4.2 per cent in 1996, compared with an average 1.9 per cent in the 1980s. Inflation remained high, exceeding 20 per cent on average throughout the region. Using UNDP-supported macroeconomic models and project investment models, national officials prepared policy framework papers for talks with the International Monetary Fund.

The region was also experiencing political changes, with over 30 countries moving towards pluralistic, democratic systems. UNDP support for those countries focused on managing electoral processes, strengthening judicial systems and enhancing capacities for conflict prevention, management and resolution. That support contributed to peace and to the design and implementation of rehabilitation and reconstruction programmes in, for example, Mali, Mozambique and Sierra Leone. National governance programmes were being formulated in Cameroon, Ethiopia, Mali, Senegal, Sierra Leone and Swaziland.

Despite promising achievements, two challenges remained. Policies and practices to enable African countries to consolidate economic and political gains or to start the process towards stability and economic progress would have to be continued, and increased financial support would have to be mobilized from a variety of sources.

The UNDP goal of achieving SHD by fostering good governance, reducing poverty, alleviating the debt burden, improving access to international markets, increasing official development assistance, promoting direct foreign investment and improving coordination of aid from donors was consistent with the UN System-wide Special Initiative on Africa (see PART THREE, Chapter III), launched in March 1996. Along with the Economic Commission for Africa, UNDP was the joint lead agency of the governance component of the Initiative.

In 1996, UNDP supported 23 countries in implementing policies and programmes to eradicate poverty. Poverty profiles and public expenditure reviews providing a statistical overview of the extent of poverty were prepared, jointly with the World Bank, for Burkina Faso and Togo. An information system to prepare national human development indexes and to assess the impact of policies and programmes on the reduction of poverty was designed in Benin, and resources were mobilized to support poverty eradication programmes during round tables for the Congo, Namibia and Sierra Leone, where poverty programmes were presented to donors for funding. UNDP supported job creation, mainly through private-sector development and community-based programmes. The ongoing African Project Development Facility, created in 1986 by UNDP, the African Development Bank and the International Finance Corporation, helped prepare small and medium-sized projects ranging from $500,000 to $5 million. Empresas Tecnológica (EMPLETEC), a facility developed in Argentina to support small and medium-sized enterprises through provision of technical assistance, financial advice and training, was introduced in Ethiopia, Ghana, Nigeria and Zimbabwe. It had helped to launch more than 250 new African businesses in such areas as agro-industry, plastics, chemicals and textiles, and assisted over 300 enterprises to expand and modernize.

A 20-year campaign to end onchocerciasis (river blindness) reached a successful conclusion in 1996. UNDP, which provided $2.8 million in support in 1996, collaborated with the World Bank, the United States and other bilateral donors to help eliminate the disease from the Niger and Volta river basins, thereby enabling nearly 1 million people from 10 countries to move back to the region of rich farmland.

UNDP implemented the Africa 2000 Network programme in 1996, with funding of over $1 million. The Network, a quick-acting programme for sustainable livelihoods in rural African communities, encouraged villages, grass-roots groups and NGOs, through grants of up to $50,000, to engage in community-based activities intended to promote local livelihoods and sustain the environment. Over 500 projects were funded in 15 countries during the year.

UNDP contributed to the Global Environment Facility (GEF) in Africa, which provided $85 million to help combat environmental problems in 1996. Four projects, 16 enabling activities and five project development funds totalling $21.7 million were approved.

Nine new programmes for areas needing rehabilitation were approved in 1996, to be financed from core funds: Angola received $2.5 million for demobilization; Liberia, $500,000 for rehabilitation; Mali, $200,000 for reintegration; Rwanda, $2.5 million for capacity-building and rehabilitation; Sierra Leone, $1 million for rehabilitation and reconstruction; the Great Lakes region, $700,000 for information coordination in refugee areas; and the Horn of Africa, $250,000 for designing a strategy for rehabilitation. Burundi and Mozambique were allocated $500,000 and $1 million, respectively.

Through national long-term perspective studies, UNDP assisted Cote d'Ivoire, Gabon, Guinea-Bissau, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritius, Sao Tome and Principe and Zambia to design long-term development strategies with a national vision and agreed development objectives.

A number of African countries encountered special problems in 1996, eight of which were characterized as countries in crisis or emerging from that status—Angola, Burundi, the Central African Republic, Liberia, Mozambique, Rwanda, Sierra Leone and Zaire. UNDP supported conflict prevention in the Central African Republic, conflict resolution in Mali and Sierra Leone, peace-building in Liberia and post-conflict recovery and rehabilitation programmes in Angola, Mozambique and Sierra Leone.

Of a total fifth cycle (1992-1996) entitlement for Africa of $1.3 billion, 68 per cent was spent by December 1995, 23 per cent was committed for 1996 and 9 per cent would be carried over to the next cycle. Non-core resources for the region for the fifth cycle totalled $479 million.

Arab States

Through the Regional Bureau for Arab States, UNDP managed programmes and country offices in 18 Arab States in the Middle East and Africa, a region that during the 1990s stagnated economically with per capita gross domestic product remaining unchanged, while the income level for large parts of the population fell [DP/1997/16/Add.1 (Part II)]. The region was faced with a high population growth rate, dependence on oil production, effects of war and internal strife. Adult literacy remained at 54 per cent, gender disparity was widespread and 30 per cent of the population was impoverished.

SHD was considered a serious goal by all countries in the region. Somalia and the Sudan were stressing poverty eradication through a highly successful area development scheme programme, which was being replicated by other countries of the region. In the Syrian Arab Republic, a national SHD workshop was held in August 1996, which resulted in recommendations that would be pursued as part of the UNDP programme on operationalizing SHD. Following the meeting, UNDP and government officials met to discuss preparations for a national strategy for poverty eradication.

In 1996, UNDP programmes in the Arab States were reoriented towards poverty eradication. In Yemen, almost 100 small projects covering a wide variety of development needs were gradually phased out and replaced by SHD programming. UNDP initiated dialogue with government, civil society, donors and UN agencies in the areas of sustainable water resources management; sustainable environment management; poverty eradication and employment generation; decentralization and governance; and rehabilitation and reconstruction. Somalia, still conflict-ridden and with no nationally recognized Government since 1991, shifted its focus towards rehabilitation and poverty eradication. UNDP projects there included repairing ports and airports in the relatively stable areas of the north-east and north-west, which stimulated local economies and provided employment opportunities. In Lebanon, support was provided for integrated rural development in the impoverished region of Baalbeck-Hermel, which helped the Government to develop a regional strategy for the area.

In May, UNDP helped to organize a regional symposium on gender and human development in the Arab region, with the participation of Arab Governments, NGOs, and regional and UN organizations. The symposium adopted the Declaration of Tunis on Gender and Human Development, which focused on policy options for increasing women's economic and political participation in the Arab region.

In the field of environment, UNDP provided support staff for the Mediterranean Environmental Technical Assistance Programme (METAP) to help the countries in the region bordering the Mediterranean Sea in pollution prevention and integrated water management. The overall METAP programme was launched in Cairo, Egypt, in October 1996, and $1.45 million was mobilized from the World Bank in cost-sharing for 1996, with anticipation of similar amounts per year for the following four years.

Major 1996 programmes in the area of governance were being implemented by Egypt, Kuwait, Lebanon and Morocco. Twenty-five per cent of UNDP activities in that sector in the Arab region were projects designed to assist aid management and coordination; 21 per cent focused on planning and support for policy formulation; and the remainder was divided among support to public-sector reform, strengthening civil society and financial management projects. A conclusion drawn from the governance-focused activities in Egypt, Kuwait, Lebanon, Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Tunisia, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen was that their impact was commensurate with the country's desire to carry out the reform of the public sector, as articulated in government strategy plans.

Several countries in the Arab region had published national human development reports, and it was expected that by the end of 1997 all country offices would have produced one. The reports provided a framework for UNDP offices in advocating SHD and building constituencies. In the Maghreb countries (Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia), political decisions were being implemented to curb poverty, create jobs, manage the environment, integrate population parameters into national development policy and promote food security. Symposia on gender mainstreaming and empowerment took place at the subregional and regional levels.

Five countries with special circumstances in the Arab region benefited from the target for resource assignment from the core resources (TRAC). For the biennium 1996-1997, $5.1 million was allocated for Djibouti, Lebanon, Somalia, the Sudan and Yemen. Within that allocation, $1 million was programmed for the preparation of strategic frameworks in Somalia and Yemen. The remainder would be used in Djibouti, Lebanon, Somalia and the Sudan for post-conflict rehabilitation, assistance to internally displaced persons and area development schemes. The $20 million Somalia Rural Rehabilitation Programme supported social and economic rehabilitation activities in areas that were relatively stable. That programme funded and implemented initiatives that had a sustainable impact on improving access to basic social services, improving the productive potential of rural communities and establishing sustainable income-generation opportunities for rural populations. UNDP country offices cooperated with the UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs in preparing appeals for Iraq, Lebanon, Somalia and the Sudan. Cooperation was especially evident in Operation Lifeline Sudan (see PART THREE, Chapter III), a humanitarian programme that attracted external funding of more than $30 million in 1996. In Iraq, UNDP assisted in the repair of electric power generation plants and transmission substations.

Asia and the Pacific

The Asia and Pacific region continued to experience dynamic economic growth in 1996, averaging 7 per cent [DP/1997/16/Add.1 (Part III)]. Growth rates, however, varied from over 9 per cent in North and East Asia to about 1 per cent in some Pacific island countries. There were marked disparities within most countries, with over 30 per cent of the region's population in absolute poverty. Increasing numbers of subsistence poor and rising income disparities were exacerbated by the high population growth, rapid industrialization and urbanization and unsustainable use of resources. In 1996, the UNDP Regional Bureau for Asia and the Pacific adopted a work plan aimed at delivering SHD programmes with measurable impact and providing support to poverty eradication efforts in the region. The effectiveness of the poverty eradication programmes was enhanced by poverty assessments, with more targeted interventions that responded to root causes of poverty and focused on poorer segments of the population. In 1996, UNDP allocated 33 per cent of core resources to poverty eradication efforts in the region, followed by 24 per cent for governance and 23 per cent for environment activities.

The UNDP-supported National Poverty Reduction Programme in China, aimed at assisting 80 million persons living below the poverty line by the year 2000, was focused on upgrading skills of poor households and increasing access to rural credit. In Indonesia, UNDP supported interventions directed at specific segments of the population, including assessing the impact of poverty programmes, establishing baseline data, developing monitoring systems and providing poor communities with access to markets through information technology. UNDP completed the first phase of its human development initiative in Myanmar, which was estimated to have benefited approximately 1 million poor persons over the previous two and a half years. The human development initiative extension, approved in 1996, was designed to promote household food security, sustainable livelihoods, primary health care and basic education, and to strengthen a grass-roots outreach network. The subregional South Asia poverty alleviation programme, launched in February 1996, helped organize about 50,000 villagers into active community organizations in Bangladesh, India, Maldives, Nepal and Sri Lanka and provided training in management and technical fields to over 2,000 managers, community organization presidents and village activists.

As at December 1996, UNDP had helped 15 Asian and Pacific countries to strengthen or prepare national poverty eradication programmes and strategies; supported 18 countries in conducting poverty assessments; assisted 17 countries in preparing national human development reports; worked with 22 countries to incorporate science and technology into poverty alleviation programmes; and developed area-based programmes.

By the end of the year, five human development reports had been published for Bangladesh, Bhutan, the Philippines, India (state-level), and the Pacific (subregional). Reports were being prepared in a further 12 countries in the region. Related documents were being produced in 18 countries, for example, a socio-economic database in Pakistan, SHD situation analyses in four countries covered by the UNDP office in Samoa and in 10 countries covered by the UNDP office in Fiji, a human development monitoring report in Thailand, and a national poverty assessment in Maldives.

The UNDP integrated approach to the concerns of employment, gender and sustainable development resulted in a number of programmes that provided training for and access to livelihoods that protected the environment, while providing a source of income to the rural poor, particularly women. In Nepal, a programme emphasized the development of the rural cottage and small industry sector through the provision of basic and vocational skills training. In Mongolia, UNDP established a cheese factory to assist herders who lived adjacent to a natural reserve and who had been affected by the reduction in grazing areas. Different approaches to providing microcredit were tested in the region and adapted to local conditions. A UNDP-supported project in China provided loans to poor households for income-generating activities such as animal husbandry and setting up small businesses. In Bangladesh, Nepal and Sri Lanka, village organizations were formed to aggregate savings from local families into pools of capital which could be used to create new jobs and businesses. Those organizations were also linked with the formal banking sector, facilitating access to an additional $100,000 in loans. A programme for microcredit, targeting women in Samoa, provided $5,000 in grants to female-headed businesses and women's groups for business start-up.

Conserving and regenerating forest and water resources was a priority of UNDP-supported environment programmes. For example, a project in Bhutan was aimed at building governmental capacity to prepare national guidelines for forest management plans. GEF provided approximately $220 million to the region, covering 53 country and regional programmes. In 1996, those efforts were directed towards climate change and biodiversity. A programme for wetlands management was initiated with the approval of projects for China and Malaysia. Other GEF programmes were implemented in China, Mongolia, Papua New Guinea and Viet Nam.

Assisting Governments to strengthen national institutions and manage governance and public administration was another main area of concern to UNDP in the region. The Ministerial Conference on Governance for Sustainable Growth and Equity (Lahore, Pakistan, November), involving 14 Asian countries, adopted a declaration on the government-civil interface, decentralization of government tasks and the role of private enterprises. A specific area of UNDP governance assistance was for developing the electoral process. At the request of the interim Government of Bangladesh, UNDP provided technical support to the electoral process during the six months of political flux in early 1996, facilitating the work of election observers, providing voter education and awareness, training 400,000 voting officials and preparing election training manuals. Following elections in June, the new Government requested UNDP assistance for future elections. Many countries had requested assistance in strengthening local government capacity to decentralize planning and administration. With UNDP support, 126 village organizations in Nepal had been established and were implementing local development activities. A UNDP-supported resettlement and reintegration project in Cambodia combined anti-poverty interventions with the strengthening of local administration and democratic processes. The project assisted local authorities, communities and NGOs to design and implement 113 subprojects in health, education, agriculture, credit, infrastructure, HIV/AIDS awareness and gender mainstreaming.

Among countries in the region that were in crisis and receiving UNDP assistance in 1996 was Afghanistan. UNDP provided support for participatory and community-driven rehabilitation, development of key programmes for joint funding, and logistical and programmatic support for coordinated UN system efforts.

During the year, natural disasters struck many parts of the region. With UNDP assistance, over $1.5 million was mobilized for emergency relief following floods in Cambodia. In response to the typhoon and flood season in Viet Nam, UNDP established a facility for channelling disaster relief funds to the country, managed the funds, assisted in identifying the neediest communities and monitored distribution of relief goods. A series of floods in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea in 1995 and 1996 led to a food deficit. In response, UNDP prepared a joint inter-agency appeal and initiated an agricultural relief and rehabilitation programme.

Total fifth cycle (1992-1996) indicative planning figure (IPF) resources for the Asia and Pacific region were estimated at $1.3 billion. Cost-sharing contributions, Special Programme Resources (SPR), technical support services and trust funds were expected to provide another $250 million over the period. Estimated project expenditures totalled $1.1 billion for 1992-1996. During 1996, 107 nationally executed programmes and projects were approved for approximately $95 million, representing 73 per cent of the total value of new projects approved during the year.

Europe and CIS

Most countries of Eastern Europe had undertaken far-reaching reforms as they moved from one-party rule to pluralist democracies and from centrally planned to market-driven economies. For the three preceding years, socio-economic conditions in most of the countries had been in a downward spiral, marked by declining gross national products, increasing poverty, unemployment and growing inequality of incomes.

In an effort to develop SHD policies, the UNDP Regional Bureau for Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) produced annual national human development reports on 25 countries in 1996 [DP/1997/16/Add.1 (Part IV)], providing statistical information on the demographic, social, economic, environmental and cultural components of the societies in transition. UNDP created the Central and Eastern European Privatization Network which played a role in the transition to market economies and enabled 23 regional countries to share experiences in the field of privatization. The development of small and medium-sized business centres and incubators in eight countries contributed to the establishment of around 500 such enterprises each year. The jobs created by those enterprises were critical in reducing poverty. In a similar effort, UNDP and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) created the Small and Medium-sized Enterprises Business Consultancy Centre in Romania, providing assistance in the service, manufacturing and processing sectors. Since the Centre was opened in 1991, over 4,000 enterprises had benefited from its services, including 247 that had received loans worth $31.5 million. Launched with UNDP help, six New Entrepreneurs' Centres in Estonia provided expert advice free of charge on how to start a business. Also with UNDP assistance, a Business Promotion and Support Centre was opened in Bulgaria in July to offer training courses and credit opportunities for small entrepreneurs.

UNDP initiated the establishment of gender-in-development units in the region to help Governments focus on women's issues. During 1995 and 1996, units became operational in 18 countries. In Bulgaria, UNDP cooperated with the Government in a programme to provide qualification training to unemployed women from five depressed areas of the country.

With regard to the environment, UNDP and the Inter-State Council for the Aral Sea organized an international conference in Uzbekistan to identify solutions to the crisis caused by the exposed seabed, which was thick with agricultural chemical residues and salt. The five heads of State attending the conference signed the Nukus Declaration committing their countries to remedying the consequences of the Aral Sea disaster. UNDP also contributed to a programme in the Barents Sea region of the Russian Arctic, which was threatened by hazardous waste dumping and air pollution.

UNDP country offices worked with Governments throughout the region to institute governance and administration programmes. With the help of UNDP and the Soros Foundation, an NGO Information and Support Centre was opened in Lithuania to give advice about establishing NGOs and offer courses in financial management and public relations. After Estonia regained independence, nearly one third of its population—people who had settled there during the Soviet administration—were required to apply for residence and work permits. UNDP was asked to provide technical support for processing the 335,000 applications and, with additional funds from five donor countries, it recruited experts and provided local offices with computers linked to a network. In Latvia, a $1.1 million UNDP programme provided assistance to the Human Rights Office, which handled complaints of human rights violations, disseminated information about human rights and investigated human rights issues. To help Kazakhstan achieve macro-economic stability and move to a market-based economy, UNDP recruited experts from Poland who had experience working in a transitional economy. The training focused on banking reform, inflation control, fiscal and tax policy, debt and foreign investment promotion. UNDP assisted countries in managing external resources and aid coordination; 15 countries joined a regional programme on external resources management in order to coordinate aid flows.

Significant contributions were made to countries in crisis and other special circumstances. UNDP made $6.2 million available from various sources during the 1992-1996 period to support Bosnia and Herzegovina in its process of reconstruction. In 1996, thanks to additional funding from donors, UNDP was involved in 32 ongoing or planned operations there valued at $34.4 million. A multidisciplinary UN system mission under UNDP leadership was fielded in March 1996 to assist the governmental structures recognized under the Dayton Agreement in designing a reconstruction programme including good governance and SHD. The mission produced plans for a $110 million programme. The UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, recognizing the need for massive reconstruction and rehabilitation in Bosnia and Herzegovina, by a January decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/11)], welcomed the Administrator's plan to earmark at least $5 million in additional funds for programming activities in 1996 for that country, to come from available unprogrammed SPR to the extent possible. The funds were to be utilized for programmes developed by the Government in consultation with UNDP. The Board welcomed the Administrator's decision to establish a UNDP country office in Bosnia and Herzegovina as soon as possible.

The UNDP programme for Tajikistan totalled around $5 million, with emphasis on the economic and social spheres, aid coordination, peace-building, women in development, governance and rehabilitation and reconstruction. The peace- and confidence-building programme was staffed by United Nations Volunteers. Some 50 youth and community centres, involving over 3,000 young people, were established in nine districts most affected by the 1992-1993 civil war. Microcredit schemes facilitated the integration of 500 returnees into communities. With a programme budget for Azerbaijan of more than $2.1 million, UNDP focused on aid coordination, environmental management, governance, administrative reforms and reconstruction of war-affected areas. In Georgia, UNDP allocated $2 million for post-crisis development, especially in the former conflict zone in South Ossetia.

During the fifth programming cycle (1992-1996), 30 per cent of programme funds were delivered through the national execution modality. The delivery rate increased throughout the period. Deliveries from IPF totalled just under $40 million in the first four years of the cycle. By the end of 1996, the total reached $22.3 million for the year.

Latin America and the Caribbean

Adjustment policies in the Latin American and Caribbean region had resulted in its restoration to macroeconomic balance and reduced inflation during the 1990s. Economic growth between 1990 and 1994 averaged 3 to 4 per cent, but it slowed to 0.6 per cent in 1995, in part owing to crises in Mexico and Argentina. Preliminary data indicated the economy strengthened again in 1996 [DP/1997/16/Add.1 (Part V)]. Countries in the region faced problems of extreme poverty, poor governance structures and unsustainable use of natural resources.

With nearly 20 per cent of the population existing in absolute poverty and social inequalities having increased, major UNDP priorities for the region were poverty eradication and employment creation. The UNDP Regional Bureau for Latin America and the Caribbean supported projects designed to help countries develop national poverty eradication strategies. A trust fund for the Central American countries, financed by Italy and UNDP, supported a regional programme on SHD. In Nicaragua, a subprogramme benefited four departments characterized by extreme poverty and former conflict; it strengthened local organizations, at the municipal and departmental levels, that promoted employment, health, education and environmental planning systems. In Guatemala, an anti-poverty subprogramme served three departments affected by former conflict, thereby contributing to the reintegration of uprooted populations.

In Haiti, support was provided to 15 municipalities to strengthen their planning and management capacity. Other projects were aimed at fostering rural economic development in the poorest regions. A $4.5 million project in Bolivia helped 4,000 poor families in the Altiplano by providing technical assistance for improving the production of alpaca wool and establishing a processing unit to produce alpaca yarn. In Ecuador, a $2 million project was improving living conditions in poor areas of Quito, Guayaquil and Cuenca, benefiting lower-income women and children through community participation. A pilot project in Guyana on squatter settlements was aimed at improving living conditions. An $11.9 million programme, funded by UNDP and the Government, supported Colombia's national social plan to create employment, improve the condition of women and facilitate investments in local infrastructure serving the poorest 20 per cent of the population. In Peru, a $20.8 million programme supported those living in extreme poverty and coca farmers. A crop-substitution programme promoted alternative development in three main coca-growing areas of Peru. Another $20.3 million programme provided assistance in the resettlement of internally displaced populations. A $200 million programme in Argentina trained 100,000 unemployed youths.

During 1996, the UNDP regional environment portfolio received significant support from GEF, with the most prominent activities related to biodiversity conservation, climate change and international waters. Projects totalling $24.5 million were approved. The portfolio included five regional environment projects. They addressed sustainable use of resources in the Amazon, globally significant environmental concerns in Central America, energy efficiency and development of renewable energy resources, heavily contaminated bays and coastal zones in the Caribbean and monitoring of greenhouse-effect gases. Two new projects, currently in the preparatory phase, would contribute to the establishment of a Central American system of protected areas and biological corridors, and of a Central American fund for environment and development. The estimated contribution of GEF would be $25 million, and the fund would finance projects addressing climate change, biodiversity loss, ozone depletion and pollution of international marine, coastal and fluvial ecosystems.

UNDP provided assistance in governance programmes in the region, which had made sweeping strides towards democratization. Governance was selected as the main theme for the Ibero-American Summit of Heads of State (Santiago, Chile, November), and Chile requested UNDP assistance in preparing the technical documentation. Preparatory activities included the organization of national conferences in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Mexico and Nicaragua. In Peru, UNDP allocated $176 million to improving key government institutions and creating new institutions to limit the role of the State and transfer productive assets to the private sector.

The subprogramme on judicial reform promoted the independence, restructuring and decentralization of the judiciary. It supported the strengthening of functions such as public defence, special proceedings for women and young criminals, and training of judges, district attorneys and magistrates. In Guatemala and El Salvador, UNDP assisted in establishing a public defence system, the overall reform of the judiciary, the strengthening of the Office of the Counsel for Human Rights and the civilian police. In Honduras, two projects aimed at strengthening the judiciary system and the civilian police, which would be transferred from military jurisdiction under the provisions of a constitutional amendment. A judicial reform programme in Peru, involving loans by the World Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank, provided $115 million in support to the Judiciary Branch and the Department of the Public Prosecutor.

Another area of cooperation in governance concerned the strengthening of parliaments and political parties. In the English-speaking Caribbean, UNDP contributed to the launching of the Association of Caribbean Community Parliamentarians, which promoted dialogue on socio-economic and political issues in the subregion. A programme in Uruguay was aimed at improving the image of the Parliament by stressing efficient methods of management, streamlining functions and responsibilities and establishing formal mechanisms to facilitate access to legislators. Government administrative reform was the goal of a programme of support for municipal development in Argentina encompassing 150 municipalities in 24 provinces over a five-year period. Similarly, a programme in Colombia provided technical assistance through a World Bank loan, aimed at strengthening local public administration.

In the area of human rights, a UNDP project helped government officials in Colombia to identify actions for the defence, promotion and protection of human rights, including education campaigns.

UNDP continued to advocate SHD throughout the region. An important contribution was the preparation of human development reports. During the year reports were completed on Brazil, Chile and Costa Rica, and those for Argentina, Belize, Guyana and Trinidad and Tobago were being prepared.

Among countries in crisis or other special circumstances that received UNDP assistance was Nicaragua, which received support for consensus-building activities during the political campaign. In particular, discussion was promoted on an anti-poverty agenda. UNDP continued to implement projects related to the peace accords in El Salvador by strengthening democratic institutions and the social and economic reintegration of ex-combatants and demobilized soldiers. In Guatemala, UNDP assisted the Government and former guerrilla forces in building an investment and technical cooperation portfolio, and contributed to the restructuring of the judicial system. The UNDP programme in Haiti focused on strengthening democracy and improving management of democratic institutions. It also included support for civic education and the electoral system and reform of the prison system. In the area of natural disasters, UNDP was involved in post-hurricane reconstruction in Costa Rica and Nicaragua.

The Regional Bureau continued to mobilize additional external resources to supplement core resources. In 1996, external resources increased by over 10 per cent from the previous year. Total approved resources for the fifth cycle (1992-1996) reached $3.25 billion, of which 94 per cent were non-core resources and 6 per cent were approved IPF resources. The non-core segment was composed of government cost-sharing resources, originating largely from loans from international financial institutions and the Governments' own resources.

Global and interregional programmes

In a July report [DP/GCF/GLO/1], the UNDP Administrator submitted to the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board the global cooperation framework, which he said was aimed at initiating and strengthening global partnerships; identifying and analysing emerging global issues and trends; supporting research, pilot and demonstration projects common to many countries; evolving multidisciplinary development approaches; carrying the lessons of experience at the country level to the interregional and global levels; and supporting the application of policy and programme tools in formulating national programmes. The five programme categories of the global framework were: sustainable human development; poverty elimination and sustainable livelihoods; the environment, natural resource management and energy; the advancement of women and gender equality; and the management of development and governance.

Of the $110 million estimated to be available for the global programme for 1997-1999, $3 million was to support the Human Development Report Office and $9 million was for contingencies. The balance of $98 million would be spread among the five programme categories.

By a 13 September decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/42)], the Executive Board took note of the global cooperation framework and requested the Administrator to submit in 1997 a revised text of the framework, taking into account clarifications requested and comments made by the Board and without prejudice to the framework's implementation.

Programme planning and management

In his annual report covering 1996 [DP/1997/16/Add.1 (Part VI)], the Administrator stated that UNDP had a key role to play in the next decade in assisting countries to take advantage of the opportunities presented by globalization, while protecting their most vulnerable citizens from globalization's hazards. To make SHD a reality in an increasingly globalized world, a more integrated approach was required that allowed economic growth, social equity and environmental sustainability to move forward together.

In 1996, support to country offices continued to be the chief priority of the Bureau of Policy and Programme Support (BPPS), which sought to ensure that UNDP had ready access to knowledge, policy guidance and operational tools for achieving SHD by providing substantive guidance and organizational leadership in the five areas of priority concern—poverty eradication, jobs and sustainable livelihoods, environmental protection and regeneration, gender equality and governance. In that regard, BPPS emphasized the creation of strategies, guidelines, indicators, assessment methodologies, the dissemination of best practices and research, and the testing of innovative models through flagship programmes. During the year, the bulk of programmes and activities funded through the fifth cycle (1992-1996) global and interregional programmes and the Special Programme Resources (SPR) were con-eluded and major evaluations of those programmes were conducted.

Addressing the operationalization of SHD and the strengthening of country offices and headquarters, the Administrator stated that the Sustainable Development Networking Programme had been strengthened in 1996. That Programme was designed to provide civil society organizations in developing countries with access to information relevant to sustainable development. By the end of 1996, it was active in more than 30 countries.

The Poverty Strategies Initiative, a flagship effort of BPPS, was launched in March 1996 to support country implementation of the commitments contained in the 1995 World Summit for Social Development Programme of Action [YUN 1995, p. 1115]. They included formulating national poverty eradication plans and strategies and elaborating national definitions, measurements, criteria and indicators of absolute poverty. Initiatives were already under way in over 70 countries.

In 1996, an outside evaluation of the Private Sector Development Programme (PSDP) was conducted, which recommended sharpening the UNDP focus in that area. Three programming priorities were identified: support to microentrepreneurs, especially through microfinance; support to small and medium-sized enterprises, especially through provision of non-financial support and advisory services; and engaging the private sector. Important progress was made in the area of microfinance with the approval in July of the MicroStart Programme. New microfinance initiatives were launched in Brazil and China. PSDP was active in supporting national-level programmes, such as an initiative involving private-sector organizations in South Africa and their counterparts in the region and an inter-agency mission on private-sector development in Haiti. Technical support was provided to Bangladesh for a project aimed at decentralizing production systems through the establishment of partnerships between microfinance NGOs and private-sector companies.

During the year, the Gender in Development Programme was instrumental in increasing UNDP resource commitments to the advancement of women. Some 15 per cent of total UNDP global and regional resources had been committed to the advancement of women for the next programming cycle, up sharply from the 1992-1996 cycle.

The areas of concentration of UNDP's environmental activities were sustainable agriculture and food security; water resources and the aquatic environment; renewable energy and energy conservation; and forest management. An organization-wide initiative on energy was launched in 1996 to help developing countries move towards sustainable energy futures. With regard to forest management, UNDP was working in 70 countries to manage, preserve and regenerate forests. It had also designed a forest capacity programme through a special fund, with which it assisted countries to formulate and implement integrated strategies for forest management. The global Capacity-building Programme for Sustainable Water Sector Development, funded by UNDP and several donors, supported water sector assessments and strategy formulation in Bolivia, China, Ghana, Mali, Mexico, Peru, the Sudan, Swaziland and Viet Nam. The programme was designed to produce a nucleus of officials and specialists trained in sustainable water sector development and to improve collaboration.

The UNDP GEF was very active in 1996, with the GEF Council approving 16 projects, 31 enabling activities and 22 Project Development Facilities. UNDP-GEF projects approved carried a total value of $80.8 million and encompassed every region of the developing world.

Capacity 21, a fund that assisted developing countries to integrate the principles of Agenda 21, adopted at the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development [YUN 1992, p. 672], contained $65.6 million, with additional contributions in excess of $6 million made in 1996. During the year, programmes were approved in Bhutan, Bolivia, Bulgaria, China, Costa Rica, Djibouti, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Kyrgyzstan, Nepal, the Niger and Sao Tome and Principe, as was a regional programme for the Mediterranean.

In connection with the Montreal Protocol, which was adopted in 1987 [YUN 1987, p. 686] in an effort to reverse the damage to the ozone layer, UNDP was helping 49 countries to eliminate ozone-depleting substances by the end of 1996. Those countries were being assisted in programme formulation, technical cooperation and training, demonstration projects, national institutional strengthening and technology transfer projects. In 1996, total funding amounted to $30.3 million.

UNDP also supported efforts to implement the 1994 United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification [YUN 1994, p. 944] through its regular core programmes and through the Office to Combat Desertification and Drought. In 1996, technical and catalytic financial support was provided to 33 countries in various preparatory activities in the implementation of the Convention. An estimated $6.7 million was mobilized through the Trust Fund to Combat Desertification and Drought, which supplemented $1.7 million for ongoing desertification-control projects in the most affected countries. The total value of ongoing projects in 1996 was approximately $45.3 million.

Programmes in the areas of governance were spearheaded by the Management Development and Governance Division, which strove to strengthen electoral processes; support decentralization and economic and financial management; build civil society partnerships; promote legal reform; and support the establishment of parliamentary processes. A significant achievement in 1996 was the completion of the UNDP policy document "Governance for Sustainable Human Development", which was intended to guide the work of UNDP country offices and key partners in programme countries in the field of governance. Another achievement in 1996 was the launching of the Management Development and Governance Network (MAGNET), a moderated electronic network that aimed to transform the Management Development Programme into a professional network in order to enhance support for public-sector reform and governance.

As a participant in the Joint and Co-sponsored United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS, UNDP continued to give high priority to strengthening the ability of country offices to integrate HIV activities in key UNDP programme areas, including governance, gender and poverty.

With regard to new programming arrangements and delivery, the Administrator reported that the Programme Management Oversight Committee became fully operational during the latter part of 1996. Extensive consultations were held on the programme approach during the fourth quarter of the year, resulting in the "User's Guide on the Programme Approach", which was distributed to country offices for comments in December.

The Administrator stated that UNDP was strengthening its partnerships in the UN system and attempting to build a leaner, more accountable organization. He noted that a prototype corporate plan, introduced in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 894], was currently under implementation and efforts had been made to institutionalize corporate planning in UNDP and to formulate a mission statement. The Administrator considered it important to synchronize UNDP's planning and budgetary cycles and proposed achieving that synchronization by the start of the 1998-1999 biennial budget cycle. After that, a corporate plan would be issued every two years. As a transitional step, the next corporate plan would span the 18-month period from June 1996 to December 1997 and the following structure for that plan was proposed: mission statement, situational analysis,

By a 15 May decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/29)], the Executive Board endorsed the mission statement, taking into account the discussions that had taken place during the Board's 1996 annual session. The mission statement said that UNDP was committed to the principle that development was inseparable from the quest for peace and human security and that the United Nations must be a strong force for development as well as peace. UNDP's mission was to help countries to achieve SHD by assisting them to build their capacity to design and carry out development programmes in poverty eradication, employment creation and sustainable livelihoods, the empowerment of women and the protection and regeneration of the environment, giving first priority to poverty eradication. Further, UNDP acted to help the UN family become a force for SHD and worked to strengthen international cooperation in that regard. At the request of Governments, said the mission statement, UNDP assisted in building capacity for good governance, popular participation, private- and public-sector development and growth with equity, stressing that national plans and priorities constituted the only viable frame of reference for the national programming of operational activities for development within the UN system. The statement also described how UNDP functioned, and affirmed that it was politically neutral and impartial and that it sought to conduct its work in a manner transparent and accountable to all its stakeholders.

Fifth programming cycle

Independence bonus

In a July report [DP/1996/27], the Administrator described implementation of a 1995 Executive Board decision [YUN 1995, p. 894] in which it had been agreed that 15 countries were eligible for an independence bonus to be granted to each country that had gained independence since 1973 as a supplement to its IPF. Subsequent to the 1995 decision, Slovakia was added to the list, bringing the total number of countries granted recipient status during the fifth programming cycle (1992-1996) to 23—Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Czech Republic, Eritrea, Estonia, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lithuania, Republic of Moldova, Russian Federation, Slovakia, Slovenia, South Africa, Tajikistan, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkmenistan, Ukraine and Uzbekistan. Palau had been granted recipient status prior to the fifth cycle, but independence was achieved only in October 1994. In 1995, the Board had decided that the independence bonus would be financed from the resources of the fifth programming cycle, provided that existing allocations for country and intercountry programmes were fully honoured.

The Administrator reported that UNDP had released the first tranche of the independence bonus, totalling $4,167,000. The remaining bonus amounts, equalling $10,338,000, represented approximately 0.3 per cent of total fifth cycle programme resource. The Administrator proposed releasing the remaining bonus amounts against UNDP general resources to the 16 eligible countries: Armenia, Azerbaijan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Eritrea, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Palau, Republic of Moldova, Slovakia, Slovenia, Tajikistan, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan.

Having been informed that Ukraine should be deleted from the list of eligible countries, the Board took note of the Administrator's report [dec. 96/46].

Successor programming arrangements

As requested by the Executive Board in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 896], the Administrator submitted a report on the implementation of the successor programming arrangements in UNDP [DP/1996/3], with specific reference to the development of guidelines that would translate into a set of operational procedures and processes. An initial set of guidelines was prepared covering country-level programming, resource assignment and programme review for the first two lines of the target for resource assignment from the core (TRAC). The preliminary guidelines, which were summarized in the report, included start-up and phasing-in procedures that permitted immediate, limited programming of TRAC resources, in line with Board directives, pending the finalization of a new CCF for each programme country. The measures were aimed at ensuring that programme countries could derive maximum benefit from the new arrangements as soon as possible.

The previous programming concept was based on a fixed five-year cycle with preallocated IPFs. However, new programming mandates had been established for UNDP in recent years, including the programme approach, national execution and enhanced resident coordinator functions. The new arrangements focused on high-impact programmes supporting national efforts towards SHD, with emphasis on poverty elimination. CCF was the prime instrument for programming UNDP resources at the country level; it was developed by Governments in consultation with UNDP and set out, for Executive Board review, the intended nature, focus and financial scope of UNDP cooperation in the country. Once endorsed by the Board, CCF would become the framework for programming all UNDP-managed resources in the country for the period specified. It set out the overall strategy for UNDP cooperation, taking into account country-specific circumstances. The Board would be able to comment on the broad, strategic directions for cooperation before actual programme formulation began.

CCF would cover a period of three to five years that was harmonized as much as possible with national planning horizons and the time frames of other UN system activities. It was based on national development priorities from an SHD perspective and on an overview of external cooperation in the country. CCF outlined possibilities for joint programming with other development partners, the results expected and the likelihood of sustainability once support ceased. It also outlined management arrangements for implementation, monitoring and review, as well as a resource mobilization strategy and target for all UNDP-managed resources.

Following endorsement of CCF by the Board, the Administrator would assign TRAC resources for programme implementation, on the basis of an initial request prepared by the country office. Resource assignments would be reviewed and could be revised at later stages after programme reviews. The country office would then formulate the full programme. That delegation of authority would be coupled with a system for programme review and monitoring, which ensured quality control accountability.

Under the rolling, three-year planning scheme, the financial period was rolled forward at year end, with a new year added and the first year dropped, and additional resources released. A revised system for programme monitoring, review and oversight was being established at the corporate, regional bureau and country-office levels. Since the majority of existing country programmes expired in 1996, the Administrator suggested that start-up procedures be applied so that the schedule for submitting the expected large volume of CCFs could be extended to the Executive Board's first regular session of 1998. The Administrator put forward suggestions for rationalizing and streamlining the Board's workload to enable it to deal with 30 to 50 CCFs per regular session in 1997 and 1998, including the possible establishment of working committees.

The Executive Board, in January [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/7)], requested the Administrator to ensure that revised guidelines were submitted to the Board no later than at the 1996 annual session. Reaffirming that CCF was the central document in the country programming process and that the recipient Government had the primary responsibility for its formulation, the Board noted that CCF should be based on a realistic estimate of income from both core and non-core resources. The Administrator was asked to submit CCFs, as formulated by the countries concerned in consultation with UNDP, to the Board for approval. It decided that CCFs would be approved as submitted, without discussion, unless at least five members objected. The Board requested the Administrator to submit in 1996 a proposed format and timing for review reports that would enable the Board to review implementation of CCF in each country and lessons learned as part of the preparation for the next CCF.

Agency support costs

In response to the Board's January decision, the Administrator issued, in March, another report on implementation of the successor programming arrangements [DP/1996/21]. He provided summaries of guidelines for country-level programming; resources for development in countries in special development situations; regional programming; global interregional and special activities; and programme support to the resident coordinator/aid coordination.

As to the programme review and support system, the Administrator stated that, in general, biennial reports reflecting the outcomes of Government/UNDP reviews of progress in implementing CCFs would be made available to the Board. In addition, ad hoc reports on evaluation of the main themes of UNDP assistance would be submitted as and when they were undertaken. Other details were provided in the Manual for the Programming of UNDP Resources.

In a February report [DP/1996/13], the Administrator gave an overview of the support cost components of the successor programming arrangements, highlighting in particular the financial framework. The Executive Board had greatly simplified the structure for support costs by establishing three major lines in the new resource framework, which replaced the nine lines used in the fifth programme cycle (1992-1996). Together, the three lines constituted support for UNDP-funded programmes and for providing technical and programme support services from the UN system. They totalled 6.6 per cent of total core resources for the 1997-1999 period, or $72.6 million annually. Earmarkings were based on an estimated $1 billion in average annual contributions for that period. Within overall annual allocations, the Administrator intended to make flexible earmarkings among eligible agencies and regional commissions, based on three criteria: the need for preparatory activities in implementing successor programming arrangements; the need to provide upstream assistance to Governments and coordination from the UN organizations in identifying SHD programming opportunities; and the need to channel contributions towards the support of enabling environments for SHD activities in programme countries. The Administrator said that the simplification of support cost facilities under the successor programming arrangements created the possibility of moving to an integrated support cost regime that could apply to the entire UN system.

The Board, in March [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/23)], stated that it would consider at its annual session the proposals contained in the reports on support cost components of the successor programming arrangements and additional information to be provided by the Administrator on the agency support costs system.

The Board, having considered that additional information at its annual session, adopted a May decision [dec. 96/31], by which it reaffirmed the continued relevance and importance of the original key objectives of the agency support cost arrangements. It decided that, under the successor programming arrangements, the current guidelines for support costs would continue to apply and would be adjusted only to the extent necessary to: ensure coherence with established procedures; reflect experience with the support costs arrangements from the fifth cycle; and accommodate the more simplified system of support costs earmarking. The Administrator was requested to ensure that the agency support cost arrangements became more driven by country priorities, and to promote the linkage of technical support by agencies to UNDP support for national programmes. The Board decided that the support cost facilities would be administered directly by country offices in consultation with the programme countries and that national execution would be encouraged. It requested the Administrator to promote the involvement of national and regional institutions in programme development and implementation. He was urged to ensure that the support of the regional commissions was focused mainly on upstream work to support national and regional programme development. Any resources saved through national execution, it was decided, would be made available for additional programming by the country. Further, the Board decided that UNDP, in order to simplify the system, should reimburse the cost of administrative and support services to the five large executing agencies (the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the International Labour Organization, UNIDO, the United Nations Department of Development Support and Management Services and UNOPS) with a maximum of 10 per cent, which represented the current average reimbursement rate for various inputs. Should the actual costs fall below 10 per cent, only actual costs would be reimbursed. The Board decided that agencies would maintain the existing cost measurement system and the Administrator should continue to report biennially on the actual costs incurred. UNDP was requested to ensure that the experience of individual countries was disseminated throughout the system and used for the benefit of the development community.

The Administrator was asked to review recent experience with the agency support cost arrangement at the country level and to report thereon in 1997 in the context of the review of the successor programming arrangements.

Programme evaluation

In a February report on UNDP evaluation [DP/1996/14], the Administrator described activities undertaken in 1995 by the Office for Evaluation and Strategic Planning (OESP) and by other organizational units of UNDP, within the conceptual framework for monitoring and evaluation. He stated that the work programme in evaluation presented to the Board in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 896] had been fully implemented. Evaluations continued to focus on performance dimensions of the UNDP programme, including sustainability, results-based management and beneficiary participation. OESP was undertaking a thorough review of performance compliance that would establish a performance profile of all organizational units concerned. That process would emphasize the importance of maintaining compliance rates in evaluation through adherence to established procedure.

At the project level, evaluations were decentralized and regional bureaux and country offices had used their own resources to carry out approximately 900 evaluations between 1990 and 1994. Over that period, the average annual rate of decline in the number of evaluations was 15 per cent, due largely to the adoption of the programme approach, which had resulted in fewer small projects. In 1994, 123 evaluations were carried out by UNDP. Early figures for 1995 showed that 92 per cent of project evaluations were in Africa and Asia. Of particular note in the Asia region were evaluations of the following projects: establishment of a national forest resources information database in China; development of hybrid rice technology in India; and strengthening of the National Planning Commission Secretariat in Nepal. In Africa, evaluations related to regional projects such as the programme for strengthening management training institutions in sub-Saharan Africa; the West African Rice Development Association; and the regional project on National Long-term Perspective Studies.

In line with the 1995 OESP action plan for evaluation, five initiatives were given priority: linking evaluation and strategic planning; facilitating and testing modalities of decentralization; building capacity of programme countries in new evaluation techniques; review of policy, procedures and operational mechanisms used in programme support, project design and monitoring and evaluation; and collaboration with other international agencies.

The report presented examples of evaluations conducted in 1995, grouped into three categories: strategic evaluations; evaluations of SPR-financed programmes; and evaluations undertaken by UNDP-administered trust funds.

In March [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/20)], the Executive Board stressed the importance of feeding back the lessons of monitoring and evaluation into planning and management in order to improve output. It requested the Administrator to ensure that evaluation and monitoring were established in the UNDP management culture by: raising the profile of accountability and of staff and programme performance monitoring and evaluation; reviewing and revising the systems and criteria for selecting subjects for evaluation, the handling in evaluations of UNDP's operational implementation, opportunities for joint evaluations with other UN bodies, and actions required of UNDP personnel; linking compliance with monitoring and evaluation procedures with UNDP personnel management and reporting systems; and reporting the results of strategic evaluations to the Board. The Administrator was requested to report in 1997 on implementation of the decision.

UNDP evaluation activities in 1996 [DP/1997/16/Add.4] included six main evaluations undertaken centrally. Evaluative work at the country level for the year covered 117 project-level evaluations registered in the Central Evaluation Database in 1996 and evaluations of regional, interregional and global programmes. As a result of those activities, the importance of the following elements was determined: participation of beneficiaries in the design and implementation of programmes; realism and clarity in objectives; the need for baseline data and performance indicators for measuring progress towards objectives; reinforcement of organizational learning by disseminating lessons learned; and reduction of the the multiplicity of administrative procedures.

The Administrator concluded that the resounding message of evaluation findings was the need for the organization to become one that was more results-oriented and where prospects for SHD were what guided programme formulation. Particularly in the fields of governance and environment, where its capacity was increasingly recognized, UNDP was becoming a partner to national authorities in substantive policy dialogue and a vehicle for implementing development programmes funded by other donor organizations.

Accountability

In a July report on accountability in UNDP [DP/1996/35], the Administrator presented a framework for both organizational and individual accountability within the Programme. He pointed out that UNDP had been at the forefront of the UN system in certain areas that were critical to accountability, including strategic planning, performance appraisal of staff, formulation of budget strategies and financial accountability. In order to improve accountability, UNDP engaged management consultants in early 1996 to make recommendations for a framework of accountability systems. Their initial findings identified six subsystems within UNDP that had a direct bearing on accountability—planning and programming; financial resources management; human resources management; material resources management; oversight, including audit and evaluation; and internal justice. The final study was expected to be completed by the end of the year.

The accountability framework, which was similar to many managerial frameworks drafted for international, national and private-sector organizations, was a four-step process: the UNDP mandate mission and goals needed to be defined through such means as establishing policies, defining authorities and responsibilities, and setting measurable performance targets and indicators; shared ethical values should be established, communicated and practised, including human resource policies and practices consistent with values and objectives, and authority, responsibility and accountability defined and consistent with objectives; a high level of capability, should be made available to ensure the availability of the knowledge, ability, skills, tools and information to achieve objectives; and monitoring performance against targets and learning from the outcomes, including assurance on compliance with the accountability framework, reliability of reporting, compliance with policies, implementing corrective actions and applying rewards and sanctions.

The Executive Board, in September [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/36)], expressed its support for the direction being pursued by UNDP to make it a more effective, efficient and accountable organization. The Administrator was asked to report informally at each Board session on progress made to implement the accountability framework.

Financing

The UNDP Administrator, in his annual review of the financial situation [DP/1997/24 & Add.1], gave an overview of the financial situation at the end of 1996 and provided financial forecasts for 1997, 1998 and 1999 and an analysis of all funds managed by UNDP over the previous three years. The 1996 report differed from previous ones in several ways, including the fact that it broke down the accounting for the UNDP general account, the Inter-Agency Procurement Services Office (IAPSO) and the Reserve for Field Accommodation.

The overall income structure of UNDP underwent a considerable shift in 1996, with the proportion of voluntary contributions falling to 49 per cent of income versus 57 per cent in 1995. The decline was offset by an increase in resources mobilized for specific activities, which accounted for 45 per cent of UNDP income. The specific contributions included project and programme cost-sharing, contributions to trust funds and sub-trust funds (small trust funds established to earmark contributions for a specific purpose consistent with the purpose of an open trust fund), and management service agreements. The shift in funding increased the administrative workload of UNDP, since most of the contributions for specific purposes required specific financial control and reporting, as well as management of cost-apportionment mechanisms.

Voluntary contributions to the UNDP general fund in 1996 fell by 6 per cent, from $900 million in 1995 to $848 million. The decrease was further aggravated by late payments by donor countries and appreciation of the United States dollar over the course of the year. By the end of the year, $58 million of voluntary contributions pledged for 1996 and prior years remained unpaid and the overall loss on 1996 pledges due to appreciation of the dollar totalled $24 million.

In contrast, UNDP resource mobilization efforts had resulted in a continuous increase in third-party cost-sharing income to the general fund, which amounted to $100 million at the end of 1996, up from $68 million in 1995, a 47 per cent increase. That increase was particularly strong in least developed countries (LDCs), where third-party cost-sharing income amounted to $44 million in 1996, 63 per cent more than the 1994 level.

Total resources mobilized as government cost-sharing to the UNDP general fund increased in 1996, reaching $701 million. Five countries (Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Panama and Peru) accounted for 73 per cent of that amount. Excluding countries from Latin America, government cost-sharing income amounted to $47 million in 1996, a 4 per cent increase over the 1995 level. Interest income earned in 1996 amounted to $51 million compared to $60 million in 1995, excluding interest earned on cost-sharing resources ($17 million), which was accounted for under extrabudgetary income.

With respect to other programmes, for which total 1996 income amounted to $589 million compared to $467 million in 1995, income received by funds and trust funds rose by 26 per cent, to $394 million from $313 million in 1995. Two factors contributed to the increase: a higher level of voluntary contributions, amounting to $287 million, and a substantial increase in sub-trust funds contributions, which equalled $71 million in 1996 compared to $24 million in 1995. Contributions channelled through management service agreements increased by 27 per cent, from $132 million in 1995 to $168 million in 1996. Interest income earned by funds and trust funds totalled $25 million compared to $18 million in 1995.

Total programme expenditure increased in 1996, both for the UNDP account ($1,211 million in 1996 compared to $994 million in 1995) and for other programmes ($439 million in 1996 compared to $397 million in 1995). Programme expenditure from general resources increased by 11 per cent, to $544 million from $490 million in 1995. Three regions contributed to the increase in programme delivery (Latin America, Europe and Africa). In the Asia Pacific and Arab States regions, the level of programme expenditure from general resources remained below 1995 and 1994 levels. Programme expenditure from general resources in LDCs grew significantly, reaching $140 million in 1996 compared to $118 million in 1995. An increase in cost-sharing expenditure by 34 per cent to $667 million confirmed that programme countries with high levels of mobilized resources also had high levels of programme delivery.

The continued shift towards national execution, which had accelerated since 1992, accounted in 1996 for 70 per cent of the UNDP general fund programme expenditure, compared to 60 per cent and 53 per cent in 1995 and 1994, respectively. The increase in programme expenditure for national execution and UNOPS was particularly noteworthy, while the share of other UN agencies, regional and Bretton Woods institutions further declined to represent less than 17 per cent of UNDP general fund programme expenditure. Programme expenditures of funds and trust funds increased by $20 million in 1996, mainly because of higher programme delivery in GEF, the Programme of Assistance to the Palestinian People, the Trust Fund for Rwanda and Capacity 21, as well as in many small trust funds.

Total expenditures through UN agencies remained stable, as indicated by the level of agency support costs. As part of the implementation of the new support cost arrangements under the successor programming arrangements, all existing projects still ruled by the old regime were to be converted to the new regime in 1997.

Revised 1996-1997 budget

The Administrator issued a June report [DP/1996/29] on the revised budget estimates for the 1996-1997 biennium. The revised estimates for the budget component relating to core activities amounted to $376.8 million gross and $338.8 million net. In net terms, that was an increase of $0.8 million, or 0.3 per cent, in relation to the original appropriation approved in 1995. The estimates incorporated an increase as a result of the establishment of a country office in Bosnia and Herzegovina as approved by the Executive Board in January (see above, under "Europe and CIS"). The revised estimates for the component relating to Programme Support and Development Activities amounted to $179.6 million, an increase of $1.4 million, or 0.8 per cent. That component included support to the operational activities of the United Nations. Total revised estimates for the budget components financed from UNDP resources amounted to $556.5 million gross or $518.5 million net. Total revised estimates for the budget components relating to the funds amounted to $22.7 million, an increase of $0.03 million, or 0.1 per cent. The revised estimates for all budget components combined and financed from the resources of UNDP and the funds amounted to $579.1 million gross and $541.1 million net. In net terms, the figure represented a total increase of $2.3 million, or 0.4 per cent.

The revised budget estimates were reviewed by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) [DP/1996/30], which noted that voluntary contributions were projected at $1,852 million for 1996-1997, reflecting a decrease of 8.9 per cent, as compared with the $2,034 million previously projected for the biennium; however, the revised figure still represented an increase of 1.3 per cent over contributions received for 1994-1995.

In September [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/41)], the Executive Board approved the revised 1996-1997 budget estimates of UNDP and the funds it administered, in the amount of $579.1 million gross ($541.1 million net). It also approved costs for establishing a country office in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Administrator's proposals on principles and criteria for determining amounts to be reimbursed by host Governments towards local office costs. The Administrator was authorized to maintain an accounting linkage between voluntary contributions and contributions to local office costs in such a manner that contributions were first applied against obligations towards local office costs. The Board decided that in the case of countries with a 1994 per capita gross national product of $4,701 and above, UNDP would finance a resident representative and a second international staff member where programme activities exceeded $12 million over a three-year period and would finance a resident representative where programme activities exceeded $8 million over that period. Financing would continue for the three years after a country passed that threshold.

Review of the 1995 financial situation

At its third regular session in September, the Executive Board had before it the Administrator's review of the 1995 financial situation [DP/1996/28 & Add.1-4]. Total overall income for 1995 amounted to $1,624 million, a decrease of $18 million compared to 1994. Voluntary contributions before the application of the accounting linkage between them and government local office costs declined slightly to $903 million, from $932 million in 1994. The level of voluntary contributions was aided by a relatively weak dollar during the course of the year. As at 31 December 1995, voluntary contributions pledged but unpaid totalled $37 million.

After several years of rapid growth, cost-sharing income remained stable compared to 1994, growing by less than 1 per cent from $596 million to $601 million in 1995. Miscellaneous income rose from $58 million in 1994 to $76 million in 1995; most of that increase was due to improved interest earnings. Extrabudgetary income was reduced from the 1994 level of $49 million to $40 million solely because of the separation of UNOPS income from that of UNDP. Excluding UNOPS income from activities relating to trust funds and management services arrangements, which amounted to $18 million in 1994, UNDP extrabudgetary income rose from an adjusted $31 million to almost $40 million in 1995.

The $9 million difference arose primarily from increases in programme and administrative support services provided by country offices, support services provided by UNDP to non-core activities and trust funds, and procurement services provided by IAPSO.

Total expenditure decreased from $1,389 million in 1994 to $1,379 million in 1995. Programme expenditure declined to $994 million from $1,020 million in 1994. Within that amount, IPF expenditure declined from $489 million to $438 million and SPR expenditure declined from $43 million to $41 million.

Cost-sharing expenditure increased from $475 million in 1994 to $504 million in 1995 and represented slightly less than 51 per cent of total programme delivery.

In September [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/44)], the Board expressed concern over the reduction in voluntary contributions to UNDP core resources and called on donors to increase their contributions in the light of the estimated planning figures it had adopted. It encouraged UNDP to work towards securing a more predictable level of core resources. Expressing concern about the build-up in the balance of general resources, the Board urged the Administrator to continue efforts to improve programme delivery, keeping in mind the importance of maintaining the quality of UNDP programming. It decided to continue the application of the agreed formula for determining the level of the Operational Reserve, and requested the Administrator to present by January 1998 a review of the modality of non-core resources from donor countries in relation to their financial management, focusing on their cost effect on core resources.

Reserve for Field Accommodation

In an addendum to his review of the 1995 financial situation [DP/1996/28/Add.3], the Administrator reported on the Reserve for Field Accommodation, as requested by the Executive Board in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 897]. He provided an update of the activities of the Reserve following the issuance of a three-year plan in late 1994, noting that a review of the Reserve's operations had begun in 1995 and improvements were being realized in management and reporting. Serious issues regarding the three-year plan had arisen, which had caused UNDP not to implement the plan. UNDP decided to retain housing assets originally planned for disposal. The non-realization of that income, coupled with costs required to complete ongoing construction, caused the level of the Reserve to increase to $46.8 million at the end of 1995. Under new accounting procedures using gross terms, the balance was $54.8 million.

The report outlined management actions taken during 1995 and 1996, analysed the contributing factors for the current situation, and made proposals for a revised accounting treatment for the Reserve, in line with international accounting standards. The review had identified some serious managerial weaknesses which were being addressed, in particular overcommitment and overexpenditure. The Administrator had established a separate management oversight committee to deal with the accountability aspects raised by the review.

UNDP considered that the forecast amount of cumulative borrowing from UNDP of $27.5 million in 1996 would be the peak borrowing by the Reserve, and it was expected that the amount due to UNDP would decline to $12.2 million by the year 2000, principally from the surplus of rental income as against maintenance costs. Other factors could also reduce the amount due.

Recalling that the Reserve was intended originally for housing only, but that UNDP had been authorized to use it for office accommodation if no other options were available, the Administrator recommended that the Executive Board include only housing operations under the Reserve. Pending approval of a detailed plan for housing and office premises, the Administrator requested the Board to approve the level of the Reserve at $62.8 million, as at 31 December 1996.

The Executive Board, in September [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/40)], welcomed the report on the Reserve and additional information provided by the Administrator and the UN Board of Auditors. It noted with concern the failure of management oversight to ensure the proper application of the Financial Regulations and Rules and the supervision of staff and contracted parties that had contributed to the problems outlined in the report. The Board welcomed the actions initiated by UNDP to strengthen control of the Reserve and requested the Administrator to take steps to ensure compliance with all financial regulations, including training of staff in financial management and oversight. He was also requested to address any systemic problems relating to financial control and management that had come to light, in order to ensure that the matter remained an isolated incident, and was urged to finalize the investigation of the Reserve's management and to ensure that, within the framework of accountability, responsibility was assigned at the individual level. While endorsing the revised accounting treatment for the Reserve, the Board noted with concern that overcommitment would reach $62.8 million by the end of the year. The proposal that activities under the Reserve cover only housing premises and that office premises be handled separately was approved.

Procurement

In a report [DP/1996/7] to the January session of the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, the Administrator stated that the mandate of the Inter-Agency Procurement Services Office (IAPSO) was to undertake research and development activities in the area of procurement and to provide a wide range of procurement services, including advisory, training and direct procurement services, to Governments, NGOs, the UN system and UN staff. The Administrator had reviewed the activities and role of IAPSO as part of the budget strategy for the 1996-1997 biennium, incorporating recommendations of the UN Board of Auditors. The Administrator believed that IAPSO should continue with its two basic mandates and that the direct procurement and training services offered should continue to be provided on a cost-recovery basis. However, research and development activities should continue to be provided as a free service to UN organizations and should be financed from UNDP resources, but should also gradually become self-financing.

By a 17 January decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/02)], the Executive Board reaffirmed that under its mandate for research and development on procurement-related matters for the UN system, IAPSO would continue to promote inter-agency cooperation and coordination, where possible finding ways of making such activities self-financing. It also reaffirmed that, under its mandate for procurement services, IAPSO would continue to provide a range of procurement services to the UN system and external development partners, including NGOs, Governments and governmental agencies, building on its capacity in common-user items and other product groups for which the Administrator would determine that IAPSO had the requisite capacity. The Board requested IAPSO to present a consolidated biennial report on its activities, including direct procurement, and to provide a full statistical report on UN system procurement later in the year.

In response to that request, the Administrator submitted in July the first biennial report on IAPSO activities [DP/1996/31 & Corr.1]. It highlighted the developments and results achieved since 1994, as well as activities planned for the future. The Common Guidelines for Procurement by Organizations in the United Nations System were developed and adopted by the Inter-Agency Procurement Working Group (IAPWG) in 1996. The aim of the guidelines was to provide transparent information to suppliers on how to do business with the UN system. IAPWG continued work on defining standard terms and conditions on contracts for procurement of goods and services, in collaboration with the UN Office of Legal Affairs. It had defined the concept of "lead agency" to guide coordinated procurement for selected product groups and had undertaken standardization of basic specifications and collective price arrangements for common-user items such as motor vehicles, office equipment and electric generators. Use of the resulting umbrella contracts had resulted in an estimated direct annual savings of $20 million.

The volume of procurement handled by IAPSO had grown from $48.2 million in 1994, an increase of 9.5 per cent over the previous year, to $56.8 million in 1995, an increase of 16.5 per cent. Growth continued in early 1996 at a rate of about 15 per cent. In 1995, 77.2 per cent of IAPSO procurement was for motor vehicles and spare parts, while computers, office equipment, communication and audio-visual equipment, power generators and laboratory equipment represented 22.8 per cent of the total dollar value.

The IAPSO publication 1995 Annual Statistical Report was distributed to the Executive Board. It stated that total procurement of goods and services for 1994 and 1995 was almost the same, at $3.67 billion and $3.69 billion, respectively. Procurement under UNDP funding, which was increasingly carried out through national execution, had increased substantially, resulting in a lesser share of procurement originating in industrialized countries. In 1995, 59.9 per cent of UNDP procurement came from developing countries (up from 58.8 per cent the year before) and 4.2 per cent from underutilized major donor countries (up from 2.8 per cent).

The Executive Board, in September [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/35)], recommended that IAPSO continue to explore ways to enter into arrangements for coordinated procurement with UN entities, drawing on the respective strengths of each entity.

Financial Regulations and Rules

In his report on the 1995 annual review of the financial situation [DP/1996/28/Add.4], the Administrator proposed amendments to the UNDP Financial Regulations and Rules in order to enhance the coordination and mobilization of resources by UNDP from non-governmental sources, as well as to enable UNDP to operate a viable micro-capital grant programme. The proposed changes were a first and temporary measure, to be followed by a complete revision to be presented to the Executive Board in 1997.

Since its formation in 1965, UNDP had been permitted to receive funding from private and public sources, including NGOs, under its Financial Regulations. UNDP had broadened its resource mobilization strategy to encompass greater involvement of NGOs, and to effectively mobilize such sources a revision of the Regulations was required. In particular, the requirement for prior approval by the Board for donations in excess of $25,000 was not practical; nor was there a need to involve the Board in prior review and approval. UNDP was putting in place all necessary elements to ensure that: UNDP associated only with non-governmental sources that were apolitical and supported its objectives; there was a system of checks and balances in place to ensure that sources of funding were appropriate for the activities to be funded; the resources mobilized did not jeopardize the universal character of UNDP activities; and once received, donations would be managed by UNDP in accordance with the Regulations.

The Administrator proposed that changes be made to expand the definition of "contribution" to include cash and in-kind assistance from non-governmental sources. In addition, he proposed eliminating the requirement for prior approval by the Board of contributions and replacing it with an annual reporting requirement.

With regard to micro-capital grants, he further proposed raising the maximum of any one grant from $50,000 to $150,000. Experience had demonstrated that a $50,000 grant was not large enough to initiate effective micro-credit activities, the Administrator reported, and the micro-capital grant was the principal modality in UNDP for supporting credit activities.

By a September decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/39)], the Board approved the Administrator's proposed changes to the Financial Regulations. It requested the Administrator to keep the Board apprised of the status of resource mobilization initiatives from non-governmental sources and to report on the matter in 1998.

Other technical cooperation

UN programmes

In July [DP/1996/32], the UNDP Administrator reported on technical cooperation expenditures financed from sources other than UNDP in 1995. The report covered the executing agencies, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), UNDP, UNFPA, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the World Food Programme (WFP) and the World Bank Group, but excluded expenditures on activities relating to refugees, humanitarian and special economic assistance, peacekeeping operations and disaster relief.

Non-UNDP-financed technical and non-technical cooperation expenditures contracted in 1995, reaching a total of $1,494.3 million, the main reason being the shortfall by WFP and the World Bank Group. Concessional technical cooperation by the World Bank Group dropped by 20.6 per cent to $1,173.6 million in 1995, reversing the growth record of the previous two years. Grant technical cooperation (agencies, plus UNFPA and UNDP) grew throughout the 1993-1995 period, but the growth in 1995 was weak, with expenditures amounting to $2,751 million. In 1995, total technical cooperation (grant plus the World Bank Group) amounted to $3,925.3 million, which was 5.8 per cent less than the previous year. That was the first time that total technical cooperation expenditures of the UN system had contracted since 1989. Non-technical cooperation expenditures (UNICEF and WFP) reached $1,901.2 million in 1995, 13.4 per cent less than the previous year.

DDSMS activities

During 1996, the United Nations Department for Development Support and Management Services (DDSMS) had more than 1,300 technical cooperation projects under execution in a dozen substantive sectors, with a total project expenditure of some $74.3 million. Projects financed by UNDP represented $45.2 million; those by trust funds, $23.6 million; and by UNFPA, $5.5 million.

On a geographical basis, the DDSMS-executed programme included expenditures of $27.7 million in Africa, $16.9 million for interregional and global programmes, $16.3 million in the Middle East and Europe, $9.3 million in Asia and the Pacific and $4.1 million in the Americas. Project delivery in Africa remained the largest with a 37.3 per cent share of total delivery.

Distribution of expenditure by substantive sectors was as follows: development policies and planning, $17.5 million; associate expert programme, $12.6 million; governance and public administration, $11.9 million; water, $9.2 million; statistics, $5.1 million; social development management, $3.5 million; energy, $3.4 million; infrastructure, $3.4 million; public finance and enterprise management, $3 million; minerals, $1.9 million; population, $1.6 million; programme support, $0.7 million; and the United Nations Educational and Training Programme for Southern Africa, $0.5 million. Of the total of $74.3 million, development policies and planning comprised 23.6 per cent; the associate expert programme, 17 per cent; and governance and public administration, 16 per cent.

On a component basis, DDSMS delivery in 1996 included $53.3 million for project personnel; $7.8 million for training; $6.9 million for equipment; $3.9 million for subcontracts; and $2.4 million for miscellaneous expenses.

In a report [DP/1996/8] to the January session of the Executive Board, the Secretary-General stated that DDSMS continued to focus its substantive support to technical cooperation on environmental management and social development, which comprised the areas of natural resources and environment planning and management, energy planning and management, and social development management, and on public administration and development management, which consisted of governance and public administration, public finance and enterprise management, and development planning and policies. With funding from the UN regular budget and extra-budgetary resources, DDSMS provided technical and managerial support and advisory services on request to bolster the development efforts of Member States. It also conducted operational research and seminars, and provided parliamentary services to expert groups and intergovernmental bodies in its areas of expertise.

DDSMS continued to collaborate with UNDP, and with the regional commissions and other Secretariat entities, in programme and project development in the areas of poverty elimination, environment, employment, women and governance, including follow-up to global conferences and implementation of the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa (see PART THREE, Chapter III). Attention was also being increasingly directed to post-conflict reconstruction and rehabilitation. Partnership was also being built between DDSMS and UNOPS (see below), through an agreement whereby UNOPS could call on the substantive capabilities of DDSMS, and DDSMS could call on the project-servicing capabilities of UNOPS.

The Executive Board, by a 19 January decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/04)], invited DDSMS, UNDP and other UN entities to give further attention to strengthened programmatic linkages. It recommended that UNDP consider including in its work plan an evaluation of the DDSMS activities that it financed, including a value-for-money audit.

UN Office for Project Services

In a March report [DP/1996/23] to the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, the Executive Director of the United Nations Office for Project Services, which became a separate entity within the United Nations on 1 January 1995 after having operated under UNDP direction, described the transitional measures that UNOPS had undergone in order to adapt itself to its new institutional status.

UNOPS was and remained a fully self-financing and extrabudgetary operation. The cornerstone of UNOPS efforts to solidify its financial viability and improve its performance was the 1995 Business Plan, the three principal priorities of which were to improve quality of service, build and enhance relationships with the client community, and complete the transition to UNOPS. Based on that Plan and following a Management Coordination Committee (MCC) recommendation that the UNOPS internal structure be reviewed, an intensive reorganization effort took place. The reorganization strategy was intended to result in improvements in three areas: responsiveness (improving timeliness, flexibility and creativity in adapting to new needs); quality (effectiveness, transparency and professionalism of services); and value (providing value for money and an ongoing commitment to reducing the cost of service delivery).

The most important concept underlying UNOPS reorganization was that of building integrated teams by placing appropriately skilled staff in self-contained groups that could focus on the needs of specific clients and portfolios. Those teams were expected to accelerate service delivery and to contain cost by streamlining work processes. Three types of integrated operations teams were formed: regional, thematic and implementation modality. The operations teams would join both project management and service specialists (purchasing, recruitment, payments), who had previously been assigned to separate organizational units.

The report went on to discuss guidance, support and control functions; client relationships; human resources issues; and future steps in the transition process.

The Executive Board, on 15 May [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/33)], encouraged the Executive Director to continue his efforts to make UNOPS more innovative and cost-effective, as recommended by the MCC. It requested the Executive Director to keep it apprised of the operational results and financial implications of the reorganization within the framework of future annual reports, submitted through MCC.

Budget estimates

The Executive Director, in a July report [DP/1996/36], issued revised 1996-1997 budget estimates for UNOPS, which had been reviewed and approved by the UNOPS MCC. The report explained changes, endorsed by the UN Board of Auditors, that UNOPS made in its reporting procedures to enhance the transparency of compensation paid to UNDP for services provided to UNOPS. It also provided justification for an increase of less than 1 per cent over the approved biennial estimates, the full amount of which UNOPS expected to be covered by its income. Information on UNOPS staffing arrangements was updated.

According to the report, the estimated revised budget for 1996-1997 was $65,444,000. Total income was projected at $67,189,000: $59,689,000 from project implementation; $6,000,000 from services to the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD); $1,400,000 from interest income; and $100,000 from accounting services provided to the Programme of Assistance to the Palestinian People. The revised estimates showed an income of $5,670,000 more than projected earlier, due mainly to a change in procedures for recording payments to UNDP country offices for services provided on behalf of UNOPS and interest on investments of unspent income.

The revised estimates of administrative expenditures for 1996-1997 totalled $65,444,000, or $4,015,000 greater than estimated. Of that increase, $3,500,000 was accounted for by the reporting of payments to country offices as a separate line under the administrative budget. Consequently, the actual increase amounted to $500,000, less than 1 per cent over the original approved estimate. Most of the increase was for reimbursement for internal audit services provided by UNDP. Other revised cost increases were for subcontracts, rent and maintenance, and computer hardware.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) reviewed the revised 1996-1997 budget estimates, and in an August report [DP/1996/38] said that actual administrative expenditures and support income earned were in line with the original projections.

The Executive Board, on 11 September [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/37)], took note of the changes in financial reporting procedures that had been introduced with effect from the 1996-1997 biennium. It approved the revised budget estimates for 1996-1997 in the amount of $65,444,000.

1996 activities

In his annual report to the Executive Board covering 1996 [DP/1997/19 & Add.1/Rev.1], the Executive Director stated that UNOPS had met the majority of its 1996 financial targets and continued to operate in accordance with the self-financing principle.

The demand for the Office's services increased in 1996 for the second consecutive year, and newly acquired business amounted to $534 million. Of that amount, UNDP core resources accounted for the largest share, 37 per cent, followed by Management Services Agreements with international financial institutions and bilateral donors, especially Japan, with 30 per cent; UNDP trust funds, the Global Environment Facility and the 1987 Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer (see PART THREE, Chapter VII) with 19 per cent; and Governments of programme countries and other UN agencies and programmes with 14 per cent. Traditionally, UNOPS and its predecessors had mainly provided implementation services, handling clients' financial resources in a manner similar to that of a general contractor. Increasingly, UNOPS was being asked to provide services in support of project execution and contracting carried out by other parties, such as national Governments of programme countries. Management fees reimbursed the cost of providing those services. An example of that modality was the loan administration service provided by UNOPS for nationally executed loans from IFAD. In addition to administering loans, UNOPS guided projects towards the attainment of agreed development objectives, helping strengthen the staff capacity of national executing agencies.

With regard to delivery, the 1996 target was set in the 1996 Business Plan at $454 million. Provisional data indicated a delivery of $433 million, at a delivery rate of 95 per cent. Of particular note was the strong delivery in the UNDP core budget portfolio, which reached $179 million. In addition to funds handled on behalf of clients, UNOPS programme supervision had led to the disbursement of $129 million in IFAD loans, representing 50 per cent of IFAD total disbursement in 1996.

Provisional data indicated that income was $36.9 million in 1996, or 11 per cent above the target set in the Business Plan. The largest portion of UNOPS income in 1996, 85 per cent, was generated by projects for which funds were entrusted to UNOPS. More than 11 per cent derived from fees for "services only" activities, with the remaining 4 per cent coming from interest income and miscellaneous sources. While income from delivery of the UNDP core budget portfolio increased in dollar value, UNOPS income derived from the implementation of UNDP core projects was below 50 per cent, underlining UNOPS efforts to diversify its portfolio.

Administrative cost for 1996 was estimated at $33.6 million, or $0.9 million higher than foreseen in the Business Plan; that figure included the estimated cost for central services and country office services provided by UNDP. The administrative elements under UNOPS direct control amounted to $29.9 million.

The administrative overhead on funds handled on behalf of clients was an important factor for UNOPS competitiveness. The administrative cost varied considerably from project to project, depending on the nature and extent of services required. In most cases, overhead costs were negotiated with the client and/or funding source on the basis of estimated actual expenditures and were budgeted as dollar amounts, rather than on a percentage basis. The overall average overhead rate for 1996 projects was 6.9 per cent.

As part of its reform and reorganization efforts, UNOPS pursued decentralization where it led to improved service at lower cost. Besides headquarters in New York, UNOPS maintained offices in El Salvador, Kenya and Malaysia. In 1996, it established new offices in Copenhagen, Denmark, and Geneva. Since IAPSO had moved its operations to Copenhagen, the conditions offered by Denmark to UNOPS had led to a decrease in the average cost of procurement operations of 10 to 15 per cent. The Rehabilitation and Social Sustainability Unit, which was responsible for social rehabilitation projects in countries in crisis and in transition, including support for the reintegration of returning refugees, internally displaced populations and demobilized combatants, moved to Geneva in 1996; Switzerland financed that relocation.

UN Volunteers

In his annual report for 1996 [DP/1997/16/Add.1 (Part VII)], the UNDP Administrator described activities of the United Nations Volunteers (UNV), which celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary that year and moved its headquarters from Geneva to Bonn, Germany. To mark the anniversary, the book Volunteers against Conflict, written by UNV specialists and based on field experiences in humanitarian and peace-building missions, was launched in May.

A total of 3,242 UNV specialists and fieldworkers from 137 nations served in 140 countries during 1996. They included more than 600 specialists who worked with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) during the September elections in Bosnia and Herzegovina, 120 national eco-volunteers and hundreds of Transfer of Knowledge Through Expatriate Nationals (TOKTEN) and United Nations International Short-Term Advisory Services (UNISTAR) volunteers serving around the world. The organization increasingly directed its efforts towards poverty eradication, peace-building, democratization and relief to development, while continuing its community-focused development work.

In the area of poverty eradication, a regional workshop on UNV contributions in sub-Saharan Africa was held in February in Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso, with UNDP resident representatives/resident coordinators, government officials and NGO representatives. UNV specialists increasingly supported UNDP poverty-related programmes, specifically in China, Kyrgyzstan, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Namibia, Nepal, Senegal, Sri Lanka, Togo, Uganda, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe. Poverty-related, community-based initiatives launched by UNV in Latin America included projects with street children in Central America; with artisans in Ecuador; with populations around Sao Paulo, Brazil; and with the UNDP Participatory Development Programme in the Caribbean, notably in Barbados, Guyana and Trinidad and Tobago.

UNV activity in peace-building and democratization included the assignment of 234 specialist volunteers to provide support to UN missions, in particular those in Angola, Haiti, Liberia and Rwanda. The dispatch of 40 election logistics specialists and 605 election supervisors for OSCE in Bosnia and Herzegovina was the first UNV operation on such a significant scale in support of a regional organization. Sixty-five UNV specialists were fielded as human rights monitors in Rwanda in connection with United Nations Centre for Human Rights activities.

In the area of relief to development, UNV specialists were present at the local level in post-conflict situations in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cambodia, Haiti, Mozambique and Rwanda, in support of rehabilitation processes. Many specialists were involved in quick-impact projects which aimed at stimulating longer-term local development initiatives. For example, in Mozambique, UNV specialists facilitated the rural resettlement of formerly displaced persons and demobilized soldiers in cooperation with government services and other organizations.

At the end of 1996, UNV Strategy 2000, a document outlining the identity, role and direction of UNV work for the years 1997 to 2000, was finalized. It stated that UNV would focus on responding to specific country needs, especially in the main areas of concentration of urban development, environmental management and preventive/curative development.

The UNDP Administrator, in a March report [DP/1996/22], described UNV activities during the 1994-1996 period. He said that volunteer roles were particularly relevant in support of NGOs and local community-based groups in countries in crisis. UNV specialists had contributed to crisis prevention, emergency humanitarian relief, electoral assistance and rehabilitation. Major activities within the framework of UN missions included demobilization of former combatants in Mozambique; electoral support in South Africa and Haiti; and technical and administrative support in Angola, Liberia, Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia. UNV human rights monitors had worked in Guatemala, Haiti and Rwanda and conflict resolution endeavours combining international and national volunteers were undertaken in the Great Lakes region of Africa (Burundi, Rwanda and Zaire) and in some countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States. UNV work in poverty eradication through the Domestic Development Services (DDS) programme continued, with the focus on enhancing the managerial and the technical capacities of community-based groups. Operational in over 30 developing countries and with some 200 government and NGO partners, DDS supported the expansion of village-level, income-generating initiatives and assistance to the most disadvantaged.

Financing for UNV activities was made available from the Special Voluntary Fund (SVF) for pilot and experimental projects, including support for the artisan sector in Asia, sensitizing UNV programme officers to the HIV/AIDS epidemic in Africa, coordinating with NGOs in several Latin American countries, and diversifying traditional rural activities in Arab States. The UNISTAR and TOKTEN programmes, both under UNV management, continued to perform well. UNISTAR, the private-sector development arm of UNV, had increasingly focused its attention on countries in transition, and its work in 1994-1995 was marked by collaboration with multinationals such as the Samsung Group, which provided assessment and advice to electronic and electrical engineering firms in Uzbekistan, and Fiat, which advised Bulgaria on developing joint venture possibilities. TOKTEN continued to provide short-term technical assistance to 43 countries. During the reporting period, TOKTEN programmes were established in Haiti and Lebanon, as well as in the West Bank and Gaza.

For 1996, UNV resources were expected to total $54.7 million, up from $52.6 million the year before. Of that amount, $20.2 million was projected from SVF contributions and funds-in-trust, $20 million from UNDP resources and $12 million from UN system organizations.

The Executive Board, on 10 May [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/32)], noted the substantial contribution of the UNV programme to humanitarian, peace-keeping, peace-building, human rights and rehabilitation activities as well as to poverty eradication and encouraged UNV to intensify participation in UN development, humanitarian and peace activities. The Board stressed the need for further contributions, including through co-financing arrangements to SVF, UNISTAR and TOKTEN. The Board took note of a UNV proposal to consider having the International Year of Volunteers 2001 as one of the instruments to promote volunteerism.

Technical cooperation among developing countries

In his annual report for 1996 [DP/1997/16/Add.1 (Part VII)], the Administrator stated that the Special Unit for technical cooperation among developing countries (TCDC) supported the implementation of activities consistent with the TCDC new directions mandate approved by the High-level Committee on the Review of TCDC in 1995 and endorsed by the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly [YUN 1995, pp. 902-903]. During the year, the Special Unit emphasized the areas of priority approved by the High-level Committee—trade and investment, macroeconomic policy development and coordination, poverty eradication and management of the environment—which were in accord with the objectives of SHD. The Special Unit issued a publication entitled TCDC and Sustainable Human Development, which provided examples of the linkage between TCDC and SHD.

In the area of poverty eradication, emphasis was placed on implementing the 237 agreements concluded among participants in the capacity and needs-matching exercise on credit and rural poverty held in Bangladesh in 1994. At the end of 1996, about one third of the agreements had been implemented, while others were in various stages of preparation. The Special Unit provided follow-up support, including funds, to facilitate further implementation. In collaboration with the Latin American Economic System (SELA), efforts were made to stimulate the development of small-scale enterprises through an analysis of opportunities offered by integration arrangements in the region. The Special Unit was monitoring activities of the countries concerned to use the knowledge gained for the benefit of establishing small businesses.

With respect to management of the environment, support was continued for the International Network on Small Hydropower based in Hangzhou, China. The network had pooled the resources of the main regional energy institutions in Africa, Latin America and Asia, serving as an expert facility and repository of technical information relating to the development of small hydropower operations as an environmentally friendly alternative source of energy, particularly in rural areas of developing countries. The E-7 Network of Expertise, a consortium of the major energy authorities of the Group of Seven major industrialized countries, shared its technical know-how on energy development with the network. Other environment activities included providing support for the establishment of a network of regional groups to exchange technical information, policies, practices and facilities relating to bio-systematics, the effective use of which had important implications not only for a country's species, but also in the development of agriculture and food production. Also, a monograph on best practices in urban management was compiled as part of preparations for the second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII).

With regard to macroeconomic policy development, support was provided to the Third World Network, which helped developing countries to disseminate and analyse information relating to trade negotiations and the establishment of the World Trade Organization. Support was also provided to the Group of 77 and China with respect to preparations for the 1997 South-South Conference on Trade, Finance and Investment.

The Special Unit continued to support the implementation of the 1994 Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States [YUN 1994, p. 783]. The first draft of the Directory of Experts and Institutions of Small Island Developing States, consisting of four volumes, was prepared and made available through UNDP country offices and various institutions. The information was also made available via the Internet through the TCDC Information Referral System (INRES). The TCDC/INRES database was expanded to cover information on the capacities of 3,400 institutions in 60 developing countries.

Overall, the TCDC programme was successfully implemented during 1996, the Administrator noted, but failure to integrate the TCDC modality into project implementation and the lack of effective operational integration between TCDC and economic cooperation among developing countries were constraints to full realization of its potential.

UN Capital Development Fund

During 1996 [DP/1997/9], United Nations Capital Development Fund (UNCDF) projects focused on reducing poverty through promotion of good local governance, a dynamic private sector and the participation of civil society in development initiatives. The Fund was increasing its activity in its innovative areas of intervention:

local development funds (financing facilities managed by local authorities and communities for investment in small-scale rural infrastructure); eco-development (in which communities agreed to work towards long-term restoration of ecologically fragile areas in exchange for investments to meet immediate needs of the community, such as energy, irrigation or shelter); and microfinance (identifying innovative ways of extending credit to microentrepreneurs). Those efforts were carried out in close partnership with Governments and UNDP, and supported efforts in least developed countries towards democratization, decentralized decision-making and the devolution of resource management to local government authorities and community organizations. Based on a capacity assessment study, UNCDF was revising its project cycle to allow for increased local participation in project design. Progress on implementation of the new policy would be reviewed at the end of 1997.

New UNCDF project approvals totalled $40.4 million in 1995 and $50 million in 1996. While approvals were increasing, the Fund's reserves were declining. The reserves were kept at twice the mandatory level to ensure that UNCDF could meet its ongoing commitments for at least two years. Overhead costs remained low. As a result of stricter financial controls, the amount in outstanding commitments had dropped yearly, from $241.5 million in 1993 to $200.5 million in 1996.

With its new policy focus, UNCDF activities were shifting to new areas. In the previous biennium, infrastructure projects, such as irrigation schemes, rural roads, water supply and sanitation systems, and educational and health facilities, accounted for 73 per cent of funds approved. In the 1995-1996 biennium, that figure had declined to allow for an increase in funding to local development and eco-development funds from the former level of 14 per cent to the current level of 44 per cent. Funding to credit and guarantee schemes increased from 7 per cent to 21 per cent. In 1996, 70 per cent of UNCDF programme resources were being spent in Africa, with the remaining 30 per cent divided between Asia, the Arab States and Latin America.

Contributions to UNCDF increased in 1995 to $32.9 million, after three years of declining donations, and $34 million was expected by the end of 1996. The projected totals expected for 1997 and 1998 were $35 million and $37 million, respectively. The increase in contributions and UNCDF core funding was considered to be the result of the challenge that UNCDF issued to donors. In a decision reached in 1996, UNCDF major donors (Belgium, Denmark, France, Japan, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland were represented) agreed to continue financing UNCDF at current or increased levels until 1999. During that period, the Fund should demonstrate greater effectiveness in implementing its policies favouring decentralization and local governance. In 1999, the donors would evaluate UNCDF performance and report to the Executive Board. If the Fund had not made sufficient progress towards implementing the new policies by that time, its funding might be discontinued.

Chapter III

Humanitarian and special economic assistance

In 1996, the international community continued to respond to major humanitarian emergencies—notably in the Great Lakes region of Africa and countries of the former Yugoslavia, as well as Angola, Liberia, the Sudan, Afghanistan and Iraq. Devastating natural disasters affecting countries in all parts of the world were also the focus of UN attention and aid.

Since the inception of the UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) in 1992, millions of the most vulnerable and needy had been given food, shelter and medical care. Tens of thousands of lost children had been reunited with their families, and millions of refugees had returned to their original homes or resettled in new communities. Many war-torn economies and societies were being rehabilitated, with UN assistance, and confidence was being restored among long-hostile neighbours.

During the year, DHA made six Consolidated Appeals for assistance to Africa, seeking $1.2 billion from donors, with the needs of the Great Lakes region and Angola dominating. Almost three quarters of all the funds raised through Consolidated Appeals in 1996 were directed to two emergencies: those in the Great Lakes region and in the area of the former Yugoslavia.

On 15 March, the System-wide Special Initiative on Africa was launched to bring a more coherent and comprehensive approach by the UN system to Africa's needs and priorities. The largest coordinated UN action in support of a continent's peoples, the Special Initiative was a multi-billion-dollar programme to accelerate African development over the coming decade by expanding basic education and health care, promoting peace and better governance, and improving water and food security. It was intended to give impetus and act as an operational wing to the UN New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s. During the mid-term review of the New Agenda in September, the Secretary-General noted a marked improvement in Africa's economic performance over the first half of the decade and called for greater commitment by both African Governments and the international community to consolidate and extend the significant economic and political gains that had been achieved.

lized and coordinated international assistance to disaster victims by distributing information, channelling immediate cash assistance, dispatching in-kind support and providing technical assistance. It issued 27 international disaster appeals, which generated donations of $84 million in cash and in-kind contributions, $6.2 million of which was channelled through DHA. A Consolidated Appeal, requesting $44 million, was launched for the flood-affected Democratic People's Republic of Korea. Appeals were also made for international assistance to Costa Rica and Nicaragua, which were struck by a hurricane, and to Madagascar, which had suffered major damage from a series of cyclones.

With more than 60 countries around the world affected by the presence of uncleared anti-personnel landmines and unexploded ordnance, DHA acted as focal point for all UN mine-clearance activities and related issues, which received increasing attention. The UN system further supported reconstruction and development efforts in the aftermath of conflict in a number of countries, among them Djibouti, Lebanon, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Somalia and Yemen.

Humanitarian assistance continued to be provided to some of the newly independent States of the former USSR, such as the three countries of the south Caucasus which were recovering from conflict—Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia—as well as Tajikistan, where continuing political instability compounded the severe economic crisis. Further assistance was also required in post-conflict Chechnya, Russian Federation. Special economic assistance was requested for several countries, including States neighbouring South Africa, to enable them to overcome the negative consequences of past acts of destabilization in the region; the Comoros, a least developed country whose economic difficulties had been compounded by an invasion of mercenaries in September 1995; and nations adversely affected by the imposition of sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro).

The importance of strengthening UN humanitarian assistance was underlined by the General Assembly, as well as the Economic and Social Council, in the light of the widespread acknowledgement that effective coordination of humanitarian assistance was crucial for saving lives, helping victims and encouraging local coping mechanisms.

Humanitarian assistance

The UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) continued its work as the facilitator for the coordination of relief for both natural and complex emergencies, increasing its capacity to act as an advocate of relief assistance in the context of both political and humanitarian policy discussions, and with respect to resource mobilization for humanitarian emergencies. A complex emergency is generally considered to be a humanitarian crisis of a nature and magnitude beyond the mandate and capacity of any single organization: DHA continued to develop its capacity to respond to ongoing and incipient complex emergencies, in particular through inter-agency Consolidated Appeals and related processes. The response of DHA to those emergencies was also strengthened by the continued rapid deployment of departmental missions, often with the active participation of other UN bodies.

The success of the international community in addressing a humanitarian crisis, however, depended not only on the formulation of a well-coordinated response, but also on raising the resources needed to ensure timely assistance. The largest requirements and number of emergencies in 1996 were found in Africa, where DHA launched six appeals for $1.2 billion. The humanitarian programmes in Iraq and Afghanistan accounted for the largest funding requirements in the Middle East and Asia, respectively. In 1996, $84,110,293 in contributions was reported to DHA. Almost three quarters of the funds raised through the Consolidated Appeals process (CAP) in 1996 were directed towards emergencies in the Great Lakes region and in the former Yugoslavia, with the remaining 27 per cent contributed to the other 12 appeals.

Coordination and resource mobilization

The Secretary-General observed in a 21 June report [A/51/172-E/1996/77] on strengthening all aspects of UN capacity to provide humanitarian assistance that, if current trends continued, humanitarian assistance in the coming decade was likely to be provided in an increasingly complex environment—one of internal conflicts and other situations where the international community was called upon to engage in peacemaking, peacekeeping and post-conflict peace-building efforts, to stabilize threatened societies, and to assist in rebuilding war-torn communities. The report contained observations on this complex environment, and gave a brief overview of substantive discussions held by the governing bodies of relevant UN organizations, highlighting issues of system-wide concern. It also covered activities specific to DHA, both in complex emergencies and in natural disasters and environmental emergencies (see below, under "Disaster relief").

The Secretary-General identified several weaknesses in the response capacity of the UN system, in the areas of prevention, preparedness and contingency planning; the definition of specific coordination arrangements; the availability of resources; and accountability. Ultimately, he concluded, the international community's capacity to respond to humanitarian emergencies and natural disasters would depend on how well each part of the system worked and how, within and outside the UN system, it worked with the other elements.

The development of an early warning system within DHA continued in 1996. The Humanitarian Early Warning System compiled and analysed data from several sources so as to identify potential crises that might have humanitarian implications, drawing on the various early warning mechanisms of other UN and non-UN organizations and collaborating with NGOs as sources of information and partners in assessing situations. The Secretary-General explained that the next step in strengthening the Humanitarian Early Warning System was the development of a strong, effective and regular channel of communication with field offices and regional information systems, such as DHA's Integrated Regional Information Network, maintained in Nairobi, Kenya, as well as with regional organizations. Recognizing the need for better communication, DHA had also established an interconnected, global information network known as "Reliefweb". The information on the Web site, in the form of situation reports, appeals, evaluations, news reports, maps, financial tracking and country information from the Humanitarian Early Warning System, was being produced by the international humanitarian community and maintained by DHA. Reliefweb consolidated and organized data on emergencies and disasters and ensured that they were current, easily retrievable and readily accessible on the Internet.

Central Emergency Revolving Fund. According to the Secretary-General's June report [A/51/172-E/1996/77], the Central Emergency Revolving Fund continued to serve as one of the main sources of funding for UN agencies in need of a timely response to emergencies. Since beginning operations in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 584], the Fund had been used 48 times, with $124 million disbursed from April 1992 to December 1996. A total of $4 million was allocated in 1996.

The Secretary-General expressed some concerns regarding the use of the Fund. Although the Fund was established to ensure a timely response in the initial phase of an emergency, he reported that it had been utilized, on a limited number of occasions, for protracted emergencies in order to avert critical interruption or scaling down of much-needed humanitarian activities. He suggested that the Economic and Social Council might formally authorize, in compelling circumstances, use of the Fund for that purpose. The Secretary-General also reported that delayed reimbursements had had a serious impact on the Fund's ability to meet requirements in emergency situations. A number of advances had remained outstanding for more than one to two years, owing to weak responses to certain appeals. He stated that the only remaining alternative for recovery of those advances would be to seek specific donor contributions to cover them so that the Fund's level of resources could be maintained at the stipulated minimum of $50 million.

Inter-Agency Standing Committee. Established by the General Assembly in 1991 [YUN 1991, p.421] to coordinate the international humanitarian response to emergencies, the Inter-Agency Standing Committee (IASC) consisted of heads of major UN agencies and other humanitarian organizations. Chaired by the Emergency Relief Coordinator, permanent IASC members included the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the World Food Programme (WFP) and the World Health Organization (WHO).

In a June report [A/51/172-E/1996/77], the Secretary-General described IASC as a key tool for inter-agency coordination on a variety of pressing humanitarian issues; in the first half of 1996, IASC had addressed the follow-up to a multi-donor evaluation study on Rwanda, the humanitarian impact of sanctions, the Consolidated Appeals process (see below) and resource mobilization. Through inter-agency discussions and a review of agency deliberations, seven key issues of a systemic nature were identified: coordination, resource mobilization, relief and development, staff development, monitoring and evaluation, strengthening local capacity and coping mechanisms, and internally displaced persons. Members of IASC decided that the task of reviewing those issues and recommending improved practices and methods would best be pursued in informal consultations.

Consolidated Appeals

Since its inception in 1992, the DHA-coordinated Consolidated Appeals process evolved from the preparation of a fund-raising document to an instrument for coordination, consisting of needs assessment, strategic planning, preparation of the appeal, and post-appeal follow-up and monitoring. Where applicable, appeals reviewed previous humanitarian programmes in the country or region and outlined further plans of action. UN agencies and bodies involved in projects included: FAO, UNDP, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA), the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, UNHCR, UNICEF, the United Nations Volunteers (UNV), WFP, and WHO. Also proposing projects were the International Organization for Migration (IOM) and DHA.

In 1996, new or ongoing Consolidated Appeals were coordinated by DHA for the following countries or regions: Angola, the Caucasus, Chechnya (Russian Federation), the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the Great Lakes region, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Somalia, the Sudan, Tajikistan, the former Yugoslavia and eastern Zaire. Several of the appeals which attracted relatively little donor support were long-standing ones seemingly resistant to political settlement. In 1996, the six largest donors were the United States, the European Union, Japan, the Netherlands, Sweden and the United Kingdom, accounting for approximately 64 per cent of all assistance.

Responses to JIU report. By a July note [A/50/572/Add.1], the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly his comments on a 1995 report [A/50/572] of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on the relationship between humanitarian assistance and peacekeeping operations. The JIU report analysed existing and proposed mandates of the various UN humanitarian agencies and the UN Secretariat, to discover if those mandates were appropriate and applicable during complex emergency operations. It concluded that further efforts were necessary to improve the existing potential of the United Nations to contribute to peace and international security through the promotion of social, economic and humanitarian progress, and set out a number of recommendations in that respect. The Secretary-General agreed with the general thrust of the report, stating that it made an important contribution to a vital and complex topic.

In October, the Secretary-General transmitted [A/51/442] the comments of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) on another 1995 JIU report [A/50/687], which had analysed the mechanisms and capacity of the UN system to provide and coordinate humanitarian assistance and problems and progress in that regard. ACC pointed out that many of the issues raised in the JIU report were already being addressed on an ongoing basis at the inter-agency level as part of a systematic effort to improve the humanitarian response to emergencies. The fact that JIU did not observe concrete instances of coordination in the field also limited the effectiveness of the report, ACC noted.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July 1996, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/33.

Strengthening of the coordination of emergency humanitarian assistance of the United Nations

The Economic and Social Council,

Reaffirming the guiding principles and coordinating mechanisms for providing emergency humanitarian assistance as outlined in the annex to General Assembly resolution 46/182 of 19 December 1991,

Recalling other relevant General Assembly resolutions, in particular resolutions 47/168 of 22 December 1992, 48/57 of 14 December 1993, 49/139 A of 20 December 1994 and 50/57 of 12 December 1995, and Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/56 of 28 July 1995,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Requests the Secretary-General, in close cooperation with relevant organizations of the United Nations system, to submit to the Economic and Social Council, at its substantive session of 1997, a comprehensive analytical report, including options, proposals and recommendations for a review and strengthening of all aspects of the capacity of the United Nations system for humanitarian assistance;

2. Calls upon the Inter-Agency Standing Committee to adopt clear work plans and timetables for the working groups established in the follow-up to Council resolution 1995/56 in order that the Secretary-General may have sufficient time to consider their recommendations;

3. Urges all relevant organizations of the United Nations system to actively participate in the follow-up process established for Council resolution 1995/56;

4. Also urges the governing bodies of the relevant agencies to complete their consideration of the follow-up to Council resolution 1995/56 in good time, no later than their first regular sessions of 1997, in order that the Secretary-General may have sufficient time to consider their recommendations;

5. Calls upon the Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat to provide a conference room paper on the status of the discussions of the working groups of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee prior to each meeting of the governing bodies of the agencies, funds and programmes at which the follow-up to Council resolution 1995/56 is to be discussed, so that governing body discussions can build on each other and on the work of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee;

6. Encourages Governments to ensure coherence in the direction given to the governing bodies of relevant agencies, organizations, funds and programmes of the United Nations system with the aim of improving the coordination and effectiveness of humanitarian assistance within the United Nations system;

7. Calls upon the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, in this context, to continue to convene regular, informal and open-ended information meetings with Member States, observer States and relevant intergovernmental and other organizations on the review of the above-mentioned issues, so as to ensure that they are coherently addressed and appropriately reflected in the report of the Secretary-General.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/33

25 July 1996 Meeting 50 Adopted without vote

Draft by Argentina, Australia, Belarus, Bulgaria, Canada, Czech Republic, Ireland (for EU), Japan, Norway, Poland, Romania, Russian Federation, Slovakia, Switzerland and United States (E/1996/L.33); agenda item 5 (a).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/194.

Strengthening of the coordination of emergency humanitarian assistance of the United Nations

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions 46/182 of 19 December 1991, 47/168 of 22 December 1992, 48/57 of 14 December 1993, 49/139 A and B of 20 December 1994, 50/57 of 12 December 1995 and Economic and Social Council resolutions 1995/56 of 28 July 1995 and 1996/33 of 25 July 1996,

Reaffirming also the guiding principles contained in section I of the annex to its resolution 46/182,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General, in particular of the attention paid by the Secretary-General to effectiveness, accountability and transparency in humanitarian assistance under increasingly complex operational environments and the need for further efforts to identify and support the smooth transition from relief to rehabilitation, reconstruction and long-term development,

Taking note of the establishment, within the Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat, of Reliefweb, for the dissemination of reliable and timely information on natural disasters and other emergencies,

Taking note also of the relevant decisions of operational agencies, organizations, programmes and funds of the United Nations system concerning their participation in a coordinated response to humanitarian emergencies,

Recognizing the need for coordinated humanitarian assistance and adequate financial resources to ensure a prompt, timely and effective response by the United Nations to natural disasters and other emergencies, both for immediate relief and for the smooth transition from relief to rehabilitation, reconstruction and long-term development, which are not necessarily sequential and often proceed at the same time,

Bearing in mind the critical importance of prevention, preparedness and contingency planning for a timely and effective response to both natural and other emergencies by the Governments concerned and the international community,

Welcoming the request to the Secretary-General by the Economic and Social Council, in its resolution 1995/56, to submit to the Council, at its substantive session of 1997, in close cooperation with relevant organizations of the United Nations system, a comprehensive analytical report, including options, proposals and recommendations for a review of issues concerning the role and operational responsibilities and strengthening of all aspects of the capacity of the United Nations system for humanitarian assistance,

Deeply concerned about the suffering of victims of disasters and emergency situations, the loss of human lives, the flow of refugees, the mass displacement of people and the material destruction,

Reaffirming that the sovereignty, territorial integrity and national unity of States must be fully respected in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and, in this context, that humanitarian assistance should be provided with the consent of the affected country and in principle on the basis of an appeal of the affected country,

Reaffirming also that each State has the responsibility first and foremost to take care of the victims of natural disasters and other emergencies occurring on its territory, and hence, the affected State has the primary role in the initiation, organization, coordination and implementation of humanitarian assistance within its territory,

Strongly emphasizing the urgent need to ensure, respect and promote international humanitarian law, principles and norms, the safety of humanitarian personnel and the need for States whose populations are in need of humanitarian assistance to facilitate the work of humanitarian organizations in implementing humanitarian assistance, in particular the supply of food, medicines, shelter and health care, for which access to victims is essential, and reaffirming that humanitarian assistance must be provided in accordance with the principles of humanity, neutrality and impartiality,

Concerned about the impediments created by natural disasters and similar emergencies to the development efforts of the affected countries, and welcoming the efforts of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, in the context of the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction, to promote disaster prevention, mitigation and preparedness measures,

Commending the activities of the United Nations Volunteers, and of the "White Helmets", deployed in the context of the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 49/139 B of 29 December 1994 and 50/19 of 28 November 1995, as well as other activities to improve, in accordance with resolutions 46/182 and 50/19, the capability for a quick and coordinated response to natural disasters and other emergencies,

Reaffirming the need for the improved accountability of all relevant actors involved in emergency relief operations,

1. Encourages Governments to ensure coherence in the direction given to the governing bodies of relevant organizations, funds and programmes of the United Nations system, and to thereby promote the development and strengthening of the cooperation between these organizations and the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, drawing on the mandate, expertise and respective strengths and available capabilities of each, to improve the system-wide capability for a quick and coordinated response to complex humanitarian emergencies and natural disasters;

2. Urges all relevant organizations of the United Nations system to participate actively in the follow-up process established by Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/56;

3. Calls upon the Secretary-General to ensure that the Inter-Agency Standing Committee, as a contribution to the report of the Secretary-General to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session in 1997, develops options and proposals to further define operational responsibilities between its members, drawing on their respective mandates, expertise, strengths and available capabilities, to identify cooperative arrangements to strengthen their joint capacities and to strengthen its work in priority setting and formulation of coherent humanitarian strategies;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to include in his report to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session in 1997 recommendations of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee on measures aimed at making it a more effective and transparent mechanism, under the leadership of the Emergency Relief Coordinator, for inter-agency decision-making on coordination;

5. Emphasizes the need for the Secretary-General to draw on the discussions and conclusions in the various governing boards, as mentioned in paragraph 1 above, on the follow-up to Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/56, on the results of the work of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee in this regard and on the assessment of the Emergency Relief Coordinator, when contributing to the report of the Secretary-General, in order to ensure that all relevant issues are coherently addressed and appropriately reflected;

6. Encourages all relevant agencies of the United Nations system to collaborate closely at the country level in carrying out their relief activities, in order to enhance the overall policy coherence, operational complementarity and cost-effectiveness of the response of the United Nations system in emergencies;

7. Encourages the Secretary-General to develop further, in consultation with the Emergency Relief Coordinator and with members of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee, a transparent and timely procedure for putting into place effective coordination arrangements in the field;

8. Encourages members of the Inter-Agency Standing Committee to cooperate closely with each other, as well as with the Bretton Woods institutions and the regional development banks, to ensure that relief, rehabilitation, reconstruction and long-term development are addressed in a more effective manner, taking into account the need for a clearer division of responsibilities between different actors;

9. Encourages the Secretary-General to strengthen further the cooperation and coordination between the Department of Humanitarian Affairs and other relevant departments of the Secretariat to ensure an effective and coherent United Nations response to natural disasters and other emergencies;

10. Calls upon States to respond quickly and generously to consolidated appeals for humanitarian assistance, taking into account the importance for donors to be flexible in their response to the specific requirements of affected populations, for rapid response as well as for early rehabilitation and recovery;

11. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Inter-Agency Standing Committee, to include in his report to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session in 1997 proposals for the clearer identification of priority needs and the formulation of a coherent humanitarian strategy within consolidated appeals, and to ensure that consolidated appeals are formulated in a manner consistent with the smooth transition from relief to rehabilitation, reconstruction and long-term development, and also requests the Secretary-General to invite States to submit their views on this subject in due time;

12. Invites the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Inter-Agency Standing Committee, to make recommendations to the Economic and Social Council, at its substantive session in 1997, on possible ways to strengthen the effectiveness of the Central Emergency Revolving Fund, taking into account the revolving nature of the Fund, to ensure a timely response in the initial phase of an emergency, and taking into account the need for transparent complementarity between the Fund and the individual emergency funds of operational agencies, and requests the Secretary-General to invite States to submit their views on this subject in due time;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to further develop Reliefweb as the global humanitarian information system for the dissemination of reliable and timely information on emergencies and natural disasters, and encourages all Governments, the United Nations agencies, funds and programmes and other relevant organizations, including non-governmental organizations, to support Reliefweb and actively participate in the Reliefweb information exchange, through the Department of Humanitarian Affairs;

14. Encourages the Secretary-General to develop further the Humanitarian Early Warning System, to make it fully operational as soon as possible and to consult all States on the use to which the database could be put, as well as its further development, taking into account that early warning information should be made available in an unrestricted and timely manner to all interested Governments and authorities concerned;

15. Calls upon the United Nations system to strengthen accountability in the field of humanitarian assistance, in particular through improved monitoring and evaluation, to ensure that:

(a) Organizations of the United Nations system involved in humanitarian assistance activities develop common methodologies for data collection and reporting, situation analyses, needs assessment, monitoring and tracking of resources, in order to ensure an effective and timely response;

(b) Clearer arrangements are made for system-wide evaluation, the lessons learned from evaluation exercises are systematically applied at the operational level and joint evaluation criteria are developed for humanitarian and disaster relief operations at the planning stage;

16. Urges all operational agencies of the United Nations system to collaborate fully with the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, particularly in the early phase of an emergency, inter alia, by providing the Department with sufficient support in terms of human and logistical assets, to enable it to enhance coordination and the rapid-response capability of the system as a whole;

17. Stresses the critical need to create a sound and predictable financial basis for the Department of Humanitarian Affairs to enable it to carry out fully its mandate, and encourages the Secretary-General to continue to explore all possible options to achieve that goal.

Mine clearance

An estimated 110 million landmines were buried in more than 70 countries, according to an October report [A/51/540] of the Secretary-General. There were approximately 25,000 mine-related casualties each year, most of whom were civilians. The report, submitted in response to General Assembly resolution 50/82 [YUN 1995, p. 930], provided information on the activities of the UN system and other organizations and NGOs involved in mine-action activities. The Secretary-General reviewed ongoing programmes in Afghanistan, Angola, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cambodia, Croatia (including Eastern Slavonia), the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mozambique and Yemen.

A sustainable national mine-clearance capacity was the objective in each country, the Secretary-General explained, and to that end, programmes were developed in close collaboration with the Governments concerned. Within the UN system, the following entities were involved in such efforts: DHA—the focal point for all humanitarian mine-clearance activities—the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, UNDP, UNICEF, UNHCR and WFP. The UN mine-action programmes also worked closely with NGOs, which trained local personnel in mine-awareness, surveying and demining operations.

The Voluntary Trust Fund for Assistance in Mine Clearance had received more than $23 million since its establishment in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 172], out of the $32.7 million pledged. Just over $8 million, or 28 per cent, was non-earmarked and available for mine-clearance programmes at the discretion of DHA. Of the total available to the Fund, $1.77 million was utilized in 1995 and approximately $9 million was disbursed during the first three quarters of 1996. Contributions to the standby capacity for mine-related activities, launched at the International Meeting on Mine Clearance in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 223], had been received from Finland, Germany and the United States, as well as from Handicap International, an international NGO. The Secretary-General noted that the development of this standby capacity had been slow and was in need of enhanced support from Member States.

By an August note [A/51/306 & Add.1], the Secretary-General transmitted the report of his expert on the topic, Graça Machel, on the impact of armed conflict on children. The report described the particular danger mines posed for that often-forgotten group. The expert explained that commercial teams frequently cleared only the major roads and generally followed the priorities of central Government or of businesses, such as airports and commercial transportation routes. Too often, children's needs were ignored and the areas around schools or rural footpaths left uncleared.

In response to General Assembly resolution 49/215 [YUN 1994, p. 173], requesting the promotion of scientific research on and development of humanitarian mine-clearance techniques and technology, Denmark, with the support of DHA, convened an International Conference on Mine Clearance Technology (Elsinore, Denmark, 2-4 July 1996) [A/51/472]. The participants recommended a framework for international standards for humanitarian mine clearance, to enhance the safety and efficiency of such programmes throughout the world. Criteria were recommended for all aspects of mine clearance, starting with the mine-survey process. Minefield-marking standards were prescribed to create a universal visual demarcation of a mined area to warn the population of the danger. Quality assurance was addressed through the proposal of specific guidelines for applying standards to contractors, NGOs and individuals engaged in demining activities. Safety standards were reviewed in detail to establish such items as safety distances, early warning requirements and procedures for the use of explosives, and medical and communications requirements. Medical support standards addressed the training of personnel, the deployment of teams and the required equipment and supplies.

In 1996, more than ever before, the issue of landmines received significant political attention, according to the Secretary-General [A/51/540]. This was due primarily to the first Review Conference of the States Parties to the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which

May Be Deemed to Be Excessively Injurious or to Have Indiscriminate Effects [YUN 1980, p. 76] (Vienna, 25 September-13 October 1995; Geneva, 15-19 January 1996 and 22 April-3 May 1996), where participants agreed on additional restrictions on the production, trade and use of landmines. Also in 1996, the 50 participating States of the Ottawa International Strategy Conference, "Towards a Global Ban on Anti-Personnel Mines" (Ottawa, Canada, 3-5 October), endorsed the Ottawa Declaration [A/C.1/51/10], calling for the earliest possible conclusion of a legally binding international agreement to ban anti-personnel mines (see also PART ONE, Chapter VII).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/149.

Assistance in mine clearance

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/7 of 19 October 1993, 49/215 of 23 December 1994 and 50/82 of 14 December 1995 on assistance in mine clearance, all adopted without a vote,

Reaffirming its deep concern at the tremendous humanitarian problem caused by the presence of mines and other unexploded devices that have serious and lasting social and economic consequences for the populations of mine-infested countries and constitute an obstacle to the return of refugees and other displaced persons, to humanitarian aid operations and to reconstruction and economic development, as well as to the restoration of normal social conditions,

Reiterating its dismay at the high number of victims of mines, especially among civilian populations, particularly children, and recalling in this context Commission on Human Rights resolutions 1995/79 of 8 March 1995 and 1996/85 of 24 April 1996 on the rights of the child and 1996/27 of 19 April 1996 on the human rights of persons with disability, and noting the recent report on the impact of armed conflict on children prepared by the expert of the Secretary-General,

Deeply alarmed that the number of mines being laid each year, as well as the presence of a large number of mines and other unexploded devices as a result of armed conflicts, exponentially outweighs the number of such mines that can be cleared during that time, and thus convinced of the necessity and urgency of a significant increase in mine-clearance efforts by the international community,

Noting the recent decisions taken at the Review Conference of the States Parties to the Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons Which May Be Deemed to Be Excessively Injurious or to Have Indiscriminate Effects, particularly with respect to Protocol II of the Convention and the inclusion in the Amended Protocol of a number of provisions of importance for mine-clearance operations, notably the requirement of detectability, Noting also the adoption at the Ottawa International Strategy Conference, "Towards a Global Ban on Anti-Personnel Mines", on 5 October 1996, of the Ottawa Declaration, whereby participants undertook a commitment towards the earliest possible conclusion of a legally binding international agreement to ban anti-personnel mines and which, among other things, recognizes that the international community must provide significantly greater resources to mine-awareness programmes, mine-clearance operations and victim assistance, and stressing the need to convince mine-affected States to halt new deployments of anti-personnel mines to ensure the effectiveness and efficiency of mine-clearance operations, and noting the offer by the Government of Belgium to host a follow-up conference at Brussels in June 1997,

Welcoming the offer by the Government of Japan to hold at Tokyo a conference on anti-personnel landmines in March 1997 with a view to reinforcing international support for the work of the United Nations in landmine clearance, development of new technology for landmine detection and removal and the rehabilitation of landmine victims,

Emphasizing the importance of recording the location of mines, of retaining all such records and making them available to concerned parties upon cessation of hostilities, and welcoming the strengthening of the relevant provisions in international law,

Recognizing the important role that the international community, particularly States involved in the deployment of mines, can play in assisting mine clearance in affected countries through the provision of necessary maps and information and appropriate technical and material assistance to remove or otherwise render ineffective existing minefields, mines and booby traps,

Bearing in mind the serious threat that mines and other unexploded devices pose to the safety, health and lives of personnel participating in humanitarian, peacekeeping and rehabilitation programmes and operations,

Aware that the rate of mine clearance needs to accelerate substantially if the global landmine problem is to be tackled effectively,

Concerned about the limited availability of safe and cost-effective mine-detection and mine-clearance equipment as well as the lack of global coordination in research and development to improve the relevant technology, and conscious of the need to promote progress in this field and to foster international technical cooperation to this end,

Encouraged by the initiative taken by the Government of Denmark in hosting and organizing the International Conference on Mine Clearance Technology at Elsinore from 2 to 4 July 1996 with the support and co-operation of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat and by the work of the Conference, notably in relation to international standards and procedures for humanitarian mine-clearance operations, which can serve as a basis on which to advance the safety, effectiveness and professionalism of these operations throughout the world,

Recognizing that, in addition to the primary role of States, the United Nations has an important role in the field of assistance in mine clearance,

Noting with satisfaction the inclusion in the mandates of several peacekeeping operations of provisions relating to mine-clearance work carried out under the direction of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations of the Secretariat, in the context of such operations,

Commending the activities already undertaken by the United Nations system, donor and recipient Governments, the International Committee of the Red Cross and non-governmental organizations to coordinate their efforts and seek solutions to the problems related to the presence of mines and other unexploded devices,

Also commending the role of the Secretary-General, through the work of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, in increasing public awareness of the problem of landmines, and in the establishment of the central landmine database and inventories of mine-awareness materials and mine-clearance techniques,

Welcoming the statement by the President of the Security Council at the 3693rd meeting of the Council, on 30 August 1996, on demining in the context of United Nations peacekeeping,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his comprehensive report on the activities of the United Nations on assistance in mine clearance and the operation of the Voluntary Trust Fund for Assistance in Mine Clearance, and takes note with interest of the proposals contained therein;

2. Welcomes, in particular, the efforts made by the United Nations to foster the establishment of mine-clearance capacities in countries where mines constitute a serious threat to the safety, health and lives of the local population, and emphasizing the importance of developing national mine-clearance capacities, urges all Member States, particularly those that have a capacity to do so, to assist afflicted countries in the establishment and development of their national mine-clearance capacities;

3. Invites Member States to develop national programmes, in cooperation with the relevant bodies of the United Nations system where appropriate, to promote awareness of landmines, especially among children;

4. Expresses its appreciation to Member States and regional organizations for their financial contributions to the Trust Fund, and appeals to them to continue this support through further contributions;

5. Encourages all relevant multilateral and national programmes and bodies to include, in coordination with the United Nations, activities related to mine clearance in their humanitarian, social and economic assistance activities;

6. Stresses the importance of international assistance for the rehabilitation of landmine victims and their full participation in society;

7. Emphasizes again, in this connection, the importance of effective coordination by the United Nations of activities related to mine clearance, including those by regional organizations, in particular activities related to standards, technological development, information and training;

8. Welcomes the efforts of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs to coordinate mine-related activities and, in particular, the establishment, in cooperation with other relevant United Nations organizations, of comprehensive mine-action programmes, and encourages the Department to continue and enhance those efforts with a view to improving the effectiveness of assistance in mine clearance by the United Nations;

9. Also welcomes the designation of the Department of Humanitarian Affairs, the focal point in the United Nations for coordinating humanitarian demining and related issues, as the repository of information and for encouraging and facilitating international research to improve mine-clearance methods;

10. Urges Member States, regional organizations, governmental and non-governmental organizations and foundations to continue to extend full assistance and cooperation to the Secretary-General and, in particular, to provide him with information and data as well as other appropriate resources that could be useful in strengthening the coordination role of the United Nations in the field of mine awareness, training, surveying, mine detection and clearance, scientific research on mine-detection and clearance technology, and information on and distribution of medical equipment and supplies;

11. Calls upon Member States, especially those that have a capacity to do so, to provide the necessary information and technical and material assistance, as appropriate, and to locate, remove, destroy or otherwise render ineffective minefields, mines, booby traps and other devices in accordance with international law;

12. Urges Member States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and foundations that have the ability to do so to provide, as appropriate, technological assistance to mine-inflicted countries and to promote scientific research and development on humanitarian mine-clearance techniques and technology so that mine-clearance activities may be carried out more effectively at lower costs and through safer means and to promote international collaboration in this regard;

13. Encourages Member States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and foundations to continue to support ongoing activities to promote appropriate technology, as well as international operational and safety standards for humanitarian mine-clearance activities, including the early follow-up of the International Conference on Mine Clearance Technology;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session a report on the progress achieved on all relevant issues outlined in his previous reports to the Assembly on assistance in mine clearance and in the present resolution and on the operation of the Trust Fund;

15. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Assistance in mine clearance".

General Assembly resolution 51/149
65-nation draft (A/51/L.44 & Add.1); agenda item 34.

New international humanitarian order

In response to General Assembly resolution 49/170 [YUN 1994, p. 828], the Secretary-General presented a report [A/51/454] in October, which contained replies to his request to Governments and NGOs for information on humanitarian issues of special concern. As at 31 August 1996, comments had been received from Monaco and Turkey and from the Independent Bureau for Humanitarian Issues. The Secretary-General felt that the contribution of the latter underlined the need to build on and strengthen existing humanitarian instruments and mechanisms in order to ensure rigorous respect for humanitarian norms and to devise more effective means for implementing humanitarian assistance programmes.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December 1996, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/74.

New international humanitarian order

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 49/170 of 23 December 1994 and other pertinent resolutions relating to the promotion of a new international humanitarian order and international cooperation in the humanitarian field,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General and the previous reports containing the comments and views of Governments, the specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations,

Noting that a number of Governments have not yet submitted their comments with regard to the above-mentioned resolutions,

Noting with deep concern the growing scale of humanitarian emergencies involving widespread suffering, loss of life and uprootedness,

Noting the corresponding increase in the burden on the international community in providing emergency relief for protracted periods while durable solutions remain evasive, to the detriment of stability and security and thereby adversely affecting economic and social development,

Bearing in mind the urgent need to ensure respect for and promotion of the principles and norms relating to humanitarian emergencies,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his continuing support for the efforts to promote a new international humanitarian order;

2. Urges Governments and governmental and non-governmental organizations that have not yet done so to submit their comments and views to the Secretary-General regarding the promotion of a new international humanitarian order;

3. Requests Governments to make available to the Secretary-General, on a voluntary basis, information and expertise on humanitarian issues of special concern to them, in order to identify opportunities for future action;

4. Invites the Independent Bureau for Humanitarian Issues to continue and to strengthen further its activities in cooperation with the governmental and non-governmental bodies concerned, including local and regional capacity-building to respond to humanitarian problems and the search for more effective measures to increase international cooperation in the humanitarian field;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to remain in contact with Governments and non-governmental organizations, including the Independent Bureau for Humanitarian Issues, in order to report in a comprehensive manner on the progress made by them to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session.

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/51/614) without vote, 8 November (meeting 29); 23-nation draft (A/C.3/51/L.16), orally revised; agenda item 105.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 19-23, 27, 29; plenary 82.

Activities in Africa

Great Lakes region

In February 1996, DHA issued a United Nations Consolidated Fund-Raising Document for the Great Lakes Region, reviewing assistance provided during 1995 and summarizing funding requests and projects proposed by UN agencies and DHA for the period January to December 1996. The report also gave details of a regional strategy and outlined the focus of programmes in 1996, as well as of the current situations in both Rwanda and Burundi. In all, $548,033,793 was to be requested from donors for projects in the region as a whole, as well as for four individual countries within it: Rwanda ($103,558,061), Burundi ($50,991,280), eastern Zaire ($6,785,370) and the United Republic of Tanzania ($1,739,348); total resources required were $711,107,852. In November, DHA released a United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Flash Appeal for the Great Lakes Region in Response to the Crisis in Eastern Zaire (see below).

In the document, DHA stated that during 1995 much progress had been made in stemming the humanitarian crisis arising from the events in Rwanda in 1994, yet the situation throughout the Great Lakes region remained precarious. The genocide that claimed the lives of an estimated 1 million Rwandans had left the region with a complex refugee crisis and a legacy of fear and bitterness which threatened to last for generations. The past year had witnessed a low-level but growing destabilization campaign in the country by militiamen allied with the former Rwandan Government. In Burundi, the general climate of insecurity and conflict was increasingly endemic in the north-west of the country, with border areas in the United Republic of Tanzania also affected. Constant population displacements resulted in the need for higher levels of humanitarian assistance, and another humanitarian emergency might occur, DHA stated, also because of reduced access to land and crops.

The fate of the Great Lakes region as a whole was inextricably bound up with the fate of the Rwandans and Burundians living outside their countries of origin, DHA declared. Traditionally, the region had been a generous host to refugee populations; however, during 1995, there was a growing frustration on the part of host countries, with the rights of refugees challenged as never before. There was a consensus that organized repatriation was the only feasible solution for most Rwandan refugees. At the same time, DHA stated, a number of unresolved issues, such as security, the slow pace of re-establishing the justice system and the fragility of conditions in areas of return, constituted serious barriers which would have to be surmounted.

The complex and myriad challenges facing the Great Lakes region in 1996 would require the continued and full support of Governments of the region and the international community, DHA said. In view of the reluctance or inability of many Rwandan and Burundian refugees to return to their home countries, care and maintenance programmes in refugee camps would have to be continued. Assistance was further required for other vulnerable groups in both countries, and a limited number of humanitarian activities to assist host communities most affected by refugee populations were also proposed.

Rwanda

In 1996, DHA reported that significant progress was made towards alleviating the humanitarian crisis in Rwanda, which had erupted in 1994. Schools reopened and the national banking system was re-established. By the end of 1995, electricity and water were available in all urban centres and in 80 per cent of rural areas. Bilateral donations also improved in the second half of 1995 and support was extended to key sectors of the national economy and for the re-establishment of the justice system and police force. However, the high rate of arrests, mainly on charges of genocide, and overcrowded prisons and places of detention remained major concerns.

In the UN Consolidated Fund-Raising Document for the Great Lakes Region, $103,558,061 was requested specifically for 1996 activities in Rwanda, including $43,944,797 for food assistance; $15,416,480 for health care; $9,328,700 for human rights projects; and $7,833,150 for agriculture and livestock.

At a round-table conference (Geneva, 20-21 June) co-organized by the Government of Rwanda and UNDP, bilateral donor countries, multilateral organizations and financial institutions pledged $617 million of the $832 million requested by the Government. The next round-table meeting was to be held in Kigali in January 1998.

On 23 November, Canada and Rwanda organized a multilateral meeting in Geneva on refugee reintegration. Priorities included: resettlement and reintegration of the displaced population; rehabilitation of the justice system and the maintenance of law and order; assistance to vulnerable groups, particularly genocide survivors; promotion of values that encouraged national reconciliation; and food security and strengthening of the macroeconomic framework.

Report of Secretary-General. On 12 September, the Secretary-General reported [A/51/353] that while the situation in Rwanda continued to improve, the lingering instability in the region and the presence of some 1.6 million Rwandan refugees still outside the country caused uncertainty and cast a shadow on efforts at rehabilitation and long-term sustainable development.

During the period from 1 January to 20 August, UNHCR registered 99,791 returnees to Rwanda, some 30 per cent fewer than over the same period in 1995. Government officials in Rwanda believed that the stagnation of repatriation might be attributable to an escalation in propaganda and intimidation tactics by former government leaders in the refugee camps.

The Secretary-General reported progress in the re-establishment of a functioning justice system in Rwanda. Intensive training and recruitment programmes attempted to compensate for the serious shortfall in trained personnel at every level.

Reviewing the assistance provided by the international community and various UN organizations, the Secretary-General reported that UNDP was primarily involved in the resettlement and reintegration of refugees; rehabilitation of the justice system and human security; and capacity-building. UNDP activities were funded from its own resources and through its Trust Fund for Rwanda, to which 10 donors had contributed more than $36 million since the beginning of 1995. A survey on vaccination coverage undertaken by the Rwandan Ministry of Health and UNICEF in March showed that pre-war vaccination levels in the number of children under the age of five immunized against the six major vaccine-preventable diseases (polio, measles, tuberculosis, whooping cough, tetanus and diphtheria) had nearly been attained. Over two thirds of WFP assistance to Rwanda during the first half of 1996 was provided in the form of food-for-work and income-generating activities. WHO assisted in the training of health auxiliaries, physicians and medical support staff. Activities by UN agencies with a World Bank special emergency assistance grant of $20 million had been completed. In 1996, approximately 90 international NGOs were working in Rwanda.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/30 H.

International assistance to Rwanda for the reintegration of returning refugees, the restoration of total peace, reconstruction and socio-economic development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/211 of 21 December 1993, entitled "Emergency assistance for the socio-economic rehabilitation of Rwanda", 49/23 of 2 December 1994, entitled "Emergency international assistance for a solution to the problem of refugees, the restoration of total peace, reconstruction and socio-economic development in war-stricken Rwanda", and 50/58 L of 22 December 1995, entitled "Situation in Rwanda: international assistance for a solution to the problem of refugees, the restoration of total peace, reconstruction and socio-economic development in Rwanda",

Taking into consideration the need for continued humanitarian assistance to support the ongoing process of the voluntary repatriation, resettlement and reintegration of returning refugees,

Emphasizing the need for, inter alia, an infusion of significant material and financial resources in Rwanda in order to create conditions for sustainable peace and development,

Conscious that continued technical assistance and advisory services, as well as other assistance, is required to assist the Government of Rwanda in reconstructing the social, legal and economic infrastructure of Rwanda,

Recognizing, inter alia, that the Peace Agreement between the Government of the Rwandese Republic and the Rwandese Patriotic Front, signed at Arusha, United Republic of Tanzania, on 4 August 1993, as well as the recently established Commission for National Reconciliation, provide an appropriate framework for national reconciliation,

Expressing its gratitude to those States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations which have responded positively and continue to respond positively to the humanitarian and development needs of Rwanda, and to the United Nations, which has mobilized and coordinated the distribution of humanitarian assistance,

Welcoming the meeting on refugee reintegration in the Great Lakes region, convened at Geneva on 23 November 1996,

Welcoming also the manner in which Rwanda has handled the massive and sudden repatriation of refugees from eastern Zaire and Burundi, and stressing the need for the Government of Rwanda to continue its efforts to support the voluntary repatriation, resettlement and reintegration of returning refugees,

1. Congratulates all relevant United Nations agencies, funds and programmes for their efforts to draw the attention of the international community to the humanitarian and development needs of Rwanda, requests them to provide all possible assistance and encourages them to coordinate with the Government of Rwanda and the coordinator of United Nations activities in Rwanda in order to address the emergency and long-term development needs of Rwanda, as presented at Geneva by the Government of Rwanda on 23 November 1996, in the programme for the resettlement and reintegration in the context of the present massive return of refugees;

2. Welcomes the commitment of the Government of Rwanda to cooperate with and to take all necessary measures to ensure the safety and security of all humanitarian personnel, including personnel of non-governmental organizations, operating in the country;

3. Urges all States, United Nations organizations and specialized agencies, as well as other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and the multilateral financial and development institutions, to continue to assist Rwanda in the resettlement and reintegration of refugees and other vulnerable groups in the context of the national reconciliation process, and in the rehabilitation efforts in the following priority areas: education, health, justice, security and public infrastructure;

4. Calls upon the international community to continue its assistance, with a view to alleviating the intolerable conditions in Rwandan prisons and to expediting the processing of cases, encourages the Government of Rwanda to continue its efforts to improve the judicial system, including by expediting the trial process, and encourages the Government of Rwanda to continue to improve the situation in the prisons;

5. Encourages the International Tribunal for Rwanda to pursue its work speedily and calls upon all States to cooperate with the Tribunal, in accordance with Security Council resolutions 955(1994) of 8 November 1994 and 978(1995) of 27 February 1995, by arresting and detaining persons suspected of genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law, and to ensure the transfer of indicted individuals to the Tribunal;

6. Urges all States to provide funds to projects and programmes for the reintegration of refugees, as proposed in the various subprogrammes presented by the Government of Rwanda at Geneva on 23 November 1996;

7. Calls upon all States, in particular the States of the Great Lakes region, to act in accordance with the recommendations adopted by the Nairobi Summit of January 1995 and the Regional Conference on Assistance to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons in the Great Lakes Region, held at Bujumbura in February 1995, and with those contained in the Cairo Declaration on the Great Lakes Region, and to continue efforts with regard to the search for peace in the Great Lakes region, in particular the convening of a conference on security, stability and development in the Great Lakes region after consulting the countries of the region;

8. Decides to consider at its fifty-second session the question of international assistance for the reintegration of returnees, the restoration of total peace, reconstruction and socio-economic development in Rwanda, and requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session a report on the implementation of the present resolution.

Burundi

In the United Nations Consolidated Fund-Raising Document for the Great Lakes Region, $50,991,280 was requested by UN agencies for activities in Burundi, such as food assistance ($19,591,968), human rights ($8,369,428) and emergency relief ($6,750,000). DHA reported that assistance programmes in Burundi assumed more importance during the year as security worsened and continued population movements occurred. The newly established Ministry for Repatriation and Reintegration of Refugees and Displaced Persons, together with relief organizations, implemented incentive programmes to encourage reintegration into the home communities.

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General, in an October report [A/51/464] on emergency assistance to Burundi, reviewed developments from September 1995 to August 1996. Economic, financial, material and technical assistance had had to be severely reduced owing to increased insecurity and the lack of progress on initiatives aimed at political reconciliation. Emergency humanitarian aid was also affected by operational difficulties and economic sanctions against Burundi instituted by eight African States following a bloodless coup overthrowing the Burundian Government on 25 July.

Since the end of 1995, the report stated, intense fighting and attacks on the civilian population throughout the country had made the humanitarian situation extremely precarious. The spreading conflict made it difficult for government authorities to provide adequate guarantees for the safety of aid workers, and the lack of security seriously impeded access to the most vulnerable populations. The politicization of the inter-ethnic conflict had made it difficult for humanitarian organizations to be perceived by the population as neutral, as their assistance was judged to favour one side or the other. Some organizations had temporarily suspended their activities and evacuated their staff. Donors said they would not pledge additional funding to Burundi until the situation had improved.

In May 1996, some improvement in the security situation was reported. WFP was able to carry out extensive food distributions to populations displaced by the fighting, and other organizations resumed activities. After three delegates of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) were murdered in an ambush, the entire ICRC delegation left Burundi on 11 June. The action had severe consequences because ICRC had maintained programmes in areas most seriously affected by the conflict.

The sanctions continued to have far-reaching implications for all humanitarian agencies operating in Burundi. Essential supplies of fuel were exempted for the United Nations and the diplomatic corps, but not for NGOs. FAO reported that if seeds and other agricultural products were not allowed into the country, agricultural productivity might decrease by as much as 40 per cent. The United Nations continued to work with the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the Regional Sanctions Coordination Committee (RSCC) to identify exemptions to the sanctions in order to ensure that essential life-saving support would reach vulnerable populations.

The Secretary-General said that the UN system must adjust humanitarian programmes to ensure greater access to vulnerable populations and to safeguard the provision of uninterrupted assistance in areas regularly affected by fighting and insecurity.

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General, Burundi submitted a draft resolution [A/51/L.48] on 9 December, calling for further assistance to Burundi. By decision 51/451 of 17 December, the General Assembly, on the proposal of Austria, decided to defer consideration of the text until its resumed fifty-first session.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

In a Presidential statement of 5 January [S/PRST/1996/1], the Security Council expressed grave concern at attacks on personnel of international humanitarian organizations, which had led to the suspension of essential assistance to refugees and displaced persons and to the temporary withdrawal of international personnel. It underlined the responsibility of Burundi authorities for the security of such personnel and called on the Government to provide adequate security for them and for food envoys.

The Council, in resolution 1049(1996) of 5 March, encouraged the Secretary-General to continue consultations with the Member States concerned and with OAU on contingency planning for a rapid humanitarian response in the event of widespread violence or a serious deterioration in the humanitarian situation in Burundi.

In a Presidential statement of 25 April [S/PRST/1996/21], the Council warned that the dramatic increase in violence throughout the country severely inhibited humanitarian aid and could have a negative effect on donors' capacity to implement development assistance in Burundi. In another statement, of 15 May [S/PRST/1996/24], the Council voiced deep concern that relief organizations had been prevented from delivering vital humanitarian and development assistance and at the resulting suffering imposed on the people of Burundi. The Council called on the parties and all concerned to refrain from any action that could aggravate the refugee problem.

Zaire

In the United Nations Consolidated Fund-Raising Document for the Great Lakes Region of February 1996, some $6.7 million was requested for programmes in eastern Zaire, including health care ($5,385,370), children in especially difficult circumstances ($950,000), water and sanitation ($100,000) and education and peace promotion ($50,000). In November, following a deterioration of the situation in the area, DHA decided to launch a UN Consolidated Inter-Agency Flash Appeal for the Great Lakes Region in Response to the Crisis in Eastern Zaire. The Flash Appeal, which reflected inter-agency needs for the period 1 November 1996 to 31 January 1997, called for more than $259 million to deal with the loss of infrastructure and increased transport and distribution costs arising from the crisis, among other things.

In a matter of a few weeks, increased conflicts in eastern Zaire, strained by the presence for more than two years of 1.25 million Rwandan and Burundian refugees, had sparked a mass movement of most of those refugees, creating 250,000 internally displaced persons and affecting at least 500,000 others inside the country. The situation in eastern Zaire had developed into one of the largest humanitarian crises ever, according to DHA, affecting large parts of the population in Burundi and Rwanda. Priority would be given to the provision of shelter, water and sanitation, food assistance, essential agricultural inputs, immunization and essential drugs to ensure the prevention of epidemics and malnutrition and to children in especially difficult circumstances and for protection.

In a Presidential statement of 1 November [S/PRST/1996/44] calling for an end to the fighting in eastern Zaire, the Security Council expressed its full support of the efforts of UNHCR and humanitarian agencies to alleviate the suffering there. It called on all parties in the region to allow humanitarian agencies and NGOs to deliver humanitarian assistance to those in need and to ensure the safety of all refugees, as well as the security and freedom of movement of all international humanitarian personnel.

In resolution 1078(1996) of 9 November, the Council, deeply concerned at the obstacles to the efforts of all international humanitarian agencies to provide relief and assistance to those in need and determining that the magnitude of the humanitarian crisis in eastern Zaire threatened peace and security in the region, welcomed the Secretary-General's proposal that a multinational force be set up for humanitarian purposes in eastern Zaire. The Council urged Member States to prepare the necessary arrangements, in consultation with the States concerned and in cooperation with the Secretary-General and OAU, to allow the immediate return of humanitarian organizations and the safe delivery of humanitarian aid to displaced persons, refugees and civilians at risk in eastern Zaire. It requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with his Special Envoy and the coordinator of humanitarian affairs, and with UNHCR, OAU, the Special Envoy of the European Union and the States concerned, to draw up a concept of operations and a framework for a humanitarian task force.

By resolution 1080(1996) of 15 November, the Council authorized the Member States cooperating with the Secretary-General to establish for humanitarian purposes a temporary multinational force to facilitate the immediate return of humanitarian organizations and the effective delivery of humanitarian aid. (For further details, see PART ONE, Chapter II.)

United Republic of Tanzania

In the United Nations Consolidated Fund-Raising Document for the Great Lakes Region, a total of $1,739,348 was requested for WHO and UNICEF assistance to the United Republic of Tanzania, to finance activities such as health care ($639,348), water and sanitation ($300,000), education and peace promotion ($200,000) and assistance to children in especially difficult circumstances ($400,000).

According to the Document, the anticipated return of large numbers of refugees from Tanzania in the second half of 1995 had not occurred, although the number of refugees volunteering to repatriate rose from 1,617, during the period January to June, to 3,260, from July to November. A verification exercise concluded in late 1995 that 570,000 refugees remained in Tanzania. An increase in adult malnutrition in refugee camps was reported in the latter part of the year, and supplementary and therapeutic feeding was introduced in all camps as necessary. To make delivery of assistance easier and to stop the recycling of refugees between Tanzania and Uganda, 10,000 refugees were relocated further inland from the border. Despite tracing activities, the number of unaccompanied children in Tanzanian camps remained high.

Angola

In April 1996, DHA launched a United Nations Updated Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for

Angola, requesting $139,052,213 for programmes for the period January to December 1996. The Updated Appeal for 1996 was an extension of the 1995 programme. It divided planned activities into three basic programmes: emergency relief and resettlement; demobilization and reintegration of former combatants; and mine action. DHA estimated that approximately 700,000 internally displaced persons, 1.8 million war-affected (but not displaced) urban and rural residents and 200,000 potential returnees from outside Angola would benefit from those activities.

DHA said that despite numerous delays, uncertainty and frustrations, the collective achievements in humanitarian assistance were remarkable. In accessible areas, WFP and partner agencies reduced the number of food-aid beneficiaries from 1.5 million to 1.1 million, while continuing to provide food to the most needy. WFP supported an increased number of food-for-work projects. Agricultural tools and seeds were distributed to over 400,000 war-affected families. More than 4,000 drug kits were distributed, giving over 2 million persons access to life-saving medications.

The uncertainty of the peace process and delays in the quartering schedule initially prompted a cautious response among donors, said DHA. By June 1995, no more than 30 per cent of the Appeal budget had been covered. Following a revision of the Appeal in July 1995, and based on detailed information provided through periodic meetings and financial reports, contributions increased steadily during the second half of the year, and the overall response reached close to 50 per cent.

In a report [A/52/563] describing humanitarian assistance activities in Angola, the Secretary-General said that as security risks declined, humanitarian activities began to expand into previously inaccessible areas and UN agencies and NGOs began to move from emergency to rehabilitation programmes. By July 1996, enhanced access allowed humanitarian agencies to deliver 70 per cent of humanitarian assistance by road, as compared to 1995 when 70 per cent of assistance was delivered by air. However, restrictions on the free circulation of persons and goods continued to constrain some humanitarian activities.

At the end of the year, UN agencies reported receiving approximately $ 132 million in response to the 1996 Appeal. Humanitarian efforts had been extended to all but one fifth of the national territory, including infrastructural repairs, demining, food assistance, provision of seeds and tools, and delivery of health services.

Of the funding requirements for the year, totalling $187,294,074, the amount of $112,355,731

(or 60 per cent) was received in pledges and contributions.

By December 1996, more than 60 international and 58 national NGOs were involved in a mixture of emergency and rehabilitation programmes in 18 Angolan provinces. Other organizations, such as the German Agency for Technical Cooperation (GTZ) and Swiss Humanitarian Aid, were also active in Angola, particularly through transition programmes, with an emphasis on rehabilitation and reconstruction where possible.

In resolution 1087(1996), the Security Council urged the international community to fulfil expeditiously its pledges to provide assistance to facilitate the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the Angolan national economy and the resettlement of displaced persons, and stressed the importance of such assistance for the consolidation of the gains in the peace process.

Central African Republic

On 19 June 1996, DHA released an Extended Situation Report on the Central African Republic Conflict-Related Crisis, requesting emergency assistance from the international community to respond to humanitarian needs arising from armed conflict which had broken out in May. A total of $1,308,800 was requested by UN agencies and programmes (FAO, UNDP, UNESCO, UNICEF, WFP, WHO) for relief activities in health care ($200,000), education ($564,000) and agriculture and livestock ($544,800). The programmes covered periods of up to three months.

On 23 May, the President of the Central African Republic had made an urgent request to the Secretary-General for international humanitarian assistance. Following assessments conducted by UN agencies and other relief organizations, two priorities were identified: survival requirements for the 500,000 residents of the capital city of Bangui, for whom health and nutritional rehabilitation programmes had been severely disrupted; and intervention in the education, agriculture and animal health sectors which, if left unaddressed, would have a serious impact on key socio-economic sectors and potentially create more social unrest. The Central African Red Cross estimated that 241 persons were wounded and 45 killed during the 10-day conflict.

Comoros

On 13 December [A/51/PV.84], the Comoros introduced a draft resolution [A/51/L.27/Rev.1] requesting special economic assistance to the country. The Comoros said it had had to cope with many constraints that hindered its economic and social development, with its economy dependent essentially on agriculture. Its major export crops now faced stiff competition in world markets due to price drops and the development of synthetic substitutes. Its many problems were further compounded by frequent and devastating hurricanes. In addition, the political instability that prevailed between 1990 and 1995, marked by 17 successive Governments, exacerbated an already unfavourable situation.

To respond to urgent humanitarian needs, the Government had to redeploy, on an emergency basis, a major part of the State budget and financial resources normally devoted to vital economic and social programmes. Furthermore, the Government did not have the means to carry out the reconstruction and development projects essential to survival. The Comoros urgently appealed to the international community to aid the country and its people.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/30 F.

Special emergency economic assistance to the Comoros

The General Assembly,

Noting the fact that, on 28 September 1995, an army of international mercenaries invaded the Comoros, overthrew the President of the Republic, and disrupted the constitutional order and, in so doing, the State institutions, as well as the political, economic and social order of the country,

Noting also that the unfavourable situation of the Comoros, which is on the list of least developed countries, is aggravated by several important factors, including its physical distance from its trading partners, the scarcity of natural resources, the diminutive size of the domestic market, the fall in prices of its export products and the poverty of its soil,

Noting further the economic and social trauma caused by that invasion and the material and structural damage suffered by the country during those events,

Aware of the efforts made by the Government and people of the Comoros to assist the most affected and deprived sectors of the population,

Considering, in particular, that in order to respond to those urgent humanitarian needs the Government of the Comoros, in the absence of other resources, had to reallocate as a matter of great urgency the major part of the budget required for the functioning of the State and the financial resources normally devoted to vital economic and social programmes,

Noting, nonetheless, the insufficiency of means available to the Government to execute programmes of reconstruction and development essential for the survival of the country,

1. Expresses its gratitude to the States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations which have provided assistance to the Government of the Comoros for the rehabilitation of the country, and appeals for the continuation of such assistance;

2. Stresses that the financial resources available remain nonetheless insufficient vis-a-vis the basic needs to ensure the emergence of the country from its transitional phase into a development phase;

3. Urgently appeals to all States and all appropriate international organizations, including United Nations bodies and specialized agencies, to provide, in consultation with the Government of the Comoros, assistance to the Comoros in repairing the damage caused by the act of aggression;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to furnish all necessary assistance in accordance with paragraph 3 above and asks him to dispatch to Moroni as soon as possible a multidisciplinary humanitarian and technical assessment mission in order to carry out a detailed study of the needs of the country in terms of assistance;

5. Requests all Member States and donor bodies, as well as the specialized agencies and other organizations of the United Nations, to grant to the Comoros all necessary humanitarian, financial, economic and technical assistance, in order to enable it to achieve national reconstruction and sustainable development;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Liberia

In October 1996, the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Liberia, which was to have expired at the end of August, was extended to 31 December 1996 by DHA following the outbreak of hostilities in April and May in the capital of Monrovia and the need to reappraise humanitarian input in the light of the Abuja Agreement (see PART ONE, Chapter II). The Appeal sought $114.6 million and had received $89.3 million by the end of the year.

In consultation with NGOs and international organizations, UN agencies developed a joint approach to the situation in Liberia composed of two parts, to begin in January 1997: emergency programmes, coordinated by DHA, and transitional/recovery programmes, instituted by UNDP. In December, DHA launched the first part in the form of a United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Liberia, covering the period January to June 1997 and focusing on the continuation of aid for all civilians in need, as well as catering to the initial and basic needs of ex-combatants, internally displaced persons and refugees. The $31,235,149 requested would fund projects in the areas of demobilization and reintegration ($7,817,840); food security and agriculture ($6,605,600); health ($6,022,170); shelter and infrastructure ($5,900,000); water and sanitation ($1,169,000); education ($990,000); and assistance to vulnerable groups, including children in especially difficult circumstances ($751,000). The second part of the joint approach, the United Nations System Inter-Agency Community Reintegration and Peace Building Programme, was prepared by UNDP in December and focused on transitional activities requiring immediate implementation using a community-based strategy continuing over a 12-month period to December 1997. A total of $60,659,115 was requested for six sub-programmes: restoration of communities through resettlement assistance ($17,113,615); management of the electoral process ($13,752,000); restoration of basic social services ($10,418,500); strengthening law enforcement institutions and building civil administration ($9,000,000); skills development and job creation ($5,900,000); and reintegration of war-affected children, youth and women ($4,475,000). DHA estimated that, of the total pre-war population of approximately 2.3 million in 1989, 750,000 were internally displaced and 768,000 were refugees as at December 1996. The conflict had also destroyed most of the country's institutions of civil society, property and productive capacity.

Reports of Secretary-General. Pursuant to General Assembly resolution 50/58 A [YUN 1995, p. 908], the Secretary-General reported [A/51/303] in August on assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Liberia since October 1995. Following the signing of the Abuja Agreement [YUN 1995, p. 358] in August 1995, significant and successful efforts had been made to expand humanitarian activities throughout the country, the Secretary-General stated. However, those positive developments took place against a backdrop of increasing political instability and insecurity. The failure of the warring factions to cease fire and disengage, coupled with delays in the disarmament process and the poor dissemination of information to fighters, contributed to a volatile environment for humanitarian assistance. In addition to the harassment of relief workers, persistent ceasefire violations and the general deterioration of security continued to cause civilian populations to shift, thereby compounding the problem of displaced persons.

The fighting that broke out in Monrovia on 6 April 1996 posed a most serious threat to the peace process and humanitarian operations in Liberia and shattered the sanctity of its capital city as a safe haven, the Secretary-General reported. The Ministry of Health estimated that about 3,000 people were killed and more than 50 per cent of the town's nearly 800,000 inhabitants were displaced by the fighting. All aid organizations, UN agencies, NGOs, the UN Observer Mission in Liberia and government offices, as well as shops and other commercial establishments, were systematically looted by fighters of all factions. With their facilities and warehouses plundered and most of their staff gone, the humanitarian assistance community was seriously constrained in effectively carrying out relief work.

Despite the high security risk, UN agencies and the UN Humanitarian Assistance Coordination Office remained in Monrovia to monitor and coordinate the delivery of much-needed relief assistance. Since the ceasefire brokered by the Economic Community of West African States and the United Nations on 31 May, expatriate staff of the major relief agencies had gradually re-established their presence in Liberia. However, the Secretary-General emphasized that the fighting had had a profound, detrimental impact on humanitarian operations. Coming at a time when relief groups were braced for a massive operation in the hinterland, it compelled the organizations to re-examine their involvement in the country. Consequently, the international NGO community in Liberia took a decision to limit programmes only to life-saving activities until a safe working environment was restored. UN agencies also agreed on a common position, involving only essential services.

The Secretary-General concluded that more than 1.5 million Liberians remained dependent on relief aid as refugees and war-affected and displaced persons. Under the current circumstances of continuing uncertainty and volatility, the requisite humanitarian assistance could not be delivered according to the pre-established plan of moving from relief to sustainable development. Mainly owing to the persistent efforts of the humanitarian community, there was no large-scale starvation in the country and the high rate of malnutrition in some areas was swiftly brought down through a concerted food-aid programme. Contagious epidemics of cholera, yellow fever and Ebola virus were effectively controlled. Clean drinking water and medical supplies were available in most accessible areas. Shelter was also provided to more than 400,000 people, while numerous camps and feeding centres catered to the vulnerable. Additionally, an increasing number of internally displaced persons were engaged in income-generating activities.

Humanitarian assistance in Liberia was at a crossroads, the Secretary-General stated. Short-term concerns were likely to continue to overwhelm humanitarian programmes and resource mobilization had become more problematic. While the current deployment of humanitarian organizations could address immediate and small-scale emergencies, the Secretary-General felt that they were inadequately equipped and staffed to respond effectively to any major emergencies, epidemics or disasters. In spite of those difficulties, the humanitarian assistance community seized every opportunity to emphasize the commitment to continuing relief assistance; it was hoped that ongoing political efforts would be successful and that leaders would agree to a complete cessation of hostilities and disarmament of their forces.

In a later report [A/52/678] on emergency assistance to Liberia, the Secretary-General said that while relief work in and around Monrovia was being carried out, the UN Humanitarian Coordinator continued to negotiate access to the hinterland with the various factions. A series of assessment missions was conducted to the most affected areas, and relief organizations were thus able gradually to expand their activities to reach towns and villages that had been inaccessible since the outbreak of the conflict.

All successful efforts were made against the background of repeated harassment and abuse by the factions against civilians and representatives of the humanitarian assistance community. With the commencement of the disarmament and demobilization exercise on 22 November, however, the humanitarian situation in the country had improved significantly; the nature of humanitarian assistance broadened, from the addressing of life-threatening human suffering to trauma counselling and the repair of basic roads and bridges and other infrastructure so as to facilitate the expansion of assistance programmes after the rainy season.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December 1996, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/30 B.

Assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Liberia

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/232 of 21 December 1990, 46/147 of 17 December 1991, 47/154 of 18 December 1992, 48/197 of 21 December 1993, 49/21 E of 20 December 1994 and 50/58 A of 12 December 1995,

Taking note of Security Council resolution 1071 (1996) of 30 August 1996, in which the Council, inter alia, welcomed the agreement of the Economic Community of West African States at Abuja on 17 August 1996, which extended the 1995 Abuja Agreement until 15 June 1997, established a timetable for implementation of the Agreement, adopted a mechanism to verify compliance with the Agreement by the faction leaders and proposed possible measures against the factions in the event of non-compliance,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General [A/51/303],

Deeply concerned about the adverse effects of the protracted conflict on the socio-economic development of Liberia, particularly the attacks against civilians, the looting of property and the destruction of infrastructure throughout the country, including the capital, as a result of the outbreak of hostilities on 6 April 1996, and the urgent need to restore peace and stability to facilitate economic recovery and the rehabilitation and reconstruction of basic sectors of the country,

Acknowledging the efforts of Mrs. Ruth Sando Perry, Chairman of the Council of State, to govern on behalf of the people of Liberia,

Noting with concern that the lack of adequate logistics and security guarantees from the Liberian factions continues to impair the delivery of relief assistance, particularly in the areas not yet under the control of the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group, thereby hampering the transition from emergency to development activities,

Commending the concerted and determined efforts of the Economic Community of West African States to restore peace, security and stability in Liberia,

1. Expresses its gratitude to all States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations that have rendered assistance to the Liberian National Transitional Government in its relief and rehabilitation activities, and urges that such assistance be continued;

2. Calls upon all States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to continue to provide Liberia with technical, financial and other assistance for the repatriation and resettlement of Liberian refugees, returnees and displaced persons and the rehabilitation of combatants so as to facilitate the restoration of peace and normalcy in Liberia;

3. Reiterates its appeal to all States to contribute generously to the Trust Fund for Liberia established by the Secretary-General, inter alia, to assist the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group to fulfil its mandate and to provide assistance for the reconstruction of Liberia;

4. Deplores all attacks against and intimidation of personnel of the United Nations, its specialized agencies, non-governmental organizations and the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group, as well as the looting of their equipment, supplies and personal property;

5. Emphasizes the urgent need for all parties and factions and their leaders in Liberia to respect fully the security and safety of all personnel of the United Nations, its specialized agencies, non-governmental organizations and the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group by ensuring their complete freedom of movement throughout Liberia and to take all measures necessary to create an atmosphere conducive to the successful resolution of the conflict;

6. Urges the factions and their leaders to establish conditions essential to the socio-economic development of Liberia by honouring their commitments to cease all hostilities and disarm their combatants according to the timetable agreed to at Abuja on 17 August 1996;

7. Commends the Secretary-General for his continuing efforts to mobilize relief and rehabilitation assistance for Liberia, and requests him:

(a) To continue his efforts to mobilize all possible assistance within the United Nations system to help the Liberian National Transitional Government in its reconstruction and development efforts;

(b) To undertake, when conditions permit, in close collaboration with the authorities of Liberia, an overall assessment of needs, with the objective of holding a round-table conference of donors for the reconstruction and development of Liberia;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the progress made in the implementation of the present resolution;

9. Decides to consider at its fifty-second session the question of international assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Liberia.

Mozambique

Report of Secretary-General. In a 25 October report [A/51/560] to the General Assembly, the Secretary-General reviewed emergency and humanitarian aid for Mozambique; assistance for reconstruction and development; macro-economic trends; structural reforms; public administration reforms, decentralization and governance; external aid; aid coordination; and UN system initiatives. The Secretary-General stated that peace had radically improved Mozambique's prospects for economic recovery and development; while humanitarian aid was still being delivered, it was in a much reduced form. The emphasis had meanwhile clearly shifted from emergency aid to rehabilitation, reconstruction, reintegration and development.

In 1994, Mozambique received $131.8 million in food aid and $13.6 million for other emergency non-food aid. Although emergency food aid continued at a high $135 million in 1995, other emergency non-food assistance saw a sharp drop to $10 million, the Secretary-General noted. The largest part of the emergency food aid ($100.2 million) was channelled through WFP. Total estimated aid disbursement by donors in 1995 amounted to $879 million, of which $733 million was for reconstruction and development programmes. As of 25 October, 1996 emergency food aid pledges were just over $40 million and the non-debt relief component of pledged financing amounted to $567 million.

In post-war Mozambique, the peace dividends had yet to materialize in any tangible way, observed the Secretary-General. In 1996, growth was projected at 4 per cent. The prevalence of the recent trend of lacklustre growth performance was likely to translate into GDP per capita too modest to make a visible contribution to, and to sustain, the goals of poverty reduction, social sector development, reconstruction and restoration of external viability.

UNDP in 1994 had reassumed responsibility for coordinating humanitarian assistance activities in the country, including support for reintegration and demining. Other UN agencies continuing to work in Mozambique included UNFPA, UNICEF, WFP and WHO. The role of UNHCR had been paramount, as it had, notably with cooperation from WFP and the International Organization for Migration (IOM), successfully conducted one of the largest refugee repatriation and resettlement operations on record, covering about 1.7 million returnees, mostly from Malawi, South Africa, Swaziland and Zimbabwe. The operation was concluded in June.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/30 D.

Assistance to Mozambique

The General Assembly,

Recalling Security Council resolution 386(1976) of 17 March 1976,

Recalling also its relevant resolutions, in particular resolution 45/227 of 21 December 1990, 47/42 of 9 December 1992 and 49/21 D of 20 December 1994, in which it urged the international community to respond effectively and generously to the call for assistance to Mozambique,

Reaffirming the principles for humanitarian assistance contained in the annex to its resolution 46/182 of 19 December 1991,

Recalling its resolutions 48/7 of 19 October 1993, 49/215 of 23 December 1994 and 50/82 of 14 December 1995 on assistance in mine clearance, and stressing the need to foster the establishment of national mine clearance capacity with a view to enabling the Government of Mozambique to deal more effectively with the adverse effects of these weapons within the framework of the efforts for national reconstruction,

Bearing in mind that Mozambique is emerging from a devastating war and that a proper response to address the current situation in the country requires substantial international assistance in a comprehensive and integrated manner and linking, inter alia, resettlement to reintegration programmes in order to strengthen further the process of national reconstruction and development,

Bearing in mind also the Paris Declaration and the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, adopted by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries on 14 September 1990,

Noting the mobilization and allocation of resources by States, relevant organizations of the United Nations system and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to assist national efforts,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on assistance to Mozambique,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;

2. Welcomes the assistance rendered to Mozambique by various States, relevant organizations of the United Nations system and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations;

3. Welcomes the progress made in the consolidation of a lasting peace and tranquillity, the enhancement of democracy and the promotion of national reconciliation in Mozambique;

4. Takes note with satisfaction of the successful completion of the repatriation, resettlement and reintegration programme of Mozambican citizens from neighbouring countries, and expresses appreciation for the support of the international and non-governmental organizations which, in close cooperation with the Government of Mozambique, played an important role in that programme;

5. Stresses that Mozambique has made significant progress in mitigating the consequences of a devastating war and that continued substantial coordinated international assistance is required to assist the country in addressing its development needs, in particular with regard to the ongoing resettlement and reintegration of internally displaced persons and demobilized soldiers;

6. Commends all States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations that have contributed to mine clearance in Mozambique, and urges those that have a capacity to do so to continue to provide the needed assistance with a view to enabling the Government of Mozambique to develop its national mine clearance capacity within the framework of the ongoing mine clearance programme;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, in close cooperation with the Government of Mozambique:

(a) To continue his efforts to mobilize international assistance for the national reconstruction and development of Mozambique;

(b) To ensure the coordination of the work of the United Nations system for adequate response to the development needs of Mozambique;

(c) To prepare a report on international assistance for the national reconstruction and development of Mozambique for consideration by the General Assembly at its fifty-third session.

Sierra Leone

In March 1996, DHA reported that Sierra Leone was in the throes of a serious humanitarian crisis. Approximately 2.1 million persons, or 47 per cent of the country's population, had been forced by violence to abandon their homes and livelihoods. Of that number, an estimated 1.6 million were internally displaced, with an additional 370,000 having sought refuge in neighbouring countries. Displaced persons inundated district towns, which were reached only sporadically by relief agencies, resulting in overcrowding, malnutrition, outbreaks of disease, the collapse of overburdened social services and a sense of hopelessness. Accordingly, DHA launched a United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Sierra Leone, covering the period from March 1996 to February 1997. The Appeal sought $57,074,706, with the bulk of the funds supporting programmes in food aid ($25,032,052), non-food assistance to the displaced and affected populations ($10,419,255), food production ($9,118,586) and health ($7,877,175).

The single largest impediment to the relief programme was poor access to populations in need and inadequate security for relief and rehabilitation operations, DHA reported. Until road access improved, efforts to meet the needs of displaced and affected populations in the major district towns would be extremely limited, DHA warned.

With the restoration of a multi-party democracy in March and the ensuing ceasefire agreement, the Government of Sierra Leone proposed a National Resettlement, Rehabilitation and Reconstruction Programme to facilitate post-war recovery. This Programme consisted of two components: a quick-action programme to be launched in September to address urgent resettlement and rehabilitation needs over a 24-month period, and a medium-term reconstruction programme, encompassing a period of three years. The Government requested approximately $211 million to cover short-term needs and $760 million for medium- and longer-term initiatives.

In August, a mid-term review of the 1996 Appeal was carried out to reflect changes that had taken place in the humanitarian environment and to harmonize the ongoing emergency operations with the Government's quick-action programme for resettlement and rehabilitation. By the end of the year, some $38 million, or 66 per cent of the total amount of the Appeal, had been pledged to participating agencies. The food-aid sector was very well funded, enabling WFP and others to provide extensive assistance to displaced and war-affected populations. Contributions received by FAO were applied to the distribution of seeds and tools for the main planting seasons, supplementing NGOs' efforts in agricultural assistance. Other aid supported primary health care, disease control and water and sanitation programmes. UNICEF and other organizations implemented projects amounting to nearly $1 million to benefit children affected by the war. The United Nations Humanitarian Assistance Coordination Unit (UNHACU), established by DHA in cooperation with UNDP in January, received funding to coordinate the humanitarian assistance programme and to support the new Ministry for National Reconstruction, Resettlement and Rehabilitation (MNRRR).

Welcoming the Peace Agreement signed between the Government and the Revolutionary United Front on 30 November, the Security Council President, in a statement [S/PRST/1996/46] made on 4 December on behalf of the Council, stressed the importance of a coordinated international effort to alleviate the humanitarian situation in the country. (For further details, see PART ONE, Chapter II.)

Somalia

After six years of civil war, Somalia continued to be held hostage to violence, particularly in the southern regions of the country where the former Government was situated, according to DHA. Somalia's neighbours remained host to around half a million refugees, and within the country itself several hundred thousand men, women and children remained displaced, living in abject poverty. Overall, the economy of Somalia remained weak, a situation which continued to take its toll on the most vulnerable members of Somali society. The lack of security had a negative impact on communities and was cited by DHA as the major impediment to the delivery of assistance. Faced with the apparent intractability of the situation, the response from the international community to both United Nations and other appeals for assistance to Somalia had diminished considerably.

In an oral report [E/1996/SR.41] to the Economic and Social Council on 19 July, the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs said that the situation in Somalia remained fragile and required the continuation of humanitarian programmes, for which donor support was essential. Because of the complexity of the problems involved, assistance programmes had to be well coordinated and delivered in tandem with efforts to stabilize threatened societies, reduce vulnerability and rebuild destroyed communities. On 19 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Under-Secretary-General's report by decision 1996/237.

In December, DHA launched a United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Somalia, to cover total funding requirements of $100,558,830 for October 1996 to December 1997. The Appeal followed an area-based approach for planning and implementation of UN activities, taking into account the markedly different needs and environments in regions of the country. While all projects fell into the main categories of emergencies, reintegration, rehabilitation, food security and governance, the Appeal outlined joint projects (totalling $46,531,000) and individual agency projects ($54,027,830). In addition, a special supplement of $13,223,043 was requested for NGO projects.

Report of Secretary-General. In August, the Secretary-General reported [A/51/315] on assistance for humanitarian relief and the economic and social rehabilitation of Somalia. While funding constraints and security conditions had affected many programmes in a negative way, UN agencies, ICRC and NGOs continued to provide food support, as well as assistance for health services, clean water supply and education. The vital presence of more than 50 international NGOs had kept them at the forefront of relief and rehabilitation interventions, and more than 10 Somali NGOs were working as reliable partners of UN agencies.

The Secretary-General explained that in the absence of a recognized national Government, UN agencies had continued to exercise a pragmatic approach to interacting with de facto local authorities. By mid-year, UN agencies were uncertain as to how much longer a renewed humanitarian crisis could be held back under prevailing conditions. The health and nutritional status of vulnerable populations had worsened in some parts of the country. Food shortages and insecurity resulted in new population displacements in southern Somalia, creating the risk of a backflow of Somali refugees into neighbouring countries. He cited such factors as poor harvests, disruptions of commercial trade flows and transportation routes as contributing to food insecurity.

Diarrhoeal diseases, anaemia, malaria and acute respiratory infections remained among the leading causes of mortality, and low immunization coverage, poor water and sanitation and limited access to health services exacerbated the situation. The return of refugees placed an additional burden on already fragile local infrastructures, and the provision of continued support to returnees was vital to ensure their sustainable reintegration, the Secretary-General said.

The Secretary-General pointed out that there were an estimated 1 million landmines still laid in Somali soil; UNESCO mine-awareness material remained relevant and was used in schools, while ICRC was launching a mine-awareness campaign targeted at youth and militia groups.

Humanitarian operations in Somalia continued to be severely impeded by security problems, including looting and inter-clan violence, the Secretary-General said. While the civil conflict over the past year had often been localized and of low intensity, the fighting had at times been heavy, claiming the lives of many innocent civilians, including women and children. There had been numerous attacks directed at or affecting humanitarian agencies and staff.

Unless there was commitment on the part of faction leaders that they would not continue to hold the country hostage to their political ambitions, Somalia would remain in a state of acute vulnerability, the Secretary-General warned. While diminishing donor resources for Somalia had reined in the operations of humanitarian partners, the Secretary-General encouraged donors to adopt a proactive and forward-thinking approach.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/30 G.

Assistance for humanitarian relief and the economic and social rehabilitation of Somalia

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 43/206 of 20 December 1988, 44/178 of 19 December 1989, 45/229 of 21 December 1990, 46/176 of 19 December 1991, 47/160 of 18 December 1992, 48/201 of 21 December 1993, 49/21 L of 20 December 1994 and 50/58 G of 20 December 1995 and the resolutions and decisions of the Economic and Social Council on emergency assistance to Somalia,

Recalling also Security Council resolution 733(1992) of 23 January 1992 and all subsequent relevant resolutions, in which the Council, inter alia, urged all parties, movements and factions in Somalia to facilitate the efforts of the United Nations, its specialized agencies and humanitarian organizations to provide urgent humanitarian assistance to the affected population in Somalia and reiterated the call for the full respect of the security and safety of the personnel of those organizations and the guarantee of their complete freedom of movement in and around Mogadishu and other parts of Somalia,

Noting with appreciation the continued efforts made by the Secretary-General to assist the Somali people in their efforts to promote peace, stability and national reconciliation,

Noting with concern that political instability and the absence of central authority continue to characterize Somalia and that, while the environment has become conducive to some reconstruction and development-oriented work in certain parts of the country, the humanitarian and security situation has worsened in other parts,

Reaffirming the importance it attaches to the need for effective coordination and cooperation among the United Nations agencies and their partners,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on assistance for humanitarian relief and the economic and social rehabilitation of Somalia,

Deeply appreciative of the humanitarian assistance and rehabilitation support rendered by a number of States to alleviate the hardship and suffering of the affected Somali population,

Recognizing that, while the humanitarian situation remains fragile in some parts, there is a need to continue the ongoing process of rehabilitation and reconstruction alongside the process of national reconciliation, without prejudice to the provision of emergency relief assistance wherever and whenever required, as security allows,

Noting with appreciation the efforts of the United Nations system focusing on working directly with Somali communities, whenever possible, in the absence of a recognized national government, and welcoming the efforts of the United Nations, in partnership with Somali counterparts at the local level and non-governmental organizations, to formulate a programme combining humanitarian and developmental approaches, given the varying conditions in different areas of the country,

Re-emphasizing the importance of the further implementation of its resolution 47/160 to rehabilitate basic social and economic services at the local level throughout the country,

1. Expresses its gratitude to all States and the intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations that have responded to the appeals of the Secretary-General and others by extending assistance to Somalia;

2. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his continued and tireless efforts to mobilize assistance to the Somali people;

3. Welcomes the ongoing efforts of the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity, the League of Arab States, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the Intergovernmental Authority on Development of the countries of the Horn of Africa and the States members of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries to resolve the situation in Somalia;

4. Also welcomes the strategy of the United Nations focusing on the implementation of community-based interventions aimed at rebuilding local infrastructures and increasing the self-reliance of the local population, and the ongoing efforts by the United Nations agencies, their Somali counterparts and their partner organizations to establish and maintain close coordination and cooperation mechanisms for the implementation of relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction programmes;

5. Emphasizes the principle that the Somali people, in particular at the local level, have the primary responsibility for their own development and for the sustainability of rehabilitation and reconstruction assistance programmes, and reaffirms the importance it attaches to the creation of workable arrangements for collaboration between the United Nations system and its partner organizations and their Somali counterparts at the local level for the effective execution of rehabilitation and development activities in those parts of the country where peace and security prevail;

6. Urges all States and relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to continue the further implementation of its resolution 47/160 so as to assist the Somali people to embark on the rehabilitation of basic social and economic services, as well as institution-building aimed at the restoration of civil administration at the local level in all those parts of the country where peace, security and stability prevail;

7. Appeals to all the Somali parties concerned to terminate hostilities and to engage in a national reconciliation process that allows for transition from relief to reconstruction and development;

8. Calls upon all parties, movements and factions in Somalia to respect fully the security and safety of personnel of the United Nations and its specialized agencies and of non-governmental organizations, and to guarantee their complete freedom of movement throughout Somalia;

9. Calls upon the Secretary-General to continue to mobilize international humanitarian, rehabilitation and reconstruction assistance for Somalia;

10. Calls upon the international community to provide continued and increased assistance in response to the United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction assistance for Somalia covering the period October 1996 to December 1997;

11. Requests the Secretary-General, in view of the critical situation in Somalia, to take all necessary measures for the implementation of the present resolution, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session.

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTION

In a Presidential statement of 24 January [S/PRST/1996/4], the Security Council commended the valiant efforts of UN and international humanitarian agencies and their Somali personnel for the courage and determination to render assistance to the Somali people. The Council encouraged Member States to continue to provide humanitarian assistance in order to avoid a further deterioration of the situation in the country. The Council considered the uninterrupted delivery of humanitarian assistance to be a central factor in the country's overall security and stability and called on the Somali parties and factions to open unconditionally seaport and other transportation facilities, as their closure posed a potential major impediment to future emergency deliveries. In a statement of 9 December [S/PRST/1996/47], the Council reaffirmed its appreciation to all the organizations and individuals who carried out humanitarian activities in Somalia and called on all Somali factions to ensure the safety of all personnel involved.

The Sudan

During 1996, the 13-year-old civil conflict in the Sudan continued to destabilize and further degrade the lives of millions of Sudanese, as war-affected populations throughout the country struggled to cope with the effects of chronic malnutrition and an alarming increase in the spread of infectious diseases. The rapid deterioration of the economy during the second quarter of 1996 exacerbated the humanitarian crisis, putting intense pressure on millions of people already living below subsistence levels. By the fourth quarter of 1996, the coping mechanisms of many vulnerable populations were at the point of collapse, raising the prospect of widespread hunger.

Further deepening the crisis, the humanitarian efforts of the United Nations through Operation Lifeline Sudan (OLS) were constrained throughout the year by the Government's initiative to control unilaterally the flow of international relief assistance. Beginning in 1995, the Government had imposed unprecedented control over the type of equipment available to OLS, paralysing many scheduled deliveries of food relief, especially in southern Sudan. In other areas, more than 1,800 died as a result of an outbreak of cholera and severe diarrhoea, and severe flooding displaced more than 15,000 people and destroyed food crops.

Of the vulnerable populations put at greater risk in 1996, the displaced persons living in Khartoum camps and settlement areas continued to be the least protected by the United Nations. Access restrictions and forced evictions/demolitions eroded the coping mechanisms of thousands already living below subsistence level. During the year, more than 12 demolitions by the Government occurred in squatter settlements in Greater Khartoum, with over 20,000 displaced persons losing their homes.

In the third quarter of 1996, 240,000 persons living in the Red Sea Hills State were reportedly affected by famine conditions. A combination of deteriorating terms of trade between livestock and grain, as well as government restrictions on the movement of food, forced the price of cereals up by more than 300 per cent.

The unpredictable dynamics of the civil conflict resulted in splits and major realignments within the rebel movements. In that connection, the new political environment created by the signature of the Political Charter in April caused a cancellation of plans to resume multilateral talks on humanitarian access with the UN Special Envoy for Humanitarian Affairs.

Although insecurity, aircraft shortages and denials of flight access seriously constrained delivery of humanitarian relief assistance to southern Sudan during 1996, OLS significantly addressed some of the worst effects of the conflict on civilians by delivering 50,366 metric tons (MTs) of food between January and November. It also delivered by air 3,403 MTs of non-food relief supplies and continued to support rehabilitation programmes in the fields of health, household food security, livestock, water and sanitation, emergency education, war-affected children and capacity-building.

Responding to the humanitarian crisis, DHA in February launched a United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for the Sudan, covering the period January to December 1996 and requesting a total of $107,574,977 from donors, in order to facilitate programmes in areas such as emergency food aid ($40,279,157); nutrition, health and water ($30,204,320); refugees and returnees ($17,503,500); agriculture, livestock and fishing ($9,496,000); and other emergency activities ($6,696,000).

Donor confidence in OLS's ability to maintain access was severely tested, resulting in a major funding shortfall. By year's end, donor pledges totalled only 51.4 per cent of the amount required.

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General in September reported [A/51/326] on emergency assistance to the Sudan. He noted that OLS had evolved over the years from a short-term relief programme to the most far-reaching and diversified international assistance effort in the Sudan. The number of beneficiaries slated to receive assistance during 1996 increased by 900,000 persons to over 2.1 million, as compared to 1.2 million in 1995.

Working closely with the Sudan Relief and Rehabilitation Association and the Relief Association of South Sudan, UNICEF coordinated 25 health NGOs working in OLS southern sector. In 1996, the programme aimed to reach an estimated 1.7 million people with basic health care services. Efforts continued to ensure that water supply management and hygiene awareness were incorporated into primary health care. Community-based animal health workers continued to vaccinate cattle against rinderpest and treat other major livestock diseases. OLS southern sector provided basic education materials for 1,200 primary schools serving 300,000 children. UNICEF and other organizations continued teacher training. Educational support to more than 3,000 unaccompanied children living in accessible camps in Eastern Equatoria also continued. A UN/NGO network was formed in June to focus on issues of unaccompanied children, family tracing and reunification, and child protection.

The Secretary-General stated that the tragic civil war in the Sudan continued unabated and remained a crisis of immense proportions, affecting the lives of millions of Sudanese. Under such circumstances, any attempt to diminish the capacity of the international community to respond to conditions of suffering and hardship among the civilian population could only give rise to the most adamant expressions of concern as a violation of recognized humanitarian principles.

Arising from OLS's growing difficulties in matters of access, the first comprehensive review of the Operation in its seven-year history had been completed in mid-August, with donor support and the cooperation of the Government and rebel movements. Bearing in mind the global, regional and national significance of OLS, the Secretary-General said, the review's findings and recommendations would be critically important in charting the future of humanitarian activities in the Sudan.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/30 I.

Emergency assistance to the Sudan

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 43/8 of 18 October 1988 and 43/52 of 6 December 1988, 44/12 of 24 October 1989, 45/226 of 21 December 1990, 46/178 of 19 December 1991, 47/162 of 18 December 1992, 48/200 of 21 December 1993, 49/21 K of 20 December 1994 and 50/58 J of 22 December 1995 on assistance to the Sudan,

Noting the declining contributions to the 1996 consolidated inter-agency appeal for Operation Lifeline Sudan despite the progress made in the Operation, and noting also that considerable relief needs still remain to be addressed, in particular in the areas of non-food assistance, including assistance to combat malaria, and for logistics, emergency recovery, rehabilitation and development,

Recognizing the need in emergency situations to address the continuum of relief, rehabilitation and development so as to reduce dependence on external food aid and other relief services,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General and of the statement by the representative of the Sudan before the General Assembly,

1. Acknowledges with appreciation the cooperation by the Government of the Sudan with the United Nations, including the agreements and arrangements achieved to facilitate relief operations towards improvement of United Nations assistance to affected areas, and encourages the continuation of that cooperation;

2. Stresses the need for Operation Lifeline Sudan to be operated with a view to ensuring its efficiency, transparency and effectiveness, with the full participation of the Government of the Sudan in its management and operation, including conducting of assessment, allocation, distribution and evaluation processes, as well as consultations in the preparation of the consolidated annual inter-agency appeal for the Operation;

3. Stresses also that Operation Lifeline Sudan should operate within the principle of national sovereignty and the framework of international cooperation in accordance with relevant national and international law;

4. Calls upon the international community to continue to contribute generously to the emergency needs, recovery and development of the country;

5. Urges the international community to give priority to assistance for the rehabilitation of roads, railways and airports and to provision of means of road transport in order to facilitate relief supplies to the affected areas;

6. Calls upon the donor community and the organizations of the United Nations system to provide financial, technical and medical assistance, guided by the actions called for by the General Assembly in its relevant resolutions to combat malaria and other epidemics in the Sudan;

7. Welcomes the signing in April 1996 of the political charter between the Government and many factions of the rebel movement for the achievement of peace in the Sudan, and encourages the remaining factions to join the peace process so as to establish durable peace and stability in the country and to facilitate relief efforts;

8. Urges the international community to support the programmes of rehabilitation, settlement and integration of returnees, refugees and the internally displaced;

9. Stresses the importance of assuring safe access for personnel providing relief assistance to all in need, and the importance of strict observance of the principles and guidelines of Operation Lifeline Sudan;

10. Urges all parties involved to continue to offer all feasible assistance, including facilitating the movement of relief supplies and personnel, so as to guarantee maximum success of Operation Lifeline Sudan in all affected parts of the country, with special emphasis on national capacity-building in the humanitarian field for governmental and non-governmental organizations;

11. Also urges all the parties to the conflict to desist from using anti-personnel mines, and calls upon the international community to refrain from supplying mines to the parties of the conflict and to provide the Government of the Sudan with financial and technical assistance in mine clearance;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to mobilize and coordinate resources and support for Operation Lifeline Sudan and to report on the emergency situation in the affected areas and the recovery, rehabilitation and development of the country to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session.

In a statement before the General Assembly on 21 November [A/51/PV.62], the Sudan said that its commitment was irreversible where OLS was concerned. It called on all its OLS partners to intensify their efforts to increase confidence, transparency and respect for humanitarian principles; all parties, it said, were participants in and not opponents of OLS. It welcomed a UN role in coordinating the relief operation, but stressed that that role should be exercised in full cooperation with the Government. It also welcomed the assistance of the international community in eliminating landmines. It hoped that OLS, as one of the most important channels for providing humanitarian assistance, would prove to be one of the major means of confidence-building and peace settlement.

Explaining their vote, a number of delegations, among them Australia, Canada, Ireland (on behalf of the European Union), Mexico, Norway and the United States, expressed regret that consensus could not be reached on the text. The United States noted that certain aspects of the text, including the proposed government involvement in the management and operation of OLS, were contrary to the spirit of OLS and could result in preventing urgent humanitarian assistance from reaching all war-affected civilians in the Sudan. Canada believed that some of the resolution's language could detract from a coordinated international effort to deliver humanitarian assistance. Mexico stressed that humanitarian assistance should not be tainted with any political aspects alien to its spirit and should abide strictly by the principles of humanitarianism, neutrality and impartiality.

Activities in Asia

Afghanistan

By December 1996, protracted fighting in Afghanistan had produced a refugee population of at least 6 million people. Within the country itself, up to 500,000 Afghans had been forced to relocate in the past two years. An estimated 10 million landmines were still buried in the country. Preventable communicable diseases were the leading cause of death among Afghan children, and malnutrition affected 15 to 20 per cent of all children under the age of five. Only 5 per cent of the rural population and at best 40 per cent of the urban population had access to safe drinking water. In the past two years, Afghanistan had had typhoid and cholera epidemics, while pneumonia threatened the majority of children.

In response to the October 1995 United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Emergency Humanitarian Aid Rehabilitation Assistance to Afghanistan [YUN1995,p.915], which covered the period 1 October 1995 to 30 September 1996, a total of $60.1 million had been pledged/contributed as at 16 October 1996. The Appeal was extended for three months, to 31 December 1996, focusing on emergency winter relief needs, with particular attention to urgent humanitarian requirements for the most needy people in the capital of Kabul. A total of $10.4 million, later updated to $11.2 million, was requested to carry out activities in the areas of food aid ($6,500,000), mine clearance ($3,000,000), non-food aid, such as blankets and plastic sheeting ($350,000), emergency services ($300,000) and fuel ($66,132). Included were WFP's requirements for six months, ending 31 March 1997.

In December, a Consolidated Appeal for Assistance for Afghanistan was launched, requesting a total of $133 million for the period January to December 1997 for programmes that responded to urgent needs, including basic relief, mine clearance, repatriation, assistance to the disabled, immunization, narcotics control, the provision of safe drinking water, primary health care, urban and rural recovery and income generation. The Appeal outlined a series of national programmes totalling $73,052,049, as well as programmes for the various regions: north ($8,530,986), south ($3,829,020), east ($9,875,533), west ($21,610,684), and the centre ($16,110,920) of the country.

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General reported [A/51/704] in December on emergency assistance to Afghanistan. He said humanitarian programmes continued to operate throughout the country, but current Taliban policies regarding women were having a significant impact on projects that employed women as well as on those that targeted women as direct beneficiaries. The United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Assistance (UNOCHA) continued to supervise the mine-clearance programme, the aircraft operation and the radio network, while also retaining responsibility for the management of the camps for internally displaced persons at Jalalabad. The rebuilding of rural and urban communities represented a predominant objective in UNDP.

A major priority of UN agencies and NGOs had been to create conditions that were conducive to the reintegration and resettlement of internally displaced persons. After the Taliban takeover of Kabul, an additional 9,231 persons were displaced, not including thousands displaced from Kabul since 1992 who were not living in camps. The report said that WFP had initiated food-for-work programmes, while water supply, health care and expanded educational opportunities were being provided by NGOs. On 21 October, a task force comprising UNHCR, WFP, UNICEF, Médecins sans frontières and Oxfam, under the overall coordination of UNOCHA, was set up to coordinate emergency supplies and assistance.

An estimated 2.35 million Afghans remained in exile, mostly in Pakistan and Iran. However, during the first 10 months of 1996, nearly 123,000 Afghan refugees had returned. In addition to transportation assistance and cash and in-kind repatriation grants, UNHCR provided reintegration assistance to areas of high return through quick-impact projects. The Inter-Agency Consolidated Appeal had called for $35.2 million to assist the voluntary repatriation of Afghan refugees, of which $19.8 million had been received as at 16 October 1996. For 1997, UNHCR and the Governments of Iran and Pakistan projected the return of 350,000 more Afghans.

Several parts of Afghanistan continued to suffer from severe food shortage, the Secretary-General reported. Despite many constraints, WFP provided direct assistance to nearly 1.8 million persons around the country. In collaboration with UNDP, WFP also supported the rehabilitation and reconstruction of community infrastructure.

Health programmes focused on maternal and child health, the prevention and control of communicable diseases, nutrition, immunization and the rehabilitation of the health infrastructure. The main strategy of WHO and UNICEF was to establish regional management teams composed of regional health departments, NGOs and UN agencies. An estimated 2.4 million children and 1.1 million women of childbearing age were vaccinated in 1996.

The provision of safe drinking water and the improvement of sanitation systems remained the most urgent need in rural and urban areas. UNICEF had selected six districts in five regions for water and sanitation activities, through which approximately 100,000 persons were to be provided with access to safe water.

Notwithstanding the modest level of funding FAO had received for activities in the food and agriculture sector, and despite the total collapse of rural infrastructure, the destruction of irrigation systems and the presence of mines in prime agricultural land, WFP had had remarkable success in assisting in relaunching food production, the Secretary-General reported. Although during the emergency phase initial seed supply came from neighbouring countries, since 1995 UNDP had placed great emphasis on in-country production with supervision to ensure quality control.

Mine deaths and mine-related injuries in Kabul had reportedly soared in recent months owing to the massive number of civilians moving back into former front-line territory, and were expected to rise with the onset of winter, when many people, especially children, would enter former areas of conflict in search of firewood and accidentally come across mines and unexploded ordnance. Mine-related deaths in Kabul were already estimated at one person every hour.

The Secretary-General concluded that the provision of humanitarian relief assistance was critical for the survival of the most vulnerable people of Afghanistan in the short term. To avert further worsening of the humanitarian situation during the coming winter, particularly for the poorest residents of Kabul, there was an urgent need to replenish depleted food stocks, fuel and medical supplies. Some activities, specifically involving female workers and targeting women beneficiaries, had been suspended. That, the Secretary-General said, continued to be a matter of serious concern to the United Nations, and it was hoped that the Afghan authorities concerned would respect the rights of all the Afghan people.

The Secretary-General also expressed serious concerns about the safety and security of UN staff, both local and international, following a number of incidents in Kabul since the Taliban took control in September. Some local staff had been apprehended and subjected to harassment, he said, while UN premises and some residences of international staff members had been encroached upon. He urged the authorities to exercise restraint and to respect the privileges and immunities of UN staff. Finally, the Secretary-General called on the international donor community to continue supporting the humanitarian assistance programmes and initiatives in Afghanistan.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/195 A.

Emergency international assistance for peace, normalcy and reconstruction of war-stricken Afghanistan

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 47/119 of 18 December 1992, 48/208 of 21 December 1993, 49/140 of 20 December

1994 and 50/88 A of 19 December 1995 concerning emergency international assistance for the reconstruction of war-stricken Afghanistan,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

Concerned about the continuation and recent intensification of the military confrontation in Afghanistan, threatening regional peace and stability, and the attendant displacement of families and interruptions in the process of repatriating refugees,

Deeply concerned about the massive loss of human life, the aggravated suffering of the most vulnerable groups, the destruction of property and the serious damage to the economic and social infrastructure of Afghanistan caused by seventeen years of war, and stressing the importance of a return to peace and stability for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Afghanistan, bearing in mind that the country continues to suffer from an extremely critical economic situation as a landlocked, least developed and war-stricken country,

Supporting the efforts of the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan headed by Mr. Norbert Holl to bring about the restoration of peace, normalcy and national reconciliation and the reconstruction and rehabilitation of war-stricken Afghanistan,

Deeply concerned about the problem of millions of anti-personnel landmines and unexploded ordnance in Afghanistan, which continue to prevent many Afghan refugees from returning to their villages and working in their fields, and disturbed by reports of new mines being laid,

Concerned for the well-being of the unarmed civilian population of Afghanistan, in particular of Kabul, who face a long winter possibly deprived of basic foods, fuel and medicine owing to a renewal of hostilities around the capital,

Bearing in mind the close interrelationship between ensuring peace and normalcy in Afghanistan and the ability of the country to take effective steps towards revitalizing the economy, and stressing that a cessation of armed hostilities between the warring parties in Afghanistan and political stability are indispensable if reconstruction measures are to have a lasting effect,

Affirming the urgent need to continue international action to assist Afghanistan in restoring basic services and the infrastructure of the country, and welcoming the efforts of the United Nations Development Programme and other United Nations agencies, associated bodies and other humanitarian organizations and agencies, including relevant non-governmental organizations, in this respect,

Expressing its appreciation for the assistance of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in its continuing support for the repatriation of Afghan refugees from neighbouring countries,

Reaffirming the principle of non-refoulement as contained in article 33 of the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, Expressing its gratitude to all Governments that have rendered assistance to Afghan refugees, in particular the Governments of Pakistan and the Islamic Republic of Iran, and recognizing the need for continuing international assistance for the maintenance abroad and the voluntary repatriation and resettlement of refugees and internally displaced persons,

Expressing its appreciation to the States, intergovernmental organizations and associated bodies of the United Nations, as well as to other humanitarian organizations and agencies, including relevant non-governmental organizations, that have responded positively and continue to respond to the humanitarian needs of Afghanistan, as well as to the Secretary-General for his efforts to draw the attention of the international community to the acute problems of reconstruction in Afghanistan and for mobilizing and coordinating the delivery of appropriate humanitarian assistance,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General, and endorses the observations and recommendations set out therein;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to authorize the United Nations Special Mission to Afghanistan, established under resolution 48/208, to continue its efforts to facilitate national reconciliation and reconstruction in Afghanistan;

3. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue efforts to develop plans for national reconstruction and rehabilitation beginning in areas of peace and security, on the basis of the recommendations set out in his report;

4. Calls upon the leaders of all Afghan parties to place the highest priority on national reconciliation, acknowledging the war-weariness of the Afghan people and their desire for rehabilitation, reconstruction and economic and social development;

5. Demands that all Afghan parties fulfil their obligations and honour their commitments regarding the safety and full freedom of movement of United Nations personnel and other international personnel, as well as the security of their premises in Afghanistan, and cooperate fully with the United Nations and associated bodies as well as with other humanitarian organizations and agencies in their efforts to respond to the humanitarian needs of the people of Afghanistan;

6. Calls upon all parties not to hamper the delivery of humanitarian assistance;

7. Expresses grave concern at the indiscriminate use of landmines in Afghanistan, which seriously impedes the delivery of humanitarian assistance;

8. Urgently appeals to all States, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, specialized agencies and other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to continue to provide, on a priority basis and as far as conditions on the ground permit, all possible financial, technical and material assistance for the restoration of basic services and the reconstruction of Afghanistan and the voluntary, safe and secure return of refugees and internally displaced persons, with dignity and honour, and appeals to the international financial and development institutions to assist in the planning of the reconstruction of Afghanistan;

9. Calls upon the international community to respond to the inter-agency consolidated appeal for emergency humanitarian and rehabilitation assistance for Afghanistan launched by the Secretary-General for the period from 1 January to 31 December 1997, bearing in mind the availability also of the Afghanistan Emergency Trust Fund;

10. Denounces the discrimination against girls and women and other violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in Afghanistan, and notes with deep concern possible repercussions on international relief and reconstruction programmes in Afghanistan;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session a report on the actions taken pursuant to the present resolution;

12. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session, under the cluster of items on coordination of humanitarian assistance, the item entitled "Emergency international assistance for peace, normalcy and reconstruction of war-stricken Afghanistan".

General Assembly resolution 51/195 A

57-nation draft (A/51/L.49 & Add.1); agenda item 21 (c).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: plenary 84, 87.

Explaining its position, Pakistan said that, unlike in previous years, it had not co-sponsored the resolution owing to reservations on paragraph" 10, as it did not see any justification in linking humanitarian assistance and social issues.

Democratic People's Republic of Korea

Between 30 July and 18 August 1995, torrential rains caused devastating floods in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK), resulting in major devastation for the agricultural sector. According to government data, some 360,000 hectares of arable land had been seriously damaged by the floods. Combined with low food stocks and exacerbated by hail damage at harvest time in 1994, the 1995 floods caused a very serious food deficit for the following 12 months, affecting 5.2 million people in eight of the country's nine provinces.

In June 1996, DHA launched a UN Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Flood-Related Emergency Humanitarian Assistance to the DPRK for the period 1 July 1996 to 31 March 1997, with proposed activities totalling $43,632,935. The Appeal addressed urgent needs resulting from the unprecedented flooding in 1995, focusing on requirements in the three priority sectors of food aid ($26,804,365), recovery of arable lands ($10,322,260) and restoration of health services ($5,940,310).

In July and August 1996, heavy rainfall once again caused widespread flooding in the DPRK. Damage was sustained in the south-western and northern parts of the country, with at least 116 reported killed and approximately 3 million people affected. The Government estimated this latest damage at about $1.7 billion. On 19 August, DHA urged all nations to support the June Appeal and reported that the response thus far had only been slightly more than 40 per cent.

Iraq

In 1996, DHA reported that the humanitarian situation in Iraq had been steadily deteriorating, with increasing cases of malnutrition, high mortality rates among children under the age of five, and other signs of widespread poverty. As the response to an April 1995-March 1996 Appeal had been grossly inadequate, with funding made available to the UN Consolidated Inter-Agency Humanitarian Programme amounting to only $86 million against requirements of $169 million, an Appeal for an extension of the Programme was prepared in March 1996, calling for $340,701,081 to cover humanitarian activities of UN agencies throughout the country for the period April 1996 to March 1997. The Appeal was geared towards arresting the fast-declining nutritional status of the most vulnerable population groups and the rehabilitation of the sectors of health, food production, water and sanitation, energy, education and resettlement, all contributing towards improved living conditions.

In view of the then ongoing negotiations related to the sale of Iraqi oil in exchange for relief goods, the launching of the Appeal was delayed until after a Memorandum of Understanding [S/1996/356] on the implementation of Security Council resolution 986(1995) [YUN 1995, p. 475] was signed between the United Nations and Iraq on 20 May. On 31 May, DHA appealed for $80 million to meet Iraq's most pressing humanitarian needs until resolution 986(1995) was effectively implemented. In September, DHA reported that, of that amount, $12.5 million had been made available to UN programmes and $17 million had been pledged to or received by NGOs and bilateral humanitarian programmes.

The outbreak of hostilities in northern Iraq in September further exacerbated the humanitarian situation and resulted in the displacement of some 20,000 people and the departure of an estimated additional 39,000 people for Iran. Schools, hospitals, water and sanitation systems, and government buildings had been damaged or looted, and electricity, water and public health services had been affected.

The cumulative effects of economic sanctions, hyperinflation, unemployment and a 30 per cent drop in crop production had contributed significantly to the hardship of the vulnerable population groups. The sharp decline in voluntary contributions to essential humanitarian activities frustrated the efforts of UN agencies and NGOs to address effectively the needs of the severely affected segments of the population, which included internally displaced persons and refugees, children, pregnant and lactating mothers, destitute families and families headed by women.

DHA in September outlined emergency requirements of $39,963,000 for the period from October to December 1996, to address the most pressing humanitarian needs, especially in northern Iraq, and to ensure the uninterrupted continuation of crucial humanitarian activities throughout the country until the commencement of the programme outlined in Security Council resolution 986(1995). Under the emergency programme, $18,956,000 was requested for food; $7,400,000 for the health sector; $5,307,000 for resettlement and shelter for returnees and internally displaced persons; $3,900,000 for water and sanitation; $2,500,000 for electricity; $1,100,000 for nutrition programmes; and $800,000 for education.

On 12 December, the General Assembly, in resolution 51/106, welcomed the Memorandum of Understanding between the United Nations and Iraq and urged the latter to cooperate in ensuring that medicines, health supplies, foodstuffs and other humanitarian supplies purchased with the proceeds of the sale of Iraqi petroleum and petroleum products were distributed to the Iraqi population equitably and on a non-discriminatory basis. The Assembly expressed special alarm at Iraq's policies, which discriminated between regions and prevented the equitable enjoyment of basic foodstuffs and medical supplies, and called on Iraq to cooperate with international humanitarian agencies in providing relief to those in need throughout the country.

Lebanon

Tension in southern Lebanon intensified in the first few months of 1996, with attacks by Islamic fundamentalists escalating against Israeli targets, countered by heavy Israeli bombardments (see PART ONE, Chapter VI). The conflict spread to other areas of the country, including Greater Beirut, and affected, in the main area of conflict, more than 150 towns and villages. Up to 400,000 persons were forcibly displaced, while an estimated 60,000 remained in the war zone, because they either chose to stay or were unable to leave. Fighting damaged the region's infrastructure, and caused significant damage to housing and other private property.

In response to the situation, DHA, on 19 April, launched a United Nations Flash Appeal for Internally Displaced Persons as a Result of the Emergency in Lebanon, seeking a total of $8,586,875, for food ($3,299,625), health ($2,326,000), water ($550,000) and basic supplies ($2,311,250) to assist 20,000 families, representing 100,000 to 120,000 persons in dire need. The funds requested were to cover only emergency relief and humanitarian assistance operations during the period from mid-April to mid-July and did not include provisions for the estimated 172,000 Palestinian refugees in Lebanon displaced by the situation. As at 31 May, $15.5 million—excluding in-kind contributions—had been received from donors.

Under the ceasefire understanding, a consultative group organized by the United States was to be established with a view to meeting Lebanon's reconstruction needs, including those resulting from the April violence. The consultative group, a nationally led effort, would aim to mobilize $5 billion over a five-year period, at the rate of $1 billion annually. The first year of the programme would be essentially for rehabilitation; subsequently, the emphasis would be on development.

The Secretary-General noted that the emergency rehabilitation phase was being completed and that the outlook was towards a perspective of development. He reiterated the need for strong national policies and programmes aimed at strengthening public-sector management, developing human resources, meeting basic needs (particularly of the poor), and preserving and managing the natural environment. He called on the international community to support the country's financial requirements for reconstruction through the mechanism of the planned consultative group.

In a later report [E/1997/96], the Secretary-General observed that economic activity in 1996 was characterized by a marked slowdown, with the annual growth rate falling to 4 per cent, compared to 6.5 per cent in 1995.

The scope and volume of UN activities increased by about 25 per cent in 1996 to just under $20 million: UNDP contributed $5.6 million; the World Bank, $3.8 million; and WFP, $1.7 million. A national housing and population survey and database, completed in October by the Ministry of Social Affairs with UNFPA assistance, made available data on population and development for the first time in more than 50 years.

On 16 December, a Friends of Lebanon Conference, organized by the United States in support of the reconstruction process in Lebanon, was convened in Washington, D.C. Contributions were announced of more than $1 billion; in addition, a number of countries committed themselves to making available resources amounting to $2.2 billion by the year 2000. In December, WFP closed its office and operations in Lebanon after achieving its mission, which included providing food aid to needy persons throughout the war period. The United Nations International Drug Control Programme also closed its country office, maintaining operations from a regional office to be established in Cairo, Egypt.

On 19 July, by decision 1996/237, the Economic and Social Council took note of the June report of the Secretary-General.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July, the Council adopted resolution 1996/32.

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon

Recalling General Assembly decision 48/450 of 21 December 1993,

Recalling its resolutions in which it called upon the specialized agencies and other organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to expand and intensify their programmes of assistance in response to the urgent needs of Lebanon,

Reaffirming its resolution 1995/42 of 27 July 1996,

Aware of the magnitude of the requirements of Lebanon resulting from the extensive destruction of its infrastructure, which is impeding national rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts and adversely affecting economic and social conditions,

Reaffirming the pressing need to continue to assist the Government of Lebanon in the reconstruction of the country and the recovery of its human and economic potential,

Expressing its appreciation for the efforts of the Secretary-General in mobilizing assistance for Lebanon,

1. Appeals to all Member States and to all organizations of the United Nations system to intensify their efforts with a view to considering an increase of all forms of support, including financial grants and soft loans given for the reconstruction and development of Lebanon; in particular, donor countries are requested to consider playing a full part in the consultative group on the reconstruction and rehabilitation of Lebanon, to be established;

2. Calls upon all organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to support governmental requirements for national capacity-building and institutional renewal in the areas of social reconstruction and development, environmental management, public services provision and support for private-sector development and for implementing priority field-based programmes in the rehabilitation and reintegration of displaced persons and in the reconstruction and development of Baalbeck-Hermel and the south Lebanon region;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to inform the Council at its substantive session of 1997 of the progress achieved in the implementation of the present resolution.

Activities in the Americas

Nicaragua

Report of Secretary-General. In a 2 August report [A/51/263], the Secretary-General reviewed the activities of the UN system in facilitating international assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Nicaragua.

With elections scheduled for October (see PART ONE, Chapter III), the Secretary-General stated that Nicaragua was entering a period of undeniable economic achievements: price stability had been maintained and the necessary framework for a market economy established.

Peace and democracy in the country had been progressively consolidated, which was reflected in the sharp reduction of political violence, the high level of public freedom, the increasingly independent functioning of the branches of Government, the strengthening of local authorities and the reduction and conversion of the armed forces. Nevertheless, the Secretary-General warned, the people's confidence in the political institutions was not sufficiently consolidated to guarantee stability. He ascribed that lack of trust to the fact that most people had not experienced a substantive improvement in their standard of living. A particularly alarming consequence was the difficulty of reintegrating former combatants. The Secretary-General concluded that the best way to make democracy take root in Nicaragua was by using the electoral debate to generate consensus on a long-term development strategy. The international community could not only stimulate that national debate, but also ensure that it was not stifled or limited by conditions established for the provision of international assistance.

UN bodies and agencies continued to provide support to Nicaragua in 1996. UNDP carried out activities promoting reconciliation, pacification, democratic governance, and economic and social development. It also continued to act as the secretariat of the Support Group for Nicaragua, created in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 848]. Following damage caused by hurricane Cesar, DHA coordinated relief efforts in the country.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 25 October, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/8.

International assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Nicaragua: aftermath of the war and natural disasters

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/15 of 20 November 1990, 46/109 A and B of 17 December 1991, 47/118 of 18 December 1992, 48/161 of 20 December 1993, 49/137 of 19 December 1994 and 50/132 of 20 December 1995 concerning the situation in Central America,

Recalling also its resolutions 47/169 of 22 December 1992, 48/8 of 22 October 1993, 49/16 of 17 November 1994 and 50/85 of 15 December 1995 concerning the item entitled "International assistance for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Nicaragua: aftermath of the war and natural disasters", in which it requested the international community to continue providing support to Nicaragua, taking into account the exceptional circumstances faced by that country, and requested the Secretary-General, in coordination with the Nicaraguan authorities, to provide the assistance necessary in the process of consolidation of peace,

Deeply concerned at the fact that the recent natural disasters that have occurred in Nicaragua, the burden of the foreign debt, despite its reduction and renegotiation achieved with the collaboration of the international community, and the harmful effects on its economy of the prolonged periods of rain and floods that have afflicted the Central American region impede the efforts being made by Nicaragua to overcome the consequences of war within the framework of a democracy and under the macroeconomic conditions already achieved,

Deeply concerned also at the serious effects of hurricane Cesar, which created an emergency in the affected areas, as well as the urgent requirement for humanitarian assistance and the need to restore the normal conditions of the population, recognized in its resolution 50/244 of 29 August 1996,

Taking into account the central role of all parties in Nicaragua, in particular the Government and the Nicaraguan people, in seeking lasting solutions to consolidate the achievements of their transition,

Expressing its appreciation for the work of the Support Group for Nicaragua, which, under the coordination of the Secretary-General, continues to play an active role in supporting that country's efforts towards economic recovery and social development,

Recognizing the efforts of the international community and the Government of Nicaragua to provide relief to the persons affected by the aftermath of the war and recent natural disasters,

Recognizing also the intensive efforts by the Government of Nicaragua to promote a sustained economic recovery and the considerable progress made in securing a broad social consensus by means of a process of national dialogue for the adoption of measures to lay the foundations for reconstruction and economic and social development through a comprehensive transition process that will be further consolidated with the holding of free and democratic elections in October 1996,

Taking into account the commitments adopted by the Central American Presidents at the Central American Environment Summit for Sustainable Development, through the Alliance for the Sustainable Development of Central America, and, in this context, the special attention required by Nicaragua because of its exceptional situation in order that those important commitments may begin to be implemented,

Taking note with satisfaction of the report of the Secretary-General on the measures adopted pursuant to resolution 50/85,

1. Commends the efforts made by the international community, including the organs and organizations of the United Nations system, to supplement the action undertaken by the Government of Nicaragua and by other parties concerned in the task of rehabilitation and national reconstruction as well as in providing emergency assistance;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, within existing resources, to support the efforts of the Government of Nicaragua in the affected areas, and invites Member States, organizations, specialized agencies and programmes of the United Nations to continue to provide assistance and to respond generously to the appeal issued by Nicaragua;

3. Expresses its gratitude to the Secretary-General for his report on the measures adopted pursuant to resolution 50/85;

4. Encourages the Government of Nicaragua to continue its efforts to bring about reconstruction and national reconciliation, in particular those related to poverty alleviation, economic and social development and the solution of property problems, with a view to the consolidation of a stable democracy;

5. Requests all Member States, the international funding agencies and regional, intraregional and non-governmental organizations to continue to provide, in a broad and flexible form, support to Nicaragua at the required levels, giving particular attention to that country's exceptional circumstances so as to stimulate a greater effort in the process of reconstruction, social investment, stabilization and development;

6. Expresses its gratitude to Member States, the international agencies, regional and intraregional organizations and, in particular, the Secretary-General, for their support for the explicit request of the Government of Nicaragua in connection with the technical cooperation and assistance needed in support of the general elections in Nicaragua in 1996;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the relevant organs and organizations of the United Nations system and in close cooperation with the Nicaraguan authorities, to continue to provide, within existing resources, all necessary assistance to activities for the reconstruction, stabilization and development of Nicaragua and to continue to ensure the timely, comprehensive, flexible and effective formulation and coordination of programmes of the United Nations system in Nicaragua, given the importance of those activities for the consolidation of peace, democracy and sustainable development;

8. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue to provide Nicaragua, at the request of its Government, within existing resources, with all possible assistance to support the consolidation of peace, democracy and sustainable development in such areas as caring for displaced persons, land ownership and land tenure in rural areas, appropriate care for war-disabled persons, mine clearance and the overcoming of difficulties in the restoration of the productive areas of the country, and, in general, a process of sustained economic and social recovery and development so that the peace and democracy already achieved become irreversible;

9. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the action taken to implement the present resolution;

10. Decides to consider this issue on a biennial basis, under the item entitled "Special economic assistance to individual countries or regions".

Activities in Europe

The former Yugoslavia

The General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina of December 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 544] marked a dramatic shift in the focus of humanitarian agencies, from the provision of aid in the context of open military hostilities to support for the peace process and durable solutions throughout the region of the former Yugoslavia. Activities of UN humanitarian agencies in 1996 centred on annex 7 of the Peace Agreement, relating to the return and repatriation of displaced persons and refugees—the overall responsibility of UNHCR—and on the recognition that assistance for refugees, internally displaced persons, returnees and war-affected populations within the region would continue to be necessary at least throughout 1996.

On 1 March 1996, DHA and UNHCR issued a United Nations Revised Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Slovenia, covering humanitarian needs from January to December 1996. The Appeal proposed assistance to 3.1 million beneficiaries: an estimated 525,300 refugees, 1,240,000 internally displaced persons and 1,400,000 vulnerable war-affected people. A total of $823,213,465 was sought for assistance in areas such as food and nutrition ($209,528,020); shelter, water and sanitation ($114,302,100); logistics and transport ($110,564,086); domestic needs ($92,426,300); community services and support for children in especially difficult circumstances ($44,176,300); health ($42,609,400); agriculture, crop production and livestock ($42,107,000); and refugee movements ($38,948,000). A sum of $4,695,860 was requested for mine-clearance and mine-awareness programmes.

In October, DHA released an implementation report for the period January to July 1996, on the status of programmes outlined in the Revised Consolidated Appeal. The framework and operational plan for the return of refugees and internally displaced persons and for the promotion of durable solutions in the region, as well as the overall plan for humanitarian assistance, were presented in a series of meetings convened by UNHCR and DHA, which included the first and second meetings of the Humanitarian Issues Working Group (Geneva, 16 January and 13 May), a high-level working meeting on implementation of annex 7 of the Peace Agreement (Oslo, Norway, 8 March), and a DHA-organized donor information meeting (Geneva, 15 March). In addition, a mid-term review meeting (Florence, Italy, 13 June) on the overall implementation of the Peace Agreement also provided an opportunity to discuss humanitarian programmes (see also PART ONE, Chapter V).

According to DHA, planning assumptions relating to the return and repatriation of affected persons to Bosnia and Herzegovina were not borne out by events in the first eight months of 1996. The foremost factor, DHA said, was the failure of the parties to implement fully the provisions of annex 7, particularly with regard to the freedom of movement to areas of origin. Furthermore, limited housing and essential infrastructure, as well as employment opportunities, combined with uncertainties about security, had had a chilling effect on repatriation from abroad and on return to both minority and majority areas. The bulk of rehabilitation efforts during the review period were of an emergency nature, implemented primarily through UNHCR, the United States Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance, the European Community Humanitarian Office (ECHO), UN organizations, NGOs and the multinational Implementation Force (IFOR). UNHCR implemented a shelter programme to support the procurement and distribution of materials to internally displaced persons and returnees, enabling them to make immediate basic repairs to render habitable their dwellings and thereby support return.

Although UN humanitarian efforts focused primarily on Bosnia and Herzegovina (with $500 million budgeted), considerable assistance continued to be provided to refugees in Croatia ($117 million), the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia ($105 million) and, to a lesser extent, Slovenia ($2 million) and the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia ($6 million). In Croatia, the United Nations continued to focus on support for refugees in collective centres throughout the country and on activities to assist displaced and war-affected groups in Eastern Slavonia. Other concerns included the situation of the Serb minority in the region of former Sectors North and South, and the repatriation of Serb refugees in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to that area.

In the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the search for durable solutions for more than 566,000 refugees proved to be difficult. Together with ECHO, WFP provided food assistance to some 310,000 refugees. UNHCR continued to promote the repatriation of refugees to Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia. It was anticipated that a citizenship law, expected to come into force in January 1997, would provide an option for some refugees to remain in the Republic. WFP, WHO, UNICEF and UNESCO pursued ongoing activities in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia as well. UNHCR maintained multi-sectoral assistance programmes aimed at refugees who had been unable to return to Bosnia and Herzegovina. An estimated 222,000 to 224,000 Bosnian internally displaced persons and refugees had either returned, relocated or repatriated by the end of August, DHA reported.

The General Assembly, in resolution 51/203 of 17 December, welcomed the efforts of UN agencies, NGOs and others to establish projects designed to facilitate the return of refugees and displaced persons to all regions of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Security Council, in resolution 1088(1996) of 12 December, emphasized the importance of creating conditions conducive to reconstruction and development in that country, and encouraged Member States to provide assistance for the reconstruction programme.

The Caucasus

In 1996, the overall situation in the Caucasus continued to improve, although durable political settlements had not yet been reached for the conflicts in the region and humanitarian assistance was still required in Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia. In February, DHA issued a supplement to the 1995-1996 United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for the Caucasus [YUN 1995, p. 925], which originally was to have expired in March 1996. The supplement requested $36,664,444 for the period from 1 January to 31 May 1996. It provided for a two-month extension to the 1995 Appeal to allow time for the completion of a comprehensive assessment of humanitarian needs. To review the humanitarian situation, more than 150 representatives of the humanitarian community, donors and the three Governments met at Tbilisi, Georgia (5-6 March). Participants agreed that in the light of the continuing severe humanitarian situation confronting displaced persons, refugees and other vulnerable groups, assistance was still required in all three countries of the region. The meeting noted that humanitarian assistance could not be significantly diminished unless durable political solutions to the region's conflicts were found.

In May, DHA launched a United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for the Caucasus, covering the period from June 1996 to May 1997, which reflected the results of the joint assessment, and sought to continue emergency assistance in the sectors of food aid, agriculture, shelter, sanitation, health and education for selected most-vulnerable categories of people. At the same time, UN agencies aimed to assist in building the capacity of Governments and communities to respond to emergency needs and promote self-sufficiency among people. Funding requirements for the Appeal totalled $101,017,395, with $9,397,506 for activities in the region as a whole, $24,408,123 for Armenia, $30,525,287 for Azerbaijan and $36,686,479 for Georgia. As at 30 October 1996, donors had pledged contributions of $38,974,464. Subsequently, DHA urgently called on the international community to make additional contributions.

In November, DHA conducted a mid-term review, assessing the humanitarian situation and priorities of the three countries until the end of May 1997, focusing on the transition from emergency relief to development assistance.

A survey among priority sectors of Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia showed consistent major gaps in health, education, special needs, agriculture, community support and income generation. The weak donor response to the health sector was extremely serious, and DHA called on all donors to enable UN agencies to address urgent health issues. Education, agricultural and income-generation projects were also of concern.

In Armenia, despite overall improvements in the macroeconomic performance, the numbers of vulnerable persons—about 400,000, including 100,000 refugees and internally displaced persons—remained large. Overall food supply remained poor. The Ministry of Health was still unable to support even the most basic health care programmes, and increases in communicable diseases, particularly diphtheria and polio, threatened the populace.

The immediate to short-term outlook for Azerbaijan remained precarious despite its oil production activities, as financial dividends from that resource were not expected to have an impact on the general population for several years. Although Azerbaijan continued to abide by the 1994 ceasefire agreement [YUN 1994, p. 577] with Armenia, and negotiations for a political settlement continued, there was little hope for the return of displaced persons to Nagorny Karabakh and the front-line areas after three years of exile. In the meantime, the needs of the 900,000 internally displaced, refugees and other vulnerable groups had to be addressed. An estimated 80 per cent of a total population of 7.4 million were affected by poverty.

In Georgia, improvements in most parts of the country had led humanitarian organizations to shift their programmes from emergency relief to more development-oriented, sustainable assistance. In the agricultural sector, the privatization of land had led to substantial modernization and growth. Education and health presented major challenges, however. Despite positive trends, some areas, including Abkhazia and South Ossetia, and the most vulnerable sectors of society, especially internally displaced persons, orphans and the elderly, would continue to depend on emergency aid, DHA said.

Chechnya, Russian Federation

As federal forces re-established control over large areas of Chechnya, fighting diminished and internally displaced persons began returning to their homes, in so far as they still existed. At the end of 1995, the Russian Federation requested a continuation of UN humanitarian activities, stating that 130,000 people were in need of shelter, food, clothes and medical services. The request was discussed at a UN agencies meeting (New York, 10 January 1996) and at a donors' meeting (Geneva, 11 January).

DHA in April launched a United Nations Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for Persons Displaced as a Result of the Emergency Situation in Chechnya, Russian Federation, for the period from January to December 1996, proposing a continuation of the existing programme at a reduced level until 31 December 1996, with the exception of WFP activities, which would continue until March 1997. Assistance, to be delivered at about 50 per cent of 1995 levels, would offer sufficient resources to provide displaced persons with a limited programme of shelter and food, and assist returnees and the internally displaced.

The 1996 Appeal outlined activities totalling $13,122,260 in areas such as food aid ($5,102,560); shelter, water and sanitation ($2,174,000); health ($1,259,700); domestic items ($1,002,000); and transport ($1,047,000). The 1995 Appeal had initially sought approximately $25 million, with a donor response of 90 per cent. The 1996 Appeal elicited contributions amounting to $13,150,582 as at 1 January 1997. Total 1996 humanitarian assistance for Chechnya was $36,960,940 as at the same date.

Tajikistan

Political instability and military confrontation compounded the continuing severe economic crisis in Tajikistan, which kept the country one of the poorest of the newly independent States to emerge from the former USSR. As the armed conflict between the Government and the United Tajik Opposition (UTO) intensified during 1996, the collapse of the Tajik economy and declining public and social services increased the vulnerability of large segments of the population. The worsening humanitarian situation, characterized as almost a chronic emergency, became a source of growing concern to the international community. DHA organized a UN inter-agency needs assessment mission to Tajikistan in October. The Security Council, in a Presidential statement of 20 September [S/PRST/1996/38], welcomed the Secretary-General's initiative to arrange for such a mission to determine how to respond effectively to the humanitarian situation in the country.

The mission visited Tajikistan from 6 to 16 October, determining that the country was faced with a situation of widespread need, experiencing in certain areas acute humanitarian crises. The most vulnerable groups, who could not meet their basic food and survival needs and who constituted 10 to 15 per cent of the population, required continued and immediate humanitarian assistance.

In response to the mission's findings, a UN Consolidated Inter-Agency Donor Alert on Urgent Humanitarian Needs in Tajikistan was launched in November, requesting donor support for a total of $22,203,068 in urgent humanitarian assistance for a period of six months, from 1 December 1996 to 31 May 1997. The Donor Alert highlighted the most urgent and outstanding needs for what was predicted to be a harsh winter, focusing on emergency food aid ($6,704,887), education ($4,185,000), health ($4,043,400), assistance to the agricultural sector ($2,170,000), water and sanitation ($1,570,000), shelter ($1,075,000), energy ($1,050,000), landmines and unexploded ordnance ($734,425) and assistance to the internally displaced ($389,016). Humanitarian assistance could contribute to social stability and would support the country in its difficult transition towards sustainable development, the Donor Alert noted.

In December, the Secretary-General reported [S/1996/1010] that WFP managed the single largest humanitarian assistance operation in the country; 620,000 persons, or around 12 per cent of the in-country population, were eligible for relief food assistance. UNICEF supported government vaccination activities against diphtheria, provided schools with educational material, and rendered assistance in health and nutrition. UNHCR was overseeing the repatriation of small groups of Tajik refugees from Afghanistan and Turkmenistan and continued to support a legal capacity-building training programme. A large-scale UNDP rural rehabilitation and reconstruction programme was launched. UNDP also jointly organized with the Government the first informal donors' meeting in October. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) assisted the Government in the areas of balance of payments and budget support. Plans were under way, in cooperation with UNDP, to strengthen the institutional capacity of the central banking system and the customs administration. The World Bank in early 1997 began a $10 million poverty alleviation programme, while its $50 million rehabilitation loan package had reached final approval stage. The Consultative Group meeting on Tajikistan, convened by the World Bank in October, pledged further support for long-term rehabilitation and development needs in Tajikistan.

Expressing concern over the worsening humanitarian situation in the country, the Security Council, in resolution 1089(1996), called on Member States and others concerned to respond promptly and generously to the Donor Alert.

African economic recovery and development

New Agenda for the Development of Africa

In 1996, a number of UN bodies continued to implement or monitor the implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, adopted by the General Assembly in 1991 [GA res. 46/151]. An Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole carried out a mid-term review of the New Agenda in September 1996. At an organizational session on 20 June [A/AC.251/3], it decided to recommend to the Assembly that it meet during the Assembly's fifty-first session and that its mandate be extended. The mandate of the Ad Hoc Committee was extended by the Assembly in resolution 50/160 B (see below).

The Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC), on 19 and 20 June [A/51/16 (Part II)], considered and recommended approval of the proposed medium-term plan of the New Agenda for the period 1998 to 2001 [A/51/6 (Prog. 6)]. The Assembly adopted the medium-term plan by resolution 51/219, section I.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 July, the General Assembly adopted resolution 50/160 B.

Implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 50/160 of 22 December 1995, by which an Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole of the fifty-first session of the General Assembly was established as the most appropriate mechanism to prepare the mid-term review in 1996 of the implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, and by which it was decided that the Ad Hoc Committee should meet for a period of up to seven working days in September 1996, prior to the fifty-first session of the General Assembly, to prepare the mid-term review on the basis of a report to be prepared by the Secretary-General,

Recalling also the decision of the Ad Hoc Committee, at its organizational session on 20 June 1996, to conduct the mid-term review starting from 16 September 1996 and, to that end, to recommend to the General Assembly at its fiftieth session that the Ad Hoc Committee meet during the fifty-first session of the Assembly, Decides to authorize the Ad Hoc Committee to meet during the fifty-first session of the General Assembly and, for that purpose, to extend the mandate of the Ad Hoc Committee through the fifty-first session of the Assembly.

Meeting 121

Adopted without vote

Draft by Belgium (A/50/L.75); agenda item 24.

Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole. The mid-term review of the New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s (New York, 16-20 September 1996) [A/51/48] took place against a background of rapid globalization and liberalization of the world economy, which presented opportunities and challenges as well as risks and uncertainties. For Africa, with 33 of the world's 48 least developed countries, the risk of further marginalization was real. The Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole for the Mid-term Review, established by the General Assembly in 1995 [GA res. 50/160 A], called for urgent action to support Africa's efforts to integrate fully into the global economy.

As part of the preparation for the mid-term review, the United Nations Office of the Special Coordinator for Africa and Least Developed Countries, along with Japan, co-organized a High-level Seminar on African Development (Tokyo, 27-28 August 1996), at which participants agreed on the necessity of a new common strategy for development, based on a partnership between donors, recipients and other actors in the development process.

Among other documents, the Ad Hoc Committee had before it a report [A/51/228 & Add.1] of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the New Agenda (see below), a report [A/AC.251/5] on NGOs that were participating in the work of the Ad Hoc Committee, and a report [A/51/359] of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) on the assessment of the implementation of the New Agenda.

The Ad Hoc Committee stated that an evaluation of the New Agenda from the point of view of Africa's own efforts indicated the following key areas for priority attention: economic reforms, including the effective mobilization and efficient utilization of domestic resources; promotion of the private sector and foreign direct investment; intensification of the democratization process and the strengthening of civil society; environment and development; agriculture, rural development and food security; the human dimension in development; regional and subregional co-operation and integration; and South-South co-operation. Primary responsibility for implementation of the New Agenda lay at the national level. The international community played a complementary role, by supporting adequate resource flows; solutions to Africa's debt problem; trade facilitation and market access; diversification of African economies; development assistance for capacity-building; international cooperation; and external development assistance from non-African NGOs.

An analysis of progress during the period 1992 to 1995 showed achievement in institutional and private-sector development and revealed significant variations among African countries in their economic and social performance. The Ad Hoc Committee stated that the effective and timely implementation of the New Agenda was contingent on the political will of African Governments and their commitment to allocate adequate resources to their development objectives. However, for African efforts to succeed within the time-frame of the Agenda, they should be complemented by sufficient and predictable resource flows. The System-wide Special Initiative on Africa (see below) was complementary to the New Agenda and designed to facilitate its implementation.

The Ad Hoc Committee recommended that monitoring and evaluation of the implementation of and follow-up to the New Agenda should be improved; the Office of the Special Coordinator for Africa and the Least Developed Countries, the Department of Public Information, the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA), the specialized agencies and UN funds and programmes, including the Bretton Woods institutions, should ensure that advocacy was undertaken in a strategic manner; advocacy and implementation of the New Agenda should be further reviewed in order to enhance coordination; UN agencies should ensure that the relevant recommendations of the mid-term review were integrated and implemented; the final review and appraisal of the New Agenda should be conducted in 2002 by an ad hoc committee of the whole; and the Secretary-General should bring the outcome of the mid-term review to the attention of United Nations and other organizations for follow-up action.

JIU report. By a note of 5 March [A/50/885], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly a 1995 report of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on the evaluation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s. The report concluded that, independently of the New Agenda, virtually all the agencies and organizations of the UN system had, since the mid-1980s, assigned priority to the Africa region, particularly in terms of the growing proportion of resources allocated for technical cooperation activities and humanitarian operations. At the same time, the report stressed the general lack of awareness of the existence of the New Agenda among UN field personnel in Africa, who were theoretically supposed to be at the cutting edge of its implementation. For years after its launch, JIU said, the New Agenda had so far had no impact on the ground. JIU made a number of recommendations aimed at raising awareness and promoting the New Agenda among the international community, UN organizations and the African States, thus forging a new development partnership and cooperation.

By a 17 May note [A/50/885/Add.1], the Secretary-General transmitted his comments and those of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) on the JIU report, which was considered a very interesting, useful and timely study presenting a good overview of Africa's extremely important development problems. However, the Secretary-General pointed out that while the report took account of progress made in implementing specific priority areas of the New Agenda, the analysis was limited to actions taken at the field level and did not recognize that consensus-building achieved at the international level was a direct outcome of the New Agenda. Some recommendations, he stressed, were beyond the UN system's capabilities, particularly due to resource constraints, and were not implementable. The Secretary-General also noted that the report did not sufficiently take into account the linkage between the New Agenda and the newly launched UN System-wide Special Initiative on Africa, overlooking the positive impact of the latter on the advancement of the New Agenda. CPC, on 10 and 11 June [A/51/16 (Part I)], considered and took note of the JIU report and of the comments of the Secretary-General and of ACC and endorsed some of the JIU recommendations.

UNDP action. The Executive Board of UNDP and the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA), in May, took note [E/1996/33] of a March report [DP/1996/20] of the Administrator on 1995 UNDP activities in support of the New Agenda.

eral Assembly [A/51/228] on the implementation of the New Agenda. He reviewed some critical development issues affecting the programme and recommended measures to accelerate its implementation and generally to foster sustained and sustainable growth and development in Africa. He raised a number of priority issues facing Africa in the 1990s, including: good governance; human development and capacity-building; mobilization of resources, such as domestic and foreign direct investment; and trade, commodity diversification and industrial development. In an annex to the report, the Secretary-General gave an account of actions taken and progress achieved in the implementation of the New Agenda since its adoption.

The Secretary-General reported that most African countries experienced socio-political changes that appeared to provide an opening for development, including the trend towards democratization of political systems; an increasing recognition by Governments of the important role of the private sector; the growing commitment to regional and subregional cooperation and integration; and the active participation of Africa at world conferences and summit meetings held under UN auspices. Notwithstanding the successes achieved by a number of African countries, the Secretary-General concluded that there was still a pressing need to address issues in the development process, such as the need to adopt and apply the principles of good governance; the persistent high rate of population growth and its effect on development; the gaps in national capacities for implementing development programmes; the persistent problems of civil war and displaced people; Africa's unmanageable external debt and debt-servicing obligations; the stagnation of official development assistance (ODA) and flows of foreign direct investment; and the anticipated difficulties in adapting to a globalized world economy.

To achieve the major objectives of the New Agenda and especially the target growth rate of 6 per cent, the Secretary-General stressed that it would be necessary to open Africa's production and financial sectors and to step up the drive to attract more foreign direct investment with a view to gaining access to external markets and integrating the emerging African economies more closely into the global economy. Even more crucial would be the readiness of Africa's public and private sectors, as well as households, to boost their aggregate savings rate in order to channel a substantial share of economic output towards capital investment. As the New Agenda dealt with long-term development, the Secretary-General considered a further commitment to a dynamic partnership between Africa and the international community to be vital for realizing the continent's potential in the coming years. The effective and timely implementation of the New Agenda was contingent on the political will of African Governments and their commitment to allocate resources for that purpose, the Secretary-General stated; however, for African efforts to succeed within the New Agenda timeframe, they should be complemented by adequate and assured resource flows from the international community.

In an addendum to his report [A/51/228/Add.1], the Secretary-General presented a comparative analysis, prepared by ECA, of the financial commitments entered into, against the resources actually mobilized over the period 1992 to 1995, in order to provide insights into the level of involvement and investment by African countries and the international community in the search for economic recovery and sustainable development. The analysis concluded that despite the efforts of African countries to improve their use of ODA and the expressed concern of developed countries regarding the need to support Africa's development, the total volume of ODA to Africa had, since the beginning of the decade, dropped to about $20 billion, an amount far below the $30 billion set by the New Agenda, which had expected ODA to increase by 4 per cent yearly. The various objectives of mobilizing financial resources had been only partially achieved, with investment and savings rates remaining weak, terms of trade having deteriorated and only slight improvement occurring in the development of the resources traded within the continent. In addition, factors that determined the flow of foreign direct investment had not improved sufficiently to stop Africa from being marginalized with respect to flows of such investment; the debt stock had not decreased, and even though debt service was being paid and had stabilized at around $28 billion, the amount was still triple the ceiling recommended under the New Agenda; and the volume of ODA was declining. The report pointed out that those pitfalls did not stem from lack of will or effort but rather from the failure of the African countries and the international community to implement more sustained practical measures. While it was the primary responsibility of African States to bear the bulk of their development burden by tapping their own financial resources as a matter of priority, the rigid international economic environment, the domestic economic hardship and the lukewarm disposition of some creditors to adopt radical measures constituted obstacles to the mobilization of financial resources and to the development of Africa. The Secretary-General concluded that most African countries would not be able to implement the economic reforms required for development without further domestic and foreign financial resources, nor could Africans and the international community afford to see yet another international initiative for Africa's socio-economic recovery and development fail.

UNCTAD action. The Trade and Development Board, at its October session, had before it an August report [TD/B/43/6] on UNCTAD's contribution to the implementation of the New Agenda and the role of UNCTAD in implementing the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa (see below). The report covered relevant UNCTAD activities in the areas of policy research and analysis, as well as technical cooperation in the areas of trade, debt, commodities, investment, science and technology, shipping, ports and multimodal transport, insurance, economic cooperation among developing countries, least developed countries and landlocked developing countries. Despite several years of implementing structural adjustment programmes, Africa as a region had yet to show tangible signs of a strong recovery and sustained growth, according to the report. The region's share of both world output and trade continued to shrink, whereas its share of world population continued to rise. In addition to the adverse impact of political instability, ethnic conflicts and the vagaries of weather, economic performance in many countries continued to be characterized by low productivity, management difficulties, failure to diversify from a narrow production and export base, and high vulnerability to the external economic environment.

In its agreed conclusions, the Board [A/51/15 (vol. II)] noted that the efforts of African countries in various areas had resulted in significant improvement in their overall economic performance, with the number of countries recording negative growth dropping to three in 1995, and those achieving the target of 6 per cent annual growth increasing to 12 by the end of 1995. It also noted the support shown by the international community through debt relief, extension of trade preferences, export compensatory mechanisms, resource flows to Africa and the various bilateral and multilateral technical and financial assistance programmes. The Board reaffirmed the agreed conclusions of the mid-term review and called on all partners in development to implement as soon as possible the recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee. It also called on UNCTAD to fulfil its responsibilities within the framework of the New Agenda.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 6 December, the Assembly adopted resolution 51/32.

Mid-term review of the implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolution 46/151 of 18 December 1991, the annex to which contains the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s,

Recalling its resolutions 48/214 of 23 December 1993 and 49/142 of 23 December 1994 on the New Agenda,

Recalling also its resolutions 50/160 A and B of 22 December 1995 and 16 July 1996 establishing the Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole of the General Assembly for the Mid-term Review of the Implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s,

Noting that the mid-term review of the implementation of the New Agenda has been an occasion for an in-depth assessment of the actions taken in the implementation of the New Agenda and the measures needed to accelerate its implementation during the remaining period of the decade and beyond,

Recognizing that while there was an overall improvement in economic performance in some African countries, in the continent as a whole many of the critical social conditions and economic problems which led to the adoption of the United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-1990, and the New Agenda in 1986 and 1991, respectively, still exist and have worsened in some countries;

Recognizing also, as noted in the mid-term review, that poverty and unemployment are expected to increase substantially in Africa, leading to the need for African countries and the international community to take urgent measures to attain the objectives of the New Agenda,

Taking note of the reports of the Secretary-General concerning the mid-term review of the implementation of the New Agenda,

Taking note also of the document of the Organization of African Unity concerning the mid-term review of the implementation of the New Agenda, the outcome of the High-level Seminar on African Development, held at Tokyo on 27 and 28 August 1996, and the submission by the non-governmental organizations,

Noting the contribution made by individual Governments and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to the work of the Ad Hoc Committee,

1. Adopts the conclusions of the mid-term review of the implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, consisting of an assessment of the responses and measures to accelerate the implementation of the New Agenda, as set forth in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole of the General Assembly for the Mid-term Review of the Implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, highlighting key areas for priority attention, inter alia: (a) economic reforms, including the effective mobilization and efficient utilization of domestic resources; (b) the promotion of private sector and foreign direct investment; (c) the intensification of the democratic process and the strengthening of civil society; (d) environment and development; (e) resource flows; (f) solution of Africa's debt problem; (g) trade facilitation and market access; (h) the diversification of African economies; (i) the improvement of physical and institutional infrastructure and social and human resource development; and (j) women in development;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to give the outcome of the mid-term review the widest publicity to all Member States and in particular to sensitize the heads of the agencies and institutions of the United Nations system, including the Bretton Woods institutions, and the donor community to the measures and recommendations contained therein;

3. Requests all States, international and multilateral organizations, financial institutions and development funds, the organs and programmes of the United Nations system and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to take, as a matter of urgency, concrete and effective measures in order to implement fully the recommendations contained in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee and to do so in a co-ordinated manner;

4. Reaffirms the importance of effective follow-up, monitoring and evaluation arrangements for the implementation of the New Agenda at the national, regional and global levels, and in this regard requests the Secretary-General to strengthen and improve follow-up, monitoring and evaluation of the implementation of the New Agenda;

5. Recognizes the complementary role of the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa in the implementation of the New Agenda, including the mobilization of adequate resources, while avoiding unnecessary duplication of activities;

6. Requests the Secretary-General, pending the final review and appraisal of the New Agenda in the year 2002, to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third and fifty-fifth sessions a progress report on the implementation of the present resolution under an item entitled "Implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, including measures and recommendations agreed upon at its mid-term review".

UN System-wide Special Initiative on Africa

The United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa was launched on 15 March 1996 to provide renewed impetus to Africa's development. Its 14 components were grouped into five main themes: water, food security, capacity-building for governance, social and human development, including in particular basic health and education for all, and resource mobilization. A lead UN agency or agencies were to be responsible for resource mobilization and for coordinating implementation of each of the five major components, while ACC was to monitor the implementation of the Special Initiative through a steering committee, co-chaired by the UNDP Administrator and the Executive Secretary of ECA. The text of the Special Initiative was annexed to the annual overview report of ACC for 1995 [E/1996/18].

In a May report [E/AC.51/1996/6 & Corr.1], the Secretary-General called the Special Initiative the most significant mobilization of support ever by the United Nations for the development of a continent's people and its largest coordinated action. He estimated that implementation would require up to $25 billion over a period of 10 years, not including food security, and said that financing would come mainly from a redirection of existing resources at the national and international levels, as well as from new resources. The Secretary-General indicated that the Special Initiative, prepared and launched by ACC, complemented the UN New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s (see above) and was a vehicle for implementing the revised System-wide Plan of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development, adopted by CPC in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 817].

CPC action. In June [A/51/16 (Part I)], CPC took note of the Secretary-General's progress report and recognized the role of the Special Initiative in implementing the Plan of Action. While welcoming the potential of the Special Initiative as an operational wing of and a complement to the New Agenda, CPC expressed strong concern about the prevailing trend to flood Africa with new initiatives that were hardly implemented. Noting that the UN organizations, including, in particular, the World Bank, had committed themselves to coordinating their efforts and pooling resources, making use of their means for media awareness through the Special Initiative, CPC urged them to produce tangible results and requested a report on the implementation of the Special Initiative for its spring session in 1997.

ACC consideration. Following the launching of the Special Initiative, ACC focused on arrangements that would ensure its effective and expeditious implementation. At its first regular session of 1996 in April, the ACC noted that significant progress had already been made in several components of the Initiative. Lead and cooperating agencies were formulating implementation strategies in cooperation with African Governments. ACC members considered that the financial aspects of the Special Initiative needed further clarification and elaboration. The figure of $25 billion represented approximate resource requirements for those components of the Initiative for which such estimates had been prepared. Four components—education, health, water and governance—accounted for over 95 per cent of such external requirements. Total external resource requirements were expected to be larger, bearing in mind that there were several programmes under key components, such as food security, that had not yet been fully developed or costed. ACC welcomed the joint World Bank/International Monetary Fund (IMF) initiative to create a framework of action to resolve the debt problems of the heavily indebted poor countries.

The co-chairs of the ACC Steering Committee of the Special Initiative briefed ACC on the conclusions of its fifth meeting (New York, 20 September). They noted that there was increasing evidence of African interest and involvement in the Initiative, initially reflected in the participation of a number of heads of State and Government in its launch in March, and more recently in the endorsements extended to the Initiative at meetings of ministers of health and other sectors of a number of African Governments. They further noted that the current mid-term review of the New Agenda (see above) provided a very useful opportunity to reinforce linkages between the Special Initiative and the New Agenda.

The co-chairs reported on the increasingly effective inter-agency collaboration developing around the Special Initiative, as well as progress in the preparation of sector investment programmes in education, health, water and governance in 13 countries. They stressed that an important next step was the formulation of a common communication strategy to guide further work in connection with the Special Initiative. With respect to the priority area of basic education for all African children, the caucus of African ministers of education had adopted an implementation protocol jointly prepared by the World Bank and UNESCO.

ACC, at its second regular session in October [ACC/1996/20], called for prompt implementation of the work programme endorsed by the Steering Committee. It also urged that more focused attention be given to a number of priority dimensions of the Special Initiative, including sustainable livelihoods in environmentally marginal areas, poverty alleviation, human-rights and gender, areas in which programme development did not yet appear to be sufficiently advanced. ACC welcomed indications of increased African interest and involvement in the Special Initiative at the international level, and noted that some of the questions raised earlier about the added value of the Special Initiative were being progressively overcome.

ECA consideration. At its May 1996 session, the Conference of Ministers of ECA had before it a report [E/ECA/CM.22/5] describing the setting and content of the Special Initiative and identifying methods of implementing and funding it. The Conference endorsed [E/1996/35 (res. 811(XXXI))] the Special Initiative and noted that its priorities were congruent with those elaborated in the Cairo Agenda for Action for launching Africa's economic and social development, approved by the OAU Council of Ministers in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 989], as well as with the New Agenda. It further noted that the Initiative represented concrete and coordinated actions aimed at maximizing support for Africa's development within the framework of the New Agenda. The Conference called on the international community, particularly the UN system, to extend effective support to African countries to enable them fully to realize the objectives and targets of the Special Initiative.

ECA adopted the report on the Special Initiative and brought the matter to the attention of the Economic and Social Council.

UNDP action. The Executive Board of UNDP/UNFPA, at its annual session in May [E/1996/33], discussed the role of UNDP in monitoring the implementation of the Special Initiative. UNDP, which had primary responsibility for the segment on governance, would report to ACC through its Administrator, a co-chair of the Steering Committee. The Board took note of a March report [DP/1996/20] of the Administrator on the New Agenda, which also dealt with the Special Initiative; the latter, the Administrator believed, would give fresh impetus to the New Agenda, as the UN system, in partnership with African countries, the Bretton Woods institutions and bilateral donors, would commit itself to working in a synergistic manner to support an unprecedented set of concrete programme actions designed to maximize African development efforts.

UNCTAD action. In an August report [TD/B/43/6], UNCTAD briefly described its role in the implementation of the Special Initiative. It would act as lead agency for the "trade access opportunities" component, in consultation and co-operation with other agencies such as UNDP, the World Trade Organization (WTO), the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the World Bank, the African Development Bank, the International Trade Centre (ITC), UNESCO and IMF. UNCTAD would also ensure close coordination between this component and the joint ITC/UNCTAD/WTO integrated technical assistance programme. It also planned to cooperate in several other priority components of the Special Initiative, such as information technology, South-South cooperation, poverty reduction and debt relief.

In October, the Trade and Development Board identified other areas in which UNCTAD could play a role. It invited donors to make extra-budgetary contributions to finance the required technical assistance programmes. At a panel meeting held by the Board on the African situation, at which ministers and ambassadors were represented, participants welcomed the Special Initiative. They identified a number of domestic and external factors responsible for Africa's continued severe problems and put forward suggestions for action to reverse that trend. A report on the panel's work was annexed to the Board's agreed conclusions on the subject [A/51/15 (vol. II) (agreed conclusions 436(XLIII))].

Special economic assistance

Djibouti

The Secretary-General, in a July report [A/51/213], said that Djibouti's difficulties and problems were related first and foremost to the conflicts in the Horn of Africa, which had created a large movement of displaced populations and reduced the country's revenues as a result of loss of trade and services. In addition, recurring emergency situations brought about by drought, floods and epidemics, combined with large-scale destruction of livestock, water sources, and health and education facilities as a result of the war in the country, had considerably increased emergency and humanitarian needs. UN organizations involved in Djibouti included UNICEF, UNESCO, UNDP, UNHCR, the World Bank, WFP and WHO. The Secretary-General's report provided a brief description of progress made in the reconstruction and development of Djibouti.

According to the report, the growing social and economic problem of the refugees was affecting not only general security, but also the health sector. UN organizations in the country constantly dealt with that problem by developing activities related to repatriation, food distribution and education; initiating regrouping efforts to resettle refugees in camps; and clean-up operations in the capital. As a result of a major repatriation programme to Ethiopia and a stricter national policy, the pressure from refugees had been alleviated somewhat, but the problem of displaced persons resulting from civil strife during the years 1991 to 1993 remained, the Secretary-General said. As for the remaining refugees, most of whom were of Somali origin, UNHCR would continue to seek durable solutions, the most feasible of which would require regional agreements and a formal commitment of the countries concerned; it could be facilitated, in the Secretary-General's view, by the UN system, in close cooperation with the Djibouti-based Intergovernmental Authority for Drought and Development.

There was an immediate need for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of damaged or destroyed social infrastructures in all regions affected by civil strife, the Secretary-General stated. In order to initiate that process, and before serious efforts were made to restore public services, displaced populations had to be encouraged to return to the towns and villages they had left. The Secretary-General estimated that at least $30 million was urgently needed to mitigate the socio-economic impact of the war. Well-coordinated action by local authorities and the active participation of returnees, including demobilized soldiers, might secure the financial and technical support needed for quick and effective rehabilitation activities, which would also alleviate the critical unemployment situation. Food aid would be an incentive for former soldiers and returnees to participate in rehabilitation activities. An international presence would be required to provide technical support and a sense of security and confidence. UNDP could serve as the coordinating body for a cross-mandate operation on behalf of all UN agencies. The Secretary-General called on the international community for financial support to enable him to assist the urgent socio-economic programmes for Djibouti's reconstruction and development.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/30 E.

Assistance for the reconstruction and development of Djibouti

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 50/58 F of 12 December 1995 and its previous resolutions on economic assistance to Djibouti,

Recalling also the Paris Declaration and the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, adopted by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries on 14 September 1990, as well as the mutual commitments undertaken on that occasion and the importance attached to the follow-up to that Conference,

Noting that the economic and social development efforts of Djibouti, which is included in the list of least developed countries, are constrained by the extremes of the local climate, in particular cyclical droughts and torrential rains and floods such as those that occurred in 1989 and 1994, and that the implementation of reconstruction and development programmes, as well as of the demobilization programme, requires the deployment of substantial resources which exceed the real capacity of the country,

Noting with concern that the situation in Djibouti has been made worse by the deteriorating situation in the Horn of Africa and in particular in Somalia, and noting the presence of tens of thousands of refugees and persons displaced from their countries, which has, on the one hand, placed serious strains on the fragile economic, social and administrative infrastructure of Djibouti and, on the other, caused serious security problems in the country,

Noting the difficult economic and financial situation of Djibouti resulting in part from the number of priority development projects that have had to be suspended in view of serious developments in the international situation and in part from the prolonged effects of the previous regional conflicts, notably in Somalia, which have disrupted services, transport and trade and which are draining the State of most of its revenues,

Noting with satisfaction that the Government of Djibouti has begun to implement the structural adjustment programme, and convinced of the necessity to support that financial recovery programme and to take effective measures to alleviate the consequences, in particular the social consequences, of that adjustment policy, which is in the course of implementation, in order that the country may achieve appreciable economic results,

Noting with gratitude the support provided to relief and rehabilitation operations by various countries and by intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Declares its solidarity with the Government and people of Djibouti, who have had to face critical challenges owing, in particular, to the scarcity of natural resources and the continuing critical situation in the Horn of Africa, especially in Somalia;

2. Welcomes the implementation by the Government of Djibouti of the structural adjustment programme and, in that context, appeals to all Governments, international financial institutions, the specialized agencies of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations to respond in an appropriate manner, as a matter of urgency, to the financial and material needs of the country;

3. Requests the donor community to participate actively and generously in the round table on Djibouti which will be organized in February 1997 in order to help that country to rebuild its economy, restore its basic and social infrastructure and develop its human resources;

4. Considers that implementation of the demobilization programme and of the national rehabilitation plan and reinforcement of democratic institutions require appropriate assistance in the form of financial and material support;

5. Expresses its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his efforts to make the international community aware of the difficulties faced by Djibouti;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his efforts to mobilize the resources necessary for an effective tive programme of financial, technical and material assistance to Djibouti;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to prepare a study of the progress made with regard to economic assistance to Djibouti, in time for the question to be considered by the General Assembly at its fifty-second session.

States neighbouring South Africa

In October, the Secretary-General reported [A/51/528] on special assistance to front-line States and other States neighbouring South Africa, covering activities undertaken by Member States and UN organizations to enable those States to overcome the negative consequences of past acts of destabilization in the region. As at 18 October, 4 Member States and 14 organizations had replied to the request for pertinent information.

The Secretary-General also transmitted a letter [A/50/1001] of 8 July from Botswana forwarding a communique issued at Gaborone, Botswana, on 28 June by the Summit of Heads of State or Government of the Southern African Development Community (SADC), launching an SADC Organ on Politics, Defence and Security.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 13 December, the General Assembly adopted decision 51/431.

Special assistance to front-line States and other neighbouring States

At its 84th plenary meeting, on 13 December 1996, the General Assembly, on the proposal of the Congo, recalling its resolution 49/21 M of 20 December 1994, having considered the report of the Secretary-General on special assistance to front-line States and other neighbouring States, and welcoming the establishment of the Southern African Development Community Organ on Politics, Defence and Security, which, therefore, effectively supersedes the front-line States, decided:

(a) To express its appreciation to the Secretary-General for his efforts regarding assistance to the front-line States and other neighbouring States;

(b) To note with appreciation the support being rendered to the Southern African Development Community by donor countries, organizations of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations;

(c) Strongly to urge the international community to continue to provide, in a timely and effective manner, the financial, material and technical assistance necessary to enhance the collective capacity of the countries of the Southern African Development Community in their efforts for the reconstruction, rehabilitation and development of their economies;

(d) To discontinue consideration of this question under the item entitled "Strengthening of the coordination of humanitarian and disaster relief assistance of the United Nations, including special economic assistance" and to consider all related matters in the context of its consideration of the question of cooperation between the United Nations and the Southern African Development Community.

Yemen

In the aftermath of the 1994 military conflict in Yemen, DHA continued to assist the country in clearing landmines, UNDP reported [E/1996/SR.41] to the Economic and Social Council on 19 July. Almost 35 per cent of the mines had been cleared, and Yemeni personnel had been trained to complete the demining operation. In addition, UNDP was funding a project to rehabilitate the water supply and sanitation systems in affected areas. In view of the frequency of natural disasters in the country, a project had been formulated to establish a national authority for disaster preparedness and management. Describing the activities of UN agencies, including assistance to Eritrean, Ethiopian and Somali refugees in the country, the UNDP representative concluded that, while the current level of assistance had enabled Yemen to cope with the most recent natural disasters, it was increasingly apparent that long-term capacity-building would have to be developed in order to manage future disasters and provide early warning. On 19 July, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1996/237, took note of the oral report.

States affected by sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)

Following the conclusion of the 1995 General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Annexes Thereto [YUN 1995, p. 521], the Security Council, in 1996, suspended the sanctions regime against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), opening the way for the gradual resumption of economic relations with, and especially transit traffic through, the country. The Secretary-General in September reported [A/51/356] that the suspension had considerably eased the burden on the neighbouring and other States of the region that had been adversely affected by the implementation of economic sanctions over the last three and a half years.

Assistance by the UN system addressed balance-of-payments support, transport and infrastructure development and trade and investment promotion. The World Bank implemented wide-ranging programmes of balance-of-payments support, project financing and technical cooperation. IMF reported that its total disbursements from May 1992 to May 1996 to eight affected countries—Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Romania, Slovakia, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Uganda and Ukraine—amounted to more than $3 billion, an increase of $710 million during the past year. Issues of transport and infrastructure development, and of trade and investment promotion, were addressed through special initiatives and assistance arrangements under the auspices of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, the European Union and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development and in cooperation with other organizations. UNDP proceeded with a project to improve alternative land routes around the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, a major UNDP-sponsored inter-agency programming mission identified 46 projects in March 1996 at a total cost of $ 112 million; a first phase of assistance, under a rehabilitation and development programme, was approved in May.

The Secretary-General noted the particular importance of enhancing regional economic cooperation following the suspension of the sanctions regime, and of facilitating the participation of the affected countries in the reconstruction effort in the former Yugoslavia. Neighbouring and other affected countries should be encouraged to participate more actively in international support for the rehabilitation, reconstruction and development efforts in the former Yugoslavia, he said. As the focus of the UN humanitarian assistance programme shifted from a four-year emergency relief operation to providing for the return of refugees and displaced persons, longer-term support projects opened new possibilities for suppliers from the neighbouring and other affected countries. In implementation of the economic reconstruction programmes for Bosnia and Herzegovina, co-financing of projects under the auspices of multilateral institutions should facilitate and increase transparency in the procurement of goods and services, including from neighbouring countries, and in the use of funds for investment and recurrent costs in the region, the Secretary-General said. The international community should accelerate disbursement of funds on flexible and concessional terms which, in turn, would help restore and promote further economic cooperation with and among all the States of south-eastern Europe as an important contribution to stability and prosperity in the region.

By a note verbale of 11 July to the Secretary-General, Bulgaria transmitted [A/51/211-S/1996/551] the Sofia Declaration on Good-neighbourly Relations, Stability, Security and Cooperation in the Balkans, adopted at a meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the countries of south-eastern Europe (Sofia, Bulgaria, 6-7 July).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 5 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/30 A.

Economic assistance to States affected by the implementation of the Security Council resolutions imposing sanctions on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

The General Assembly,

Recalling the provisions of Articles 25, 48, 49 and 50 of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling also Security Council resolutions 724(1991) of 15 December 1991 and 843(1993) of 18 June 1993,

Recalling further Security Council resolution 1074(1996) of 1 October 1996 terminating the measures suspended by resolution 1022(1995) of 22 November 1995 and imposed by or reaffirmed in resolutions 757(1992) of 30 May 1992, 787(1992) of 16 November 1992, 820(1993) of 17 April 1993, 942(1994) and 943(1994) of 23 September 1994, 988(1995) of 21 April 1995, 992(1995) of 11 May 1995, 1003(1995) of 5 July 1995 and 1015(1995) of 15 September 1995,

Stressing the importance of the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the annexes thereto initialled on 21 November 1995 in Dayton, Ohio, and signed in Paris on 14 December 1995,

Paying tribute to the neighbouring States and the other States in the region affected by the sanctions, the Mission of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, the European Union/Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe Sanctions Coordinator, the Sanctions Assistance Missions Communication Center and the Sanctions Assistance Missions, the Western European Union operation on the Danube, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization/Western European Union Sharp Guard operation in the Adriatic Sea and the Danube Commission, for their significant contribution to the achievement of a negotiated peace,

Reaffirming its resolutions 48/210 of 21 December 1993, 49/21 A of 2 December 1994 and 50/58 E of 12 December 1995 on economic assistance to States affected by the implementation of the Security Council resolutions imposing sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia,

Taking note of the Sofia Declaration on Good-neighbourly Relations, Stability, Security and Cooperation in the Balkans, adopted by the meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Countries of South-Eastern Europe, held at Sofia on 6 and 7 July 1996,

Taking note also of the fact that some of the States in the region affected by the sanctions have expressed their views on the issue,

Commending the efforts of the international financial institutions, other international organizations and those States which responded to the appeal of the Secretary-General and the donor conferences held at Brussels in December 1995 and April 1996 by taking into consideration the special economic problems arising from the implementation of the sanctions in their support programmes and specific activities for the affected States,

Commending also the continuing attention paid by intergovernmental and regional organizations, in particular the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe and the European Union, as well as through the Central European Initiative, to the needs of the affected States for assistance in developing regional transport and communication infrastructures,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General, entitled "Supplement to An Agenda for Peace: position paper of the Secretary-General on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations", and in particular its chapter III.E on the issue of United Nations sanctions,

Taking note also of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 50/58 E and of the conclusions and recommendations contained therein,

1. Expresses concern at the persisting special economic problems confronting States in the period following the lifting of the sanctions, in particular the States that border the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the other Danube riparian States and all other States affected by the consequences of the severance of their economic relations with the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the disruption of traditional transport and communication links in that part of Europe during the period when the sanctions were in force and their long-term adverse impact on the economies of those States;

2. Reaffirms the need for a continuing concerted response from the international community to deal in a more effective manner with the special economic problems of the affected States in the period following the lifting of the sanctions in view of their magnitude and of the adverse impact of the sanctions on the economy of those States;

3. Renews its invitation to the international financial institutions and in particular the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development to continue to pay special attention to the economic problems of the affected States in the period following the lifting of the sanctions and to consider ways and means for mobilizing and providing resources for mitigating the continuing negative impact of the consequences of the sanctions on the efforts of the affected States for financial stabilization and for the development of regional transport and communications infrastructure;

4. Renews its request to the competent organs, programmes and United Nations specialized agencies to take into consideration the special needs of the affected States in programming their development activities and to consider the provision of assistance from their special programme resources;

5. Renews its appeal to all States, on an urgent basis, to provide technical, financial and material assistance to the affected States in the period following the lifting of the sanctions to mitigate the continuing adverse impact of the sanctions on their economies, including, inter alia, through the consideration of measures for the promotion of exports, investments and development of private enterprises in the affected States;

6. Encourages the States of the region affected by the implementation of the Security Council sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to continue the process of multilateral regional cooperation outlined in the Royaumont Platform for Action of the European Union in 1995 and launched by the meeting of the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Countries of South-Eastern Europe, held at Sofia on 6 and 7 July 1996, in such fields as the realization of cross-border infrastructure projects and promotion of trade and investments, thus alleviating the adverse impact of the sanctions lifted under the terms of Security Council resolution 1074(1996);

7. Urges the organizations and specialized agencies of the United Nations system and other organizations involved to take appropriate steps in order to broaden access for suppliers, particularly from States which have been affected by the implementation of the sanctions, to participate actively in the post-conflict reconstruction and rehabilitation of the former Yugoslavia;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to take all appropriate measures to increase the opportunity for the affected countries to participate actively in the post-conflict reconstruction, rehabilitation and development of the former Yugoslavia;

9. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue to seek, on a regular basis, information from States, regional organizations and the concerned organs and agencies of the United Nations system on action taken to alleviate the special economic problems of these States in the period following the lifting of the sanctions, and to report thereon to the Security Council, as well as to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session a report on the implementation of the present resolution.

Disaster relief

In 1996, the Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) responded to 60 natural disasters and two technological disasters in 46 countries. It issued 27 international disaster appeals, resulting in $84 million in cash and in-kind contributions from the international community, and provided emergency cash grants of $680,000 to seven countries. Major disasters included: snowstorms, an earthquake and floods in China, a hurricane in Costa Rica and Nicaragua, heavy floods in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and in Yemen, and a spill of wastes from a large copper mine in the Philippines. The Joint United Nations Environment Programme/DHA Environment Unit responded to requests for assistance from the Philippines, the Russian Federation, Rwanda and Slovenia.

Natural disasters, such as storms, floods, landslides and earthquakes, killed 14,000 persons and caused $7.9 billion in direct damage in 1996. DHA estimated total economic losses from natural disasters during the year at some $50 billion, roughly the annual average for the past 25 years. United Nations disaster assessment and coordination teams—consisting of DHA relief coordination officers and emergency response officers seconded by Governments—conducted seven missions in response to natural disasters.

International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/117 A [YUN 1995, p. 940], the Secretary-General, on 11 July, presented a report [A/51/186-E/1996/80] on the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction (1990-2000), containing an overview of critical needs for enhancing the programme and coordination of the 1989 International Framework of Action for the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction [GA res. 44/236]. The Secretary-General stressed that policy makers should recognize disaster reduction as an investment in the protection of national assets, and that the international community's commitment to the Decade had to be translated into concrete support in the form of human and financial resources.

Reviewing the implementation of disaster-reduction programmes, the Secretary-General stated that progress had not been uniform or consistent throughout the world. He noted, however, that the increasing diversity and variety of initiatives in the field of disaster reduction should be appreciated and capitalized upon. Sharing experiences and information among industrialized and developing countries provided the rationale for bringing together a wide range of professions and representatives of the Decade. Meetings sponsored jointly by regional institutions and Governments were held in South America, in the Commonwealth of Independent States and in the Pacific. A Pan-Pacific Conference on Natural Hazards (Vancouver, Canada, 29 July-2 August), organized by private groups, industry, NGOs and national and local government officials, brought together participants involved in disaster-reduction activities from North and South America, Asia and the Pacific.

In many countries, often with external support, the policy and technical requirements of disaster reduction were addressed at the national level, which resulted in national programmes such as risk assessment, the establishment of designated national authorities to address disaster reduction and the conduct of inventories of professional resources available within a country. More countries were analysing their human resource requirements for disaster mitigation and taking measures to provide education and training. In the private sector, both small, local enterprises and major international corporations were more aware of the need to reduce their vulnerability to natural disasters and to develop countermeasures that ensured their business continuity. The ultimate success of the Decade rested with the actions and commitments of international, national and local community partners. Options for future forms of organization after the Decade needed to be defined soon, possibly through the establishment of an appropriate private facility, such as an international NGO, a foundation underwritten by Governments and other concerned bodies, or an internationally recognized centre accommodated by a university or technical institution.

During 1996, the secretariat of the Decade continued to service the Framework for Action; promoted the concept of the Decade through public information, awareness-raising and training; and was actively involved in the relevant legislative and programme activities of the United Nations. Reviewing the Trust Fund for the Decade, the Secretary-General reported that the annual requirement of the secretariat of the Decade for the execution of its core functions amounted to $4.2 million. While traditional donors had continued their support, no additional funding commitments had resulted from a special appeal made by the Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs in January.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 26 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/45.

International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction

The Economic and Social Council, Recalling its resolution 1995/47 B of 27 July 1995 and General Assembly resolution 50/117 A of 20 December 1995,

Mindful of the continuing threat of natural disasters and similar emergency situations to vulnerable populations and communities worldwide,

Reaffirming the commitment to the effective implementation of the goals and overall objectives of the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction,

Recognizing the need for concrete measures to reduce the vulnerability of societies to natural disasters, with their attendant loss of human life and heavy physical and economic damage, in particular in developing countries, among which least developed countries, small island States and land-locked countries are especially vulnerable,

Reaffirming its commitment to the full implementation of the Yokohama Strategy for a Safer World: Guidelines for Natural Disaster Prevention, Preparedness and Mitigation, containing the Principles, the Strategy and the Plan of Action, especially with regard to its call for international cooperation in the field of disaster prevention, preparedness and mitigation,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction;

2. Reiterates the distinct character of the Decade as a framework for action that facilitates the effective integration of disaster reduction into planning at all levels, in particular at the national and community levels;

3. Reaffirms that disaster reduction forms an integral part of sustainable development strategies and national development plans of vulnerable countries and communities;

4. Calls upon States, relevant intergovernmental bodies and all others involved in the Decade to participate actively in its financial and technical activities, including the need to share the necessary technology to prevent, reduce and mitigate disasters, in order to ensure the implementation of the International Framework of Action for the Decade;

5. Underlines the need for the United Nations system to ensure the integration of the Yokohama Strategy for a Safer World: Guidelines for Natural Disaster Prevention, Preparedness and Mitigation and its Plan of Action in the coordinated approach taken to the follow-up to all recent major United Nations conferences and summits and to the implementation of their respective plans of action;

6. Stresses the need for synergy between the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States and the Yokohama Strategy and its Plan of Action as they relate to natural disaster reduction;

7. Recommends that adequate consideration be given to the International Framework of Action for the Decade as part of the evaluation and overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21 in 1997.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/185.

International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 44/236 of 22 December 1989, 48/188 of 21 December 1993, 49/22 A of 2 December 1994, 49/22 B of 20 December 1994 and 50/117 A and B of 20 December 1995, and Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/45 of 26 July 1996,

Expressing its solidarity with the people and countries that suffer as a result of natural disasters and expressing also the deepest sympathy to all victims of the natural disasters that have struck in various parts of the globe,

Emphasizing once again the urgent need for concrete measures to reduce the vulnerability of societies to natural hazards, the loss of human lives and the heavy physical and economic damage that occur as a result of natural disasters, in particular in developing countries, small island developing States and landlocked countries,

Commending those countries, national and local institutions, organizations and associations that have adopted policies, allocated resources and initiated action programmes, including international assistance, for disaster reduction and, in this context, welcoming the participation of private companies and individuals,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General;

3. Calls upon all States, relevant intergovernmental bodies and all others involved in the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction to participate actively in the financial and technical support for Decade activities, in order to ensure the implementation of the International Framework of Action for the Decade, in particular with a view to translating the Yokohama Strategy for a Safer World: Guidelines for Natural Disaster Prevention, Preparedness and Mitigation and the Plan of Action contained therein into concrete disaster reduction programmes and activities;

4. Commends all countries, in particular those developing and least developed countries, that have mobilized domestic resources for disaster reduction activities and have facilitated the effective implementation of such activities, and encourages all developing countries concerned to continue in this direction;

5. Reaffirms the need to support the implementation of the Yokohama Strategy and its Plan of Action with particular regard to improving education and training in disaster reduction, including the creation of interdisciplinary and technical networking at all levels, for the purpose of capacity-building and human resources development in developing countries, in particular those that are prone to natural disasters, as well as least developed, small island developing and landlocked countries;

6. Welcomes the initiatives aimed at defining regional frameworks for disaster mitigation, such as the regional seminars held in Africa and the Mediterranean;

7. Stresses the need for synergy between the implementation of the Programme of Action for the Sustainable Development of Small Island Developing States and that of the Yokohama Strategy and its Plan of Action as they relate to natural disaster reduction;

8. Underlines the need for the United Nations system to ensure the integration of the Yokohama Strategy and its Plan of Action into the coordinated approach taken to the follow-up to all recent major United Nations conferences and summit meetings and to the implementation of their respective plans of action;

9. Invites the Secretary-General, in particular, to facilitate, within the existing International Framework of Action for the Decade, an internationally concerted framework for improvements in early warning by developing a concrete proposal for an effective international mechanism on early warning, to include the transfer of technologies related to early warning to developing countries, under the auspices of the United Nations and as part of the implementation of the International Framework of Action for the Decade and the Yokohama Strategy and its Plan of Action;

10. Calls upon the secretariat of the Decade to continue to facilitate a concerted international approach to improvements in early warning capacities for natural disasters and similar disasters with adverse impact on the environment within the process leading towards the closing event of the Decade;

11. Recommends that adequate consideration be given to the International Framework of Action for the Decade as part of the evaluation and overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21 in 1997;

12. Reaffirms that the secretariat of the Decade will continue to serve as the substantive secretariat for the preparation of the closing event of the Decade, working with the full support of relevant bodies of the United Nations Secretariat and drawing on the contributions of the organizations of the United Nations system concerned, other international organizations and Governments;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to appeal for additional voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund for the Decade;

14. Also requests the Secretary-General to bring forward, as a first step in the process leading towards the closing event of the Decade and in order to begin the preparatory process in 1998, proposals arising from consultation with interested parties, and to set forth in his substantive report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session proposals regarding the format, substance and timing of the event, also taking into account, inter alia, the need to review relationships and responsibilities relevant to natural disaster reduction with respect to the future and the performance capability of the secretariat of the Decade.

Drought-stricken areas

Reporting on 19 July to the Economic and Social Council on the question of assistance to drought-stricken areas of Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, the Sudan and Uganda, UNDP [E/1996/SR.41] described the situation in the Horn of Africa and eastern Africa with respect to food security and sustainable livelihood as very precarious. UNDP provided assistance through country offices and regional bureaux, its Office to Combat Desertification and Drought (UNSO), and trust funds such as the United Nations Capital Development Fund. An Emergency Response Division had been established to work with other bodies to address rehabilitation needs immediately following a severe drought.

UNDP was also working to strengthen national policy frameworks, help Governments implement strategies related to drought, improve local responses to cope with the effects of recurrent drought through comprehensive area development schemes, and help resettle and integrate refugees and displaced populations. At the regional level, support was provided jointly with FAO to the Inter-Governmental Authority for Drought and Development (IGADD) with respect to its strategy on disaster prevention and preparedness, as well as to the regional early warning systems for east and southern Africa.

UNDP assisted in the preparation of national action programmes to serve as the main framework for implementing the 1994 United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in Those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, Particularly in Africa [YUN 1994, p. 944], and also supported environment information systems. It assisted IGADD in the development of a subregional action programme and promoted sustainable water management in dry land areas. UNDP appealed to the Council to recognize the importance of investing in long-term preventive development efforts in countries affected by desertification and drought.

In an addendum to his annual report for 1996 [DP/1997/167Add.1 (Part VI)], the UNDP Administrator reported that UNSO provided technical and catalytic financial assistance to 33 programme countries in various preparatory activities in implementation of the Convention. An estimated $6.7 million was mobilized through the Trust Fund to Combat Desertification and Drought, which had been established in 1995 to facilitate support for the Convention, supplementing $1.7 million for ongoing desertification-control projects in the most affected countries. In 1996, the total value of ongoing projects amounted to approximately $45.3 million (see also PART THREE, Chapter VII).

On 19 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the oral report by the UNDP representative by decision 1996/237.

Hurricanes and cyclones

Costa Rica and Nicaragua

Between 28 and 31 July, hurricane Cesar cut a swath across Costa Rica and Nicaragua, causing extensive flooding and damage, the loss of human lives and the creation of thousands of refugees and displaced persons, mainly in the poorest communities. In Costa Rica, the hurricane affected up to half a million people. In Nicaragua, it affected about 100,000 people, destroying thousands of houses and seriously damaging some 30,000 hectares of agricultural land, as well as food crops. In response to requests from the two countries, DHA launched appeals for assistance, which brought a total of $4.3 million in contributions for Costa Rica and $4.2 million for Nicaragua.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 29 August, the General Assembly adopted resolution 50/244.

Emergency assistance to Costa Rica and Nicaragua

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 43/202 of 20 December 1988, on the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction, and 45/199 of 21 December 1990, the annex to which contains the International Development Strategy for the Fourth United Nations Development Decade, and Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/45 of 26 July 1996, on the International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction,

Deeply concerned at the large number of persons killed, missing and affected by hurricane Cesar, which struck Costa Rica and Nicaragua on 26, 27 and 28 July 1996, thereby rendering more difficult the task of consolidating a region of peace, democracy, freedom and development in Central America,

Also deeply concerned at the tremendous damage caused by hurricane Cesar to the infrastructures and economies of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, which could adversely affect the economic and social development plans of both countries,

Aware of the efforts of the Governments and peoples of Costa Rica and Nicaragua to save lives and alleviate the suffering of the victims of hurricane Cesar,

Bearing in mind the enormous effort that will be required to ameliorate the serious situation caused by this natural disaster,

Recognizing the prompt response of Governments, organs and organizations of the United Nations system, particularly the Department of Humanitarian Affairs of the Secretariat, international and regional agencies and non-governmental organizations in providing relief,

Also recognizing that the magnitude of the disaster and its medium- and long-term effects will require, as a complement to the efforts already being made by the peoples and Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, a demonstration of international solidarity and humanitarian concern to ensure more broad-based and adequate multilateral cooperation in order to meet the immediate emergency situation in the affected areas and initiate the process of reconstruction,

1. Expresses its solidarity and support to the Governments and peoples of Costa Rica and Nicaragua;

2. Expresses its gratitude to all the States of the international community, the international agencies and the non-governmental organizations that have provided emergency relief to the affected countries;

3. Calls upon all States of the international community as a matter of urgency to contribute generously, to the extent that they are able, to relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction operations in the affected countries;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, within existing resources and in cooperation with international financial institutions, and organs and organizations of the United Nations system, to assist the Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua in identifying their short-, medium- and long-term needs and also to collaborate in the reconstruction efforts undertaken by the Governments of the affected countries.

29 August 1996 Meeting 122 Adopted without vote
22-nation draft (A/50/L.76/Rev.1 & Rev. 1/Add.1); agenda item 20 (b).

Madagascar

Following the natural disasters of 1994, when four major cyclones struck Madagascar, destroying homes, public buildings, the country's only oil refinery, more than 20 major highways and the railway network [YUN 1994, p. 819], UN organizations had assisted in the country's reconstruction and helped strengthen its national emergency capacity. Within the context of the UNDP/DHA Disaster Management Training Programme, two high-level workshops—one national (3-7 June) and one regional (10-12 June)—were held in Madagascar; the workshops resulted in the definition of priority guidelines for action plans aimed at strengthening national and regional capacities to cope with the impact of disasters.

The Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs on 19 July reported [E/1996/SR.41] on DHA assistance for Madagascar following the 1994 disasters. By decision 1996/237 of the same date, the Economic and Social Council took note of that report.

In response to cyclone Bonita in January 1996, which inflicted major damage on central parts of Madagascar's east coast, DHA provided emergency relief. Donor contributions in response to its appeal totalled $445,462, with an additional $30,000 DHA grant for the financing of a nutritional rehabilitation facility for cyclone victims.

Chernobyl aftermath

In 1996, the tenth anniversary of the nuclear power plant accident at Chernobyl, Ukraine, a number of international conferences were held, including one sponsored by the International Atomic Energy Agency, WHO and the European Union, in cooperation with DHA, UNESCO, and UNEP, among others. Held in Vienna from 8 to 12 April, it was entitled "One Decade After Chernobyl: Summing Up the Consequences of the Accident". The conference called for intensified assistance to vast segments of the populations of affected States, as well for further research. In its continuing attempt to assist the affected populations, to understand the complex pattern of damage and to revitalize the interest of Governments in the disaster, DHA decided, on the recommendation of Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine, to send in 1997 an inter-agency mission to affected regions of the three countries to assess current needs and make recommendations regarding future assistance.

By an 8 April letter [A/50/924] to the President of the General Assembly, the Secretary-General appealed to Member States to continue and intensify their assistance to Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine, in support of their ongoing efforts to cope with the consequences of the Chernobyl disaster.

By a letter dated 23 April [A/50/944], the Russian Federation transmitted to the Secretary-General a Declaration on the tenth anniversary of the Chernobyl accident, adopted in Moscow on 12 April by the Governments of Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan and Ukraine. The Declaration stated that those Governments would endeavour to coordinate their actions to protect the health and ensure the social welfare of citizens affected by Chernobyl and other radiological disasters, including those who participated in the elimination of their consequences. In a 3 May letter to the Secretary-General [A/51/132], Ukraine expressed its gratitude to the States, international organizations and foreign citizens who had supported Ukraine following the catastrophe at Chernobyl and continued to do so. By a letter of 29 October [A/51/633], the President of Belarus forwarded to the Secretary-General proposals for a strategy for long-term international cooperation in the second post-Chernobyl decade.

Chapter IV

International trade, finance and transport

In 1996—the year of the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD IX)—world trade grew far less rapidly than in the previous two years. The volume of world exports grew by an estimated 5.8 per cent, well down from the 9 per cent growth rate of 1995. However, world trade growth had leaped in 1994 and 1995 and appeared to be returning to more normal rates of growth in 1996. The world's financial markets were heading for a 25 per cent increase in international medium- and long-term lending, with developing countries borrowing more in the first three quarters of the year than in all of 1995. Transition economies also continued to tap those markets, albeit in smaller amounts.

UNCTAD IX, which took place in Midrand, South Africa, from 27 April to 11 May, culminated in the adoption of the Midrand Declaration and a final document entitled "A Partnership for Growth and Development", which addressed the need to promote growth and sustainable development in a globalizing and liberalizing world economy. It observed that a particular challenge for the international community was the integration of developing countries into the global economy. Many of those countries, particularly in Africa, risked being left behind and marginalized in world trade, investment, commodities and capital markets. Following a frank assessment of UNCTAD's functioning, the Conference restructured the intergovernmental machinery, establishing three commissions of the UNCTAD Trade and Development Board to perform integrated policy work in their areas of competence—trade in goods and services, and commodities; investment, technology and related financial issues; and enterprise, business facilitation and development. The Commissions on Trade in Goods and Services, and Commodities, and on Investment, Technology and Related Financial Issues held their first sessions during the year.

In December, the General Assembly endorsed the outcome of UNCTAD IX, particularly "A Partnership for Growth and Development", and recognized UNCTAD's role as the focal point within the United Nations for the integrated treatment of development and interrelated issues in the areas of trade, finance, technology, investment and sustainable development.

Having discussed questions of trade, environment and sustainable development, the Commission on Sustainable Development encouraged UNCTAD to propose positive measures to support developing countries' efforts to achieve sustainable development, focusing on capacity-building and support for national efforts to internalize environmental costs.

In the area of trade facilitation, the International Trade Centre, under the joint sponsorship of UNCTAD and the World Trade Organization (WTO), expended $36.1 million on assisting developing countries and economies in transition to formulate and implement trade promotion programmes and to develop export opportunities.

In a report to the Assembly on global financial integration, the Secretary-General stated that technological advances had reduced the cost and increased the speed of international financial transactions. Although some developing countries had taken advantage of the globalization of finance, many had also been stung by the volatility of the flows. In December, the Assembly stressed that global financial integration presented new challenges and opportunities for the international community and that it should constitute an important element of the dialogue between the UN system and the Bretton Woods institutions (the World Bank group and the International Monetary Fund).

As to the developing country debt situation, the Assembly called on the international community and the private sector to take action to implement the commitments of the major UN conferences and summits on development, organized since the beginning of the 1990s, related to the question of external debt.

In the area of transport, the Assembly proclaimed 7 December as International Civil Aviation Day. Expert meetings were held regarding ports, maritime liens and mortgages, and the transport of dangerous goods.

UN Conference on Trade and Development

UNCTAD IX

The ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, known as UNCTAD IX, was held in Midrand, South Africa, from 27 April to 11 May [TD/378], in accordance with a 1995 General Assembly resolution [YUN 1995, p. 949], with the unifying theme "Promoting growth and sustainable development in a globalizing and liberalizing world economy". The UNCTAD Trade and Development Board (TDB) served as the preparatory committee for the Conference (see below), which was preceded by a one-day Meeting of Senior Officials, also in Midrand, on 26 April.

The Conference was attended by 140 member States of UNCTAD, as well as by representatives of the UN Secretariat, the regional commissions and other UN bodies, and nine specialized agencies. Also represented were 14 intergovernmental organizations and 15 non-governmental organizations. Palestine attended as an observer.

At an inaugural ceremony on 27 April, the Conference was addressed by Nelson Mandela, President of the Republic of South Africa, who welcomed participants, and by the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who stated that UNCTAD should achieve three goals: be a place of consensus; fulfil a technical assistance role; and continue to be the "conscience" and advocate of the developing and most disadvantaged countries.

The inaugural ceremony was followed by two high-level round tables—the Round Table of Head of States and the Round Table of Heads of Agencies.

At the opening meeting, also on 27 April, the Conference elected as its President Alec Erwin, Minister for Trade and Industry of South Africa.

On 30 April, acting on the recommendation of the Meeting of Senior Officials [TD/371], the Conference established three subsidiary drafting groups to work on the pre-Conference text on promoting growth and sustainable development in a globalizing and liberalizing world economy [TD/367] as follows: Drafting Group I—globalization, trade and commodities; Drafting Group II—investment, science and technology, enterprise development, trade-supporting infrastructure and trade efficiency; and Drafting Group III—institutional issues and technical cooperation.

In addition to reports of meetings held in preparation for the Conference (see below), UNCTAD IX had before it a report of the UNCTAD Secretary-General [TD/366], who discussed trade and development in a liberalized and globalizing world economy; promoting international trade as an instrument for development in the post-Uruguay Round world; and promoting enterprise development and competitiveness in developing countries and countries in transition. The report also contained his personal reflections on the future work of UNCTAD.

Declaration and final document

On 11 May, the Conference adopted the Midrand Declaration—which covered globalization, partnerships, UNCTAD's work, institutional reform of UNCTAD, partnership initiatives, and South Africa to Thailand (the venue for UNCTAD X)—and the final document entitled "A Partnership for Growth and Development". The final document comprised three parts: part I—promoting growth and sustainable development in a globalizing and liberalizing world economy; part II—the contribution of UNCTAD to sustainable development; and part III—the future work of UNCTAD: institutional implications.

In part I, the document addressed challenges arising from globalization and liberalization among countries facing different circumstances. It noted that a particular challenge for the international community was the integration of developing countries into the global economy. Many of those countries, particularly in Africa, risked being left behind and marginalized in world trade, investment, commodities and capital markets. Intensive efforts were needed to help developing countries, particularly least developed countries (LDCs), to benefit from the process of global trade liberalization. The challenge at the national and international levels was to create the conditions that would allow the flows of world investment and trade to help bridge the economic and social disparities among and within nations. Towards that end, the Conference reaffirmed the partnership for development that was included in the final document of UNCTAD VIII in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 612].

Part II of the final document noted that UNCTAD's role as the focal point within the United Nations for the integrated treatment of development and interrelated issues in the areas of trade, finance, technology, investment and sustainable development necessitated adaptation to new economic and institutional modalities created by the process of globalization, the conclusion in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 1474] of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations and the creation of the World Trade Organization (WTO) in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1515]. Since UNCTAD had a clear comparative advantage in tackling trade-related development issues, it should continue to facilitate the integration of developing countries and countries in transition into the international trading system in a complementary manner with WTO and to promote development through trade and investment in cooperation with the International Trade Centre (ITC), institutions of the UN system and other international organizations. UNCTAD's work should be geared to the special needs of developing countries, particularly LDCs, and focus on development-oriented activities. Further, it should be action-oriented and provide guidance on national policies and on an enabling environment conducive to trade and development. In its analytical and deliberative work, UNCTAD should focus on the following areas: globalization and development; international trade in goods and services, and commodity issues; investment, enterprise development and technology; and services infrastructure for development and trade efficiency. Technical cooperation was considered an important element in UNCTAD's overall effort to provide practical assistance to developing countries, and that assistance should be directed towards developing countries with the greatest need, LDCs having priority.

In considering the institutional implications of UNCTAD's future work, part III of the final document stated that the Conference had recognized the need to revitalize and remodel UNCTAD's intergovernmental machinery. It endorsed the recommendations adopted by TDB in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 980], decided on the structure of the intergovernmental machinery and called for the establishment of three TDB commissions: on trade in goods and services, and commodities; on investment, technology and related financial issues; and on enterprise, business facilitation and development (see also below, under "Institutional matters"). As for the involvement of non-governmental actors in UNCTAD activities, the Conference said that UNCTAD should continue to take into account the views of those groups by inviting them to participate in an advisory capacity at public meetings of TDB and its commissions. The Conference requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to pursue consultations with non-governmental actors, taking into account the experience of participation of civil society in other UN forums and international and regional organizations, and to make recommendations to TDB.

Other action. On 30 April, the Conference welcomed and endorsed the offer of the Government of Thailand to host UNCTAD X in the year 2000.

By an 11 May resolution [res. 172(IX)], UNCTAD IX expressed appreciation for the generous hospitality and warm friendship accorded to Conference participants and requested the Conference President to convey those sentiments to the President and the people of South Africa.

By another 11 May resolution [res. 173(IX)], the Conference approved the report of the Credentials Committee.

Preparatory process for UNCTAD IX

The twelfth executive session of TDB (Geneva, 26 February-29 March) [TD/B/EX(12)/2] had as its main task the launching of substantive preparations for UNCTAD IX. An open-ended Committee of the Whole elaborated the substantive pre-conference text [TD/367], which the Board submitted as an official document of UNCTAD IX to serve as a basis for negotiations.

As part of the intergovernmental preparations for the Conference, three high-level regional meetings were held: the Eighth Ministerial Meeting of the Asian Group of the Group of 77 (Amman, Jordan, 9-11 January), which adopted the Amman Final Documents; the Latin American Coordination Meeting for UNCTAD IX (Caracas, Venezuela, 16-18 January), which adopted the Caracas Declaration; and the Meeting of African Ministers Responsible for Trade, Regional Cooperation, Integration and Tourism (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 14-16 February), which adopted the Addis Ababa Declaration on UNCTAD IX. Under cover of a note by the UNCTAD secretariat [TD/370], the final documents of those meetings were brought to the attention of the Conference.

The Eighth Ministerial Meeting of the Group of 77 developing countries convened in Midrand on 28 April. It adopted the Ministerial Declaration of the Group of 77 [TD/372], which it submitted to the Conference.

The Meeting of Ministers of Least Developed Countries took place on 1 May in Midrand. A Declaration was adopted [TD/373/1] and submitted to the Conference.

By an UNCTAD secretariat note [TD/369], a paper on the basic position of the European Union (EU) on UNCTAD IX was circulated to the Conference.

UNCTAD IX follow-up

The thirteenth executive session of the Trade and Development Board (Geneva, 8 July) [A/51/15, vol. I] was held to follow up on the recommendations adopted by UNCTAD IX (see below). The Board established three commissions as subsidiary bodies: Commission on Trade in Goods and Services, and Commodities; Commission on Investment, Technology and Related Financial Issues; and Commission on Enterprise, Business Facilitation and Development. It also approved the provisional annotated agendas for their first sessions (see also "Institutional matters" below).

By a 27 August note [A/51/3081, the Secretary-General submitted the Midrand Declaration and "A Partnership for Growth and Development" to the General Assembly.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/167.

International trade and development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 50/95 and 50/98 of 20 December 1995, as well as relevant international agreements concerning trade, economic growth, development and interrelated issues,

Emphasizing the importance of an open, rule-based, equitable, secure, non-discriminatory, transparent and predictable multilateral trading system,

Emphasizing also that a favourable and conducive international economic and financial environment and a positive investment climate are necessary for the economic growth of the world economy, including the creation of employment, in particular for the growth and development of the developing countries, and emphasizing further that each country is responsible for its own economic policies for sustainable development,

Noting with satisfaction the highly successful outcome of the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, held at Midrand, South Africa, from 27 April to 11 May 1996, and the strengthened spirit of genuine partnership and solidarity that emerged therefrom,

Expressing its deep gratitude to the Government and the people of South Africa for the hospitality extended to the participants in the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development,

Welcoming with appreciation the generous offer made by the Government and the people of Thailand to host the tenth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development in the year 2000,

Expressing its appreciation to the Government and the people of Singapore for hosting the inaugural Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization,

I

1. Endorses the outcome of the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, held at Midrand, South Africa, in April and May 1996, in particular the document entitled "A Partnership for Growth and Development", which builds upon various related agreements and conferences, and expresses its political will and responsibility with respect to implementing the agreed commitments;

2. Takes note of the report of the Trade and Development Board on its forty-third session;

3. Welcomes the fact that the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, as part of the United Nations system and a contributor to its revitalization, has adopted far-reaching reforms, as embodied in the Midrand Declaration and the document entitled "A Partnership for Growth and Development", adopted by consensus at the ninth session of the Conference, which encompass its programme of work, its intergovernmental machinery and the reform of its secretariat, including its complementarity with the World Trade Organization, inter alia, by making its analysis of trade and development available to the World Trade Organization, and its cooperation with the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and relevant organizations, thus adapting itself to new economic and institutional modalities created by the process of globalization, the conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations agreements and the creation of the World Trade Organization;

4. Also welcomes the importance attached by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its ninth session to building a lasting partnership for development between non-governmental actors and the Conference and the initiative taken by the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to hold meetings with relevant actors;

5. Recognizes the role of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development as the focal point within the United Nations for the integrated treatment of development and interrelated issues in the areas of trade, finance, technology, investment and sustainable development;

6. Also recognizes that the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, having a comparative advantage in tackling trade-related development issues, should continue to facilitate the integration of developing countries and countries with economies in transition into the international trading system, in a complementary manner with the World Trade Organization, and to promote development through trade and investment in cooperation and coordination with the International Trade Centre, relevant institutions of the United Nations system and other international organizations;

7. Invites, in this context, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to continue, inter alia, to follow developments in the international trading system, in particular their implications for developing countries, and to identify new opportunities arising from the implementation of the Uruguay Round agreements;

8. Decides, in this context, that the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development should implement its programme of work with a focus on the issues of globalization and development, international trade in goods and services and commodity matters, investment, enterprise development and technology, services infrastructure for development and trade efficiency;

9. Invites the President of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development at its ninth session to consider convening a special high-level review meeting two years prior to the tenth session of the Conference;

II

10. Stresses the urgent need to continue trade liberalization in developed and developing countries, including liberalization through a substantial reduction of tariff and other barriers to trade, in particular non-tariff barriers, and the elimination of discriminatory and protectionist practices in international trade relations, which will have the effect of improving access for the exports of developing countries, enhancing the competitiveness of their domestic industries and facilitating structural adjustment among developed economies;

11. Also stresses the need for the full integration of economies in transition, as well as other countries, into the world economy, in particular through improved market access for their exports in accordance with the multilateral trading agreements, and recognizes in this respect the importance of open regional economic integration of interested economies in transition among themselves, as well as with developed and developing countries, in creating new possibilities for expanding trade and investment;

12. Recognizes that the World Trade Organization provides the framework for an open, rule-based, equitable, secure, non-discriminatory, transparent and predictable multilateral trading system, and stresses that all members of the World Trade Organization should implement their commitments in respect of the Uruguay Round agreements in a full, timely, faithful and continuous manner and that all provisions of the Final Act Embodying the Results of the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations should be effectively applied, so as to maximize economic growth and the developmental benefits thereof for all, taking into account specific difficulties and interests of developing countries;

13. Urges Governments and concerned organizations to implement fully and expeditiously the Ministerial Decision on Measures in Favour of the Least Developed Countries and to apply effectively the Ministerial Decision on Measures Concerning the Possible Negative Effects of the Reform Programme on Least Developed and Net Food-importing Developing Countries, as well as the recommendations adopted at the Mid-term Global Review of the Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s and at the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, as they relate to trade and trade-related issues of the least developed countries;

14. Emphasizes the importance of the strengthening of, and the attaining of greater universality by, the international trading system, welcomes the process directed towards accession to the World Trade Organization of developing countries and countries with economies in transition, and emphasizes the necessity for World Trade Organization member Governments and relevant international organizations to assist non-World Trade Organization members so as to facilitate their efforts with respect to accession in an expeditious manner on the basis of World Trade Organization rights and obligations and for the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to provide technical assistance, thereby contributing to their rapid and full integration into the multilateral trading system;

15. Also emphasizes the importance of the inaugural Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization, to be held at Singapore in December 1996, in regard to reviewing the implementation of the Uruguay Round agreements and their built-in agenda, stressing that the pursuit of that agenda, as well as the international community's handling of new issues affecting the conduct of international trade relations, should be carried out in a balanced manner which takes into account the concerns of all countries, including developing countries;

16. Further emphasizes that the dispute settlement mechanism of the World Trade Organization is a key element with regard to the integrity and credibility of the multilateral trading system and the full realization of the benefits anticipated from the conclusion of the Uruguay Round;

17. Deplores any attempt to bypass or undermine multilaterally agreed procedures on the conduct of international trading by resorting to unilateral actions over and above those agreed in the Uruguay Round, and affirms that environmental and social concerns should not be used for protectionist purposes;

18. Emphasizes the need for a balanced and integrated approach to environment, trade and development issues;

19. Reaffirms that Governments should have as their objective to ensure that trade and environmental policies are mutually supportive so as to achieve sustainable development and that, in doing so, their environmental policies and measures with a potential trade impact should not be used for protectionist purposes, and reaffirms also that positive measures such as market access, capacity-building, improved access to finance and access to transfer of technology, taking into account the relationship between trade-related agreements and technology, are effective instruments in assisting developing countries to meet multilaterally agreed targets, while noting that trade measures can, in certain cases, play a role in achieving the objectives of multilateral trade agreements, while safeguarding a non-discriminatory and equitable multilateral trading system;

III

20. Recognizes the important progress made in understanding the relationship between trade and environment in the Committee on Trade and Environment of the World Trade Organization, as well as in the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, and in the Commission on Sustainable Development, including the recommendations made at its fourth session, and requests the Conference to continue its work on trade, environment and development, in cooperation with relevant international organizations including the Commission on Sustainable Development, the United Nations Environment Programme, the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development, regional organizations and the World Trade Organization;

21. Requests the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to continue its special role in promoting the integration of trade, environment and development, in accordance with paragraph 27 of resolution 50/95, by examining trade and environment issues from a development perspective, in close cooperation with the United Nations Environment Programme and the World Trade Organization and as task manager for the Commission on Sustainable Development;

22. Stresses the role of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development in the context of the forthcoming special session of the General Assembly for the purpose of an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21;

23. Requests the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, on the basis of the outcome of its ninth session, to identify and analyse the implications for development of issues relevant to investment, taking into account the interests of developing countries and bearing in mind the work undertaken by other organizations;

24. Reaffirms the need to give priority to the problems facing the least developed countries, and reaffirms in particular that actions, as appropriate, should be taken to assist the least developed countries to maximize the potential opportunities and minimize possible difficulties arising from the Uruguay Round agreements;

25. Requests Governments, organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to take concrete measures to implement fully and as a matter of urgency the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, including the measures and recommendations agreed upon at its mid-term review, especially those related to trade and development;

26. Invites the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the World Bank and the United Nations Development Programme to improve collaboration between the Conference's country-level programmes for least developed countries and the overall macroeconomic and sectoral policy dialogue in respect of those countries at the World Bank Consultative Group and United Nations Development Programme Round Tables, bearing in mind General Assembly resolution 50/120 of 20 December 1995;

27. Stresses the need to give special attention, within the context of international cooperation on trade and development issues, to the implementation of the many international development commitments geared to meeting the special development needs and problems of small island developing States and of landlocked developing States, as well as to recognize that developing countries which provide transit services need adequate support in maintaining and improving their transit infrastructure;

28. Invites preference-giving countries to continue to improve and renew their Generalized System of Preferences schemes in keeping with the post-Uruguay Round trading system and with the objective of integrating developing countries, especially least developed countries, into the international trading system, and stresses that ways and means should be found to ensure more effective utilization of Generalized System of Preferences schemes, particularly by least developed countries;

29. Notes the concern among the beneficiaries that the enlargement of the scope of the Generalized System of Preferences by linking eligibility to non-trade considerations may detract value from its original principles, namely, non-discrimination, universality, burden sharing and non-reciprocity;

30. Stresses that Governments, as well as international organizations, should extend technical assistance to developing countries to enable them to participate more effectively in the international trading system;

31. Encourages the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to further promote South-South cooperation, including triangular cooperation, recalling the results of the Intergovernmental Meeting of Experts on South-South Cooperation, held in New York from 31 July to 4 August 1995, and the outcome of the ninth session of the Conference;

32. Notes that the forthcoming South-South conference on finance, trade and investment, to be held at San Jose, Costa Rica, will provide an opportunity for developing countries to advance initiatives related to the document entitled "A Partnership for Growth and Development", and invites the international community to support the initiative;

33. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, through the Secretary-General of the United Nations, to submit a proposal on savings resulting from improved overall cost-effectiveness achieved pursuant to the ninth session of the Conference, including the restructuring of the intergovernmental machinery and reform of the secretariat, and to submit a proposal on how to reallocate a part of the savings in the 1998-1999 budget cycle, with a view to strengthening the Conference's capabilities in priority areas, including, inter alia, in technical cooperation.

General Assembly resolution 51/167

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/602) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Belarus, Colombia (for Non-Aligned Movement), Costa Rica (for Group of 77 and China), Japan, Mexico, Norway, Russian Federation and United States (A/C.2/51/L.16/Rev.1); agenda item 94 (c).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 29-33, 35-37; plenary 86.

UNCTAD programme

In 1996, the Trade and Development Board—the executive body of UNCTAD—held three sessions: the twelfth executive session (Geneva, 26 February-29 March) [TD/B/EX(12)/2], at which preparations for UNCTAD IX were discussed; the thirteenth executive session (Geneva, 8 July) [A/51/15, vol. I], which mainly dealt with follow-up to UNCTAD IX; and the regular forty-third session (Geneva, 7-18 October) [A/51/15, vol. II]. The forty-third session included a high-level segment which discussed the question of foreign direct investment and development in a globalizing world economy. It adopted agreed conclusions on: the Programme of Action for LDCs for the 1990s [agreed conclusions 435(XLIII)] (see PART THREE, Chapter I); development in Africa [agreed conclusions 436(XLIII)] (see PART THREE, Chapter III); and interdependence and global economic issues, UNCTAD technical cooperation activities, participation of developing-country experts, and the UNCTAD publication policy (see below).

By decision 1996/205 A of 9 February, the Economic and Social Council authorized the Secretary-General to transmit directly to the General Assembly the report of TDB on the second part of its forty-second session. However, as UNCTAD IX had decided that TDB should hold only one regular session annually, the second part of the forty-second session did not take place.

Technical cooperation activities

In a July report [TD/B/43/7 & Corrs. and Adds.] to TDB's forty-third session, the UNCTAD Secretary-General gave an overview of technical cooperation activities in 1995, when UNCTAD's expenditures amounted to $22 million, a slight increase over the $21.4 million spent in 1994. Of the $22 million, $7.8 million was financed by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), $13.4 million from trust fund contributions and $0.8 million from the regular programme of technical cooperation.

By region, approximately $4.5 million went to Africa; $3 million to Europe; $2.9 million to Asia and the Pacific; $2.5 million to Latin America and the Caribbean; and $1 million to the Arab States. Some $8.1 million went to interregional projects. The share of LDCs in total technical cooperation activities ($6.1 million) declined from a high of 42 per cent in 1989 to 28 per cent in 1995.

By programme, expenditures broke down as follows: $11.5 million to services development and trade efficiency; $2.6 million to global interdependence (including development finance and debt); $2.6 million to cross-sectoral and other activities (including training and human resources development); $2.1 million to international trade; $2 million to transnational corporations and investment; and the remainder spread among LDCs, landlocked and island developing countries, economic cooperation among developing countries and special programmes, commodities, and science and technology.

The report proposed that a strategy be devised to strengthen the linkages between UNCTAD's analytical work and technical cooperation.

In agreed conclusions of 18 October [agreed conclusions 437(XLIII)], TDB requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to finalize the strategy and plan for technical cooperation before the end of 1996 and agreed to consider the plan for 1997 and the subsequent two years at its executive session in early 1997. It further agreed to invite contributions to the proposed UNCTAD trust fund for LDCs; to welcome consultations between the UNCTAD Secretary-General and the UNDP Administrator on issues relating to trade and investment; to request the UNCTAD Secretary-General to review existing cooperation arrangements, to conclude formal arrangements and to address the possible establishment of inter-agency task forces; and to welcome the integrated programme for Africa launched by UNCTAD, WTO and ITC.

Expert meetings

ings called for in "A Partnership for Growth and Development", adopted by UNCTAD IX [TD/378], needed the active participation of experts from every interested region in order to benefit from a higher level of technical expertise. It recognized that the cost involved might cause problems to developing countries, particularly to LDCs, and that measures needed to be taken to facilitate the participation of developing-country experts, including by providing a predictable and stable funding basis.

As a concrete measure on a trial basis, the Board agreed to request the UNCTAD Secretary-General to establish a trust fund to enhance the participation of developing-country experts in UNCTAD meetings. He was also requested to explore avenues to increase their participation in addition to the financing of travel and per diem costs, bearing in mind, in particular, recourse to modern methods of communication. The Board agreed that it would assess, at its 1997 regular session, the effectiveness of those measures and their impact on improving developing-country expert participation, on the basis of a report by the UNCTAD Secretary-General.

TDB annexed to the agreed conclusions a statement by the United States, which endorsed the establishment of a trust fund to enhance the participation of developing-country experts in UNCTAD's work but was unable to support the full text of the agreed conclusions.

Publication policy

In agreed conclusions of 18 October [agreed conclusions 439(XLIII)], TDB endorsed the approach whereby the UNCTAD Secretary-General would review the report of the secretariat task force on publications, to be completed by March 1997, and subsequently report to the Board. He was requested to submit an interim report at the next executive session in 1997.

TDB requested the Secretary-General to ensure that the task force took into account the following: the need to develop a coherent communication and information policy and to improve marketing and distribution; the need to make best use of modern communication technology; the need to develop suitable criteria for measuring feedback; the ongoing need for detailed data on work months, print runs, printing costs, place of printing, and distributed copies for all recurrent publications; the feasibility of printing and translating externally; and the availability and need for timely distribution of documents in all UN official languages.

JIU report

In May 1996, the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly the report [A/51/152] of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) on UNCTAD institutional and programme issues. JIU made a number of recommendations with regard to strengthening UNCTAD's role and reinforcing co-operation and coordination with WTO and the Bretton Woods institutions.

In October [A/51/152/Add.1], the Secretary-General transmitted his comments on the JIU report, stating that most of the recommendations coincided with actions already under way, particularly in the context of the follow-up to UNCTAD IX.

Medium-term plan and programme budget

The UNCTAD Working Party on the Medium-term Plan and the Programme Budget held two sessions in 1996.

At its twenty-seventh session (Geneva, 17-19 June) [TD/B/43/21], the Working Party reviewed the UNCTAD programme of the UN medium-term plan 1998-2001 [A/51/6 (prog. 9)]. It approved a number of amendments and emphasized that the final text as it related to trade and development should faithfully reflect the consensus position of UNCTAD member States on the programmes of work in the period up to the convening of UNCTAD X in the year 2000. It further emphasized that the UNCTAD IX Midrand Declaration and final document, "A Partnership for Growth and Development", should represent the main reference in determining mandates and subprogrammes for that period.

The Working Party at the first part of its twenty-eighth session (Geneva, 16-19 September) [TD/B/43/8], reviewed the UNCTAD section of the UN programme budget for the biennium 1996-1997 in the light of the outcome of UNCTAD IX. It had before it a document [TD/B/WP/98] containing proposed revisions to the work programme. On 19 September, the Chairman announced that the Working Party had been unable to agree on the proposed revisions to the work programme. The Working Party decided that it would hold the second part of its twenty-eighth session in December to discuss the programme budget. That meeting was subsequently cancelled, however, and the question was deferred to the twenty-ninth session.

In resolution 51/219 of 18 December, the General Assembly adopted the proposed medium-term plan for 1998-2001, making a number of changes to the UNCTAD programme.

Institutional matters

Intergovernmental structure

In the Midrand Declaration and final document adopted by UNCTAD IX [TD/378], the question of UNCTAD's intergovernmental machinery was addressed (see also "UNCTAD IX follow-up" above). With a call for its restructuring in accordance with the future work programme, it was to focus on a few priority areas: globalization and development; international trade in goods and services, and commodity issues; investment, enterprise development and technology; and services infrastructure for development and trade efficiency. In carrying out activities, cross-sectoral issues such as the problems of LDCs, poverty alleviation, economic cooperation among developing countries, sustainable development and the empowerment of women should be integrated into the work of the intergovernmental machinery.

The Conference endorsed a 1995 TDB resolution [YUN 1995, p. 980] on the intergovernmental machinery and decided on its structure. The Board would be responsible for ensuring the overall consistency of UNCTAD activities with agreed priorities, would set or adjust priorities for the period up to the Conference's next session in the year 2000, would set benchmarks and evaluate performance on that basis, and would ensure that the budget, programme of work, technical cooperation activities and publications policy were carefully scrutinized; it would be assisted in those tasks by the Working Party on the Medium-term Plan and the Programme Budget. In carrying out its mandated functions, TDB would meet in regular or executive session, with the regular session being convened in one part in autumn for approximately 10 working days. It could also meet in executive session three times throughout the year to deal with policy, management and institutional matters; such session would normally be confined to one day. TDB should set up three commissions that would meet once a year unless otherwise decided: the Commission on Trade in Goods and Services, and Commodities; the Commission on Investment, Technology and Related Financial Issues; and the Commission on Enterprise, Business Facilitation and Development. The Conference decided that the Board should meet in executive session not later than 10 July 1996 in order to establish those Commissions and identify agenda items for their first sessions.

In order to benefit from a higher level of technical expertise, each Commission could convene expert meetings of short duration, the outcome of which did not have to be in the form of agreed conclusions.

At its thirteenth executive session (Geneva, 8 July) [A/51/15, vol. I], TDB established the three Commissions and approved their draft agendas.

International trade

The growth of world trade slowed down somewhat in volume terms in 1995, according to the Trade and Development Report, 1996 [Sales No. E.96.II.D.6], with exports increasing by 8 per cent, compared with 8.9 per cent in 1994, and imports increasing by 8.5 per cent, compared with 10.2 per cent. The slowdown affected all regions, with the major exception of exports from Latin America, where imports, however, declined sharply. Nevertheless, the volume of world trade expanded at twice the pace experienced at the beginning of the 1990s. In value terms, the growth of exports and imports was much higher, largely because of the weakness of the United States dollar in the first half of 1995 and the continued strength of primary product prices, such as oil and non-ferrous metals.

More important, the value of world trade continued to expand faster than world output for the sixth consecutive year. That development could be explained in terms of four new aspects of world trade which were the result of greater integration of markets: the rise of intra-trade, trade in similar goods between similar countries; the ability of producers to break a production process into many geographically separated steps; the resulting emergence of countries with extremely high ratios of trade to gross domestic product (GDP); and the emergence of large exports of manufactured goods from low-wage to high-wage nations.

Developing countries continued to take on increasing importance in determining the performance and patterns of world trade, with trade among those countries growing much more rapidly than trade among developed ones. The dynamism of trade in Asian developing countries was such that they were able not only to maintain their own growth momentum, but also to exert a marked influence on other countries, including developed ones, through the growing integration of world trade. The share of 10 developing Asian economies in world trade (imports plus exports) in 1995, excluding trade among European Union (EU) countries, was more than 19 per cent. That was very close to the share of EU (19.5 per cent) and greater than that of the United States (17.7 per cent) or Japan (10.2 per cent).

World exports of services also increased rapidly in 1995, although less so than merchandise exports, with exports of services such as insurance, banking and telecommunications rising particularly fast. While trade in services was most dynamic in Asia, it was also strong in Western Europe. Trade in primary commodities also expanded during 1995, due to favourable price developments, especially in metals and oil. Nevertheless, manufactures remained the most dynamic element of world trade, especially in the area of telecommunications and office equipment.

The World Economic and Social Survey 1996 [Sales No. E.96.II.C.1] stated that the total value of world merchandise trade was about $5 trillion in 1995. Developed countries supplied almost two thirds of world exports, selling more than 70 per cent to other developed countries. Developing countries provided about 29 per cent of the world total, almost half of which originated in South and East Asia (excluding China). Economies in transition accounted for the remainder of world exports, about 4 per cent of the total.

The volume of imports of developed economies grew relatively slowly in the first three years of the 1990s and then quickened during the period 1994-1996. From 1994 on, all developed countries were in various stages of economic recovery and that raised the demand for imports. However, the slowdown in economic growth during 1995, continuing into 1996, especially in Europe, curtailed the growth of import demand and was a major factor behind the slower growth of import volume forecast for 1996. The exception was Japan, where recovery was particularly weak, but import volume rose 13.6 per cent in 1994 and by more than 10 per cent in 1995. A prime reason was the sharp appreciation of the yen.

Developing-country imports had grown in volume by 9 per cent or more a year since 1991 and were forecast to rise by 12.25 per cent in 1996. That was the result of a broad mix of outcomes. The growth of Latin America's import volume fell dramatically in 1995 after a financial crisis in two of its three largest economies, while the continuing adjustment programmes in the large West Asian economies again reduced their import levels. Other Asian economies thus accounted for most of the growth of imports in 1995, although Africa also participated, if in a modest way. Except in South Africa, the volume of Africa's imports rose only slightly in 1995, although a stronger growth was forecast for 1996. Imports were stimulated by trade liberalization policies and by expanded food imports, owing to drought conditions. The rise in imports was made possible in part by higher commodity export earnings, owing to stronger prices in 1994 and 1995, abetted, for the countries of the franc zone, by the devaluation of the CFA (Communauté financière africaine) franc in early 1994. Export volumes were thus boosted by almost 5 per cent in 1995, and double that increase was forecast for 1996.

Import growth had been consistently strong in South and East Asia and in most years in China. That was paralleled and made possible by the rapid growth of exports. Economies of the region had been particularly successful in expanding into the most dynamic sectors of merchandise trade—highly sophisticated information-age goods. China was a major destination for foreign direct investment (FDI), with gross inflows reaching $38 billion in 1995. With strong growth of the volume of exports (some 17 per cent in 1995) and substantial capital inflows, the exchange rate began to appreciate. If continued, currency appreciation could dampen the competitiveness of China's exports in 1996, it was reported.

The trade situation in Latin America reflected the dramatic events occurring there in 1994 and 1995, mainly in the three largest economies. While Latin American exports grew strongly in 1995, import growth slowed, mainly reflecting the sharp adjustments in Argentina and Mexico in late 1994 and 1995. In 1996, with moderate recovery forecast for those two nations, regional import volumes were expected to resume a stronger rate of growth. In Brazil, the largest economy in the region, import growth was encouraged by a liberalization policy, as part of the anti-inflation programme. Dramatic progress was made in reducing inflation which helped to attract large capital inflows that underwrote strong domestic demand and thus the import growth.

The foreign trade of the Central and Eastern European transition economies mirrored the buoyant economic growth in most of those countries. The volume of exports grew an estimated 9.5 per cent in 1995 and imports expanded 11 per cent. Similar, if slightly lower, rates of growth were forecast for 1996. In the Baltic States and in countries of the Commonwealth of Independent States, there also appeared to have been a considerable increase in trade flows.

Trade policy

Economic and Social Council consideration.

During its high-level segment (24-27 June) [A/51/3/Rev.1], the Economic and Social Council held an intensive policy dialogue on major issues in the world economy with UNCTAD Secretary-General Rubens Ricupero, a Deputy Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, Prabhakar R. Narvekar, and a Managing Director of the World Bank, Sven Sandstrom, during which the issues of trade and structural adjustment were considered. With regard to trade, the Council President, in his summary of the segment, stated that, while all partners in the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations had undertaken trade liberalization measures, many developing countries had adopted unilateral measures as well. Liberalization efforts had to be further deepened in all countries, taking into account the relevant internationally agreed provisions to address the special situations of developing countries. Economic cooperation and integration at the regional level were also important. Intensified regional cooperation should not be pursued as an alternative to the global liberalization process, but should contribute to an open and multilateral trading system.

As to structural adjustment, he said that discussions had shown growing international consensus on the main elements of sound economic policies. The proper design and effective implementation of structural adjustment programmes, which fully took into account the social dimension, remained a key challenge. While recent improvement in growth in Africa suggested that well-designed structural adjustment programmes could restore growth, experience had vividly demonstrated that such programmes had to take into account the need to expand social investment, provide a social safety net and alleviate poverty. Policies to protect social sectors should assure that the poor had a stronger say in designing plans and setting priorities. Building Governments' capacities should be a priority as well as an appropriate role for civil society. Efforts should be intensified to implement commitment 8 of the 1995 Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1114] regarding structural adjustment programmes.

Trade in goods and services, and commodities

The Commission on Trade in Goods and Services, and Commodities, established by TDB on 8 July on the recommendation of UNCTAD IX, held the first part of its first session in Geneva from 6 to 8 November [TD/B/44/5]. The Commission had before it a report [TD/B/COM.1/2 & Add.1] by the UNCTAD secretariat on enabling countries to respond to the opportunities arising from the Uruguay Round Agreements so as to derive maximum available benefit by: analysing the impact of those Agreements on development and enhancing capacities for participation in the multilateral trading system. The report reviewed post-Uruguay Round trading conditions facing developing countries, emphasizing improved market access opportunities for developing countries in goods and services arising from the Round, as well as the challenges they were likely to face. It also discussed the kind of study needed to understand fully the impact of the Uruguay Round Agreements on development. Since developing countries' trading opportunities in goods and services and their enhanced integration into the world economy would also be influenced by their ability to participate more fully in the multilateral trading system, the report reviewed gaps in national capacities in terms of human resources and administrative infrastructures.

In agreed conclusions, the Commission stated that the UNCTAD secretariat should undertake country-specific studies covering the impact and dynamic effects of the Uruguay Round Agreements on development and the transitional and long-term development impact of trade liberalization, the supply capacity, trade policy and capacity-building for strengthening the participation of developing countries in the international trading system. Technical cooperation by UNCTAD on capacity-building for strengthening the participation of developing countries, and particularly LDCs, in the system should be an important component of the work in that field, focusing particularly on: capacity-building to assist developing countries to prepare for negotiations in the context of the built-in agenda of the Uruguay Round Agreements and improve the understanding of the implications of new and emerging issues; accession to WTO and problems of non-WTO members, particularly those of LDCs; human, institutional and legislative capacity-building to benefit from the opportunities arising from the participation in the multilateral trading system, to exercise the rights and to comply with the obligations within the Uruguay Round Agreements; promotion of South-South cooperation in the area of capacity-building; and horizontal and vertical diversification in commodity-dependent countries.

Attention was drawn to the need to relate technical cooperation activities in the area of trade with those related to commodities, services, trade efficiency, FDI promotion and technology capacity-building.

The Commission decided to convene expert meetings to: consider opportunities for vertical diversification in the food-processing sector in developing countries, bearing in mind successful experiences, and make action-oriented recommendations; and examine opportunities/difficulties which might confront developing countries in strengthening their capacity and expanding their exports, drawing on the situation in the health-service sector.

Interdependence and global economic issues

Using the Trade and Development Report, 1996 [Sales No. E.96.II.D.6] as background, the Trade and Development Board, at its forty-third session (7-18 October) [A/51/15, vol. II], considered general policy, issues concerning globalization and liberalization, as well as more specific policy issues in its discussion of the agenda item "Interdependence and global economic issues from a trade and development perspective: rethinking development strategies; some lessons from East Asian development experience".

Summarizing the debate, the TDB President said that there was agreement that the role of the market as a basis of economic growth was now better appreciated by policy makers in developing countries. It was argued that a new generation of structural adjustment programmes in Africa should address the lessons emanating from East Asian experience. However, some delegations from East Asia cautioned against an uncritical assessment of their experiences, recognizing that mistakes had been made and that they needed to be included in the learning process.

How the East Asian economies had used external resources to strengthen domestic growth was a particular concern of many delegations. Access to markets, foreign capital and technologies was also cited as integral to successful development in those countries. Doubts were expressed as to the selective trade and industrial policy measures of some East Asian economies, in the context of a new trading environment. The UNCTAD secretariat was urged to determine more specific policy actions that were compatible with the Uruguay Round Agreements.

The President stated that Trade and Development Report's optimistic stance concerning the global environment for export-oriented industrialization had met with some scepticism from several delegations. While there was agreement that globalization had opened up many new opportunities for developing countries, it was also believed that there was an increased risk of marginalization. A combination of factors, including slower growth in the advanced economies, increased protectionism and much greater competition among developing-country exporters, contributed to an international economic and trade environment much less conducive to economic growth, compared with the period when East Asia's growth began to accelerate. In the light of new global obstacles facing policy makers in developing countries, many delegations expressed interest in the regional dimension of East Asian success, in which trade and investment had acted as vehicles to transfer growth impulses among countries at different levels of development. A number of them urged further work on that aspect of East Asian success and its implications for development strategies more generally.

In agreed conclusions of 18 October [agreed conclusions 434(XLIII)], TDB stated that the UNCTAD secretariat should pursue its work on development experiences of developing countries as part of its analysis of interdependence and global economic issues from a trade and development perspective, drawing as necessary on experiences of developing countries in other regions and of the more successful LDCs, deriving relevant policy lessons. It requested the UNCTAD Secretary-General to formulate lessons that might be considered by African countries, and noted the support provided by Japan in that regard. The TDB President was invited to conduct informal consultations designed to improve the way the Board addressed the item on interdependence, drawing on "lessons learned". In that connection, decisions were to be taken at an executive session of the Board in 1997.

Trade and environment

Commission consideration. At its fourth session (18 April-3 May), the Commission on Sustainable Development had before it a report of the Secretary-General on trade, environment and sustainable development [E/CN.17/1996/8 & Add.1.]. The report—prepared by the UNCTAD secretariat as task manager in the implementation of Agenda 21 (adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 672] for trade, environment and sustainable development—covered trade and development aspects of multilateral environmental agreements (MEAs), including the relationship between the provisions of the multilateral trading system and trade measures pursuant to MEAs; environmental policies and competitiveness; eco-labelling; exports of domestically prohibited goods; finance and technology transfer; sustainable development of the commodity sector; and capacity-building and institutional issues.

By a 3 May decision [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/1)], the Commission, with regard to trade measures in MEAs, called on Governments to ensure coordination between trade and environment officials at the national level and to take steps at both national and international levels to ensure the mutual supportiveness of trade and environment policies in support of sustainable development, and looked to WTO to address the relationship between WTO provisions and trade measures for environmental purposes, including those pursuant to MEAs.

The Commission recognized that the link between environmental policies and competitiveness was complex, noting that there was no available evidence to suggest that environmental policy generally had a significant detrimental impact on competitiveness. It firmly rejected the use of "green countervailing duties" or other protectionist or trade measures inconsistent with WTO to compensate for the negative competitiveness effects, whether real or perceived, of environmental policies; it stressed that it would be inappropriate to relax environmental laws, regulations and standards or their enforcement in order to encourage FDI or to promote exports. Considering that complying with the environmental requirements of importing countries could raise competitiveness concerns for developing countries and countries with economies in transition, the Commission recommended that Governments of developed countries facilitate continued market access for developing countries by ensuring greater transparency and providing them with technical and financial assistance in the area of environmental capacity-building. UNCTAD was encouraged to propose positive measures at the national and international levels for supporting developing countries in their efforts to achieve the objectives of sustainable development, focusing on capacity-building and support for national efforts to internalize environmental costs, and was invited to elaborate its analytical study of the relationship of environmental protection to international competitiveness, job creation and development.

Recognizing that eco-labelling could have an impact on trade, the Commission invited Governments to ensure adequate transparency of eco-labelling, by considering inputs from interested parties, including consumer and environmental groups, and domestic and foreign producers, at an early stage in the design of the measures, and to encourage private bodies involved in eco-labelling to do the same.

With respect to trade liberalization and the environment, the Commission invited UNCTAD, in cooperation with other organizations, such as the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), taking into account work already under way at WTO, to examine how further trade liberalization, such as through reducing or eliminating tariff escalation, export taxes or restriction, trade-distortive subsidies and the elimination of tariff and non-tariff barriers, could result in environmental benefits and contribute to sustainable development, including by examining recent analyses on such topics.

Regarding sustainable development of the commodity sector, the Commission invited UNCTAD, in cooperation with the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and other relevant organizations, to assist developing countries in implementing pilot projects in export-oriented production and processing activities aimed at internalizing environmental costs. It encouraged international organizations, Governments and the business community to intensify the search for pragmatic methods for increasing cooperation between exporters and importers with a view to facilitating developing countries' efforts to internalize environmental costs in their development process and to assess the scope for the establishment of sectoral round tables and other arrangements for identifying efficient and cost-effective approaches.

As to biological diversity and trade issues, the Commission welcomed UNCTAD's BIOTRADE initiative in collaboration with the secretariat of the 1992 Convention on Biological Diversity [YUN 1992, p. 683], interested UN agencies and other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations (NGOs), the private sector, local communities and academic institutions, and encouraged further consultations in that area.

The Commission noted the work of the WTO Committee on Trade and Environment and looked to the WTO ministerial meeting, to be held in Singapore in December 1996, to continue the important work of the Committee. UNCTAD and UNEP were requested to continue their work on trade and environment in accordance with their mandates. The regional commissions, in cooperation with other international organizations, were invited to organize meetings in order to enhance coordination on trade and environment.

Ministerial Round-table Meeting. A UNEP-UNCTAD High-level Ministerial Round-table Meeting on Environment, Trade and Sustainable Development (Geneva, 30 September-1 October) [UNCTAD/ITCD/TED/Misc.2] discussed issues of MEAs, trade and sustainable development and market access and trade liberalization. A joint session was held with selected NGOs.

In agreed conclusions, participants stressed that trade and environment should not be a divisive issue, either between North and South or between economic and environmental interests. They noted that implementing sustainable development globally involved improving the economic capacity of developing countries and that trade measures could, in certain cases, play a role in achieving MEA objectives while safeguarding a non-discriminatory and equitable multilateral trading system. Participants stressed the need for action to increase market access opportunities for developing countries, including by further removing tariff and non-tariff barriers to trade. Governments in a position to do so should support the UNCTAD/UNEP programme for capacity-building, in cooperation with UNDP, preferably on a regional basis, with special attention for Africa and LDCs, they stated.

Strengthening institutional trade arrangements

In response to a 1994 General Assembly request [YUN 1994, p. 875], the Secretary-General reported [A/51/331] on strengthening international organizations in the area of multilateral trade, highlighting relevant institutional developments, including a framework for cooperation between the secretariats of the United Nations and WTO, signed in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1444]; steps to establish arrangements for cooperation between UNCTAD and WTO; relevant results of UNCTAD IX (see above); and other pertinent institutional developments.

In decision 51/442 of 16 December, the Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Regional economic arrangements

The Seminar on Regional Economic Arrangements and Their Relationship with the Multilateral Trading System was held in Geneva from 15 to 17 January [TD/B/42(2)/10], as agreed by TDB in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 861]. It had before it a report by the UNCTAD secretariat on major new developments in large economic spaces and regional integration processes and their implications [TD/B/SEM.1/2 & Add.1].

In summarizing issues discussed at the Seminar, the Chairman noted that integration groupings had rapidly expanded to new countries and policy areas, even after the successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations. Reasons included the fact that regional arrangements were able to complement and go beyond what had been possible at the multilateral level. Economic spaces were no longer limited to the removal of tariffs, but had become multifaceted and multisectoral, covering a wide range of policies with a bearing on international trade, investment and development. Further driving forces included business-sector interest in gaining better market access and enhanced investment opportunities, as well as fast technological change which required vast markets to be cost-efficient.

Large economic spaces could have positive development effects for developing-country members, but fears were expressed about possible adverse effects on trade and investment of developing countries outside such groups, as preferential access was a big advantage on the world's largest consumer markets.

The Seminar considered various options for developing countries: strengthening multilateral liberalization; membership in regional or sub-regional groups among developing countries; and joining large economic spaces, provided that conditions for acceptance and competitiveness could be met. With regard to weaker trading nations, the importance of strengthening national policies to increase competitiveness and the capacity to respond to the challenges of regionalism was emphasized.

Several delegations pointed out that large economic spaces were increasingly expanding into new sectors that had substantial implications for third countries and the multilateral trading system. In cases where new areas were not covered by multilateral discipline, there was no defence for a non-member in relation to what regional groupings could do. Labour standards, movement of labour, immigration rules and social standards were cited as areas where economic integration was progressing and, indeed, were essential components for reaching socially balanced results. Regional integration placed increasing emphasis on investment and technology, and regional arrangements could comprise preferential liberalization of mutual investments. For third countries, there might be important risks of investment diversion arising from preferential liberalization or the incentives to investment in large regional markets. Such effects were considered particularly important with regard to the growth prospects of third developing countries.

It was stressed that regional arrangements must be WTO-consistent and it was proposed that article XXIV of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade should be further strengthened and reinterpreted.

In order to exploit the full potential of sub-regional and regional integration among developing countries, substantial further support was required with regard to strengthening the economic capacities of member States and their ongoing economic and social reform processes and providing the necessary infrastructure for successful integration.

Trade promotion and facilitation

During 1996, United Nations bodies continued to assist developing countries to promote their exports and to facilitate the movement of their goods in international commerce. The International Trade Centre was the main originator of technical cooperation projects in that area.

The TDB Commission on Enterprise, Business Facilitation and Development, established by UNCTAD IX in May, was scheduled to hold its first session in January 1997.

International Trade Centre

During 1996, the International Trade Centre (ITC), under the joint sponsorship of UNCTAD and WTO, continued to serve as the technical cooperation arm of those two bodies for operational and enterprise-oriented aspects of international trade development. It worked with developing countries and economies in transition in formulating and implementing trade promotion programmes and developing export opportunities.

Total expenditures of ITC in 1996 [ITC/AG(XXX)/160 & Add.1], the funds for which came from the regular budget (contributed equally by the United Nations and WTO), trust funds, UNDP and support costs (overheads reimbursed to ITC for implementing technical cooperation projects), were $36.1 million, a decrease from $41.8 million in 1995. Trust fund delivery dropped to $8.5 million from $9.8 million and delivery of UNDP funding fell to $4.1 million, from $5.7 million in 1995.

During the year, ITC work focused on six main programme areas or core services: product and market development; development of trade support services; trade information; human resource development; international purchasing and supply management; and needs assessment and programme design for trade promotion. Although activities were carried out for a wide variety of target groups, particular emphasis was given to LDCs. Within programme areas, ITC gave special attention to working directly with individual business enterprises in the light of the increasing role of the private sector in economic development and to specific follow-up action to the Uruguay Round Agreements of benefit to the business community.

In the product and market development sub-programme, ITC concentrated on: strengthening cooperation with international commodity bodies for commodity promotion projects; developing new tools for product promotion; and contributing to the programme on the Uruguay Round follow-up. Continuing regular activities included direct assistance to export enterprises and participation in product-oriented international events, sharing product knowledge with other national and international bodies for the benefit of developing countries.

In trade support services, ITC's functional advisory services continued to evolve in order to implement an increasingly integrated strategy of cooperation in pursuance of sustainable development through national capacity-building. The strategy linked ITC with national multiplier organizations in close and active partnerships through a series of activities ranging from the identification of business promotion needs to the development, adaptation and delivery of trade support services at the national or regional levels. Country-based capacity-building activities included customization of ITC products to local needs, the training of trainers and business counsellors, pilot events to demonstrate the practical use of new tools and techniques, and strong networking to build synergy between the business sector and its support agencies.

In the trade information sector, ITC continued to focus on capacity-building activities to assist trade information centres in beneficiary countries to develop their services and networks. That included developing a number of Internet applications and prototypes. ITC also supplied information to facilitate marketing decisions, market access and the use of appropriate information sources. The direct supply of price and market information was provided through the Market News Service.

In early 1996, ITC embarked on a comprehensive reformulation of its approach to human resource development and training activities. The new strategy included the development of a Global Competitiveness Curriculum—a programme of applied training which concentrated on the common, priority human resource development requirements of small and medium-sized enterprises with export potential; plans for a Trade Tutor Team-building Programme, under which national capacities would be developed to adapt the modules of the Curriculum to local business circumstances, manage the Curriculum's presentation and provide trade counselling support to participating enterprises; and the establishment of the Training Materials Development and Exchange Centre to disseminate training materials designed to support and enrich the trade-related services of human resource development institutions and small and medium-sized enterprises in developing and transition economies.

ITC's long-term objective in international purchasing and supply management was to assist developing and transition countries in ways to manage their purchasing and supply operations for imported goods and services as cost-effectively as possible. The new approach, incorporated into ongoing activities during 1996, aimed at developing a set of universal tools and related services needed to build and operate national capacities for providing training, consultancy support and information to the business community.

ITC's Global Trust Fund, established in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 960] as an additional means for donors to provide voluntary contributions, completed its first full year in 1996. The Consultative Committee of the Fund, composed of donors and beneficiaries, met four times during the year to review implementation of three programmes approved for financing under the Fund: Uruguay Round follow-up: information dissemination, needs identification and capacity-building; trade information and market intelligence support to business information services within the UNCTAD Special Programme for Trade Efficiency; and the international competitiveness programme for small and medium-sized export-oriented enterprises.

JAG action. The Joint Advisory Group (JAG) on ITC held its twenty-ninth session in Geneva from 15 to 19 April [ITC/AG(XXIX)/157]. Documents before it included a report on ITC activities in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 959]; the ITC mission statement [ITC/AG(XXIX)/154]; ITC's contribution to the UN medium-term plan (1998-2001) [ITC/AG(XXIX)/153]; and the report of the Consultative Committee on the Global Trust Fund [ITC/AG(XXIX)/155].

Having reviewed ITC's 1995 technical cooperation activities, the Group stressed the importance of devoting full attention to common issues such as environmental considerations, the advancement of women, and economic and technical cooperation among developing countries. The Group welcomed the ITC mission statement and expressed its full support for the formulation of the ITC strategy, core services, values and modus operandi. However, it noted that the priority to be given to LDCs should be explicitly mentioned in the statement.

Pledges of contributions to ITC, some made specifically to the Global Trust Fund, were announced by Canada, China, Denmark, Finland, Germany, India, Japan, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland.

Trading opportunities

The Ad Hoc Working Group on Trading Opportunities in the New International Trading Context, established by TDB in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 861], held its second session in Geneva from 5 to 8 February 1996, at which it adopted its final report

[TD/B/42(2)/12]. The Group had before it reports by the UNCTAD secretariat on enhancement of the understanding of the implications of the new rules deriving from the Uruguay Round Agreements and their follow-up [TD/B/WG.8/6], and on identification of areas in which technical cooperation should be strengthened [TD/B/WG.8/7].

On 8 February, the Group adopted recommendations for action at the national and international levels and on areas for future work by UNCTAD.

Commodities

The World Economic and Social Survey 1996 [Sales No. E.96.II.C.1] stated that prices of non-fuel commodities exported by developing countries were on average 11 per cent higher in 1995 than in 1994. However, those prices peaked in the first quarter of 1995, then slowly retreated. The commodity boom had thus lasted from the second half of 1993 through the dramatic increases of 1994 to the peak, from which point they had edged back by the end of 1995. Dollar prices in 1996 were expected to remain at roughly the end-year levels, if demand kept pace with the expected steady-but-moderate growth in the global economy.

The largest price gains in 1995 were for industrial raw materials owing to strong demand. The price index for the minerals and metals group rose 20 per cent, compared with agricultural raw materials which rose by 14 per cent. Increases for individual commodities, such as lead, tin, aluminium, copper, nickel and natural rubber, ranged from 11 to 40 per cent. Food prices increased by 6 per cent as a result of increased demand and supply shortages in global markets. The strongest growth in demand came from developing countries, where incomes had been growing steadily. Lower import tariffs and lower domestic food production in countries undergoing rapid industrialization contributed to the growing worldwide demand for food commodities, such as wheat, rice, beef, poultry, vegetable oils and oilseeds, as well as feed grains such as corn and soy meal. Tropical beverage prices rose only 1 per cent in 1995 under more normal supply conditions than in 1994, when coffee prices had more than doubled following a severe frost in Brazil's coffee-growing region.

Average oil prices were about 9 per cent higher in 1995 than in 1994, and by April 1996 crude oil prices were at their highest level since 1991. There were several special circumstances, including low inventory and uncertainty over whether the United Nations would allow Iraq to export some oil to buy food and medicine, which coincided with a surge in world demand for oil owing to the unexpectedly cold winter across the northern hemisphere and the rapid growth in consumption in Asia.

Common Fund for Commodities

The 1980 Agreement Establishing the Common Fund for Commodities [YUN 1980, p. 6211], a mechanism intended to stabilize the commodities market by helping to finance buffer stock of specific commodities as well as commodity development activities such as research and marketing, entered into force in 1989, and the Fund became operational later that year.

As at 31 December 1996, the Agreement had been signed by 115 States and the European Community (EC) (European Union), and 105 States and EC had become parties to it. Cote d'Ivoire and Myanmar acceded during the year.

Individual commodities

Agricultural commodities

Natural rubber. The United Nations Conference on Natural Rubber, 1994, met in its fourth part in Geneva on 28 March 1996 [TD/RUBBER.3/17], the first two parts having taken place in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 887] and the third part in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 964], when the International Natural Rubber Agreement, 1995, was adopted. As a number of countries were unable to sign the Agreement during the time it had been open for signature (3 April-28 December 1995), the fourth part of the Conference was convened for one day for the sole purpose of modifying the period of signature.

By a 28 March resolution [TD/RUBBER.3/16], the Conference decided that the Agreement could be signed until 31 July 1996.

As at 31 December 1996, 22 States and EC had signed the Agreement, 10 States had formally accepted it, and 8 States and EC had given notification of its provisional application.

Tropical timber. In accordance with article 41 of the International Tropical Timber Agreement, 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 887], a meeting was held in Geneva on 13 September 1996 [TD/TIMBER.2/19] to decide whether to put the Agreement into force provisionally or definitively, in whole or in part. The meeting was attended by signatories to the Agreement and States that were parties to it or had notified the depositary that they would apply it provisionally.

By a 13 September decision [TD/TIMBER.2/18], 31 States which were either parties to the Agreement or had agreed to apply it provisionally, plus EC, decided to put the Agreement into force provisionally among themselves as of 1 January 1997. They further decided that five States (Bolivia, Liberia, Norway, Peru, Togo) could notify the Secretary-General that they also accepted the decision.

As at 31 December 1996, 48 States and EC had signed the Agreement, 25 States had become parties to it and 20 States and EC had given notice of its provisional application.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/169.

Commodities

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/200 of 21 December 1990, 47/185 of 22 December 1992, 48/214 of 23 December 1993 and 49/104 of 19 December 1994, and stressing the urgent need to ensure their full implementation,

Recognizing that in many developing countries, in particular African countries and least developed countries, the commodity sector remains the principal source of export revenues and of the creation of employment, income and savings, and a driving force of investments and contributor to growth and development,

Also recognizing the need for a better functioning of commodity markets and the necessity of stable and more predictable commodity prices, including searching for long-term solutions,

Mindful of the need for developing countries, especially African countries and least developed countries, to diversify their economies, in particular the commodity sector, with a view to modernizing their production, distribution and marketing systems, enhancing productivity and stabilizing and increasing their export earnings,

Concerned about the difficulties experienced by the developing countries in financing and implementing viable diversification programmes,

1. Welcomes the outcome of the ninth session of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, including the Midrand Declaration and the document entitled "A Partnership for Growth and Development", related to the issues of commodities;

2. Emphasizes the need for developing countries that are heavily dependent on primary commodities of continuing to promote a domestic policy and an institutional environment that encourage diversification and enhance competitiveness;

3. Notes the need expressed by developing countries, in particular the commodity-dependent developing countries, for stable and more predictable commodity prices, in the face of instability and decline in real terms of the prices of many commodities;

4. Expresses the urgent need for supportive international policies to improve the functioning of commodity markets through efficient and transparent price formation mechanisms, including commodity exchanges, and through the use of commodity price risk management instruments;

5. Urges developed countries to continue to support the commodity diversification efforts of developing countries, especially African countries, in a spirit of common purpose and efficiency, inter alia, by providing technical and financial assistance for the preparatory phase of their commodity diversification programmes;

6. Reiterates the importance of maximizing the contribution of the commodity sector to economic growth and sustainable development in commodity-dependent developing countries and, in this respect, stresses, inter alia, that:

(a) Trade-distorting policies and practices, including tariff and non-tariff barriers, tariff escalation and obstacles to competition, have a negative effect on the ability of developing countries to diversify their exports and to undertake the requisite restructuring of their commodity sector;

(b) Expansion of South-South trade in commodities offers opportunities for intersectoral linkages within and among exporting countries;

(c) In line with Agenda 21 and the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, Governments should have as their objective to ensure that trade and environmental policies are mutually supportive so as to achieve sustainable development; in so doing, their environmental policies and measures with a potential trade impact should not be used for protectionist purposes;

(d) The issues related to commodities in the context of sustainable development should be fully taken into account by all overall review and appraisal machinery of the implementation of Agenda 21 adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development;

(e) There is a need to promote research and development, to provide infrastructure and support services and to encourage investment, including joint ventures in developing countries engaged in the commodity and commodity-processing sectors;

7. Emphasizes the importance for developing countries to process a significant part of their commodities, and in that regard stresses the importance of new market opportunities for their processed and semi-processed commodities;

8. Encourages the Common Fund for Commodities, in cooperation with the International Trade Centre, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and other relevant bodies, to direct its commodity development programmes more towards commodity sector diversification projects, as well as to promote commodity market development in the developing countries, with particular focus on the needs of least developed countries, and to explore effective ways and means of using the resources of the First Account of the Common Fund;

9. Urges producers and consumers of individual commodities to intensify their efforts to reinforce mutual cooperation and assistance;

10. Requests the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations and other relevant international organizations to continue to provide technical support to the basic food sector of developing countries, in particular net food-importing countries, inter alia, in meeting their commitments under the Uruguay Round agreements;

11. Welcomes the technical cooperation activities that will be undertaken by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, in collaboration with the World Trade Organization and other concerned international organizations in the field of international commodity trade;

12. Requests the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, within the framework of its programme of cooperation with the World Trade Organization, to provide analytical information related to the Ministerial Decision on Measures Concerning the Possible Negative Effects of the Reform Programme on Least Developed and Net Food-importing Developing Countries, and encourages it to continue to assist, in accordance with the outcome of its ninth session, in vertical and horizontal diversification in commodity-dependent countries and to promote the use of risk management in favour of producers and exporters;

13. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on world commodity trends and prospects, with particular emphasis on commodity-dependent developing countries in accordance with the outcome of the ninth session of the Conference;

14. Decides to include the question of commodities in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session.

General Assembly resolution 51/169

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/602) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.49), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica, for Group of 77 and China (A/C.2/51/L.14) and orally amended by Cote d'Ivoire; agenda item 94 (d).

Finance

Financial policy

During 1995, there continued to be great disparities in the experience of developing countries and transition economies regarding the availability of external financing from the international capital markets, according to the Trade and Development Report, 1996 [Sales No. E.96.II.D.6]. A minority of countries raised significant sums in the forms of equity and various types of debt from that source, while the remainder continued to depend more heavily on official financing, including export credits.

For the major recipients of funds from the international capital markets, 1995 was marked by the sequel to the Mexican financial crisis. But, even for Latin American countries, its consequences for bank loans and issues of debt instruments were short-lived, having more lasting effects in markets for internationally issued equities of developing countries of all regions. However, internationally issued equities by developing countries were increasingly dwarfed by institutional investors' direct purchases of domestically issued equities in emerging financial markets.

In the early months of 1996, some countries experienced surges in capital inflows which, as earlier in the 1990s, posed problems for macroeconomic policies. The countries affected were not only in Asia and Latin America but also, for the first time, in Central Europe.

Economies without access to international financial markets continued to fare less well in 1995. International bank lending to Africa again contracted. Moreover, the revival of export credits during 1994 was not sustained in 1995. For the majority of developing countries and transition economies, the official insurance cover associated with export credits continued to be available only on restrictive conditions or remained completely unavailable. Those limitations not only led to higher transaction costs in trade, but also indicated low creditworthiness for the countries concerned.

Episodes of international financial instability, such as the disruption of the European Union Exchange Rate Mechanism and the Mexican situation, led to widespread reconsideration of appropriate policies for fostering more orderly financial markets and handling crises due to volatile capital movements. One school of thought believed that convergence of macroeconomic policies, particularly with regard to inflation, interest rates and fiscal deficits, would largely suffice to produce stability. However, seeking to attain targets for such variables would generally be regarded as too deflationary by some countries and too inflationary by others. Also, the concepts underlying advocacy of policy convergence, linking the determination of exchange rates to such economic fundamentals, had only a tenuous connection to indicators widely used to guide the day-to-day decisions of traders in the currency markets.

Other ideas put forward included international lender-of-last-resort facilities and steps other than convergence for reducing international financial instability. Initiatives in the International Monetary Fund (IMF) had addressed an expansion of financing under the General Arrangements to Borrow and improvements in available information regarding countries borrowing from international financial markets. International debate had also focused on monetary union, better arrangements for handling countries' debt problems as they emerged, improved supervision of banks and securities firms, tax and tax-like measures to restrain currency speculation, and new methods of official intervention in foreign-exchange markets. Difficulties associated with various proposed measures needed to be seen in conjunction with the likely costs of failing to deal adequately with current policy lacunae. Continuing recurrences of international financial instability could be prejudicial to orderly trading relations and, more generally, to coherence in global economic policy-making.

By decision 1996/310 of 13 November, the Economic and Social Council decided that the high-level segment of its substantive session of 1997 should be devoted to the theme "Fostering an enabling environment for development: financial flows, including capital flows; investment; trade".

Net transfer of resources

In response to a 1994 General Assembly request [YUN 1994, p. 892], the Secretary-General reported [A/51/291] on net transfer of resources between developing and developed countries. He described recent developments in the net financial transfer to developing countries, noting that there had been a large net transfer in every year since 1991. The very large transfer out of the Latin American and Caribbean region in the 1980s had reversed direction by 1992, although the net inflow was almost eliminated in 1995. Western Asia, once a source of financial transfers to the rest of the world, had been absorbing them for over a decade, albeit in declining amounts. The rest of Asia had alternated between supplying financial resources on a net basis and absorbing them, most recently the latter. The net transfer of Africa, which had been negative and positive in different years in the 1980s, had remained positive since 1993. The LDCs had, as a group, continuously received a positive net transfer, albeit an amount that had grown rather slowly in dollar terms since the 1980s.

However, by individual country, of 93 developing countries for which detailed figures were available, 21 had negative net transfers of financial resources over the period 1991-1994, despite the switch at the aggregate level to a positive net transfer. Brazil had the largest negative transfer during the period, averaging more than $ 10 billion a year; the next largest was China, whose negative transfer was only one third as large and reflected very different circumstances (Brazil faced major external debt and domestic adjustment problems, while China experienced the rapid build-up of savings that accompanied its economic growth).

The net transfer of financial resources of the 93-country sample was almost $40 billion in 1995. However, when all financial flows in and out of those countries were added together, including interest and other investment income payments, the net inflow—called the net transfer on a financial basis—was about $94 billion. Clearly, a very considerable volume of financial resources was made available to developing countries in 1995, well over $50 billion of which was added to official reserve holdings instead of being used to expand imports. However, as the Mexican crisis demonstrated, large reserve holdings could be expended very rapidly when a country developed a high demand for imports and foreign financial flows started to disappear. Nevertheless, the accumulation of large levels of reserves helped to boost the confidence of foreign investors, although reserves would not substitute for appropriate macroeconomic policy, at least not indefinitely.

Regarding the composition of financial flows themselves, several facts stood out, the report said. Flows of foreign direct investment (FDI) showed a steady and strong upward trend, mainly accounted for by the virtual explosion of FDI in Asia, particularly East Asia. Net FDI in Asia rose above $50 billion and in 1995 accounted for four fifths of the net flow to the 93 countries considered. The strong direct flows to Asia seemed to reflect the overall dynamism of the region. Direct investment flows to Latin America also grew, although not nearly so strongly, reflecting the somewhat more fragile situation of several economies. At the same time, there was no notable pick-up in flows to Africa as a whole, with barely any flows to sub-Saharan Africa.

In discussing official financial cooperation, the report noted that, despite large net financial transfers to developing countries in recent years, the development process still required a strong official international presence to assist in times of stress in individual countries and to address problems of a global nature that put development progress at risk. That required, in particular, a strong IMF with the capacity to stand behind its policy advice with sufficient financial support of adjusting countries. Three important sets of IMF financing discussions were advancing towards agreement: expansion of contingency resources (the General Arrangements to Borrow), upon which the Fund would be able to draw in event of need; an increase in the Fund's own resources through the Eleventh General Review of Quotas; and future funding for the Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility, which provided loans on highly concessional terms in support of adjustment programmes in low-income countries.

For most developing countries, the need for international official support went beyond adjustment financing measures, with most countries requiring official development assistance (ODA).

In that regard, member countries of the Development Assistance Committee (DAC) of OECD had always been the largest source of ODA, but they had become the source of almost the entire aid flow since the economic situation deteriorated in certain major oil-exporting countries and in the European countries with economies in transition. However, DAC flows peaked in 1992 and, with a 9.3 per cent drop in 1995, they fell 13.5 per cent below that peak, measured in constant prices and exchange rates.

Those developments in ODA were being reflected in the concessional channels of multilateral cooperation. The resource commitments, which were on a grant basis, of the operational agencies of the UN system dropped from $3.5 billion in 1994 to $3.1 billion in 1995, while the largest multilateral lending agency, the International Development Association of the World Bank, committed $6 billion in concessional loans in 1995, down from $7.3 billion in 1994. The African Development Fund, the concessional arm of the African Development Bank, made no new lending commitments in 1994 or 1995, and replenishment was not agreed upon until May 1996.

The report concluded that a lesson of the recent surge in net transfers was that there were dangers as well as opportunities in the international financial market place. Governments needed to be concerned not only with the overall volume of net financial inflows but also with their durability. The combination of sustainable domestic policies and strong economic growth appeared to set the stage for more desirable mixes of private financial inflows.

The relative absence of private-sector net transfers to Africa in the first half of the 1990s illustrated the point that the limited attractiveness to potential foreign investors of low-income, slow growth and often distressed economies meant that official sources of finance still had to carry much of the burden if those countries were to invest more than their limited domestic savings allowed and accelerate their economic growth. Recent improvements in the African economy suggested that the continent might be able to make better use of resource inflows and more, not less, official assistance was required for that.

Development assistance was a political question, it was stated. Governments allocated monies from their national budgets for ODA, and if ODA levels were falling it was because public spending priorities were changing. If it were only a question of one country reducing its commitment, others could successfully pressure that country to participate or replace its resources with their own. However, data on ODA suggested that pessimism on the question was more widespread, however misplaced. Judiciously applied in the proper circumstances and targeted in appropriate ways, aid promoted development. It thus seemed to be a question of determining how to recover political momentum for development assistance.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/165.

Net flows and transfer of resources between developing and developed countries

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions 47/178 of 22 December 1992 and 49/93 of 19 December 1994,

Taking note of the World Economic and Social Survey, 1996, in particular chapter III thereof, entitled "The international economy", and the report of the Secretary-General on the net transfer of resources between developing and developed countries,

Recognizing that, while developing countries have primary responsibility for their own development, there is continuing need for the international community to give strong support to their efforts to solve their economic and social problems through, inter alia, the promotion of a favourable international economic environment,

Noting that for many developing countries, especially those in Africa and the least developed countries, official development assistance remains an important source of financial resources to support their development efforts,

Recognizing the increasing role of private investment and that the completion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations was a major step by the international community towards the expansion of the rule-based international trading system, advancing liberalization in international trade and creating a more secure trading environment,

Noting that capital flows, in particular private capital flows, to developing countries have been increasing strongly but that not all countries have benefited from such flows and that short-term capital movements can be unpredictable,

Noting also that the future course of net transfer of resources to developing countries depends on a growth-oriented and supportive international economic environment and on sound domestic economic policies,

Stressing the unpredictable character of short-term private capital movements, which are particularly subject to interest-rate variations and other possible fluctuations in the domestic and international economic environment,

Noting that in the 1990s the net transfer of resources from the Bretton Woods institutions to developing countries has been negative in real terms, although it has been positive to countries in Africa and to certain countries in Asia, and noting also that the net financial transfer from regional banks to developing countries, taken together, has been generally positive in the 1990s, although it became slightly negative in 1994 and 1995,

Expressing its concern at the recent decline in the overall level of official development assistance,

Bearing in mind that all countries, particularly the major industrialized countries, which have significant weight in influencing world economic growth and the international economic environment, should continue their efforts to promote sustained economic growth and sustainable development, to narrow imbalances, and to cooperate with the developing countries so as to enhance their ability to address and alleviate their major problems in the areas of money, finance, resource flows, trade, commodities and external indebtedness,

1. Stresses the need to increase efforts to ensure the flow of substantial resources to developing countries through, inter alia, an expansion of multilateral credits, the promotion of foreign direct investment and an increase in concessional and non-debt resources;

2. Also stresses that private capital flows are an important external source of financing for sustainable development and that attracting such investment requires, inter alia, sound fiscal and monetary policies, accountable governmental institutions and transparent legal and regulatory regimes;

3. Reaffirms the pressing need of developing countries for official development assistance, especially those in Africa and the least developed countries, and urges countries to strive to fulfil, consistent with commitments in international agreements, the agreed target of 0.7 per cent of the gross national product of developed countries for official development assistance to the developing countries, and the target, where agreed, of 0.15 per cent of the gross national product of the developed countries for official development assistance to the least developed countries as soon as possible;

4. Stresses the need to mobilize public support for development cooperation, inter alia, through a strategy based on partnership between developed and developing countries which incorporates, as appropriate, mutually agreed goals for development;

5. Also stresses the importance of the role of the International Development Association as a highly concessional lending arm of the World Bank for promoting development in eligible developing countries, and urges donors fully to honour their commitment thereto, in particular to the eleventh replenishment of the Association, and to secure its adequate future funding;

6. Appeals to all countries to continue to cooperate and work together on issues relating to the Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility, with a view to arriving at a self-sustained facility, including the provision of bilateral contributions; if the need arises, the International Monetary Fund should consider optimizing its reserves management in order to facilitate financing of the Facility;

7. Urges all international financial institutions and donor countries, as appropriate, to continue their own efforts to improve the quality and effectiveness of their lending, inter alia, through thorough assessment of the contributions to sustainable development of projects financed, effective monitoring and evaluation, and increased concessionality, where appropriate;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to monitor developments in the net flows and transfer of resources between developing and developed countries and to utilize all relevant reports, such as those provided by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the regional development banks, and to report thereon in the World Economic and Social Survey, 1997, and also requests the Secretary-General to report, in close cooperation with the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the Bretton Woods institutions, to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on the implementation of the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 51/165

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/602) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.53), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica, for Group of 77 and China (A/C.2/51/L.26); agenda item 94 (b).

Global financial integration

In response to a 1995 General Assembly request [YUN 1995, p. 968], the Secretary-General in September reported [A/51/388] on the challenges and opportunities of global financial integration, in which he noted that, as technological advances reduced the cost and increased the speed of international financial transactions and as policy liberalization removed barriers to international capital flows, financial institutions had increasingly added foreign assets to their portfolios. Mainly short-term assets and borrowings of banks were traded internationally at first, but that had expanded to a broader range of financial instruments. That diversification had also stimulated a rapid pace of innovation in financial instruments, known as derivatives, which allowed financial investors to modify the types and degree of risk they faced from possible changes in exchange rates and interest rates. It had become common to refer to those trends collectively as global financial integration.

Although some developing countries had been able to take advantage of the globalization of finance and tap markets for an increasing volume and variety of financial flows, many of them had also been stung by the potential volatility of some flows. In fact, international financial markets had gone through a highly unsettled period in 1994 and 1995. Many analysts feared that a prime reason for the heavy flow of finance to Latin America in the early 1990s had been the relatively low interest rates in the United States, which would not and did not last.

Developed countries were also vulnerable. The foreign exchange markets of the major currency countries experienced a very turbulent period from 1994 through early 1995, as the United States dollar plunged against the deutsche mark and the Japanese yen, several European currencies slumped against the deutsche mark, and the latter hit a record low against the yen. In addition, investors pulled funds out of Mexico in 1994 and other countries in early 1995. Since Governments and market participants clearly recognized the benefits of the growth of international financial flows and the need to avert the adverse effects of their turbulence, global financial integration had been accompanied by a refinement in the nature of measures taken by those parties to enhance the environment for international capital flows.

The report also described the global macroeconomic environment, discussed how to make international financial markets work better and more safely, and addressed the question of the quality and quantity of access to international finance.

In conclusion, the report suggested that the General Assembly might wish to consider whether and how global financial integration might be addressed during the policy dialogue of the high-level segment of the annual session of the Economic and Social Council.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/166.

Global financial integration and strengthening collaboration between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolution 50/91 of 20 December 1995, entitled "Global financial integration: challenges and opportunities", and Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/43 of 26 July 1996 on strengthening collaboration between the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions,

Expressing concern that a number of developing countries have become more vulnerable, in the course of liberalizing their external economic and financial regimes, to the volatile fluctuations of private capital flows in international financial markets, and stressing the importance at the national level in the countries concerned of a favourable climate for private financial flows, sound macroeconomic policies and appropriate functioning of markets,

Welcoming the initiative the Bretton Woods institutions have taken to address the question of the volatility of capital flows,

Recalling its resolution 50/227 of 24 May 1996, annex I, section VIII, on the relationship between the United Nations and the international finance and trade institutions, as well as other relevant resolutions,

1. Recognizes that technological advances have reduced the costs and increased the speed of international financial transactions and that, as policy liberalization has facilitated international capital flows, financial institutions have increasingly added foreign assets to their portfolios, paving the way towards the phenomenon of global financial integration;

2. Stresses that global financial integration presents new challenges and opportunities for the international community and that it should constitute a very important element of the dialogue between the United Nations system and the Bretton Woods institutions;

3. Notes that the globalization of financial markets can generate new risks of instability, including interest rate and exchange rate fluctuations and volatile short-term capital flows, which require all countries to pursue sound economic policies and to recognize the external economic impact of their domestic policies;

4. Stresses that sound domestic macroeconomic policies of each country in regard to promoting macroeconomic stability and growth are primary elements for determining private capital flows, and that the co-ordination of macroeconomic policies, where appropriate, and a favourable international economic environment play an important role in reinforcing their effectiveness;

5. Also stresses that implementation of sound domestic monetary, fiscal and structural policies over the medium term, including ensuring sound banking systems, is required to promote financial and exchange rate stability;

6. Further stresses that Governments and international financial institutions have a contribution to make to reducing the risks of volatility of short-term capital flows and to promoting stability in domestic financial markets, within their respective competences;

7. Recognizes the progress made in improving risk management and transparency in international financial markets, such as the International Monetary Fund's improved surveillance capacities, standards for the provision of economic and financial information to markets and the creation of an emergency financing mechanism;

8. Also recognizes the progress made in establishing the new arrangements to borrow, which would effectively double the resources currently available to the International Monetary Fund under the General Arrangements to Borrow and improve the Fund's ability to assist members in circumstances that could have systemic implications;

9. Recalls that, in the context of global financial integration, further efforts have to be made, at both the national and international levels, to strengthen international economic cooperation;

10. Recognizes that a number of developing countries have been able to take advantage of the globalization of finance, and notes the need for the expansion of private capital flows and for broader access by all developing countries to those flows, and therefore the need for the international community to assist low-income countries, especially those in Africa, in their efforts to create the enabling environment necessary to attract such flows;

11. Notes that a number of developing countries, among them most of the least developed countries, especially those of Africa, have not benefited from the globalization of finance and continue to be in great need of official development assistance;

12. Recognizes, in this context, that the regular lending programmes of the multilateral institutions, recent initiatives aiming at enhancing the confidence of the financial markets, and the operational activities of the United Nations system, inter alia, in promoting capacity-building for sound financial management, contribute to assisting recipient countries, particularly developing countries, in such adjustment and stabilization efforts as are conducive to their development process;

13. Welcomes Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/43 on strengthening collaboration between the United Nations development system and the Bretton Woods institutions, and calls for its full implementation;

14. Notes that cooperation between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions continues to be strengthened at the level of operational activities for development;

15. Considers that the strengthening of collaboration between the United Nations and the Bretton Woods institutions requires an integrated approach, encompassing a closer policy dialogue at the intergovernmental level on relevant areas of international development policy issues, taking into account their respective competences;

16. Stresses the need for encouragement of private flows to all countries, in particular to developing countries, while reducing the risks of volatility;

17. Emphasizes the need to explore ways to broaden appropriate enhanced cooperation and, where appropriate, coordination of macroeconomic policy among interested countries, monetary and financial authorities and institutions, so as to enhance preventive consultation arrangements between such institutions as a means of promoting a stable international financial environment conducive to economic growth, particularly of developing countries, taking into account the needs of developing countries as well as situations that may have a significant impact upon the international financial system;

18. Reiterates the need for broadening and strengthening the participation of developing countries in the international economic decision-making process;

19. Welcomes the steps taken by the International Monetary Fund, and recognizes the need for a stronger and central role for the Fund in surveillance of all countries, in a symmetrical manner;

20. Reaffirms the objective of promoting greater transparency and openness, including increasing participation of developing countries in the work of the International Monetary Fund, this objective also involving, among other elements, the regular and timely provision of economic and financial data by all Fund members;

21. Welcomes the decision of the Economic and Social Council that the theme of its high-level segment in 1997 will be: "Fostering an enabling environment for development—financial flows, including capital flows; investment; trade";

22. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly, at its fifty-second session, in cooperation with the Bretton Woods institutions and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, on the implementation of the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 51/166

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/602) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.50), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica, for Group of 77 and China (A/C.2/51/L.28); agenda item 94 (b).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 29-33, 35-37; plenary 86.

Also on 16 December, the Assembly, by decision 51/442, took note of the Secretary-General's report on the challenges and opportunities of global financial integration.

Debt problems of developing countries

In a report on the developing country debt situation as of mid-1996 [A/51/294], prepared in response to a 1995 General Assembly request [YUN 1995, p. 970], the Secretary-General stated that the gross external debt of capital-importing developing countries had grown by an estimated $120 billion in 1995, topping $1.7 trillion by the end of the year. In a change from the earlier years of the 1990s, long-term lending by official creditors rose faster than private lending, largely as a result of the international rescue package for Mexico and a smaller one for Argentina. While the growth of private-credit flows dropped in Latin America and the Caribbean as a temporary fallout of the Mexican crisis, they expanded significantly in Asia, particularly in East Asia's emerging markets, reflecting investors' increased discrimination among borrowers through a closer evaluation of economic fundamentals. As a result, Asia had registered the largest rise in the debt stock among geographical regions, and its share in the debt stock of developing countries reached nearly 40 per cent of the total in 1995. Meanwhile, Africa's share gradually declined, from around 22 per cent in 1990 to about 18 per cent in 1995.

Long-term debt remained fairly equally distributed between official and private creditors, with the latter holding about 47 per cent of the total in 1995. However, the distribution varied substantially by region: close to 60 per cent of Latin America's long-term debt was owed to private creditors, while the share of private creditors in Africa was less than 26 per cent, reflecting the traditionally limited market access of that region. In Asia, private creditors' share rose from 40 to 46 per cent between 1990 and 1995.

Based on the ratios of external debt to gross national product, external debt to exports of goods and services, and debt service to exports, the overall debt situation of developing countries appeared to have improved somewhat in 1995, with the average ratio of external debt to exports for all countries falling to the lowest level since the beginning of the debt crisis. However, indicators varied both among and within regions.

The report highlighted the debt situation of a new grouping of countries—the heavily indebted poor countries—noting that the multilateral debt of that group had reached $62 billion in 1994, or about 26 per cent of their total external debt of $241 billion. At the same time, multilateral debt service represented more than 46 per cent of the total debt service of those countries. Three multilateral financial institutions—the World Bank, IMF and the African Development Bank—accounted for over 80 per cent of the heavily indebted poor countries' multilateral debt. Debt owed to multilateral creditors could not be formally restructured or subjected to cancellation or reduction, owing to the preferred-creditor status enjoyed by the institutions.

Describing the outcome of the April 1996 meeting of the Development Committee (the Joint Ministerial Committee of the Boards of Governors of the World Bank and IMF), as requested by the Assembly in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 970], the report stated that a new framework of action had been approved to resolve the debt problems of the heavily indebted poor countries. The initiative offered eligible countries a commitment by the creditor community to alleviate their debt burden in order to bring it to sustainable levels. That would be achieved by reducing the net present value of claims on the indebted country. In each case, the various bilateral and multilateral creditors would provide relief proportional to their exposure to the indebted country. The underlying idea was that assisting those countries to reduce their external debt would help increase investor confidence and remove an important impediment to growth.

In conclusion, the report stated that the new initiative to advance the resolution of the external debt problems of heavily indebted poor countries was a welcome step forward. Some flexibility, both in terms of the use of debt indicators for eligibility and the time-frame of enhanced multilateral measures, might be required to assist countries with a satisfactory policy track record to resume sustainable growth and normal external financial relations. Two additional areas of concern remained to be addressed if the debt overhang of heavily indebted poor countries was to be gradually eliminated: (1) it was essential that an adequate replenishment of the soft-loan windows of multilateral financial institutions be implemented in order to provide the necessary resources on terms that were affordable to those countries and without sacrifices being imposed on other countries; (2) and the focus over the years on commercial bank debt, Paris Club debt and multilateral debt still left to be adequately addressed the question of debt owed to bilateral creditors that had not participated in the Paris Club of creditor countries. A coherent framework to deal with that debt was critical for a number of heavily indebted poor countries in Africa.

With the signing in July 1996 of a Paris Club agreement for Peru, the debt-restructuring process for middle-income countries had largely been completed. However, several of those countries still displayed the indicators of a fragile external financial position. They remained highly vulnerable to external shocks, and domestic policy mistakes could be extremely costly. Central to avoiding new crises seemed to be limiting exposure to the more volatile forms of finance before an economy was ready and maintaining the confidence of international financial investors. Individual countries had a central responsibility in that regard, but the international community was also undertaking to play a greater role (see above, under "Global financial integration").

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/164.

Enhancing international cooperation towards a durable solution to the external debt problem of developing countries

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/165 of 21 December 1993 and 50/92 of 20 December 1995 and the relevant provisions of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee of the Whole of the General Assembly for the Mid-term Review of the Implementation of the United Nations New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s, as well as the results, as agreed, of all major United Nations conferences and summit meetings held since the beginning of the 1990s,

Reaffirming the urgent need for effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions to the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries and to help them to exit from the rescheduling process,

Noting the improvement in the debt situation of a number of developing countries since the second half of the 1980s and the contribution that the evolving debt strategy has made to this improvement, noting with appreciation the debt-relief measures taken by creditor countries both within the framework of the Paris Club and through their cancellation and equivalent relief of bilateral official debt, and welcoming the even more favourable debt-relief measures taken by the Paris Club on the basis of the Naples terms of December 1994,

Stressing the need for a full and swift implementation of those initiatives, which will further assist developing countries, in particular the poorest and heavily indebted countries, especially in Africa, in their efforts to improve their debt situation in view of their continued very high level of total debt stock and servicing burdens,

Emphasizing the importance for debtor countries of continuing to pursue and intensify their efforts with respect to economic reforms, and stabilization and structural adjustment programmes, in order to raise savings and investments, reduce inflation and improve economic efficiency, taking into account the need to address the social aspects of development, including the eradication of poverty, and their individual characteristics, as well as the vulnerability of the poorer strata of their populations,

Noting with concern the continuing debt and debt-servicing problems of indebted developing countries as constituting an element adversely affecting their development efforts and economic growth, and stressing the importance of alleviating the onerous debt and debt-service burdens connected with various types of debt of many developing countries, on the basis of an effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable approach and, where appropriate, addressing the full stock of debt of the poorest and most indebted developing countries as a matter of priority,

Noting that those developing countries that have continued, at great cost to themselves, to meet their international debt and debt-service obligations in a timely fashion have done so despite serious external and domestic financial constraints,

Expressing its concern that debt-relief measures taken so far have not yet fully provided effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions to the outstanding debt and debt-servicing problems of a large number of developing countries, in particular the poorest and heavily indebted countries,

Noting the situation in some creditor countries with economies in transition in addressing the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries,

Stressing the need for continuing global economic growth and the necessity for a continuing supportive international economic environment with regard to, inter alia, terms of trade, commodity prices, improved market access, trade practices, access to technology, exchange rates and international interest rates, and noting the continued need for resources for sustained economic growth and sustainable development of the developing countries,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the developing country debt situation as at mid-1996;

2. Recognizes that effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions to the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries can contribute substantially to the strengthening of the global economy and to the efforts of developing countries to achieve sustained economic growth and sustainable development;

3. Notes that further progress, including swift implementation of innovative approaches and concrete measures, is essential for contributing to effective, equitable, development-oriented and durable solutions to the external debt and debt-servicing problems of developing countries, particularly the poorest and heavily indebted countries;

4. Stresses the importance for developing countries of continuing their efforts to promote a favourable environment for attracting foreign investment, thereby promoting economic growth and sustainable development so as to favour their exit from debt and debt-servicing problems, and also stresses the need for the international community to promote a conducive external economic environment through, inter alia, improved market access, stabilization of exchange rates, effective stewardship of international interest rates, increased resource flows, access to international financial markets, flow of financial resources and improved access to technology for the developing countries;

5. Also stresses that the evolving debt strategy must be accompanied by a favourable and supportive international economic environment, including the full implementation of the results of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, and the Marrakesh ministerial decisions in favour of the least developed countries and the net food-importing developing countries;

6. Welcomes the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative endorsed by the Interim Committee of the International Monetary Fund and the Development Committee of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, designed to enable eligible heavily indebted poor countries to achieve a sustainable debt situation through coordinated action by all creditors on the basis of adjustment efforts by the debtor countries;

7. Recognizes that the implementation of the Initiative requires additional financial resources from both bilateral and multilateral creditors without affecting the support required for development activities of developing countries, welcomes the commitment made to provide additional resources for the Initiative, and invites bilateral donors to contribute to the Trust Fund for the implementation of the Initiative;

8. Stresses the urgent need for the developed countries to give the Initiative the support it both needs and deserves and to implement it flexibly to ensure that the performance already achieved is taken into account in determining the duration of adjustment required to reach, with the assistance of all creditors, an exit from debt rescheduling;

9. Also stresses the importance of implementing the Initiative's eligibility criteria flexibly, in a transparent manner, and with the full involvement of the debtor country, and further stresses the importance of continuously evaluating and actively monitoring the implications of the existing terms of the eligibility criteria in the implementation of the Initiative, so as to ensure sufficient coverage of heavily indebted poor countries;

10. Underlines the importance of the transparency and involvement of debtor countries in any review and analysis that will be conducted during the adjustment period;

11. Welcomes the decision taken by the Paris Club to go beyond the Naples terms to provide debt reduction, including some debt stock forgiveness for the poorest and most heavily indebted countries, stresses the need for the swift implementation of that decision, and urges all other bilateral creditors to make comparable contributions in the context of coordinated efforts by all countries;

12. Recognizes the efforts of indebted developing countries in regard to fulfilling their commitments on debt servicing despite the incurring of a high social cost and, in this regard, encourages private creditors and, in particular, commercial banks to continue their initiatives and efforts to address the commercial debt problems of middle-income developing countries;

13. Invites creditor countries, private banks and multilateral financial institutions, within their prerogatives, to continue the initiatives and efforts to address the commercial debt problems of the least developed countries and the requests for continued mobilization of resources through the Debt-reduction Facility of the International Development Association in order to help eligible least developed countries reduce their commercial debt;

14. Invites the International Monetary Fund to continue devising concrete measures and action to address the problems faced by indebted developing countries, including the provision of bilateral contributions and, if the need arises, to consider optimizing its reserves management in order to facilitate the financing of the Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility;

15. Reaffirms the Mid-term Global Review of Progress towards the Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s, in particular the appropriate actions in favour of those countries concerning their official bilateral, commercial and multilateral debt;

16. Notes with concern the continuing burden of debt and debt-service obligations of middle-income countries, including in particular those in Africa, and encourages creditors, including multilateral financial institutions and commercial banks, to continue to address their obligations effectively;

17. Stresses the importance of continued concessional Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility lending operations for low-income developing countries;

18. Also stresses the need for, in addition to debt-relief measures that include debt and debt-service reduction, new financial flows to debtor developing countries from all sources, and urges creditor countries and multilateral financial institutions to continue to extend concessional financial assistance, particularly to the least developed countries, in order to support the implementation of economic reforms, stabilization and structural adjustment programmes and the eradication of poverty by the developing countries so as to enable them to extricate themselves from the debt overhang and attract new investment and to assist them in achieving sustained economic growth and sustainable development;

19. Further stresses the urgent need to continue to provide social safety nets to vulnerable groups most adversely affected by the implementation of economic reform programmes in the debtor countries, in particular low-income groups;

20. Calls upon the international community, including the United Nations system, and invites the Bretton Woods institutions, as well as the private sector, to take appropriate measures and action for the implementation of the commitments, agreements and decisions of the major United Nations conferences and summits organized since the beginning of the 1990s on development related to the question of external debt;

21. Requests the Secretary-General, in close cooperation with the Bretton Woods institutions and other relevant bodies of the United Nations system, to closely follow the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative and to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the implementation of the Initiative and of the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 51/164

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/602) without vote, 2 December (meeting 38); draft by Costa Rica (for Group of 77 and China) and Colombia (for Non-Aligned Movement) (A/C.2/51/L.24/Rev.1), orally revised; agenda item 94 (a).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 29-33, 35-38; plenary 86.

Investment, technology and related financial issues

The Commission on Investment, Technology and Related Financial Issues, established by TDB in July on the recommendation of UNCTAD IX (see above), held the first part of its first session in Geneva from 18 to 22 November [TD/B/44/4].

Among documents before the Commission for its consideration of developments in international investment was the World Investment Report 1996: Investment, Trade and International Policy Arrangements [Sales No. E.96.II.A.14]. The document noted that world economic growth and the response of transnational corporations to technological development, international competition and liberalization had propelled global FDI flows to unprecedented levels in 1995. Inflows reached a record of $315 billion—40 per cent more than in 1994—but investment outflows also hit new highs, reaching $318 billion, an increase of 38 per cent over 1994. World FDI flows were expected to remain at a high level in 1996, it was stated.

Developed countries were the key force behind the record 1995 flows, with inflows rising by 53 per cent to $203 billion and outflows rising by 42 per cent to $271 billion. However, the spectacular flows into developed countries did not detract from flows into developing countries. At $100 billion (a 15 per cent increase over 1994), they also set a record in 1995, although their share in global inflows declined to 32 per cent, after having increased for the previous six years. While continuing to be small, FDI inflows to the 48 LDCs (see PART THREE, Chapter I) increased as well, by 29 per cent in 1995, to $1.1 billion. With $47 billion in 1995 (15 per cent of outflows), developing countries scored another record in FDI outflows, accelerating their production-level integration into the world economy. After stagnation in 1994, FDI flows to Central and Eastern Europe nearly doubled, to $12 billion.

For its discussion of issues related to competition law of particular relevance to development, the Commission had before it a note by the UNCTAD secretariat [TD/B/COM.2/2 & Add.1], providing the background of UNCTAD's work on restrictive business practices and proposed continuing analytical work on restrictive business practices and assistance in formulating competition policies and legislation. It was stated that competition policy aimed at minimizing restrictions on free competition, both by controlling restrictive business practices engaged in by firms, and by promoting the reform of governmental regulations or measures when they unjustifiably distorted competition or created barriers to market entry by new competitors. The Commission also considered the agreed recommendations of the Expert Meeting on Competition Law and Policy (see below), the report of the Third (1995) United Nations Conference to Review All Aspects of the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices [YUN 1995, p. 961], and the report of the Intergovernmental Working Group of Experts on International Standards of Accounting and Reporting on its fourteenth session (see below).

Competition law and policy

The Expert Meeting on Competition Law and Policy held its first session in Geneva from 13 to 15 November [TD/B/COM.2/3]. In agreed conclusions, it recommended that it meet again in 1997 to consider: consultations on competition law and policy, including the Model Law and studies related to the provisions of the Set of Principles and Rules; and UNCTAD's work programme, including technical assistance and advisory and training programmes on competition law and policy. The UNCTAD secretariat was requested to prepare a number of reports for the 1997 session.

Standards of accounting and reporting

The International Working Group of Experts on International Standards of Accounting and Reporting held its fourteenth session in Geneva from 1 to 5 July [TD/B/ITNC/7]. It had before it reports by the UNCTAD secretariat on commercial bank accounting and disclosures [TD/B/ITNC/AC.1/9] and on accounting and reporting for government concessions [TD/B/ITNC/AC.1/8]. The Group agreed that UNCTAD should publish both reports and provide them to the International Accounting Standards Committee for consideration and response.

The Group strongly recommended that work on international standards of accounting and reporting be pursued in UNCTAD on an ongoing basis, since reliable, transparent and comparable financial information was necessary for growth and development in general and for a sound banking sector and stock market, as well as for the attraction of FDI and for successful privatization.

It recommended that an expert meeting be convened and focus on environmental accounting and the development of the global qualification for accountants.

Taxation

By decision 1996/233 of 15 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the report of the Secretary-General on the seventh (1995) meeting of the Ad Hoc Group of Experts on International Cooperation in Tax Matters [YUN 1995, p. 973].

Transport

Maritime transport

Ports

The Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Ports held its second session in Geneva from 18 to 22 March 1996 [TD/B/CN.4/57], having held its first session in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 766]. In its conclusions, entitled "Ports—an emerging partnership for development", the Group stated that, over the last decades, there had been an evolutionary process through which a port organization passed from a wholly government-controlled body to more efficient organization schemes, including the landlord organization scheme, coordinating private- and public-sector bodies, and sometimes the totally privatized organization. In all cases, there was a need for the Government to provide a regulatory framework to address issues of national and international relevance, such as safety and the environment, and to act as coordinator for port development, including hinterland connections. A pragmatic approach to port modernization would be for Governments to encourage the private sector to participate in development and expansion projects. However, it was unlikely that the private sector would be willing to invest in common infrastructure, such as breakwaters and approach channels. Thus, a partnership between the Government and public and private sectors was an emerging and necessary trend for development. The Group observed that while developed countries had succeeded in certain cases in implementing privatization, developing countries should be encouraged to do so with caution since they might not have the logistical, legal and financial framework.

The Group's general recommendations included that: Governments should review the institutional structure of their ports; port authorities should be pro-active in order to play an important role in fostering trade; price controls should be relaxed when a port had achieved financial self-sufficiency and could demonstrate that flexible (strategic) pricing would foster additional trade; cooperation among ports was essential in the area of compliance with international regulations and Governments should acknowledge the important development role of cooperation, including forums such as Legiport; and training represented an important investment which should be promoted by Governments.

Specific recommendations included that: the UNCTAD secretariat should maintain its programme of work on the development and modernization of ports by updating the most important background studies, issuing new monographs on current topics and continuing the dissemination of information by means of the Ports Newsletter and other media to the informal network of port focal points; the Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Ports should meet every two years; priority for study should be given to quality management in port operations, development of value-added services in ports as a means of trade promotion, economic impacts on ports of potential developments in marine environment regimes and comparative analysis of legal regimes for ports; and priority should also be given to developing training packages in strategic planning, strategic pricing and quality management.

Maritime liens and mortgages

The Joint UNCTAD/International Maritime Organization (IMO) Intergovernmental Group of Experts on Maritime Liens and Mortgages and Related Subjects held its ninth session in Geneva from 2 to 6 December [TD/B/44/3]. It considered the review of the International Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules relating to the Arrest of Sea-going Ships, 1952, for which it had before it a note by the secretariats of UNCTAD and IMO [TD/B/IGE.1/2], as well as a note by the UNCTAD secretariat transmitting comments and proposals by Governments on the draft articles for a convention on arrest of ships [TD/B/IGE.1/3].

The Group recommended to the IMO Council and to TDB that they consider favourably, on the basis of work done so far, proposing to the General Assembly the convening of a diplomatic conference to consider and adopt a convention on certain rules relating to the arrest of sea-going ships, on the basis of the draft articles prepared by the Group.

Air transport

On 6 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/33.

Proclamation of 7 December as International Civil Aviation Day

The General Assembly,

Noting that 7 December marks the anniversary of the signing of the Convention on International Civil Aviation, done at Chicago on that date in 1944,

Recalling that the preamble to the Convention states that the future development of international civil aviation can greatly help to create and preserve friendship and understanding among the nations and peoples of the world,

Welcoming resolution A29-1 adopted in 1992 by the Assembly of the International Civil Aviation Organization declaring 7 December as International Civil Aviation Day each year starting in 1994, and instructing the Secretary-General of the organization to inform the Secretary-General of the United Nations accordingly,

Noting that, at its meeting of 27 May 1996, the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization requested the Secretary-General of the organization to take steps to urge the General Assembly of the United Nations to recognize officially 7 December each year as International Civil Aviation Day,

1. Proclaims 7 December as International Civil Aviation Day;

2. Urges Governments as well as relevant national, regional, international and intergovernmental organizations to take appropriate steps to observe International Civil Aviation Day.

6 December 1996

Meeting 75

Adopted without vote

41-nation draft (A/51/L.42 & Add.1); agenda item 162.

Transport of dangerous goods

By a June note [E/1996/66], the Secretary-General drew the attention of the Economic and Social Council to letters from IMO [E/1996/15] and the International Air Transport Association (IATA) [E/1996/63] regarding the periodicity of amendments to the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods [Sales No. E.95.VIII.1]. IMO conveyed to the Council the request of its Maritime Safety Committee that the publication cycle of the Recommendations be expanded from every two to every four years to enable the smooth and timely harmonization among the different modes of transport, while IATA believed that the current two-year publication cycle was essential for maintaining flexibility and improving safety. By a 26 June letter [E/1996/84], the International Civil Aviation Organization informed the Secretary-General that its Dangerous Goods Panel strongly advised that the two-year cycle be maintained.

By decision 1996/301 of 26 July, the Economic and Social Council indicated that the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods would examine, at its forthcoming session, the question of the periodicity of amendments to the Recommendations. The Council invited the Committee to take fully into account the views expressed by delegations during their consideration of the issue, and invited Member States to submit to the Committee their views on the matter.

Committee of Experts. The Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods held its nineteenth session in Geneva from 2 to 10 December [ST/SG/AC.10/23 & Add.1-4]. It had before it the reports of its Subcommittee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods on its tenth and eleventh sessions, held in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 976], and on its twelfth session (Geneva, 1-12 July 1996) [ST/SG/AC.10/C.3/24]. The Committee adopted a number of draft amendments to the Recommendations on the Transport of Dangerous Goods as proposed by its Subcommittee, and considered a report of the IMO Working Group on Portable Tanks.

It also considered the periodicity of amendments to the Recommendations, decided not to take a decision at the current session, and prepared a draft resolution on its programme of work for consideration by the Economic and Social Council in 1997.

Committee membership

By an August note [E/1996/94], the Secretary-General informed the Economic and Social Council that he had received applications from Australia and Spain for full membership in the Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods. He approved those applications and requested the Council's endorsement.

By decision 1996/311 of 14 November, the Council endorsed the Secretary-General's approval of the applications of Australia and Spain.

Chapter V

Regional economic and social activities

In 1996, the five UN regional commissions continued to promote economic and social development in their respective regions. Four met for regular sessions during the year: the Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia; the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP), in Bangkok, Thailand; the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) in Geneva; and the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) in San Jose, Costa Rica. The Economic Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA) did not meet in 1996, having held its most recent biennial session in 1995.

In May, the General Assembly stated that the Economic and Social Council should provide for the review of the regional commissions, with a view to strengthening and enhancing their effectiveness as action- and policy-oriented bodies in the economic and development fields.

In July, the Council amended the terms of reference of ESCAP to change the name of Hong Kong to Hong Kong, China; to reflect the admission of Palau as a member of the Commission; and to include Turkey within the geographical scope of the Commission.

Regional cooperation

In 1996, efforts continued to strengthen the role of the regional commissions as part of the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields. The executive secretaries of the regional commissions, meeting in New York on 31 July and 15 November, reviewed the substance and modalities of cooperation as well as arrangements among the regional commissions and with relevant bodies and programmes, and exchanged views on the reform and restructuring of their respective organizations in the context of the reform of the United Nations. The executive secretaries noted that although regionalism might weaken multilateralism by contributing to the fragmentation of the world economy into separate blocs, it could be a powerful bulwark against marginalization and a bridge towards a harmonious multilateral system. The challenge was to use both global and regional arrangements in a mutually supportive way.

They noted that, as providers of services to their member States, the question was whether the regional commissions should engage in both normative and operational activities as they currently did. The commissions complemented technical cooperation activities funded from the regular UN programme of technical cooperation with the operational activities funded by extrabudgetary contributions from Member countries, including developing countries, and from multilateral funding institutions, including development banks. However, although the normative and operational activities of the regional commissions were mutually reinforcing, their linkage with the country framework strategies remained weak. An absence of institutional linkages militated against optimal utilization of the capacities and full potentials of the regional commissions in providing services to their memberships, both for regional activities and for backstopping activities at the national level. In that regard, linkages should be established with existing consultative mechanisms set up by the regional commissions for improved cooperation with the regional offices of UN programmes and agencies.

The executive secretaries welcomed the call by the Economic and Social Council for institutionalizing a more structural relationship between the Council and the regional commissions. They felt that a better flow of information and improved policy dialogue were essential to improve the structural relationship between the commissions and the Council. Future regional cooperation reports could focus more on analysis of the results of research and operational activities of the commissions in selected priority areas. The commissions should also report on activities relevant to the theme topics considered by the Council's various high-level segments. That would improve the substantive interactions between the Council and the regional commissions by making the latter's inputs more relevant to the Council's agenda, and give real meaning to its task of harmonizing regional and international cooperation. An improved structural relationship could also involve more interface between the subsidiary bodies of the regional commissions and the Council's functional commissions, through inputs on items of mutual concern and participation of the bureaux of regional commissions in meetings of the functional commissions. The new orientation of the Secretary-General's report should also result in a more effective review by the Council of the yearly topic for interregional cooperation. The regional commissions were also cooperating among themselves more directly, based on their experiences and capacities. The demand drive in utilizing and learning from each other's experiences could also be a criterion for the choice of a topic for interregional cooperation to be considered by the Council.

Report of Secretary-General. On 9 February, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1996/214, decided to consider at its substantive session under the item entitled "Regional cooperation in the economic, social and related fields", the question of "Trends in regional economic and social cooperation, including trade issues and the work of the regional commissions in this regard".

In a June report [E/1996/45] to the Council on regional cooperation, the Secretary-General outlined the work of the regional commissions, with special emphasis on follow-up activities to recent global conferences, and examined trends in regional economic and social cooperation, including trade issues and the work of the commissions in that regard. The report also focused on the ongoing reform and restructuring exercises of the commissions.

In a 12 June addendum [E/1996/45/Add.1], the Secretary-General submitted a report containing resolutions and decisions adopted at recent sessions of the regional commissions calling for action by the Economic and Social Council or to be brought to its attention.

On 18 July, by decision 1996/236, the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report on regional cooperation and other documents considered in connection with the question of regional cooperation in the economic, social and related fields, including summaries of: the economic survey of Europe, 1995 [E/1996/46]; survey of economic and social conditions in Africa, 1995 [E/1996/47]; survey of economic and social conditions in Asia and the Pacific, 1996 [E/1996/48]; economic survey of Latin America and the Caribbean, 1995 [E/1996/49]; and survey of economic and social developments in the Western Asia region, 1995 [E/1996/50].

Review of regional commissions

The General Assembly, in resolution 50/227 of 24 May, on further measures for the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields, stated that the Economic and Social Council should provide for the review of the regional commissions, with a view to strengthening and enhancing their effectiveness as action- and policy-oriented bodies in the economic and development fields with better response to the conditions and environments unique to the specific regions; improving their coordination with the UN system, including the specialized agencies, the Bretton Woods institutions and the regional development banks; strengthening their active participation in implementation at the regional level of the results of major UN conferences; and encouraging them to undertake their own management and functional assessments towards those ends. The reviews should aim to eliminate unnecessary duplication or overlapping of work and ensure a better structural relationship among those bodies and with the Economic and Social Council.

In follow-up to the Assembly's resolution, the Council, in resolution 1996/41 of 26 July, requested the regional commissions to continue undertaking their own reviews and to report to the Council at its 1997 substantive session. It reaffirmed the need for the reviews and reform processes to improve the commissions' effectiveness and efficiency by eliminating duplication or overlapping of work and by ensuring a better structural relationship among themselves and with the Council. It decided that it would take a decision at its 1997 substantive session on further action on how to achieve the objectives set out in the Assembly's resolution. (For details, see PART FIVE, Chapter I.)

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 26 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/46.

Regional cooperation in the economic, social and related fields

The Economic and Social Council,

Noting with appreciation that the summaries of the economic surveys of the five regional commissions have been made available to the Council,

1. Recognizes that the regional commissions provide a useful forum and mechanism for enabling, promoting and strengthening regional cooperation and development;

2. Also recognizes that the regional commissions are the regional arm of the United Nations in the economic and social fields and facilitate the United Nations role of promoting development and international cooperation;

3. Notes with appreciation the role played by the regional commissions in the preparation of regional plans and programmes of action for United Nations conferences and in their necessary follow-up activities;

4. Recognizes that the regional commissions have important contributions to make to the deliberations of the Council, and that the regional perspectives of development should further enrich the Council's debate on economic and social development;

5. Recommends that the Council, at its resumed substantive session of 1996, consider placing the agenda item on regional cooperation at the beginning of the general segment of the substantive session of the Council;

6. Decides to incorporate in the existing format for this agenda item informal briefings and dialogue between the executive secretaries and the Council along the lines of the informative briefing held on the margins of the substantive session of 1996;

7. Reaffirms the provisions regarding the review by the Council of the regional commissions contained in General Assembly resolution 50/227 and in Council resolution 1996/41.

Africa

The Economic Commission for Africa (ECA) held its thirty-first session/twenty second meeting of the Conference of Ministers in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, from 6 to 8 May. The Conference theme was "Meeting the challenges of Africa's development in the twenty-first century". The Ministers reviewed the renewed programme of ECA; perspectives of Africa's socio-economic development; the continent's economic and social situation; the UN System-wide Special Initiative on Africa; exploiting information technology to accelerate socio-economic development; implementation of the 1991 Abuja Treaty of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) [GA res. 46/20] establishing the African Economic Community; issues relating to regional cooperation and programme administration; and organizational matters. In his message to the Conference, the UN Secretary-General pointed out that the Conference's theme reflected both the conviction that African cooperation would be critical in enabling the continent to benefit fully from the rapidly changing international economy and the major role ECA was to play in assisting Africa in that transformation. He noted that at the dawn of the new millennium, Africa showed greater promise. Average rates of economic growth had improved, political liberalization was taking hold, rehabilitation and reconstruction were gaining momentum in many previously conflict-torn countries, and economic reforms were laying the foundation for rapid and sustained growth. He referred to the UN System-wide Special Initiative on Africa launched on 15 March (see below) as a coordinated and collaborative effort to assist Africa to achieve its vision of a better future and to add momentum to Africa's development. The UN system would mobilize external resources, and ECA had been entrusted with several specific responsibilities in the implementation of the Special Initiative, and the lead role in some specific activities. He emphasized that the renewal process under way in ECA responded to the need to meet the increasing demands of member States for greater value for money, cost-effectiveness and economy in the way the UN delivered its services.

The ECA Executive Secretary said that the Conference was the first opportunity to discuss with Ministers the Commission's plans for a major renewal. Excellence, cost-effectiveness and partnership were the cornerstones of the ECA renewal process, the centrepiece of which was the reform of its programmes. Twenty-one areas of concentration in nine subprogrammes would be consolidated into five core themes: facilitating economic and social policy analysis; ensuring food security and sustainable development; strengthening development management; harnessing information for development; and promoting regional cooperation and integration. Two cross-cutting themes were gender and capacity-building. Other components of the process consisted of a significant reorientation in Commission services to member States and the reform of ECA modalities of implementation. To that end, there would be more use of electronic means of communication; improved dissemination of Commission products; improved country targeting and closer links with African ambassadors in Addis Ababa; fewer policy reports and fewer but more global-oriented meetings; and closer work with member States to rationalize ECA-sponsored institutions to avoid superfluity and ineffectiveness.

The Conference of Ministers was preceded by the seventeenth meeting of the Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole (Addis Ababa, 30 April-3 May), which discussed the renewal programme at ECA and the 1998-2001 medium-term plan, the economic and social situation in Africa in 1996, the UN System-wide Special Initiative on Africa, and the action plan for exploiting information technology to accelerate socio-economic development. Participants also discussed progress reports on preparation and follow-up to international and regional conferences and programmes, and the progress report on the implementation of the Abuja Treaty establishing the African Economic Community. The Committee examined programme evaluation and issues from subsidiary bodies calling for action by the Conference of Ministers. It also held a panel discussion on the Framework Agenda for Building and Utilizing Critical Capacities in Africa.

The Conference of Ministers reviewed, amended and adopted the Committee report [E/ECA/CM.22/13], including the draft resolutions and decisions annexed to it. It welcomed the proposal by the Executive Secretary to prepare a report on biennializing the meetings of the Conference of Ministers for consideration at its next meeting, taking into consideration all the implications of such a proposal. It also adopted a motion on the decoration of the new UN Conference Centre in Addis Ababa.

The Conference of Ministers held a high-level forum on "Public expenditure and the poor in Africa". The forum, stressed [E/ECA/CM.22/CRP.4] the need for Governments to increase the production capacities of the poor and to refrain from giving them handouts. It emphasized the need for institutional poverty arrangements aimed at helping the poor to help themselves, and suggested follow-up actions to help eradicate poverty in Africa.

Economic and social trends

Economic trends

According to a summary of the survey of economic and social conditions in Africa in 1996 [E/1997/41], the region's gross domestic product (GDP) recorded a growth rate of 3.9 per cent, compared to a revised rate of 2.7 per cent in 1995, the highest since the start of the decade, and resulting in the first turn around in per capita income in almost a decade. The high performance was attributable to the positive effects of economic reforms and the deepening of market-based, private-sector-driven policies, favourable weather conditions and a significant rise in export revenue, particularly in oil-exporting countries. Beverage-exporting countries registered the highest growth, of 4.8 per cent, down 1 per cent compared to 1995, while mineral exports rose to 3 per cent, compared to 2.8 per cent the previous year. The economies of both oil-exporting States and non-oil exporters expanded significantly, by 4.2 and 3.8 per cent, compared to 3.1 per cent and 2.4 per cent respectively in 1995. Output in the agriculture and mining sectors increased appreciably, while there was significant deceleration in the manufacturing sector. However, Africa's position in international trade and output remained insignificant. Its share of world output was about 2 per cent, and its trade share fell from 5 per cent in 1980 to 2.2 per cent in 1996.

Value-added in the mineral sector increased from -0.2 per cent in 1995 to 6.6 per cent in 1996, due to the increase in prices on the international market for crude oil, gold, iron ore and phosphates, although production volumes remained virtually stable except for crude oil, which enjoyed substantial recovery. Gold production decreased in Ghana, Sierra Leone and South Africa owing to internal constraints in the mining industry. However, in Zaire, copper output increased by 40 per cent in 1996, despite chronic economic and social difficulties. Crude oil recovered substantially in terms of production and prices, with output increasing from 353 million tons in 1995 to 369 million tons in 1996.

Growth in manufacturing value-added declined from 4.6 per cent in 1995 to 2.5 per cent in 1996. The output of exportables such as textiles was stymied by the slowdown in the economies of Western Europe and competition from other producers. However, strong performance in manufacturing was recorded for the northern and eastern subregions, with growth rates of 4.2 per cent and 5.3 per cent respectively, due to strong domestic demand and inflows of foreign direct investment. In contrast, growth declined to 1.6 per cent in Central Africa. Although performance was unimpressive in such larger economies as Cameroon, Egypt, Nigeria and South Africa, exceptional growth was recorded for Cote d'Ivoire (6.5 per cent), Tunisia (6.1 per cent), Botswana (5.7 per cent), Senegal (4.6 per cent) and Uganda (4 per cent).

The consumer price index in Africa, with 1990 as the baseline, declined from 35.4 per cent in 1995 to 37 per cent in 1996. Inflation remained in double digits in most countries, in spite of substantial progress in lowering the upward pressure on prices in some countries through fiscal stabilization, reductions in budget deficits as a percentage of GDP, and slowdown in money growth rates.

External debt

The total debt stock of African countries increased by 4 per cent in 1996, to $340.5 billion, while total debt-service payment declined from $25.6 billion to $24 billion, probably due to a further accumulation of arrears. Despite reschedulings and arrangements to reduce the debt burden of the continent, the overhang was large enough to threaten and impede reform efforts aimed at restoring economic and socio-political viability in many African countries. In particular, the disproportionate increase in multilateral debt intensified the problem of the debt overhang in the region and rendered the process of debt renegotiation more intractable.

The ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole suggested that ECA study the link between Africa's external debt and external trade, assess the impact of the devaluation of the CFA franc, and undertake a prospective analysis of the effects the single European currency (Euro) would have on economies in the franc zone.

Agriculture

Agriculture recorded a growth rate of 5.2 per cent, the highest in the decade, and was a strong factor behind the continued recovery in the region in 1996. Among the food groups, cereal production was the major contributor to the recovery, notably in north, eastern and southern Africa, where output increased considerably. In West Africa, the results were less spectacular because of inadequate rainfall and infestations of locusts and crickets in Mali and the Niger, while in Central Africa cereal production stagnated. The production of roots and tubers, estimated at 135 million tons, remained unchanged from the 1995 level. Cocoa production increased 6 per cent over the previous year to an estimated 1.6 million tons, with a bumper crop in Cote d'Ivoire, which increased output to 0.86 million tons, from 0.81 million in 1995. Similar trends were observed in Ghana and Nigeria. Tea and tobacco production remained relatively constant.

Ongoing reforms and good weather were responsible for the vigorous rebound in the sector. There were also notable policy thrusts directed towards diversification and food self-sufficiency. An improved supply of modern inputs, such as seeds and fertilizer, and the privatization of State farms enhanced agricultural output. Those measures, however, were rather limited. Countries with structural food deficits continued to require food aid. Preliminary projections put the regional food deficit at an estimated 10.5 million tons, a significant improvement over the 20 million figure of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), but worrisome all the same.

Trade

Africa's terms-of-trade index, with 1990 as the baseline, was up 4.5 per cent in 1996, as against 1.5 per cent in 1995. Export earnings rose by 8.7 per cent, compared to 11 per cent the previous year. Terms of trade registered a robust 4.6 per cent improvement in 1996, with the unit value index of exports increasing by 4.7 per cent, against a 0.1 per cent increase in the unit value of imports. Export receipts increased by some 9 per cent, spurred by a 4 per cent rise in volume and a 5 per cent increase in prices. On the other hand, imports grew more rapidly, at 10 per cent, 9 per cent of which was due to increase in volume. The terms-of-trade effect was still negative, at 11.6 per cent of real exports, while GDP, adjusted for negative terms of trade, showed a loss of 2.6 per cent. Oil-exporting countries benefited from higher export earnings, with receipts increasing by 23.3 per cent, reflecting a 19 per cent terms-of-trade improvement. Non-oil-exporting countries experienced a mere 1 per cent increase in their terms of trade, with a 5 per cent decline in export earnings. That was brought about by a 17 per cent decrease in beverage prices, 11 per cent in metals and minerals and 3 per cent in agricultural raw materials. An excessively large negative balance of $ 15.8 billion in the service sector led to a current account deficit of $17.4 billion. External financing of $20.8 billion was needed to cover the overall deficit of $ 19.7 billion and allow for an increase in the reserve of $1.1 billion.

Exports and imports continued to influence significantly the region's economy, both in terms of magnitude and product mix. With exports alone accounting for a quarter of regional GDP, and imports providing a fifth of the domestic supply, Africa had become the most open of all the regions in the world, except for the East Asia and Pacific rim subregions. The extensive trade-liberalization and exchange-rate reforms implemented across the continent since 1990 had yet to trigger a vibrant export base and rapid economic growth, or reduce the current account deficits to a sustainable level.

Subregional economic performance

In 1996, all subregions, except southern Africa, registered GDP growth rates in excess of the regional average. Central and North Africa registered the highest GDP growth rate—4.4 per cent. They were followed by East Africa, 4.3 per cent, and West Africa, 4.2 per cent, with southern Africa registering the lowest rate, at 3 per cent. Sub-Saharan Africa as a group, with Nigeria and South Africa excluded, registered a 2.5 per cent growth rate, compared to 4.2 per cent in 1995, while the growth rate in the Sahel zone contracted from 4.1 per cent in 1995 to 4 in 1996. At the national level, the 33 least developed countries (LDCs) registered a growth rate of 4.5 per cent; 11 countries either equalled or surpassed the growth target of 6 per cent, and only two countries showed a negative performance.

Policy developments

In 1996, many African countries persisted in reforming and re-engineering their economic environments, by reducing the predominant role of the State in the production process, replacing policies inhibiting the private sector by more market-friendly regulations, and striving to revitalize the social sector, minimize waste of human and natural resources, promote popular participation and democratic governance, focus world attention on Africa's needs for a more supportive international economic environment, and reinforce efforts at conflict prevention and resolution. Still, there were concerns about the region's socio-economic transformation and sustained development in the medium term, given the persistence of anachronistic production structures and deep-rooted economic malaise. Growth was constrained by factors such as internal social disarticulation at almost all levels of production, a weak and undiversified production base, economic delusion and a fragmented domestic factor and product markets, a low level of endogenous human resource development and capacity utilization, and weak physical, institutional and technical capacities. Sustaining and reinforcing the current economic growth momentum in the context of poverty-alleviating strategies remained a major policy challenge to African countries. Governments were also aware that effective mobilization of domestic and external resources was crucial for long-term sustained development, and that they needed to redouble their efforts to redefine their strategies for doing so and for ensuring efficient management and judicious allocation of those resources. A compelling related policy perspective was the creation of a more enabling environment for attracting foreign direct investment. African Governments needed to place themselves in such a way that they and the private sector would be able to mobilize the resources needed to finance additional investment by reducing inefficiency and creating an environment conducive to the retention of savings, by reversing capital flight and by encouraging savings through policies and incentives.

Economic and technical cooperation among developing countries

On 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers welcomed a proposal by ECA to organize a meeting bringing together UN regional commissions and relevant specialized agencies, development banks of developing countries, subregional economic communities and countries that were not yet members of such communities, business organizations, African regional and subregional institutions, centres of excellence on South-South cooperation, research and scientific centres and other organizations and personalities concerned with economic and technical cooperation among developing countries (ECDC/TCDC), with a view to providing a framework of action and to formulating specific ECDC/TCDC projects as a significant breakthrough in the history of South-South cooperation and the best way forward out of the prevailing difficult economic situation. It called on the ECA Executive Secretary to proceed with the organization of the conference, to act as focal point and take the lead in drawing up the work programme, and to work out a programme of action to sensitize African officials to ECDC/TCDC. It invited the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and multilateral and bilateral donors to consider financing the conference and related programmes.

Social trends

Despite attempts to reduce political instability and civil unrest, the overall social situation in Africa remained daunting in 1996. Social conditions in the region were worsened by the population growth rate, twice the world's global average (2.8 per cent against 1.5 per cent), while at the same time the efforts of Governments to reduce their budget deficits had entailed disproportionate reduction in activities that would have ameliorated the social situation. Cutbacks in expenditures on education and health reduced the capacity of countries to empower and graduate their people into productive work forces. However, some countries had started developing wide systems of social safety nets and specific pro-poor policies. The decline in governmental investment reduced employment generation in the public and private sectors, although the ongoing programme of privatization pursued by several countries might have helped generate employment to compensate for governmental lay-offs. The economic and social crisis did not help to reduce political tensions and civil unrest. Civil, religious and ethnic conflict continued to claim thousands of lives in Algeria, the Great Lakes region, the Horn of Africa, Somalia and the Sudan. The large number of refugees and huge population movements disrupted the orderly development process in the source countries, while imposing heavy costs on the recipient countries. Though a number of countries were taking measures to create a conducive political environment through improved governance, more needed to be done to overcome the increasingly adverse plight of the people.

Activities in 1996

In 1996, ECA activities focused on promoting African economic and social development through the formulation of plans and strategies, strengthening development institutions, and providing technical assistance to member States and intergovernmental organizations. The Commission's substantive work was directed towards development issues and policies, trade, regional economic cooperation and integration, poverty alleviation through sustainable development, development administration and management, human resources and social transformation, statistical and information systems development, natural resources and energy development, infrastructural and structural transformation, and women in development.

Development policy and regional economic cooperation

ECA activities concerning development issues and policies included advocating economic and social policies, articulating plans and strategies, strengthening development institutions and providing technical assistance to intergovernmental organizations. Its five new programme directions covered economic and social policy analysis, food security and sustainable development, development management, information for development, and regional cooperation and integration. ECA activities in research and analysis focused on policy analysis and development, particularly with regard to improving mechanisms for the appraisal of socio-economic conditions. A major effort was the support of financial sector reform by reducing financing repression; restoring bank solvency; and improving financial infrastructure, exchange and interest rate management policies, development of capital markets and the effectiveness of monetary reform policies. The UN System-wide Special Initiative on Africa was unveiled in 1996 (see PART THREE, Chapter III). The Commission discharged its responsibilities towards implementation of South-South cooperation, poverty reduction through promotion of the informal sector, employment-generating opportunities and internal resource mobilization.

The strengthening of regional economic groupings at the sectoral level went hand-in-hand with institution-building across the board, in addition to supporting African countries in debt management and taking advantage of the World Trade Organization's Plan of Action for the Least Developed Countries. Supporting policy measures and actions to foster regional cooperation and integration was a high priority for ECA, which supported the preparations for the June and November meetings of the African Economic Community (AEC). ECA was also the executing agency of a UNDP-funded project, launched in November, aimed at promoting Africa's economic cooperation and integration through the establishment of AEC. Also in cooperation with UNDP, ECA initiated a programme of assistance in rural and agricultural development in some member States, which would soon be extended to others.

African recovery and development

At its 1996 meeting, the ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole noted that since its last meeting an evaluation [E/ECA/CM.22/10/Add.2] of the UN New Agenda for the Development of Africa in the 1990s (UN-NADAF) had been conducted by the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU), and the UN System-wide Special Initiative on Africa had been launched. The JIU evaluation stated that the New Agenda was still little known within the African region and within the UN system, and had thus far had no impact on the ground four years after it had been launched. It made recommendations on promoting the Agenda, reducing the cost of technical cooperation, supporting subregional integration, strengthening UN-NADAF implementation, and supporting conflict prevention and management.

The Committee noted that member States were experiencing very difficult economic problems which hindered the implementation of UN-NADAF. It recommended that UN Headquarters be urged to allocate more funds to the secretariat of the Inter-Agency Task Force for the implementation of UN-NADAF activities. It also recommended that the Multinational Programming and Operational Centres (MULPOCs) be strengthened to carry out activities for implementing UN-NADAF more effectively, and to that end ECA should mobilize more extrabudgetary resources. It stated that the recommendations of the JIU evaluation were in line with the ECA strategic vision (see PART THREE, Chapter III).

The Committee welcomed the UN System-wide Special Initiative on Africa, launched on 15 March, considering it timely and opportune. It called for enhanced cooperation and collaboration among UN agencies to avoid duplication of effort, including at the country level. It called for maximum networking among UN agencies at the country level in implementation of the Initiative, for intensive collaboration among members of the joint secretariat of OAU/ECA/African Development Bank (ADB), and for the involvement of the subregional groupings in the formulation, design and implementation of programmes and projects under the Initiative. It underlined the need to make use of country experts in various elements of its implementation, and requested that due balance be struck between national and subregional concerns in the Initiative.

On 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers endorsed the Special Initiative and called on the international community, particularly the UN system, to support African countries to enable them to realize fully its objectives and targets. It requested the ECA Executive Secretary to harmonize the monitoring, evaluation and reporting related to the Initiative and UN-NADAF (for more details, see PART THREE, Chapter III).

Framework Agenda for capacity-building

In May, the ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole considered a draft [E/ECA/CM.22/12] of a Framework Agenda for Building and Utilizing Critical Capacities in Africa. The draft was divided into two parts: the first gave a brief outline of concepts and definitions and the imperative of capacity-building, articulated the objectives of the Framework, explained the process of its formulation, indicated some lessons and guiding principles in capacity-building, and discussed strategies for implementation; the second presented an analysis of the situation regarding capacity-building in 10 priority areas in Africa, each followed by an action matrix indicating policy measures required in each area, what African countries should do at the national level, complementary action at subregional and regional levels, and supplementary action by Africa's external partners in support of national actions.

ECA support for the African Economic Community

At its 1996 session, the ECA Technical Preparatory Committee had before it a joint ECA/OAU progress report [E/ECA/CM.22/8] on implementation of the Abuja Treaty establishing the African Economic Community, which had entered into force on 12 May 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 682]. The report dealt with the status of the draft Protocols to be annexed to the Treaty, the translation of the Treaty, draft rules of procedures, draft organizational structure of the OAU/AEC secretariat, and consultations between the secretariats of the regional economic communities and the OAU general secretariat.

The Committee deplored the slow progress on the drafting of the Protocols, as well as the preparation of the organizational chart of the AEC secretariat and of the summarized version of the Treaty. It emphasized the need to speed up those processes.

On 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers urged member States that had not done so to ratify the Abuja Treaty as a matter of urgency; stressed the need for every African country to become a member of a regional or a subregional community; and requested the regional and subregional communities to institute a programme for the rationalization and harmonization of community trade policies through the unification of trade liberalization instruments within each subregion.

Information technology

The ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole in April/May considered a document [E/ECA/CM.22/6] entitled "Exploiting information technology to accelerate socio-economic development in Africa: an action plan", which addressed the challenges and opportunities of an African information society and outlined the components of an African information society framework. In a proposed Initiative, the formulation of a national information and communications infrastructure plan was called for in every African country. That plan would be driven by national development challenges such as debt management, food security, health, education, population, unemployment, job creation, industrialization, land reclamation, water, tourism and trade, among others. The emphasis would be on supporting decision-making at all levels and providing information and communication infrastructure for government, business and society to enlighten the process of development. The Initiative also proposed cooperation, linkage and partnership between African countries to share the success of accumulated implemented experiences and stimulate development in various information and communication fields. It also called for bilateral and regional mechanisms to stimulate cooperation between African countries and for support and partnership with the friends of Africa, including bilateral and multilateral development agencies, regional economic organizations and the private sector.

The Committee noted that, in implementing the action plan, due attention should be given to the development of the information infrastructure of African countries. It observed that the plan seemed too ambitious, and that ECA should approach it on a pilot basis or in phases, as well as play a leading role in sensitizing member States regarding its implementation.

On 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers adopted in principle the African Information Society Initiative as an action framework for building Africa's information society, and called on member States to incorporate the Initiative into their national development plans. It called on ECA, in consultation with member States and other relevant agencies and organizations, to use the Initiative as a guiding framework. It urged member States to utilize the capacities and experiences of national, subregional and regional African centres of excellence in the enrichment and implementation of the Initiative. It requested the Executive Secretary to take action, in particular mobilizing funding and technical assistance, to realize the goal of the Initiative; incorporate the action framework into the secretariat's work programme; set up a regional mechanism to assist in development and follow-up and coordinate the implementation of the programmes and projects of the Initiative; establish a gender-balanced African technical committee to advise on programmes and projects and to evaluate results; and ensure that the gender dimension was integrated into the policy document "African Information Society Initiative" to respond to the needs of both women and men.

The Initiative was launched at the Information Society for African Development Conference, held in Midrand, South Africa, from 13 to 15 May. It was also endorsed by the African Regional Telecommunication Development Conference (Abidjan, Cote d'Ivoire, May), and by the OAU Council of Ministers (Yaounde, Cameroon, 8-10 July). The Initiative coordination meeting, held in Addis Ababa from 21 to 23 October, drew up implementation plans for partnership activities and decided on the distribution of lead agency roles.

Statistical and information systems

The Conference of African Planners, Statisticians and Population and Information Specialists, at its ninth session (Addis Ababa, 11-16 March) [E/ECA/PSPI.9/24], discussed statistical needs assessment and strategy development: the African experience; building Africa's information highway; progress on the implementation of the Dakar/Ngor Declaration on Population, Family Planning and Sustainable Development and the Cairo Programme of Action; and implementation of short-term forecasting systems for policy design and economic management in individual African countries. Its Population, Planning, Statistics and Information Committees discussed and made recommendations relating to specific issues in their areas of activity.

ECA's work in statistics had been defined by the Addis Ababa Plan of Action for Statistical Development in Africa in the 1990s, adopted by ECA in 1991 [YUN 1991, p. 304]. In 1996, ECA's work in statistical and information systems development continued to include the expansion and improvement of the regional statistical database to support the analysis and monitoring of poverty; and assistance to national statistics services in the development of socio-economic and environmental data. ECA planned to establish a household data archive/data service centre which would store and disseminate data on household, community and other data sets and facilitate the exchange of data and analytical experiences. It organized a regional workshop on statistics on services in the informal sector (Addis Ababa, 17-21 June), a training workshop on international trade statistics in cooperation with the UN Statistics Division (Addis Ababa, 23-27 September), and a workshop on the 1993 System of National Accounts and its implications for North African countries (Tangiers, Morocco, June).

Advisory services were provided through missions to Algeria, the Comoros, Ethiopia, Kenya, Morocco, Uganda and Zambia. On demographic and social statistics, a regional working group on the recommendations for the 2000 round of population and housing censuses was held jointly with the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) country support teams.

Public administration and finance

ECA activities in development administration and management in 1996 concentrated on facilitating inter- and intra-regional cooperation among professional management and finance associations and institutions in the design and delivery of public-sector management development and support programmes, especially with the African Centre for Administrative Training and Research for Development and the African Association for Public Administration and Management. ECA regional training workshops, seminars and fellowships underscored the role of local government in enhancing popular participation; the relationships between tax regimes and investment in Africa; the enhancement of interface between government, research institutions and the private sector in capacity development for small and medium-scale enterprises; and public and administrative efficiency. ECA also mounted advisory missions on various aspects of national and administrative development.

International trade and development finance

ECA activities in international trade and development finance were geared towards revitalizing African domestic and external trade and strengthening intra-African trade.

On 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers, noting the low level of intra-African trade, endorsed the ECA Plan of Action for the development of intra-African trade; it called on African countries fully to support and implement the eight-year Plan of Action, and on chief executives of regional business organizations to cooperate and coordinate efforts in implementing the Plan of Action. It called on UNDP and multilateral and bilateral donor agencies to support the Plan of Action and provide resources for the funding of related programmes.

ECA and the African Economic Research Consortium organized a dissemination seminar on regional integration and trade liberalization in sub-Saharan Africa (Addis Ababa, 10-11 October). The seminar's aim was to review and disseminate research undertaken by the Consortium in the area of regional integration and trade liberalization.

Industrial development

Efforts continued in 1996 to diversify Africa's industrial production base through measures to consolidate the privatization of the industrial sector, through the promotion of small and cottage industries, and through support to entrepreneurship development of small and medium-scale industries. Guidelines, legal procedures and modalities for negotiation and investment promotion of multinational industrial projects were made available to member States. ECA promoted private-sector involvement in manufacturing industries for road and railway equipment, machinery, plants and components. A database and network for African industrial and technological information and performance monitoring data was established.

On 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers appealed to African countries and intergovernmental organizations to ensure full implementation of their national and subregional programmes for the second Industrial Development Decade for Africa (1991-2000). It called on African countries that had not done so to revise their national programmes, in cooperation with the private sector, and concretize their industrial projects for implementation, as well as to prepare action-oriented plans for their realization and implementation, including the establishment of corresponding institutions for their implementation. It called on countries to include the programme of the Decade in their national plans and to set up national follow-up committees, as well as to take policy, institutional and other measures to ensure implementation of sustainable industrial development through the Decade's programme by promoting a cleaner-production approach to industrial project investments and the application of the environmental impact assessment to industrial project investments proposed in the second Decade's programme. It urged international development finance institutions, particularly the World Bank, the Arab Bank for the Economic Development of Africa, ADB and African subregional banks and funds, to allocate substantial resources to implementing the Decade's programme at the national and subregional levels. It dissolved the functions of the Committee of Ten and requested the joint secretariat to assist the bureau of the Conference of African Ministers of Industry and the Decade's national committees to follow up on the implementation of the Decade. It requested the ECA Executive Secretary, the Director-General of the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) and the OAU Secretary-General to undertake follow-up actions for promoting the Decade at the international level.

The Conference adopted as the theme for Africa Industrialization Day in 1996 the mobilization of financial resources, and for 1997 the promotion of small and medium enterprises/small and medium industries. It appealed to the General Assembly to allocate increased resources to ECA to enable it to support African countries in their efforts to implement the Decade's activities, and called on African countries to ensure the successful implementation of their national Decade programmes, particularly the establishment of an enabling environment to ensure the private sector's participation in the implementation of the programme and the attraction of investments in identified industrial projects. It requested African countries, ECA, UNIDO and OAU to undertake in 1997 a mid-term evaluation of the implementation of the Decade's programme at national, subregional and regional levels and to report to the Conference at its next meeting. It requested the Executive Secretary and the UNIDO Director-General to accord high priority to organizing subregional and national investment forums and to utilizing African consultants in Decade-related activities; to hold subregional meetings on revision, concretization, evaluation and assessment of the Decade's programmes and to elaborate action plans for their implementation; and to report on the implementation of its requests at the next meeting of the Conference of African Ministers of Industry.

Also on 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers called on African countries to create and maintain an enabling environment for private-sector development, the growth of private capital inflows and the mobilization of domestic resources. It invited Africa's development partners to support the improvement of investment conditions for domestic and foreign investors through increased resource flows, debt-relief programmes and support to the efforts of African countries to improve their financial intermediation capabilities. It requested UN system agencies to continue providing to African countries technical and financial assistance to promote the private sector and private investment. It called on African States and organizations to accord priority to the development of industrial skills in national human resource development programmes, and to strengthen human resources development support institutions. It urged Governments to formulate policies geared towards increasing the participation of women in industrial development.

Noting that women accounted for 52 per cent of Africa's human resources, the ECA Conference of Ministers on 8 May called on Governments and socio-economic partners to enhance women's contribution for Africa's industrial development, among other things, by enhancing the role of women as producers, by promoting their access to education for entrepreneurship, by facilitating business creation by women, by promoting services to relieve women's dual family and professional burden, and by strengthening associations of women entrepreneurs.

Transport and communications

Activities in transport and communications focused on assisting member States and intergovernmental organizations with their structural and infrastructural programmes. ECA implemented programmes on a regional transport database; a transit highway; manufacture of transport and communication equipment; and human resources and institutional development. It provided advisory services to Nigeria on a regional transport database; to the Djibouti-Ethiopian railways corporation in drawing up guidelines for restructuring; to Central African States in harmonizing navigation regulations in inland waters; and to Cameroon in a project on manufacturing transport equipment. ECA organized meetings, conferences and seminars on road safety; on restructuring parastatal organizations and governmental institutions and financing policies and practices in transport and communications; and on aspects of the Second United Nations Transport and Communications Decade in Africa, 1991-2000.

ECA in 1996 continued activities aimed at implementing the programme for the Decade. Efforts focused on facilitating inter-State institutional reforms and improving human resources and other capacities through a regional programme on human resources and industrial development, and a transport data project. ECA assisted member States to establish national transport and communication databases, and to adopt standardized methodologies for data collection and performance data indicators.

The ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole in May noted the six primary objectives of the Decade's programme designed to establish an integral transport and communications system in Africa; outlined the national and subregional mechanisms set up for implementing the programme, emphasizing the need for strengthening such mechanisms; and advised that efforts would be made to study and adopt alternative approaches for stimulating the development of transport, communications and industry. Several delegates observed that the Decade's programme had been used as a framework for developing their national and regional infrastructure.

Tourism

On 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers adopted a wide-ranging resolution on tourism development in Africa, with emphasis on regional integration, and socio-economic and cultural development. The Conference made specific recommendations for each of Africa's subregions, and addressed the promotion of trade, African tourism and inter-State circuits, and establishment of tourism programmes inspired by African culture and of cooperation mechanisms at the level of policies and development activities that would enhance opportunities for integration. It called for the promotion of an African tourism product and the pooling of resources available for tourism with a view to establishing professional training institutions. It called for the elaboration of a protocol on the development of the tourism sector as an annex to the Abuja Treaty; for the organization of a second African tourism fair; for the establishment of autonomous government departments concerned specifically with the tourism sector; for the strengthening of the ECA tourism unit to enhance its effectiveness in addressing the increasing need of member States for technical assistance; and for allocation by Governments of credit lines in national budgets to speed up the development of tourism. ADB was called on to include loans for tourism development in its lending portfolio. ECA was requested to convene a meeting of ministers of tourism, transport and aviation, including concerned international and national organizations and associations, to enhance the contribution of air transport to the promotion and development of tourism. ECA was to study, in cooperation with the World Trade Organization, the implications of the General Agreement on Trade in Services on tourism development; and to work, in cooperation with the European Union, towards harmonizing the contractual relations between European tourism operators and their African partners, mainly regarding the business relationship for tourism services. ECA was requested to facilitate implementation of those arrangements and to extend technical assistance to member States and relevant organizations.

A Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Trade, Regional Cooperation and Integration and Tourism was held in Addis Ababa from 14 to 16 February.

Science and technology

In promoting science and technology development and application, ECA continued to convene meetings and undertake studies and advisory services designed to formulate and execute strategies, policies and programmes to stimulate scientific progress and technological breakthrough as a tool for Africa's economic and social integration. Technical assistance for the development of national science and technology policy was provided to Botswana in April and July. ECA held a regional workshop on food irradiation to control food losses and food-borne diseases and facilitate food trade (Rabat, Morocco), and a workshop on science and technology policy dialogue in Africa (Dakar, Senegal). In accordance with a 1995 decision of the first African Regional Conference on Science and Technology [YUN 1995, p. 998], the first meeting of the West African Subregional Conference on Science and Technology was held in Yamoussoukro, Cote d'Ivoire, from 8 to 11 May.

On 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers noted that a more proactive approach to science and technology development was needed, especially its link to industrialization. It urged member States to participate at the highest level of decision-making in the work of the upcoming second African Regional Conference on Science and Technology and ensure its continuity; set up or review their science and technology policy and machinery and translate them into legislation for their application; put in place an incentives regime to foster scientific progress and technological innovation; strengthen their technological and financing capacity through, among other things, the use of foreign direct investment; accelerate technology acquisition, absorption and assimilation; and create a strong governmental unit to design and manage a more discriminating technology transfer, carry out technology assessment and forecasting and support entrepreneurs in their foreign technology transactions. States were urged to put into place an enabling environment by redoubling their efforts in capacity-building to better apply international technologies by pursuing structural economic reforms, better absorb needed technologies, better exploit technological complementarities and participate more in the regional and global economy. States should implement policies to curb the brain drain and benefit from African nationals working abroad; implement the protocol on science and technology of AEC; strengthen the acquisition and application of nuclear science and technology; build and periodically update a series of science and technology indicators to provide information on the design of science and technology policies and to monitor progress; empower women through their participation in science and technology activities; and intensify the teaching of mathematics, science and technology at primary and secondary levels through reform of curricula. The Conference resolved to create five regional subconferences on science and technology and to support fully ECA activities in that area. It called on the UN system to intensify cooperation with ECA and assistance to African countries and organizations in promoting the development of science and technology on the continent. It expressed support for ECA efforts in the search for funds to execute extrabudgetary projects in the priority areas identified by the Conference.

Natural resources, energy and cartography

ECA continued to promote the development and management of energy, water, mineral and marine resources, as well as cartography and remote-sensing services. An ad hoc expert group meeting was held on guidelines for natural resources and energy development in Africa, with emphasis on privatization and deregulation (Addis Ababa, 14-16 October). The ad hoc group outlined criteria that should be incorporated into national policies to allow privatization and deregulation to proceed in a manner congruent with Africa's development priorities and sectoral needs. The criteria should also guide the elaboration of general as well as sectoral specifications.

The ninth United Nations Regional Cartographic Conference for Africa (Addis Ababa, 11-15 November) urged maritime African States and those with navigable waters to support the establishment of regional hydrographic and nautical charting facilities and to cooperate in the establishment of regional data standards. In September, ECA co-organized and hosted the first meeting of the FAO AFRICOVER Working Group on geometry and cartography. The meeting agreed on main standards concerning datum and a geodetic network and developed detailed technical specifications for their implementation. The results of the Working Group were endorsed by the ninth Cartographic Conference.

The ECA Conference of Ministers on 8 May requested ECA to study selected minerals with a view to providing member States with information that could be used in establishing mineral development policies, strategies and programmes. It called on member States to adopt policies to encourage further processing of their minerals, and to put in place policies, strategies, incentives and instruments to encourage local entrepreneurs to participate more effectively in the development of mineral resources. It recommended that ECA carry out studies on privatization relating to the development of the minerals industry and African macroeconomic frameworks as they affected the performance of the industry, and that member States establish national electronic databases on mineral resources development and utilization. ECA was requested to study the standardization of formats of the electronic databases, and to commission a team of experts to study the various models and instruments for promoting small-scale mining. ECA, in collaboration with OAU, should convene a meeting of subregional economic groupings to agree on the creation of mechanisms to promote cooperation in minerals sectors and formulate an agreement in that area. The Conference of Ministers urged ECA to assist member States in the preparation of investment codes in the minerals and energy sectors, and proposed that a decade be proclaimed for the development of minerals industries in Africa. It called on the UN Secretary-General to strengthen the ECA department responsible for mineral resources development and utilization by providing adequate financial and human resources.

In another 8 May resolution, the ECA Conference of Ministers recommended that African States continue to formulate and implement coherent energy strategies, tailoring them to meet the needs and aspirations of their populations for socio-economic betterment, and to establish legal, fiscal, and financial incentives, credit mechanisms and physical infrastructure to facilitate access to energy by low-income consumers. It urged States to initiate actions, including sectoral reforms and private-sector participation, to improve energy efficiency, production and supply and to allow their energy institutions greater autonomy to make them competitive. It urged States to establish and strengthen specialized government agencies, in collaboration with non-governmental organizations (NGOs), to handle rural electrification and increase energy supply; to develop new and renewable energy and increase productive activities with a view to alleviating poverty; to initiate the local manufacture of turbines and generators for mini-hydropower, as well as to set up manufacturing plants for equipment to utilize renewable energy resources; and to provide financial and technical assistance to small- and medium-scale energy users in the industrial and agricultural sectors in accessing energy and related equipment and appliances. It recommended that the African Energy Commission be provisionally established until the time was opportune for its creation, and called on ECA and other organizations to establish energy networks for the exchange of information.

Food and agriculture

ECA activities in food and agriculture concentrated on food security and food self-sufficiency. The alleviation of rural poverty with added emphasis on its gender implications and environmental protection, in particular the conservation of land, water and forests, were of high priority for ECA. The coordination, harmonization and rationalization of food-security programmes under the theme of regional integration remained an overarching goal. Policy implementation, analysis, research and dissemination of best practices were pursued. An ad hoc group meeting on measures for increased production and utilization of non-conventional food resources as a source of food was held in Addis Ababa from 4 to 6 November.

ECA also undertook the financing and implementation of projects within the framework of the FAO Regional Convention on Fisheries Cooperation among African States Bordering the Atlantic Ocean, the modernization and harmonization of the agricultural sector in West Africa, and the coordination and harmonization of food and agricultural policies, strategies and production in North and southern Africa. It also provided advisory services in agriculture to the Economic Community of West African States technical community. ECA project delivery also included managing the consequences of post-harvest losses; coping with the effects of the 1975 Lome Convention between the European Economic Community and the African, Caribbean and Pacific States [YUN 1975, p. 330] and the Uruguay Round Agreements on the food and agricultural sector, with emphasis on food security and measures to ensure sustainable production and marketing; and strengthening cooperation in agricultural development with subregional, regional, intergovernmental, non-governmental and international organizations, and with the UN system in poverty reduction.

Sustainable development and the environment

The first Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Sustainable Development and the Environment (CAMSDE) [E/ECA/CAMSDE/16] was held in Addis Ababa on 8 and 9 March, preceded by a meeting of the Committee of Experts from 4 to 7 March. The theme of the Conference was "Facing the challenges of sustainable development and environment in Africa". The Conference adopted guidelines for monitoring the progress made in building critical management capacities for sustainable development in Africa as a framework instrument for harmonizing relevant activities in the region. It urged member States to carry out continuous monitoring and evaluation as an integral part of the activities of their national Agenda 21 programmes and establish a national database for such a purpose. It encouraged them to establish a geographic information system to enhance national data collection and environmental monitoring. The Conference called on the international community to accord special consideration to African countries whose economic and social conditions had been aggravated by the influx of refugees, and requested that additional international financial and technical assistance be given to countries of asylum for the rehabilitation of areas suffering from environmental degradation due to the influx arid presence of refugees.

The Conference requested the ECA Executive Secretary to consult with the secretariats of the African Ministerial Conference on the Environment (AMCEN), OAU and the United Nations Environment Programme to reach agreement on the issue of the scope of activity of AMCEN and CAMSDE. In response to that request, the Executive Secretary on 1 May submitted a report [E/ECA/CM.22/11/Add.2] on the results of those consultations.

On 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers decided that the Conference would subsume the functions of the intergovernmental Regional Committee on Human Settlements and Environment, which it abolished, and requested the ECA Executive Secretary, the Ministerial Follow-up Committee of Fifteen or the Bureau of CAMSDE to make recommendations to the regular session in 1998 of the Conference of Ministers responsible for economic and social development and planning for a final decision on the status of CAMSDE vis-a-vis AMCEN, on the basis of the outcome of the seventh session of the latter in 1997.

Social development

In the area of social development, ECA continued to monitor developments in the African social sector through technical reports and collaboration with other UN agencies. Among the studies undertaken were those on: HIV/AIDS and its implications for human development in Africa, which examined the impact of the pandemic on the African social situation and its implications for Africa's long-term socio-economic transformation; and trends and prospects for social security systems in Africa, which analysed the status of formal social security there. ECA continued technical cooperation with its partners in social development.

Population

In 1996, ECA supported member States in implementing the integration of population and sustainable development strategies; empowerment and the status of women; socio-economic support for the family; reduction of fertility and mortality rates and population growth; primary health care and the health sector; health and child survival; women's health and safe motherhood; and population distribution and urbanization. ECA led a mission on programme review and strategy development in Nigeria and Togo, where national population programmes and implementation strategies were defined for each country and gender issues discussed. It also issued a publication on the potential of non-conventional foods as a source of food security.

The first meeting of the Committee of Experts of the First Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Sustainable Development and the Environment (Addis, Ababa, 4-7 March) considered the implementation of the Dakar/Ngor Declaration on Population, Family and Sustainable Development, adopted by the third African Population Conference in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 476]. It requested ECA to prepare, every other year, an analytical report reviewing those factors that militated against the implementation of the Dakar/Ngor Declaration and proposing solutions to those constraints and problems. It also requested the ECA secretariat to undertake a more comprehensive evaluation of the implementation of the Declaration.

The ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole in May requested OAU, ECA and ADB to intensify their cooperation and to assist ECA member States to implement the Declaration and the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD) Programme of Action [YUN 1994, p. 956].

Human settlements

In 1996, ECA finalized the regional report on the state of human settlements in Africa, comprising a review of current regional trends and their impact on policies and programmes, and a review of contributions to the implementation of the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000, adopted by the General Assembly in 1988 [GA res. 43/181].

In March, the Conference of African Ministers Responsible for Sustainable Development and the Environment requested ECA member States to make human settlements a development priority and to mobilize resources for the formulation and pursuit of human settlement policies, with a view to reducing the imbalance between rural and urban areas. It invited ECA to approach international institutions for assistance for member States in formulating and implementing a coherent physical planning policy in the human settlements sector. It urged African countries to reflect the African common position, adopted in Johannesburg, South Africa, in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1001] on the draft Habitat Agenda, in the major documentation of the 1996 United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII).

The ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole in May noted the role played by ECA in Africa in the preparatory process for Habitat II and in preparing an African common position. It urged African countries to participate effectively in the Conference, support the regional position and ensure its incorporation in the global Habitat Agenda. With regard to the future of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat), the Committee requested African Governments to support its strengthening, asking the ECA Executive Secretary to use his position as coordinator of the regional commissions to mobilize political and diplomatic support for its future existence.

Integration of women in development

In April/May, the Technical Preparatory Committee reviewed follow-up to the implementation of the Global Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women held in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1170]. The Executive Secretary informed the Committee that he was strengthening the African Centre for Women. Some $1.5 million of a projected $5 million had been mobilized to help establish an African women leadership fund. He assured the Committee that the secretariat was coordinating the region's activities in the follow-up to the World Conference. The Committee noted that ECA was in the forefront in the support of gender issues and underscored the need to give special attention to gender issues when formulating development programmes and priorities. It also noted the progress made in various African countries in the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference. It recommended that there should be at least one staff member at each Multi-(MULPOC) to cover women's issues at the subregional level.

On 8 May [E/1996/35(res.824(XXXI))], the ECA Conference of Ministers, on the recommendation of the Africa Regional Coordinating Committee for the Integration of Women in Development (Addis Ababa, 24-26 April), urged: African Ministers to sensitize their Governments about the need to continue to promote the implementation of the Regional and Global Platforms for Action; OAU, ECA and ADB to play a strong coordinating and catalytic role in their implementation at the regional level; subregional organizations to set up machineries to facilitate their implementing role; and Governments to create, upgrade or strengthen national machineries. It requested ECA: to establish a data bank on national experiences on women, gender and development and disseminate that information for possible replication; involve eminent Africans in campaigns for the implementation of the Global and Regional Platforms for Action; and re-energize the activities of MULPOCs, particularly by allocating sufficient resources to facilitate the coordination of gender programmes in the subregions. It requested the Bureau of the fifth African Regional Conference on Women, in collaboration with ECA and OAU, to play a complementary advocacy role in implementing the Platforms for Action. It recommended to Governments that mainstreaming gender in all sectors of national programmes should be the strategy for implementing the Platforms for Action, and that all ministries should include elements of the Platforms within their sectors and allocate resources for their implementation. It recommended to Governments and development actors that, in the search for resources for implementing the Platforms, competition be avoided through consultations between Governments and NGOs, and that action be taken to reduce waste of resources. It urged ECA to set up a multidisciplinary group of experts to report on the impact of debt and structural adjustment programmes on women and the feasibility of already proposed relief measures; and to create a forum for sharing women's long-term vision and ideas on the community and development within the context of globalization. It urged Governments, NGOs, the private sector and all development actors to ensure scientific and technical literacy for all women and men, to foster equal access to advanced training in science and technology, to promote equal access to information and knowledge to improve the standard of living and quality of life, and to ensure gender equity within science and technology institutions, including policy and decision-making bodies. The Conference of Ministers also approved the modification in the composition of the membership of the Africa Regional Coordinating Committee for the Integration of Women in Development.

The ECA secretariat produced technical publications on women and peace, traditional and cultural practices harmful to the girl child, and a manual on gender and mainstreaming. It organized meetings to facilitate the renewal of the Africa Regional Coordinating Committee and the subregional bureau for the eastern and southern African subregions. Other meetings were organized to share information and provide guidance to organizations.

Programme, administrative and organizational questions

The ECA Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole considered the renewal programme at ECA as contained in the document "Serving Africa better: strategic directions for ECA" [E/ECA/CM.22/2] and the proposed medium-term plan for 1998-2001 [E/ECA/CM.22/3]. The document recognized that ECA needed to be reorganized and reformed, in response to changes in Africa, to a series of critical studies about its own operations, and as part of the broader stream of UN crisis and reform, so that it could be more cost-effective and play a more central part in the initiatives for African development. The strategic narrowing of the ECA agenda was based on clear priorities and on its comparative advantages in analysing regional issues, fostering regional cooperation, identifying role models, comparing and harmonizing policies, and compiling and networking development information. Reforms were guided by the principles of excellence, cost-effectiveness and effective partnership. The new focus promoted synergy, responded to new priorities and would strengthen monitoring and evaluation. In the range of policy priorities, reducing poverty was the overriding goal. Another priority was overcoming structural problems, such as distorted macroeconomics, inadequate capital markets, poor infrastructure, a low skills base, and regulations that discouraged investments. The five programme directions on which ECA's work would focus over the next six years were: facilitating economic and social policy analysis and implementation; ensuring food security and sustainable development; strengthening development management; harnessing information for development; and promoting regional co-operation.

The Committee expressed support for the proposals for the renewal of ECA, noting that the programme focus was consistent with member States' priorities. The new orientation should strengthen Commission structures and render it better able to assist countries to meet the challenges of development. It would help ECA to concentrate on a few, selected areas, which would enable it to use its scarce resources to achieve greater impact.

On 8 May, the ECA Conference of Ministers endorsed the new orientations of the Commission as outlined in the strategic directions document and the proposed medium-term plan for 1998-2001. It encouraged the Executive Secretary to continue the reform and renewal process of ECA in consultation with member States, and requested him to revise the 1996-1997 work programme to reflect the new orientation of the Commission's work and to ensure a smooth transition in 1997 to the next medium-term plan. The revision should be within resources already approved for ECA by the General Assembly and should pay due regard to the efficiency measures required to implement the relevant decisions of the Assembly regarding the 1996-1997 budget. The Conference appealed to the Secretary-General to request the Assembly to consider the revised work programme in conjunction with its review of the medium-term plan for 1998-2001.

The Committee for Programme and Coordination in June recommended approval by the Assembly of programme 14 (Economic and social development in Africa) of the proposed medium-term plan, taking into account the results of the process of internal restructuring in ECA.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 18 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/4.

New directions for the Economic Commission for Africa

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling the terms of reference of the Economic Commission for Africa as adopted by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 671 A(XXV) of 29 April 1958 and amended in its resolutions 974 D I(XXXVI) of 5 July 1963, 1343(XLV) of 18 July 1968 and 1978/68 of 4 August 1978,

Recalling also the various resolutions that have implications for the mandate and operations of the Commission, in particular General Assembly resolutions 32/197 of 20 December 1977 and 33/202 of 29 January 1979 on the restructuring of the economic and social sectors of the United Nations system, and Assembly resolution 44/211 of 22 December 1989,

Noting its endorsement of Economic Commission for Africa resolution 718(XXVI) of 12 May 1991 on the revitalization of the mandate and operational framework of the Economic Commission for Africa, as well as Commission resolutions 726(XXVII) of 22 April 1992 on strengthening the Economic Commission for Africa to face Africa's development challenges in the 1990s and 779(XXIX) of 4 May 1994 on strengthening the operational capacity of the Economic Commission for Africa,

Bearing in mind General Assembly resolutions 45/177 of 19 December 1990, 45/264 of 13 May 1991 and 46/235 of 13 April 1992 on the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields, in which the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to implement proposed restructuring measures whereby, inter alia, the regional commissions should be enabled fully to play their role under the authority of the Assembly and the Council and, in particular, those regional commissions located in developing countries should be strengthened in the context of the overall objectives of the ongoing restructuring and revitalization process,

Having examined in depth the document entitled "Serving Africa better: strategic directions for the Economic Commission for Africa" and the proposed medium-term plan for the period 1998-2001,

1. Expresses its appreciation for the process of reform and renewal of the Commission initiated by the Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Africa;

2. Endorses the new orientations of the Commission, as outlined in the document "Serving Africa better: strategic directions for the Economic Commission for Africa";

3. Also endorses the proposed medium-term plan for the period 1998-2001, bearing in mind that in its implementation due emphasis will be given to the need for greater selectivity and impact;

4. Encourages the Executive Secretary to continue to strengthen the process of renewal and reform of the Commission in consultation with member States;

5. Requests the Executive Secretary, in close collaboration with the Bureau of the Commission, to carry out a revision of the work programme for the period 1996-1997, which has become necessary to reflect the new orientation of the Commission's work and to ensure a smooth transition in 1997 to the next medium-term plan, bearing in mind that the revision must be within resources already approved for the Commission by the General Assembly and must pay due regard to the efficiency measures required to implement the relevant decisions of the Assembly regarding the budget for the period 1996-1997;

6. Appeals to the Secretary-General to request the General Assembly to consider the revised work programme of the Economic Commission for Africa in conjunction with its review of the medium-term plan for the period 1998-2001.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/4
18 July 1996 Meeting 40 Adopted without vote
Draft by ECA (E/1996/35); agenda item 7.
Meeting numbers. ESC 38-40.

Programme evaluation

The Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole considered a progress report [E/ECA/CM.22/10] on programme evaluation in ECA, which presented the results of programme evaluation studies relating to subprogrammes on trade, regional economic cooperation and integration; poverty alleviation through sustainable development; human resources development and social transformation; natural resources and energy development; and women in development. It also considered two additional reports: "In-depth evaluation of ECA natural resources and energy subprogramme" [E/ECA/CM.22/10/Add.1] and "Evaluation of UN-NADAF" [E/ECA/CM.22/10/Add.2]. The Committee observed that the findings required further study, as their recommendations needed careful consideration in line with ECA's strategic vision.

Multinational Programming and Operational Centres

The ECA Conference of Ministers on 8 May requested the Executive Secretary to strengthen the MULPOCs by putting at their disposal sufficient and competent staff, as well as financial resources, including recourse to competent consultants, and to endow them with sufficient administrative autonomy to allow them to operate effectively. He should ensure that the Centres played their role more efficiently as centres of excellence for the exchange of information and provision of support for the implementation of regional economic integration. He should undertake consultations with a view to recommending whether or not to reinstate the subregional conferences of ministers of the Centres, to enable them to focus more on specific subregional priorities and to enhance the Commission's presence at the subregional and country levels. He should also study and make recommendations on the rationalization of the membership of the different Centres. The Conference of Ministers appealed to member States to contribute to the United Nations Trust Fund for African Development in favour of the institutional strengthening of and activities to be undertaken at the Centres, and to put national experts at the disposal of the Centres, at their own expense, for short assignments. It called on UNDP, bilateral and multilateral funding agencies to support programmes of technical cooperation at the Centres.

Asia and the Pacific

The Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP), at its fifty-second session (Bangkok, Thailand, 17-24 April) [E/1996/36], had as its major theme topic "Rural poverty alleviation and sustainable development in Asia and the Pacific". The Commission reviewed the implications of recent economic and social developments, rural poverty alleviation and sustainable development, regional economic cooperation, environment and sustainable development, poverty alleviation through economic growth and social development, transport and communications, statistics, least developed, landlocked and island developing countries, technical cooperation, strengthening inter-organizational cooperation in the promotion of economic and social development in the region, as well as programme and organizational questions.

In his message to the session, the Secretary-General noted that the United Nations had been assisting developing countries in Asia and the Pacific for the past five decades in addressing pressing economic and social problems. The region had been at the forefront of world economic growth, yet, given the diversity of its development experience, the challenges ahead were many. He expressed the hope that the work of the fifty-second session would reinforce the spirit of partnership and the traditional vitality that had become the Commission's distinguishing features.

In his policy statement, the ESCAP Executive Secretary pointed out that poverty still affected millions of people despite the region's continued economic dynamism. He identified the lack of employment opportunities and access to resources, and the inability of the poor to respond to new and emerging opportunities as the basic causes of poverty, and emphasized the need to encourage complementarity among countries so that progress could be equitably shared by all. He drew the Commission's attention to the secretariat's initiative to reassess its programmes and activities, and requested guidance and advice in achieving a leaner and more efficient organization. He emphasized the need for continued UN assistance to the developing countries in overcoming problems associated with their economic reform, liberalization and integration with the global economy, particularly to the poorest countries to avoid their further marginalization and even to the more successful developing countries, which faced the risk of externally generated instability, especially through the global financial and capital markets. The Executive Secretary noted the prospects for intraregional and interregional cooperation, emphasizing the need to enhance the Commission's role as a facilitator in sharing experience among countries at varying levels of development, as a centre for information, and as a link between action at the national level and the evolution of a global consensus, thus enhancing cooperation.

Economic and social trends

Economic trends

The Economic and Social Survey of Asia and the Pacific 1997 [ST/ESCAP/1727] reviewed world economic developments in 1996 and their implications for the ESCAP region. It discussed emerging global trends and the ESCAP region, the region's socio-economic trends and prospects, foreign trade, external financial and investment inflows and transport and communications.

A summary of the survey [E/1997/44] examined the opportunities and challenges faced by the region as it approached the twenty-first century, in the light of the emerging globalization and regionalization processes driven by technology- and market-related factors, greater liberalization and deregulation, and international measures to increase the transparency of international transactions. The summary noted that data on the flows of trade, investment and finance attested to intensified globalization over the past three decades. Developing ESCAP countries had increased their share of world trade in goods and services, outperforming other developing countries. Their share of world trade in goods and services had more than doubled between 1971 and 1994, and, in the case of services, the share tripled over the same period. They also accounted for most of the increase in developing countries' share of manufactured exports. In terms of external finance, developing countries, especially those in Asia and the Pacific, had become progressively more integrated with international financial and capital markets. The share of developing countries in international equity issues rose from 14 per cent in 1990 to 35 per cent in 1995, largely due to the increase in issues originating in South and South-East Asia. In the area of foreign direct investment (FDI), ESCAP developing countries became more important, both as recipients and sources, with their share of world inflows increasing from about 9 per cent in the 1984-1989 period to 21 per cent in 1995. Their share of outflows rose from 4 per cent to 13 per cent of the world total, and from 68 per cent to 88 per cent of the developing countries' total.

At the same time, there was an intensification of intraregional linkages as reflected in enhanced intraregional trade and investment flows. The trend towards intensified participation in the globalization and regionalization processes by the developing ESCAP countries was likely to continue into the next century. Similarly, prospects for regional cooperation in trade and investment were likely to be sustained, and possibly gather momentum, because of rising income and per capita consumption, overall export growth, moderate inflation and modest current-account deficits projected for South, East and South-East Asian countries. However, the enhanced integration by ESCAP countries into the international economy and the forging of regional linkages in trade and financial flows were not equally shared by all countries, especially since the variations in the level and speed of integration were partly influenced by variables related to macroeconomics and social development.

Striking differences were evident among countries in the region. The least developed had low levels of per capita income. Most of them, in particular all Pacific island countries, had small populations. The observed level of per capita income in many of them might not be sustainable with declining aid flows. In South and South-West Asia, rates of economic growth had accelerated, associated in most cases with the promotion of domestic savings, investments and exports, better budgetary balance and containment of inflation. On the other hand, rates of growth, with few exceptions, remained low in the least developed economies and the small island economies of the Pacific. The problems faced by the economies in transition remained daunting, despite some recent successes in containing inflation and arresting negative growth. Those countries had yet to develop effective institutional structures to suit the needs of a well-functioning market economy. During the period 1991-1995, they experienced severe contractions of total and per capita incomes amid hyper-inflationary situations. Only in the past couple of years had some economies shown signs of positive growth and moderate inflation. The challenges facing different groups of countries in the region were of different magnitude and nature. The countries lagging behind, especially the least developed countries (LDCs) and Pacific islands, and the transition economies had considerable headway to make in order to join the regional mainstream and the global economy.

The summary of the Survey noted that, in the light of a lack of uniformity in the benefits and risks of globalization and regionalization, due to differences in initial conditions, specific policy responses had to correspond to each country's condition. At the national level, policies had to focus on internal and external macroeconomic balances; the soundness of the financial sector; a greater role for the private sector; extended coverage and improved quality of health and educational services; greater flexibility in labour markets; support for technological upgrading; and appropriate speed and sequencing of liberalization measures, along with social safety nets to minimize the hardships of adjustment and restructuring. At regional and subregional levels, measures that could be taken included intensification of trade liberalization; trade facilitation; policy coordination for greater convergence in inflation, interest rates and tax levels; harmonization of investment incentives; exploration of multi-country commodity futures markets and multi-country bonds and stock markets; and collaboration in research and development, transport and telecommunications. At the international level, measures suggested included: accelerating official financial and technical assistance to the disadvantaged groups of countries; fully implementing the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade agreements and market access for products of export interest; ensuring that issues such as labour welfare, environment and human rights were not misused as non-tariff barriers; avoiding anti-dumping practices as a protective device; and improving preferential market access schemes.

Subregional economic performance

By 1996, most of the 13 LDCs of the region, with the exception of some Pacific island nations, had succeeded in accelerating growth rates, reaching 6 per cent or above during the period 1995-1996, and expecting to reach the 7 per cent target rate by the turn of the century. Bangladesh and Nepal were estimated to have grown by 6 per cent in 1996. Cambodia, the Lao People's Democratic Republic and Myanmar, which had grown by 7 per cent, 7.1 per cent and 9.8 per cent respectively the previous year, expected growth rates to accelerate further; they were also becoming increasingly interlinked with their prospective Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN) partners, which were providing them with investment, trade and technical support.

Rates of growth in Pacific island economies during the 1980s and 1990s were low, despite some improvement in the first half of the 1990s. Given the high population growth rates, most experienced static or declining living standards. Growth was not only slow, but erratic and uneven. Papua New Guinea, Solomon Islands and Tuvalu experienced growth rates in the first half of the 1990s of 7.6 per cent, 5 per cent and 6.7 per cent, respectively. Samoa showed positive rates of economic growth in 1995 and 1996 after years of decline largely due to devastating cyclones. The recovery was due to the revival of exports of coconut products and expansion in the tourism sector. Growth in Papua New Guinea was estimated at less than 2 per cent in 1996.

In Asia's North and Central regions, the gross domestic product (GDP) of the Central Asian republics and the Russian Federation declined during the first half of the 1990s. However, with the exception of Tajikistan, the worst of the recession appeared to have ended, and the situation in some countries had improved by 1995-1996. Armenia showed the first signs of recovery; by the first half of 1996, the recessions in Kyrgyzstan and Uzbekistan had ended, with real GDP growth of 0.3 per cent and 1.4 per cent, respectively, compared with 1995. Positive shifts in economic performance in some other countries in the first half of 1996 were also noticeable, except for Tajikistan where output again contracted by more than 20 per cent. Recovery in output occurred mainly in the industrial sector, as gross industrial output grew strongly in Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan. On the other hand Azerbaijan, the Russian Federation and Tajikistan experienced further declines; in the Russian Federation, industrial production and real GDP fell by 5 and 6 per cent, respectively.

Among the countries of South and South-West Asia, India, Pakistan and Sri Lanka made modest advances during the 1980s and 1990s. The Indian economy, after a severe balance-of-payments crisis in 1991, resumed its growth momentum in 1992 and gradually accelerated to over 6 per cent in 1995-1996. Pakistan had the best record of growth in South Asia, with an average 6.1 per cent rate between 1981 and 1990, but decelerated to an average of 4.9 per cent during 1991-1995. Sri Lanka, on the other hand, succeeded in raising its growth rate from 4.3 per cent to 5.4 per cent during the same period. Fiscal deficits in the three economies were still high; however, a structural shift had taken place, especially in respect of the share of GDP produced in agriculture.

Most of the South-East Asian economies had displayed considerable dynamism in recent years. Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore, Thailand and Viet Nam achieved an average growth rate of more than 8 per cent during 1991-1995. Indonesia, Malaysia and Thailand experienced rapid changes in the structure of their production, with a decline in the share of agriculture in GDP from 31 per cent to 16 per cent in Indonesia, from 23 per cent to 13 per cent in Malaysia, and from 20 per cent to 10 per cent in Thailand. Those nations had also experienced rapid rates of industrial growth since 1980. The economies of the Philippines and Viet Nam also showed changes in the composition of their outputs, although not as marked as in the other three countries.

In East and North-East Asia, the growth rate of China's economy was estimated to have decelerated to 9.2 per cent in 1996, compared to 10.2 per cent in 1995, due to the impact of tight monetary policies aimed at curbing inflation. Agricultural production was disrupted by severe flooding; industry and services were the main sources of growth. China's economy also underwent substantial structural changes, with the weight of production shifting towards industry and services and with the relative share of agriculture falling. Mongolia's economy continued its recovery in 1996, with a GDP growth rate of 4.5 per cent, though below the 6.3 per cent growth rate of 1995; the industrial sector continued to lead the recovery. Growth rates in the economies of the Republic of Korea and Taiwan Province of China slackened in 1996, with the former experiencing the sharpest deceleration from 9 per cent in 1995 to 6.6 per cent in 1996.

The three developed countries in the region—Australia, Japan and New Zealand—grew at slower rates, in line with many other developed countries. Average growth rates decelerated sharply during the first half of the 1990s, largely reflecting the impact of the recession that many industrial countries, including those three, experienced, extending to 1993. Japan's economy, which had fallen into recession later than the other two countries, had yet to set on a course of recovery. Its annual growth rate remained below 1 per cent in 1995, but was estimated at 3.7 per cent in 1996. Australia maintained a strong growth of some 4 per cent in 1996, while New Zealand's growth rate slipped to 2 per cent. Apart from the recession, those countries also experienced structural problems, reflected in large budget and balance-of-payments deficits and rising wage pressures and inflation, particularly in Australia and New Zealand. However, in those two countries, problems were largely reduced by the implementation of fiscal, financial and labour market reforms.

Activities in 1996

ESCAP activities in 1996 were carried out under six thematic subprogrammes approved by the Commission in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 720]: regional economic cooperation; environment and sustainable development; poverty alleviation through economic growth and social development; transport and communications; statistics; and least developed, landlocked and island developing countries.

Development policy and regional economic cooperation

At its 1996 session, the Commission had before it a study on rural poverty alleviation and sustainable development in Asia and the Pacific [ST/ESCAP/1617], as well as its summary [E/ESCAP/1016]. Those documents provided analyses of the incidence, correlates and causes of rural poverty; the relationship between development strategies and macroeconomic policies on the one hand, and rural poverty on the other; the impact of sustainable development of agriculture and of the agreements of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations on rural poverty; natural resource degradation and rural poverty; rural industrialization, physical infrastructure and poverty alleviation; and gender dimensions of rural poverty. Policy recommendations for alleviating rural poverty were also provided.

The Commission endorsed the findings and policy recommendations contained in the study. It concluded that Governments needed to adopt multi-pronged strategies to alleviate rural poverty, including the reallocation of resources from non-productive sectors to social sectors; generation of high economic growth and equitable sharing of its benefits with the poor; promotion of access to nutrition, health, literacy, education and training; provision of basic physical infrastructure and basic social services, such as clean water and sanitation; and special anti-poverty programmes for the most disadvantaged and needy groups. Sustainable development should be pursued through environmentally friendly technological changes and improvements in the productivity of resources, so as to conserve natural resources and alleviate poverty. The Commission recommended that standards of living of rural women should be improved through access to primary health care, family planning, nutrition, education and microcredit schemes. The secretariat should formulate a regional strategy and a programme of action on rural poverty alleviation, and examine the situation and obstacles to be faced in implementing alleviation measures. It should also undertake a follow-up of the theme study so that different scenarios could be derived with internally consistent recommendations and clear policy options, taking into account social and cultural aspects. The Commission urged the secretariat to assist its members and associate members in strengthening their policies and programmes relating to rural poverty alleviation, through research studies, workshops and training programmes, the facilitation of information exchange, and the provision of technical assistance and advisory services.

The Committee for Regional Economic Cooperation, at its fifth session (Bangkok, 2-3 April) [E/ESCAP/1017], on the recommendation of its Steering Group [YUN 1995, p. 1012], approved a secretariat initiative to organize a regional dialogue among senior trade policy officials to assist in their preparations for the first ministerial meeting of the World Trade Organization (WTO), to be held in Singapore in December (see PART SIX, Chapter XVIII). It approved the revised Action Programme for Regional Economic Cooperation in Trade and Investment; endorsed proposed additions to the Seoul Plan of Action for Promoting Industrial Restructuring in Asia and the Pacific; stated its support for the establishment of the Regional Forum for Sustainable Development and Restructuring; and approved the Plan of Action for phase II (1996-1997) of the Asian Land Transport Infrastructure Development project.

The Commission, in endorsing the Committee's report and its recommendations, reiterated its commitment and support for strengthening the regional economic cooperation process, especially in the light of the changes in the international economic situation. It recalled the importance it had accorded to subregional cooperation, and commended the Steering Group and the Committee for their initiatives to stimulate such cooperation, specifically with regard to North-East Asia. It noted the proposals to establish a North-East Asian business forum and to enhance cooperation through technical cooperation among developing countries, including tripartite cooperation. It stressed the need to strengthen economic cooperation to address the emerging issues of concern in the region. It agreed that the full and effective implementation of the Uruguay Round of multilateral agreements was fundamental to the credibility of the multilateral trading system.

Action Programme for Infrastructure Development

At its 1996 session, the Commission considered a note [E/ESCAP/1027] by the secretariat on the Regional Action Programme for Infrastructure Development in Asia and the Pacific. Endorsing the Regional Action Programme, the Commission agreed with the proposed phasing of its implementation, that is, phase I (1997-2001) and phase II (2002-2006), so as to allow maximum flexibility in responding to changing priorities within the region at the project level. The Commission entrusted the task of translating the Regional Action Programme into an operational set of activities to the Ministerial Conference on Infrastructure (see below). Approving the arrangements for holding the Conference, the Commission noted that the Conference would provide an opportunity for a smooth transition between Phase II (1992-1996) of the Transport and Communications Decade and the New Delhi Action Plan on Infrastructure Development in Asia and the Pacific [YUN 1995, p. 1012]. The Commission stressed the importance of inter-agency cooperation and coordination through the Inter-Agency Subcommittee on Infrastructure Development in Asia and the Pacific for the implementation of the New Delhi Action Plan. It expressed satisfaction at progress in establishing the Asia Infrastructure Development Alliance (AIDA). The Steering Committee to establish AIDA met in 1996 for its second (Bangkok, 10-11 April) and final (Bangkok, 24-25 September) meetings [TCT/SC(2) and (3)/AIDA/Rep].

The Ministerial Conference on Infrastructure [E/ESCAP/MCI/Rep] was held in New Delhi, India, on 28 and 29 October. The World Infrastructure Forum—Asia 1996 was held concurrently with the Conference. Preparations for the Conference included an expert group meeting (Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, 16-18 July) [TCT/EGM/PMCI/Rep] and a meeting of senior government officials (New Delhi, 23-26 October) [E/ESCAP/MCI/1]. The Conference adopted the New Delhi Declaration on Infrastructure Development in Asia and the Pacific and endorsed the list of operational activities/projects for phase I of the Regional Action Programme for the implementation of the New Delhi Action Plan. It urged multilateral and bilateral donors to contribute to the implementation of the Regional Action Programme. It also recommended that the name of the Committee on Transport and Communications be changed to the Committee on Transport, Communications, Tourism and Infrastructure Development, subject to the review of the subsidiary structure of the Commission in 1997.

Least developed and landlocked developing countries

The Special Body on Least Developed and Landlocked Developing Countries, at its third session (Bangkok, 21-22 April), considered institutional development for macroeconomic policy management and coordination, and issues and problems of landlocked developing countries and modalities for addressing them. It noted that sustainable economic growth could not have been obtained without coordinated formulation and implementation of macroeconomic policies by key government institutions, and that institutional development was a crucial but difficult issue for many countries. It recognized that adequate attention should be given to resolving the transport problems of landlocked countries, and recommended the development of multiple corridors and the further exploration of the use of inland waterways. The Special Body urged member countries to accede to international conventions on land transport facilitation measures and to increase the use of multimodal transport and freight forwarding.

At its 1996 session, the Commission noted the lack of progress in implementation of the United Nations Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries for the 1990s [A/CONF.147/18], adopted in 1990 by the Second United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries and endorsed by the General Assembly later that year [GA res. 45/206]. Noting the continuing relatively poor economic performance of LDCs in the region, it urged the secretariat to continue to monitor and assist in the implementation of the Programme of Action to improve their socio-economic situation. The Commission recommended that policies and programmes to promote capacity- and institution-building within those countries should be intensified, and that high priority should be given by the international community to assisting in those efforts. It urged that aid targets and commitments set in the Programme of Action should be met, and that adequate funding of multilateral institutions, including ESCAP, should be assured to support their efforts for the benefit of LDCs. Member States should also implement measures to alleviate the debt burden, increase concessional financing in support of economic policy measures, and support LDCs in their efforts to attract foreign investment. The Commission also recommended that technical assistance should be given to LDCs to enhance the institutional and human capacities required to comply with obligations arising from WTO membership. Activities to address the transport and infrastructure concerns of those countries should be strengthened, and donors should increase assistance to reduce the damage of annual natural disasters, especially floods and droughts.

Landlocked States in Central Asia

In a 14 August note [A/51/288], the UN Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly the progress report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) on measures to improve the transit transport environment in Central Asia, in response to General Assembly resolution 49/102 [YUN 1994, p. 704]. The report discussed the new landlocked reality, and examined the impact of economic change on trade and transit in the region, main alternative transit transport routes for Central Asia, and obstacles, opportunities and proposals for action for reducing costs and improving the efficiency of transit transport. It presented elements of a programme for improving the efficiency of the current transit environment.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/168.

Transit environment in the landlocked States in Central Asia and their transit developing neighbours

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 48/169 and 48/170 of 21 December 1993 and 49/102 of 19 December 1994,

Recalling also the agreed conclusions and recommendations of the first and the second Meeting of Governmental Experts from Landlocked and Transit Developing Countries and Representatives of Donor Countries and Financial and Development Institutions, held in New York from 17 to 19 May 1993 and from 19 to 22 June 1995, respectively, and in particular the conclusions and recommendations of those meetings pertaining to the newly independent and developing landlocked States in Central Asia and their transit developing neighbours,

Recognizing that the overall socio-economic development efforts of newly independent and developing landlocked States, seeking to enter world markets through the establishment of a multicountry transit system, are impeded by a lack of territorial access to the sea as well as by remoteness and isolation from world markets,

Supporting the current efforts being undertaken by the newly independent and developing landlocked States in Central Asia and their transit developing neighbours through relevant multilateral, bilateral and regional arrangements to address the issues regarding the development of a viable transit infrastructure in the region,

Considering that the outcome of the Symposium for Landlocked and Transit Developing Countries, held in New York from 14 to 16 June 1995, in particular the document entitled "Global framework for transit transport cooperation between landlocked and transit developing countries and the donor community", is a practical contribution to the development objectives and efforts of the United Nations,

Taking note of the progress report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development on measures designed to improve the transit transport environment in Central Asia, and considering that the problems of transit transport facing the Central Asian region need to be seen against the backdrop of economic changes and the accompanying challenges, including especially the impact of those changes on the international and intraregional trade of the countries concerned,

Recognizing that, to be effective, a transit transport strategy for the newly independent and developing landlocked States in Central Asia and their transit developing neighbours should incorporate actions that address both the problems inhering in the use of existing transit routes and the early development and smooth functioning of new, alternative routes,

Emphasizing the importance of strengthening international support measures to address further the problems of the newly independent and developing landlocked States in Central Asia and their transit developing neighbours,

1. Takes note of the results of the Technical Meeting on Central Asia's Transit Transport Links with World Markets, held at Ankara from 7 to 9 November 1995, under the auspices of the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development;

2. Invites the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the Governments concerned, in cooperation with the United Nations Development Programme, the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, the Economic Commission for Europe and relevant regional and international organizations and in accordance with approved programme priorities and within existing financial resources, to continue elaborating a programme for improving the efficiency of the current transit environment in the newly independent and developing landlocked States in Central Asia and their transit developing neighbours;

3. Invites donor countries and multilateral financial and development institutions, within their mandates, to provide newly independent and developing landlocked States in Central Asia and their transit developing neighbours with appropriate financial and technical assistance for the improvement of the transit environment for those countries;

4. Calls upon the United Nations system to continue studying, within the scope of the implementation of the present resolution, possible ways of promoting more effective cooperative arrangements between landlocked States in Central Asia and their transit neighbours and to encourage a more active supportive role on the part of the donor community;

5. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development to prepare a report on the implementation of the present resolution, to be submitted to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session.

General Assembly resolution 51/168

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/602) without vote, 25 November (meeting 36); 11-nation draft (A/C.2/51/L.25), orally revised; agenda item 94.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 29-33, 35, 36; plenary 86.

Special problems of Pacific island countries

The Special Body on Pacific Island Developing Countries, at its fourth session (Bangkok, 18-19 April), paid special attention to problems facing small island States in their consideration of membership in WTO. Principal concerns were the burden of payment of dues in relation to the size of the domestic economy, the limited human resources available to analyse the agreements and ensuing obligations, and the substantial changes in domestic laws required to execute those obligations. It also recognized the need for the economies of Pacific island States to become more competitive as their protection through preferential agreements was eroded in efforts to expand and diversify export products and markets. It urged greater exchange of experience between States of the Pacific and Asia in development policy management, development of subregional economic arrangements, trade and investment promotion, and tourism development.

The Commission noted that the fast-changing international economic environment was having an increasing impact on the development performance of Pacific island countries, especially as a result of the conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations. It urged the secretariat to continue to provide technical assistance to those countries in trade and investment, including giving advice on issues related to WTO accession and obligations and assisting Pacific island countries in enhancing their trade and investment relationships with the dynamic Asian countries, as well as among themselves. The secretariat, including the ESCAP Pacific Operations Centre (ESCAP/POC), should continue to advise Pacific island countries on economic adjustment and reform measures, and assist them in strengthening national capacity in policy formulation and implementation, institution-building, and collecting and analysing statistical information. Together with other agencies and organizations, it should provide technical and advisory assistance to those countries in their efforts to attain sustainable development. The Commission requested the secretariat to provide ESCAP/POC with the necessary financial and human resources, and urged it to strengthen cooperation with subregional organizations to avoid duplication. The Commission urged Pacific island countries to take advantage of offers of technical cooperation and to make known their priority areas for such assistance. It urged donors to continue to support ESCAP activities for the benefit of Pacific island countries.

During the year, ESCAP/POC provided advisory services focusing on economic and financial management in Pacific island developing countries and promotion of sustainable development in small island developing States. The secretariat conducted studies under a project on enhancing cooperation in trade and investment between Pacific island countries and the economies of East and South-East Asia.

ESCAP transition economies

The ESCAP secretariat continued to provide assistance to Asian and Pacific economies in transition to a market system. Its activities during the year included a national workshop on economic reform in Viet Nam, a subregional seminar on key issues in the implementation of economic policy reform in the Central Asian countries and the Russian Federation and a seminar on the role of wage systems in economic planning.

The Commission, in a 24 April resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/10)] on the revised Action Programme for Regional Economic Cooperation in Trade and Investment, noted that economies in transition continued to face several major impediments to the successful implementation of their programmes of economic reform, particularly in the establishment and maintenance of macroeconomic stability within their new market-oriented economic environments. The regional economic cooperation programme should address issues relating to trade liberalization and efficiency, expansion of trade with economies other than their traditional partners, price liberalization, the introduction of competition with the private sector, maximization of foreign direct investment flows and the management of a supportive exchange rate policy. It should provide those economies with the necessary technical assistance for policy-making and macroeconomic management. Entrepreneurship development within the economies should be promoted to facilitate their transition to market economies. Assistance to those countries should be undertaken in consultation with other international and regional institutions, to avoid duplication. With regard to their integration into the region, the Commission stated that regional cooperation programmes would continue to accord special attention to improving transport linkages through the implementation of the Asian Highway and Trans-Asian Railway projects, and improving land transport facilitation measures as integral parts of the Asian land transport infrastructure development project, with a view to identifying transport routes of regional and subregional importance for establishing rail and road linkages between those economies and the rest of the region.

Economic and technical cooperation

During 1996 [E/ESCAP/1069], ESCAP received $23.3 million in contributions for technical cooperation activities, a marginal increase of some $883,073 over 1995, including $10 million from within the UN system and $13.3 million from donor States, developing member countries and organizations. Australia, France, Germany, Japan, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Norway contributed 82.4 per cent of total bilateral assistance received. China, India, Indonesia and the Republic of Korea were the largest contributors among developing member countries. In addition to cash contributions, donor States and developing countries provided 507 work-months of expert services, compared with 372 in 1995. During 1996, bilateral donors approved 98 projects, totalling $8.2 million, for execution under ESCAP's work programme, excluding special projects and regional institutions. A corps of 12 regional advisers undertook 92 missions to 32 developing countries of the region. Financial requirements for the 119 new project proposals recommended for bilateral funding in 1997 amounted to $10.9 million.

Technical cooperation among developing countries

In 1996, the Commission stressed the importance of reinforcing technical cooperation among developing countries in the areas of human resources development and the exchange and sharing of experience. It welcomed the efforts of the secretariat to expand economic and technical cooperation among developing countries (ECDC/TCDC) in the context of regional economic cooperation.

During the year, the secretariat developed and implemented a total of 140 promotional TCDC and ECDC activities financed from extrabudgetary resources and complemented by resources under the UN regular programme of technical cooperation. Those activities included bilateral and multilateral exchange of experience and participation in seminars, study visits and training workshops. In addition, 41 TCDC operational activities involving 165 officials were implemented through resources provided by China, the Netherlands and the Republic of Korea to the ESCAP TCDC supplementary fund. TCDC operational activities concentrated mainly on human resources development and covered a broad range of subjects, including water resources management, flood forecasting, use of hydropower, solar energy and small-scale wind energy, energy conservation, remote sensing/geographic information systems for land-use mapping, protection from crop diseases and insect pests, meat processing, vegetable cultivation, integrated fish farming, agricultural machinery, tropical meteorology, port management and operations, information technology, environmental health, urban management, customs computer application systems, trade promotion and aid cooperation. In addition, experts from the Republic of Korea rendered advisory services to Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan on the development of national energy conservation legislation; two resource persons from Thailand advised Sri Lanka on the role of the private sector in rural development; and a volunteer statistician from Myanmar assisted and trained officials of the Marshall Islands in the development of national statistics. To strengthen the role of TCDC national focal points, the secretariat organized a workshop for focal points of selected Pacific island developing countries.

International trade and finance

In 1996, the Commission stressed the need to strengthen economic cooperation to address emerging issues of concern in the region. To meet new challenges, it was recommended that ESCAP continue to provide technical assistance for the implementation of the Uruguay Round agreements and for future negotiations, especially in the area of trade in services. The Commission recognized the importance of the textiles and clothing manufacturing sector for the future economic growth of LDCs, and suggested that the implications of the Uruguay Round agreements for those countries should be studied as well as the impact of the erosion of preferences. The Commission recommended that ESCAP continue to provide technical assistance to non-WTO members in their integration into the international trading system, including their accession to WTO. The secretariat was also requested to study the linkages between investment and competition policy. The Commission recommended that high priority be accorded to the problems faced by LDCs in financial reform, and suggested that technical cooperation and training activities should be organized for them involving the development of human resources, technology and management skills. The Commission, by a 24 April resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/10)], noted progress in the implementation of the Action Programme for Regional Economic Cooperation in Trade and Investment, which it had endorsed in 1993 [YUN1993, p.609]. It endorsed the revised Action Programme, annexed to the resolution, which outlined arrangements for the growth of intraregional trade; expansion of intraregional investment flows; development of small and medium-sized enterprises; emerging trade and investment-related concerns, including implications for trade expansion of implementing the Uruguay Round agreements; assistance to the economies in transition; and promotion of inter-subregional cooperation.

During the year, consultative meetings, seminars and workshops were held on: fostering Myanmar's trade and investment interdependency; the formation of a private-sector advisory group under the Forum for the Comprehensive Development of Indo-China; exports of fish and fishery products of selected island developing countries; export marketing for selected industries and export finance in the Lao People's Democratic Republic; market research; implications of the single European market for Asian and Pacific economies; trade and environment linkages; Uruguay Round issues; chambers of commerce and industry of the Greater Mekong subregion; trade policy issues for Papua New Guinea; Electronic Data Interchange (EDI) and the economies in transition; networking of trade-related research institutions; the ESCAP network on trade facilitation; and the development of the Asia Pacific Information Exchange.

Regional advisory services were provided to ESCAP members on issues relating to the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, including assistance in the preparations for the WTO Ministerial Conference; the comprehensive development of Indo-China; promoting exports of fish and fishery products; export marketing; international market research; implications of the single European market for Asian and Pacific economies; enhancing trade and environmental linkages in environmentally vulnerable export-oriented sectors of ESCAP economies; trade facilitation and efficiency; accession to the Bangkok Agreement; establishing a network of trade-related research institutions; trade promotion activities; and organization of the sixth Asia-Pacific International Trade Fair, held in Manila, Philippines, in November. Priority attention continued to be given to the development of information systems in the region, in particular the development of computerized trade information systems: the Micro Computer-based Commodity Analysis and Information System; the Regional Investment Information and Promotion Service; the Bangkok mirror site of the Trade Facilitation Information Exchange; and the Asia Pacific Information Exchange.

The secretariat published the TISNET Trade and Investment Information Bulletin, and issued publications on foreign investment guidelines, seafood exports and customs tariffs in the Pacific. Studies were completed on prospects for the textile and clothing sector of the ESCAP region in the post-Uruguay Round context, trade and investment complementarities in North-East Asia, trade and investment potential in Myanmar, promoting exports of fish and fishery products in selected ESCAP island developing countries, and Asian and Pacific developing economies and the first WTO Ministerial Conference.

Transport and communications

In 1996, the Commission reviewed activities related to land, railways, urban transport, multimodal transport and facilitation of maritime traffic, inland water transport, freight forwarding, commercialization and privatization of ports, environmental concerns arising from infrastructure development and operation, and the implementation of the Regional Action Programme for Phase II (1992-1996) of the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific. The Commission endorsed the report of the Committee on Transport and Communications at its second session [YUN 1995, p. 1015]. It agreed that the work programme implied under the New Delhi Action Plan on Infrastructure Development in Asia and the Pacific should be considered in a single forum. It directed the secretariat to draft new terms of reference for the Committee on Transport, Communications, Tourism and Infrastructure Development (formerly the Committee on Transport and Communications). It reiterated its support for the integrated Asian Land Transport Infrastructure Development (ALTID) project and emphasized the importance of its completion, also emphasizing that the Asian Highway and the Trans-Asian Railway networks, including Asia-Europe links, should be brought into operation as early as possible. In that regard, the Commission, in a 24 April resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/9)] on intra-Asia and Asia-Europe land bridges, urged members and associate members to seek ways of constructing the missing highway and railway links, and upgrading and/or extending links, as well as constructing new links as part of the Asian Highway and the Trans-Asian Railway networks. It requested donors and funding agencies, as well as international and intergovernmental organizations, to support ALTID activities and initiatives to create intra-Asia and Asia-Europe land bridges. The Commission also approved the plan of action for implementation of phase II (1996-1997) of the ALTID project, including a study on the development of the Trans-Asian Railway in the southern corridor linking South Asia with Europe. The Commission noted that a new railway line linking the railways of Iran and Turkmenistan would be inaugurated in May, completing a new "silk rail route" from China to Europe and providing landlocked Central Asian republics with rail access to seaports in the south. In view of the important benefits of implementing policies to privatize and "corporatize" elements of the transport and communications sector to improve efficiency of management and operations, the Commission considered that the proposed concepts and guidelines for the commercialization and privatization of ports would be of great assistance to countries in formulating appropriate policies. It supported the secretariat's proposal to develop a comprehensive plan of activities on transport-related environmental issues, including emphasis on environmentally friendly and sustainable transport systems. It requested the secretariat to give higher priority to urban transport issues and to the investigation of low-cost urban transport systems, and to give special attention to the specific needs of least developed, landlocked and island developing countries and disadvantaged economies in transition.

The Ministerial Conference on Infrastructure (see above) welcomed the preparation of a "Green Paper for Telecommunications" in the Asia and Pacific region. It requested the secretariat to pay priority attention to the formulation, formalization and improvement of the operational efficiency and completion of missing links in international transport networks; transport facilitation measures at border crossings; and transport logistics. It requested the secretariat to initiate activities within ALTID to develop draft ESCAP agreements on Trans-Asian Railway and Asian Highway networks to formalize the international land transport network for coordinated development of land transport in Asia. It also endorsed priority ALTID infrastructure projects.

During the year, the secretariat organized national, subregional and regional workshops and seminars on management and financing of road maintenance; freight forwarding and multimodal transport; facilitation of maritime traffic; inland water transport, including several on financial/economic appraisal of inland water transport projects; privatization of ports; and transport of dangerous goods. Two seminars were organized on the implications of accession to land transport facilitation conventions: one for the North-East Asian countries, and another for the Greater Mekong subregion. Other highlights included the organization of a seminar on infrastructure regulation for Central Asian republics; a joint ESCAP/Asian Development Bank road safety seminar; and a Japan/ESCAP symposium on the Asian Highway network development.

The secretariat provided advisory services to the Central Asian republics on the development of the ESCAP/Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) Special Programme for the Economies of Central Asia, and to Kazakhstan on railway marketing practices. Training was provided to Micronesia on the installation of computer-assisted port management, while advisory services were rendered to Iran on shipping and port organization and to Bangladesh on fleet development. Advisory missions were also undertaken to China and the Philippines to review implementation of transport conventions and to Myanmar on transport conditions and freight forwarding. Two pilot projects began, on participatory planning of rural infrastructure in the Lao People's Democratic Republic and on integration of non-motorized transport into an urban transport system in the city of Dhaka, Bangladesh. During the year, the secretariat produced studies on the feasibility of rail networks in China, Kazakhstan, Mongolia, the Russian Federation and the Korean peninsula; on development of the Trans-Asian Railway in the southern corridor of Asia-Europe routes; and on development of the Trans-Asian Railway for the Indo-China and ASEAN subregions.

Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific

The Commission expressed satisfaction at the results of the implementation of the Regional Action Programme for Phase II (1992-1996) of the Transport and Communications Decade for Asia and the Pacific, proclaimed by the General Assembly in 1984 [GA res. 39/227] and extended in 1991 [YUN 1991, p. 312] until 1996, and which promoted infrastructural improvements in the ESCAP region. The Commission expressed concern over the 11 projects that remained unfunded, even though some issues had been addressed with the cooperation of the private sector.

The Ministerial Conference on Infrastructure (New Delhi, India, 28-29 October) recommended that data and information should be updated in 1997 for the final evaluation report on the Decade, and requested members and associate members to support the secretariat in carrying out that task through their respective focal points.

Decade-related information continued to be disseminated during the year in Decade News, published by the ESCAP secretariat.

Tourism

In 1996, the Commission recognized the important role of tourism in the socio-economic development of the Asian and Pacific region, stressing that it should be given high priority in the ESCAP programme of work. The Commission urged the secretariat to intensify its tourism activities and to place special emphasis on those related to integrated tourism planning and development, appraisal of the economic impact of tourism, environmental management of tourism development, human resources development in the tourism sector, tourism infrastructure development and investment, and regional and subregional cooperation in the development and promotion of tourism and facilitation of travel. It requested the secretariat to play a catalytic role in promoting TCDC in the field of tourism, and noted that ESCAP had considered initiating activities to promote tourism along the Asian Highway. It supported a project on strengthening cooperation in tourism development in the Greater Mekong subregion. The Commission requested the secretariat to pay attention to the specific needs of the LDCs, economies in transition and countries in an early stage of tourism development. It endorsed the convening in December of an intergovernmental meeting on tourism development and the formation of a regional network of tourism training institutes and organizations in the Asian and Pacific region.

The Intergovernmental Meeting on Tourism Development (Bangkok, 11-13 December) discussed tourism trends and prospects worldwide and in the Asian and Pacific region, and strengthening national capabilities in tourism planning and promotion of regional cooperation in tourism development. It recommended that ESCAP strengthen its activities in the areas of economic impact of tourism, the environmental management of tourism development, infrastructure development and investment for the tourism sector, human resources development in the tourism sector, facilitation of travel for the expansion of intraregional tourism, and regional/subregional promotion of tourism, including tourism along the Asian Highway. It also recommended that the name of the Committee on Transport and Communications be changed to the Committee on Transport, Communications, Tourism and Infrastructure Development.

During the year, the ESCAP secretariat organized two meetings of the working group on the Greater Mekong subregion tourism sector; a seminar on tourism promotion in countries in the early stage of tourism development; and national workshops on the Japanese travel market and on tourism investment. Secretariat publications included: Guidelines on Integrated Tourism Planning; Study of the Economic Impact of Tourism in the Asian Region; and Study on Regional Cooperation in Human Resources Development in the Tourism Sector. Technical information and data on tourism and tourism development continued to be disseminated through the ESCAP Tourism Review and the ESCAP Tourism Newsletter.

Industrial and technological development

The Commission endorsed additions [E/ESCAP/1017] to the Seoul Plan of Action for Promoting Industrial Restructuring in Asia and the Pacific, adopted in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 486]. It considered the Regional Forum for Sustainable Industrial Development and Restructuring an effective means for facilitating an ongoing dialogue between policy makers, private-sector representatives and professional experts in promoting industrial restructuring in the region. It urged that activities related to industrial and technological development should be strengthened and focus on small enterprise development, investment promotion, industrial complementarities and relocation, technological capacity-building, skills development and private-sector development. It noted the proposal to hold a meeting of ministers of industry and technology in 1997, and urged the secretariat, in its preparatory work for the meeting, to keep in view the needs and priorities of least developed and other disadvantaged countries. It urged the strengthening of cooperation with the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) in industrial and technological development.

During 1996, ESCAP organized meetings of the En-Techmart '96 and Asia-Pacific Expert Group on transfer of environmentally sound technologies; the Consultative Expert Group on the adoption of ISO-9000 series; the ESCAP/UNIDO Nanjing Forum '96 on Technology Cooperation for Rural Small and Medium Scale Industries; a subregional symposium on strengthening the role of the private sector and privatization for industrial and technological development in South Asian economies; national workshops on promoting foreign direct investment for Bangladesh, Fiji, India, Nepal and Viet Nam; and other seminars, symposiums and meetings on: strengthening the private sector in enhancing manufacturing competitiveness; formulating industrial policies and women's work for the future; poverty alleviation through technological capability building; engineering consultancy for the service of economic development and technology transfer; and technological options to issues related to river dam construction. A comprehensive study was prepared on industrial finance in Asia and the Pacific, industrial complementarities and relocation of industries in the fields of investment promotion, small and medium-sized enterprises development, and industrial restructuring and development.

Asian and Pacific Development Centre

In 1996, the Asian and Pacific Development Centre (APDC), located in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, implemented 27 projects in the areas of energy, gender, poverty alleviation and public management. Publications were issued on information technology, public-sector innovations, population and environment, changing comparative advantages, economic management, and privatization in Asia and the Pacific. The Centre's institutional and development funds for 1996 totalled $2.9 million; expenditures ran to $2.6 million.

Natural resources and marine affairs

Mineral resources

ESCAP activities in the mineral sector continued to focus on the assessment and inventory of the geological and mineral resources of its member countries, particularly economies in transition, through the preparation of the ESCAP Atlas of Mineral Resources volumes on Kyrgyzstan and Mongolia, and two subregional studies reviewing the mineral potential of the countries of North-East Asia and the Central Asian republics of the Commonwealth of Independent States. Efforts continued to promote the integration of geoscience in urban and land-use planning: two volumes of the ESCAP Atlas of Urban Geology were issued, and a meeting of the Forum on Urban Geology in Asia and the Pacific was held on environmental and urban geology for the sustainable development of fast-growing cities. Advisory services were provided to Iran, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, Myanmar, Nepal, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sri Lanka, Vanuatu and Viet Nam on appropriate regulatory and institutional frameworks for foreign investment promotion in mining and mineral-based industries and for mineral exploration and development.

Water resources

ESCAP activities relating to water resources focused on integrated development and management, with the preparation of guidelines on sustainable development of water resources; establishment of pricing policies and structures for water supply; promotion of private-sector participation and investment in water resources projects; and promotion of women's role and participation in water supply and sanitation. During the year, expert group meetings and workshops were held on sustainable development of water resources; on establishing guidelines on water and sustainable development; on water pricing policies and structures in the region; on the establishment of pricing policies and structures for urban and rural water supply and for irrigation water supply; and on creating a guidebook on promoting investment for water supply and sanitation projects. To promote women's role and participation in water supply and sanitation, ESCAP organized three national workshops on the use of the UN training modules on women, water supply and sanitation, in collaboration with other international agencies. The inter-agency Subcommittee on Water for Asia and the Pacific met in Bangkok in June and December.

ESCAP provided advisory services on various aspects of water resources development and management, including water-related natural disaster reduction, to Cambodia, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Mongolia, the Philippines and the Republic of Korea. Through its publications, it disseminated information on advanced technology and know-how on water resources development and management.

Marine affairs

ESCAP activities in the area of marine affairs included issuance of the publication Technical Aspects and Legal Frameworks for the Removal and Disposal of Offshore Installations and Structures in Asia and the Pacific, as part of its work programme on the implications of the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea [YUN 1982, p. 178] on the new ocean regime. It strengthened cooperation with the Coordinating Committee for Coastal and Offshore Geoscience Programmes in East and South-East Asia. Cooperation with subregional intergovernmental organizations continued towards the implementation of the Regional Seas Action Programme.

Mekong River basin development

Progress was made on Mekong River basin development through the work of the Mekong River Commission (MRC), established in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1017]. Of some 100 projects included in the MRC work programme in 1996, 48 were implemented, for which donors committed $27.3 million. In that connection, MRC officially established the Donor Consultative Group. MRC continued to shift from national to basin-wide/regional priorities and to carry out its work following a strategic approach, using the Mekong Basin Development Plan as a planning tool for its future work.

The Commission noted the progress on major activities in implementing the Agreement on Cooperation for the Sustainable Development of the Mekong River Basin, signed in 1995 by Cambodia, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Thailand and Viet Nam. The Commission noted that MRC had strengthened its relationship with other international organizations and subregional development projects, and established contacts with other river basin commissions to exchange experiences. It was informed that MRC had established a formal dialogue mechanism with Myanmar and China, and that China had accorded great importance to the goals and activities of MRC. The Commission reiterated its support for the work of MRC, noting the continuing support of MRC by donor countries and agencies and expressing the hope that such assistance would increase.

Energy

The Commission considered a secretariat note [E/ESCAP/1022] on energy issues and development in integrated natural resources management in Asia and the Pacific, which provided an overview of energy trends and developments in the ESCAP region, energy resource constraints, rural energy environment planning and management, environmental impacts of energy systems and their mitigation, energy efficiency improvements and energy intensity and the role of pricing policies. It concluded that the promotion of clean-fuel technology use in the region was desirable. Other alternatives, such as renewable energy sources, might become a preferred option in the longer term for commercial energy use and were well recognized in rural energy supplies. The integration of environmental considerations into energy policy and planning was an absolute necessity for attaining sustainable development objectives. As the region developed economically, it would become more feasible to internalize environmental costs of energy production and distribution. However, subsidies were unavoidable and would remain part of the energy policies of some developing countries, although Governments should avoid them as much as possible.

The Commission agreed with the conclusions regarding the integration of environmental concerns into energy policy and planning. It recognized the critical importance of energy in social and economic development, and the fact that the increasing demand for energy would lead to further deterioration of the environment; hence the need for an appropriate energy mix. Since the use of fossil fuels, particularly coal, would remain dominant in the region, clean coal technology would play a major role in minimizing environmental impacts. There was also a need to promote new and renewable sources of energy technologies, such as solar photovoltaic, hydropower, wind and geothermal energy systems. The Commission endorsed the Asia Energy Efficiency 21 project.

During 1996, the ESCAP secretariat initiated, supported and implemented several seminars, workshops and expert group meetings in energy development and management. It conducted, in collaboration with the Asian Institute of Technology, a regional workshop on energy environment planning to provide technical assistance and training to enhance the national capability of participating countries in energy/environment planning through specifically packaged computer software. With support from UNDP, several training courses were organized by the Joint Coal Board of Australia. In the area of natural gas and petroleum development, the secretariat subcontracted a group of consulting engineers to provide advisory services and promote the use of natural gas as a clean and environmentally benign fuel. Studies were undertaken, within the scope of the subprogramme on Rural Energy Environment Development, to develop a manual for rural energy environment planning. Several activities sought to benefit those Asian economies in transition to market economies, including a regional seminar and a study tour on energy efficiency promotion and institution-building for participants from those countries. An international seminar on productivity and energy efficiency in the refinery industries was also organized, in cooperation with the Ministry of Oil and Gas in Ashgabat, Turkmenistan. Activities involving TCDC were implemented to support energy-sector authorities in countries in Central Asia. In November, a regional seminar took place on energy efficiency in commercial buildings in Asia and related regulations, which provided an opportunity for a regional exchange of experiences in the incorporation of energy issues in the respective national, provincial and local building codes. The secretariat initiated a project to support governmental and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in the promotion of sustainable energy use. With support from Japan, the secretariat prepared national seminars in Hong Kong, Iran, Malaysia, the Philippines, the Republic of Korea, Thailand and Viet Nam.

Agriculture and rural development

In 1996, the Commission noted that many developing countries were highly dependent on the agricultural sector, and that rural poverty was a major problem in the Asian and Pacific region. It noted the need to undertake innovative programmes and generate gainful employment for unemployed and underemployed persons in rural areas. The rural poor should be provided with collateral-free but non-subsidized credit through rural financing institutions. The development and upgrading of rural infrastructure should be accelerated. Special attention should be given to the introduction of science, technology and industrialization into rural areas to increase the productivity and employment of the poor. The private sector should be encouraged to participate in the industrial and technological development of rural areas. Small and medium-scale industries in the formal and informal sectors could play an effective role in poverty alleviation.

ESCAP emphasized activities aimed at alleviating rural poverty through rural developmental activities and sustainable agricultural development. National studies on strengthening rural credit institutions, focusing on poverty alleviation, were initiated in Bhutan, Indonesia, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Nepal, the Philippines and Viet Nam. National studies were under way on capability-building to alleviate rural poverty under economic adjustments. Training seminars on success-case-replication methodology were held in Bhutan and the Lao People's Democratic Republic. A national evaluation and dissemination seminar was conducted in Viet Nam.

The Commission endorsed the report of the Governing Body of the Regional Network for Agricultural Machinery, stressing that it should continue its activities until the end of 1998; it noted its activities on enhancing employment opportunities for rural women and on promoting and developing agro-related metalworking industries in the least developed and island developing countries of Asia and the Pacific. Regarding the Regional Coordination Centre for Research and Development of Coarse Grains, Pulses, Roots and Tuber Crops in the Humid Tropics of Asia and the Pacific, the Commission recommended strengthening the Centre's collaboration with national, regional and international agricultural research and development institutes and organizations, to enhance the effectiveness of poverty alleviation activities. The Centre should undertake activities related to agricultural diversification, the sustainability of upland agriculture, market development and the effects of trade liberalization on crop production, and should convene workshops and training courses to disseminate information and methodologies for socio-economic studies in agriculture.

Studies on sustainable agricultural development focused on Cambodia and the Lao People's Democratic Republic, as well as on a regional overview. National workshops were held in Bangladesh, Bhutan and Nepal. Major activities pertaining to the regional database on pesticides and the environment were concluded with the issue of a computerized database. The Fertilizer Advisory Development and Information Network of Asia and the Pacific programme continued its focus on environmentally friendly crop protection and promotion of balanced use of fertilizers. A regional workshop was conducted on fertilizer concepts, with special reference to organic fertilizers, in the Philippines and a national workshop on soil fertility and plant nutrition management was held in Nepal. In the area of fertilizer marketing policy and training, the following were held: a regional workshop on fertilizer policies and subsidies in developing countries in Indonesia; a national workshop on fertilizer sector development in Mongolia; and a marketing management training seminar in Sri Lanka.

Science and technology

In 1996, the Commission stressed the need to further strengthen regional cooperation in promoting science and technology for sustainable development. It noted the progress made in the implementation of the Action Programme for Regional Economic Cooperation in Investment-related Technology Transfer, endorsed in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 713], particularly the commencement of studies on technology flows and the associated technological capacity-building, and the review of national policies for the promotion of technology transfer. It pointed to the need for new areas on which the Action Programme could focus, such as information technology, and recommended as a priority activities related to technological development and promotion. It emphasized the importance of the transfer and acquisition of environmentally sound technologies by developing countries for meeting the objectives of the Regional Action Programme and Agenda 21, adopted at the 1992 UN Conference on Environment and Development [YUN 1992, p. 672], and of promoting and financing access to and transfer of such technologies. It advised the secretariat to promote greater regional cooperation in the dissemination of information on the application of environmentally sound technologies through its regional institutions. By a 24 April resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/7)] on the transfer of environmentally sound technology, the Commission asked the Executive Secretary: to report on measures taken by members and associate members with respect to their commitments regarding chapter 34 of Agenda 21; to prepare an inventory of environmentally sound technologies appropriate to selected industrial sectors in the Asian and Pacific region, including information on the elaboration of the terms under which such transfers could take place, for submission to the Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development in 1998; to continue to advise on improving the operational modalities for the transfer of environmentally sound technology to ESCAP developing countries; and to promote the development of endogenous technological capacities and technology in those countries. The Commission invited contributions of financial and technical resources from donor countries.

The Commission recognized that space technology applications were an integral part of sustainable natural resources development and environmental management. To assist members and associate members in building up their capability to manage the environment and their natural resources, it was essential to establish an information infrastructure based on integrated uses of space technology, with ESCAP playing a critical role in that regard. The Commission recommended that the Regional Space Applications Programme (RESAP) should continue to be accorded high priority in the ESCAP work programme, and that UNDP should lend financial support to integrated uses of space applications in its sixth intercountry programme. The secretariat was requested to prepare for the mid-term review of progress in the implementation of RESAP in 1997. The Commission noted the progress at the national level in implementing the Strategy for Regional Cooperation in Space Applications for Sustainable Development and the Action Plan on Space Applications for Sustainable Development in Asia and the Pacific, which it had endorsed in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1019].

During the year, the secretariat implemented a number of operational activities under the framework of RESAP, including seminars and workshops on such subjects as tropical ecosystems management, sustainable rural development using integrated geographic information systems and remote sensing, the integrated use of space technologies for poverty alleviation and rural development, and a geo-information system for coastal zone development planning. Four regional working group meetings in major space technology applications sectors were organized in China, Indonesia, Malaysia and the Republic of Korea. Three fellowship programmes were implemented and 24 fellowships granted to 20 member States. Under RESAP, a multi-year research project was initiated, involving 20 technical teams from 15 developing countries.

The Asia-Pacific Expert Group Meeting on Transfer of Environmentally Sound Technology (New Delhi, 22-24 January) studied the mechanism for environmentally sound technology transfer among small and medium-sized enterprises in Asia and the Pacific and the barriers hindering that transfer. It analysed the role of different organizations in that process and made recommendations for improving the environment for commercial transfer of environmentally sound technologies in developing countries.

Centre for technology transfer

The Commission considered the report of the Asian and Pacific Centre for Transfer of Technology (APCTT) [E/ESCAP/1019]. It expressed satisfaction at the proactive initiatives by APCTT to strengthen linkages among enterprises, research and development institutions, consultants and technology transfer agencies, with particular emphasis on sustainable development, through workshops, exhibitions and training programmes. It directed APCTT to organize its programmes in cooperation with national agencies and institutions, as well as international agencies, to benefit from the synergistic pooling of activities, efforts and resources. The Centre was requested to focus its programmes on meeting the needs and requirements of the least developed countries in technology development transfer, utilization and management. The Commission elected the APCTT Governing Board for 1996-1999, and urged those countries that had not contributed to the support of the Centre to do so in order to strengthen it on a long-term basis.

During the year, APCTT organized or co-sponsored 12 regional workshops, 11 national training programmes, 5 expert group meetings, 4 exhibitions, 5 seminars and more than 700 business meetings. It continued to promote environmentally sound technologies among small and medium-sized enterprises in the region under the Mechanism for Exchange of Technology Information project, to strengthen technology management, to promote technology information and exchange, and to encourage more active participation of women in the field of technology.

The Centre's work was reviewed by its Governing Board at its eleventh session (Kathmandu, Nepal, 28-29 November), which recommended the operationalization of the Regional Association of Commercialization of Research and Development Results; expansion of human resources development programmes on technology assessment, evaluation, negotiation, licensing and marketing; and development of mechanisms to provide women entrepreneurs with training in technology upgrading.

ACC comments on JIU report. In May [A/50/721/Add.1], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly the comments of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) on the 1995 report [YUN 1995, p. 1020] of the Joint Inspection Unit on UN system support for science and technology in Asia and the Pacific. ACC supported in principle the broad conclusions and recommendations of the Inspectors and agreed that much could and should be done to improve the activities of UN organizations and agencies in the area.

Social development

The Commission recommended that national efforts to implement the Agenda for Action on Social Development in the ESCAP region, endorsed in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1020], should be facilitated, that clear priorities should be set for the efficient utilization of existing resources, and that new and innovative sources of financing should be sought to augment resources for social development.

Concerning the human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (HIV/AIDS), the Commission recommended that efforts to address that crisis be facilitated and strengthened through a coordinated approach by UN agencies. By a 24 April resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/5)] on regional cooperation in response to the spread and consequences of HIV/AIDS in Asia and the Pacific, the Commission urged members and associate members to accord high priority to the development and implementation of effective tive policies, programmes and strategies to prevent the spread of HIV/AIDS, with emphasis on community-based action and cross-border collaboration. It requested the Executive Secretary to undertake initiatives to promote regional co-operation to prevent the spread of HIV/AIDS, including development of area-specific information systems, community-based prevention strategies, and establishment of mechanisms for cross-border collaboration.

The secretariat continued to assist in developing national strategies for community-based drug demand reduction and HIV/AIDS prevention in Bangladesh, China, India, the Lao People's Democratic Republic and Viet Nam. It initiated a major project at the Myanmar-Thailand border to prevent drug abuse and the spread of HIV/AIDS, and developed, in cooperation with agencies concerned, a draft strategy on cross-border collaboration for consideration by the Regional Inter-Agency Committee for Asia and the Pacific.

The secretariat also assisted ESCAP members in developing comprehensive national policies on ageing. A policy framework was formulated to guide national policy and programme development for lifelong preparation for old age covering a wide spectrum of concerns, ranging from income security and employment to health maintenance, education and housing. The framework [ST/ESCAP/1684] was adopted by an ESCAP meeting of senior officials (Bangkok, 7-10 May). The secretariat updated and enlarged the "Annotated Bibliography on Policy and Programme Issues in the Field of Ageing", and provided advisory services on issues relating to ageing and older persons, including lifelong preparation for old age. Work continued on promoting and bridging efforts for older persons, including the preparation of a directory of national focal points on ageing in Asia and the Pacific, a directory of NGOs active in dealing with older persons in the region, and a compilation of international and regional mandates and relevant documents concerning ageing and older persons.

Concerning alleviation of poverty, the Commission recommended that national policies and programmes targeted at the poor should be continued and strengthened, focusing on enhancing the income-generation capacity of the poor and their access to social infrastructure facilities, health and education. The secretariat's poverty-alleviation programmes should pay attention to urban poverty as well as focus on secondary cities, small towns and rural centres; programmes and policies should be formulated to enhance the productivity and income of the informal sector. The Commission called on the secretariat to strengthen the promotion of technology transfer and experience related to rural industrialization and the technological upgrading of small and medium-scale industries in small towns and urban centres. It recommended that cooperation among its members and associate members in the marketing of agricultural products be encouraged and supported, and that sustainable development strategies and support services be developed to encourage women to participate in economic activities in the formal and informal sectors. It noted that a three-pronged strategy might alleviate poverty: supporting economic growth sustained by a stable macroeconomic framework; enhancing the capacity of poor people by providing education and health services for them to participate in development activities; and providing support through some form of safety net for disadvantaged groups.

Disabled persons

In 1996, the Commission recommended courses of action to implement the Agenda for Action for the Asian and Pacific Decade of Disabled Persons, 1993-2002, adopted in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 621], including follow-up activities in support of national implementation; development of pilot projects for non-handicapping environments for disabled and elderly persons; inclusion of more cities in pilot projects for non-handicapping environments; and organizing information exchange on measures for barrier-free environments within and outside the ESCAP region.

In pursuance of those recommendations, the secretariat assisted Malaysia in convening the first intercountry seminar on multi-sectoral collaborative action for people with disabilities in the ESCAP region, and Viet Nam in convening the first national workshop of diverse disability groups, government agencies and NGOs on self-help initiatives among people with disabilities and cross-disability cooperation. A Pacific subregional workshop was held in Fiji on improving organizational management skills to strengthen self-advocacy by people with disabilities. Pilot projects were launched in Beijing and New Delhi.

Human resources development

The Commission called on the secretariat, in implementing the Jakarta Plan of Action on Human Resources Development in the ESCAP region, as revised in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 715], to focus on investment in the productive capabilities of people and the utilization of those capabilities to enhance the quality of life. It recommended four core human resources development issues for priority attention: literacy and the provision of basic education, the delivery of basic social services, support of skills development, and the promotion of productive employment for youth. By a 24 April resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/4)] on promoting human resources development among youth in Asia and the Pacific, the Commission called on ESCAP members and associate members to integrate the World Programme of Action for Youth to the Year 2000 and Beyond, adopted by the General Assembly in 1995 [GA res.50/81], in their youth policies, plans and programmes. It urged donor Governments and agencies to provide technical and financial resources to support regional implementation of the Programme, and invited NGOs and private enterprises to collaborate with Governments and the Commission in promoting human resources development among youth in the region. It requested the Executive Secretary to convene in 1996 a regional meeting (see below) to consider means of promoting human resources development among youth through implementation of the World Programme; to prepare a comprehensive survey of the youth situation and human resources development policies, plans and programmes for youth in Asia and the Pacific; to provide advisory services to members and associate members in the formulation of plans and policies to enhance youth skills; to conduct training activities directed at youth work personnel to enhance youth skills for productive employment and youth participation in community development; and to assist members and associate members, beginning with Indo-China, in designing and implementing their youth policy frameworks.

ESCAP organized the Asia-Pacific Meeting on Human Resources Development for Youth (Beijing, China, 22-26 October) [SD/HRDY/Rep.]. The meeting reviewed the Jakarta Plan of Action and the World Programme of Action for Youth to the Year 2000 and Beyond. It examined programmes and policies to promote human resources development for youth, mechanisms to promote participation in decision-making for youth, and regional cooperation. It adopted the Beijing Statement on Human Resources Development for Youth in Asia and the Pacific, which contained proposals for regional cooperation to promote human resources development among youth in the region.

The secretariat continued its support for regional and national implementation of the World Programme of Action for Youth, through its newsletter and its Internet home page. Under a project on training of trainers for youth participation in development, national workshops were held in Bangladesh, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, Nepal and Viet Nam. ESCAP, in collaboration with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), continued to carry out literacy projects for girls and women.

Women in development

On 24 April, the Commission, in its resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/3)] on follow-up to the 1995 Fourth World Conference on Women [YUN 1995, p. 1169], urged all ESCAP members and associate members to ensure full implementation of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action and the 1994 Jakarta Declaration and Plan of Action for the Advancement of Women in Asia and the Pacific [YUN 1994, p. 716]. That should be done by developing implementation strategies or plans of action; strengthening national machineries to enhance women's effectiveness in promoting mainstreaming of gender concerns into policy formulations and planning for national development; alleviating and eradicating the feminization of poverty; and promoting support and community participation at all levels. The Commission urged donor countries, local and national governments, the private sector, funding agencies and regional and international financial institutions to assist developing countries in implementing the two declarations. It requested the Executive Secretary to support national efforts towards that end, and to mainstream women's issues and gender perspectives into the Commission's work programme.

ESCAP activities in 1996 included a project to promote women's participation in economic development in Indo-China; a regional meeting in Hanoi, Viet Nam, at which a regional plan of action was adopted on women workers, skills training, access to credit and financial resources, and entrepreneurship; and a number of subregional seminars. An Expert Group Meeting on Promoting Women's Rights as Human Rights was held in August in Saitama, Japan. The secretariat organized a regional meeting in Seoul, Republic of Korea, on strengthening national machineries for the advancement of women. Networking and information exchange and dissemination activities continued throughout the year. ESCAP also convened the second meeting of the Inter-Agency Subcommittee on the Advancement of Women.

Population

ESCAP population activities in 1996 were geared towards implementing the Bali Declaration on Population and Sustainable Development [YUN 1993, p. 622], endorsed by the Commission in 1993, and the Programme of Action [YUN 1994, p. 956] adopted at the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development. During the year, ESCAP implemented regional projects on population and environment dynamics; population data for local area development planning; strengthening monitoring and evaluation systems to measure progress in reproductive health/family planning programmes, female migration, employment, family formation and poverty; population ageing; poverty and the quality of life; building knowledge bases and advocating change through the dissemination of population data and information; use of information technology to improve the quality of population information services and products; and continuing activities of the Asia-Pacific Population Information Network. It also carried out a human resource development project for improved population information services, products and communications. Advisory services were provided to Cambodia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan and Viet Nam to assist in implementing the Bali Declaration and to build national capabilities for demographic data analysis. ESCAP organized the second session of the Inter-organizational Subcommittee on Population and Development in Asia and the Pacific. Other meetings focused on gender role in family planning management; using population data for local area development planning in ESCAP countries; and the implications of ageing for family and the elderly. Training workshops were held on selected population topics and information technology for population information professionals; using the Internet to access and disseminate population information; and population and environment dynamics, poverty and the quality of life in Asia and the Pacific. Publications included the Asia-Pacific Population Journal and the Population Headliners.

Human settlements

The Commission, in view of rapid urbanization in the region, recommended that urban environmental issues relating to old and emerging cities should be addressed in a timely manner. It requested the secretariat to assist countries in seeking expertise and technologies to manage urban areas. It also recommended promotion of greater interaction and exchange of information on the implementation of the Regional Action Plan on Urbanization [YUN 1994, p. 717], adopted by the Commission in 1994.

On 24 April, the Commission, in a resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/6)] on promotion of environmentally sound and healthy cities, urged ESCAP members and associate members to accord high priority to promoting environmentally sound and healthy cities in their overall socio-economic development and to allocate adequate resources for that purpose. It requested UN bodies, specialized agencies and other organizations to intensify efforts towards environmentally sound and healthy cities, and donors and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to provide technical and financial support towards that end.

ESCAP's work in the area of human settlements focused on the implementation of the Regional Action Plan on Urbanization. The second Asia-Pacific Urban Forum (Bangkok, 11-15 March) reviewed the publication Living in Asian Cities: The Impending Crisis-Causes, Consequences and Alternatives for the Future, which constituted the regional contribution to the second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII). To support a participatory approach to and building of partnerships in urban management, the secretariat prepared case studies on local urban forums. A regional policy seminar on effective participatory urban management was held in Shanghai, China, in November. To strengthen networking of organizations and institutions in the region, ESCAP supported the Training Education and Research Committee of the International Union of Local Authorities (Asia-Pacific chapter) to develop activities for local authorities to address issues of urban poverty and environment. The Inter-organizational Committee on Urbanization held three meetings in Bangkok to discuss cooperation and coordination of projects and programmes, to make them more efficient and maximize their impact.

Environment

The Commission in 1996 considered a report on progress in achieving sustainable development and issues requiring further attention [E/ESCAP/1021]. It examined environmental policies in economic decision-making, natural resources development and management, food and shelter, and hazardous waste management and environmentally sound technology options.

The Commission recognized that environmental problems were linked to poverty, population and socio-economic development and that national priorities varied. It felt that the resolution of those problems was beyond current national capacities, and that international technical and financial support was required. It recognized the need to strengthen assistance to ESCAP members and associate members in integrating environmental considerations into economic decision-making.

In a 24 April resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/8)], the Commission endorsed the recommendations of the third Ministerial Conference on Environment and Development in Asia and the Pacific [YUN 1995, p. 1023], including the Ministerial Declaration on Environmentally Sound and Sustainable Development in Asia and the Pacific and the Regional Action Programme for Environmentally Sound and Sustainable Development, 1996-2000, and called for their early implementation. It urged UN bodies and agencies, multilateral financial institutions and donors to contribute technical and financial resources to implement Conference recommendations, and asked the Inter-Agency Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development in Asia and the Pacific to play an effective role in implementing the Regional Action Programme. The Commission requested the Executive Secretary to mobilize human and financial resources to implement Conference recommendations; to ensure coordination and joint pursuit of activities of UN bodies and agencies and NGOs in facilitating and monitoring implementation of the recommendations; and to include, in the agenda of the 1997 session of the Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development, a mid-term review and assessment of progress achieved in that regard, and to report to the Commission in 1998. The seventh meeting of the Inter-Agency Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development in Asia and the Pacific (Bangkok, 20 March) [ENR/ICESD(7)Rep.] discussed, among other matters, the implementation of the outcome of the third Ministerial Conference.

ESCAP activities under its environment subprogramme focused on implementing Agenda 21 and the Regional Action Programme for Environmentally Sound and Sustainable Development. A number of catalytic activities were initiated, including a project to integrate environmental considerations into economic decision-making, and a project, involving 36 countries of the region, relating to areas such as water quality, toxic chemicals and hazardous waste, urban environmental issues, and coastal and marine environment. Other regional activities included development of an implementation strategy for the Asian annex of the 1994 UN Convention to Combat Desertification [YUN 1994, p. 944]. Regional cooperation on climate change was enhanced with the establishment of a regional network concentrating on technical cooperation, information exchange and organization of meetings, including the fourth Asia-Pacific seminar on climate change. An expert group meeting on regional cooperation in climate change was also held. At the subregional level, cooperation was strengthened through capacity-building activities in South Asia and North-East Asia. The third Meeting of Senior Officials on Environmental Cooperation in North-East Asia (Ulaanbaatar, Mongolia, 17-20 September) [ENR/SO/ECNA(3)Rep.] adopted the Framework for the North-East Asian Subregional Programme of Environmental Cooperation. A subregional meeting on military activities and the environment was also held. Activities were undertaken to enhance national capacities in the areas of trade and environment, sustainable development indicators, and industrial audit for waste minimization.

Natural disaster reduction

Having reviewed the annual report [E/ESCAP/1040] of the Typhoon Committee, the Commission in 1996 noted progress achieved by the Committee, including work in its meteorological and hydrological components, disaster prevention and preparedness, training and research. The Commission urged UNDP and other donors to support the Committee's work, and directed ESCAP to continue to provide substantive support to the Committee within its programme of work.

The secretariat continued to promote and enhance collaborative efforts concerning the mitigation of damage from typhoons/cyclones, floods and drought. It concentrated efforts on land-use planning and practices to reduce damage due to water-related disasters, and to enhance productivity of land for poverty alleviation through watershed management. In cooperation with the World Meteorological Organization, ESCAP supported the Typhoon Committee and the Panel on Tropical Cyclones in their work towards disaster reduction and better preparedness in their member countries in typhoon monitoring, forecasting and dissemination of information on typhoons, as well as hydrological and disaster prevention measures.

Statistics

In 1996, the Commission noted the issues raised at the ninth session of the Working Group of Statistical Experts (Bangkok, 30 January-2 February) [STAT/WGSE.9/Rep.], and suggested that the statistics subprogramme should support other subprogrammes within the medium-term plan, 1998-2001, particularly environment and sustainable development, poverty alleviation through economic growth and social development, and the least developed, landlocked and island developing countries. The Commission supported the conclusions and recommendations contained in a March secretariat note [E/ESCAP/1028] which reviewed selected issues in the area of statistics. It recommended that Governments accord high priority to generating and maintaining an adequate database to monitor national progress in achieving the targets of the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1113] policy themes. It recommended that the secretariat prepare a manual on social statistics and organize training workshops in that field. It urged donors to provide financial and other support to the secretariat to enable it to collect and exchange relevant information on national capacities in social statistics and to organize related technical assistance and training activities. It endorsed the proposed subregional training workshops for assisting countries in the region to implement the 1993 System of National Accounts, and urged bilateral and multilateral donors to support the secretariat for that purpose. It also emphasized the need for training middle-level statisticians on the System. It supported the recommendation of the Working Group of Statistical Experts that the secretariat act as a clearing house to support an exchange of experience in the use of information technology in statistics. It suggested a complementary approach for training information technology personnel in statistics, and asked the secretariat to organize information technology sensitivity training among senior-level policy makers. The Commission suggested the organization of a meeting to share information and exchange experiences of countries in implementing statistical coordination. It urged member States to pay attention to and provide resources for the next round of population and housing censuses, and emphasized the need for ESCAP to play a prominent role in their preparation.

ESCAP activities during the year included seminars and workshops on environmental and resource accounting and gender statistics. Advisory services were provided to member countries on the implementation of the 1993 System of National Accounts, population and housing censuses, civil registration systems, software packages, data processing requirements, and population and development strategies. Training was provided on application software for mapping and on management information systems. Statistical information on Asia and the Pacific was released mainly through the Statistical Yearbook, the Statistical Indicators and the Foreign Trade Statistics for Asia and the Pacific. The Statistical Newsletter and the Government Computerization Newsletter were published.

The Committee on Statistics, at its tenth session (Bangkok, 25-29 November) [E/ESCAP/1061], recommended its terms of reference to the Commission for adoption. It agreed on the terms of reference, composition, nature and geographical representation of its Bureau and on financial arrangements for Bureau meetings. It reviewed the statistical activities of countries, international organizations and the secretariat over the past two years. It reaffirmed its support for the ESCAP Statistical Information System and urged that it be made operational as soon as possible. It endorsed the practice of inviting papers from national statistical offices, and recommended that the secretariat disseminate information on gender issues and continue to give priority to improving gender statistics in the region. It identified high priority areas in the 1998-1999 work programme, including implementation of the 1993 System of National Accounts, service statistics, pilot studies and other work on statistical implications of global summit conferences. It urged ESCAP to provide advisory services in the field of national accounts, and to collect and collate information from agencies for an integrated presentation of statistical work programmes.

Statistical Institute for Asia and the Pacific

The Governing Board of the Statistical Institute for Asia and the Pacific [E/ESCAP/1029], which became a subsidiary body of the Commission in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1024], held its first session in Tokyo from 11 to 13 March. It adopted its rules of procedure and agreed on guidelines for its annual report to the Commission.

Noting the report of the Governing Board, the Commission requested early implementation of the Board's decision to establish a task force to evaluate and restructure the Institute's programme in accordance with the changing needs and priorities of the region. It suggested that the Institute play a central role in training statisticians in the region on information technology. It expressed concern about the need to improve the financial stability of the Institute, and appealed to members and associate members to provide financial support, as well as experts on a non-reimbursable loan basis, to support Institute programmes.

Programme and organizational questions

In April, the Commission considered and endorsed the proposed medium-term plan, 1998-2001 [E/ESCAP/1031]. It reviewed the implementation of the 1994-1995 programme of work [E/ESCAP/1032 & Corr.1], observing that some outputs and activities had been deleted, modified or postponed owing to the special measures imposed in relation to the UN financial crisis. The Commission also endorsed the proposed changes in the programme of work, 1996-1997 [E/ESCAP/1033 & Add.1 & Add.1/Corr.1].

Review of conference structure

The Commission welcomed the comprehensive review by the secretariat of the effectiveness of the thematic approach and priorities in relation to the ESCAP programme of work and resources, in preparation for the review by the Commission of its conference structure, to be undertaken in the context of the ongoing reform of the United Nations. The Commission recommended that the ESCAP work programme be prioritized and more focused, and that the secretariat's comparative advantage be more clearly defined and its efficiency increased, with inter-agency cooperation at the regional level strengthened.

The Commission, in a 24 April resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/1)], acknowledged the need for review of its conference structure in 1997, and requested the Advisory Committee of Permanent Representatives and Other Representatives Designated by Members of the Commission to undertake an independent review of that structure. It requested the Executive Secretary to consult the Advisory Committee and convene a regional preparatory meeting in Bangkok in 1997 to discuss the outcome of the secretariat's preparatory exercise and the Advisory Committee's recommendations, in preparation for the review, and to report to the Commission in 1997.

Membership

On 18 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/3 B.

Admission of Palau as a full member of the Commission

The Economic and Social Council,

Noting that Palau has become a member of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific in accordance with paragraph 3 of the terms of reference of the Commission,

Decides to amend paragraphs 3 and 4 of the terms of reference of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific accordingly.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/3 B
18 July 1996 Meeting 40 Adopted without vote
Draft by ESCAP (E/1996/36); agenda item 7.
Meeting numbers. ESC 38-40.

On the same date, the Council adopted resolution 1996/3 C.

Admission of Turkey as a member of the Commission

The Economic and Social Council,

Noting that the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific has recommended the admission of Turkey as a member within the geographical scope of the Commission,

Decides to amend paragraphs 2 and 3 of the terms of reference of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific accordingly.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/3 C
18 July 1996 Meeting 40 Adopted without vote
Draft by ESCAP (E/1996/36); agenda item 7.
Meeting numbers. ESC 38-40.

Terms of reference

On 18 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/3 A.

Change of name of Hong Kong in paragraphs 2 and 4 of the terms of reference of the Commission

The Economic and Social Council,

Noting that the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific has recommended that the name "Hong Kong" in paragraphs 2 and 4 of the terms of reference of the Commission be changed to "Hong Kong, China", effective as from 1 July 1997, with the objective of enabling Hong Kong to continue thereafter as an associate member of the Commission,

Decides to amend paragraphs 2 and 4 of the terms of reference of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific accordingly.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/3 A
18 July 1996 Meeting 40 Adopted without vote
Draft by ESCAP (E/1996/36); agenda item 7.
Meeting numbers. ESC 38-40.

Fifty-third session of ESCAP

At its fifty-second session, the Commission decided to hold its fifty-third session in Bangkok in March or April 1997, and chose as its theme for that session "Asia and the Pacific into the twenty-first century: opportunities and challenges for ESCAP".

Fiftieth anniversary of ESCAP

On 24 April, the Commission, noting that the fiftieth anniversary of ESCAP would fall in 1997, decided to hold a symposium in Shanghai on "Development challenges and opportunities for Asia and the Pacific in the twenty-first century and the role of ESCAP" [E/1996/36 (res. 52/2)]. It urged members and associate members to cooperate in the preparations for and in the symposium and requested the Executive Secretary to work closely with China in organizing the symposium.

Subregional activities

The Committee for Regional Economic Cooperation, at its fifth session (Bangkok, 2-3 April) [E/ESCAP/1017], recommended that the secretariat should undertake further studies on strengthening cooperation within North-East Asia and with other subregions and countries. It should also assess the possibilities for intra-subregional cooperation in other subregions in Asia and the Pacific, and include the Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO) subregion in studies on subregional linkages.

The Commission, in a 24 April resolution [E/1996/36 (res. 52/11)] on strengthening of subregional economic cooperation among south-western member countries of ESCAP, including the member countries of ECO, welcomed the initiative of the Steering Group of the Committee for Regional Economic Cooperation to give special attention to the North-East Asian subregion. Noting that there was, among the south-western ESCAP countries, including the ECO member countries, potential for sustainable development, the Commission called on ESCAP members and associate members to support efforts to promote subregional economic cooperation and invited the Steering Group to focus, in its future meetings, on promoting economic and technical cooperation in trade, investment and transportation and communications among the south-western ESCAP member countries, including the ECO member countries.

Cooperation between the United Nations and the Economic Cooperation Organization

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/1 [YUN 1995, p. 1025], the Secretary-General submitted an August report [A/51/265] on cooperation between the United Nations and ECO. The report reviewed implementation of the 1993 memorandum of understanding [YUN 1993, p. 613] signed between ECO and ESCAP. It highlighted the joint project for a survey of economic resources to identify opportunities for closer cooperation among ECO member countries, and discussions taking place between the two organizations on provision of technical assistance in the areas of privatization and private-sector development in the Central Asian republics, macro-economic reforms, access of women to formal credit and increased productivity of the informal sector. A September addendum [A/51/265/Add.1] to the report covered developments pertaining to cooperation between ECO and other UN bodies and agencies.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 27 November, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/21.

Cooperation between the United Nations and the Economic Cooperation Organization

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 48/2 of 13 October 1993, by which it granted observer status to the Economic Cooperation Organization,

Recalling also its resolution 50/1 of 12 October 1995, in which it affirmed the need to strengthen the cooperation that already exists between the entities of the United Nations system and the Economic Cooperation Organization in the areas of economic and social development,

Recalling further that the Charter of the United Nations provides for the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters as maintenance of international peace and security and economic cooperation as are appropriate for regional action, provided that their activities are consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations,

Bearing in mind that the Treaty of Izmir, signed at Izmir, Turkey, on 12 March 1977, later revised at Ashgabat on 11 May 1996 and signed at Izmir on 14 September 1996, created a permanent body for intraregional cooperation, consultation and coordination in order to enhance economic, social and cultural development,

Taking note of the Ashgabat Declaration issued at the Fourth Summit Meeting of the Heads of State and Government of the States members of the Economic Cooperation Organization at Ashgabat on 14 May 1996,

Taking note also of the recent measures by the Governments members of the Economic Cooperation Organization to revitalize that organization through the adoption of a new charter of the organization and related documents on its reorganization and restructuring,

Convinced that the maintenance and further strengthening of the cooperation between the United Nations system and the Economic Cooperation Organization promote the implementation of the goals and principles of the Organization,

1. Takes note of the decision of the Heads of State and Government of the States members of the Economic Cooperation Organization welcoming the adoption of General Assembly resolution 50/1 on cooperation between the two organizations and endorsing the cooperative arrangements entered into by the Economic Cooperation Organization with various entities of the United Nations system for joint efforts towards the implementation of the economic projects and programmes of the Economic Cooperation Organization;

2. Notes with satisfaction the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 50/1, and invites the Secretary-General of the United Nations to continue his efforts, in consultation with the Secretary-General of the Economic Cooperation Organization, to promote and expand cooperation and coordination between the two secretariats in order to increase the capacity of the two organizations to attain their common objectives;

3. Welcomes the inauguration of the Tejan-Sarakhs-Mashad railway line, which illustrates the significance of the alternative road and railway links which exist or are being developed in order to provide the landlocked countries of the region of the Economic Cooperation Organization further access to the seaport facilities of the Indian Ocean, the Persian Gulf, the Gulf of Oman and the Caspian, Black, Mediterranean and Aegean Seas;

4. Urges the specialized agencies and other organizations and programmes of the United Nations system to initiate, maintain and increase consultation and programmes with the Economic Cooperation Organization and its associated institutions in the attainment of their objectives;

5. Takes note of Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific resolution 52/11 of 24 April

1996 on the strengthening of subregional economic cooperation among the south-western countries members of the Commission, including the countries members of the Economic Cooperation Organization, in which the Commission is called upon to promote economic and technical cooperation in trade, investment and transport and communications among countries members of the Economic Cooperation Organization and the request therein to the Executive Secretary of the Commission to report to the Commission at its fifty-fourth session in 1998 on the progress in the implementation of that resolution;

6. Calls upon the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific, as the regional arm of the United Nations having all States members of the Economic Cooperation Organization as its members, to assume a specific role in promoting cooperation with the Economic Cooperation Organization;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session a report on the implementation of the present resolution;

8. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Cooperation between the United Nations and the Economic Cooperation Organization".

Europe

In 1996, the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE), at its fifty-first session (Geneva, 15-19 April) [E/1996/34], considered economic cooperation in the ECE region; Commission activities to assist the integration of countries in transition into the European and global economy; preparations for the 1997 ECE Jubilee (fiftieth anniversary) Session; ECE cooperation and partnership; and the work of the Commission and its subsidiary bodies for 1996-1997.

The Commission reviewed [E/ECE/1333 & Add.1] its cooperation with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), including the Concluding Document of the OSCE Review Meeting (Geneva, 22-24 January) and the fourth session of the Economic Forum in Prague (March), as well as economic cooperation in the Mediterranean in the light of the Final Act of the 1975 Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (Helsinki Conference) [YUN 1975, p. 100]. Considering that cooperation between ECE and OSCE could be strengthened within existing resources, the Commission, in an 18 April decision [E/1996/34 (dec. D(51))], asked the Executive Secretary to ensure the ECE contribution to the follow-up of the fourth session of the Economic Forum, to consult with the OSCE Secretary-General on further strengthening cooperation between the two bodies, and to report on progress in 1997. In another decision [E(51)], the Commission called on the Executive Secretary to continue an action-oriented analysis of existing cooperation between ECE Mediterranean countries, as well as between Mediterranean and other ECE member countries, and to identify means of enhancing cooperation in that area in all spheres of the ECE work programme. He was also asked to continue to cooperate with executive secretaries of other regional commissions, as well as heads of other relevant UN bodies, in order to secure interaction with Mediterranean partners, with a view to increasing interregional cooperation on subjects within ECE competence of common interest. The Commission called on ECE to cooperate with OSCE in organizing workshops and seminars on economic cooperation subjects devoted to Mediterranean questions. The Executive Secretary was invited to explore the possibility of European Union (EU) funding to develop and assist in the implementation of projects supported by Mediterranean countries in such areas as trade facilitation, environment, transport, statistics and energy, and to report in 1997.

On 18 April, the Commission approved [A(51)] its work programme for 1996-1997 and endorsed the programme for 1996-2000, subject to review at its 1997 session. The work programme included subprogrammes on policy and coordination of Commission work, environment, transport, statistics, trade facilitation, economic analysis, energy, development of international trade, industry and technology, agriculture and timber, and human settlements. The Commission decided to suspend the activities of the Committee on Agriculture, and to retain only ECE work on standardization of perishable produce, to be transferred for the time being to the Committee on the Development of Trade; and on agricultural statistics, to be transferred to the Conference of European Statisticians, pending the decision of the 1997 session of ECE on the future of the Committee on Agriculture. In the same decision, ECE, noting suggestions [E/ECE/1330] on the commemoration of its fiftieth anniversary, invited the Executive Secretary to finalize, in cooperation with the Commission Bureau and member States, preparations for the anniversary session.

Economic trends

According to a summary of the economic survey of Europe [E/1997/42], economic growth in 1996 varied considerably throughout the ECE region, which included Europe, the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) and North America. In market economies, growth in Western Europe, at 1.9 per cent, was fairly modest and weaker than in 1995; the United States had a stronger rate, at 2.4 per cent. In Eastern Europe, fairly high growth rates—5 per cent—were maintained in most reform countries of Central Europe, and there was solid recovery in the Baltic States, at 3.4 per cent. In the Russian Federation, GDP declined by 6 per cent, but there were recoveries in many other CIS members.

Eastern Europe, Baltic States and CIS

In many respects, 1996 was a disappointing year for transition economies of Eastern Europe, CIS and the Baltic States. Economic growth in Eastern Europe averaged 4 per cent, down from 1995; in the Russian Federation, the slump in output deepened rather than bottoming out; there were major economic setbacks in Bulgaria and Romania; and in Albania, an economic crisis developed into political and social chaos. Despite many setbacks, there was also progress for this group of countries. Growth remained relatively strong among leading reformers, especially in Poland (6 per cent) and Slovakia (7 per cent). Growth was also sustained in the Czech Republic, although it was markedly lower than in Poland. There was a return to significant growth in the Baltic States; for the first time since the break-up of the Soviet Union and despite the continued fall in Russian output, positive growth was reported in a majority of the 12 CIS members. A fall in output also ended in all Central Asian republics, except for Tajikistan.

One consequence of the Eastern European slowdown was an end to the hesitant improvement in the level of employment experienced in 1995. There were some increases in employment levels in some faster-growing economies—the Czech Republic, Poland and Slovakia, for example—but those were much smaller than 1995 gains. There was, however, an increase of 1.2 per cent in Lithuania, following three years of positive growth and the first since independence. But everywhere else, and including all CIS members, total employment continued to fall. The slowdown in growth rates also checked the decline in unemployment in Eastern Europe, which had peaked at 7.5 million in early 1994, declining slowly to 6 million by the third quarter of 1996; in the last quarter, there was an increase of nearly 120,000, about two thirds, in Bulgaria. In CIS, at year's end, the number registered as unemployed was just over 8 million. Altogether, at the end of 1996, there were at least 14 million people unemployed in all ECE transition economies.

During the year, inflation rates generally continued to fall, with particularly marked improvements in the Baltic States, the Russian Federation and all other CIS members except Kyrgyzstan. In Eastern Europe, however, progress was less striking and widespread. First, in Albania, Bulgaria and Romania, there were major reversals, especially in Bulgaria where consumer price inflation rose 311 per cent during 1996, as compared to 33 per cent in 1995. Although much lower than in Bulgaria, the inflation rate tripled in Albania and more than doubled in Romania. Second, the reduction in inflation rates elsewhere in Eastern Europe was small, often less than targets set by Governments for 1996. In Hungary and Poland, progress remained slow, with inflation at some 19 to 20 per cent. In the Baltic States, inflation ranged between 13 per cent and 15 per cent, half the 1995 rates while, in the second half of 1996, it was in single digits in Estonia and Lithuania, significantly lower than in most advanced reforming countries of Eastern Europe. Tight control of monetary and fiscal policies, together with significant real exchange-rate appreciation, were major factors influencing that situation. There was also a major reduction in the rate of inflation of the Russian Federation and most other CIS countries; typically from 3 and 4 digit rates of increase in 1994 and 1995, the annual rate fell to within a range of 18 to 40 per cent in more than half of those States. A considerable deceleration in the Russian inflation rate was also important for other CIS members, given their high degree of dependency on the Russian economy. In the Russian Federation, the inflation rate during 1996 was just under 22 per cent, compared with over 130 per cent in 1995. The maintenance of a tight monetary policy throughout the year and a large real appreciation of the rouble in the first half of 1996 were important factors behind the reduction. But there was also an element of suppressed inflation, as large arrears of payments for wages and pensions helped to dampen domestic demand, and increases in administered prices were deliberately held below the average inflation rate. The large drop in the inflation rate in Belarus, unlike most other CIS countries, was largely achieved through governmental price subsidies, cheap credit and de facto price controls.

In 1996, trade deficits deteriorated considerably in most of Eastern Europe and the Baltic States, in most cases at an accelerating rate in the second half of the year; they doubled in Poland and were up six times over in Slovakia; elsewhere, increases of 50 to 70 per cent were common. The main exceptions were with regard to a few countries such as Bulgaria and, to a lesser extent, Romania and Slovakia, where domestic adjustments had forced a reduction in imports. Altogether, the aggregate of Eastern European and Baltic trade deficits increased from $23.6 billion in 1995 to just over $37 billion in 1996. Most CIS countries also moved into a deficit situation, although on a much smaller scale than Eastern Europe. Except for Ukraine, most deficits were less than $1 billion, but all were dwarfed by another increase in the Russian surplus, from $31 billion in 1995 to over $37 billion, or 9 per cent of GDP, in 1996. Allowing for unrecorded trade, however, the Russian surplus was estimated at some $29 billion in 1996. The leading reasons for the deterioration in Eastern Europe and, to a lesser extent, in the Baltic States were a sharp deceleration in the growth of export values—from 25 per cent in 1995 to just over 1 per cent on average for Eastern Europe, and from 36 to 16 per cent for the Baltic States—and a continuing strong growth of imports—11 per cent in Eastern Europe, 24 per cent in the Baltic States. The slowdown in export growth appeared to be due to external and domestic factors. Slower growth in Western Europe was an obvious factor, with the increase of import demand falling by nearly two thirds between 1995 and 1996, which referred to a decline in the volume growth of merchandise imports. However, that affected Eastern countries differently, and some—Estonia, Hungary, Latvia and Poland—were still able to achieve export volume growth of 6 to 9 per cent, more than the growth of world trade and despite their dependence on the much weaker Western European market.

Western Europe and North America

Economic growth in Western Europe strengthened during the course of 1996, but, for the year as a whole, the average rate of increase of just under 2 per cent was much lower than that in 1995. According to preliminary data, the recovery in continental Europe appeared to have lost momentum in the last quarter of 1996, while in the United Kingdom there was an acceleration in the closing months of the year. The main source of Western European growth was increasing exports, mainly outside Western Europe to, for example, the United States, the transition countries of Eastern Europe and developing countries. Many countries benefited from the competitive advantages resulting from the appreciation of the dollar and the stronger growth of demand in countries such as the United States. But the impulse from net exports was not strong enough to give a significant boost to domestic demand. In general, private consumption expenditure in Western Europe rose slightly more than 2 per cent, not much more than in 1995, and was still restrained by modest growth in wages and salaries and in employment. In sharp contrast to Western Europe, the United States economy continued to expand for the sixth successive year. Growth strengthened throughout the year and for 1996 was about 2.5 per cent higher than in 1995. The expansion was broadly based, but rising employment, higher real incomes and increased consumer confidence meant that household expenditures, up 2.5 per cent, was the main support. Nevertheless, business investment also grew strongly, encouraged by high capacity utilization, rising profits and confident expectations of continued growth. Also, in contrast to Western Europe, American business expanded its productive capacities and spent heavily for new technology. Strong domestic demand in the United States also boosted the world economy in 1996, with imports of goods and services rising nearly 6.5 per cent and creating a slight net drag on the domestic growth rate. The performance of the Canadian economy in 1996 was closer to that of Western Europe than that of the United States. Annual growth averaged some 1.5 per cent, less than in 1995. Relatively weak labour markets and increased taxes held back the growth of personal disposable income, although consumption picked up to a large extent because of a steep fall in the savings ratio.

Despite tighter labour markets and strong consumer demand in the United States and the United Kingdom, inflation rates in both countries remained subdued, and there were only sporadic signs of incipient inflationary pressures. In continental Europe, inflation rates continued to decelerate, which led to an easing of monetary policy in a number of countries. European rates of consumer price inflation continued to fall throughout most of 1996, and the average rate for the year as a whole was just under 2.5 per cent, its lowest rate in more than 30 years.

Low rates and weak expectations of economic growth in Western Europe meant that there was virtually no increase in the average level of employment. Some new jobs were created in the United Kingdom and in some smaller economies, but, in general, increases were less than in 1995. Most new jobs were created in the service area. In Europe, employment increased by just 0.3 per cent on average, whereas in the United States, job creation was robust, rising by 1.4 per cent. Employment was also growing more strongly in Canada, with a 1.3 per cent increase, even though its GDP growth was significantly lower than in the United States. Weak output and employment growth in Western Europe meant that little progress was made in reducing persistently high rates of unemployment. The average rate there in 1996 was 10.3 per cent, somewhat higher than in 1995 and about the same as in 1993. In the four largest economies—France, Germany, Italy, United Kingdom—it varied in 1996 from 8.2 per cent in the United Kingdom (the only one of the four where the rate fell) to 12.3 per cent in France. There were a few small reductions in some of the smaller economies, where unemployment rates ranged from 3 per cent in Luxembourg to more than 20 per cent in Spain.

Activities in 1996

During 1996, ECE was involved in analytical and policy-oriented work; in assisting countries in implementing and monitoring major policies, conventions and norms adopted at the regional level; and in providing technical support to programme and project formulation at the country and subregional levels.

ECE activities aimed at assisting the integration of the countries in transition into the European and global economy; they included workshops and seminars, training programmes and foreign investment promotion projects [E/ECE/1348]. Technical cooperation activities focused on population, social statistics, the environment, the gas industry, investment promotion and enterprise development, timber and transport. Concerning the reconstruction of war-torn areas, ECE organized two advisory and one technical mission to Bosnia and Herzegovina, these related to statistics, transport and gas. Assistance was provided to Croatia in formulating a national strategy for sustainable environmental development. Advisory missions to Tajikistan were also conducted. As at 31 December, the net unencumbered balance of the Trust Fund on Assistance to Countries in Transition (TFACT), excluding programme support costs, mandatory operating reserve and interest, amounted to $223,783. The funds were earmarked by donors for such priority areas as environment, transport and trade facilitation.

Activities of the ECE Regional Advisory Services Programme (RASP) were limited by its precarious financial situation. Funds were not sufficient to respond to the needs of countries in transition or subregional groupings, or for special initiatives. As in previous years, regional advisers provided assistance for implementing conventions, norms and standards; formulating policy guidelines for economic restructuring and developing market institutions and the private sector; capacity-building and human resource development in technical fields; and formulating national or multi-country projects. In 1996, there were 64 advisory missions in countries in transition; CIS countries accounted for 37 of those. Missions to developed market economies were organized for resource-raising purposes and as contributions to international conferences on development and transition issues. In CIS countries, emphasis was placed on national issues, while in countries of Central and Eastern Europe, the assistance shifted in the direction of multi-country projects. RASP continued to provide assistance to the Central European Initiative and the Black Sea Economic Cooperation. Regional advisers prepared project outlines for the Southeast European Cooperative Initiative, launched in December 1996 to enhance regional stability through the development of economic, environmental and transborder cooperation. Together with the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP), a Special Programme for the Economies of Central Asia was launched, aimed at maximizing the benefits which the subregion could obtain from the expertise of the two Commissions. Other RASP activities focused on private-sector development and better integration in the regional economy; assistance to national development, and international cooperation and cooperation among neighbouring regions belonging to different countries; and pursuing close work relations on development projects and technical assistance with other UN institutions.

In an 18 April decision [C(51)] on ECE activities to assist countries of the region in transition to a market economy and their integration into the European and global economy, the Commission asked the Executive Secretary to continue consultations on data collection and data-sharing on foreign direct investment opportunities in cooperation with the World Bank, the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development and other relevant institutions, as well as with the business community, and to develop a guide to investment promotion practice, taking into account the work done by other international organizations. It also asked that adequate resources be allocated within the UN regular budget for implementing RASP. ECE member countries and relevant international organizations and institutions, as well as other potential donors, were invited to contribute to TFACT. The Commission recommended that the UN Secretary-General consider the possibility of using ECE as a focal point to facilitate arrangements within the Secretariat to promote and enhance mutual cooperation with UN global programmes, organs and specialized agencies.

Other ECE activities included cooperation with other organizations and institutions and subregional groupings active in the region, with increased cooperation with OSCE [E/ECE/1349]; and contribution and follow-up to UN global programmes and conferences and to UN programmes assisting developing countries of other regions [E/ECE/1343]. In that regard, ECE had contributed [E/ECE/1340] to preparations for the 1996 UN Conference on Human Settlements (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII), and was involved in follow up to the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development [YUN 1994, p. 955], the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1113] and the 1995 Fourth World Conference on Women [YUN 1995, p. 1169]. In addition, there was increased interaction with the NGO community.

International trade

At its forty-fifth session (Geneva, 10-12 December), the ECE Committee on the Development of Trade reviewed its activities [ECE/TRADE/210] and endorsed the reports of its two subsidiary bodies, the Working Party on Facilitation of International Trade Procedures and the Working Party on International Contract Practices in Industry. The Working Party on Perishable Produce and Quality Development reported to the Committee for the first time. The Committee unanimously supported the establishment of a Centre for Facilitation of Procedures and Practices for Administration, Commerce and Transport.

In 1996, the Working Party on International Contract Practices in Industry, at its forty-fifth session (Geneva, 24-26 June), held an international forum on creating viable real estate markets in Central and Eastern Europe and CIS [TRADE/WP.5/59]. The forum issued guidelines for member Governments and agreed to establish a real estate advisory group to implement them in the transition economies. It also approved a guide on the adaptation of property laws in the transition economies. The Build, Operate and Transfer (BOT) Group was established in 1996, attracting leading experts from private companies and international organizations. The purpose of the BOT Group was to prepare guidelines on attracting private investment into infrastructure and to hold consultative meetings with member Governments, the first in Budapest, Hungary.

Regarding trade facilitation, training materials on electronic data interchange and the UN Electronic Data Interchange for Administration, Commerce and Trade (EDIFACT), including an electronic book, were developed in a joint project with ESCAP to be used for developing and transition economies. In the area of data elements and automatic data interchange, the development of UN/EDIFACT continued at a fast pace. Use of the World Wide Web to disseminate and exchange information increased. During the year, the Agricultural Standards Unit became fully integrated into the work of the Trade Facilitation Section.

Industry and technology

As requested by the Commission in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1031], the Round-table Conference on Co-operation for Sustainable Industrial Development was held during the 1996 ECE session to identify obstacles to and weak points in the current transition process, under the headings of industrial policy development and restructuring, international trade, foreign direct investment, and local training and development of human resources. It was also to develop concrete solutions to overcome those problems and speed up that process. On 18 April [(dec. B(51))], the Commission, welcoming the discussion held at the Round-table Conference, asked the Executive Secretary: to explore, in consultations with member States and business community representatives, the feasibility of a more consistent framework of cooperation with the business community; to take steps to improve the management of extrabudgetary funds contributed by the business community by preparing relevant administrative guidelines and selecting projects which would encourage further business community involvement and cooperation; and to study possible mechanisms for enhancing NGO and business community involvement in ECE activities.

At their twenty-second session (25-27 September) [ECE/SC TECH/49], the Senior Advisers to ECE Governments on Science and Technology carried out a quadrennial review of major changes in overall national science and technology policies, for which 26 ECE member countries provided written contributions. They considered the results of data collection on main science and technology indicator statistics received from 18 economies in transition. During the session, a forum discussion was held on administrative obstacles to international scientific cooperation. The secretariat continued to maintain an inventory of existing safety guidelines in biotechnology and, acting as depository, had national submissions from 34 ECE Governments and three international organizations.

The Working Party on the Chemical Industry, at its sixth session (2-4 October) [ECE/CHEM/110], evaluated progress made and future action to be taken in the regional programme on sustainable economic and ecological development of the chemical industry. It supported further work on a pilot project demonstrating the environmental clean-up of selected sites polluted by chemicals, and the preparation of a compendium of clean-up technologies. Preparations for a workshop on detection and analysis of polluted soils were also to be pursued. A round-table discussion on policies for strategic planning of research and development in the chemical industry was held during the Working Party session, which prompted a proposal from Poland to host a seminar on sustainable development perspectives in chemical research.

The fourteenth session of the Working Party on Engineering Industries and Automation (30 October-1 November) [ECE/ENG.AUT/59] carried out a review of its work since 1994. An open-ended meeting of experts on robotics was held in Faverges, France, in September.

The sixth session of the Working Party on Steel (23-25 October) [ECE/STEEL/100] expressed its satisfaction with the quality of the steel statistical bulletins published in 1996, the steel market review, and the study on privatization and changing ownership in the steel industry. It emphasized the importance of the collection and analysis of data on global trade and consumption of steel scrap, which was of great concern to steel producers and had consequences for trade relations between countries. Within its regional programme on metallurgy and ecology, the Working Party agreed to convene a third meeting of experts on the steel industry and the environment to make proposals regarding the harmonization of regulations on the environment. A directory of organizations dealing with the steel industry and the environment was issued during the year. The Working Party adopted the recommendations of a seminar on the processing, utilization and disposal of waste in the steel industry, held in Balatonszeplak, Hungary, in June.

In 1996, the Commission adopted a revised title and new terms of reference for the Working Party on Technical Harmonization and Standardization Policies. The sixth session of the Working Party (13-15 May) [ECE/STAND/44] adopted revised versions of the ECE recommendations on technical harmonization policies and on standardization policies. During the year, training workshops were organized on metrology in Slovakia and on quality assurance in Romania.

Transport

The Inland Transport Committee, at its fifty-eighth session (Geneva, 15-19 January) [ECE/TRANS/116], discussed, among other things, assistance to countries in transition, road transport, the development of uniform technical prescriptions for the construction of road vehicles, rail transport, inland water transport, customs questions affecting transport, transport of dangerous goods, transport of perishable foodstuffs and transport statistics. Assistance to countries in transition continued to receive attention from the Committee and its subsidiary bodies through the organization of workshops: one on the improvement of statistics on the transport of goods by road (Berlin, March) and another on international transit traffic facilitation (Tashkent, Uzbekistan, October).

The Preparatory Committee of the 1997 Regional Conference on Transport and the Environment continued to develop a draft declaration and joint programme of action to be issued by the Conference. Progress was also made in drawing up legal instruments to be adopted or signed at the Conference. On 18 April, ECE decided [G(51)] to hold the Conference in Vienna, if possible during the second week of November 1997.

Under the Trans-European North-South Motorway and Trans-European Railways projects, activities aimed at the coordinated development of international road and rail, as well as combined transport infrastructure in Central and Eastern Europe. Activities included updating the respective networks, developing respective databases, elaborating pre- and feasibility studies, and holding workshops and training seminars.

Energy

Mobilization of private-sector support assisted countries in transition through such extrabudgetary activities as the Gas Centre, the Energy Efficiency 2000 Project (EE 2000) and the Clean Coal Implementation Programme. In 1996, companies, institutions and Governments continued to provide strong support to the Gas Centre through financial and in-kind contributions and secondment of experts. Four new companies joined the Centre during the year, and a fifth was in the process of doing so. Two Global Environment Facility (GEF) funding proposals, developed under the auspices of EE 2000 and totalling some $6 million, were approved by GEF for the cities of Vladimir, Russian Federation, and Gabrvo, Bulgaria. New financing, notably from the World Bank, was secured for energy efficiency projects and initiatives in Energy Efficiency Demonstration Zones. Two new donors provided contributions to EE 2000, which entered the last year of its second three-year phase in 1996. A third three-year phase was under development and resources were being mobilized for its implementation. A number of Governments and companies pledged financial and in-kind support to the Clean Coal Implementation Programme.

As to the development of international standards and norms, a UN Framework Classification for Solid Fuels and Minerals Commodities, for worldwide application and developed under the auspices of the Working Party on Coal, was intended to assist transition countries, as well as other countries, to reassess their solid fuels and mineral deposits, using market economy criteria. A Trilingual Glossary on Natural Gas Resources was developed and published under the auspices of the Working Party on Gas. A joint study was completed by EE 2000 and the EU's SAVE Programme on labelling and standards of refrigeration appliances in four transition countries.

By an 18 April decision [H(51)], the Commission, taking note of the Executive Secretary's report on cooperation in the field of energy [E/ECE/1339] and the report of the Committee on Energy at its fifth session [YUN 1995, p. 1033], invited the Committee: to mobilize the support of the private sector to assist countries in transition through the Gas Centre, EE 2000 and the Clean Coal Implementation Programme; to cooperate with other regional institutions, subregional groups and NGOs active in the sphere of energy; to continue its work on developing international standards and norms; and to streamline its work. The Executive Secretary was asked to report in 1997.

The Committee on Energy at its sixth session (Geneva, 6-8 November) [ECE/ENERGY/30] streamlined its programme of work, reducing the number of programme elements from 29 to 12. The Committee also suggested that ECE consolidate the intergovernmental bodies supporting ECE work in the field of energy.

Other activities included surveys initiated by the Working Party on Gas on underground gas storage in the ECE region; an international map of natural gas fields in Europe; and gas interconnections in the region.

Agriculture

The Working Party on Standardization of Perishable Produce and Quality Development, during its fifty-second session (Geneva, 7-8 November) [AGRI/WP.1/66], discussed the outcome of expert meetings on coordination of standardization of fresh fruit and vegetables; standardization of dry and dried fruit produce; and standardization of potatoes (seed). It also discussed matters of interest arising from the work of other international organizations, including the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) scheme for the application of international standards for fruits and vegetables; the EU; the Codex Alimentarius Commission; and the World Trade Organization.

During the year, the Timber Committee continued to develop its role as the major regional forum for information on and analysis of the sustainable development of forests and the timber sector. The Committee, at its fifty-fourth session (Geneva, 23-27 September) [ECE/TIM/87], streamlined its programme, identifying core activities and eliminating many programme elements. A study of the long-term outlook for European wood supply and demand, European Timber Trends and Prospects: Into the Twenty-first Century, was published. The Committee's secretariat played a leading role in the Intersecretariat Working Group on Forest Sector Statistics, which coordinated the work of all international organizations.

Economic analysis

Preparation and publication of the annual Economic Survey of Europe and Economic Bulletin for Europe remained the core activity of the ECE Division for Economic Analysis and Projections.

At their thirty-second session (Geneva, 3-5 June) [ECE/EC.AD/50], the Senior Economic Advisers organized a round table on the improvement of the investment climate and the restructuring of industry in Europe and their impact on employment. The Advisers reviewed their ongoing activities on medium- and long-term projections; international trade and structural change; structural changes in the ECE region and their impact on employment, labour productivity, working patterns and income distribution; and sustainable economic development. As part of ECE reforms, the meeting of the Senior Economic Advisers was to be replaced by a one-day seminar, to take place the day before the opening of the Commission's annual meeting.

Research into population issues continued to focus on fertility, family and reproductive health, international migration and population ageing. Standard data sets were prepared for three quarters of the countries that conducted Fertility and Family Surveys (FFS), and the majority of those were archived at ECE. Arrangements for comparative research on fertility, reproductive health and family behaviour were agreed upon by countries participating in the project. The first FFS standard country report was published, and 12 more were expected in 1997. Two issues of the International Migration Bulletin were published, as was a volume on international migration in Eastern Europe and CIS. Another volume was being prepared for publication in 1997 on international migration in Lithuania, Poland and Ukraine. Work on population ageing in 1996 focused on finalizing standard data sets of elderly persons for 14 countries; a plan for preparing country monographs based on those data was agreed upon by participating countries.

Environment

In 1996, the Committee on Environmental Policy held a one-day special session (Geneva, 17 January) [ECE/CEP/18] to consider an overview and evaluation of the Third Ministerial Conference "Environment for Europe" [YUN 1995, p. 1036], held in 1995. The special session focused on the Ministerial Declaration, whereby participants at the Conference reaffirmed their commitment to cooperation in the area of environmental protection in Europe. The Committee established an Ad Hoc Preparatory Working Group of Senior Officials to prepare for the Fourth Ministerial Conference in 1998, and an Executive Committee to prepare the work of the Working Group. The Working Group and the Executive Committee were serviced by the ECE secretariat. The Executive Committee met three times during the year, and the Working Group was scheduled to have its first meeting in May 1997. In addition, the Committee established an Ad Hoc Working Group for the preparation of a draft convention on access to environmental information and public participation in decision-making, which met three times in 1996. On 18 April [dec. F(51)], the Commission endorsed the establishment of the Ad Hoc Preparatory Working Group of Senior Officials, with the aim of streamlining the Environment for Europe process and preparation of the 1998 Ministerial Conference. It also endorsed the establishment of the Ad hoc Working Group to prepare a draft convention. The Executive Secretary was asked to report in 1997.

At its third session (Geneva, 20-22 May) [ECE/CEP/30], the Committee on Environmental Policy considered its strategic role in regional environmental policy-making, and consequently revised its 1996-1998 programme of work, basing it on three pillars: participation in the two major international cooperative processes—the Environment for Europe process and the regional promotion of Agenda 21, adopted by the 1992 UN Conference on Environment and Development [YUN 1992, p. 672]; the development and carrying out of environmental performance reviews; and the development of and follow-up to its decision-making, including monitoring the use of resources and coordinating work on environment with international governmental organizations and NGOs. The Committee screened further action required for implementing the Environmental Programme for Europe and agreed on sub-activities to its work programme. It extended the Environmental Performance Review programme to further non-OECD countries of the region. The Committee's Bureau followed the preparations for the Regional Conference on Transport and Environment (Vienna, November) and encouraged national environmental experts to participate in the preparatory work.

Human settlements

Activities of the Committee on Human Settlements in 1996 concentrated on finalizing its contribution to the UN Conference on Human Settlements (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII), which included the submission of five publications and the convening of a special event at the Conference on the housing crisis in the countries in transition. The Committee, at its fifty-seventh session (Geneva, 16-18 September) [ECE/HBP/100], revised its structure and work programme. It decided to abolish the two Working Parties and to rely more on task forces and expert meetings to carry out its work programme; it gave a stronger role to its Bureau and approved the establishment of an advisory board with participation of the private and public sectors.

Statistics

The Conference of European Statisticians, at its forty-fourth session (Paris, 11-13 June) [ECE/CES/50], devoted attention to a review of the integrated presentation of planned future international statistical work. The Conference decided to streamline further its consideration of the integrated presentation by focusing greater attention at each plenary session on four to six programme elements which member States had indicated deserved being studied in greater depth. The new approach was to be used for the first time at the Conference's 1997 session. The ECE/UNDP project launched in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1039] to improve the capacities of national statistical offices in countries in transition to provide social and demographic statistics was suspended by UNDP in December because it did not receive the anticipated contributions from donor countries.

Latin America and the Caribbean

The Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) held its twenty-sixth session in San Jose, Costa Rica, from 15 to 20 April 1996 [E/1996/37]. The Commission focused its deliberations on assessing the achievements, failures and inadequacies of the reform process in the region since the debt crisis, and examined approaches to facilitate progress towards macro-economic stability, more dynamic growth and greater social equity. The Commission considered a basic document, "Strengthening development: the interplay of macro and micro-economics", and a complementary document, "The economic experience of the last fifteen years: Latin America and the Caribbean, 1980-1995".

Addressing the opening session, the Executive Secretary stated that despite significant improvements in economic performance in recent years, the region had not achieved sufficiently robust growth to ensure a higher level of well-being for all, especially the most disadvantaged groups. While nearly all the countries displayed certain common features linked to the demands of globalization, they differed in the timing, scope and content of economic reforms. The restoration and maintenance of macroeconomic equilibria were requirements for an increasingly transnationalized economy, and the region should avoid striving to achieve higher growth at the price of stability. Experience had shown that rapid and sustained growth could not be achieved solely on the basis of market signals and macroeconomic discipline. The proposal submitted by the ECLAC secretariat, therefore, emphasized the need for measures at the macroeconomic, microeconomic and institutional levels to support productive modernization, the development of financial and labour markets, and the strengthening of institutions to create a favourable development environment. The proposal suggested that to increase productivity and create more and better jobs, the region had to expand its gross domestic product (GDP) by around 6 per cent per annum; and main economic policies had to be constantly adapted to ensure long-term sustainability of macroeconomic equilibria and avoid inefficiencies in the allocation of resources, so as to expand the production frontier, promote saving and investment and stimulate innovation. To achieve growth rates of that magnitude, the region had to meet certain goals for channelling national savings into investment, making better use of existing capital and stimulating capital formation. To expand linkages within productive systems and enable demand and technical progress to radiate outward from the leading sectors to the rest of the economy, action was called for at the microeconomic level to assist firms in incorporating the best international practices and technologies, together with action to promote the dissemination and large-scale assimilation of such practices, while facilitating access by all firms to a well-structured capital market and training system.

In a resolution on strengthening sustainable development in the region [E/1996/37 (res. 552(XXVI))], the Commission stressed that achieving rates of saving and investment to ensure strong, sustained growth required, in addition to a stable macroeconomic context, an effective financial development policy. It stressed further that, to achieve steady increases in productivity, there was a need to complement macroeconomic policy with productive development and to direct human resource training policies towards facilitating the promotion, generation and dissemination of technology through a combination of measures to foster development and improve domestic systems of innovation; that could begin with measures aimed at improving the quality and coverage of mandatory basic education, followed by others directed towards supporting information networks, strengthening mechanisms of business cooperation, protecting intellectual property, promoting research centres and technology extension services, adopting international norms and standards of quality, and encouraging vocational training and education.

The secretariat was requested to deepen its analysis of the interactions between macroeconomics, institutions and microeconomics; policies that minimized macroeconomic instability while maximizing the impetus to investment, saving, technical progress and international competitiveness; the conditions of macroeconomic stability and opportunities for development in countries of different sizes or in different stages of development, and the possibilities for cooperation in the development of the smaller economies of the region; fiscal and other reforms seeking to strengthen the structural stability of public finances, increase incentives to saving and investment, and improve social equity; reforms that increased national savings and channelled them towards investment, including reforms of the social security, banking and insurance systems; intermediation of long-term financing in support of productive development; incentives and policies for promoting innovation and disseminating environmentally sustainable technical progress throughout the productive system; development potential inherent in key natural resources; the role of infrastructure investment and new modes of private participation in such investment; concerted action schemes, such as institutional mechanisms that encouraged coordination between the public and private spheres and between private agents; investment in human resources; the impact of structural reforms on the labour market; the quality of social investment and the efficacy of social policy instruments, with emphasis on their linkages with growth; the links between economic policy, environmental sustainability of growth and social equity; regional integration agreements in their various forms and the opportunities for intraregional cooperation; public policy reforms to meet institutional and public administration requirements generated by economic changes, increasingly complex conditions of international competition and growing demand for economic and social development; and the impact of the debt burden on the formulation and implementation of sustainable development policies.

In a resolution on the implications for ECLAC of UN reform [res. 553(XXVI)], the Commission reaffirmed that the activities entrusted to it by the Economic and Social Council retained their full validity in the light of current circumstances and the foreseeable future of the ECLAC countries, and that it was essential for the United Nations, in carrying out economic and social activities, to take account of the regional dimension and the decentralization of tasks in accordance with the comparative advantages of headquarters and subsidiary organs located in the developing regions. The Commission declared that ECLAC should function as a centre of excellence, charged with collaborating with member States in a comprehensive analysis of development processes geared to the design, monitoring and evaluation of public policies and the resulting provision of operational services in the fields of specialized information, advisory services, training and support for regional and international cooperation and coordination. The Commission established an ad hoc working group to define priorities for its work programme (see below) and to recommend strategic directions for its future activities, taking into account the development priorities of Latin America and the Caribbean, as well as budgetary considerations.

In another action [res. 561(XXVI)], the Commission admitted Anguilla as an associate member and welcomed its participation in the work of the Commission. It also adopted a resolution supporting the work of the Latin American and Caribbean Institute for Economic and Social Planning [res. 554(XXVI)] and one on the Latin American Demographic Centre [res. 555(XXVI)] (see below).

In the framework of the Commission session, ECLAC and the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) signed a cooperation agreement on 20 April to strengthen their work in the region. Under the agreement, the two institutions would search for common objectives and exchange information on strategies and plans of action in the region, and explore jointly financed studies, programmes and projects, particularly in the areas of economic integration, intraregional trade, population, statistics, social policy, citizens' security, macroeconomics, transport and the environment.

Economic trends

According to the 1996 summary of the economic survey of Latin America and the Caribbean [E/1997/43], the dominant feature of the region's economic panorama in 1996 was the re-emergence of a pattern of modest growth, accompanied by price stability, that had characterized the region's economy during the 1990s, until the Mexican financial crisis erupted in 1994. An important development was the gradual recovery of the Argentine and Mexican economies. GDP for the region expanded 3.4 per cent, following a lacklustre performance the previous year. As a result, per capita GDP climbed 1.7 per cent, higher than the average annual rate since the start of the decade. Seven economies (Barbados, Chile, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guyana, Nicaragua, Saint Lucia) expanded at a rate of more than 5 per cent. Another 13 (Argentina, Bolivia, Belize, Brazil, Colombia, El Salvador, Grenada, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Trinidad and Tobago, Uruguay) recorded increases of between 3 per cent and 5 per cent. Five others (Ecuador, Haiti, Panama, Paraguay, Peru) had a growth rate of 2 per cent, while GDP was flat in Costa Rica and Jamaica, and shrank in Antigua and Barbuda and in Venezuela. The region's stronger showing in 1996 was chiefly attributable to an upturn in economic activity in Argentina, Mexico and Uruguay. More robust growth in Barbados, the Dominican Republic, Guyana and Nicaragua was also a contributing factor, as was the swift pace of economic expansion in Chile, even though that was slower than the year before. Trends in Bolivia and Honduras were much the same as in 1995, with both countries posting growth rates close to the regional average. Another 11 countries saw a decline in economic growth rates. The downturn was especially marked in Peru, whose rate dropped by over five percentage points. Argentina and Mexico made comebacks, as the negative impacts of the 1994 financial crisis dissipated; in 1996, external capital began to flow into both countries once again. Uruguay's economic reactivation started to take hold as the Argentine economy recovered. In contrast, the weaker performances of a large group of countries were due to adjustment policies, as in Brazil, Chile, Colombia, El Salvador, Guatemala and Peru, or in response to major macroeconomic disequilibria, as in Brazil, Costa Rica and Venezuela and, to a lesser extent, Ecuador. The decline in Paraguay's growth rate was accounted for by its banking crisis.

Exports were the dominant factor in stimulating economic growth for the region, with volume rising nearly three times as fast as GDP. In relation to domestic demand, consumption appeared to have risen faster than investment, although the latter resumed its positive evolution after the previous year's decline. The continuing downward trend in the inflation rate continued, from 26 per cent in 1995 to 20 per cent in 1996. That outcome was fairly evenly distributed in 1996, since inflation was down in 10 of 22 economies analysed, and the consumer price index held steady or rose only slightly in another 11 economies. Only Venezuela registered triple-digit levels. The marked reduction in the region's rate of inflation and the improved performance of most countries were made possible by stabilization programmes implemented in the late 1980s and early 1990s, and in Brazil in mid-1994.

Unfortunately, the moderate upturn in the region's growth rate did not improve the labour situation. The unemployment rate soared in various countries, rising from 7.3 per cent in 1995 to 7.7 per cent in 1996. That was due to the fact that the labour supply remained stable, whereas job creation was sluggish. Only Mexico showed a substantial increase in industrial employment.

The region's merchandise exports reached $248 billion in 1996, an increase of 11 per cent over 1995, but it represented a moderation of the extraordinary export burst during 1994-1995. Mexico led the way, with its exports growing by 20 per cent, reflecting an expansion in manufacturing exports and a substantial rise in earnings from oil exports. In Argentina and Uruguay, export earnings were up by 13 per cent and 11 per cent, respectively. Both countries more than made up for the fall in meat prices by increasing their shipments. They also benefited from sluggish domestic demand and were able to take advantage of expanding foreign markets. Bolivia and the Dominican Republic also experienced significant growth in their export volume. Brazil's exports declined in general, while in Colombia there was a surge in traditional exports and a drop in non-traditional exports, as the Colombian peso appreciated in real terms. Costa Rica's exports were adversely affected by the fall in coffee prices, a leaner banana harvest and the contraction of the maquila industry, while in Peru, variations between products were mainly a reflection of price differences. Five countries recorded lower export earnings than during the year before, due to smaller volumes and lower prices. In Haiti, the fall was particularly marked, at 19 per cent, in view of the preceding year's upsurge of 84 per cent, while Chile suffered from a downturn in the high prices of its commodities. The same could be said for Guatemala and Panama. In Paraguay, however, the drop in earnings was due chiefly to a decline in cotton production for export.

The region's real terms of trade deteriorated overall. Terms of trade improved only in the oil-exporting countries of Ecuador and Venezuela, and in Argentina.

The region's merchandise imports approached $245.5 billion, increasing almost 11 per cent. Particularly marked upturns were registered in Argentina and Mexico, while the import boom in Brazil came to an end. Generally, imports expanded faster in countries experiencing a reactivation of their economies. However, since economic activity slackened in most countries, in many cases imports stagnated, fell or rose slowly.

The region's trade deficit narrowed by some $800 million, to $8 billion, largely as a result of favourable trends in the oil market. However, in a majority of countries, the trade balance actually worsened, with the exceptions of Colombia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Panama, Paraguay, Peru and Venezuela. The most significant changes in quantitative terms, other than in Venezuela, occurred in Brazil, where the trade deficit widened; Argentina, whose former hefty deficit reappeared; and Ecuador, whose trade surplus grew considerably.

The region's current account deficit grew relatively little, widening from $32 billion in 1995 to $32.5 billion in 1996. During the year, the region consolidated its progress towards full participation in international financial markets. Changing trends in the composition of capital flows, first observed in 1995, gathered momentum. Foreign direct investment grew from $22 billion in 1995 to a record high of $30.8 billion. Flows of that type were significant for Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Mexico and Peru, and reached unprecedented levels in some countries. By contrast, direct investment in Mexico remained unchanged from the previous year's level of $7 billion. Bond issues continued the upward trend begun in mid-1995, totalling $41 billion in the first 10 months of 1996. Those flows were directed primarily to Argentina, Brazil and Mexico, and, to a lesser extent, to Chile, Colombia and Venezuela.

External debt

In 1996, the region's external debt amounted to $607 billion, an increase of 3.4 per cent over 1995, the lowest increase since 1991. That was attributable to the depreciation of European currencies and the yen vis-a-vis the dollar in 1996, which was reflected in a reduction in the external debt denominated in those currencies, as well as to a decrease in the nominal debt in several countries, particularly Nicaragua and Venezuela. The region's external debt indicators continued to improve, returning to pre-1980s levels. Total interest payments, measured as a percentage of exports of goods and services, declined to 14.5 per cent. During the year, important advances were made in the renegotiation of the external debt in several heavily indebted Latin American countries. Peru made substantial progress in concluding debt rescheduling agreements with the Paris Club, commercial banks and the Russian Federation, and a final agreement for restructuring its commercial debt under the Brady Plan. Nicaragua reduced its external debt by over $4 billion by renegotiating its debt with the Russian Federation and obtaining forgiveness of its debts with Mexico and Germany. Honduras and Guyana also signed agreements to restructure their bilateral debt with the Paris Club, and Panama rescheduled its debt arrears with commercial banks.

Activities in 1996

ECLAC continued to implement its mandate to collaborate with member States in a comprehensive analysis of development processes, such as public policy-making, monitoring and evaluation, and the provision of resulting operational services of specialized information, technical assistance, training, and support for regional and international cooperation.

Development policy and regional economic cooperation

As part of its systematic monitoring of macroeconomic trends in the countries of the region, ECLAC's Economic Development Division produced the Economic Survey 1995-1996, the Economic Panorama 1996, and the Preliminary Overview of the Economy of Latin America and the Caribbean 1996. The analytical work carried out by the Division focused on the study of employment difficulties in the region, with special emphasis on analysing the effects of adjustment processes; and government policies aimed at changing production patterns and promoting sustainable development and social equity, with emphasis on assessing their effectiveness in those different spheres.

Operational activities continued in the area of fiscal policy and decentralization. The Division continued the project on privatization processes in Bolivia and Nicaragua, and conducted the eighth regional seminar on fiscal policy, stabilization and adjustment.

The Latin American Centre for Economic and Social Documentation, which focused on strengthening the management of information and documentation for development, continued to provide technical assistance to Governments and to publish its periodical publications—PLANINDEX, INFOPLAN and Informativo terminológico. Courses were organized in Argentina, Cuba, Chile, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Venezuela to raise awareness among information systems managers and decision makers on the role of information in the new context of globalized economies, and the potential for public- and private-sector cooperation.

The Latin American and Caribbean Institute for Economic and Social Planning (ILPES) conducted four international courses on economic reform and strategic public management; preparation, evaluation and management of local development projects; regional development; and decentralization and local management. International seminars were conducted on financial management of the State and political parties and strategic management of the State. The Institute carried out some 20 technical assistance missions in support of central Governments and decentralized institutions, as well as academic institutions. With the sponsorship of the Andean Development Corporation, the Institute was carrying out a project to offer Andean Governments a set of strategic criteria and a methodological framework to analyse and develop regulatory frameworks for the electrical, telecommunications and sanitary works sectors. The Institute also set up REDILPES, a network of former participants in ILPES training activities, universities, research centres and NGOs, to promote the exchange of experiences and update information on those areas related to the strategic management of the State. The Institute's activities were reviewed in 1996 at the eighteenth meeting of the Presiding Officers of the Regional Council of Planning (Brasilia, Brazil, 25-26 November).

The Commission, in a resolution on support for the work of the Institute [res. 554(XXVI)], supported the establishment of REDILPES.

Activities in the area of regional integration and cooperation included participation in and preparation of discussion papers for working groups of the Free Trade Area of the Americas. Publications were issued on the economic relations between the European Union and Latin America, and on the evolution and perspectives of intraregional trade and investments. Chapters on open regionalism, the state of regional and subregional economic integration, the panorama of intraregional investment, and the social dimension of regional integration were included in the new publication Panorama de la Inserción Internacional.

Industrial, scientific and technological development

The Joint ECLAC/United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) Industrial

and Technological Development Unit focused on the industrial restructuring process and policy formulation to enhance the competitiveness of Latin American and Caribbean countries. It provided technical assistance on policies for export promotion, human resources development and technological innovation and dissemination, as well as on the design of industrial policies and modernization of business associations. Studies were produced on industrial performance, innovation and specialization, industrial policy and competitiveness in open economies, and linkages and industrial development process. The two computer programs devised by the Division to evaluate the export competitiveness of individual countries and industrial performance in the region were further developed; 11 training workshops were conducted on the use of the programs. International seminars were held on the industrial dimension of national sustainable development strategies and on decentralized industrial policies. Six training courses were offered on stabilization and adjustment, innovation theory and industrial development, technological and industrial development and the challenge of competitiveness.

A seminar was held to design a new project aimed at identifying strategies for developing resource-based production linkages around clusters arising from the region's rich base of natural resources. Other activities included a national seminar on the analysis of productivity in Chile, and contributions to two UNIDO 1997 global reports, The Key Role of Industrial Investment in Economic Development and Industrial Policy Outlook. Agreements were reached with the Latin American Confederation of Pulp and Paper Industries, on an evaluation of pulp and paper imports from outside the region; the Technical Cooperation Service of Chile, on upgrading efficiency on the use of funds in support of micro, small and medium firms; and the National Planning Department of Colombia and the Colombian Institute for Science and Technology, on technical assistance on sectoral development negotiations. Publications included the Desarrollo Productivo series, as well as other works on industrial restructuring and the design of policies to enhance the competitiveness of the countries of the region.

International trade and development finance

During 1996, ECLAC activities focused on research aimed at contributing to policy formulation in the region to foster expansion and improvement of its commercial links with the changing world economy, and taking into account the globalization of production processes and increasing commercial and financial apertures. That included publications dealing with foodstuff exports, trade policies between Latin America and the United States, evolution and perspectives of economic relations between Japan and Latin America, trade policies and World Trade Organization commitments, and open regionalism. In addition, the first edition of a new publication, Panorama de la Inserción Internacional, was published, describing the evolution of trade and trade policy of countries of the region, paying special attention to structural changes in the world economy affecting trade and investment opportunities, regional and subregional integration, and the implementation of multilateral trade agreements.

In the area of development finance, and within the framework of the joint ECLAC/United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) project on financial policies for changing production patterns with social equity, case studies were completed of Chile and Mexico, on regulation and supervision of financial conglomerates; of Chile, Colombia and Costa Rica, on access of low- and medium-income strata to housing finance; and on financial institutions and capital formation in Latin America. Regarding the project on reforms of health systems financing, case studies of Argentina, Chile and Colombia, as well as Canada, the United States and other developed countries, were completed, and a regional seminar was held in November. Work continued on a project on income distribution and recent stabilization and adjustment policies, with a comparative study of the cases of Argentina, Brazil and Colombia, and preparation of a report with comparative data resulting from the processing of household surveys of Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Chile and Mexico. Two international seminars were held, one in May and another in November.

A regional seminar discussed the current situation and prospects for reform regarding pension systems in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, Chile, Ecuador, Honduras, Paraguay and Peru. Four issues of the Financiamiento del desarrollo series were published, dealing with savings, financial clusters, macroeconomic shocks and income distribution, as were the documents Flujos de capitales a América Latina y el Caribe en los Noventa: Experiencias y Políticas and Entorno macroeconómico para el desarrollo productivo en el contexto de entrada de capitales externos.

Natural resources and energy

Activities of the ECLAC Natural Resources and Energy Unit in the areas of marine and mineral resources, hazardous wastes and energy continued to focus on institutional management issues; defining the role of the State, particularly with regard to privatization and regulation; the design and application of public policies for integrated natural resources management; and regional implementation of international environmental agreements, such as Agenda 21 [YUN 1992, p. 672]. National seminars were held on reform, regulation and privatization in Brazil, Costa Rica, Peru and Venezuela; regional seminars on conservation and sustainable use of coastal and marine biodiversity, and reform and strategic alliances for the efficient use of energy were held in Brazil and in Chile. Advisory services were provided on the analysis of complex areas of different international agreements and the use of different strategies included in Agenda 21; and on mining, energy, water and marine resources legislation. In the area of water resources, activities focused on privatization of water utilities, particularly the regulation of monopolies and the use of the concept of watershed management. Technical assistance was provided regarding management for the multiple use of water, and training courses were offered on integrated watershed management. Work also continued on the joint ECLAC/Latin American Energy Organization project on energy and sustainable development, on issues ranging from equity to regulatory frameworks.

Transport

The work of ECLAC in the field of transport concentrated on research, technical cooperation and institutional support in railways operation, road maintenance, port management, urban transport and multimodal transport. Research focused on the study of transport services resulting from integration processes, ports modernization and privatization, and infrastructure for urban transport. In addition to the technical assistance provided to countries in the region, ECLAC collaborated with the World Bank and IDB on projects dealing with land bridges and railway networks in South America. Technical assistance was provided to the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific and the Economic Commission for Africa, and through joint programme training courses in several African and Asian cities. Assistance was also provided to meetings of the South American Ministers of Transport, Communications and Public Works, and to other regional organizations. ECLAC continued to publish its Boletín FAL on the facilitation of trade and transport in the region.

Social development

In 1996, the work of the ECLAC Social Development Division focused on the production of the 1996 edition of the Social Panorama of Latin Amer- ica, which provided statistical information and social indicators for an adequate assessment of the social situation in the region. Work continued on an assessment of recent socio-economic progress and the impact of social policies. Technical assistance was provided to Costa Rica on the elaboration of a national plan against poverty, and to Paraguay on the formulation of its national plan for social development and on the elaboration of the social panorama of Paraguay. Methodologies were developed to improve the design and implementation of social policies methodologies, paying special attention to institutional and organizational aspects. The analysis of experiences in the management of social policies, programmes and projects continued; technical assistance was provided through the PROPOSAL project, seven national training courses and one regional course. Research was conducted to facilitate efforts to reduce drug abuse. Twenty-five working papers were published, including eight issues of the Políticas sociales series on social policies. Eight workshops were held on education, the informal sector, popular participation, reform of the State, and public policies and income distribution.

In addition, preparations were conducted for the first Regional Conference in Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development, to be held in April 1997, including a contribution to the study The Equity Gap: Latin America and the Caribbean and the Social Summit.

Integration of women

In April, the Commission adopted a resolution [res. 558(XXVI)] on the Regional Programme of Action for the Women of Latin America and the Caribbean, 1995-2001, which had been approved in 1994 by the Regional Conference on the Integration of Women into the Economic and Social Development of Latin America and the Caribbean [YUN 1994, p. 739]. The Commission requested the Executive Secretary to support regional activities in implementation of the Programme of Action, and urged its implementation in close coordination with the UN system, as a complement to the 1995 Beijing Platform for Action [YUN 1995, p. 1170] and the medium-term plan for 1996-2001. The Commission requested the Regional Conference and its Presiding Officers to carry out a periodic review and evaluation of the implementation of the 1977 Regional Plan of Action [YUN 1977, p. 596] and of the Regional Programme of Action for 1995-2001.

The activities of the ECLAC Women and Development Unit concentrated on contributing to the implementation and monitoring of the Regional Programme of Action and the Beijing Platform for Action. That was done primarily through reinforcing the activities of the Presiding Officers of the Regional Conference, which met in November 1996. The Unit continued its activities aimed at mainstreaming gender issues into the Commission work programme. A preliminary Directory of National Organizations in charge of policies and programmes dealing with women's issues and several studies on indicators in the labour market, human settlements and female human resources training were completed.

Environment and human settlements

ECLAC's work on environment and human settlements continued within the general framework of the implementation of Agenda 21 and the Regional Plan of Action on Human Settlements. As part of the follow-up to Agenda 21, the ECLAC/German Agency for Technical Cooperation project, entitled "Guidelines and consultancy services on controlled environmentally sound waste management", continued to assist in the formulation of integrated waste management policies, with emphasis on the institutional and legal framework, technological policy and urban planning. The Fourth Regional Seminar on Progress and Prospects for Environmentally Sound Management of Urban and Industrial Waste was held in December. In addition, a document was prepared on the progress achieved by Latin American and Caribbean countries in the implementation of recommendations regarding integrated resources management. Studies were carried out on the environmental aspects of economic integration, particularly in the case of the Southern Cone Common Market (MERCOSUR).

In the area of human settlements, a project on changing production patterns in the region's housing sector concluded with the publication of the study Producción de vivienda en América Latina y el Caribe: áreas de interés para una política habitacional innovativa. Activities continued within the project on urban management in selected medium-sized cities of Latin America, with national seminars held in Brazil, Colombia, Chile, Peru and Trinidad and Tobago.

Population

ECLAC's sessional Ad Hoc Committee on Population met for the first time during the Commission's twenty-sixth session (17-18 April). The Committee evaluated progress achieved in the implementation of the Regional Plan of Action on Population and Development, adopted by the Commission in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 740].

The Commission [res. 556(XXVI)] agreed that each country should designate an institution to serve as liaison for the follow-up of the Regional Action Plan to facilitate communication between member countries and with the ECLAC secretariat. It decided that, at its next meeting, the Ad Hoc Committee would consider the issue of reproductive health and poverty. It requested the secretariat to procure extrabudgetary financing for activities envisaged in the Plan of Action, to update those activities periodically, and to disseminate the information in a special bulletin. The secretariat should also prepare a biennial report on activities undertaken for presentation to the Ad Hoc Committee. The Commission urged the international community and ECLAC member States to increase their financing of activities related to population and development in Latin America and the Caribbean, particularly those envisaged in the Action Plan.

In a resolution [res. 555(XXVI)] on the Latin American Demographic Centre (CELADE), the Commission reiterated the need for continued support for its activities in the field of population, and asked ECLAC member countries to increase their contributions to financing the activities of the population work programme, bearing in mind the successive reductions in extrabudgetary contributions that CELADE had experienced in recent years. It also asked international agencies to increase their support for those activities.

ECLAC provided technical assistance on population policy formulation to, among others, Mexico and Paraguay; and in social investment projects, in collaboration with IDB, to Guatemala, Nicaragua, Paraguay and Peru. Assistance on the use of census data through the application of the REDATAM-Plus and Geographical Information Systems was provided to several countries of the region. Research focused on collaboration with the Population Division of the United Nations on population projections and on the development of the final stage of the Windows version of REDATAM-plus and three related applications: ACESS-Plan, EduPlan and ZonPlan.

Training activities included the nineteenth intensive regional course on demographic analysis for development; and collaboration with the sixth postgraduate course on population and development, held by the University of Chile with the sponsorship of the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA). Assistance was provided to universities, public institutions and NGOs in Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Guatemala, the Netherlands Antilles, Paraguay and Uruguay for the training of national officials and exchange of teachers and research fellows. Besides CELADE periodicals, such as DOCPAL: Latin American Population Abstracts, the Notas de Población and the Demographic Bulletin series, publications included Impacto de las tendencias demográficas sobre los sectores sociales en América Latina, issued jointly with IDB, and Pensamiento Iberoamericano, covering population and development issues.

Food and agriculture

The ECLAC Agricultural Development Unit continued its work on linkages between small- and medium-scale farmers and agro-industry; long-term agricultural scenarios, including the impact of regional integration; technological innovation; and the study of land markets.

The project on promoting social and economic integration of small- and medium-scale farmers into agro-industry concluded with the preparation of policy recommendations based on eight national case studies (Colombia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guyana, Jamaica, Mexico, Peru, Trinidad and Tobago) and five sectoral studies. The document Escenarios de la agricultura y el comercio mundial hacia el año 2020 was published. A study was carried out on technological demands and cooperation possibilities among countries in the Southern Cone. A new project commenced on policies to promote the development of the agricultural land market, with emphasis on providing access to small producers. As a contribution to a larger project on the development of resources-based clusters, research began on the feasibility of forestry and agricultural clusters. Research was also carried out on the impact of the MERCOSUR-Chile agreement on the Chilean agricultural sector.

Statistics and economic projections

The ECLAC Statistics and Economic Projections Division continued to carry out activities aimed at expanding the regional network of statistical information and regional cooperation in statistics to foster dissemination of statistical information in the region; analysing the region's position in the global economy; and undertaking studies on regional development.

The regional framework of statistical information was considerably enlarged and strengthened by the consolidation of the Short-term Indicators Database, the final incorporation of the latest international statistical classifications based on the Harmonized Commodity Description and Coding System for external trade data, the creation of the External Debt Database for the countries of the region, and the incorporation of new surveys into the Household Survey Data Bank. Improvements were made to the methodology for estimating income distribution and poverty situations, as well as for calculating new indexes of unitary values for foreign trade.

Regarding the development and dissemination of statistical information, special emphasis was placed on supporting the implementation of the revised System of National Accounts (SNA 1993) [YUN 1993, p. 112], and promoting the translation of its handbook into Spanish. Progress was achieved in disseminating information in electronic formats (diskettes and CD-ROMs) and on-line access via the Internet and Intranet, allowing direct access to ECLAC databases. In the area of technical cooperation, activities continued to focus on the creation of statistical databases, household surveys, improving national accounts, production of basic statistics, and social policies and programmes. Progress was achieved in the sub-programmes on adaptation and production of basic statistics in the framework of a regional strategy for the implementation of SNA 1993; environmental statistics and indicators; poverty statistics indicators; and statistics on services.

Studies were undertaken on outside factors affecting the evolution of the region, and on potential economic growth trends for individual countries and the region as a whole. National macroeconomic projections were updated and the regional economy monitored in the context of Project Link, which coordinated world economic projections.

Transnational corporations

During 1996, the ECLAC/UNCTAD Joint Unit on Transnational Corporations carried out activities involving information dissemination and research. Activities in the field of information continued, with the collaboration of the national competent bodies and correspondents' network that regularly interacted with the Unit, to update the electronic database Directorio sobre inversión extranjera directa en América Latina y el Caribe: marco legal e información estadística.

Research activities of the Joint Unit focused on the role of transnational corporations with respect to industrial restructuring and international competitiveness; economic and institutional reforms and real investments processes in ECLAC countries by leading enterprises (national and transnational); and sectoral studies, including research on specific sectoral activities. A comparative study was prepared on the legal framework of the hydrocarbon sector and its contracting modalities, in order to identify the sectoral reforms introduced in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Ecuador, Mexico, Peru and Venezuela.

Technical cooperation and assistance

During the year, the ECLAC Programme Planning and Operations Division completed 11 regional, 3 subregional and 8 country projects financed from extrabudgetary funds. It launched 32 new projects, 8 of which were regional and 3 subregional. New regional and subregional projects focused on institutional strengthening of the integration process, development of geothermal energy, improving quality in human resources training, international trade and financial policy-making.

Country projects dealt with: in Argentina, support for small and medium-sized enterprises, industrial policy-making, local development, strengthening statistical systems and assessing social programme impact; in Brazil, technical assistance in the social policy and pension fund system, incorporating environmental variables into public-sector lending and promoting human resources development; in Cuba, economic information gathering; in Chile, institution-building in the national investment system and the national plan for the prevention and control of drug abuse, and productive use of natural resources; in Colombia, sectoral technological development and academic curricula development; in El Salvador, institutional strengthening of its Vice-Presidency; in Suriname, support in poverty alleviation policy-making; and in Uruguay, social policy-making.

In April, the Commission reviewed ECLAC activities to promote and support technical cooperation among developing countries (TCDC). In its resolution on the subject [res. 560(XXVI)], the Commission reaffirmed the importance of technical cooperation among countries in the region. It requested the Executive Secretary to: intensify activities to support and promote TCDC; strengthen links between ECLAC and national focal points for TCDC, through the creation of a data bank on national supply and demand for technical cooperation and information dissemination; support regional cooperation networks and systems and create and strengthen systems for data collection and analysis, especially in economic and social sectors of developmental priority to Governments; cooperate with the UNDP Special Unit for TCDC and support its activities to promote small and medium-sized enterprises; intensify activities to incorporate forms of TCDC into various areas of the secretariat's work programme and broaden the dissemination of such activities among national focal points; support mechanisms for coordination among bodies and organizations engaged in TCDC projects; cooperate with the Permanent Secretariat of the Latin American Economic System (SELA) in organizing joint activities with national focal points; and intensify activities with other regional commission secretariats to promote TCDC among countries in the various developing regions.

The ECLAC Sessional Committee on Cooperation among Developing Countries and Regions, in charge of reviewing ECLAC system activities in that area, met on 19 April to consider new guidelines for TCDC adopted by the UN system, aimed at achieving a closer link between TCDC activities and social and economic development priorities of member countries.

ECLAC continued working on the incorporation of TCDC components in the execution of technical cooperation projects supported by extrabudgetary contributions, through activities and outputs related to the promotion of exchange of experiences and practical results at the country level. It provided technical support to the annual meetings of the National Directors of International Cooperation of the countries of the region, organized with UNDP, within the institutional framework of the Permanent Secretariat of SELA, the regional focal point for TCDC. At SELA's twelfth annual meeting (Mexico City, May), ECLAC was requested to prepare and promote a project to strengthen the modernization of the national focal points for TCDC in the area of computerized information networks. To that end, ECLAC obtained financial support from UNDP's Special Unit for TCDC to implement a project to support the national agencies concerned to access the Internet network, develop their institutional home pages, and maintain adequately information provided on technical cooperation. ECLAC published, in English and Spanish, the bulletin Cooperation and Development.

Caribbean

The ECLAC subregional headquarters for the Caribbean, located in Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago, continued to analyse socio-economic development in the subregion and to support activities of subregional bodies.

Special emphasis was placed on the promotion of cooperation in functional and sectoral areas, both among Caribbean Development and Cooperation Committee (CDCC) members and associate members, and between them and the countries of Latin America. The secretariat continued its work with the Special Subcommittee on the Free Trade Area of the Americas to consider issues affecting the smaller economies of the Caribbean, as well as with the secretariat of the Association of Caribbean States.

High priority was given to the social aspects of development, especially monitoring the implementation of the 1995 World Summit for Social Development Programme of Action [YUN 1995, p. 1115]. To that end, the Caribbean Ministerial Meeting on Poverty Eradication was held, with support from eleven regional, international and UN agencies. The meeting developed a Directional Plan of Action for Poverty Eradication in the Caribbean, which identified issues and actions for combating poverty in the region. The subregional headquarters also carried out follow-up activities with regard to global conferences organized in 1994 and 1995 under UN auspices.

In 1996, ECLAC activities in the Caribbean were reviewed at the eighth meeting of the Caribbean Council for Science and Technology (CCST) Monitoring Committee (21-22 March), at the sixteenth session of CDCC at the technical level (31 October) and at the fourteenth plenary session of CCST (16-18 December). With respect to data gathering, the secretariat convened a subregional meeting on improving the data supply modality in the Caribbean.

Various reports were produced reviewing the economic, trade and financial performance of CDCC member countries. Newsletters were published, providing current information on trade, finance and development strategies. Studies were prepared on issues relating to economic and social development, sustainable economic development, public-sector reform, structural adjustment and privatization policies in the subregion. Technical support was offered to member Governments and regional and subregional institutions for carrying out research on issues related to environmentally sustainable development programmes.

A major aspect of the population programme was the convening of a subregional workshop to improve techniques used in census data analysis. The secretariat continued to provide technical assistance to member countries for the formulation of national population policies and the analysis of census data and population projections.

The ECLAC secretariat continued to update its in-house capacity to respond to the increased demand for information from member countries in its move to the information super-highway. As a result, it was putting into place mechanisms to ensure that new information technology was made available to users through the secretariat's Electronic Information Exchange System and various in-house databases. The coverage of the Office's database continued to be amplified in terms of countries and subject matter, particularly with the establishment of new databases on intra-CDCC trade, social statistics and environmental data.

Mexico and Central America

The activities of the ECLAC subregional headquarters in Mexico City concentrated on an analysis of regional and hemispheric integration; social security and development systems reform; non-traditional agricultural exports promotion and competitiveness; food security and agricultural trade liberalization; industry transformation; and electric integration and hydrocarbons. In 1996, besides regular publications, such as the economic surveys of the subregion's 10 countries, the Historical Macroeconomic Statistical Series was published.

Special attention was given to technical cooperation activities in a wide-ranging number of areas, including for the Guatemalan peace process. Important activities were carried out with extrabudgetary resources, such as the Programme in Support of the Strengthening and Rationalization of the Institutions for the Central American Integration and the Detailed Study of the Recent Evolution of the Cuban Economy. In the area of economic development, special attention was given to evaluating the economic impact of natural disasters, and to the impact of fiscal reform in different countries.

Training activities included the second course on Central American integration, jointly organized with SELA, and workshops on the use of the software Competitiveness Analysis of Nations, the Module for United States Import Consultations, and Modules for the Analysis of Growth of International Commerce.

Programme and organizational questions

The Commission [res. 559(XXVI)] approved the draft programme of work of the ECLAC system, including ILPES and CELADE, for 1998-1999 [LC/G.1901(SES.26/6)]. Activities were proposed under seven subprogrammes. It decided that the ad hoc open-ended working group, to be established by virtue of its resolution on the impact of UN reform on ECLAC (see below) should set priorities for the draft programme of work for 1998-1999. The Commission also approved the calendar of ECLAC conferences for 1996-1998 [res. 557(XXVI)].

Venue of the twenty-seventh session of ECLAC

On 18 July, the Economic and Social Council, acting on ECLAC's recommendation [res. 562(XXVI)], decided that the Commission's twenty-seventh session would be held in 1998 in Oranjestad, Aruba (decision 1996/235).

Impact of UN reform

The Commission considered a 26 January note by the ECLAC secretariat [LC/G.1899(SES.26/4)] on the reform of the United Nations and its impact on ECLAC. The note discussed the process of reforming the United Nations, central issues in the debate and their impact on the regional commissions, and reform of the United Nations and ECLAC and issues which it raised for ECLAC. Among its conclusions were that ECLAC, as a regional UN organ, should, as its mission, contribute to the development of Latin America and the Caribbean, collaborating interactively with member Governments in the comprehensive analysis of development processes and in the resulting provision of operational services. It should focus its analytical work on the design of public policies and facilitate the implementation of such policies, concentrating operational services in specialized information, advisory assistance, and training and support for regional and international cooperation. It should avoid duplicating the work of other multilateral and non-governmental organizations and take advantage of alliances with other institutions and NGOs through joint activities and cooperative agreements with the Organization of American States, IDB and SELA, and through partnerships with counterparts within and outside the region. Special efforts should be made to strengthen links with the regional activities of other UN units, agencies and programmes. There was no reason to change the intergovernmental structure of ECLAC, given its simplicity and effectiveness. The ECLAC secretariat should expand its institutional development and management efforts in strategic planning, improve the organizational climate, establish a system of responsibility and accountability, undertake staff training and development, and expand the electronic data network.

The Commission [res. 553(XXVI)] declared that ECLAC should function as a centre of excellence, charged with collaborating with member States in a comprehensive analysis of development processes geared to the design, monitoring and evaluation of public policies and the resulting provision of operational services in specialized information, advisory services, training and support for regional and international cooperation and coordination. It would need to adapt to the evolving development priorities of Latin America and the Caribbean, within the framework of the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations. The Commission recommended that the institutional structure and pattern of conferences of the ECLAC system, including the practice of holding biennial sessions of the main forum, should continue to serve as the foundation for maintaining the simplicity, effectiveness and flexibility of the Commission. ECLAC should improve its performance, productivity, impact, efficiency and effectiveness, taking into account ongoing processes pertaining to the United Nations as a whole. It instructed the Executive Secretary to strengthen institutional development and management upgrading activities; improve indicators for evaluating the Commission's activities in terms of performance, productivity and impact; intensify consultations and strengthen cooperation with other UN organs, agencies and programmes, particularly UNDP and UNFPA; and strengthen cooperation and coordination with other multilateral organizations and other Latin American and Caribbean institutions pursuing similar objectives in the region.

The Commission established an ad hoc working group to define priorities for the work programme and recommend to the Commission strategic directions for its future activities, taking into account the development priorities of the region and budgetary considerations. The first meeting of the working group was to be held within 90 days, at ECLAC headquarters. The working group would provide a report through the Executive Secretary to the resumed substantive session of the Economic and Social Council, for consideration by the 1996 session of the General Assembly; proposals on priorities for the 1998-1999 work programme were to be made to the Assembly in 1997. The group would submit a final report on the review of priorities for the programme of work of ECLAC to the 1998 session of the Commission.

Pursuant to that resolution, the ad hoc working group met at ECLAC headquarters in Santiago, Chile, from 29 to 31 July, and approved a number of adjustments in the priorities for the execution of the 1998-1999 work programme of the ECLAC system. The discussions highlighted the difficulty of structuring a work programme which fully reflected the desires and objectives of each member country. A number of dilemmas surfaced, including: finding the dividing line between a concentration on high-impact activities and the necessity of forming an institutional view regarding the wide spectrum of major development issues confronting the region; maintaining a certain balance between the allocation of resources to each subprogramme and the possibility of concentrating on a smaller number of subprogrammes; striking an adequate balance between analytical and operational activities; distributing activities between Commission headquarters in Santiago and its subregional headquarters; and linking budgetary with extrabudgetary funding.

On 25 October, a meeting of delegates from the Permanent Missions of ECLAC member States to the United Nations in New York took place to examine the final report of the Santiago meeting.

Western Asia

The Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia (ESCWA) did not meet in 1996, nor did its Technical Committee. In 1994, the Economic and Social Council [ESC res. 1994/26] had instructed the Commission, beginning in 1995, to hold its sessions in odd years, to coincide with the General Assembly's consideration of the programme budget and with the monitoring of progress achieved in the Secretariat's work programmes. In addition, the Council decided that meetings of the ESCWA Technical Committee would be linked with the Commission's sessions and would meet shortly before each Commission session.

Economic and social trends

Economic trends

The overall economic performance in Western Asia improved significantly in 1996, as stated in a summary of economic and social developments in the ESCWA region for the year [E/1997/45]. The region's GDP, excluding that of Iraq, was estimated to have registered a 4.8 per cent growth rate in 1996, compared to 2.2 per cent in 1995. Major factors contributing to the acceleration of economic growth and development included the significant rise in oil revenues and a widening of economic reforms. At the same time, growth was hindered by the unstable political situation resulting from the impasse in the Middle East peace process (see PART ONE, Chapter VI), Israeli attacks on Lebanon, the closure of the borders of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, and continued UN economic sanctions against Iraq (see PART ONE, Chapter IV).

The GDP of Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) countries (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates) registered an estimated 4.9 per cent growth rate in 1996, compared with 1.1 per cent in 1995, mainly due to growth in the oil sector. The Council's per capita GDP was estimated to have increased by 1.8 per cent in real terms, after declining by 2.1 per cent in 1995. Estimates indicated that Bahrain's GDP increased by 3.8 per cent in 1996, compared to 2.2 per cent in 1995; Kuwait's by 5.2 per cent, compared to 3.9 per cent; Oman's by 5.2 per cent, compared to 4.5 per cent; and Qatar's by 3.2 per cent compared to 1.4 per cent in 1995. Saudi Arabia's economy, which accounted for more than 40 per cent of the ESCWA region's GDP and some 58 per cent of combined GDP in GCC countries, after being basically stagnant in 1995, grew by an estimated 5 per cent during the year. Also performing well was the United Arab Emirates, with ESCWA estimates putting the GDP growth rate at 5 per cent for 1996, compared with 2.2 per cent for 1995.

The region's more diversified economies—Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, the Syrian Arab Republic, Yemen and the West Bank and Gaza Strip—performed well in 1996, with the exception of Iraq, with an estimated combined GDP growth rate of 4.7 per cent. Egypt's growth rate reached 4.9 per cent in 1996, up from 4.6 per cent in the previous year, and GDP in the Syrian Arab Republic was estimated to have registered a growth rate of 5.9 per cent, compared with 3.6 per cent in 1995. Other countries saw declines. In Iraq, economic conditions continued to deteriorate to the extent that the country was ranked in the lowest group of least developed countries in the world. Lebanon's GDP, which grew by 7 per cent in 1995, was estimated to have registered a growth rate of 3 per cent in 1996. In Yemen—the region's least developed country—the economy was estimated to have grown by 3 per cent, after having registered a GDP growth rate of 8.5 per cent in 1995. The combined GDP of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip grew in 1995 by 3.5 per cent, but was estimated to have declined by 5 per cent in 1996.

Inflation rates in most ESCWA countries were at internationally acceptable levels during the year. In the GCC countries, inflation rates continued to be restrained, ranging from 4 per cent in the United Arab Emirates to only 1.2 per cent in Saudi Arabia. All GCC currencies, with the exception of Kuwait, were pegged to the United States dollar, the appreciation of which helped to further dampen inflation rates in those countries. Among the more diversified economies, however, inflation rates tended to be considerably higher. That of Yemen, estimated at 30 per cent for the year, was however considerably below previous rates of 120 per cent and 55 per cent, registered in 1994 and 1995, respectively. In the Syrian Arab Republic, estimates indicated that the inflation rate had increased in 1996, compared with 1995, from 18.5 per cent to 20 per cent, due to the high liquidity in the banking system and the devaluation of the Syrian pound for several imported items. In the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the inflation rate declined from 25 per cent to 12 per cent between 1995 and 1996, a result of the sharp decline in the purchasing power of the Palestinian people due to high unemployment rates and a general decline in the level of economic activities. In Lebanon, the inflation rate during the year declined to an estimated 8.9 per cent, from 14 per cent in 1995, reflecting more conservative money policies and a decline in the growth of economic activities. Estimates showed that the lower inflation rate in Egypt, 7.2 per cent in 1996 compared with 15.7 per cent in the preceding year, was attributable to a decline in the budget deficit as a percentage of GDP, and government use of treasury bills to finance its budget deficits instead of increasing the money supply. Jordan saw an estimated inflation rate in 1996 of 6 per cent, an increase compared with 2.3 per cent in 1995, mostly due to a reduction in the level of governmental subsidies of wheat, fodder, water and electricity.

Economic reforms continued in most countries in the region, but the process tended to lose momentum in some GCC countries, mainly because of the unexpectedly large oil revenue windfall. Reforms continued to be implemented in most of the region's more diversified economies, particularly Egypt and Jordan, with privatization accelerating notably in the former.

Despite reported growth in real GDP, high unemployment rates remained a major problem facing ESCWA members, especially the more diversified economies. The highest unemployment rate in the region was recorded in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, affecting 28 per cent of the labour force. In Yemen, the rate of unemployment in 1996 was estimated at 25 per cent, compared with 30 per cent in 1995. In Egypt and Jordan, estimates showed a relatively high unemployment rate of some 13 per cent. Some GCC countries suffered from unemployment among their indigenous populations.

The tight banking conditions that characterized the banking markets eased significantly in 1996 as a result of the upturn in economic activity and reforms in the financial sector. In addition, most stock markets in the region performed better in 1996 than many emerging markets in other developing regions.

Total external debt of ESCWA countries, excluding Iraq, was estimated to have declined by some 4 per cent, from $182 billion in 1995 to $175 billion in 1996. That drop was caused partly by re-scheduling and forgiveness of parts of the debt of a number of countries, including Egypt, Jordan and Yemen, and partly by repayment of debt by others, such as Kuwait, which late in the year paid a final instalment of $786 million. On the other hand, the external debt of some countries increased, notably that of Qatar which reached $8.1 billion in 1996, up by 42 per cent over 1995, when it was $5.7 billion. Lebanon's external debt increased by 38 per cent, from $1.28 billion to $1.77 billion.

Oil

The region's oil revenues in 1996 were the highest recorded in more than a decade, estimated at $96.5 billion, an increase of 20.4 per cent over the previous year, despite the fact that oil production remained unchanged at the 1995 level of 16 million barrels per day. The average price per barrel of oil increased by 20.3 per cent, from $16.86 per barrel in 1995 to $20.29 in 1996.

More than 93 per cent of the increase in oil revenues accrued to GCC countries, which included some of the world's major oil-exporting countries, namely, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates. Excluding Jordan, Lebanon, and the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which exported no oil, all ESCWA members exported oil in varying degrees.

In GCC countries, despite diversification efforts, the oil sector represented some 35 to 40 per cent of combined GDP. Oil revenues accounted for as much as 80 per cent of government revenues, and for more than 85 per cent of exports in those countries. Bahrain's economy was stimulated by an estimated 44.7 per cent increase in its oil revenues. The United Arab Emirates' oil revenues increased from $12.8 billion in 1995 to some $15.3 billion in 1996. A 13.5 per cent rise in Qatar's oil production resulted in a 34.3 per cent increase in its 1996 oil revenues. Saudi Arabia's economy benefited from a 19.3 per cent increase in oil revenues, with Kuwait following closely, with an estimated 19.1 per cent rise. The Syrian Arab Republic, one of the more diversified economies, benefited from a 21 per cent increase in its oil revenues.

Trade

Regional exports and imports benefited from the significant rise in oil prices, from the overall economic growth and from the increase in non-oil exports. Exports expanded by 15 per cent, while imports increased by 9 per cent. The region's export/import ratio, a measure of its ability to finance imports from export proceeds, rose from 1.23 in 1995 to 1.3 in 1996; it grew from 1.6 to 1.74 in the GCC countries, but decreased from 0.47 to 0.44 in the more diversified economies.

The GCC countries' exports, estimated at $117.4 billion and accounting for 89 per cent of the region's total exports, increased by 16 per cent, mainly because of higher oil prices. The largest percentage increases in exports were recorded by Kuwait (19 per cent), Saudi Arabia (18.8 per cent) and the United Arab Emirates (14.9 per cent); both Oman and Qatar noted 10 per cent increases. Kuwait's oil exports increased from $10.2 billion in 1995 to some $12.1 billion in 1996. Saudi Arabia also benefited from greater exports of petrochemicals and non-oil exports. The United Arab Emirates saw continued export growth in the non-oil sector, particularly in re-exports and in exports to South-East Asia. Bahrain's 5 per cent export increase was due to growth in aluminium exports and to Saudi Arabia's decision to transfer to Bahrain all the revenues of an oilfield which had been shared by both countries. The more diversified economies recorded an export increase of some 5.6 per cent; their exports were mainly oil and raw materials. Some benefited somewhat from higher oil prices, but others saw declines in non-oil exports. Their total exports grew from $14.2 billion in 1995 to $15 billion in 1996. The largest percentage increase was recorded by Lebanon (20 per cent), followed by the Syrian Arab Republic (16.9 per cent). Yemen's exports grew by 8.5 per cent and Jordan's by 7.4 per cent. However, Egypt saw a 6 per cent decrease, as non-oil exports, particularly textiles, declined. Severe restrictions placed by the Israelis on the West Bank and Gaza Strip led to a 20 per cent export drop there.

The region's imports grew from $93.3 billion in 1995 to $101.8 billion in 1996. Imports by the GCC countries totalled $67.5 billion, or 66 per cent of the region's total imports. Imports increased in all GCC countries, ranging from Qatar's 3 per cent to Oman's 11 per cent. More diversified economies increased their exports by 14 per cent, from $30.2 billion to some $34.3 billion. Imports increased from Jordan's 8 per cent to Lebanon's 28 per cent. Egypt's imports increased by 10.1 per cent, the Syrian Arab Republic's by 14.7 per cent and Yemen's by 15.5 per cent.

The region's balance of trade recorded a $30.5 billion surplus, significantly higher than the $21.7 billion in 1995, mainly due to higher oil prices. The GCC countries saw their balance-of-trade surplus grow to $49.9 billion, but the more diversified economies saw deficits in their overall trade balance grow to $19.3 billion, significantly higher than the previous total of $16 billion.

The current-account deficit (excluding Iraq, the Syrian Arab Republic, the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and Yemen, where data were not available) decreased significantly, from $8.7 billion in 1995 to $1.4 billion in 1996, mainly due to higher oil exports. The GCC countries recorded a total current-account surplus of $5.8 billion—a notable improvement over the $2.5 billion deficit in 1995. Saudi Arabia saw the most significant improvement, with a $900 million surplus following an $8.1 billion deficit in 1995. In the more diversified economies, the current-account deficit rose from $6.2 billion in 1995 to $7.2 billion in 1996, largely due to the increase in Egypt's deficit from $254 million to $1 billion, mainly because of lower exports in 1996. Lebanon saw its deficit increase from $5.4 billion to $5.9 billion, while Jordan saw a decrease, from $460 million to $270 million, mainly owing to the rise in workers' remittances.

The region's international reserves (excluding Iraq, the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and the Syrian Arab Republic owing to lack of data) increased by 6.3 per cent over 1995, from $51.2 billion to $54.4 billion. That was mainly the result of higher reserves in the more diversified economies. The reserves of the GCC countries remained unchanged at $23.4 billion, with Saudi Arabia ($8.5 billion) and the United Arab Emirates ($8 billion) as the largest holders. Reserves of the more diversified economies reached $30.9 billion in 1996, of which Egypt held $19 billion.

Social trends

The size of the population of Western Asia was relatively large, estimated at 147.7 million in 1995, comprising some 2.6 per cent of the total world population. Annual increase averaged 2.7 per cent, a rate considered quite high in comparison with other world regions. Although annual growth rates were expected to begin to decline to 2.1 per cent per year by 2010-2015, it was still a high rate by global standards. The region's population was projected to reach some 350 million by the year 2050.

The total fertility rate of the region was declining, with the average number of children per woman of childbearing age dropping from 6.8 to 5.2 between 1975 and 1995. However, fertility rates varied among member countries, ranging from a low of 3.1 children in Lebanon and Kuwait to a high of 7.6 children per woman in Yemen. Family planning was being increasingly pursued, through awareness campaigns and with the assistance of non-governmental organizations and specialized agencies.

Rural to urban migration continued at extremely high rates. UN estimates for mid-1990 placed the urban population of the region at 55 per cent of the total population. Urbanization was projected to rise to 59 per cent and 66 per cent by the years 2000 and 2015, respectively. Variations in rates of urbanization existed, with some GCC countries more than 90 per cent urbanized; Oman and Yemen were less than 35 per cent urbanized, and the rest fell between 44 and 88 per cent.

Educational progress in the region, despite significant strides, continued to lag behind that experienced in other social areas. Drop-out rates for both sexes were high. Female education and literacy, in particular, had been slow to improve. According to available data, in 1995 some 34 per cent of the female population in the region, aged 15 and above, were still illiterate. Female illiteracy rates ranged from some 76 per cent in Yemen to between 20 and 23 per cent in Jordan, Bahrain and the United Arab Emirates, and from 9 to 13 per cent in Lebanon, Kuwait and Qatar.

As to the status of women, their participation in public life, power-sharing, decision-making and politics fell below expectations. Except in GCC countries, women had gained the right to vote and run for public office. However, fewer than 3 per cent of the seats in the parliaments of 7 of the 13 ESCWA member States were occupied by women. The highest representation of women in those legislatures occurred in Iraq and in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with more than 10 per cent, followed by the Syrian Arab Republic, with over 8 per cent. The lowest representation was in the parliament of Yemen, with fewer than 1 per cent of its seats occupied by women.

The ESCWA region was beset by a number of environmental problems ranging from the increasing salinity of agricultural land to a deterioration of air and water quality in its major cities. Those problems were the result of economic development, increasing urbanization, development of coastal areas, the relative scarcity of water and arable land, an increased use of pesticides and fertilizers, persistent poverty and generally high population growth. Industrial pollution was caused by emissions from electric power generation facilities, cement factories and other industries, including steelworks, ironworks, refineries, and textile, brick and chemical factories. Problems arose in urban areas from traffic congestion and over-reliance on the automobile to meet urban transportation needs. The ESCWA members began to address environmental problems by establishing specific ministries and agencies, notably in Bahrain, Egypt, Jordan, Oman, Saudi Arabia, the Syrian Arab Republic and the United Arab Emirates. Other ESCWA countries addressed their environmental concerns through existing mechanisms and agencies.

Activities in 1996

During 1996, ESCWA activities, under the programme of work for the 1996-1997 biennium, focused on the management of natural resources and environment; improvement of the quality of life; economic development and cooperation; regional development and global changes; and special programmes and issues.

Economic development and cooperation

In 1996, the annual Survey of Economic and Social Developments in the ESCWA Region 1995 was issued. The Survey analysed the socio-economic developments in 1995 at country and regional levels and provided a forecast for 1996. In conjunction with the Survey, the Preliminary Overview of Economic Developments in the ESCWA Region in 1996 was produced for the first time. The issue of privatization was a major area of concern, as reflected in a series of studies, including the Survey of Economic and Social Developments in the ESCWA Region, Part Two: Privatization in the ESCWA Region. A review of the role of financial markets in privatization in the region was under way, and the subject was also addressed in the Assessment of Privatization of the Electric Power Sector in Selected ESCWA Member Countries, which included an overview and case studies of Egypt, Jordan and Yemen. As a culmination of its work in the development of micro-enterprises, ESCWA organized, in Beirut, a regional seminar on assessment of the role of business incubators in economic development.

In the area of industry, the Commission initiated efforts to enhance the upgrading of the industrial sector of the region—particularly small and medium-scale enterprises—and to further promote cooperation among institutions providing support services to the sector.

Regarding transport, ESCWA organized, in Cairo, an expert group meeting on standardization of border-crossing formalities and agreements for the transport of goods and passengers, with the aim of facilitating border crossing and transit traffic. A set of regional guidelines for transport agreements and conventions was prepared for publication. ESCWA cooperated with the Arab Security Studies and Training Centre, an affiliate of the League of Arab States, in conducting a training workshop on traffic regulations in major cities.

In the area of agriculture, the Commission continued to analyse policy issues, completing a study on the Evaluation of Agricultural Policies in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan (Policy Analysis Matrix Approach). ESCWA held a national training workshop on food and agricultural policy analysis to enhance the capability of Jordan's Ministry of Agriculture to employ various techniques in agricultural policy analysis. In addition, the Commission cooperated with the Arab Organization for Agricultural Development in conducting the Workshop on the Implications of the GATT Agreement for the Region.

As to statistics and information, ESCWA initiated a feasibility study for establishing an integrated statistical information system in the region. It continued to publish the Statistical Abstract of the ESCWA Region, the National Account Studies of the ESCWA Region, the External Trade Bulletin of the ESCWA Region and the Statistical Newsletter. In order to propagate international standards and norms in statistics, the Commission conducted a regional training workshop on PopMap and the Internet. A newly implemented project on the International Comparison Programme (ICP) in ESCWA member countries was undertaken jointly with the World Bank. A seminar on ICP discussed the results of ICP field surveys carried out in nine ESCWA member countries, and outlined steps for future implementation of ICP.

Quality of life

In the area of population, ESCWA joined the Population Information Network (POPIN) (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII), and, supported by the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA), extended assistance to population councils and committees in the Arab countries. In that context, training was provided to Arab population councils and committees at the first training workshop on computer software packages for population policies and sustainable development, and at a training workshop on population policies and sustainable development, health care, education and housing. In addition, the first meeting of the heads of national population councils and committees in the Arab world was held to discuss a draft final report prepared for an expert group meeting on population dynamics and sustainable development in the Arab world.

The issue of poverty was pivotal in the area of social development, with activities focusing on case studies that could provide inputs into a regional perspective on poverty eradication. ESCWA was also carrying out a project on developing and strengthening the Ministry of Social Affairs in Lebanon. Profiles of Iraq, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip had been prepared for publication. Regarding human development, with UNDP support and as executing agency for a regional project for strengthening national capabilities in sustainable human development in member States, ESCWA established national networks for sustainable human development in Bahrain, Iraq and Lebanon.

As to women and development, ESCWA updated its "Review and assessment of the progress achieved for the advancement of Arab women in the light of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies", including all information available in country reports and national plans of action prepared for the 1995 World Conference on Women [YUN 1995, p. 1169], held in Beijing. In line with Conference recommendations, ESCWA compiled gender-specific data to facilitate the monitoring of the implementation of the Beijing Platform for Action [YUN 1995, p. 1170] at the regional level. In addition, a database on policies related to advancement of Arab women was set up, covering Jordan and Lebanon. ESCWA, in cooperation with the Centre of Arab Women for Training and Research, completed the first phase of a gender statistics database that was used to prepare the publication Arab Women: Statistical Database.

In the area of human settlements, a database on human settlements policies was established, emphasizing housing and urbanization policies. Attention was given to Bedouin communities, a population group with special needs. In cooperation with the United Arab Emirates University in Al-Ain, ESCWA held a symposium on environmentally sustainable human settlements development in desert regions.

Natural resources and environment

The water resources situation was considered critical and constituted a priority issue for ESCWA members in 1996. Efforts aimed at assisting members in establishing mechanisms for cooperation in developing and managing water resources. An expert group meeting on water legislation in the ESCWA region represented an effort to harmonize water legislation among ESCWA member States and to identify possible mechanisms for the effective enforcement of such legislation. ESCWA carried out a study on Water Resources Assessments in the ESCWA Region Using Remote Sensing and GIS Techniques, and published jointly with the Governments of Jordan and the Syrian Arab Republic a study on the basalt aquifer system shared by those countries.

In the area of environment, ESCWA monitored regional developments in the implementation of Agenda 21, and contributed studies and reports to various environmental bodies, including UNEP and the Commission on Sustainable Development. ESCWA presented papers to such meetings as a regional workshop on water conservation and reuse, and the workshop on the role of industry in the development and rational use of water resources in the Arab region.

Regional development and global changes

ESCWA in 1996 was advising member States on negotiations for their accession to the World Trade Organization (WTO) (see PART SIX, Chapter XVIII), and researching the implications of WTO for their economies. The workshop on total quality management and standards of industrial products (ISO 9000), with special reference to the cement industry, provided industrialists with information regarding international standards for quality management. A study on trade policy aspects of environmental measures addressed the challenges that environmental concerns posed to trade expansion and stressed the need to observe environmental standards.

Special programmes and issues

ESCWA gave attention during the year to countries with special needs in the region, as well as to special issues, notably the implications of the Middle East peace process for various sectors. In that context, a profile of poverty in Gaza and the West Bank was prepared for publication. In addition, a study was made of the situation of Palestinian cities and villages and requirements for development, which attempted to determine the magnitude of the housing problem, to estimate housing needs until the year 2005, and to propose a strategy for housing.

Programme and organizational questions

Coordination

The Regional Inter-Agency Coordination Group in Amman represented a mechanism for coordinating system-wide activities at the regional level through the ESCWA secretariat. All regional commissions had such mechanisms.

The second meeting of the Coordination Group, held in January 1996, discussed events and meetings which had had or were expected to have an impact on UN activities in the region, follow-up of UN global conferences, the UN financial crisis, operational activities for development, and information-sharing and cost-efficiency within the UN system. An agreement was reached to strengthen regional inter-agency coordination. Participants discussed the possibility of forming task forces parallel to those of the Administrative Committee on Coordination on social services, employment and sustainable livelihood, and the creation of an enabling environment for social and economic development. Those task forces would report to regional coordination meetings, to be held at least twice yearly.

At the third meeting of the Coordination Group, held in June, the UNFPA Executive Director and the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization addressed the gathering, emphasizing the importance of UN inter-agency coordination.

The fourth meeting of the Coordination Group, held in September, stressed follow-up of UN global conferences and recent activities of ESCWA and UN specialized agencies in the region. The ESCWA Executive Secretary stated that the Commission intended to prepare a project proposal for a regional integrated programme of action for the follow-up of UN conferences; inputs from other UN agencies were invited. The project proposal was to be submitted to Coordination Group members for discussion. Once adopted, it was to be submitted to UNDP as a flagship project.

Permanent headquarters

In August, the ESCWA secretariat established two committees, entrusting them with technical and administrative responsibilities related to the permanent headquarters of the Commission in Beirut [E/ESCWA/19/7]. Efforts were being made by the Government of Lebanon to complete the building by 1 September 1997.

Earlier in the year, ESCWA and the Government of Iraq signed an agreement concerning the handover of the premises occupied by ESCWA in Baghdad.

Over the past 20 years, the ESCWA secretariat had been located, at different times, in three capitals—Beirut, Baghdad and Amman. It began its operations in 1974 in Beirut, which was to have been a temporary site for a five-year period. In 1976, because of the intensification of war there, ESCWA was forced to move its offices, temporarily, to Amman, where it remained for over a year. ESCWA returned to Beirut in 1977, remaining there until late 1981 when it began its move to Baghdad, where it remained until August 1990. It had been operating out of Amman since August 1991, in the wake of the Gulf war, again as a temporary measure. In May 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 753], ESCWA members voted to relocate Commission headquarters in Beirut.

Chapter VI

Natural resources and energy

The use and conservation of natural resources, particularly water and minerals, and the efficiency and development of energy were the focus of attention of a number of United Nations bodies in 1996. Concerns set out in "Agenda 21", adopted at the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, were taken into consideration. The Economic and Social Council at its mid-year session took action on a number of issues related to water resources, minerals and energy, based on the work of two of its subsidiary bodies.

Water and mineral resources were dealt with by the Committee on Natural Resources at its third session in May. The Committee was informed that the world was facing a severe water crisis and, within three decades, more than 3 billion people could be plagued by water stress or scarcity. Preparations for a comprehensive assessment of the world's freshwater resources continued, and the need for an international code of water ethics was emphasized. The Committee recommended the establishment of a commission on mining and materials to consider how best to use new technology and methodologies to achieve sustainable use of resources, and the creation of a global geochemical database and of a global knowledge base on mineral resource potential. Appropriate arrangements to formalize small-scale mining were also called for.

The Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development, at its second session in February, emphasized energy management, stressing the promotion of energy efficiency and conservation. Among its recommendations were those urging the launching of a global initiative to expand decentralized rural electrification programmes in developing countries and accelerated research into all promising approaches to energy and materials efficiency. The energy potential of biomass resources—plant materials and animal wastes used as fuel sources—was reviewed.

The report of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) was presented in October by its Director General to the General Assembly, which took note of it and affirmed its confidence in the role of the Agency in the application of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes.

Natural resources

The Committee on Natural Resources held its third session in New York from 6 to 16 May [E/1996/31]. The Economic and Social Council established the dates of the session by decision 1996/207 of 9 February.

The Committee had two working groups, one on water resources and the other on mineral resources, which discussed activities of the UN system in their respective areas, as well as inter-agency coordination with an emphasis on progress made towards achieving sustainable development. Progress on water-related issues, averting the freshwater crisis and future water resources management issues were discussed by one working group. The other dealt with inflow of funds and new technologies in the mineral sector of developing countries and economies in transition, mineral resource assessment and the role of the UN system, small-scale mining, environmental issues arising from mineral industry activities, and integrating the issue of the sustainable supply of minerals into the UN processes for addressing Agenda 21, adopted by the UN Conference on Environment and Development in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 672].

The Committee forwarded four draft texts for action by the Council on: the integration of key minerals issues into the implementation of Agenda 21; integrated water resources development and management; the report of the Committee's current session and the provisional agenda and documentation for its fourth (1998) session; and the duration of the Committee's future sessions.

The Committee also adopted seven resolutions on: activities of the UN system in the field of water and mineral resources, and inter-agency cooperation; environmental protection and restoration issues arising from mineral industry activities; issues related to the social and economic impacts of the mining sector, especially in developing countries and economies in transition; authoritative technological assessment of progress towards sustainable extraction and utilization of minerals; a global land-monitoring programme; a global knowledge base on mineral resource potential; and reports in the field of water resources.

Organizational matters

By decision 1996/306 of 25 July, the Council, taking note of the Committee's report on its third session, approved the provisional agenda and documentation for the Committee's 1998 session.

On the same date, the Council, by decision 1996/307, decided that the duration of the Committee's future sessions should be eight working days, beginning in 1998.

On 13 November, the Council, by decision 1996/310, decided that the coordination segment of its 1997 substantive session should be devoted to, among other things, consideration of freshwater, including clean and safe water supply and sanitation.

ACC action. The Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) Subcommittee on Water Resources (Paris, 9-11 October) [ACC/1996/19] discussed matters arising from the 1996 session of the Committee on Natural Resources, namely three documents on water-related issues which were to be prepared for the Committee's 1998 session.

Water resources

Development and management

In a May inter-session strategy paper [E/C.7/1996/6 & Corr.1] on future water resources management issues and appropriate strategies and policies, the Committee on Natural Resources stated that the world was facing a severe water crisis and that by the year 2025 some 52 countries with a total population of more than 3 billion would be plagued by water stress or chronic water scarcity. If not averted, the crisis would have severe repercussions on human health, global food supply and nutrition, the eradication of poverty, human dignity and quality of life, and environmental security and peace, as well as ecosystem health and biodiversity. The crisis was viewed as fourfold: the water quantity crisis; the water quality crisis; the urban scale and water-supply crisis; and the land fertility degradation crisis. The strategy paper reviewed the impact of the water crisis on key societal issues such as the drinking-water supply and health of future generations, the food security of the world population, the health of aquatic ecosystems, biodiversity, societal production and the eradication of poverty.

Strategies for sustainable land/water management included avoiding the over-exploitation of groundwater; protecting passing water from quality deterioration from waste-producing land use; minimizing land fertility degradation; paying proper attention to land/water linkages; balancing between conflicting objectives; and ensuring an integrated approach at the level of river basin or drainage basin.

The paper suggested actions to create an enabling environment to initiate the necessary cooperation and preparedness of all sectors and actors. Management tools to avoid the current undermining of human life-support systems included legislation consistent with the laws of nature; hierarchical administrative systems that allowed an intersectoral approach and dialogue; and education at all levels of society. Governments were urged to: develop legislation and regulations that made regional planning possible; define national objectives and targets to secure development within the constraints of prevailing environmental conditions and vulnerability; and secure legislation for waste minimization, together with enforcing rules and regulations. Concerning a river basin-oriented action plan, the paper proposed one that covered: a clear set of objectives to be developed within a well-defined time period; the physical, socio-economic, environmental and institutional systems influencing objectives; the disciplines involved in formulating the action required, its implementation and its progress monitoring; an inventory of relevant factors in the existing situation as starting and reference points; indicators to monitor progress; and a description of actions and appointment of those responsible for implementation.

The paper outlined the roles of Governments and the United Nations to implement the above strategies and stressed the need for an international code of water ethics.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/50.

Integrated water resources development and management

The Economic and Social Council, Recalling General Assembly resolution 32/158 of 19 December 1977, in which the Assembly approved the Mar del Plata Action Plan,

Recalling also the recommendations related to water resources contained in Agenda 21, which was adopted by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, and the decisions concerning water resources taken by the Commission on Sustainable Development at its second session, in 1994,

Recalling further General Assembly resolution 50/126 of 20 December 1995 concerning water supply and sanitation,

Bearing in mind the outcome of the Intergovernmental Conference to Adopt a Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities, which was held in Washington from 23 October to 3 November 1995,

1. Notes the work being undertaken on the comprehensive assessment of the freshwater resources of the world;

2. Takes note with appreciation of the inter-sessional strategy paper of the Committee on Natural Resources entitled "Averting the multi-cause water crises ahead: key coping strategies", which contains an analysis of pressing issues with worldwide implications in the field of water resources;

3. Reaffirms the concept of water as a scarce and vulnerable resource needed for the integrated development and management of land and water resources in the framework of the national planning process, including its linkages to economic and social objectives, land and ocean resources;

4. Recommends that Governments consider adopting measures designed to improve the efficient use of water resources in the context of sustainable production and consumption patterns and the growing importance of world trade;

5. Also recommends that Governments take urgent action, as appropriate, according to their national policies and priorities, on the formulation and implementation of policies for the management of water resources in large cities and towns; the water resources requirements for food production relative to other needs; accelerating significantly the rate of progress in the provision of water supply and sanitation, particularly for the urban and rural poor; the control of pollution from land-based sources, sewage and effluents; and the protection of groundwater from overutilization and pollution;

6. Further recommends that Governments, in accordance with their national policies and priorities and with the aid of the international community, take appropriate measures for enhancing national and regional self-sufficiency and capacities for, inter alia, the operation, maintenance and financing of water resources projects, and take measures to enhance their institutional, legal and technical capabilities in the area of water resources, including the strengthening and, where necessary, the establishment of regional organizations;

7. Recommends that Governments consider, with the support of the organizations of the United Nations system, other multilateral and bilateral organizations and non-governmental organizations, the possibility of establishing pilot projects on water resources development and management, inter alia, on river basins and in areas that are deemed to be suffering from serious water-related stresses with a view to developing and implementing policies designed to avert water crises;

8. Urges the organizations of the United Nations system, international financing organizations, other multilateral and bilateral organizations and non-governmental organizations and the international community at large to give priority attention, as appropriate, to providing Governments with technical and financial support in their efforts to deal with such problems;

9. Invites the organizations of the United Nations system to consider the findings and recommendations contained in the Committee on Natural Resources strategy paper mentioned in paragraph 2 above, in particular with regard to the ongoing preparation of a comprehensive assessment of the freshwater resources of the world, and invites them to give wide dissemination to that paper.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/50

25 July 1996

Meeting 50

Adopted without vote

Draft by Vice-President (E/1996/L.29), based on informal consultations on draft by Committee on Natural Resources (E/1996/31); agenda item 6 (d).

Freshwater resources

In an April report [E/C.7/1996/4] on the state of the world's freshwater resources, the Secretary-General assessed the scope and spatial distribution of water scarcities worldwide and their possible consequences for economic development. He also elucidated some possible global consequences of such scarcities.

In the report, countries were classified as either water-surplus, water-vulnerable, water-stressed or water-scarce, based on annual per capita availability of freshwater resources in cubic metres and annual withdrawals as a percentage of that availability. Based on data from the UN Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development, an available sample included 98.83 per cent of the total world population. Globally, 1.93 billion people (34.2 per cent of the world population sampled) lived in water-surplus countries; 1.91 billion (33.7 per cent) in water-vulnerable countries; 1.5 billion (26 per cent) in water-stressed countries; and 362.4 million (6 per cent) in water-scarce countries. The people living in water-scarce, water-stressed and water-vulnerable countries amounted to 65.8 per cent of the world population.

As to the economic implications of the situation, some 60 per cent of the world population belonged to the low-income category, and about 76 per cent to the low and low-medium income categories combined. The data also showed that 80 per cent of the population of water-stressed and water-scarce countries belonged to the low or low-medium income group, along with 70 per cent of the population of water-vulnerable countries. One third of the world population with low or low-medium incomes lived in water-stressed or water-scarce countries.

The situation had serious implications for patterns of economic growth and food security, and managing the problem of the increasing scarcity of water needed to combine concern for economic efficiency with concern for social equity. One approach might be to establish regimes to allow the gradual adjustment of prices that water users paid so as to more closely reflect the scarcity value, at least for withdrawals above the minimum needed by households for health. That would permit markets to reallocate water from agricultural and industrial uses with low value added per input of water to uses with high value added, such as those for speciality crops and industrial processes using relatively little water. In some cases, it might lead to countries approaching nearly complete economic specialization in non-agricultural production.

The Committee on Natural Resources also considered a report [E/C.7/1996/5] reviewing plans to avert the freshwater crisis. The report recalled that the Committee in 1994 had noted with concern the slow pace of progress with regard to the implementation of the recommendations of the 1977 Mardel Plata Action Plan [YUN 1977, p. 555] and Agenda 21, and expressed alarm that some 80 countries, comprising 40 per cent of the world's population, were already suffering from serious water shortages, with scarcity of water resources in many cases being the limiting factor to economic and social development. Ever-increasing water pollution, it was also noted, had become a major problem throughout the world, including coastal zones.

In view of those considerations, the Committee had affirmed the importance of establishing a global implementation plan to avert the impending water crisis [YUN 1994, p. 919] incorporating principles for the effective management of land and water resources and guidelines and schedules based on Agenda 21. The Commission on Sustainable Development, meeting later in 1994, did not act on that recommendation, deciding instead to urge UN bodies, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) to strengthen efforts towards a comprehensive assessment of freshwater resources, with the aim of identifying the availability of such resources, projecting future needs, and identifying problems to be considered by the General Assembly at a special session to be held in 1997. Governments were invited to cooperate by providing technical inputs to the process.

Implementation of the assessment was being undertaken through a Steering Committee composed of UN organizations and the Stockholm Environment Institute, which was commissioned by the Government of Sweden to collaborate on its behalf in preparing the assessment. The UN system was represented by the Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development, the Department for Development Support and Management Services (DDSMS), the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the World Health Organization (WHO), the World Bank, the World Meteorological Organization (WMO) and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO). In addition to Sweden, financial and technical support was being provided by Canada, Denmark, the Netherlands and Norway.

The Steering Committee, which had held five meetings, was preparing a report for submission in 1997 to the Commission on Sustainable Development (see PART THREE, Chapter I) and to the General Assembly. The introductory section to the report would provide a rationale for the assessment; the second section would provide an assessment of the current situation concerning water availability and use; the third section would present scenarios to the year 2025 in order to investigate the likely effect of trends and policies in search of a sustainability path; and the final section would put forth a set of policy options for the long-term sustainable development and utilization of water resources.

The report would be supplemented by commissioned studies on the economic aspects of sustainable water resources development and use and gender issues, as well as studies on the relationship between water resources and growing urbanization and on cooperative approaches to the development of shared river basins.

In May, the Committee on Natural Resources asked [res. 3/7] the Secretary-General to prepare a report for its next session on follow-up to the comprehensive assessment of the world's freshwater resources, including methodological questions and problem areas.

Institutional and legal issues

The Committee on Natural Resources considered a March report [E/C.7/1996/3] of the Secretary-General on institutional and legal issues in water resources management.

The report reviewed the legal systems that allowed water marketing, and provided examples of regulations that were intended to cope with externalities and other concerns of a number of countries. The United States was considered in detail because it had the longest and best recorded experience in water marketing; its developments, findings, search for balance between public and private interests, and regulations were worth taking into account for the purpose of drafting legislation on the subject, the report stated. Chile and Peru were discussed in some detail because they embodied a laissez-faire philosophy on water management and their experience was also worth considering.

The following conclusions were provided to the Committee for its consideration: that water markets were a valid means of increasing the efficiency of water use and reallocation; that systems in which water markets did not exist provided evidence of structural rigidities that negatively affected the efficiency of water allocation, as well as the allocation of other resources; that areas with a strong tradition and experience in water marketing had established conditionalities to prevent monopolies and protect public and private interest; that such areas had relatively strong systems of water administration; that in areas in which public interest was lacking, there was no requirement of effective and beneficial use, and regulations and planning were disregarded and discouraged; that such areas were experiencing problems due to monopolies on water rights and related public services; and that water legislation should include water marketing principles, established within a balanced structure in which protected water rights were accommodated to the public interest.

Mineral resources

Sustainable supply of minerals

An April inter-sessional strategy paper [E/C.7/1996/11] of the Committee on Natural Resources discussed the sustainable supply of minerals in the context of Agenda 21.

The Committee had expressed concern that minerals issues, notably those connected with maintaining a sustainable supply of mineral resources, had received little attention in Agenda 21. It stressed that current emphasis should be on improving global management strategies for the optimal and most efficient supply and use of resources with minimum environmental impact.

The strategy paper examined population growth and increasing demand for materials and energy; the environmental impacts of minerals extraction and use and response strategies; monitoring of the mineral cycle; and monitoring the terrestrial ecosystem.

Concerning monitoring of the mineral cycle, the Committee recommended the establishment of a commission on mining and materials to assess and report on technological progress towards the sustainable use of resources through improved efficiency, new technologies, substitution and recycling. It proposed that the commission's mandate include the compilation of information on the total impacts of the use of various commodities as a basis for determining optimum consumption patterns, and a study of the technology of resource discovery and extraction, trends in the efficiency and cost of new mineral resources, and trends in recycling. The new body could also assist the United Nations in identifying opportunities in its capacity-building programmes for technology transfer to countries not members of the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD). The Committee suggested that the commission be placed within DDSMS or, alternatively, within the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD).

As to monitoring the terrestrial environment, the Committee recommended the implementation of a programme to produce a global geochemical database to contribute to objective and effective environmental and resource management. Estimates regarding full data acquisition were, at the minimum, about a decade old. Given the immediate relevance of such data to intensifying land-use problems, the Committee stated that the programme should be initiated without delay. The capacity to coordinate the activities for terrestrial monitoring appeared to lie principally in DDSMS and with the regional commissions.

In accordance with the above recommendations, it was recommended that a global knowledge base on mineral resource potential be developed and integrated with other land information, so that the horizon of sustainability could be extended and land-use planning could take into account national and global needs for mineral exploration and development.

In May, the Committee adopted a resolution [res. 3/4] recommending that various organizations, including UNEP, UNIDO and UNCTAD, which were developing independent initiatives regarding authoritative technological assessment of progress towards sustainable extraction and utilization of minerals, consult together and with governmental organizations and NGOs with a view to establishing a partnership to fulfil the proposed technological functions.

Also in May, the Committee adopted a resolution [res. 3/5] by which it endorsed the need to establish a global geochemical database, and recommended that FAO, WHO and UNEP consult together with a view to formulating a plan for co-operation with national agencies to develop the database.

Similarly, by a further resolution [res. 3/6], the Committee endorsed the need for a global knowledge base on mineral resource potential for integration with other land-use information as an essential part of an integrated approach to planning and managing natural resources. It recommended that the Secretariat, in consultation with FAO, the regional commissions and the international mining industry, consider the requirements of such a knowledge base and ways in which it might be achieved, including initiation through a regional pilot project.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/49.

Integration of key minerals issues into the implementation of Agenda 21

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling that Agenda 21 called for, inter alia, the identification of balanced patterns of consumption worldwide that the Earth could support in the long term,

Recalling also that, in Agenda 21 and the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development, it is stated that the major cause of the continued deterioration of the global environment is the unsustainable pattern of consumption and production, particularly in industrialized countries, which is a matter of grave concern, aggravating poverty and imbalances,

Noting that the policy implications of trends and projections in consumption and production patterns were evaluated in a report of the Secretary-General submitted to the Commission on Sustainable Development at its fourth session in 1996, and that the Commission endorsed the eco-efficiency approach and stressed the need for an appropriate balance between supply-side and demand-side approaches,

Noting also that in its inter-sessional strategy paper entitled "Towards the sustainable supply of minerals in the context of Agenda 21", the Committee on Natural Resources analysed the implications of those policy approaches for the minerals sector in terms of the capacity of the environment to absorb the physical and chemical impacts of minerals resource use, the sustainability of the supply of essentially non-renewable mineral resources, and the possibilities for modifying production and consumption patterns throughout the mineral cycle by introducing greater efficiency of minerals use, new technologies, recycling and substitution,

Recalling that those minerals issues impinge heavily on developing countries and economies in transition that seek to capture greater benefits from mineral development, and consequently recalling also the need to avoid undesirable impacts on those economies,

1. Brings to the attention of the Commission on Sustainable Development, the relevant United Nations bodies and the regional commissions the inter-sessional strategy paper of the Committee on Natural Resources entitled "Towards the sustainable supply of minerals in the context of Agenda 21";

2. Takes note, in principle, of the recommendations for concrete action contained in relevant resolutions of the Committee on Natural Resources, and recommends consideration of the means of their implementation, within existing resources, through the relevant priority programmes and by maximizing the opportunities for collaboration among interested parties.

Environmental degradation

In an April report [E/C.7/1996/10], the Secretary-General described major advances in the development and application of state-of-the-art technologies for minimizing environmental degradation caused by mining and processing mineral resources.

The Secretary-General concluded that the two key considerations guiding national policies to promote the development, transfer and diffusion of state-of-the-art technologies regarding mining were: striking a balance between economic growth and environmental protection and a shift from end-of-pipe pollution-abatement technologies to cleaner production processes. The shift to a preventive rather than reactive approach needed to be encouraged everywhere, but especially in countries with developing and transitional economies, he stated.

The report outlined current and future activities for UN technical assistance agencies, multi-lateral and bilateral development assistance agencies, Governments and the private sector.

In May, the Committee on Natural Resources, noting the Secretary-General's report, asked him to submit in 1998 a report on the development and application of state-of-the-art technologies for the utilization/reprocessing of mineral industry wastes, with the aim of reducing the ecological burden on the environment [res. 3/2].

Social and economic impacts of mining sector

The Committee on Natural Resources considered a March report [E/C.7/1996/8] of the Secretary-General providing an assessment of host country benefits accrued to date from the inflow of funds and technology for mineral development. He noted that in the past decade many developing countries and economies in transition had recognized that private-sector investment in mineral resources could contribute significantly to a country's economic base, and had shifted development strategies towards relying on the private sector to lead economic growth. Reforms were taking hold slowly. Perceptible improvements in business environments were noticeable, and the private sector was responding through increased direct investment in the minerals sector with a corresponding multiplier effect into the economy, with job creation, the development of local small and medium-sized enterprises, and capacity-building in physical, social and economic infrastructure. Noting that mineral resources were finite resources, the Secretary-General stated that policies and supportive frameworks being instituted must consider the long-term country goal of sustained economic growth and sustainable development. He stressed that devising and implementing mechanisms that supported the complementarity of roles between host Governments and investors were therefore paramount.

Small-scale mining

In an April report [E/C.7/1996/9], the Secretary-General reviewed employment estimates in small-scale mining and, using examples from Africa, Asia and Latin America, described the economic impact of small-scale mining on selected countries.

The number of people active worldwide in small-scale mining (small mechanized mining and artisanal mining) exceeded 6 million, which represented more than 20 per cent of those active in the industry as a whole.

The Secretary-General observed that small-scale and artisanal mining had seen a worldwide resurgence over the past 25 years. Serious efforts were needed in small-scale mining regulation and promotion, particularly to mitigate environmental damage, minimize social upheavals and curb smuggling. He stated that artisanal mining should be legalized and formalized to promote its growth. Confronting mining issues (technical, legal, financial, environmental) was necessary but not sufficient for solving the problems inherent in artisanal mining, since that type of mining might create immediate income but often did not create improved living conditions or social development. He recommended adopting an approach that expanded the way artisanal mining was viewed, from a sectoral mining issue to a multisectoral issue of socio-economic development. The multisectoral approach would include the involvement of community development sociologists, economists, legal experts and public health experts to generate multisectoral development initiatives. The Secretary-General concluded that small-scale mining should be viewed and approached from the broader view of socio-economic development and poverty eradication.

The Committee on Natural Resources, in May [res. 3/3], having considered the Secretary-General's report, urged Member States, with respect to small-scale mining, to put in place appropriate, people-centred, institutional and regulatory arrangements that would formalize those economic activities, and would allow interaction with and assistance from international financial institutions and multinational mining companies. It noted the negative social impacts on local communities that were sometimes associated with the privatization of State-owned mineral assets, and concluded that, as far as possible, Governments should devise innovative privatization plans. The Committee decided that the basic problem of improving the capacity of developing countries and economies in transition to capture the maximum sustainable economic and social benefits of their potential for mineral production should be the principal focus of its inter-sessional activities and of the agenda of its 1998 session, and asked the Secretary-General to prepare a discussion paper on the topic.

Technical cooperation

In a March report [E/C.7/1996/7], the Secretary-General assessed the technical cooperation activities of the UN system in the area of mineral resources since the submission of his previous report in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 918]. He presented an overview of those activities and discussed organizational changes in the Secretariat pertaining to mineral resources. He noted changes made by the UN system concerning mineral resources in response to Agenda 21, as well as progress made towards sustainable development. The Secretary-General discussed activities in other areas of mineral resources development, including mining legislation, investment promotion and privatization, and progress made towards achieving sustainable development in small-scale mining.

In his conclusions, the Secretary-General stated that, since the adoption of Agenda 21 in 1992, the UN system had increased its emphasis on environmentally sound mineral development policies and had adopted a cross-sectoral, multidisciplinary approach in coordinating and integrating technical cooperation activities.

The ability of the UN system to provide technical cooperation assistance and advisory services had been severely diminished owing to evolutions in the funding of technical cooperation activities, and current budgetary reductions and the financial situation of the Secretariat. At the same time, in addition to areas of mineral resources development such as investment promotion and mining legislation, there were new areas and issues that were opening up—including those related to mining and the community, mineral resources and social development, as well as small-scale mining and artisanal mining—providing areas to refocus on cross-sectoral, multidisciplinary activities and alternative approaches to mineral resources development. The Secretary-General noted that the Committee on Natural Resources might wish to consider those approaches.

Energy

New and renewable sources of energy

The Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development, established by the Economic and Social Council in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 658], at its second session (New York, 12-23 February) [E/1996/24] considered energy and sustainable development, including the development of energy resources in developing countries; renewable sources of energy, with special emphasis on progress made and the development of policies in biomass; progress and policies concerning the use of energy and materials; and energy and the protection of the atmosphere. It also reviewed medium-term planning and coordination in energy, and discussed follow-up to the results of its previous sessions.

On the recommendation of the Committee, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/44, on coordination of activities of UN organizations in the area of energy, and two decisions (see below). A draft resolution proposing a UN conference on energy for the twenty-first century was forwarded to the Council, but not acted upon.

The Committee considered a January report [E/C.13/1996/2] of the Secretary-General on the follow-up to its first (1994) [YUN 1994, p. 922] and special (1995) [YUN 1995, p. 1060] sessions. The special session had focused on rural energy.

On 26 July, the Council, by decision 1996/303, took note of recommendations made by the Committee, and invited States, UN entities and other international organizations and NGOs to consider them. The recommendations dealt with: the need to accelerate research into and development of all promising approaches to energy and materials efficiency and renewable energy development; the need to adopt a proactive approach towards removing the barriers that hampered renewable energy development; the launching of a global initiative to fund an expansion and acceleration of decentralized rural electrification programmes in developing countries; regional initiatives to resolve issues related to the use and development of energy resources; a systematic database on UN programmes and activities in the area of energy; and the availability of Committee reports to the Commission on Sustainable Development, the UN Centre for Human Settlements and the Conference of the Parties to the 1992 United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change.

On the same date, the Council, by decision 1996/304, took note of the Committee's report and approved the provisional agenda and documentation for its third (1998) session.

Energy trends in developing countries

The Committee had before it a January report [E/C.13/1996/3] of the Secretary-General updating the 1994 review [YUN 1994, p. 922] of energy exploration and development trends in developing countries.

The Secretary-General noted that world energy demand had risen in 1994, up by almost 1 per cent over the previous year, after three years of static energy consumption, once demand in non-OECD Europe had started to decline. The total global primary energy demand in 1994 was about 7,923.8 million tons of oil equivalent (about 158 million barrels of oil equivalent per day). Oil remained the world's most important commercial fuel, accounting for almost 40 per cent of the energy market. Global oil demand in 1994 increased by 1.7 per cent, and if non-OECD Europe was excluded it was up by 3.2 per cent. Growth continued strongly in most regions of the developing world, up 1.5 per cent in Africa, more than 4 per cent in Latin America and the Middle East, and 6 per cent in Asia and the Pacific.

As for other major commercial fuels, world consumption of natural gas declined marginally in 1994. World coal demand gained modestly, about 0.5 per cent. Nuclear energy consumption continued to grow at a historically high level in 1994, accounting for 7.2 per cent of all primary energy, while the share of hydroelectricity generation remained steady at 2.5 per cent. Regionally, coal remained the dominant source of energy in Asia and the Pacific, mainly owing to its heavy use in China and India, while oil and natural gas accounted for most demand in all other regions.

In most developing countries, oil accounted for the predominant share of commercial primary energy consumed. Among the energy-deficient developing countries, only 17 had produced some of their oil requirements from indigenous resources. The remaining countries, more than 100, had no domestic oil production. Moreover, 85 per cent of the total oil produced in those developing countries came from two producers (Brazil, India) and the remainder of the output was largely from a few smaller producers (Chile, Cuba, Pakistan, Philippines, Thailand).

The outlook was for fossil fuels to continue to be pre-eminent in the global energy mix, accounting for more than 85 per cent of world energy consumption by the year 2010. Also, natural gas demand was expected to increase significantly. International trade in coal was expected to double by 2010, and thus would require expansion of infrastructure for its transportation and export. Electricity was accounting for an increasing share of energy demand worldwide and the trend was set to continue, especially in developing countries. Globally, fossil fuels continued to be the dominant primary energy source for electricity generation, with coal accounting for the major share and likely to remain so into the next century. Hydroelectric power had reached a mature state of development in OECD countries, while in developing countries there remained a huge potential for further development.

Regarding energy resources development, the Secretary-General reviewed the worldwide production and consumption of crude oil, natural gas, coal, electric power and renewable sources of energy, including solar electricity and thermal systems, wind power, mini-hydropower, recycling of waste biomass and biomass digesters for making gas and liquid fuels.

As to energy and the environment in developing countries, the Secretary-General observed that the only affordable and effective way to reduce the impacts of energy production and use on the environment was to change products and processes, policies and pressures that generated waste and gave rise to pollution.

The Secretary-General concluded that a major problem facing most developing countries was that of mobilizing the capital necessary to meet their growing energy requirements, against a background of stagnant multilateral loans and grants and falling official development assistance.

Significant progress was made in some OECD countries in the commercial application of renewable energy technologies that contributed electricity to the utility distribution-line grid, while in developing countries, the limited application of those technologies was mostly occurring in a dispersed setting, likely due to the economics of the technologies concerned.

Efficient use of energy and materials

The Secretary-General submitted to the Committee in April a report [E/C.13/1996/5] on the efficient use of energy and materials, which focused on the potentials for improving energy and material efficiency and subsequent policy implications.

Large potentials existed for energy savings through the improvement of energy and material efficiency in all sectors of society; those savings could change current unsustainable consumption patterns. The factors that played a major role in energy efficiency improvements included increasing energy prices (except for the past 5 to 10 years); energy policies aimed at bringing energy efficiency into the market; and technological development. Efficiency improvement was a cheap energy source, but there were barriers to it, including an unwillingness to invest; lack of available and accessible information; economic disincentives; and organizational barriers. Material efficiency improvement had not received as much attention in policy-making and analyses as energy efficiency. As a result, detailed data on the qualities and quantities of final consumption were not available, making it difficult to formulate effective policies.

The Secretary-General recommended increasing cooperation in energy efficiency between the industrialized countries and the countries in the developing world and Central and Eastern Europe; training in all aspects of energy and material efficiency; improving the quality and availability of information on energy and material efficiency provided through Governments, energy agencies, vendors, trade and consumer associations or other bodies; removing tariffs and other barriers for importing and exporting energy-efficient technologies to enhance technology transfer; establishing policy plans with clearly defined energy and material efficiency goals; developing and designing new regulatory, legal and market frameworks; better understanding the technical, socio-economic and behavioural barriers limiting the market diffusion and correct application of new energy-efficient technologies; formulating an integrated policy accounting for the characteristics of technologies and target groups; removing existing energy subsidies which provided disincentives for energy efficiency improvement or efficient use of materials; providing a legal basis for product standards such as energy standards for appliances in national legislation; investigating the viability of voluntary agreements relating to energy efficiency and technology development goals in international policy-making; reallocating budgets to reflect better the importance of efficiency improvement in energy policy; and drawing up well-established and accepted analysis and monitoring instruments to evaluate and redirect policies and instruments to changing conditions and situations. Specific recommendations were made for the building, agriculture and transportation sectors.

The Secretary-General stated that the role of the United Nations could be strengthened in the transition to more sustainable development by emphasizing the importance of energy and material efficiency and by improving programme co-ordination, the exchange of information and capacity-building within the UN system.

Biomass energy (bioenergy)

The Committee examined an April report [E/C.13/1996/4] of the Secretary-General on renewable sources of energy, with special emphasis on biomass—plant materials or animal waste used as sources of fuel.

Biomass energy, or bioenergy, was experiencing a surge in interest stemming from greater recognition of its current role and the future potential contribution of biomass as a modern fuel; its availability, versatility and sustainability; its global and local environmental benefits; and development and entrepreneurial opportunities. However, bioenergy still faced barriers due to economic, institutional and some technical factors. In many countries where bioenergy was important, in both socio-economic and energy terms, few resources were allocated to biomass.

Much more useful energy could be economically derived from biomass. There was considerable potential for the modernization of biomass fuels to produce convenient and less polluting energy carriers, such as electricity, gases and transportation fuels, to provide for traditional uses of biomass. In addition, biomass energy had environmental and social benefits such as job creation, use of surplus agricultural land in industrialized countries, improved land management and a reduction of carbon dioxide and sulphur levels in the atmosphere.

Technological advances were opening up many new opportunities for bioenergy, among them advanced steam-cycle technology with co-generation; cofiring with fossil fuels; integrated gasification/advanced technology; biocrude-fired combustion-turbine technology; production of methanol and hydrogen from biomass; and fuel cell vehicle technology.

A major problem with bioenergy was that until recently it had had a low priority in the allocation of resources for research and development, planning and implementation.

The Secretary-General recommended broad guidelines on bioenergy dealing with formulating policies to promote bioenergy on an equal footing with conventional energy sources, through rational energy pricing; providing financial incentives to bioenergy, and allowing the sale of bioelectricity, heat and gases by private generators; directing research and development to the most promising areas of biomass; examining past successes and failures to assist policy makers; internalizing external costs and benefits of bioenergy; developing bioenergy distribution systems that facilitated consumption and use; considering interrelated socio-economic aspects of bioenergy; paying more attention to sustainable production and use of biomass energy feedstocks, methodologies of conversion and efficient energy flows; allocating more research and development to pollution abatement, energy efficiency and development of newer conversion systems; improving capacity-building in bioenergy management skills; promoting sustainable development of large-scale biomass plantations to reduce costs and achieve environmental acceptability; and improving market opportunities and conditions for potential suppliers and improving supplies for potential markets.

Protection of the atmosphere

An April report [E/C.13/1996/6] of the Secretary-General focused on protection of the atmosphere from energy-related sources of human interference. He analysed the relationship between energy and development, prevailing trends in energy use worldwide and possible future developments, possible impacts on the atmosphere, and strategies for mitigating and adapting to the adverse impact of possible climate change.

Protection of the atmosphere was an important precondition for ensuring sustainable economic development. Energy needs were driven by population growth, economic and industrial development, and technological change. The type and the extent of the environmental impacts of energy production and use were closely related to the degree of economic development and industrialization. Three different classes of economic problems had been analysed in relation to the environment: those relating to poverty, industrialization and affluence. The Secretary-General noted that each placed a different burden on the environment, and all called for different environmental policy approaches and solutions.

As to trends in energy use, global primary energy use had increased by a factor of 20 since the middle of the nineteenth century, with much of the increased consumption occurring in the developed countries.

Regarding the atmospheric impact of greenhouse gases, the developed countries accounted for most of the carbon dioxide, aerosol and chlorofluorocarbon emissions. Currently, it was not possible to determine reliably the combined effects of the concentration of greenhouse gases and of human activities on the climate system. The options available to mitigate undesirable impacts on the atmosphere included efficiency improvements, fuel switching, structural change, control of large point sources, enhancement of greenhouse gas sinks and adaptation measures. Various policy options were also available.

UN activities

In a February report [E/C.13/1996/7], the Secretary-General described the energy activities carried out within the UN system.

Many entities within the system were involved in a wide range of projects and programmes in energy, covering energy development and use, energy efficiency, management, analysis and projections, financial resources and investment, institutions and capacity-building, cooperation and coordination of energy activities, and information flows. The mode of action varied, involving technical and financial assistance, advisory services, expert group meetings, workshops and seminars, studies, and establishment and maintenance of computer tools and database or publications.

In the area of energy development and use, projects related to exploration, assessment and planning, electricity development and use, renewable energy resources, new energy technologies, fuel substitution, development of national and regional energy policies, and integration of energy, environment and development policies. Activities were also reported in identifying energy trends and perspectives, weather and climate implications, environmental impact assessment and mitigation of adverse environmental effects.

The Secretary-General observed that the trend towards cooperation among UN entities was encouraging. Directly related to cooperation was the issue of coordination, which, except for very few submissions, seemed minimal. The Secretary-General stated that the Committee might wish to suggest specific ways to improve coordination, such as through the Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development, which could devote part of its agenda to energy issues.

The transportation area did not seem to be receiving the attention that it deserved by UN entities, the report stated. Some effort, however, had been reported regarding the integration of energy, environment and development. More activities were needed in the development and application of environmentally sound technologies.

The Secretary-General noted that more effort was required to expand substantially the supply of energy to rural areas of developing countries, including rural electrification, to stimulate economic growth or at least to help arrest, reverse and eventually eradicate poverty. In addition, further attention was needed to ensure more participation of women at all levels, and to increase women's capacity to participate in decision-making.

It was apparent that UN entities tended to concentrate on conventional energy systems, with inadequate attention given to sustainable energy developments involving the development and application of renewable sources of energy.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 26 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/44.

Coordination of the activities of the organizations of the United Nations system in the field of energy

The Economic and Social Council,

Considering the crucial role of energy in sustainable development,

Noting the continuing need for enhancing energy supplies and improving the living conditions in developing countries,

Recognizing the need to evolve strategies and programmes to ensure a cost-effective and sustainable regime of energy supply and consumption in the twenty-first century,

Bearing in mind the views and recommendations of the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development on the issues of medium-term planning and coordination in energy,

Recalling decision 4/15 of the Commission on Sustainable Development of 3 May 1996, in which the Commission requested the Secretary-General to prepare a report for consideration by the Commission at its fifth session, covering an inventory of ongoing energy-oriented programmes and activities within the United Nations system, as well as proposals for arrangements as appropriate, that might be needed to foster the linkage between energy and sustainable development within the United Nations system,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to take into account the report and views of the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development when preparing the report requested in decision 4/15 of the Commission on Sustainable Development;

2. Also requests the Secretary-General to prepare a report, taking into account, as appropriate, the views of the Committee, on the possibilities of strengthening the coordination of the organizations and bodies of the United Nations system in the field of energy within the framework of the Administrative Committee on Coordination, and to submit this report, through the Council, to the General Assembly for consideration at its fifty-second session;

3. Further requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the regional commissions and other entities within the United Nations system, to address in the same report the need to enhance the capability of the system in the field of energy for sustainable development, and to explore all possible options for a high-level discussion in this context, taking into account the results of the fifth session of the Commission on Sustainable Development and of the special session of the General Assembly scheduled for June 1997, as well as the guidance provided by the relevant environmental conventions and their respective conferences of the parties, in particular the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/44
26 July 1996 Meeting 52 Adopted without vote
Draft by Vice-President (E/1996/L.40), based on informal consultations on two drafts by Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy for Development (E/1996/24); agenda item 6 (e).
Meeting numbers. ESC 30-32, 52.

Nuclear energy

By a note of 26 August [A/51/307], the Secretary-General transmitted the 1995 report of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to the General Assembly.

The IAEA Director General on 28 October presented an updated report to the Assembly. He addressed issues of nuclear safety, including the entry into force on 24 October of the Convention on Nuclear Safety, adopted in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 925]; the use of radiation; nuclear weapons and the verification of nuclear-arms control and disarmament agreements; treaties establishing nuclear-weapon-free zones; compliance; and safeguards agreements. (See also PART ONE, Chapter VII.)

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 29 October, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/10.

Report of the International Atomic Energy Agency

The General Assembly,

Having received the report of the International Atomic Energy Agency to the General Assembly for the year 1995,

Noting the statement of the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency of 28 October 1996, in which he provided additional information on the main developments in the activities of the Agency during 1996,

Recognizing the importance of the work of the Agency in promoting the further application of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes as envisaged in the statute of the Agency and in accordance with the inalienable right of States parties to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and other relevant internationally legally binding agreements that have concluded relevant safeguards agreements with the Agency to develop research, production and use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes without discrimination and in conformity with articles I and II of the Treaty, with other relevant articles and with the objectives and purposes of the Treaty,

Conscious of the importance of the work of the Agency in the implementation of the safeguards provisions of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and other international treaties, conventions and agreements designed to achieve similar objectives, as well as in ensuring, as far as it is able, that the assistance provided by the Agency or at its request or under its supervision or control is not used in such a way as to further any military purpose, as stated in article II of its statute,

Reaffirming that the Agency is the competent authority responsible for verifying and assuring, in accordance with the statute of the Agency and the Agency's safeguards system, compliance with its safeguards agreements with States parties undertaken in fulfilment of their obligations under article III, paragraph 1, of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, with a view to preventing diversion of nuclear energy from peaceful uses to nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices, and also reaffirming that nothing should be done to undermine the authority of the Agency in this regard and that States parties that have concerns regarding non-compliance with the safeguards agreement of the Treaty by the States parties should direct such concerns, along with supporting evidence and information, to the Agency to consider, investigate, draw conclusions and decide on necessary actions in accordance with its mandate,

Noting the statement by the President of the fortieth regular session of the General Conference of the Agency, issued under item 23 concerning the application of Agency safeguards in the Middle East, that:

"The General Conference requests the Director General to invite experts from the Middle East and other areas to a technical workshop on safeguards, verification technologies, and related experience. It calls on the Director General to commence with preparations, in consultation with the parties concerned, with a view to developing an agenda and modalities that would help ensure a successful workshop",

Again stressing the need for the highest standards of safety in the design and operation of nuclear installations and in peaceful nuclear activities so as to minimize risks to life, health and the environment,

Considering that an expansion of technical cooperation activities relating to the peaceful uses of nuclear energy will contribute to the well-being of the peoples of the world, recognizing the special needs of the developing countries for technical assistance from the Agency and the importance of funding in order to benefit effectively from the transfer and application of nuclear technology for peaceful purposes as well as from the contribution of nuclear energy to their economic development, and desiring that the Agency's resources for technical cooperation activities be assured and sufficient,

Recognizing the importance of the work of the Agency on nuclear energy, applications of nuclear methods and techniques, nuclear safety, radiological protection and radioactive waste management, including its work directed towards assisting developing countries in all these fields,

Taking note of the report of the Director General to the General Conference on the developments related to the nuclear-weapons programme of Iraq, of his reports on the Agency's twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth on-site inspections in Iraq and of resolution GC(40)/RES/21 of 20 September 1996 of the General Conference,

Taking note also of resolutions GOV/2711 of 21 March 1994 and GOV/2742 of 10 June 1994 of the Board of Governors and GC(40)/RES/4 of the General Conference of the International Atomic Energy Agency in connection with the implementation of the Agreement between the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the International Atomic Energy Agency for the application of safeguards in connection with the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, the statements of the President of the Security Council of 31 March, 30 May and 4 November 1994 and the Board of Governors' authorization, on 11 November 1994, to the Director General, to carry out all the tasks requested of the Agency in the statement by the President of the Security Council of 4 November 1994.

Bearing in mind resolutions GC(40)/RES/2 on a nuclear-weapon-free zone in Africa, GC(40)/RES/10 on the Convention on Nuclear Safety, GC(40)/RES/11 on a convention on the safety of radioactive waste management, GC(40)/RES/12 on measures to resolve international radioactive waste management issues: establishing predisposal waste demonstration centres, GC(40)/RES/13 on the strengthening of the Agency's technical cooperation activities, GC(40)/RES/14 on a plan for producing potable water economically, GC(40)/RES/15 on extensive use of isotope hydrology for water resources management, GC(40)/RES/16 on strengthening the effectiveness and improving the efficiency of the safeguards system, GC(40)/RES/17 on measures against the illicit trafficking in nuclear material and other radiation sources, GC(40)/RES/18 on the staffing of the Agency's secretariat, GC(40)/RES/20 on the amendment of article VI of the statute relating to the membership of the Board of Governors, GC(40)/RES/21 on the implementation of relevant Security Council resolutions relating to Iraq, and GC(40)/RES/22 on application of Agency safeguards in the Middle East, adopted on 20 September 1996 by the General Conference of the Agency at its fortieth regular session,

Noting the statement by the President of the fortieth regular session of the General Conference of the Agency, issued under item 19 (b) concerning the composition of regional groups, that:

"The General Conference takes note of the report of the Director General on the composition of regional groups under the agenda item entitled 'Amendment of article VI of the Statute', as contained in the attachment to GC(40)/11. It reiterates the principle of the sovereign equality of all member States of the Agency, as provided for in article IV.C of the Statute. It affirms that this principle requires that each member State of the Agency be within one of the areas listed in article VI.A.1 of the Statute. Recalling draft resolution GC(39)/COM.5/10 (19 September 1995) and resolution GC(39)/RES/22 (22 September 1995), the Conference requests that the Chairman of the Board of Governors consult with member States not yet listed in a regional area, as well as with other member States, including representatives of the regional areas, and that he report for consideration at the forty-first session of the General Conference specific proposals to include each member State within the appropriate area at the time of the Conference in September 1997",

Bearing in mind resolution GC(40)/RES/17 on measures against illicit trafficking in nuclear materials and other radioactive sources, recognizing the importance of measures against illicit trafficking of nuclear material and, in this regard, further recognizing the importance of the programme for preventing and combating illicit trafficking in nuclear material, agreed upon by the participants in the Moscow Nuclear Safety and Security Summit of April 1996,

Also bearing in mind resolution GC(40)/RES/19 on women in the secretariat adopted on 20 September 1996 by the General Conference of the Agency, calling on the Director General to further integrate the Platform for Action developed at the Fourth World Conference on Women into the Agency's relevant policies and programmes,

1. Takes note of the report of the International Atomic Energy Agency;

2. Affirms its confidence in the role of the Agency in the application of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes;

3. Welcomes the measures and decisions taken by the Agency to maintain and strengthen the effectiveness and cost efficiency of the safeguards system in conformity with the Agency's statute, in particular, welcomes the establishment by the Board of Governors of a committee which began its work in July 1996 and is tasked with the drafting of a model protocol in order to strengthen the effectiveness and to improve the efficiency of the nuclear safeguards system and thereby reinforce and improve the Agency's capacity to detect any undeclared nuclear activities, and calls upon this committee to make every effort to bring its work to a successful conclusion at the earliest possible date;

4. Urges all States to strive for effective and harmonious international cooperation in carrying out the work of the Agency, pursuant to its statute, in promoting the use of nuclear energy and the application of the necessary measures to strengthen further the safety of nuclear installations and to minimize risks to life, health and the environment, in strengthening technical assistance and cooperation for developing countries, and in ensuring the effectiveness and efficiency of the safeguards systems of the Agency;

5. Welcomes the measures and decisions taken by the Agency to strengthen and fund its technical cooperation activities which should contribute to achieving sustainable development in developing countries, and calls upon States to cooperate in implementing the measures and decisions pursuant thereto;

6. Commends the Director General and the secretariat of the Agency for their continuing, impartial efforts to implement the safeguards agreement still in force between the Agency and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, including their efforts to monitor the freeze of specified facilities in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea as requested by the Security Council, expresses concern over the continuing non-compliance of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea with the safeguards agreement, and urges the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to cooperate fully with the Agency in the implementation of the safeguards agreement and take all steps the Agency may deem necessary to preserve all information relevant to verifying the accuracy and completeness of the initial report of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea on the inventory of nuclear material subject to safeguards until the Democratic People's Republic of Korea comes into full compliance with its safeguards agreement;

7. Also commends the Director General of the Agency and his staff for their strenuous efforts in the implementation of Security Council resolutions 687(1991) of 3 April, 707(1991) of 15 August and 715(1991) of 11 October 1991, and while noting that Iraq has adopted over the last twelve months a more constructive approach, expresses concern that Iraq failed to provide immediate access on 7 July 1996 to the Agency's Action Team and that it has previously withheld from the Agency information about its nuclear-weapons programme in violation of its obligations under relevant Council resolutions, and in this context stresses the need for Iraq to cooperate fully with the Agency to resolve the remaining inconsistency concerning the full, final and complete declaration in achieving the implementation of the relevant Council resolutions, and stresses that the Agency's Action Team will continue to exercise its right to investigate further any aspects of the past nuclear-weapons capability of Iraq, in particular as regards any further relevant information necessary to complete the record of the nuclear-weapons programme of Iraq that it may still be withholding from the Agency;

8. Welcomes the entry into force on 24 October 1996 of the Convention on Nuclear Safety and appeals to all States to become parties to it so that it obtains the widest possible adherence, and expresses its satisfaction that a preparatory meeting of the contracting parties will be convened at a date to be agreed upon, but not later than April 1997;

9. Also welcomes the measures taken by the Agency in support of efforts to prevent illicit trafficking in nuclear materials and other radioactive sources and, in this context, calls upon other States to join the programme for preventing and combating illicit trafficking in nuclear material agreed upon by the participants at the Moscow Nuclear Safety and Security Summit of April 1996;

10. Takes note with appreciation of the work of the open-ended Group of Technical and Legal Experts on a Convention on the Safety of Radioactive Waste Management established by the Board of Governors of the Agency and expresses the hope that the outstanding issues will be resolved in a spirit of compromise so as to allow timely completion of the preparatory work and adoption of a convention in the near future;

11. Notes with satisfaction the substantial progress achieved in the negotiations to strengthen the international regime of liability and compensation for damage arising from a nuclear incident, in particular, by amending the 1963 Vienna Convention on Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage as well as by adopting a convention on supplementary compensation, and expresses the hope that the diplomatic conference for that purpose will soon be convened;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit to the Director General of the Agency the records of the fifty-first session of the General Assembly relating to the activities of the Agency.

29 October 1996 Meeting 43 141-2-8 (recorded vote)

45-nation draft (A/51/L.9/Rev.1 & Rev.1/Add.1); agenda item 14.
Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: plenary 42, 43.

Recorded vote in Assembly as follows:

In favour: Albania, Algeria, Andorra, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Bahrain, Belarus, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bolivia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Cambodia, Canada, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Costa Rica, Cote d'Ivoire, Croatia, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Georgia, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Liechtenstein, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Marshall Islands, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Monaco, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Myanmar, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Republic of Korea, Republic of Moldova, Romania, Russian Federation, Saint Lucia, Samoa, San Marino, Saudi Arabia, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Slovakia, Slovenia, Solomon Islands, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Tajikistan, Thailand, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, Ukraine, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United Republic of Tanzania, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Against: Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Lebanon.

Abstaining: China, Cuba, Micronesia, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, Vanuatu, Viet Nam.

Before adopting the text, Iraq introduced an amendment to paragraph 7 [A/51/L.11] by which the Assembly would have called on Iraq to continue its cooperation with IAEA in achieving the complete implementation of the relevant Security Council resolutions. The amendment was rejected by a recorded vote of 71 to 11, with 41 abstentions.

The third preambular paragraph was retained by a recorded vote of 123 to 3, with 11 abstentions.

Chapter VII

Environment

During the year, the United Nations was involved in efforts to solve environmental problems threatening the Earth's land masses, forests, fauna and flora, oceans and atmosphere. A variety of activities took place in follow-up to "Agenda 21," the wide-ranging action document adopted at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in June 1992.

On 26 December 1996, the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, adopted and opened for signature in 1994, entered into force. During the year, preparations were under way for the first Conference of the Parties, scheduled to be held in 1997.

In December 1996, the General Assembly endorsed the 1995 Washington Declaration on Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities and the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities, and stressed the need for States to implement the Programme. The Programme was designed to serve as a guide to devising and implementing sustained action to prevent, reduce, control and/or eliminate marine degradation from land-based activities. In another action, the Assembly urged States, international organizations and regional and subregional fisheries management organizations to take action to reduce by-catches, fish discards and post-harvest losses.

The Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Panel on Forests, established under the aegis of the Commission on Sustainable Development, focused on various aspects of deforestation and forest degradation, while the Ad Hoc Working Group on Sectoral Issues addressed the problems of adverse impacts of human activity on the atmosphere and oceans.

The third meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the 1992 Convention on Biological Diversity considered a report of the Open-ended Ad Hoc Working Group on Biosafety, which discussed the elaboration of a protocol setting out procedures, including advanced information agreement, in the safe transfer, handling and use of any living modified organism resulting from biotechnology that might have an adverse effect on the conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity.

On 10 December, the 1994 Lusaka Agreement on Cooperative Enforcement Operations Directed at Illegal Trade in Wild Fauna and Flora entered into force, 60 days following the receipt of the fourth instrument of ratification or accession.

During the year, the second session of the Conference of the Parties to the 1992 United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change reviewed the implementation of the Convention and the progress made in the negotiation of a protocol or another legal instrument to strengthen commitments on controlling emissions after the year 2000 of parties included in annex I to the Convention (developed and transition countries).

The United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) convened with the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) the first two sessions of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for an International Legally Binding Instrument for the Application of the Prior Informed Consent (PIC) Procedure for Certain Hazardous Chemicals and Pesticides in International Trade. The meetings made progress in elaborating a number of draft articles essential for the mandatory application of the PIC procedure.

General aspects

UNCED follow-up

During the year, preparations were under way for the special session of the General Assembly, to be held in 1997, to review and appraise the implementation of Agenda 21, adopted in 1992 by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) [YUN 1992, p. 672] (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

Commission action. The high-level segment of the fourth session of the Commission on Sustainable Development (New York, 3 May) discussed matters related to the special session, pursuant to a 1995 Assembly request [YUN 1995, p. 840], and considered a February report [E/CN.17/1996/16] of the Secretary-General presenting an overview of the progress made since UNCED in the institutional arrangements within the UN system, by bilateral organizations, regional organizations and financial institutions. Post-UNCED institutional changes taken by major groups, relating to the role of nine non-governmental sectors recognized in Agenda 21, were reflected in another February report [E/CN.17/1996/12] on the role of those groups during 1995-1996. The Secretary-General stated that major groups continued to open new avenues for dialogue, collaboration and cooperation through participation in monitoring and implementation activities of Agenda 21. However, further work needed to be done to encourage, enhance and enable participation, including information collection and dissemination, enhanced participatory arrangements and programming support.

The Commission recommended [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/7)] that the 1997 review give special attention to post-UNCED institutional arrangements to ensure their continued relevance and increased effectiveness. It also recommended that the preparatory work for the 1997 special session examine the institutional implications for forging new alliances for sustainable development between the United Nations and other major organizations relevant for sustainable development.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly, by resolution 51/181 of 16 December, requested that other contributions to the special session, in addition to those identified in Assembly resolution 50/113, include submissions from relevant UN bodies and organizations; information on the outcomes of UN conferences held since UNCED, regional and subregional conferences, summits and other inter-sessional meetings on sustainable development organized by countries; and information on the activities of relevant UN conventions on the environment and development and the global freshwater assessment. It requested that the activities organized by major groups, including business and industry and non-governmental organizations (NGOs), be taken into account.

Environment and sustainable development

Commission action. The Commission on Sustainable Development (fourth session, New York, 18 April-3 May) examined a March report [E/CN.17/1996/11 & Add.1] of the Secretary-General on integrating environment and development in decision-making. Regarding policies, planning and management, he stated that at the national level there appeared to be a trend towards a more integrative approach to decision-making. More attention was being given at national, bilateral and international levels to coordinating sectoral and special interest plans, strategies and targets in a manner aimed at achieving consistency, efficiency, effectiveness and movement towards an integrated goal of sustainable development. He stated that laws and regulations suited to country-specific conditions were among the most important instruments for transforming environment and development policies into action. He noted that whereas most countries had some process in place to develop integrated strategies on a regular basis, fewer had comparable routine processes in the area of law. As to integrated environmental and economic accounting, the Secretary-General stated that it was likely to increase in use, at least on pilot and experimental bases.

On 3 May [dec. 4/4], the Commission asked organizations of the UN system and other relevant organizations to support efforts taken by Governments to integrate environment and development in decision-making, by strengthening coordination and exchanging information on "best practices" relating to sustainable development strategies.

Second Committee action. In October [A/51/605], the Assembly's Second (Economic and Financial) Committee discussed the item "Environment and sustainable development". Action on questions not related to specific sub-items was taken on 5 November and 2 December [A/51/605/Add.7].

On 5 November, Belarus, Georgia, Latvia, the Russian Federation, Tajikistan and Ukraine introduced a draft resolution [A/C.2/51/L.11] entitled "Application of the principles of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development in international cooperation on the environment". (The Rio Declaration, adopted in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 670], aimed to establish a new and equitable global partnership on environment and development through cooperation among States, key sectors and individuals.)

On 2 December, the Committee was informed that the draft resolution was withdrawn by its sponsors, in the light of the adoption of another draft, which was subsequently adopted by the Assembly as resolution 51/181 concerning the special session to review and appraise the implementation of Agenda 21 (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

By decision 51/446 of 16 December, the Assembly took note of parts one and eight of the Second Committee's report [A/51/605 & Add.7].

International conventions and mechanisms

Climate Change Convention

In 1996, 13 States ratified, acceded to or accepted the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, which was opened for signature in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 681] and entered into force in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 938], bringing the total number of States parties to 164 at year's end. The Convention aimed to stabilize atmospheric concentrations of greenhouse gases at levels that would prevent human activities from interfering dangerously with the global climate system.

Conference of Parties

Financing

In an April report [A/C.5/50/58], the Secretary-General presented revised budgetary appropriations for the conference servicing of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention and its subsidiary bodies. He estimated the full costs for the 1996-1997 biennium at $7,751,300 ($3,580,600 for 1996 and $4,170,000 for 1997). The additional requirements for the biennium were estimated at $5,517,000.

After considering the Secretary-General's report, the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, in April [A/50/7/Add.15], observed that, in accordance with a 1986 General Assembly resolution [YUN 1986, p. 1024], the additional appropriation would be subject to the provisions of a contingency fund established for each biennium to accommodate additional expenditure derived from legislative mandates not provided for in the programme budget.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 7 June, the General Assembly adopted resolution 50/232.

Conference servicing of the Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the conference servicing of the Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions thereon,

Recalling that, in its resolution 50/115 of 20 December 1995, it decided to include in the calendar of conferences and meetings for the biennium 1996-1997 the sessions of the Conference of the Parties and its subsidary bodies envisaged for that biennium, entailing twelve weeks of conference-servicing facilities,

Recalling also that the Fifth Committee informed the General Assembly in that connection that the actual amount required under section 26E (Conference services) of the proposed programme budget for the biennium 1996-1997, including the need for additional appropriation, would be considered by the Assembly at its resumed session in 1996,

Recalling further that, in its resolution 50/214 of 23 December 1995, it had already requested the Secretary-General to make economies in an amount of 103,991,200 United States dollars and also requested him to implement fully all mandated programmes and activities,

Reaffirming the budgetary process adopted in its resolution 41/213 of 19 December 1986 and subsequent relevant resolutions,

1. Authorizes the Secretary-General to enter into commitments up to an amount of 5,517,000 dollars from section 26 (Administration and management) of the programme budget for the biennium 1996-1997 for the provision of conference servicing to the Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and its subsidiary bodies;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, subject to the full implementation of all mandated programmes and activities as required by its resolution 50/214, to submit a report to the General Assembly no later than 1 September 1996 containing proposals on possible means of absorption in the programme budget for the biennium 1996-1997;

3. Decides to revert to the issue of appropriations in the context of the first performance report.

7 June 1996 Meeting 120 Adopted without vote

Approved by Fifth Committee (A/50/842/Add.3) without vote, 31 May (meeting 64); draft by Chairman (A/C.5/50/L.71); agenda item 116. Meeting numbers. GA 50th session: 5th Committee 56-58, 60-64; plenary 120.

Conference and subsidiary bodies

At its second session (Geneva, 8-19 July) [FCCC/CP/1996/15 & Add.1], the Conference of the Parties to the Convention reviewed the implementation of the Convention and the progress made in the negotiation process initiated in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1070] with the adoption of the Berlin Mandate. Pursuant to the Mandate, the parties were called on, among other things, to negotiate a protocol or another legal instrument to strengthen the commitments of parties included in annex I to the Convention (developed and transition countries) after the year 2000. The Conference took note of the Geneva Ministerial Declaration that had emerged from consultations with a representative group of "Friends of the President". The Declaration was presented in the name of the ministers and other heads of delegation present at the session. It emphasized the need to accelerate the Berlin Mandate talks on strengthening the Convention and, in particular, called for making commitments on controlling emissions in the post-2000 period "legally binding". On 18 July, on the President's proposal, the Conference took note of the Declaration and agreed that it should be annexed to the Conference's report.

Decisions adopted by the Conference to promote the implementation of the Convention dealt with guidelines, schedule and process for consideration of communications received from annex I parties (communications were to address a party's actions to implement all its Convention obligations), as well as all anthropogenic emissions and removals of all greenhouse gases not controlled by the 1987 Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer [YUN 1987, p. 686]; guidelines, facilitation and process for consideration of communications from parties not included in annex I; and a Memorandum of Understanding between the Conference and the Council of the Global Environment Facility (GEF), the interim operating entity of the financial mechanism of the Convention. Other decisions dealt with the development and transfer of technologies and know-how conducive to mitigating and adapting to climate change; the 1996-1997 work programme of the Subsidiary Body for Implementation (SBI); the work of the Conference's Ad Hoc Groups, including the Ad Hoc Group on the Berlin Mandate; secretariat activities relating to technical and financial support to parties; the establishment and functioning of the permanent Convention secretariat; the Agreement signed with Germany in Bonn on 20 June 1996 concerning its headquarters; the 1997 budget; documentation; and the date and venue of the Conference's third session, which was scheduled to take place in Kyoto, Japan, from 1 to 12 December 1997.

The Conference's subsidiary bodies met in Geneva during the year. The Subsidiary Body for Scientific and Technological Advice held its second (27 February-4 March) [FCCC/SBSTA/1996/8], third (9-16 July) [FCCC/SBSTA/1996/13] and fourth (16-18 December) [FCCC/SBSTA/1996/20] sessions. The sessions dealt with organizational issues, a pilot phase for activities implemented jointly, scientific assessments, cooperation with the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (see below), communications from parties, the development and transfer of technologies, and mechanisms for consultations with NGOs. Another subsidiary body, SBI, similarly held three sessions, its second (27 February-8 March) [FCCC/SBI/1996/9], third (9-16 July) [FCCC/SBI/1996/12] and fourth (10-11 December) [FCCC/SBI/1996/L.5], which dealt with national communications, the development and transfer of technology, financial and technical cooperation, including the Memorandum of Understanding between the Conference and the GEF Council, and institutional and budgetary matters.

The Ad Hoc Group on the Berlin Mandate continued its debate on quantified emission limitation and reduction objectives in three sessions: its third (5-8 March) [FCCC/AGBM/1996/5], fourth (11-16 July) [FCCC/AGBM/1996/8] and fifth (9-12 December) [FCCC/AGBM/1996/11].

The Ad Hoc Group on article 13 held its second (10 July) [FCCC/AG13/1996/2] and third (16-18 December) [FCCC/AG13/1996/4] sessions to consider the establishment of a multilateral consultative process for the resolution of questions regarding implementation (article 13).

Report of Secretary-General. The Secretary-General in October reviewed [A/51/484] developments regarding the provision of conference-servicing facilities for sessions of the Conference of the Parties and its subsidiary bodies; arrangements for administrative support to the Convention secretariat; transfer of end-1995 balances in funds established under a 1990 Assembly resolution [GA res. 45/212]; and institutional linkage of the Convention secretariat to the United Nations.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/184.

Protection of global climate for present and future generations of mankind

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/212 of 21 December 1990, 46/169 of 19 December 1991, 47/195 of 22 December 1992, 48/189 of 21 December 1993, 49/120 of 19 December 1994 and 50/115 of 20 December 1995,

Noting with satisfaction that most States and one regional economic integration organization have ratified or acceded to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, and inviting States that are not parties to take appropriate action to that end,

Welcoming the achievements of the second session of the Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, held at Geneva from 8 to 19 July 1996, and noting that the Conference of the Parties at its second session adopted by consensus a series of substantive decisions,

Recalling that at its second session the Conference of the Parties took note, without formal adoption, of the Geneva Ministerial Declaration which received majority support among ministers and other heads of delegations attending the Conference, which, inter alia, called for acceleration of negotiations on the text of a legally binding protocol or another legal instrument to be completed in due time for adoption at the third session of the Conference of the Parties,

Taking note with appreciation of the scientific contribution to the convention process of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change of the World Meteorological Organization/United Nations Environment Programme, and also taking note of its second assessment report as the most comprehensive assessment available to date of the issues related to global climate change,

Concerned that changes in climate may result in significant and often adverse impacts on many ecological systems and socio-economic sectors, including food supply and water resources, and on human health, and noting that in some cases the impacts are potentially irreversible, and that developing countries and small island developing States are typically more vulnerable to climate change,

Looking forward to the continued efforts of the Conference of the Parties and its subsidiary bodies in addressing climate change and, in particular, to the successful conclusion of the Berlin Mandate process at the third session of the Conference of the Parties,

Reiterating that a comprehensive approach should be adopted by the Conference of the Parties and its subsidiary bodies in the implementation of the Convention, including the full consideration of the particular situation of the developing countries as recognized by the Convention,

Taking note with appreciation of the generous offer of the Government of Japan to host the third session of the Conference of the Parties at Kyoto from 1 to 12 December 1997,

Noting that the relocation of the Convention secretariat to Bonn, Germany, is well under way, and expressing its appreciation to the Government of Germany and the city of Bonn for the facilities and support they are providing to the secretariat,

Recalling its request to the Secretary-General, as put forth in paragraph 9 of resolution 50/115, to make the necessary arrangements to include in the calendar of conferences and meetings for the biennium 1998-1999 those sessions of the Conference of the Parties and its subsidiary bodies that the Conference may need to convene in that period, and noting that those arrangements should be made without prejudice to the outcome of the review referred to in paragraph 3 below,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 50/115,

1. Notes the administrative arrangements regarding personnel and financial matters that have been established in the context of the transitional arrangement for administrative support to the secretariat of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change for the biennium 1996-1997;

2. Also notes the arrangements made for the provision of conference services to the Conference of the Parties to the Convention and its subsidiary bodies for the biennium 1996-1997;

3. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General, as set forth in paragraph 10 of resolution 50/115, to review the arrangements mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2 above towards the end of the biennium 1996-1997 and to report on the results of that review to the Assembly at its fifty-second session, taking into account evolving needs arising from the relocation to Bonn of the Convention secretariat;

4. Notes with appreciation contributions made to the extrabudgetary funds established under paragraphs 10 and 20 of resolution 45/212 and maintained in accordance with resolution 47/195, and calls upon Member States that are parties to the Convention to also contribute generously to the trust fund for participation in the Convention process, envisaged in paragraph 15 of its financial procedures, and to the trust funds envisaged for supplementary activities under the Convention;

5. Calls upon Member States that are parties to the Convention to pay in full and in a timely manner for each of the years 1996 and 1997, in accordance with the indicative scale adopted by consensus by the Conference of the Parties, the contributions required for the trust fund for the core budget of the Convention, envisaged in paragraph 13 of its financial procedures, so as to ensure continuity in the cash flow required to finance the ongoing work of the Conference of the Parties, the subsidiary bodies and the Convention secretariat;

6. Invites the Executive Secretary of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session and, pending the outcome of the special session of the General Assembly in 1997, to report on the results of future meetings of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention;

7. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Protection of global climate for present and future generations of mankind" and to consider at that session the reviews requested in paragraph 10 of resolution 50/115.

General Assembly resolution 51/184

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/605/Add.5) without vote, 2 December (meeting 38); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.33), based on informal consultations on draft by Colombia (for Non-Aligned Movement) and Costa Rica (for Group of 77 and China) (A/C.2/51/L.6); agenda item 97 (e).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 10-15, 19, 38; plenary 86.

Montreal Protocol and Ozone Convention

As at 31 December 1996, 160 States and the European Community (EC) were parties to the 1987 Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer [YUN 1987, p. 686], 112 States and the EC were parties to the 1990 Amendment to the Protocol, and 65 States and the EC were parties to the 1992 Amendment [YUN 1992, p. 684]. During the year, 10 States became parties to the Protocol, 9 to the 1990 Amendment and 15 to the 1992 Amendment.

At the eighth meeting (San Jose, Costa Rica, 25-27 November) [UNEP/OzL.Pro.8/12] of the Parties to the Montreal Protocol, the Scientific Assessment Panel stated that tropospheric levels of chlorine were decreasing as a result of the Protocol and that, within a few years, the level of chlorine in the stratosphere would also start decreasing, assuming that all countries abided by agreed control measures. Once stratospheric levels of chlorine and bromine started to decrease, the ozone layer would begin recovering, but complete recovery would not occur until the middle of the next century, even with full compliance with the Protocol. The Panel on Environmental Effects of Ozone Depletion had made an executive summary on new findings that addressed changes in ultraviolet (UV) radiation and the effects of increasing UV radiation on health, terrestrial and aquatic ecosystems, bio-geochemical cycles, air quality and materials. The Technology and Economic Assessment Panel presented specific issues related to the Panel's operation. The Implementation Committee reported on various issues related to non-compliance with the Protocol.

Among the decisions adopted at the meeting were those relating to the uses and possible applications of hydrochlorofluorocarbons; further clarification of the definition of "bulk substances"; control of trade in methyl bromide with non-parties; critical agricultural uses of methyl bromide; the availability of halons for critical uses; and the Multilateral Fund for the Implementation of the Protocol. The parties decided to hold their ninth meeting in Montreal in September 1997.

The Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), in his annual report for 1996 [DP/1997/16/Add.1 (Part VI)], stated that by the end of 1996 UNDP was helping 49 countries eliminate ozone-depleting substances (ODS) through programme formulation, technical cooperation and training, demonstration projects, national institutional strengthening and technology transfer investment projects. During the year, funding amounted to $30.3 million, resulting in a rise in the UNDP 1991-1996 cumulative project portfolio to $139 million. The portfolio comprised 490 projects, including 287 technology transfer investment projects, which would eliminate an estimated 18,137 tonnes of ODS annually.

At year's end, with 11 States becoming parties in 1996, 162 States and the EC were parties to the 1985 Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer [YUN 1985, p. 804], which entered into force in 1988 [YUN 1988, p. 810].

The fourth meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the Vienna Convention (San Jose, 25 and 27 November) [UNEP/OzL.Conv.4/6] adopted decisions which dealt with adjustments and amendments to the Montreal Protocol; recommendations made at the third meeting of the Ozone Research Managers (Geneva, 19-21 March); budgetary and financial matters; and its fifth meeting, which was scheduled to take place in 1999.

Convention on Biological Diversity

As at 31 December 1996, the Convention on Biological Diversity, which was opened for signature in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 683] and entered into force in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 810], had been ratified, acceded to, accepted or approved by 165 States. During the year, 28 States became parties to the Convention.

The aims of the Convention were conservation of biological diversity, sustainable use of its components and fair and equitable sharing of benefits arising from the use of genetic resources. The term biological diversity refers to the number and variety of living organisms on the planet. It was estimated in 1996 that the Earth was host to some 13 to 14 million species, of which only 1.75 million had been scientifically described.

Pursuant to a 1995 Assembly request [YUN 1995, p. 1073], the Secretary-General transmitted in September [A/51/312] the report of the second (1995) meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention.

The third meeting of the Conference (Buenos Aires, Argentina, 4-15 November) [UNEP/CBD/COP/3/38] adopted decisions related to identifying indicators, monitoring and assessment of biological diversity; the conservation and sustainable use of agricultural biological diversity; the programme of work for forest biological diversity, and for dryland, mountain and inland water ecosystems; biological diversity for indigenous and local communities; access to genetic resources; ways to promote and facilitate access to and transfer and development of technology; the impact of intellectual property rights systems on the conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity and on the equitable sharing of benefits from its use; incentive measures for the conservation and sustainable use of components of biological diversity; and the General Assembly's 1997 special session. It also adopted decisions on the Convention's relationship with the Commission on Sustainable Development and biodiversity-related conventions, other international agreements, institutions and processes; the operation of the clearing-house mechanism; financial resources and the adoption of a revised Memorandum of Understanding between the Conference and the Council of GEF; the 1996-1997 medium-term programme of work; and the 1997-1998 budget of the Trust Fund for the Convention. The Conference noted the signing, on 25 October, of a headquarters agreement between the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) and the Government of Canada, establishing Montreal as the permanent secretariat of the Convention. The secretariat formerly was located in Geneva.

The Conference held a ministerial segment on 13 and 14 November. No ministerial declaration was adopted, but the views expressed were to be conveyed as a contribution of the Conference to the Assembly's 1997 special session.

The meeting accepted the offer of Slovakia to host the Conference's fourth meeting in Bratislava and decided that it should be held from 4 to 15 May 1998.

The Conference considered the report of the Subsidiary Body on Scientific, Technical and Technological Advice on its second meeting (Montreal, 2-6 October) [UNEP/CBD/COP/3/3]. Recommendations emerging from the meeting dealt with capacity-building for taxonomy and for biosafety; terrestrial biological diversity; knowledge, innovations and practices of indigenous and local communities; programme issues; the development and transfer of technology; identification, monitoring and assessment of components of biological diversity; and the pilot phase (1996-1997) of the clearing-house mechanism and its operations, namely, information linking and organization, visualization and the decision support function. The Conference decided to extend the pilot phase to December 1998.

The Conference also considered the report of the first meeting of the Open-ended Ad Hoc Working Group on Biosafety (Aarhus, Denmark, 22-26 July) [UNEP/CBD/COP/3/26], which discussed the elaboration of a protocol setting out procedures, including advanced information agreement, in the safe transfer, handling and use of any living modified organism resulting from biotechnology that might have an adverse effect on the conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity. The Group requested that the secretariat compile: a background document on existing international agreements relevant to the subject; a bibliography of literature on the positive and negative potential socio-economic effects of biotechnology; and definitions already contained in binding international agreements of the terms proposed for definition in the protocol [UNEP/CBD/COP/3/27]. The Conference decided that two meetings of the Group would be held in 1997, and a sufficient number of meetings held in 1998 to allow the Group to complete its work.

During the year, memoranda of cooperation were signed between the secretariats of the Convention and the 1971 Convention on Wetlands of International Importance, especially as Waterfowl Habitat, and the secretariats of the Convention and the 1979 Convention on the Conservation of Migratory Species of Wild Animals.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/182.

Convention on Biological Diversity

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions 49/117 of 19 December 1994 and 50/111 of 20 December 1995 on the Convention on Biological Diversity and 49/119 of 19 December 1994 on the International Day for Biological Diversity,

Recalling the provisions of the Convention on Biological Diversity,

Recalling also Agenda 21, particularly its chapter 15 on the conservation of biological diversity, and related chapters,

Recalling further the recommendations made at the third session of the Commission on Sustainable Development on the review of chapter 15 of Agenda 21 on the conservation of biological diversity,

Deeply concerned by the continued loss of the world's biological diversity and, on the basis of the provisions of the Convention, reaffirming the commitment to the conservation of biological diversity, the sustainable use of its components, and the fair and equitable sharing of benefits arising out of the utilization of genetic resources,

Emphasizing that the Convention is an important instrument for achieving sustainable development, taking into account its three objectives,

Noting with satisfaction that most States and one regional economic integration organization have ratified or acceded to the Convention,

Taking note with appreciation of the generous offer of the Government of Argentina to host the third meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention at Buenos Aires from 4 to 15 November 1996,

Encouraged by the work carried out to date under the Convention,

1. Welcomes the results of the second meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity, held at Jakarta from 6 to 17 November 1995, as reflected in the report of the meeting, submitted in accordance with resolution 50/111, and in that context reaffirms the need to take concrete action to fulfil the three objectives of the Convention, and takes note of the Jakarta Mandate on the Conservation and Sustainable Use of Marine and Coastal Biological Diversity, which proposes a framework for global action;

2. Takes note of the results of the second meeting of the Convention's Subsidiary Body on Scientific, Technical and Technological Advice, held at the seat of the secretariat of the Convention at Montreal, Canada, from 2 to 6 September 1996, and of the work carried out at the first meeting of the Open-ended Ad Hoc Working Group on Biosafety, held at Aarhus, Denmark, from 22 to 26 July 1996;

3. Encourages those States that have not yet ratified the Convention to do so;

4. Recognizes that States Parties have agreed to provide financial resources for the implementation of the Convention in accordance with article 20, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Convention;

5. Invites the Executive Secretary of the Convention to provide to the General Assembly at its special session in 1997, inter alia, information on experience gained under the Convention to date and on effective arrangements for the coordination of activities related to the objectives of the Convention;

6. Welcomes the work being carried out under the Convention to enhance cooperation with the Commission on Sustainable Development and biodiversity-related conventions, and invites the Conference of the Parties to the Convention to take into account the outcome of the 1997 special session at its fourth meeting, when considering ways of promoting greater cooperation with the United Nations system and the international community in relation to activities relevant to the objectives of the Convention;

7. Invites the Executive Secretary of the Convention on Biological Diversity to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session and, pending the outcome of the 1997 special session, to report to the Assembly on the results of future meetings of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention;

8. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session a sub-item entitled "Convention on Biological Diversity".

General Assembly resolution 51/182

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/605/Add.3) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.31), based on informal consultations on draft by Colombia (for Non-Aligned Movement) and Costa Rica (for Group of 77 and China) (A/C.2/51/L.5); agenda item 97 (c).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 10-15, 22, 37; plenary 86.

Convention to combat desertification

As at 31 December, the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, adopted in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 944] and opened for signature in October of that year, had been signed by 114 countries and the EC; 57 States had ratified, acceded to or accepted the Convention, 38 of them in 1996. The Convention entered into force on 26 December, 90 days following the deposit of the fiftieth instrument of ratification.

The eighth (Geneva, 5-15 February) [A/51/76] and ninth (New York, 3-13 September) [A/51/76/Add.1] sessions of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for the Elaboration of the Convention (INCD) focused on preparations for the first Conference of the Parties, scheduled for 1997. Some of the issues before INCD related to the interim arrangements to support the Convention beyond the first Conference of the Parties; procedures for communication of information and review of the Convention's implementation; terms of reference and work programme of the Committee on Science and Technology, a subsidiary body of the Conference; a global mechanism to promote the mobilization of financial resources; and the financial rules of the Conference, its subsidiary bodies and the permanent secretariat. Following offers by Canada, Germany and Spain to host the permanent secretariat of the Convention in Montreal, Bonn or Murcia, respectively, INCD asked its Chairman to establish a contact group to clarify the offers and decided to consider the item in 1997 based on the group's deliberations. Under the Convention, INCD was obliged to meet once during the year following the Convention's entry into force.

INCD accepted an invitation by the Government of Italy to host the first Conference of the Parties in Rome and an offer by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) of services and facilities. The exact dates of the Conference were to be determined at a later stage.

Report of Secretary-General. In response to a 1995 Assembly resolution [YUN 1995, p. 1075], the Secretary-General submitted, in October, a report [A/51/510] reviewing developments concerning the Convention. He discussed the status of the Convention, INCD sessions held in 1996, participation by States in INCD, the activities of the interim secretariat to observe the 1996 World Day to Combat Desertification and Drought (17 June), and the future work of INCD.

UNDP action. The UNDP Administrator stated that UNDP supported efforts to implement the Convention through its regular core programmes and through its Office to Combat Desertification and Drought (UNSO). In 1996, UNSO provided technical and financial support to 33 countries in various preparatory activities in implementation of the Convention. (See PART THREE, Chapter III.)

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/180.

Elaboration of an international convention to combat desertification in those countries experiencing serious drought and/or desertification, particularly in Africa

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 47/188 of 22 December 1992, 48/191 of 21 December 1993, 49/234 of 23 December 1994 and 50/112 of 20 December 1995 related to the elaboration of an international convention to combat desertification in those countries experiencing serious drought and/or desertification, particularly in Africa,

Recalling also the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa,

Recalling further its resolution 50/114 of 20 December 1995, in which it recalled the decisions of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development set forth in chapter 12 of Agenda 21, entitled "Managing fragile ecosystems: combating desertification and drought",

Noting the ongoing work in preparation for the first session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention undertaken by the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for the Elaboration of an International Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa,

Noting with satisfaction that to date more than fifty countries have already ratified the Convention,

Recalling that, in accordance with article 22, paragraph 4, of the Convention, the first session of the Conference of the Parties shall be convened by the interim secretariat of the Convention and shall take place not later than one year after the date of entry into force of the Convention,

Having considered the recommendations and decisions made by the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee at its eighth and ninth sessions regarding the Conference of the Parties to the Convention,

Having also considered the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 50/112 and on possible requirements for intergovernmental and secretariat work on the implementation of the Convention and its regional implementation annexes to respond effectively to the needs in the African, Asian and Latin American and the Caribbean regions,

Considering that the Convention is one of the most important achievements in the implementation of and follow-up to the recommendations and decisions of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, held at Rio de Janeiro in June 1992,

Taking into account the basic provisions of its resolution 40/243 of 18 December 1985,

1. Welcomes the fact that, in conformity with article 36, paragraph 1, of the United Nations Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, the Convention will enter into force on 26 December 1996, and calls upon more countries to take appropriate action for the ratification, acceptance or approval of or accession to the Convention;

2. Urges the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for the Elaboration of an International Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, at its tenth session, to be held in New York from 6 to 17 January 1997, to aim at finalizing all the outstanding negotiating issues, including the negotiations of the two working groups and the plan for the preparatory work for the first session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention;

3. Recalls the decision contained in paragraph 4 of its resolution 50/112 and, in this context, takes note of paragraph 3 of Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee decision 9/5 of 13 September 1996;

4. Decides that the first session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention shall be held from 29 September to 10 October 1997;

5. Accepts with deep appreciation the generous offer of the Government of Italy to host in Rome, at the headquarters of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the first session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention;

6. Decides to include the first session of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention and the meetings of its subsidiary bodies in the calendar of conferences and meetings for 1997-1998;

7. Requests the head of the interim secretariat to continue to promote cooperation and coordination with other relevant organizations and entities, particularly those of the United Nations system, in support of the regional implementation annexes, aimed, inter alia, at facilitating the efforts of affected developing country parties, particularly those in Africa, to fulfil their commitments under the Convention;

8. Urges all States, the United Nations system, including international financial institutions, and all other relevant organizations and actors, to take concrete actions and measures for the full and effective implementation of the provisions of Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee resolution 5/1 of 17 June 1994 on urgent action for Africa, as well as to promote actions for other affected developing countries and regions;

9. Notes the arrangements and contributions made by the Secretary-General and relevant organizations, funds and programmes active in the fields of desertification and drought;

10. Notes with appreciation the contributions made thus far to the Trust Fund established pursuant to resolution 47/188, and invites Governments, regional economic integration organizations and other interested organizations to continue to make voluntary contributions to the Trust Fund to support the interim secretariat of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee and the work of the Committee, and also for the transition period following the first session of the Conference of the Parties to support the secretariat of the Convention and the work of the Conference of the Parties;

11. Also notes with appreciation the contributions made to the Special Voluntary Fund established pursuant to resolution 47/188 to assist developing countries affected by desertification and drought, in particular the least developed countries, to participate fully and effectively in the negotiating process, and invites Governments, regional economic integration organizations and other organizations to continue to contribute generously to the Fund also for the transition period following the first session of the Conference of the Parties;

12. Renews its appeal to Governments, regional economic integration organizations and other interested organizations, as well as to non-governmental organizations and the private sector, to continue to make contributions to relevant United Nations bodies, in order to strengthen their capacity to support activities to combat desertification and mitigate the effects of drought in all affected developing countries and regions, particularly in Africa;

13. Requests the Secretary-General, subject to the decision of the Conference of the Parties at its first session, to consider:

(a) Authorizing the secretariat established pursuant to resolution 47/188 to act as secretariat for the transition period following the first session of the Conference of the Parties until the permanent secretariat designated by the Conference of the Parties begins operating, which should not be later than 31 December 1998;

(b) Maintaining the arrangements within the current programme budget for the interim secretariat to support the Convention beyond the first session of the Conference of the Parties until the permanent secretariat designated by the Conference of the Parties begins operating, which should not be later than 31 December 1998, and maintaining the arrangements relating to extrabudgetary funds;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to bring the present resolution to the attention of all Governments, the relevant specialized agencies, funds and programmes of the United Nations system, international financial institutions, other intergovernmental organizations, non-governmental organizations and relevant institutions;

15. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to it, at its fifty-second session, on the implementation of the present resolution and on any possible implications arising from the report of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention on its first session;

Environmental activities

The atmosphere

Atmosphere and climate protection

Reports of Secretary-General. In a February report [E/CN.17/1996/22] to the Commission on Sustainable Development, prepared by the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) and the World Meteorological Organization as task managers for chapter 9 of Agenda 21 (protection of the atmosphere), the Secretary-General stated that there had been steady progress towards an improved scientific basis for policy decisions, particularly in the areas of ozone depletion and global climate change. National research programmes and global environmental observing systems under the inter-agency Climate Agenda [YUN 1995, p. 1077] provided an understanding of the impacts of an altered atmosphere on people and their environment. The Climate Agenda dealt with new frontiers in climate science and production; climate services for sustainable development; studies of climate impact assessments and response strategies to reduce vulnerability; and dedicated observations of the climate system.

The Secretary-General noted that global atmospheric concentrations and emissions of the major greenhouse gases continued to increase. Developed market economies had achieved a significant reduction in energy intensity due to improvements in the generation of energy and end-use efficiency in many socio-economic sectors. Experiences in developing countries varied considerably because of the significant differences in their resources base, energy demand structures, economic situation, technological capacity, population and development strategy. Pollution of the atmosphere from industrial activity in the developed market economies appeared to have moderated over the past two decades with improved energy efficiency, conservation and the decarbonization of fuels. In developing countries, end-use efficiency could be improved, he stated, by using available technologies. Global production and consumption of the major ozone-depleting substances (ODS) had decreased markedly. However, an illegal trade in chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs), the largest contributors to ozone depletion, had developed. Moreover, in a number of countries, the consumption of CFCs continued to increase. As to transboundary atmospheric pollution, actions to address national issues in developed countries and agreements among developed countries had led to a reduction.

The Secretary-General concluded that there were good prospects for involving developing countries in protection of stratospheric ozone and in negotiations to address global climate change. However, to promote faster progress towards sustainability, three areas required attention: developing countries needed further assistance and encouragement to ensure protection of the atmosphere; there should be a recognition of the link between individual issues and an increased focus on an integrated approach to address the problems; and increased attention should be given to sustainable resource management in addition to avoidance or correction of specific adverse environmental impacts.

As to policies to address major atmospheric issues, the Secretary-General pointed out that implementation in developed countries was in some cases inadequate, and developing countries were only beginning to institute policies and actions to address the issues.

The Secretary-General's recommendations for action by States to protect the atmosphere and climate included: ratifying and implementing relevant conventions, protocols and regional agreements; ensuring adequate funding to regional and international bodies supporting the conventions, protocols and agreements; implementing international and regional agreements in a way that avoided creating or enhancing other environmental issues; developing national environmental programmes to protect the atmosphere; enhancing research programmes, improving the basis for decision-making, and cooperating with experts in developed and developing countries; encouraging broader participation by environmental NGOs, industries, communities and academic institutions in developing and implementing atmospheric protection strategies; and reviewing financial contributions to relevant mechanisms to ensure sufficient resources to assist developing countries in implementing their commitments.

At the international level, the Secretary-General proposed intensified efforts to enhance coordination between various conventions, protocols and regional agreements to protect the atmosphere; a better coordinated institutional approach to provide scientific, technical and economic assessments of major human activities contributing to atmospheric modification; and political support for the inter-agency climate agenda to facilitate the provision of resources needed to implement international climate-related activities, including research programmes and systematic observations, and to promote national climate-related activities.

In an addendum to his report [E/CN.17/1996/22/Add.1], the Secretary-General summarized information on progress made and experiences reported by organizations, which had formed the basis of his report.

The Commission had before it a March report [E/CN.17/1996/19] of the Secretary-General concerning the protection of the atmosphere, based on reports received from 24 States. He explained that the safe use of technologies within industry, transport and energy, as well as environmental impact assessment and research and development within the same areas, was being given high priority by all developed countries. Legislation had been revised or was in the process of being revised, and all developed countries had agreed to the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer and its amendments and had ratified the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. They had agreements on transboundary pollution control and had provided information about emissions of carbon dioxide, sulphur dioxide, oxides of nitrogen and methane. Reductions in CFC consumption as agreed under the Montreal Protocol and its amendments were considerable.

Developing countries placed equally high emphasis on the use of safe technologies, environmental impact assessment and research and development, but their limited resources constrained them and resulted in less attention paid to research and development, life-cycle analysis and the transport sector. Few developing countries provided information about emissions of pollutants into the air and several did not have the capacity to monitor transboundary pollution, nor had they signed agreements covering that issue.

Annexed to the report was data provided by Governments on actions taken to protect the atmosphere since the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) [YUN 1992, p. 672].

Working Group on Sectoral Issues. The Ad Hoc Inter-sessional Working Group on Sectoral Issues (atmosphere and oceans) (New York, 26 February-1 March) [E/CN.17/1996/6] noted the proposals made by the Secretary-General to States (see above) and suggested additional recommendations for consideration by the Commission. It recommended that States consider the broad spectrum of policy instruments available to them for improving energy efficiency and efficiency standards in all sectors; encouraged Governments and organizations to cooperate in implementing policy and economic instruments for minimizing the adverse effects of international competitiveness and optimizing the allocation of resources; and urged countries to sign, ratify and implement the Climate Convention, the Convention to Combat Desertification in those Countries Experiencing Serious Drought and/or Desertification, particularly in Africa, the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer, the Montreal Protocol and its amendments, and the Convention on Biological Diversity.

The Group presented recommendations to the Commission concerning establishing a sound scientific base upon which to develop appropriate responses to atmospheric degradation; promoting sustainable development; stratospheric ozone depletion; and transboundary air pollution.

Commission action. On 3 May [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/15)], the Commission, stressing the close inter-relationship between protection of oceans and all kinds of seas and protection of the atmosphere, in view of the exchange of matter and energy that took place between the atmosphere and oceans and their influence on marine and terrestrial ecosystems, called for the integration of protective measures to address the problems of adverse impacts of human activity on the atmosphere and the oceans. It stressed the need to further strengthen coordination mechanisms between regions and subregions for better exchange of information and experience.

The Commission, among other things, urged Governments to consider the broad spectrum of cost-effective policy instruments to improve energy efficiency and efficiency standards and to promote the use of sustainable and environmentally sound renewable energy sources, as well as the use of energy sources with low greenhouse gas emissions. It urged them and organizations, in considering transboundary air pollution issues, to take measures to reduce emissions of acidifying substances, and urged developed countries to enhance programmes that shared management expertise, scientific expertise and information on technical mitigation options with developing countries and countries with economies in transition. Governments and relevant institutions and organizations were urged to utilize education and training, information dissemination, enhancement of knowledge and voluntary agreements to improve efficiency in the production, distribution and use of energy and other natural resources.

The Commission asked the Secretary-General to report in 1997 on an inventory of ongoing energy-oriented programmes and activities within the UN system, as well as on proposals for arrangements that might be needed to foster the link between energy and sustainable development within the United Nations.

UNEP activities. UNEP co-sponsored a Regional Conference on Activities Implemented Jointly in Countries with Economies in Transition under the Framework Convention on Climate Change (Prague, Czech Republic, 17-19 April). Some 30 projects were presented which offered various options for mitigating carbon dioxide emissions, ranging from fuel substitution to afforestation programmes.

In May, UNEP held a workshop with the National Environmental Protection Agency of China on safety issues relating to CFC substitution in refrigeration, aerosol and foam plants. The workshop contributed to building the capacities of local governments and industries in handling safety concerns and to the development of safety standards.

In collaboration with the Hydrometeorological Service and the Ministry of Science, Technology and Environment of Viet Nam, UNEP convened two workshops (Hanoi and Ho Chi Minh, 4-9 July). The workshops aimed at increasing policy makers' and industry leaders' understanding of the negative effects of ODS.

In observance of the International Day for Preservation of the Ozone Layer (16 September), UNEP, in collaboration with the Government of Kenya, held a seminar on the ozone layer in Nairobi. It discussed the environmental effects of ozone depletion, capacity-building for the phasing out of ODS, and available alternatives and technologies.

UNEP's Industry and Environment Ozone Action Programme organized an intergovernmental consultative meeting of high-ranking officials of countries with economies in transition on the Montreal Protocol (Riga, Latvia, 4-5 November). The meeting, hosted by the Ministry of Environment and Regional Development of Latvia, supported by UNDP and funded by the Global Environment Facility, explored ways to accelerate ratification of the Montreal Protocol and its amendments to protect the stratospheric ozone layer.

The Ozone Action Programme of UNEP released the fourth diskette version of the database Ozone Action Information Clearinghouse. The information exchange service was designed to assist national ozone units and industry associations from developing countries in phasing out ODS.

Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change

At its twelfth session (Mexico City, 11-13 September), the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) agreed on a schedule of technical papers, special reports and workshops for the next two years.

In addition to its major assessment reports, IPCC responded to the needs of the parties to the Climate Convention by producing technical papers. It agreed to produce four papers in 1996-1997, as requested by the Subsidiary Body for Scientific and Technological Advice and the Ad Hoc Group on the Berlin Mandate, dealing with technologies, policies and measures for mitigating climate change; the stabilization of greenhouse gas concentrations in the atmosphere; climate system models used by IPCC for the projection of future climate; and the temperature and sea-level implications of proposed carbon dioxide emission limitations.

Terrestrial ecosystems

Biodiversity and biosafety

In response to public concerns about the potential risks to the environment and human health posed by living modified organisms produced by modern biotechnology, UNEP promoted biosafety in cooperation with the secretariat of the Convention on Biological Diversity (see above) and other institutions.

UNEP's Environmental Natural Resource Information Network Programme hosted a regional workshop (Nairobi, 27-28 June) on the use of databases to support decision-making in biodiversity conservation in East Africa. The workshop reviewed progress made by the region's collaborating institutions in developing biodiversity databases.

The UNEP/Biotechnology Industry Meeting (Geneva, 8 July) involved industries in the implementation of the 1995 UNEP International Technical Guidelines for Safety in Biotechnology [YUN 1995, p. 1078], a tool to facilitate the development of biosafety expertise and regulatory frameworks worldwide. At the meeting, the industrial sector expressed its commitment to ensure safety in biotechnology. Key stakeholders, including Governments, NGOs and industries, were encouraged to provide information on biosafety mechanisms to the newly established UNEP International Register on Biosafety. A complement to the Guidelines, the Register was set up in response to the growing need of countries for information concerning living modified organisms and invasive species.

Under its Outreach Programme on Indigenous People, UNEP participated in the fifth International Congress of Ethnobiology (Nairobi, 2-6 September), with a presentation on the promotion of women's indigenous knowledge as a tool towards sustainable environmental management. It focused on the importance of indigenous knowledge in the management of biodiversity and the environment.

Desertification and drought control

World Day to Combat Drought and Desertification

In Kenya, on 17 and 18 June, UNEP commemorated the World Day to Combat Desertification and Drought, proclaimed by the General Assembly in 1994 [GA res. 49/115], by attempting to bridge the gaps that existed between people, businesses and Governments in understanding the global dryland crisis. The "Saving the Drylands" awards were granted to two community projects: the Jhanwar watershed project in India and the SOS Sahel community forestry project in Ed Debba, Sudan.

Deforestation and forest degradation

The Ad Hoc Intergovernmental Panel on Forests (IPF), established in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1080] under the aegis of the Commission on Sustainable Development to conduct studies and report in 1997 with recommendations, held its second session in 1996 (Geneva, 11-22 March) [E/CN.17/1996/24]. The report on the session contained the Co-Chairmen's summary of the Panel's discussion on programme elements included in its terms of reference. Programme elements that were discussed, following consideration of reports of the Secretary-General thereon, focused on the underlying causes of deforestation and forest degradation; fragile ecosystems affected by desertification and the impact of airborne pollution on forests; the needs and requirements of countries with low forest cover; international cooperation in financial assistance and technology transfer for sustainable forest management; assessment of the multiple benefits of all types of forests; and methodologies for the proper valuation of the multiple benefits for forests.

In connection with preparations for a substantive discussion during its third session (see below), IPF held initial discussions on the balance of programme elements. They were discussed following consideration of reports submitted by the Secretary-General on progress in national forest and land-use plans; traditional forest-related knowledge; criteria and indicators for sustainable forest management; trade and environment in relation to forest products and services; and international organizations and multilateral institutions and instruments, including appropriate legal mechanisms.

IPF recommended to the Economic and Social Council, through the Commission, a draft decision. The Council, by decision 1996/230 of 11 July, approved the IPF request to hold its third session in Geneva from 9 to 20 September and its fourth in New York for a two-week period in 1997. The Council also approved the IPF request for provision to be made so that the two sessional working groups it intended to establish during those sessions could meet simultaneously.

The Panel also adopted a decision concerning additional voluntary contributions to support its work, which it brought to the Commission's attention.

The object of the third session of IPF was to produce a document containing elements to be used by the Panel at its fourth session in preparing its final (1997) report to the Commission. The text of the document, presented in the report on the third session, contained conclusions and proposals for action on all of the programme elements. The elements were open to further discussion and negotiation, with a view to arriving at a general agreement on the conclusions and proposals.

IPF had before it reports of the Secretary-General on the programme elements, as follows: progress in national forest and land-use plans; underlying causes of deforestation and forest degradation; traditional forest-related knowledge; fragile ecosystems affected by desertification, and the impact of airborne pollution on forests; needs and requirements of countries with low forest cover; international cooperation in financial assistance and technology transfer; assessment of the multiple benefits of all types of forests; criteria and indicators for sustainable forest management; trade and environment relating to forest goods and services; international organizations and multilateral institutions and instruments; contribution to consensus-building towards the further implementation of the forest principles; the issues, policies and challenges of measuring and capturing forest values.

Various inter-sessional meetings and activities contributed to the preparation of the reports for the Panel and to the deliberations at its third session, among them: Independent Group of Experts established under the Swiss-Peruvian Initiative on Forests (first and second sessions, Geneva, 5-7 March and 24-28 June); International Conference on Certification and Labelling of Products from Sustainably Managed Forests (Brisbane, Australia, 26-31 May); Workshop on Financial Mechanisms and Sources of Finance for Sustainable Forestry (Pretoria, South Africa, 4-7 June); Expert Consultation on Implementing the Forest Principles: Promotion of National Forest and Land-use Programmes (Feldafing, Germany, 16-21 June); International Experts' Working Group Meeting on Trade, Labelling of Forest Products and Certification of Sustainable Forest Management (Bonn, Germany, 12-16 August); and Intergovernmental Seminar on Criteria and Indicators for Sustainable Forest Management (Helsinki, Finland, 19-22 August). The Government of Norway initiated a study on the long-term trends and prospects in world supply and demand for wood and implications for sustainable forest management, and forwarded a report thereon to the Panel. In September, the Ministers Responsible for Forest Matters of the Nordic States of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden transmitted a statement to the Panel.

Marine ecosystems

Protection of the marine and coastal environment

Reports of Secretary-General. In February, the Secretary-General submitted a report to the Commission on Sustainable Development [E/CN.17/1996/3], prepared by the Subcommittee on Oceans and Coastal Areas of the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) as task manager for chapter 17 of Agenda 21 (protection of the oceans, all kinds of seas, including enclosed and semi-enclosed seas, and coastal areas and the protection, rational use and development of their living resources).

The Secretary-General noted that coastal areas were home to 60 per cent of the world's population. Oceans, which covered 71 per cent of the Earth's surface, contained a vast proportion of the world's biodiversity. They were a major sink for atmospheric carbon and for the toxins and chemical substances carried by continental effluents and through the atmosphere, as well as a powerful regulator of the world's climate. He observed that the most important traditional ocean resources, including coastal environments and conventional fishery resources, were overused and required improved management. In many cases, the unrestricted use of technology, the growing demand for goods and services from the ocean, uncontrolled population growth and continuous migration to coastal areas had led to the depletion of living resources and the degradation of the coastal and marine environment as well as of the economic conditions of some of the major sectors exploiting the ocean.

Constraints to progress were found in the fact that oceans and coastal areas were a finite economic asset yet to be fully understood by Governments; Member States' concerns were voiced by different governmental representatives in different intergovernmental forums and in different ways, depending on the constituencies, which resulted in a lack of coherent policy within the United Nations; most countries had not established national coordination mechanisms to enhance implementation of chapter 17; concerns of the private sector and many poor communities were driven by short-term economic priorities that tended to give low priority to resource conservation and the needs of future generations; resource constraints often limited the amount of attention and financial support Governments could devote to scientific research and its application to national policy options; and UN efforts regarding chapter 17 needed to be based on a co-ordinated approach embracing scientific, technological and socio-economic factors.

Despite those difficulties, progress had been made in relation to chapter 17 programme areas (integrated management of coastal areas, marine environmental protection, sustainable use and conservation of living marine resources of the high seas and of such resources under national jurisdiction, critical uncertainties for the management of the marine environment and climate change, strengthening international and regional cooperation and coordination). Areas where progress was not as satisfactory included the continuing decline in the abundance of fishery resources and in the economic health of fisheries; the gap between total financial resource needs estimated at UNCED and those being mobilized; insufficient development of national capacity to implement sustainable development strategies; the insufficient level of implementation by Governments of existing rules, regulations, international standards and conventions; the different implementation rates between developed and developing countries; and the insufficient gender perspective in all policies and programmes.

The Secretary-General suggested a series of actions for the Commission.

In an April addendum to his report [E/CN.17/1996/3/Add.1], the Secretary-General provided additional information on implementation of chapter 17. He presented a general overview of the main policy issues concerning the programme areas of chapter 17, and reviewed the experiences of countries and NGOs in those areas. Based on experiences within the UN system, the Secretary-General reviewed issues related to finance, technology transfer and capacity-building, which, he stated, affected significantly the capacity of countries to implement Agenda 21.

The Secretary-General concluded that the UN system had contributed to raising awareness of sustainable development issues in the oceans and coastal areas. Institutional set-ups and management processes had been reviewed, including the establishment of the Commission and the ACC Subcommittee and replenishment of the Global Environment Facility, and coordination of UN agencies had been further improved. Legal frameworks and conventions had been developed and strengthened. NGO participation in the international debate had been promoted and enhanced. However, concern might arise from the lack of additional support for the burden that various post-UNCED activities represented for countries and for UN agencies; the insufficient flow of financial resources in support of national implementation; and the relatively slow pace in the development of national capacity, particularly in the areas of information systems, research and institutions. Modifications of consumption patterns had not yet been made, such as on overused coastal and fishery resources, but were being addressed by the Commission as well as by other bodies and organizations and in negotiations.

The Secretary-General proposed plans for future action within the programme areas of chapter 17.

In a March report to the Commission [E/CN.17/1996/19], the Secretary-General provided information on chapter 17, based on reports of 18 countries, the EC and the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific (ESCAP) and the Asian Development Bank. He stated that none of the developed countries reported any serious problem areas, although there were indications that control of sewage and other land-based pollution could be improved. The developing countries' reports reflected the lack of capacity or funding that plagued their ability to address the issues; thus, regular assessment of the coastal and marine environment was severely restricted. The EC report identified eutrophication as a problem in the Baltic and the North Seas, and coastal zone pollution in the Baltic and the Mediterranean Seas. The ESCAP/Asian Development Bank report addressed coastal and marine resources, environmental threats, and policies and programmes for managing coastal areas.

Annexed to the report was a country-by-country matrix of key activities under review.

Working group activities. Participants in the Ad Hoc Inter-sessional Working Group on Sectoral Issues (New York, 26 February-1 March) [E/CN.17/1996/6] agreed that activities relating to oceans, seas and coastal areas required greater priority in decision-making. It was also noted that special characteristics and needs of individual countries needed to be recognized and addressed when suggesting intergovernmental actions.

The Group had before it a report on the London Workshop on Environmental Science, Comprehensiveness and Consistency in Global Decisions on Ocean Issues (30 November-2 December 1995) [E/CN.17/1996/23], which was jointly hosted by the Governments of Brazil and the United Kingdom.

The Group made a series of recommendations on chapter 17 programme areas.

Commission action. On 3 May [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/15)], the Commission recommended that the Economic and Social Council, subject to the outcome of the General Assembly's special session in 1997, approve: a periodic review by the Commission of all aspects of the marine environment and its related issues, as described in chapter 17; an invitation to the Secretary-General to review the working of the ACC Subcommittee on Oceans and Coastal Areas, with a view to improving its status and effectiveness; and an invitation to the Secretary-General and the executive heads of UN agencies and organizations sponsoring the Joint Group of Experts on the Scientific Aspects of Marine Environmental Protection to review the Group's terms of reference, composition and methods of work, with a view to improving its effectiveness and comprehensiveness while maintaining its status as a source of agreed, independent scientific advice.

The Commission took note that with regard to offshore oil and gas activities, the International Maritime Organization (IMO) had and was developing conclusions on harmonized environmental regulations in specific regional programmes. It called on States to adopt measures to ensure that the management of their water-courses, inland waters and the related catchments were consistent with the aims of their integrated coastal area management. States and the UN system were asked to promote programmes to guide management and corrective actions to control pollution in the larger coastal urban settlements, and the World Bank and regional development banks were asked to continue developing effective means for their implementation.

ACC Subcommittee. The ACC Subcommittee on Oceans and Coastal Areas (fourth session, London, 28-30 May) [ACC/1996/8] drew the attention of the Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development to issues relating to institutional arrangements for the implementation of the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities; international cooperation and coordination; its future work plan, particularly its newly agreed upon functions concerning the inter-agency review of the Programme of Action; and administrative matters.

Regarding international cooperation and coordination, the Subcommittee expressed its willingness to undertake the coordination of a periodic review of the marine environment and related issues, as described in chapter 17. The Subcommittee felt strongly that it should focus on chapter 17 and should address a selected number of issues that needed to be brought to the attention of Governments at the General Assembly for appropriate action. It recommended that the proposed periodic review be considered by the Assembly every three to five years.

Global Programme of Action

In March [A/51/116], the United States asked the Secretary-General to circulate the report of the 1995 Intergovernmental Conference to Adopt a Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities and the Global Programme of Action [YUN 1995, p. 1081]. The Conference was hosted by the United States and held in Washington, D.C.

Working Group activities. The Ad Hoc Inter-session Working Group on Sectoral Issues (New York, 26 February-1 March) [E/CN.17/1996/6] agreed to transmit to the Commission elements for further negotiation that could be included in a draft resolution on institutional arrangements for the implementation of the Global Programme of Action, to be considered for approval by the General Assembly (see below).

Commission action. On 3 May [E/1996/2.8 (dec. 4/15)], the Commission on Sustainable Development welcomed the successful outcome of the Conference and decided to submit to the Economic and Social Council, for adoption, a draft resolution on the institutional arrangements for the implementation of the Global Programme of Action (see below). It endorsed a request contained in the Washington Declaration on the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities [YUN 1995, p. 1082], adopted by the Conference, for the UNEP Executive Director, in close partnership with the World Health Organization (WHO), the UN Centre for Human Settlements, UNDP and other relevant organizations, to prepare proposals for a plan to address the global nature of the problem of inadequate management and treatment of waste water and its consequences for human health and the environment, and to promote the transfer of appropriate and affordable technology drawn from the best available techniques, and referred to in the Global Programme of Action.

The Commission recognized the intention of the Conference's participating Governments to develop, in accordance with the Programme of Action, a global, legally binding instrument to reduce and/or eliminate emissions, discharges and, where appropriate, eliminate the manufacture of persistent organic pollutants.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 11 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/1.

Institutional arrangements for the implementation of the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities

The Economic and Social Council

Recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the following draft resolution:

[For text, see General Assembly resolution 51/189 below.]

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/1

11 July 1996 Meeting 31 Adopted without vote

Draft by Commission on Sustainable Development (E/1996/28); agenda item 6 (a).

Meeting numbers. ESC 30, 31.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/189.

Institutional arrangements for the implementation of the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities

The General Assembly,

Recalling the relevant provisions of Agenda 21, in particular chapters 17, 33, 34, 38 and other related chapters, and the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development,

Recalling also its resolution 50/110 of 20 December 1995 on the report of the Governing Council of the United Nations Environment Programme, in which it endorsed, inter alia, Governing Council decision 18/31 on the protection of the marine environment from land-based activities,

Noting the successful conclusion of the Intergovernmental Conference to Adopt a Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities, which was held in Washington, D.C., from 23 October to 3 November 1995,

Having considered the Washington Declaration on Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities and the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities, as well as the proposal of the United Nations Environment Programme on institutional arrangements and implementation of the Global Programme of Action and relevant recommendations of the Commission on Sustainable Development,

1. Endorses the Washington Declaration on Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities and the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities;

2. Stresses the need for States to take the necessary measures for the implementation of the Global Programme of Action at the national and, as appropriate, the regional and international levels;

3. Also stresses the need for States to take action for the formal endorsement by each competent international organization of those parts of the Global Programme of Action that are relevant to their mandates and to accord appropriate priority to the implementation of the Global Programme of Action in the work programme of each organization;

4. Further stresses the need for States to take such action at the next meetings of the governing bodies of the United Nations Environment Programme, the United Nations Development Programme, the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (Habitat), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the World Health Organization, the International Maritime Organization, the International Atomic Energy Agency, the International Labour Organization and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization and in the Intergovernmental Oceanographic Commission of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the relevant bodies of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, as well as in other competent international and regional organizations within and outside the United Nations system;

5. Further stresses the need for international cooperation, as outlined in sections IV.A and B of the Global Programme of Action, in capacity-building, technology transfer and cooperation, and the mobilization of financial resources, including support, in particular for developing countries, especially the least developed countries, countries with economies in transition and small island developing States, and to this end calls upon bilateral donors and international, regional and subregional financial institutions and mechanisms, including the Global Environment Facility, and other competent development and financial institutions:

(a) To ensure that their programmes give appropriate priority for country-driven projects aimed at the implementation of the Global Programme of Action;

(b) To assist with capacity-building in the preparation and implementation of national programmes and in identifying ways and means of funding them;

(c) To improve their coordination so as to enhance the delivery of financial and other support;

6. Invites non-governmental organizations and major groups to initiate and strengthen their actions to facilitate and support the effective implementation of the Global Programme of Action;

7. Requests the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme to prepare, for the consideration of the Governing Council at its nineteenth session, specific proposals on:

(a) The role of the United Nations Environment Programme in the implementation of the Global Programme of Action, including the relevant role of its Regional Seas Programme and Freshwater Unit;

(b) Arrangements for secretariat support to the Global Programme of Action;

(c) Modalities for periodic intergovernmental review of progress in implementing the Global Programme of Action;

8. Calls upon the United Nations Environment Programme, within its available resources, and with the aid of voluntary contributions from States for this purpose, to take expeditious action to provide for the establishment and implementation of the clearing-house mechanism referred to in the Global Programme of Action, and requests the Executive Director of the United Nations Environment Programme to prepare and submit to the Governing Council at its nineteenth session specific proposals on, inter alia:

(a) The establishment of an inter-organizational group to develop the basic design and structure of the clearing-house data directory and its linkages to information delivery mechanisms;

(b) The means of linking the inter-organizational group to ongoing work within the United Nations system on the identification of and access to relevant databases and the comparability of data;

(c) The outline of a pilot project on the development of the clearing-house's source category component on sewage, to be implemented in partnership with the World Health Organization;

9. Calls upon States, in relation to the clearing-house mechanism, to take action in the governing bodies of relevant intergovernmental organizations and programmes so as to ensure that those organizations and programmes take the lead in coordinating the development of the clearing-house mechanism with respect to the following source categories, which are listed in conjunction with the relevant organization(s) or programme(s) but not in order of priority:

(a) Sewage—World Health Organization;

(b) Persistent organic pollutants—Inter-organization Programme for the Sound Management of Chemicals, the International Programme on Chemical Safety and the Intergovernmental Forum on Chemical Safety;

(c) Heavy metals—United Nations Environment Programme in cooperation with the Inter-organization Programme for the Sound Management of Chemicals;

(d) Radioactive substances—International Atomic Energy Agency;

(e) Nutrients and sediment mobilization—Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations;

(f) Oils (hydrocarbons) and litter—International Maritime Organization;

(g) Physical alterations, including habitat modification and destruction of areas of concern—United Nations Environment Programme;

10. Decides to determine, at its special session to be held in June 1997 in accordance with its resolution 50/113 of 20 December 1995, specific arrangements for integrating the outcomes of periodic intergovernmental reviews, as envisaged in paragraph 7 (c) above, in the future work of the Commission on Sustainable Development related to the monitoring of the implementation of and follow-up to Agenda 21, in particular chapter 17.

General Assembly resolution 51/189

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/601) without vote, 25 November (meeting 36); draft recommended by ESC in res. 1996/1 (A/C.2/51/L.2); agenda item 12.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 27, 28, 35, 36; plenary 86.

Living marine resources

Drift-net fishing, unauthorized fishing and fisheries by-catch and discards

In September, the Secretary-General submitted a report [A/51/404] providing information received from States, UN bodies and specialized agencies, NGOs and regional and subregional fisheries organizations regarding the impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas of large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing, unauthorized fishing in zones of national jurisdiction, and fisheries by-catch and discards.

On 18 November, the Republic of Korea drew to the attention of the Secretary-General what it called an unfounded allegation in his report made by Greenpeace that Korean vessels were engaged in drift-net fishing in the Mediterranean Sea [A/51/694].

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 9 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/36.

Large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing; unauthorized fishing in zones of national jurisdiction; and fisheries by-catch and discards

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its resolutions 46/215 of 20 December 1991, 49/116 and 49/118 of 19 December 1994 as well as other relevant resolutions,

Reaffirming also its resolution 50/25 of 5 December 1995 on large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing and its impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas, unauthorized fishing in zones of national jurisdiction and its impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas, and fisheries by-catch and discards and their impact on the sustainable use of the world's living marine resources,

Conscious of the need to promote and facilitate international cooperation, especially at the regional and subregional levels, in order to ensure the sustainable development and use of the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas, consistent with the present resolution,

Mindful that the Agreement for the Implementation of the Provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982 relating to the Conservation and Management of Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks provides in its general principles that States shall minimize pollution, waste, discards, catch by lost or abandoned gear, catch of non-target species, both fish and non-fish species, and impacts on associated or dependent species, in particular endangered species, through measures including, to the extent practicable, the development and use of selective, environmentally safe and cost-effective fishing gear and techniques, and further provides that States shall take measures, including the establishment of regulations, to ensure that vessels flying their flags do not conduct unauthorized fishing within areas under the national jurisdiction of other States,

Noting that the Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries sets out principles and global standards of behaviour for responsible practices to conserve, manage and develop fisheries, including guidelines for fishing on the high seas and in areas under the national jurisdiction of other States, and on fishing gear selectivity and practices, with the aim of reducing by-catch and discards,

Expressing deep concern at the detrimental impact of unauthorized fishing in areas under national jurisdiction, where the overwhelming proportion of the global fish catch is harvested, on the sustainable development of the world's fishery resources and on the food security and economies of many States, particularly developing States,

Reaffirming once again the rights and duties of coastal States to ensure proper conservation and management measures with respect to the living resources in areas under their national jurisdiction, in accordance with international law as reflected in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing and its impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas, unauthorized fishing in zones of national jurisdiction and its impact on the living marine resources of the world's oceans and seas, and fisheries by-catch and discards and their impact on the sustainable use of the world's living marine resources,

Acknowledging with appreciation the measures taken and the progress made by members of the international community, international organizations and regional economic integration organizations to implement and support the objectives of resolution 46/215,

Recognizing the efforts that international organizations and members of the international community have made to reduce by-catch and discards in fishing operations,

Once again expressing deep concern that there are continuing reports of activities inconsistent with the terms of resolution 46/215 and unauthorized fishing inconsistent with the terms of resolution 49/116,

1. Reaffirms the importance it attaches to compliance with its resolution 46/215, in particular to those provisions of the resolution calling for full implementation of a global moratorium on all large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing on the high seas of the world's oceans and seas, including enclosed seas and semi-enclosed seas;

2. Notes that a growing number of States and other entities as well as relevant regional and subregional fisheries management organizations and arrangements have adopted legislation, established regulations or applied other measures to ensure compliance with resolutions 46/215 and 49/116, and urges them to enforce fully such measures;

3. Urges all authorities of members of the international community that have not done so to take greater enforcement responsibility to ensure full compliance with resolution 46/215 and to impose appropriate sanctions, consistent with their obligations under international law, against acts contrary to the terms of that resolution;

4. Calls upon States to take the responsibility, consistent with their obligations under international law as reflected in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and resolution 49/116, to take measures to ensure that no fishing vessels entitled to fly their national flags fish in areas under the national jurisdiction of other States unless duly authorized by the competent authorities of the coastal State or States concerned; such authorized fishing operations should be carried out in accordance with the conditions set out in the authorization;

5. Urges States, relevant international organizations and regional and subregional fisheries management organizations and arrangements to take action to adopt policies, apply measures, including through assistance to developing countries, collect and exchange data and develop techniques to reduce by-catches, fish discards and post-harvest losses consistent with international law and relevant international instruments, including the Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries;

6. Reiterates its call on development assistance organizations to make it a high priority to support, including through financial and/or technical assistance, efforts of developing coastal States, in particular the least developed countries and the small island developing States, to improve the monitoring and control of fishing activities and the enforcement of fishing regulations, including through financial and technical support for regional and subregional meetings for this purpose;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to bring the present resolution to the attention of all members of the international community, relevant intergovernmental organizations, the organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, regional and subregional fisheries management organizations, and relevant non-governmental organizations, and invites them to provide the Secretary-General with information relevant to the implementation of the present resolution;

8. Also requests the Secretary-General to ensure that reporting on all major fisheries-related activities and instruments is effectively coordinated and duplication of activities and reporting minimized and that relevant scientific and technical studies are disseminated to the international community, and invites the relevant specialized agencies, including the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, as well as regional and subregional fisheries organizations and arrangements, to cooperate with the Secretary-General to that end;

9. Further requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session and biennially thereafter a report on further developments relating to the implementation of resolutions 46/215, 49/116 and 49/118, taking into account the information provided by States, relevant specialized agencies, in particular the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, and other appropriate organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system, regional and subregional organizations and arrangements and other relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations;

10. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session, under an item entitled "Oceans and law of the sea", a sub-item entitled "Large-scale pelagic drift-net fishing; unauthorized fishing in zones of national jurisdiction; and fisheries by-catch and discards".

9 December 1996

Meeting 77

Adopted without vote

23-nation draft (A/51/L.29 & Add.1); agenda item 24 (c).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: plenary 76, 77.

International fishery instruments

The Commission on Sustainable Development, on 3 May [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/15)], noting with concern that significant fish stocks were depleted or overexploited, considered that urgent action was needed to rebuild depleted fish stocks and to ensure the sustainable use of all fish stocks. It stated that adequate financial, scientific and technological cooperation should be provided to support the actions of developing countries to implement the objectives concerning the programme area of chapter 17 dealing with marine living resources under national jurisdiction, as well as the provisions of the 1995 Agreement for the Implementation of the Provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982 relating to the Conservation and Management of Straddling Fish Stocks and Highly Migratory Fish Stocks [YUN 1995, p. 1334] and the 1995 FAO Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries [YUN 1995, p. 1471].

The Commission stressed the importance of effective conservation and management of fish stocks and recommended implementing the international instruments to: prevent or eliminate overfishing and excess fishing capacity; apply the precautionary approach as referred to in the 1995 Agreement and FAO Code of Conduct; rebuild fish stocks throughout their entire range of distribution and protect vital habitats; strengthen or create regional and subregional fisheries management organizations and arrangements in accordance with the Agreement and FAO Code; strengthen fishery research; promote environmentally sound fisheries technologies, prohibiting dynamiting, poisoning and other destructive fishing practices; minimize waste, discards, catch by lost or abandoned gear and catch of non-target species in accordance with the Agreement and FAO Code; protect fisheries from harmful sea- and land-based activities; deter the activities of vessels flying the flag of non-members or non-participants engaging in activities which undermined the effectiveness of subregional or regional conservation and management measures; increase efforts to ensure full compliance with applicable conservation and management measures; increase consultations among all local parties affected by fishery management decisions; and avoid adverse impacts on small-scale and artisanal fisheries consistent with the sustainable management of fish stocks, while protecting the rights of fishers, including subsistence, small-scale and artisanal fishers.

The Commission recommended that FAO be invited to prepare a report, based on information provided by its member States, on the actions listed above and, more generally, on progress made in improving the sustainability of fisheries, for consideration by the FAO Committee on Fisheries and for submission to the Secretary-General.

Coral reef initiative

On 3 May [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/15)], the Commission on Sustainable Development, recognizing the importance of coral reefs and other related ecosystems as a life-support system of many countries and as a rich source of biodiversity, welcomed the 1995 Call to Action of the International Coral Reef Initiative (ICRI) [YUN 1995, p. 1084] as a means to address threats to coral reefs and related ecosystems and the inauguration of the 1997 International Year of the Reefs.

An international coral reef symposium (Panama, 24-29 June) addressed several key issues, including the enhancement of scientists' involvement in reef conservation and management, the use of coral skeletons to assess past climates and predict consequences of global climate change, the management of marine protected areas in the Tropics, and the links between fisheries and the health of coral reefs.

Through its Regional Seas Programme, UNEP was facilitating the convening of regional ICRI workshops and was providing technical assistance to regions. A workshop on coral reefs (Mahe, Seychelles, 29 March-2 April) resulted in an action plan for coral reef management in the region of the western Indian Ocean and East Africa. In addition, UNEP co-sponsored a workshop with the United States Agency for International Development (25 June) on the participation of managers and scientists in the management of coral reefs and related resources.

Conservation of wildlife

Concluded in 1995 under the auspices of the 1979 Convention on the Conservation of Migratory Species of Wild Animals (CMS), the Agreement on the Conservation of African-Eurasian Migratory Waterbirds was opened for signature on 15 August in The Hague by the depositary, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands. Covering nearly 120 countries, the Agreement, the product of collaboration among the Government of the Netherlands, the UNEP/CMS secretariat, Wetlands International and many countries and NGOs in the regions concerned, was scheduled to enter into force following the signature of at least 14 Range States from Africa and Eurasia.

On 10 December, the 1994 Lusaka Agreement on Cooperative Enforcement Operations Directed at Illegal Trade in Wild Fauna and Flora [YUN 1994, p. 951] entered into force, 60 days following the receipt of the fourth instrument of ratification or accession. Uganda and the United Republic of Tanzania ratified it in 1996, Lesotho had acceded to it and Zambia had ratified it in 1995. The Agreement, concluded under the auspices of UNEP, aimed to reduce and ultimately eliminate illegal international trafficking in African wildlife.

Protection against harmful products and wastes

Chemical safety

Prior informed consent procedure

As requested by the UNEP Governing Council in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1085], UNEP convened with FAO the first session of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee for an International Legally Binding Instrument for the Application of the Prior Informed Consent (PIC) Procedure for Certain Hazardous Chemicals and Pesticides in International Trade (Brussels, Belgium, 11-15 March). At the meeting, the potential elements to be included in the PIC convention were identified and a working group progressed in identifying chemicals that could be covered by the convention. In that context, a Government-designated group of experts on further measures to reduce the risks from a limited number of chemicals, either within or beyond the scope of the existing PIC procedure, was convened (Copenhagen, Denmark, 16-19 April) [UNEP/GC.19/INF.7]. The expert group focused on the inadequate capacity of developing countries to handle issues of hazardous chemicals and pesticides; the disposal of unwanted stocks of pesticides and other chemicals; insufficient information for chemicals management decision-making and action; and the possible need to ban and phase out certain chemicals. The experts recommended that UNEP constitute an expert group which would provide advice to Governments on the definition of problems associated with obsolete pesticides and other chemicals in developing countries and countries with economies in transition, and the prevention, management, reuse and safe disposal of other chemicals.

The experts stressed that the Governing Council should take into consideration the global significance of the health and environmental problems caused by chemicals. They proposed specific tasks to be addressed by the Council with regard to capacity-building in chemicals management, information exchange and risk reduction from hazardous chemicals. It was suggested, among other things, that the Council call on member organizations of the Inter-Organization Programme for the Sound Management of Chemicals (IOMC) and other agencies to strengthen the coordination of their capacity-building activities. Additionally, the experts recommended that the Council ask the Intergovernmental Forum on Chemical Safety (IFCS) to propose to IOMC a series of actions improving information delivery. They also recommended that IFCS be invited to develop criteria identifying chemicals which posed risks of international concern. Furthermore, it was recommended that the Council call on donors to mobilize financing for the safe management of chemicals. In addition, the Council should request the Council of the Global Environment Facility to explore ways of incorporating in its operational strategy the need of countries to develop their capacities in chemicals management. The outcome of the Copenhagen meeting was to be submitted for consideration at the Governing Council session in 1997.

UNEP and FAO convened the second session of the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee (Nairobi, Kenya, 16-20 September). On the basis of the initial draft key articles presented by the Chairman, the Committee made progress in elaborating a number of draft articles essential for the mandatory application of the PIC procedure, such as the scope of the instrument, a procedure to include chemicals in the PIC procedure and obligations of exporting and importing parties. The Committee established two sessional groups—a technical working group and a legal drafting group. While the Committee had made progress, many facets of the instrument needed further detailed consideration. A need for at least one further negotiating session, before its final session and a diplomatic conference for the adoption of the instrument, was envisaged. The final negotiating session was expected to adopt the convention in 1997.

FAO and UNEP efforts to promote chemical safety were based on the 1985 FAO International Code of Conduct on the Distribution and Use of Pesticides [YUN 1985, p. 774] and the 1987 London Guidelines for the Exchange of Information on Chemicals in International Trade [YUN 1987, p. 697].

UNEP, the United Nations Institute for Training and Research and FAO convened a regional workshop (Accra, Ghana, 22-26 July) for Western and Central Africa on the sound management of chemicals. Government experts on chemicals management from 23 countries made recommendations to strengthen subregional and regional collaboration structures as well as cooperation among national chemicals focal points; enhance the capacities of Western and Central African countries in the field of chemicals management; and ensure the active participation of African countries in the negotiation and implementation of a legally binding PIC instrument. The workshop was funded by the Directorate General for Development of the European Commission as part of a series of regional workshops on the subject.

Persistent organic pollutants

UNEP convened a meeting of the Ad Hoc Working Group on Persistent Organic Pollutants (POPs) of IFCS on behalf of IOMC (Canberra, Australia, 9 March). UNEP presented the results relevant to POPs from a trade survey it carried out under the framework of the PIC procedure, which demonstrated that the chemicals were still used in many countries, although they had been banned for many years. UNEP was asked to ensure coordination between the ongoing POPs assessment and the Global Programme of Action for the Protection of the Marine Environment from Land-based Activities. The Working Group discussed the key issues to be addressed by the assessment for the elaboration of international actions. Issues identified as major concerns, particularly for developing countries, included information exchange, capacity-building, trade impacts, technology transfer, food production, public health considerations and financing.

Another meeting of the Ad Hoc Working Group (Manila, Philippines, 21-22 June) [UNEP/

GC.19/INF.8] recommended measures and strategies to be considered by the UNEP Governing Council in 1997. The Group recommended that the Governing Council and the WHO World Health Assembly decide that immediate international action be initiated to reduce and/or eliminate the emissions of the 12 POPs identified by the Governing Council: PCBs, dioxans, furans, aldrin, dieldrin, DDT, endrin, chlordane, hexachlorobenzene, mirex, toxaphene and heptachlor. In addition, the meeting suggested that the expeditious development of a global, legally binding instrument on POPs be undertaken. It was recommended that the Governing Council invite UNEP to convene an intergovernmental negotiating committee on the issue. The instrument would be prepared in collaboration with relevant international organizations. The Working Group recommended that the negotiating committee establish an expert group to develop science-based criteria to be considered in the negotiation of a binding instrument.

Regional concerns

Africa

One of the most promising projects under way in 1996 was the joint work of UNEP and the UN Centre for Human Settlements in the Great Lakes region of Africa (Burundi, Rwanda, Uganda, the United Republic of Tanzania, Zaire) to help bring about political, social and environmental stability, as well as sustainable economic development.

UNEP was organizing major awareness-building activities on the issues of water, land and waste management. The Regional Office for Africa (ROA) was working with communities all over the continent to find solutions to the critical problem of waste disposal. ROA, with the assistance of the Environment and Industry Programme, was investing in training and information exchange through the Cleaner Production Centres established in the United Republic of Tanzania and Zimbabwe.

A regional youth forum (Zanzibar, United Republic of Tanzania, 26 February-2 March) held by UNEP reviewed the African plan of action which sought the development of sustainable projects at the community level and the improvement of youth environmental networks within the region. The plan was to be implemented by youth groups in collaboration with ROA.

Asia

A programme of cleaner production mill assessments was under way in six countries which were part of the Network for Industrial Environmental Management (NIEM). By the end of 1996, close to 40 pulp and paper mills of various types would have conducted such assessments as part of the NIEM effort. NIEM was formed to promote improved environmental management in the pulp and paper industry in seven Asian countries. UNEP's Regional Office for Asia and the Pacific served as the secretariat to NIEM. A NIEM guidance manual on cleaner production assessment at pulp and paper mills, a joint effort between UNEP and the National Productivity Council of India, was being finalized. UNEP was preparing a training resource package that would make it easier to conduct training workshops on cleaner production.

On 30 October, the Agreement between the Mekong Regional Law Centre (MRLC) and UNEP for Cooperation in the Field of Environmental Law in the Mekong Region was signed. Planned activities that were to be carried out jointly by UNEP's Regional Office and its Environmental Law Programme in partnership with MRLC included assistance in strengthening national environmental legislation, legal training and dissemination of information on environmental law and policy. The Government of Denmark provided funding to begin implementing the activities.

Latin America and the Caribbean

The activities and financial situation of UNEP in Latin America and the Caribbean were among the points addressed by the Second Meeting of the Inter-sessional Committee of the Environment Ministers of the region (Mexico, 23-24 May). The meeting decided that a report on the activities to be taken by UNEP's Regional Office for Latin America and the Caribbean (ROLAC) should be distributed for comments to all Governments of the region. The inputs from Governments would assist in adjusting the regional environmental priorities in the light of UNEP's financial situation. In addition, UNEP and the Committee discussed the development of a joint financial strategy. The meeting asked the UNEP Executive Director to report to the Governing Council in 1997 on the impact that UNEP's 1996 budget reduction had had on the activities of ROLAC. UNEP's Global Environment Citizenship Programme, which was designed to empower citizens with the capacity to improve the environment, was presented to the meeting.

In 1996, ROLAC's publication Tierramerica was launched.

The Mediterranean

Increased cooperation to protect the environment of the Mediterranean was at the centre of a governmental meeting (Cairo, Egypt, 1-2 April), held under the auspices of the Mediterranean Action Plan, part of UNEP's Regional Seas Programme.

Other matters

Global Environment Facility

The Global Environment Facility (GEF) was established as a joint international effort to help solve global environmental problems. The GEF Trust Fund was established by the World Bank in March 1991 while the Facility was formally established in October of that year as a joint programme of UNDP, UNEP and the World Bank [YUN 1991, p. 505].

GEF was initially established for a three-year period known as the pilot phase ending in June 1994 and later extended for three years in what was termed the operational phase or GEF I [YUN 1994, p. 941]. GEF provided new and additional grant and concessional funding to meet the incremental costs of measures to achieve global environmental benefits in four focal areas, namely, the protection of biological diversity, the reduction of greenhouse gases, the protection of international waters and the protection of the ozone layer. The incremental costs of activities concerning land degradation, primarily desertification and deforestation, as they related to the four focal areas were also eligible for funding. Currently, more than 150 countries were participating in GEF.

UNEP provided guidance on relating GEF-financed activities to global, regional and national environmental assessments, policy frameworks and plans, and to international environmental agreements.

The Scientific and Technical Advisory Panel (STAP) of GEF was composed of 12 members appointed by the UNEP Executive Director. UNEP provided the secretariat to STAP, which acted as an independent, advisory body to GEF, providing objective, strategic scientific and technical advice on GEF policies, operational strategies and programmes. STAP had established five working groups dealing with international waters, energy mitigation strategies/climate change, adaptation/climate change, biodiversity and land degradation.

Environmental emergencies

In November [UNEP/GC.19/14], the UNEP Executive Director reviewed activities and services provided by the Joint UNEP/UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs Environment Unit set up in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 944]. She stated that in 1995-1996, the Joint Unit responded to requests for assistance from, among other countries, Guyana (mining-waste dam failure), the Philippines (spill of copper mine tailings), the Russian Federation (oil-waste fire), Rwanda (fungicide storage fire), the Seychelles (main sewerage system breakdown), Slovenia (chemical-waste dumping-site fire) and Ukraine (major sewerage system breakdown).

The second meeting of the Advisory Group on Environmental Emergencies (Geneva, 3-4 October) reviewed the implementation of the Joint Unit's activities, which was operating with extremely limited financial resources and with minimal staff. The Advisory Group asked the Executive Director to allocate resources for the 1998-1999 biennium for the administration and operation of the Joint Unit and recommended to Governments in a position to do so to provide additional resources. The Group asked the Joint Unit to develop further its activities and services, especially brokerage, clearing-house and assessment.

The environment and the military

The third meeting of the UNEP Expert Group on Liability and Compensation for Environmental Damage Arising from Military Activities (London, 12-18 May) arrived at substantive conclusions regarding key areas of liability and compensation for environmental damage, which included definitions and valuation of environmental damage and depletion of natural resources, applicable laws and the rights of States and international organizations to bring claims.

A subregional meeting on military activities and the environment (Bangkok, Thailand, 26-28 June), convened by UNEP in cooperation with ESCAP, identified the environmental problems caused by the military sector in Asia and the Pacific, as well as possible solutions. UNEP and ESCAP convened a similar meeting for South Asian countries (Bangkok, 29-31 October). Participants discussed military-related environmental problems and the military's contribution towards achieving national environmental goals. The two meetings were financed through the Swedish Trust Fund to Assist Developing Countries to Take Action in accordance with Agenda 21.

Insurance and the environment

The UNEP Conference on the Insurance Industry and the Environment (London, 20-21 May) sought new solutions for managing the growing environmental risks that insurers faced. Insurers explored issues related to claims handling, environmental reporting, asset management, loss prevention, mobilization of companies, lobbying and product design.

Chapter VIII

Population and human settlements

In 1996, the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) adopted the Istanbul Declaration on Human Settlements and the Habitat Agenda, containing goals and principles, commitments and a global plan of action with strategies for implementation. Habitat II was the latest in a series of development-linked United Nations conferences and summits that began with the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in 1992 and included the 1994 Conference on Population and Development, the follow-up to which was pursued during the year.

By mid-1996, world population stood at 5.8 billion, an increase of 81 million persons, or 1.4 per cent over the previous year. The rate of increase continued to decline in 1996, from 1.72 per cent per annum between 1975 and 1990, and 1.48 per cent per annum between 1990 and 1995.

UN activities in the field of population during 1996 were guided by the Programme of Action adopted at the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD). At its February/March session, the Commission on Population and Development reviewed progress towards ICPD implementation, considered UN population programmes, particularly the work of the Population Division of the Department for Economic and Social Information and Policy Analysis, and discussed the flow of financial resources in international assistance for population activities. The Commission, which marked its fiftieth anniversary in 1996, followed a topic-oriented programme of work adopted by the Economic and Social Council, concentrating its session on the issue of reproductive rights and reproductive health.

During the year, the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) continued efforts to implement the ICPD Programme of Action. Total contributions to the Fund reached $302.5 million in 1996. The Fund adopted a new approach for resource allocation for population activities that paid special attention to countries in greatest need.

As in previous years, the work of the Population Division included analysis of demographic variables (fertility and family planning, mortality rates, and migration), world population projections, population policies and population information.

Habitat II, held 20 years after the first United Nations Conference on Human Settlements, was conceived as a conference of partnerships, in which representatives of local authorities and other groups of civil society participated fully. It was preceded by two years of intensive preparations designed to encourage the involvement of major groups such as local authorities, non-governmental organizations, women, youth, the private sector, labour unions, professionals' organizations, foundations, media, parliamentarians and academies of sciences. Those partner groups committed themselves to the Habitat Agenda, which was a global call to action at all levels. It offered, within a framework of goals, principles and commitments, a vision of sustainable human settlements—where all had adequate shelter, a healthy and safe environment, basic services, and productive and freely chosen employment. The Istanbul Declaration—a high-level political statement that committed Governments to the Habitat Agenda's recommendations—and the Agenda itself were endorsed by the General Assembly in December. The Assembly also reaffirmed that the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements should be designated as a focal point for the Agenda's implementation. The Centre began its implementation activities following the Conference.

The Commission on Human Settlements—the intergovernmental body with a central role in monitoring the Agenda's implementation—did not meet in 1996.

Follow-up to the 1994 Conference on Population and Development

The United Nations continued in 1996 to focus on implementing the Programme of Action adopted by the International Conference on Population and Development in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 956] and endorsed by the General Assembly that year [YUN 1994, p. 963, res. 49/128].

Commission on Population and Development consideration. The Commission on Population and Development, which had primary responsibility for reviewing the follow-up to and implementation of the ICPD Programme of Action, had as the central theme of its February/March 1996 session "Reproductive rights and reproductive health", which, in accordance with chapter VII of the Programme of Action [YUN 1994, p. 958], included such issues as family planning, maternal health, abortion and information on sexuality.

The Commission had before it a report by the Secretary-General on reproductive rights and reproductive health [E/CN.9/1996/2], which covered such aspects as entry into reproductive life; reproductive behaviour; contraception; abortion; maternal mortality and morbidity; sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV/AIDS; and population information, education and communication with respect to reproductive rights and reproductive health. The Secretary-General noted that the reproductive rights and reproductive health of both men and women were reviewed in the report, although data collection and research had until recently focused primarily on the reproductive and contraceptive behaviour of women. The need to collect data and to conduct research on the reproductive attitudes and behaviour of both men and women had become more imperative, he said, given the renewed emphasis on the shared responsibility of partners in reproductive matters. Information was also lacking on the reproductive health of adolescents and of older men and women.

The Secretary-General's report on monitoring of population programmes [E/CN.9/1996/3] reflected responses received from UNFPA representatives/country directors in 78 countries. It assessed the strategies and approaches that countries had adopted to implement the recommendations of the ICPD Programme of Action concerning reproductive health and population information, education and communication, and analysed difficulties and constraints encountered. To obtain data, a questionnaire had been sent to all UNFPA representatives and country directors in the field, covering more than 130 developing countries and countries with economies in transition.

The information received revealed that many Governments of developing countries and countries with economies in transition had taken significant steps in responding to the Programme of Action. In almost two thirds of the countries responding, initiatives were under way to broaden family planning information and services to include other reproductive health elements. ICPD had helped to crystallize issues and acted as a catalyst, so that subjects previously ignored or overlooked had come to the fore. For example, the needs and perspectives of adolescents and the role of men in matters related to sexuality, family planning, parenting, family life and gender equality were receiving increased attention.

As for quality of care in reproductive health/family planning programmes, countries had begun taking steps to improve or measure the quality of care and had been paying increased attention to the physical state of health-care facilities. Governments were also more responsive to expanding the availability of a variety of contraceptives.

The Secretary-General noted that despite signs of commitment to reproductive health programmes, the socio-economic and cultural environment was not always conducive to change. Widespread poverty severely hampered Governments' abilities fully to implement reproductive health programmes and limited people's access to basic social services, including reproductive health care. Countries needed assistance from the international community, in terms of both financial and human resources. A number of countries also faced internal problems, such as massive bureaucracies that hampered the implementation of ICPD recommendations.

Another area needing improvement was accountability. The implementation of reproductive health programmes required sectoral coordination at the central governmental level. There was a strong need for the development of indicators in such areas as gender equality, reproductive health, women's participation, male involvement and resource mobilization, in order to monitor population programmes and measure progress in their implementation. Political commitment to achieving the Programme of Action's goals and objectives should be extended to include not only the central Government but also government officials at various levels, as well as local and community leaders, unions and the media.

In a report on activities of intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in the area of reproductive rights and reproductive health [E/CN.9/1996/5], the Secretary-General summarized information gathered through a questionnaire sent to international, regional and national NGOs to assess their progress towards achieving goals and objectives of the ICPD Programme of Action. Responses were received from 38 organizations, representing about 40 per cent of the total number of intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations contacted. As shown by the low number of intergovernmental organizations that responded to the questionnaire (4 out of 22, of which only 2 were involved in ICPD-related activities), it was clear that NGOs played a more significant role in reproductive rights and reproductive health than intergovernmental organizations.

Most NGOs responded that they were already developing family planning activities before ICPD, and many were already in the process of implementing new reproductive health components as well. The most frequently mentioned new programmatic component was the provision of information and health services to prevent and treat reproductive tract infections and sexually transmitted diseases. Other ICPD programmatic components that had been incorporated into the agendas of many NGOs included: education in human sexuality, reproductive health and responsible parenthood (60 per cent of the NGOs); prenatal, delivery and postnatal care, including breastfeeding (37 per cent); prevention of abortion and the consequences of abortion (29 per cent); and infertility (15 per cent). Collaboration between Governments and NGOs varied enormously from country to country.

The Secretary-General reported that NGOs were learning not only how to translate the Programme of Action into practice but how to improve their advocacy activities and their existing services and initiatives in order to serve their clients better. They had demonstrated their viability as a major means of meeting the reproductive health needs of women and men. Overall, the main strength of NGOs lay in their capacity to create innovative programme models that could be replicated on a larger scale by Governments; their main weaknesses were related to their long-term sustainability and lack of self-sufficiency.

In a report to the Commission on international assistance for population [E/CN.9/1996/6], the Secretary-General stated that, since ICPD in 1994, the international donor community had shown its commitment to achieving the goals and objectives of the Programme of Action, and significant progress had been made in implementing it. There was some evidence of an increasing flow of resources in the form of external assistance and many Governments were recasting and updating population and development policies in line with the goals and objectives of the Programme of Action. Several developing countries, despite unfavourable economic circumstances, had increased domestic resources or had manifested a desire to mobilize resources for population activities. However, until more systematic data on the flow of domestic resources was collected, the question of resource mobilization within the developing countries would remain incomplete.

Despite the fact that progress in implementing the Programme of Action was evident on several fronts, successful implementation was dependent upon resource mobilization. Additional resources were required to better identify and satisfy unmet needs in such areas as reproductive health care, including family planning and sexual health information and services, and to keep pace with growing demands and improve the scope and quality of programmes. Sub-Saharan Africa, parts of Asia and all least developed countries would need a much larger share of resources from the international community. Official development assistance (ODA) had tended to stagnate in recent years, said the Secretary-General, and there had been little movement towards the target of 4 per cent of ODA for population and development from the level of 1.4 per cent in 1993.

UNFPA programme implementation. The Executive Board of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and UNFPA took decisions in 1996 that had an impact on UNFPA's implementation of the ICPD Programme of Action, including a new approach for resource allocation based on the Programme of Action's goals and objectives (see below).

Coordination in UN system. The Inter-Agency Task Force on the Implementation of the ICPD Programme of Action was expanded and reconstituted as the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) Task Force on Basic Social Services for All, chaired by UNFPA. Its mandate encompassed population, with an emphasis on reproductive health and family planning services; basic education; primary health care; drinking water and sanitation; shelter; and social services in post-crisis situations. At its first meeting on 23 February 1996, the ACC Task Force agreed to establish two working groups, one on basic education and the other on primary health care, and to continue other working groups, including those on reproductive health and the tracking of child and maternal mortality.

The Secretary-General, in his September report [A/51/350] on ICPD implementation (see below), noted the need to develop indicators in such areas as gender equality, reproductive health, women's participation, male involvement in reproductive health and family planning, and resource mobilization in order to monitor population and development programmes.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 17 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/2.

Follow-up to the International Conference on Population and Development

The Economic and Social Council,

Bearing in mind the results of the International Conference on Population and Development and the adoption of the Programme of Action of the Conference, and taking into account General Assembly resolution 49/128 of 19 December 1994 on the report of the Conference, as well as Assembly resolution 50/124 of 20 December 1995 and Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/55 of 28 July 1995 on the implementation of the Programme of Action of the Conference,

Having reviewed the report of the Commission on Population and Development on its twenty-ninth session,

Recalling the terms of reference and multi-year work programme of the Commission, endorsed by the Council in its resolution 1995/55,

1. Stresses the need for all the reports prepared as part of the multi-year work programme of the Commission on Population and Development to be based on comprehensive and reliable information, for the final version of the reports to take fully into account the observations of the Commission and for the reports to be widely disseminated in accordance with the terms of reference of the Commission;

2. Also stresses the need to ensure that the deliberations of the Commission fully reflect its updated and enhanced mandate, taking into account the integrated, multidisciplinary and comprehensive approach of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development;

3. Welcomes the newly constituted Task Force on Basic Social Services for All of the Administrative Committee on Coordination, under the current chairmanship of the United Nations Population Fund, and requests the Task Force to make appropriate arrangements to ensure coordination, collaboration and harmonization in the implementation of all aspects of the Programme of Action of the Conference, as decided by the Commission at its twenty-eighth session, and to continue to report thereon to the Commission;

4. Requests that a revised version of the report of the Secretary-General relating to the activities of the non-governmental sector in the area of reproductive rights and reproductive health be submitted to the Commission at its thirty-first session, in 1998, based on a more comprehensive survey of the sector and a clearer explanation of the selection criteria and categorization of the organizations consulted, and incorporating examples of cooperation between Governments and non-governmental organizations, in both developing and developed countries;

5. Decides to invite non-governmental organizations to participate, on an exceptional basis, in the thirtieth session of the Commission, in 1997, along the lines specified in Economic and Social Council decision 1996/208 of 9 February 1996;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to make appropriate arrangements for liaison between non-governmental organizations and the Commission and to ensure that existing channels of communication with non-governmental organizations are fully utilized in order to facilitate broad-based participation and dissemination of information;

7. Requests improved annual reporting on financial flows, including allocations/expenditures, based on consistent criteria and related to the costed elements of the Programme of Action of the Conference, including a clear account of levels and trends of funding by source (bilateral sources, multilateral sources (both core and non-core) and private funds, domestic allocations and the like);

8. Encourages the widest possible dissemination of reports on progress in implementing the Programme of Action of the Conference prepared by the organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, including, wherever possible, their dissemination through electronic channels of communication, and welcomes the intention of the United Nations Population Fund to report on implementation in its annual publication The State of World Population report;

9. Proposes that, in addition to their special coverage in the World Population Monitoring reports, main demographic trends be covered biennially, starting in 1997, in a complementary concise report prepared by the Population Division of the Department for Economic and Social Information and Policy Analysis of the Secretariat, to be discussed under the agenda item concerning the work programme of the Division;

10. Emphasizes the importance of information, education and communication as a strategy for furthering follow-up action on the International Conference on Population and Development, particularly in the areas of reproductive rights and reproductive health, and urges the Population Division to highlight the efforts of Governments in this regard in relevant reports prepared for the Commission;

11. Welcomes the encouraging evidence of actions being undertaken by Governments, international organizations and the non-governmental sector in response to the challenges of the Programme of Action of the Conference related to reproductive rights and reproductive health, and stresses the need for such action to be accelerated and widened, in particular the need to mobilize additional financial resources, as called for in the Programme of Action;

12. Requests the Task Force on Basic Social Services for All to coordinate the development of appropriate indicators, taking into account relevant research, so that progress in addressing reproductive health needs by individual countries can be assessed on a reliable basis;

13. Requests that evidence of further progress in achieving the goals of the Programme of Action of the Conference be communicated to the Commission on an annual basis through selected publications and documentation prepared by the Secretariat, including the Population Division, as well as publications and documentation prepared by other United Nations bodies, including the United Nations Population Fund, the regional commissions and the specialized agencies.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/2

17 July 1996

Meeting 37 Adopted without vote

Draft by Commission on Population and Development (E/1996/25); agenda item 6 (f).

Meeting numbers. ESC 36, 37.

Report of Secretary-General. In September, the Secretary-General submitted a report on implementation of the ICPD Programme of Action [A/51/350], as requested by the General Assembly in 1995 by resolution 50/124 [YUN 1995, p. 1094]. The report examined coordination and collaboration by the UN system in implementing the Programme of Action through the Inter-Agency Task Force established for that purpose and through its successor, the ACC Task Force on Basic Social Services for All. It gave a brief overview of national progress towards implementation, including the role of NGOs, and examined the flow of resources for population assistance to recipient countries (see above). The report also reviewed the work of the Commission on Population and Development (see above) and actions taken by the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board towards implementation (see below).

In the area of South-South cooperation, UNFPA provided assistance to Partners in Population and Development—an intergovernmental organization established to promote South-South cooperation in the field of reproductive health—and supported selected centres of excellence. UNFPA also supported a global programme of training in population and development, which provided postgraduate training at five institutions in developing countries. During 1995, the programme trained 101 middle-level professionals, 34 of them women, from 71 developing countries.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/176.

Implementation of the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 49/128 of 19 December 1994 and 50/124 of 20 December 1995,

Recalling also Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/2 of 17 July 1996 on the follow-up to the International Conference on Population and Development,

Acknowledging fully the integrated approach taken during the International Conference on Population and Development, which recognizes the interrelationship between population, sustained economic growth and sustainable development,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 50/124,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of resolution 50/124;

2. Notes the action taken so far by Governments and the international community to implement the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development, and encourages them to strengthen their efforts in that regard;

3. Reiterates that Governments should continue to commit themselves at the highest political level to achieving goals and objectives and to take a lead role in coordinating the implementation, monitoring and evaluation of the follow-up actions at the national level;

4. Urges all countries to consider, among other things, their current spending priorities, with a view to making additional contributions in line with national priorities for the implementation of the Programme of Action, taking into account the provisions of chapters XIII and XIV thereof and the economic constraints faced by developing countries, in particular the least developed among them;

5. Emphasizes that international cooperation in the field of population and development is essential for the implementation of the recommendations adopted at the Conference and, in this context, calls upon the international community to continue to provide, both bilaterally and multilaterally, adequate and substantial support and assistance for population and development activities, including through the United Nations Population Fund, other organs and organizations of the United Nations system and the specialized agencies that will be involved in the implementation, at all levels, of the Programme of Action;

6. Reiterates the importance of South-South cooperation for the successful implementation of the Programme of Action and invites all Governments, relevant organizations of the United Nations system, as well as the private sector and non-governmental organizations, to continue to support those activities in South-South cooperation being undertaken by the developing countries;

7. Recognizes the efforts of Partners in Population and Development in strengthening the capacities of developing countries in South-South cooperation;

8. Emphasizes the importance of the identification and allocation of financial resources by all members of the international community, including regional financial institutions, to enable them to fulfil their commitments with regard to the implementation of the Programme of Action;

9. Requests the Economic and Social Council to continue to give guidance on matters concerning harmonization, cooperation and coordination within the United Nations system regarding the implementation of the Programme of Action;

10. Reiterates that the Commission on Population and Development, as a functional commission assisting the Economic and Social Council, has the primary responsibility for monitoring, reviewing and assessing the implementation of the Programme of Action, and emphasizes the need for the Commission to continue its work in broadening its focus so as to fully reflect the Programme of Action;

11. Invites the Secretary-General to ensure that the Task Force on Basic Social Services for All of the Administrative Committee on Coordination informs the Commission and the Economic and Social Council on the progress of its work, with an emphasis on the improvement of the impact of programme delivery for the purpose of system-wide coordination, and stresses the need for close cooperation and timely reporting by all the working groups of the Task Force;

12. Emphasizes the importance of the ongoing efforts of the Task Force to develop, on an urgent basis, appropriate indicators as reliable means for monitoring the progress of the implementation of the Programme of Action, with special attention to the reproductive health needs of individual countries, taking into account relevant research and development work as well as existing data collection systems in developing countries, and to make this information available as it is developed to the Commission on Population and Development, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly at its fifty-second session;

13. Endorses the continuation of coordination and collaboration between the Task Force and the appropriate United Nations entities responsible for the development of statistics;

14. Reaffirms that the follow-up to the Conference, at all levels, should take fully into account that population, health, education, poverty, patterns of production and consumption, empowerment of women and the environment are closely interconnected and should be considered through an integrated approach;

15. Recommends that the special session for the overall review and appraisal of the implementation of Agenda 21, which will be convened from 23 to 27 June 1997, should give due attention to the issue of population in the context of sustainable development;

16. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution;

17. Decides to include in the agenda of its fifty-second session the sub-item entitled "Population and development".

General Assembly resolution 51/176

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/604/Add.4) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.43), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica (for Group of 77 and China) and Colombia (for Non-Aligned Movement) (A/C.2/51/L.19); agenda item 96 (d).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 17, 18, 20-27, 34, 37; plenary 86.

UN Population Fund

1996 activities

In her report for 1996 [DP/FPA/1997/10 (Part I)] to the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board, the Executive Director said that UNFPA had focused on translating its three core programme areas (reproductive health, including family planning and sexual health; population and development strategies; and advocacy) into concrete activities at the country level. That process was aided by a new resource allocation approach, which recognized differing needs among countries for external assistance, and it encompassed an array of activities, including a series of expert consultations and thematic workshops.

The country programming process undertaken during the year combined substantive programming with the new resource allocation approach. Forty-seven new country programmes were formulated during 1996 and were reviewed in terms of programming needs and resource allocation category, which determined the amount and type of resources allocated to each programme as well as its strategy and focus. In the first round of programming under the new approach, reproductive health activities accounted for 71 per cent of total allocations; population and development strategies, 18 per cent; and advocacy, 11 per cent. In terms of country category, the breakdown was as follows: 27 Group A countries (those with the greatest need for external assistance) accounted for 73.7 per cent of total allocations; 15 Group B countries (those having higher levels of development), 22.3 per cent; and the remaining 5 country programmes (3 from Group C (those meeting the thresholds for all seven ICPD-goal indicators), 1 country with an economy in transition and 1 "other" country), 4 per cent of allocations.

The country programming process was accompanied by initiatives to improve programme effectiveness and enhance accountability, such as management reviews to help streamline operations and strengthen the delivery of programmes; improvement of the coordination of activities under the Fund's decentralized programming approach; updating and compiling a comprehensive set of guidelines, policies and procedures covering such areas as programming, administration, procurement, personnel and staff development; and financial issues. Internal oversight was also strengthened during the year.

Operationalizing reproductive health was a key UNFPA activity in 1996. To help countries reorient their population programmes to a reproductive health approach, the aim was to institutionalize the concept of reproductive health in the design and implementation of national reproductive health programmes and to fully integrate such programmes into primary health care systems. As part of that process, UNFPA organized an expert consultation of policy makers and national programme managers (16-19 April) to review such issues as: assessing and prioritizing reproductive health needs; involving women in the design and implementation of reproductive health programmes; repositioning family planning within a reproductive health approach; enhancing maternal health care programmes; ensuring the quality of, and access to, reproductive health; preventing and managing the complications of abortion; and integrating the prevention and management of reproductive tract infections (RTIs), including sexually transmitted diseases (STDs), and the prevention of HIV/AIDS, into primary health care systems. The consultation group recommended a combined approach involving public health (to assess the magnitude of the problems), a pragmatic view (to build upon what was already in place and what was feasible), and a participatory approach (to include all stakeholders in the process).

Operationalizing of the reproductive health approach was incorporated in the development of the new country programmes and in UNFPA's response to refugee and emergency situations. A broader reproductive health approach was apparent in strategies adopted to reduce maternal mortality and morbidity, prevent abortion, and reduce the transmission of RTIs and STDs, including HIV/AIDS. The reproductive health needs of adolescents and men, in addition to those of women, also received greater attention than in the past.

The urgent reproductive health needs of individuals, especially women, in refugee and emergency situations were the focus of an agreement concluded between UNFPA and the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). Joint activities provided emergency reproductive health care to displaced persons and refugees in Burundi, Rwanda and Zaire, in collaboration with the International Federation of the Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies.

In April, UNFPA began to develop a set of reproductive health performance indicators. After a meeting in July with UN agencies with an interest in the subject and NGOs, a draft discussion paper was prepared for consideration by an inter-agency group in 1997.

To redress the frequently neglected problem of reproductive health needs of adolescents, UNFPA included that element in almost every country programme prepared in 1996, usually as a priority activity. In Angola, for example, reducing the high level of unprotected sexual relations among adolescents was part of the main strategy to reduce maternal mortality and abortion; in Eritrea, adolescent-friendly services were to be provided in the programme's two target provinces; and in the Gambia, 10 pilot reproductive health centres for youth were planned to provide counselling, outreach activities, referral and other services. Several countries initiated projects involving counselling on the prevention of STDs, including HIV.

UNFPA estimated that 2 million girls a year were at risk of female genital mutilation (FGM). As part of the movement to eradicate it, UNFPA organized a technical consultation on the subject (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 27-29 March), following which UNFPA prepared a programming framework for the eradication of FGM. A programme supported by UNFPA in Uganda showed the potential impact of advocacy for the eradication of FGM: following workshops involving community leaders and people from all sectors of society, there was a 36 per cent drop in female circumcision in less than one year.

UNFPA provided support for HIV/AIDS prevention within the global strategy of the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS) (see PART THREE, Chapter XIII). In 1996, UNFPA supported HIV/AIDS prevention activities in 124 countries, compared to 114 countries in 1995 and 103 in 1994, and collaborated with more than 78 NGOs. Activities supported by UNFPA included education and communication components in training programmes for service providers in 71 countries and counselling and distribution of condoms in 54 countries. Although women were the major beneficiaries of prevention activities, men were also targeted in a number of countries in such settings as the armed forces and the workplace, through trade unions and at long-distance truck stops.

The primary aim of activities in the area of population and development strategies was to assist Governments in integrating the population dimension into national policies, plans and programmes. In 1996, UNFPA issued new guidelines for UNFPA support, addressing such areas as policy formulation and the data systems needed for programming, processing and related research. The guidelines reflected changes in the content and approach to population and development strategies, including a more integrated approach to the development and use of data and information systems, as well as of research, policy and training. It called for integration of population policies into development strategies that would reflect the centrality of the individual and the interrelatedness of demographic, social, economic and environmental factors.

As an advocate for the ICPD goals, UNFPA's strategy was to remind Governments and partner organizations of their part in achieving the goals and to secure their commitment to meeting those objectives. At the country level, advocacy activities were designed to secure commitment of national resources to meet ICPD goals and to promote coordination among the various sectors of government and between government and civil society. UNFPA advocacy activities were designed to build support for revising programmes addressing adolescent reproductive and sexual health needs; sustaining commitment to quality reproductive health services; promoting responsible reproductive health behaviour among men; respecting reproductive rights and human-centred population and development strategies; advancing gender equity and empowerment of women; and making girls' education a priority. UNFPA implemented its strategy through national news media, the local donor community, decision makers and programme implementers, elected officials, NGOs, opinion leaders, labour union leaders and academic institutions, as well as the general public.

UNFPA's The State of World Population 1996 contained chapters on conditions of life in urban areas, urban population dynamics, sources of city growth, urban-rural links, and policies, strategies and issues for improving cities.

In June, UNFPA issued its annual report [E/1996/68] on implementation and follow-up of certain General Assembly and Economic and Social Council resolutions. The Council, by decision 1996/228 of 10 July, took note of that report.

Contraceptive requirements and logistics management

In response to a 1995 request of the Executive Board of UNDP/UNFPA [YUN 1995, p. 1099], the UNFPA Executive Director submitted a report [DP/FPA/1996/2] in which she reappraised the future role of UNFPA in assessing and meeting unmet needs for contraceptives and the requirements for logistics management. She stated that the UNFPA Global Initiative on Contraceptive Requirements and Logistics Management Needs in Developing Countries, since its inception in 1990, had completed in-depth studies on long-term requirements and costs in 11 developing countries (Bangladesh, Brazil, Egypt, India, Mexico, Nepal, Pakistan, Philippines, Turkey, Viet Nam, Zimbabwe) by the end of 1995. The studies, in addition to estimating the status of the countries' contraceptive requirements and logistics, projected requirements over the following 10 years. They also assessed the role of NGOs and the private sector in contraceptive delivery, reviewed local production options, estimated condom requirements for HIV/AIDS prevention, and conducted a financial analysis of the sources and uses of funds for acquiring contraceptive commodities.

In the coming years, the Executive Director stated, the Global Initiative had an important role to play, including: monitoring follow-up action plans as suggested by the in-depth studies; providing technical assistance in countries for more efficient logistics systems; organizing training in logistics management and contraceptive forecasting; publishing technical reports; assisting countries in conducting in-depth studies; and disseminating information on contraceptive needs and supply throughout the world.

In her annual report for 1996 [DP/FPA/1997/10 (Part I)], the Executive Director said that the rationale for the Global Initiative was that continued population growth in most developing countries would result in increases in the demand for good-quality, low-cost contraceptives and other reproductive health commodities. Good logistics management, such as forecasting, storage and distribution, as well as donor-government coordination, were vital.

One of the main goals of the Global Initiative was to help countries strengthen their capacity to manage logistics independently of external assistance. The Global Initiative had developed and pilot-tested a Logistics Management Training Strategy Development Workshop in Bangkok, Thailand, in December, with participants from Indonesia, Mongolia, the Philippines, Thailand and Viet Nam. The main outcome of the workshop was the development of national strategies and work plans designed to facilitate the initiation of training-related logistics management activities in those countries.

By a 26 March decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/14)], the Executive Board of UNDP/UNFPA endorsed the proposed future activities of the Global Initiative. It requested the Executive Director to submit a progress report on the activities of the Global Initiative as part of her annual report.

The Board also considered the establishment of a global contraceptive commodity programme, to which it had agreed in principle in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1099]. It had before it the UNFPA Executive Director's report [DP/FPA/1996/3] on the envisaged programme, covering the objectives and scope, administrative and financial aspects, and UNFPA's efforts to promote national capacity-building. In the view of many donors and UNFPA, the programme was a means of meeting urgent country requests for contraceptives, including condoms for HIV/AIDS prevention, in a more effective and efficient manner, and was consistent with the broad reproductive health approach, including family planning and sexual health, endorsed by the Board. As the number and timing of requests for UNFPA procurement assistance were often unpredictable, the existence of a buffer stock of contraceptives would allow the Fund to meet urgent requests more efficiently. UNFPA would also maintain a close link between the activities of the programme and the work of the Global Initiative, thus ensuring that national capacity-building, particularly in contraceptive forecasting and logistics management, was strengthened through such means as technical training and technical advisory services and by improved warehousing, stock-keeping, transport and management information systems.

Under the proposed programme, a trust fund would be used to purchase a buffer stock of commonly requested contraceptives, to be stored at a UN facility or held at the manufacturer's premises. The Executive Director proposed that UNFPA create an in-house global procurement management team comprising the staff of the Global Initiative and the Procurement Unit, which would work with geographical and technical UNFPA divisions and with outside partners to strengthen logistics management and procurement services.

The Executive Board, by a 19 January decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/3)], endorsed the establishment of a global contraceptive commodity programme, to be managed by UNFPA. As set out in the Executive Director's report, the programme would be funded with an initial capitalization of $5 million. The Board emphasized that the programme's activities should be monitored carefully to ensure adherence to technical standards of safety and quality. The Executive Director was requested to report annually on the programme's activities and management, paying particular attention to progress in strengthening national capacities to deal with the logistical aspects of contraceptive procurement. She was also requested to coordinate with other UN entities active in procurement and reproductive health, particularly the Inter-Agency Procurement Services Office and the World Health Organization (WHO). The Board further requested the Executive Director to arrange an overall independent and external evaluation of the global contraceptive commodity programme at a time to be decided by the Board, particularly with regard to its impact on national capacity-building, in order to provide the Board with the information required to make a decision on whether the programme should be continued.

Country and intercountry programmes

During discussion by the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board of UNFPA country programmes, attention was drawn to the fact that the programming processes of UNDP and the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) had recently been changed. In view of the desire to harmonize the work of the three programmes, it was suggested that UNFPA should monitor the new developments and report back to the Board on recommendations for a new country programming process.

By a 26 March decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/13)], the Board invited the UNFPA Executive Director to consider ways of harmonizing the Fund's country programming process with those of UNDP and UNICEF. In that context, the Executive Director should review the format for, content and timing of as well as the mode of discussion of the documentation submitted to the Board on country activities. The Executive Director was asked to submit to Member States, after consultations with UNDP and UNICEF, recommendations on the future country programming process of UNFPA based on the requested reviews, no later than the Board's 1997 annual session.

UNFPA's provisional expenditures for country and intercountry (regional and interregional) programmes in 1996 totalled approximately $216.5 million, compared to $230.9 million in 1995 [DP/FPA/1997/10 (Part I/Add.1)]. Some $36.4 million were allocated to new country projects approved in 1996.

The number of country projects directly executed by Governments during the year numbered 940, compared to 806 in 1995, and totalled $77.3 million or 33.3 per cent of total 1996 country programme allocations, compared to $50.2 million or 27.3 per cent of country programme expenditures in 1995.

In accordance with criteria defined by the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board in 1996 [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/15)], 60 countries had priority status for resource allocation (37 in Africa, 16 in Asia and the Pacific, 5 Arab States, and 2 in Latin America and the Caribbean).

Sub-Saharan Africa. UNFPA allocations to programmes for sub-Saharan Africa totalled $97 million in 1996, with the largest share of programme resources (39.2 per cent) being spent on reproductive health/family planning, followed by information, education and communication (23.6 per cent). Despite numerous obstacles, population programmes continued to advance in most African countries during 1996 [DP/FPA/1997/10 (Part II)]. Political commitment to ICPD goals remained relatively strong, at least at the highest levels of government, in almost all of the 45 countries covered by the Africa Division, and progress continued towards gaining the support of NGOs and civil society for population programmes, especially in the area of reproductive health. Indications of increasing contraceptive prevalence and decreasing fertility appeared in a growing number of countries. Obstacles to expanding and improving population programmes included budgetary limitations, other crises that competed for funding, an inadequate number of trained personnel, and civil unrest in several countries. In May, Benin became the eighteenth sub-Saharan African country to adopt a national population policy. Operationally, advances were made in bringing national population efforts into line with the ICPD objectives and Programme of Action. For example, most countries were attempting to integrate maternal and child health and/or family planning interventions into reproductive health programmes. UNFPA assisted in those efforts through support for training of health personnel and related information, education and communication, as well as through advocacy with governmental bodies and other groups in favour of the reproductive health approach. UNFPA's assistance for reproductive health-service costs requiring hard currency outlays, especially for contraceptives, medical equipment and supervision and logistics vehicles, was critical in a number of countries, particularly where major donors had withdrawn assistance. UNFPA support was directed in most countries to making reproductive health services available within the governmental health infrastructure, since that infrastructure provided a greater potential coverage than other alternatives. Assistance was also provided to NGOs and for the creation of community-based outreach services in such countries as Ethiopia, Ghana, Malawi and Zimbabwe. Information, education and communication were emphasized in the region, as were services for adolescents, and UNFPA remained the principal donor in the region for population and family life education in schools. Occasionally, as in the case of Kenya, such efforts had produced a backlash against what was viewed as premature education on matters that should be learned within the family. UNFPA continued to support the incorporation of prevention of STDs, particularly HIV/AIDS, into basic reproductive health information and services. Capacity-building continued to be a priority in the African region. During 1996, 20 programme review and strategy development (PRSD) exercises were completed in the region, a process which emphasized bringing national population efforts into greater conformity with ICPD and the inculcation of a programme approach as opposed to an isolated project orientation. UNFPA sought to diversify the range of national partners during the year. Projects directly executed by NGOs grew from 31 in 1993 to 68 by the end of 1996, and that figure did not fully reflect NGO involvement because it did not include the many projects in which NGOs participated but were not the primary executing agency. The trend continued towards greater support for research directly related to programme implementation, especially investigations of sociocultural obstacles to improving reproductive health, including traditional attitudes and practices, but also for censuses of Eritrea and Mozambique as well as migration surveys in several countries.

UNFPA also funded several regional conferences and meetings. At the Second Regional Conference of African Women Ministers and Parliamentarians (Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, October), representatives from 34 countries participated in a programme designed to equip them with practical knowledge of population matters and advocacy skills. UNFPA and Senegal, under the auspices of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), co-sponsored a regional seminar that resulted in a statement linking urban management and population growth. UNFPA also contributed to a conference on "Crisis, poverty, and demographic changes in sub-Saharan countries" (Burkina Faso, November). In an attempt to assure basic reproductive health services for refugees, a project was approved in 1996 to empower the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies to provide services to Rwandan refugees in Zaire. However, the dispersion of that group and the return to Rwanda of many of them impeded service delivery. A similar project in the United Republic of Tanzania continued to function throughout the year.

Arab States and Europe. UNFPA allocations for the Arab States and Europe amounted to $36.2 million in 1996, of which 49.2 per cent went towards reproductive health/family planning, followed by 15.1 per cent for information, education and communication, and 10.4 per cent for population dynamics.

Common challenges facing Arab countries were continued high levels of maternal mortality as a consequence of lack of basic maternal care and referral services. The quality and accessibility of reproductive health information and services was a critical issue, often compounded by the large gap between urban and rural development. Despite the improved status of women in some countries in the region, women in other countries still faced considerable social, legal and economic barriers. Harmful traditional practices, such as female genital mutilation, continued to be prevalent and there were large gaps between male and female literacy rates throughout the region. Notwithstanding those challenges, Governments were committed to population and development issues.

Implementation of ICPD goals varied significantly from country to country. In 1996, those countries where the concept of reproductive health had not been operationalized made efforts to adjust their development policies to incorporate new ICPD concepts and to make explicit policy statements. Those countries included Algeria, where an in-depth study was made of the current national population policy in the light of the ICPD recommendations. A holistic approach to maternal health and reproductive health was endorsed by Lebanon, the Palestinian Authority and the Sudan, following PRSD missions undertaken with the technical assistance of UNFPA. A national conference on reproductive health was held in Baghdad, Iraq, in October, at which the Minister of Health reaffirmed the Government's support for family planning. In Yemen, an update of the population strategy was conducted to allow the Government to review the achievements made and to revise quantifiable national population objectives and adjust strategies aimed at achieving them. National institutions were adapted to new policy orientations. For example, in Algeria and the Sudan, new bodies were created to deal with population issues. UNFPA worked closely with national counterparts to strengthen implementation of guidelines for reproductive health, including family planning and sexual health, and in setting programme priorities. Training and logistical support was provided to national family planning programmes, such as those of Jordan and the Syrian Arab Republic, where reproductive health services were integrated into maternal and child health/family planning facilities. National NGOs, particularly those affiliated with the International Planned Parenthood Federation, continued to play a lead role in implementing reproductive health services and in providing related educational information in Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, the Sudan, Syria and Yemen. More emphasis was placed on incorporating adolescent reproductive health in a number of programmes, in spite of sociocultural barriers in some countries. With the support of UNFPA and other donors, a number of countries launched new programmes on sexual and reproductive health for youth. New activities were undertaken in Djibouti, Egypt, Jordan and Yemen to provide education and/or training to reach adolescents. UNFPA supported workshops to strengthen national capacity to implement, monitor and evaluate population programmes. As a result of such workshops, health personnel in Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Somalia, the Sudan, Syria and Yemen were trained in the provision of reproductive health services. During 1996, the regional demographic maternal and health survey (PAPCHILD) and the Gulf Family Health Survey provided a number of demographic and reproductive health indicators in Bahrain, Lebanon, Oman, the Sudan and the United Arab Emirates. One aim of those exercises was to provide benchmarks for countries to assess the achievements made towards achieving ICPD goals. UNFPA supported final evaluations of 33 country projects and five regional ones in 1996, and the input provided by the evaluations was incorporated in the subsequent phases of the programme.

Central and Eastern Europe. Demographic indicators in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union showed that population growth rates remained negative or low (ranging from -0.7 to 1 per cent a year). In most countries, the trend was caused by declining total fertility rates, rising overall mortality rates and emigration, which were attributable to the collapse of the public health-care system and declining standards of living. In an effort to assist countries with economies in transition to bridge technical gaps in the areas of population and reproductive health, UNFPA established two new offices which became operational in 1996: in Romania (covering Belarus, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, the Republic of Moldova, Romania, the Russian Federation, Slovakia and Ukraine) and Albania (covering Albania, Armenia, Bulgaria and Georgia). The field presence was to ensure better coordination of activities initiated with UNFPA assistance and better liaison with other agencies and programmes, including UNAIDS.

In most countries of the region, induced abortion was common as a means to regulate fertility, partly because of limited access to modern contraceptives. Also, medical professionals were reluctant to promote modern contraceptives, as the performance of abortions provided additional income to their generally low salaries. To reverse the trend, UNFPA supported an approach to fertility control through reproductive health. This strategy implied provision of technical assistance to build national capabilities of health providers to meet the needs of the population, through country-based and regional workshops on contraceptive technologies, prevention and management of reproductive tract infections, including STDs, which were on the rise, and management of other reproductive health conditions, including cervical and breast cancer. To address the lack of access to reproductive health information and services, UNFPA continued to assist Governments to expand such services, particularly at the primary health-care level, through such measures as training service providers at the national or regional level and providing support for the procurement of contraceptives, educational materials and medical equipment. UNFPA provided contraceptive supplies in Armenia, Georgia, Poland and the Republic of Moldova. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, UNFPA provided, in cooperation with WHO, reproductive health kits to Government-run health care facilities. In Romania, a UNFPA-supported project was designed to strengthen the capacity of family planning reference centres and local health posts throughout the country. In Albania, 1996 was the last year of UNFPA's first programme of assistance, and an assessment mission made recommendations for a new country programme (1997-2000). Through two regional projects, implemented by educational institutions in Hungary and the Netherlands, UNFPA helped organize three courses for high-level health professionals from Central and Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union.

Assistance for data collection and research on reproductive health was also provided in the region. For example, UNFPA contributed to a study on maternal mortality and abortion in Romania and to research on sociocultural determinants of reproductive behaviour and sexual attitudes of Armenian adolescents. Four regional projects were approved for execution by the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) to provide a database on international migration and on older people and new data on sexual behaviour and fertility in those countries.

Asia and the Pacific. In Asia and the Pacific, UNFPA assistance amounted to approximately $87.7 million in 1996. Most of that assistance (63 per cent) was for reproductive health/family planning, with 15.7 per cent allocated for information, education and communication. The region had been quick to commence advocacy and other activities in support of ICPD goals, and concrete results could be seen in 1996 in both policy and programme areas. In Mongolia, Parliament approved a policy aimed at reducing infant and child mortality by one third and maternal mortality by 50 per cent, to promote birth spacing as a means of improving the health of women and children and to maintain annual population growth at not less than 1.8 per cent. India continued to move from a target-based approach to a needs-based approach in reproductive health, with emphasis on quality of care and the development of new indicators for measuring client satisfaction and needs. In the Philippines, a population bill, formulated with UNFPA assistance, would establish a population policy to promote equity and empowerment, especially for women, youth, elderly and indigenous populations. The country programme in Mongolia, for which 1996 was the last year, included support for reproductive health training for 125 senior health workers and 54 doctors from 9 provinces. The programme's activities were completed with a near 100 per cent implementation rate. In the area of reproductive health of adolescents, UNFPA supported the National Youth Services Council of Sri Lanka in a pilot project to provide reproductive health education to out-of-school young people and assisted the National Adolescent Health Committee in the production of a book on adolescent health. UNFPA assistance was used to provide training to service providers, policy makers, programme managers and other government officials in Bhutan, Nepal, the Philippines, Sri Lanka and Thailand, through fellowships, study tours and in-country training courses. There remained a few countries where UNFPA assistance was needed for national capacity-building, including Central Asian countries, Myanmar and Papua New Guinea. In some countries, there was more acceptance of NGOs as executing agents of UNFPA activities, including in India, where NGOs would receive about 10 per cent of funds allocated under the new country programme. Monitoring of ongoing programmes was undertaken in a number of countries through tripartite reviews, final project reviews, mid-term reviews and project evaluations. All three Country Support Teams in the Asia and Pacific region provided technical services for those activities. Progress was made in Pakistan in the monitoring of service-delivery outlets through joint UNFPA/government monitoring teams. Regional activities included conferences on reproductive health, one in Islamabad, Pakistan, and another in Almaty, Kazakhstan, each of which brought together participants from 10 regional States. UNFPA also collaborated with the World Bank in organizing an international work-study tour in Iran on reproductive health for francophone West African and Central Asian countries to exchange ideas on implementation of reproductive health programmes and the integration of reproductive health into the primary health-care system.

Latin America and the Caribbean. In 1996, UNFPA allocated $32.8 million to the Latin America and Caribbean region. Of the total, 43.6 per cent was for reproductive health/family planning, 18.9 per cent for information, education and communication, and 9 per cent for formulation and evaluation of population policies. As several country programmes came to an end in 1996, assessments for renewal focused on ensuring that financial resources were used to reach the populations most in need (the poor, adolescents and indigenous groups) and to achieve ICPD goals. Quality issues, including sensitivity to gender and ethnic considerations, received special attention. Sex education and services for adolescents were prominent in all 1996 programmes. Mexico, the first country of the region to incorporate a reproductive health approach within the public health system, began to integrate gender concerns in its programmes with the support of UNFPA and other organizations. In Haiti, UNFPA developed a three-year programme, with the main priority being to reduce the levels of maternal mortality and STDs, including HIV/AIDS. In the Dominican Republic, the new programme focused resources on parts of the country in most need and on better integrating gender issues and sociocultural aspects in the programme. The reduction of maternal mortality, unwanted teenage pregnancies and assistance for the formulation of a national population policy were other objectives. In Cuba, assistance was focused on sex education and the provision of contraceptives. Socio-cultural and statistical research activities in Paraguay contributed to identifying barriers to the exercise of reproductive and sexual rights among rural and indigenous women and adolescents. Training institutions in Brazil, Costa Rica and Venezuela trained managers in the public health sector from the Dominican Republic, Honduras and Paraguay, emphasizing reproductive health. Population education in schools continued to be supported by UNFPA, and efforts were made to reach youngsters outside the school system as well, particularly through NGOs. In the Dominican Republic, UNFPA contributed to the opening of three new centres to provide integrated health services for adolescents and to update national reproductive health norms. An innovative project incorporated non-traditional agents such as taxi drivers, traditional healers and barbers for orientation activities in reproductive health, including prevention of STDs, responsible parenthood and family planning.

Building national capacity was the ultimate aim of UNFPA assistance to all countries. UNFPA's work in Guatemala focused on national capacity-building in understanding population matters in the context of the peace process. In the Dominican Republic, UNFPA supported the strengthening and decentralization of the country's population information system. UNFPA provided technical assistance to Cuba to reinforce national institutions, including assistance for data collection and sexual education programmes, and provided support for the construction of a contraceptives plant. A regional project carried out with the Pan-American Health Organization (PAHO) developed a management training programme for health managers focused on reproductive health.

Interregional programmes. Allocations for interregional programmes totalled some $31.8 million in 1996, of which reproductive health/family planning activities accounted for 33.8 per cent; information, education and communication for 25.2 per cent; and formulation and evaluation of population policies for 18.5 per cent. The year was the beginning of a new cycle for UNFPA's intercountry programme, which would extend from 1996 to 1999. As the new cycle was implemented, UNFPA would monitor programme activities and incorporate lessons learned in the programming process. Much of the focus was on operationalizing strategies in the three UNFPA core programme areas of reproductive health, including family planning and sexual health; population and development strategies; and advocacy. In reproductive health, UNFPA collaborated with several organizations in such activities as research and development of improved methods of fertility regulation; development of guidelines, methodologies and operational approaches to strengthen reproductive health programmes and services; development and testing of cost-effective reproductive health interventions for application at the primary health-care level; and promotion of the concept of reproductive health as an overall approach to general health and well-being. UNFPA continued its support for activities under the Global Initiative on Contraceptive Requirements and Logistics Management Needs in Developing Countries (see above). It also continued its support for the promotion of South-South cooperation in the field of reproductive health (see below).

In the area of population and development strategies, support was provided for promoting the development and use of new methodologies in data collection, processing and dissemination. UNFPA assisted other UN bodies in compiling and updating databases on gender, population and development, and provided support for the Population Information Network (POPIN), which provided technical leadership in support of cooperation among population information networks. Assistance was provided to two initiatives, in conjunction with UNESCO and the Society for International Development, that carried out sociocultural research on how to operationalize the concept of reproductive health. A major component of interregional efforts was the Global Programme of Training in Population and Development, the main emphasis of which continued to be nine-month courses, with individual centres supplementing the regular curriculum with other training activities. In advocacy, UNFPA's main aim was to strengthen and broaden the base of policy support for the priority concerns of the Fund. Several organizations participated in activities related to the development of training and advocacy prototype materials on such issues as girls' education, the needs of adolescents and the importance of male involvement. An International Labour Organization (ILO) project was also supported, aiming at increasing the interest and capacity of ILO's partners in the labour sector to develop programmes for workers that promoted responsible family life, gender equality and reproductive health.

South-South cooperation

In January, the UNDP/UNFPA Executive Board considered the request of the intergovernmental organization Partners in Population and Development [DP/FPA/1996/11] for UNFPA support. The organization was established by 10 developing countries (Bangladesh, Colombia, Egypt, Kenya, Mexico, Morocco, Indonesia, Thailand, Tunisia and Zimbabwe) to implement the ICPD recommendations regarding South-South cooperation. It was to establish a small secretariat in Dhaka, Bangladesh, and had received pledges of funds from UNFPA, the World Bank and the Rockefeller Foundation. To facilitate the administration of the secretariat, the 10 members requested UNFPA to establish a trust fund mechanism, to which UNFPA provided $150,000 in financial support. They further requested the Executive Board's approval to recruit and assign project personnel to the Partners' secretariat. The secretariat's facilities and most of the utilities would be provided by the host country.

Under the proposal, the Director of the secretariat would be appointed by UNFPA, following consultations with the Partners, and the rest of the secretariat staff would be appointed by UNFPA following consultations with the Director.

By a 19 January decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/9)], the Executive Board approved the proposed arrangements as outlined in the report. It invited the Partners to consider broadening the organization's scope by involving in its programmes other developing countries as well as countries with economies in transition. The Board requested the UNFPA Executive Director to report to the Board in 1998 on this initiative, including UNFPA's role, and on the justification for further Fund involvement beyond 1998.

UNFPA publications programme

In response to a 1995 Executive Board request [YUN 1995, p. 1102], the Executive Director submitted a report on the effectiveness of UNFPA's publication programme [DP/FPA/1996/14], which was reviewed in the light of ICPD and the Fund's enhanced role in advocacy. Also included were the findings of an independent analysis of the publications programme.

By a 28 March decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/18)], the Executive Board reaffirmed the importance of information and advocacy activities to promote awareness and better understanding of UNFPA programmes. Noting UNFPA efforts to make most of its publications available in different languages, the Board requested the Executive Director to take into consideration the linguistic balance in developing the electronic dissemination of information. She was encouraged to give special attention to the needs of the Information and External Relations Division publications programme to support information, education and communication efforts at the national and local levels. In order to strengthen UNFPA publications, the Board requested the Executive Director to further develop a communication and information policy and strategy in the context of the UNFPA role in advocacy, in consultation with Board members as well as with observers and NGOs, taking account of the need to prioritize its publications with special attention to the content of other UN publications and UNFPA financial and human constraints. The Executive Director was also requested to submit such a strategy, including detailed costs of publications and distribution information, to the session that would examine the 1998-1999 budget estimates for administrative and programme support services. The Board requested the Executive Director to propose recommendations to facilitate the timely collection and dissemination of current data contained in the Inventory of Population Projects in Developing Countries Around the World and of the Guide to Sources of International Population Assistance.

Mission statement

In response to a 1995 Executive Board request [YUN 1995, p. 1093], the Executive Director submitted a revised draft UNFPA mission statement [DP/FPA/1996/21], which was arrived at after numerous consultations with professional staff and Board members.

Noting that UNFPA was mandated by the General Assembly to extend assistance to developing countries, countries with economies in transition and other countries at their request to help them address reproductive health and population issues, the statement said that its three main areas of work were: to help ensure universal access to reproductive health, including family planning and sexual health; to support population and development strategies that enabled capacity-building in population programming; and to promote awareness of population and development issues and advocate for the mobilization of the necessary resources and political will to accomplish work in that area.

UNFPA, the statement said, was guided by the principles of the ICPD Programme of Action. In particular, it was committed to reproductive rights, gender equality and the autonomy and empowerment of women. The statement affirmed that all individuals had the right to decide the number and spacing of their children as well as the right to the information and means to do so. UNFPA believed that meeting those goals would contribute to improving the quality of life and to the universally accepted aim of stabilizing world population. As the lead UN organization for implementation of the ICPD Programme of Action, UNFPA was committed to working with Governments, the UN system, development banks, bilateral aid agencies, NGOs and civil society.

By an 8 May decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/28)], the Board endorsed the mission statement and annexed it to the decision. The Board's endorsement took into account the discussions that had taken place, as reflected in its report [E/1996/33], particularly the paragraph that said the mission statement would in no way alter the Fund's mandate, priorities, resource allocations or operational guidelines. The mission statement was seen as a public relations document, not as a UN document.

Financial and administrative questions

UNFPA's estimated income in 1996 totalled $309.4 million, a 1 per cent decrease compared to income of $312.6 million in 1995 [DP/FPA/1997/10 (Part I/Add.1)]. Total contributions, pledged by 95 donors, fell by $0.4 million to $302.5 million; an additional $18.3 million was provided through multi-bilateral and other arrangements. Expenditures totalled $300.3 million, compared to $310.8 million the previous year. Project allocations for the year totalled $285.4 million, including $104.5 million of unspent allocations from 1995, while project expenditures were estimated at $216.5 million.

In a March report on the status of financial implementation of country programmes and projects [DP/FPA/1996/19], the Executive Director stated that the balance of UNFPA commitments from regular resources for ongoing programmes was $248 million. Of the total, $96.3 million was for sub-Saharan Africa; $31.8 million for the Arab States and Europe; $101.5 million for Asia and the Pacific; and $18.4 million for Latin America and the Caribbean.

The Executive Board, by a 17 May decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/27)], acknowledged the problem of absorptive capacity and financial resource utilization relating to population programmes in recipient countries, particularly in most African countries, and especially the least developed countries. It requested the Executive Director to study the problem within the framework of existing UNFPA institutional structures, in consultation with relevant actors, including development institutions familiar with UNFPA programmes in recipient countries, particularly those in Africa. The Board also requested that a study, as well as other means to address the problem, be undertaken to focus on concrete operational measures to enhance absorptive capacity and financial resource utilization, particularly in African countries. The measures should draw on an analysis of the problems as they were encountered, primarily at the country level. The Executive Director was also requested to present to the Board in 1998 concrete recommendations for UNFPA actions to enhance absorptive capacity and financial resource utilization, particularly in Africa.

Resource allocation

In response to a 1995 Executive Board request [YUN 1995, p. 1093], the Executive Director submitted a report [DP/FPA/1996/1] on a new approach for the allocation of UNFPA resources to country programmes. By a 19 January decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/10)], the Board requested the Executive Director to submit a revised document reflecting comments made by Board members, to be considered at a session later in the year.

The revised report [DP/FPA/1996/15] reviewed the evolution of UNFPA's existing system of resource allocation, which was based on the designation of priority and non-priority countries using one economic indicator (per-capita gross national product (GNP)) and various demographic and socio-economic indicators.

The revised approach, said the Executive Director, would function at two levels. First, indicators of ICPD goals (access to reproductive health; mortality reduction; and universal education, especially of girls) would be used, together with an indicator of income, to group countries according to the level of their needs for external assistance in the area of population and development. Second, further criteria, based on UNFPA technical and qualitative country-specific assessments, would be employed to distribute resources to individual countries within each group.

The Executive Director proposed categorizing developing countries into three groups. Group A would include developing countries in which two conditions were met: greatest distance from achieving ICPD goals and low levels of development. Countries meeting the first condition were those that had met established threshold levels for the year 2005 for three indicators or fewer. Countries with low levels of development included all least developed countries (LDCs) (see PART THREE, Chapter I) and/or countries with a GNP per capita of less than $750. The Fund's resources would be concentrated on Group A countries by allocating 65 to 69 per cent of country-programme resources to them. Countries in Group B were those that had made considerable progress towards achieving the ICPD goals (meeting the threshold levels for 4-6 indicators) or that had higher levels of development (GNP per capita of $750 or more). It was proposed to allocate 22-24 per cent of programme resources to those countries. Group C included countries that had met the thresholds of all seven ICPD goal indicators; 5 to 7 per cent of programme resources would be allocated to that group.

It was noted that, in addition to the developing countries, countries with economies in transition would have specific needs for external assistance on a temporary basis. The Executive Director proposed that 3 to 4 per cent of country programme resources be allocated for them.

When the revised approach was applied to 111 developing countries with populations of 150,000 or more, 60 countries fell into Group A, 39 into Group B, and 12 into Group C.

By a 27 March decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/15)], the Executive Board endorsed the revised approach, including the indicators and threshold levels towards meeting the goals of ICPD for the year 2005. It also endorsed the flexible approach to the allocation of relative shares of resources to the new categories of countries and the distribution of resources to individual countries, as outlined in the report. It decided that UNFPA should give special attention to LDCs, low-income countries and Africa. In distributing resources to individual countries within each category, the Board stated, UNFPA should use per capita GNP as a criterion, as well as other appropriate indicators of the level of development of a country.

The Board further decided that the allocation of resources should be based on an assessment of the needs and requirements of countries, and should take into consideration national programmes, plans and strategies on population and development and the need for external resources. The Board endorsed the procedure for categorization of countries into three groups and approved the following shares of resources: 67-69 per cent to Group A, 22-24 per cent to Group B, 5-7 per cent to Group C and 3-4 per cent to countries with economies in transition, on a temporary basis, and 0.5 per cent to other countries.

The Board recommended that the revised approach be introduced in a phased manner, taking into account the stage of the current cycle of assistance and the status of programme implementation in individual countries. It also recommended that the Executive Director undertake a quinquennial review of the system for resource allocation, including a performance assessment of the indicators and their threshold levels, and report to the Executive Board starting in the year 2000. The Executive Director was requested to provide annual information on the level of allocations and disbursements to the categories of countries as well as information on allocations and disbursements of resources to regions, LDCs and low-income countries. UNFPA was asked to continue its work to further develop indicators for the ICPD goals to be used in allocating resources.

Work plan 1997-2000

In an April report [DP/FPA/1996/18 & Corr.1], the Executive Director outlined the 1997-2000 work plan and requested programme expenditure authority for 1997. The UNFPA work plan—a rolling four-year plan whereby, for each new work plan, the current year was deleted and one future year was added—was a projected programme of assistance based on income projections from regular resources, prior commitments and foreseeable needs. For the 1997-2000 plan, the Executive Director took the income of 1996, estimated at $300 million, as the base, and projected a constant annual rate of increase of 8 per cent. That projection took into account preliminary indications from major donor countries about 1997 pledges. The new programmable resources from regular resources based on those assumptions were: $257 million for 1997, $279 million for 1998, $305 million for 1999 and $334 million for 2000.

The planned distribution of total programmable resources between country and intercountry activities (regional and interregional activities) took into consideration the needs in each of those areas. Having followed the allocation methodology recommended by the Board in a March decision (see above), the Executive Director noted the following changes in shares of resources for the three groups of countries: the share for Group A, currently 51 per cent, would be 60 per cent on average for 1997-2000, and was expected to reach the range of 67-69 per cent by 2000; the share for Group B, currently 35 per cent, was expected to be 28 per cent on average for the same period, and in the range of 22-24 per cent by 2000; and the share for Group C, currently 11 per cent, was expected to be 8 per cent on average, and 5-7 per cent by 2000.

By region, amounts for the four-year period would average: 38 per cent for sub-Saharan Africa; 12 per cent for the Arab States and Europe; 39 per cent for Asia and the Pacific; and 11 per cent for Latin America and the Caribbean.

By a 17 May decision [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/26)], the Executive Board endorsed the programme resource planning proposals; approved the request for the 1997 programme expenditure authority, estimated at $257 million; endorsed the estimates of new programmable resources from regular resources; and endorsed the use of the projected $15 million per year from multi-bilateral funding for 1997-2000.

UN Population Award

The 1996 United Nations Population Award was presented to Leticia Ramos-Shahani, a leading advocate for population policies and women's rights in the Philippines and internationally for over 30 years, and to Pathfinder International, a United States-based NGO that helped to start and manage population programmes worldwide.

The laureates each received a diploma, a gold medal and a monetary prize of $12,500 at ceremonies held on 17 July in New York.

The Award was established by General Assembly resolution 36/201 [YUN 1981, p. 792] to be presented annually to individuals or institutions for outstanding contributions to increased awareness of population problems and to their solutions. As at 1 January 1996, the Trust Fund for the UN Population Award totalled $737,739. Expenditures during the preceding year, including the prizes, totalled $42,185.

In October 1996 [A/51/534], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly the report of the UNFPA Executive Director on the Population Award.

Other population activities

Commission on Population and Development

The Commission on Population and Development, formerly the Population Commission, marked its fiftieth anniversary in 1996. The Commission's twenty-ninth session (New York, 26 February-1 March) [E/1996/25] was the first session since its membership was increased from 27 to 47 by the Economic and Social Council in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1551] and the first under the new terms of reference and the topic-oriented, multi-year work programme endorsed by Council resolution 1995/55 [YUN 1995, p. 1093]. As its central theme, the Commission considered "Reproductive rights and reproductive health" in the context of monitoring the implementation of the ICPD Programme of Action (see above). As in previous sessions, the Commission held a general debate, during which members exchanged views and national experiences in the area of population, particularly the implementation of the Programme of Action.

The Commission recommended a draft resolution on follow-up to ICPD to the Economic and Social Council, which was adopted (resolution 1996/2, see above). A resolution on the work programme in the field of population was adopted by the Commission and brought to the Council's attention (see below).

On the Commission's recommendation, the Council, by decision 1996/234 of 17 July, took note of the Commission's report on its twenty-ninth session and approved the provisional agenda for the thirtieth (1997) session.

1996 UN activities

In a report on the work of the Department for Economic and Social Information and Policy Analysis (DESIPA) in population in 1996 [E/CN.9/1997/7], the Secretary-General described activities in the areas of analysis of demographic variables at world level; world population projection; population policy and socio-economic development; monitoring, review and appraisal, co-ordination and dissemination of population information; and technical cooperation in population. Research and technical cooperation work and information activities were carried out by the Population Division, whose work programme was adopted by the Commission on Population and Development (see below).

With regard to fertility and family planning, a study was published entitled Child Survival, Health and Family Planning Programmes and Fertility, which examined the relationships between mortality and fertility in the context of socio-economic development, based on case studies in Ecuador, Indonesia and Zimbabwe. The third report on global monitoring of contraceptive use, Levels and Trends of Contraceptive Use as Assessed in 1994, estimated that, by 1996, 60 per cent of couples of reproductive age were probably using some form of contraception, but that rate varied considerably from 12 per cent of couples in sub-Saharan Africa to 79 per cent in eastern Asia. A study entitled Family Building Process: An Approach to Evaluation of the Impact of Family Planning Programmes, which discussed a new method of measuring fertility taking into account contraceptive use, was completed and submitted for publication. Work continued on the study entitled Evolving Patterns of Fertility Behaviour in Developing Countries and on a report entitled Measurement of the Quality of Family Planning Services: Issues and Challenges. DESIPA's mortality work included databases allowing the estimation of child mortality by sex for countries in Asia and Latin America, issued under the titles Child Mortality by Sex: Asia and Child Mortality by Sex: Latin America and the Caribbean. A study on the status of women and child survival was completed and would be published under the title Too Young to Die: Genes or Gender? All but two countries (India and Jordan) recorded higher levels of mortality among male than among female children.

International migration estimates showed that the proportion of women among all international migrants remained virtually unchanged at almost 48 per cent during the period 1965-1990.

With respect to population projections, World Population Prospects: the 1996 Revision was completed. As in the 1994 Revision, the year 2050 was maintained as the horizon for the projections, but the new base date was 1995; there was one series of demographic estimates for the period 1950-1995 and four projection variants for the period 1995-2050. At mid-1996, the revision stated, world population stood at 5.77 billion persons, an increase of 81 million persons over the previous year. Between 1990 and 1995, world population grew at 1.48 per cent per annum, much below the 1.72 per cent per annum rate between 1975 and 1990. Eighty per cent of the world population lived in the less developed regions. The 1990-1995 average annual growth rate was 1.8 per cent in the less developed regions and 0.4 per cent in the more developed regions. The population growth rate of the less developed regions was lower (1.77 per cent per annum between 1990 and 1995) than that estimated two years earlier (1.88 per cent per annum). Major factors affecting the growth rate were a decline in fertility and a higher mortality in countries affected by wars (Burundi, Iraq, Liberia, Rwanda) or by the spread of AIDS.

Work in population policy and socio-economic development included a study submitted for publication entitled International Migration Policies and Programmes: A World Survey. It examined policies on long-term migrants; labour migration; refugees and asylum-seekers; undocumented or illegal migration; and relevant international and regional instruments. The population data bank maintained by the Population Division was updated in preparation for the sixth edition of the population policy database, Global Population Policy Database, 1997. In the area of population and sustainable development, a set of country profiles was prepared, based on the database on population, resources, environment and development.

Dissemination of population information was expanded in 1996 through POPIN, available on the Internet. Together with other partners, training, workshops and technical assistance were made available to population specialists in each of the regions. Research studies were published in a variety of formats to meet the needs of different audiences and widely disseminated.

Technical cooperation

In 1996, the Population Division provided technical assistance services to more than 30 projects in 20 developing countries in Africa, Asia, western Asia and Latin America and countries with economies in transition. Areas covered were population and development training; institutionalizing analysis and research on socio-economic and demographic data obtained from population censuses, surveys and vital registration systems; population policy; and population and development.

During the year, technical support services specialists provided substantive support to UNFPA country support teams and to national projects. In addition, they participated in technical workshops organized by UNFPA on gender, population and development (New York, 30 September-3 October) and on prevention and care of STDs at the primary health-care level (Geneva, 21-25 October).

Demographics

Commission on Sustainable Development.

The Secretary-General submitted a report on demographic dynamics and sustainability [E/CN.17/1996/10], prepared by UNFPA in consultation with the UN Secretariat, to the fourth session of the Commission on Sustainable Development (New York, 18 April-3 May). The report covered progress in the implementation of the aims set out in chapter 5 (demographic dynamics and sustainability) of Agenda 21, which was adopted by the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) [YUN 1992, p. 672]. It included information on a range of factors that had been shown to have a significant impact on demographic variables and on population and sustainable development policies in general, focusing on government action in support of population policies and programmes and, in particular, in support of gender issues.

The report concluded that UNCED and ICPD were important agents of change. Both of them, but especially ICPD, fashioned new ways of approaching population questions and problems and gave greater visibility to the critical linkages between population and developmental and environmental issues. The extent to which action on those linkages would be taken would depend on the financial resources made available, nationally and internationally.

The Commission adopted a decision [E/1996/28 (dec. 4/3)] on demographic dynamics and sustainability, in which it expressed satisfaction that greater importance was being attached to population questions and to the need to integrate population factors into environment and development planning. It welcomed activities to follow up chapter 5 of Agenda 21 and chapter III of the ICPD Programme of Action. The Commission encouraged Governments, regional and international organizations and NGOs to continue to develop or support research on gender-sensitive analysis and the linkages between population, poverty, consumption and production, environment and natural resources, education and health as a guide to effective sustainable development. It encouraged Governments, NGOs and relevant UN bodies to implement effective information, education and communication strategies that took into account such linkages, thereby creating the necessary conditions for the rapid achievement of the goals of Agenda 21 and ICPD.

ACC Task Force. The nineteenth session of the ACC Subcommittee on Demographic Estimates and Projections (Geneva, 25-27 June) [ACC/1996/20] discussed the continuing collaboration in the demographic field within the UN system, including the schedule for coordination and dissemination of the 1996 rounds of consistent demographic estimates and projections and arrangements for the 1998 rounds. It also discussed the recent activities of the Population Division (see above) and of the regional commissions, the specialized agencies and other UN bodies.

The Subcommittee agreed that it was essential to continue inter-agency coordination in the field of demographic and sectoral estimates and projections in order to strengthen the UN system database, maintain consistency of coverage and timing, and ensure homogeneity in the presentation of results.

Programme questions

On 1 March, the Commission on Population and Development adopted a resolution [E/1996/25 (res. 1996/1)] on the work programme in the field of population, which it brought to the attention of the Economic and Social Council. The Commission regretted that the work programme for the biennium 1996-1997, adopted by it in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1104], had had to be adjusted to take into account the general measures taken by the Secretary-General in view of the tight financial situation of the Organization. It urged the General Assembly, in its future deliberations on the work programme, to ensure that none of its essential elements were adversely affected. The Commission reiterated the need to maintain the special role and strengths of the Population Division as a body with competence across the broad range of issues covered by ICPD, as well as the importance of maximizing the Division's effectiveness. It reaffirmed the work programme's content as approved in 1995 and stressed that priority was to be attached to the elements that were directly related to the monitoring and review of the Programme of Action. The Commission recognized the need to reappraise the shape, content and structure of the work programme at its thirtieth (1997) session in view of the beginning of the new planning period, as well as the need to support the implementation of the outcomes of major UN conferences. The Director of the Population Division was asked to consult with Commission members with respect to the reappraisal. The Commission fully supported the need to protect the long-term work programme, including both traditional demographic work and the development of innovative approaches to meeting new demands following the outcomes of ICPD and other major UN conferences.

Human settlements

UN Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II)

The United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) was held in Istanbul, Turkey, from 3 to 14 June 1996 [A/CONF.165/14], as decided by the General Assembly in 1992 [GA res. 47/180]. The Conference, also called the "City Summit", addressed two themes—adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development in an urbanizing world. The first United Nations Conference on Human Settlements was held in 1976 in Vancouver, Canada [YUN 1976, p. 441]. The high-level segment of Habitat II, at which 117 heads of State or Government or their personal representatives made statements, took place from 12 to 14 June.

Preceded on 1 and 2 June by pre-Conference consultations on procedural and organizational matters, Habitat II was attended by 171 States, the observer for Palestine, three of the regional commissions and three associate members of regional commissions, UN organizations and specialized agencies, and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations (NGOs). Its work was divided between two committees: Committee I dealt with organizational matters and considered the draft Habitat Agenda (see below); and Committee II considered the role and contribution of local authorities, the private sector, parliamentarians, NGOs and other partners in implementing the Habitat Agenda. Committee II conducted hearings on that subject at which representatives of the different components of civil society presented their views to delegates. They also were given the opportunity to assemble in their own partners' forums. The hearings involved representatives of local authorities, parliamentarians, NGOs, business, foundations, scientists, professionals and researchers.

The Conference elected as its President Suleyman Demirel, President of Turkey; it also elected a Rapporteur-General, 27 Vice-Presidents and an ex-officio Vice-President from the host country.

The Conference President, the UN Secretary-General and the Secretary-General of Habitat II, Wally N'Dow, spoke at the inaugural ceremony.

In his statement, the UN Secretary-General said that Habitat II was the last in a series of UN conferences that had shaped, during the 1990s, an agenda for development. He stated that there were three points which could provide useful background for the conference debates: Habitat II as a link in a series of international conferences; Habitat II as an innovation in international conferences; and the Habitat Agenda as a follow-up to the Conference. He noted that by the year 2000 almost half the world's population would live in urban centres. Problems of jobs, housing, infrastructure and environmental safety would increasingly acquire an urban face. The crises of urban development, said the Secretary-General, were crises of all States, rich and poor, but the challenges were most severe in developing countries. Inner city dwellers, the inhabitants of slums or marginalized favelas, ghettos and barrios shared in the misery, health dangers, and a vision of hopeless unemployment and marginalization. But such common problems also provided the basis for common action. In some regions of the world, however, the concern about cities and towns had to be balanced with the need to develop rural settlements and the rural economy. In other regions, rapid urbanization accompanied by rapid economic growth had resulted in great gaps in infrastructure, spiralling land prices, housing beyond the reach of most, and growing environmental decay. In the most urbanized parts of the world, cities were becoming the focus of national policy. There was a joint awareness that human settlements would be central to growth and sustainable development, said the Secretary-General, and policies had to reflect that.

Istanbul Declaration on Human Settlements.

On 14 June, Habitat II adopted the Istanbul Declaration on Human Settlements, in which the heads of State or Government and the official delegations of countries assembled at the Conference endorsed the universal goals of ensuring adequate shelter for all and making human settlements safer, healthier and more liveable, equitable, sustainable and productive. They committed themselves to the objectives, principles and recommendations contained in the Habitat Agenda (see below) and pledged mutual support for its implementation.

The Conference participants noted that, to improve the quality of life within human settlements, they had to combat the deterioration of conditions that, particularly in developing countries, had reached crisis proportions. To that end a number of issues had to be addressed: unsustainable consumption and production patterns, particularly in industrialized countries; unsustainable population changes, including changes in structure and distribution, giving priority consideration to the tendency towards excessive population concentration; homelessness; increasing poverty; unemployment; social exclusion; family instability; inadequate resources; lack of basic infrastructure and services; lack of adequate planning; growing insecurity and violence; environmental degradation; and increased vulnerability to disasters.

Although the challenges of human settlements were global, countries and regions also faced specific problems. The participants recognized the need to improve living conditions in the cities, towns and villages throughout the world, particularly in developing countries and in countries with economies in transition. In that connection, it was acknowledged that globalization of the world economy presented opportunities and challenges for the development process, as well as risks and uncertainties, and that the achievement of the goals of the Habitat Agenda would be facilitated by positive actions on financing of development, external debt, international trade and transfer of technology.

In addition to improving the urban habitat, it was also necessary to extend adequate infrastructure, public services and employment opportunities to rural areas in order to enhance their attractiveness, develop an integrated network of settlements and minimize rural-to-urban migration. Small- and medium-sized towns needed special focus.

Participants recognized the particular needs of women, children and youth for safe, healthy and secure living conditions and stated that they would intensify their efforts to eradicate poverty and discrimination, to promote and protect human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, and to provide for basic needs, such as education, nutrition and life-span health care services, and especially adequate shelter for all. They committed themselves to promoting full accessibility for people with disabilities, as well as gender equality in policies, programmes and projects.

Further, the participants reaffirmed their commitment to realizing the right to adequate housing; stated that they would work to expand the supply of affordable housing; committed themselves to sustainable patterns of production, consumption, transportation and settlement development, pollution prevention, respect for the carrying capacity of ecosystems and preservation of opportunities for future generations; and affirmed that they would adopt the enabling strategy and principles of partnership and participation as the most democratic and effective approach for the realization of their commitments.

Noting that the implementation of the Habitat Agenda would require adequate funding, the participants noted that they had to mobilize financial resources at the national and international levels, including new and additional resources from all sources—multilateral and bilateral, public and private.

Habitat Agenda. The Habitat Agenda: goals and principles, commitments and global plan of action, was adopted by Habitat II on 14 June. The draft text of the Agenda had been established by the Preparatory Committee for Habitat II (see below). Reservations or comments were expressed on a number of chapters or parts of chapters by the following countries: Argentina, Ecuador, Egypt, Guatemala, Holy See, Honduras, Iran, Kuwait, Malta, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, United Arab Emirates, United States, Zambia.

The Habitat Agenda's preamble discussed the Conference's two themes. With regard to the first—adequate shelter for all—it was noted that a large segment of the world's population lacked shelter and sanitation, particularly in developing countries. Habitat II recognized that access to safe and healthy shelter and basic services was essential to a person's physical, psychological, social and economic well-being and should be a fundamental part of urgent actions for the more than 1 billion people without decent living conditions. The Conference's objective was to achieve adequate shelter for all, especially the deprived urban and rural poor, through an enabling approach to the development and improvement of shelter that was environmentally sound. As to the second theme—sustainable human settlements development in an urbanizing world—the Conference observed that it combined economic development, social development and environmental protection, with full respect for all human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the right to development, and offered a means to achieve a world of greater stability and peace. Lack of development and the existence of widespread absolute poverty could inhibit the full and effective enjoyment of human rights and undermine fragile democracy and popular participation.

The preamble went on to place Habitat II in the context of the experience since the first UN Conference on Human Settlements in 1976 [YUN 1976, p. 441] and of the results of recent world conferences, beginning with the 1992 UN Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) [YUN 1992, p. 670], which had agreed on a framework for the sustainable development of human settlements. In addition, the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000, adopted in 1988 [YUN 1988, p. 478], emphasized the need for improved production and delivery of shelter, revised national housing policies and an enabling strategy and offered useful guidelines for the realization of adequate shelter for all in the next century.

Although urbanization had historically been associated with economic and social progress, Habitat II stated that the challenges facing cities and towns had to be recognized. According to projections, by the turn of the century more than 3 billion people—one half of the world's population—would live and work in urban areas. The most serious problems confronting cities and towns included inadequate financial resources, lack of employment opportunities, spreading homelessness and expansion of squatter settlements, increased poverty and a widening gap between rich and poor, growing insecurity and rising crime rates, inadequate and deteriorating building stock, services and infrastructure, lack of health and educational facilities, improper land use, insecure land tenure, rising traffic congestion, increasing pollution, lack of green spaces, inadequate water supply and sanitation, uncoordinated urban development and an increasing vulnerability to disaster. All of those seriously challenged the capacities of Governments, particularly of developing countries, to realize economic development, social development and environmental protection.

In the process of globalization and growing interdependence, rural settlements represented a great challenge and opportunity for renewed developmental initiatives. Many rural settlements were facing a lack of economic opportunities, especially employment, and of infrastructure and services, particularly those related to water, sanitation, health, education, communication, transportation and energy.

Urban-rural linkages were of crucial importance for the sustainability of human settlements. Rural-to-urban migration had steadily increased, particularly in developing countries, which had put enormous pressure on urban infrastructure and services already under serious stress. It was urgent to eradicate rural poverty, improve the quality of living conditions and create employment and educational opportunities in rural settlements, regional centres and secondary cities.

The preamble went on to call for measures to address the special human settlements needs of people living in absolute poverty, displaced persons, including refugees, children and youth, indigenous people, women, persons with disabilities and older persons. It noted that empowering all people, especially those belonging to vulnerable and disadvantaged groups, to participate equally and effectively in activities related to human settlements was the basis for civic engagement and should be facilitated by national authorities.

It was recognized that adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development could not be set apart from the need for favourable national and international frameworks for economic development, social development and environmental protection, which were indispensable and mutually reinforcing components of sustainable development.

The Habitat Agenda contained 10 goals and principles, which, stated the Conference, were in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations and international law.

(I) Equitable human settlements were those in which all people had equal access to housing, infrastructure, health services, adequate food and water, education and open spaces, and such settlements provided equal opportunities with regard to livelihood, access to economic resources, personal, spiritual, religious, cultural and social development, participation in public decision-making, equal rights and obligations with regard to conserving and using natural and cultural resources, and access to mechanisms to ensure that rights were not violated. The empowerment of women was fundamental to sustainable human settlements development.

(II) Poverty eradication, the principle of which was based on the framework adopted by the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1113] and on the outcome of other major UN conferences, was essential for sustainable human settlements development.

(III) Sustainable development was essential for human settlements development and gave full consideration to the needs and necessities of achieving economic growth, social development and environmental protection. Special consideration had to be given to the situation and needs of developing countries and of countries with economies in transition. Human settlements should be developed taking account of sustainable development principles as set out in Agenda 21, adopted by UNCED in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 672]. Production, consumption and transport had to be managed in ways that protected and conserved the stock of resources while drawing on them. Sustainable human settlements entailed their balanced geographical distribution, promotion of economic and social development, human health and education, and the conservation of biological diversity as well as air, water, forest, vegetation and soil qualities at standards sufficient to sustain human life and well-being for future generations.

(IV) The quality of life depended on, among other things, the conditions and spatial characteristics of villages, towns and cities. City lay-out and aesthetics, land-use patterns, population and building densities, transportation and ease of access to basic goods, services and public amenities had a crucial bearing on the liveability of settlements. People's need for community and their aspirations for more liveable neighbourhoods and settlements had to guide the process of design, management and maintenance of human settlements. Objectives of that endeavour included protecting public health, providing for safety and security, education and social integration, promoting equality and respect for diversity and cultural identities, increased accessibility for persons with disabilities, and preservation of historic, spiritual, religious and culturally significant buildings and districts, respecting local landscapes and treating the local environment with respect and care.

(V) As the basic unit of society, the family was entitled to receive protection and support. Marriage should be entered into with the free consent of the intending spouses, and husband and wife should be equal partners. Human settlements planning should take into account the constructive role of the family in the design, development and management of settlements, and society should facilitate conditions for its integration, reunification, preservation, improvement and protection within adequate shelter and with access to basic services and a sustainable livelihood.

(VI) All people had rights and also had to accept their responsibility to respect and protect the rights of others—including future generations—and to contribute actively to the common good. Sustainable human settlements were those that generated a sense of citizenship and identity, cooperation and dialogue for the common good, and a spirit of voluntarism and civic engagement, where all people were encouraged and had an equal opportunity to participate in decision-making and development. Governments at all levels had a responsibility to ensure access to education and to protect their population's health, safety and general welfare.

(VII) Partnerships among countries and among actors within countries from public, private, voluntary and community-based organizations, the cooperative sector, NGOs and individuals were essential to the achievement of sustainable human settlements development and the provision of adequate shelter for all and basic services. Partnerships could integrate and mutually support objectives of broad-based participation through a number of processes that could be made more effective by strengthening civil organizations at all levels.

(VIII) Solidarity with those belonging to disadvantaged and vulnerable groups, including people living in poverty, as well as tolerance, non-discrimination and cooperation among all people, families and communities were foundations for social cohesion. The international community and Governments at all levels were called on to promote sound and effective policies and instruments and to mobilize complementary resources to meet the challenges of human settlements development.

(IX) To safeguard the interests of present and future generations in human settlements was a fundamental goal of the international community. Although the formulation and implementation of strategies for human settlements development were primarily the responsibility of each country, new and additional financial resources from various sources were necessary to achieve the goals of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development in an urbanizing world. Existing resources available to developing countries—public, private, multilateral, bilateral, domestic and external—needed to be enhanced through appropriate and flexible mechanisms and economic instruments to support adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development.

(X) Since human health and quality of life were at the centre of the effort to develop sustainable human settlements, the participating States committed themselves to promoting and attaining the goals of universal and equal access to quality education, the highest attainable standard of physical, mental and environmental health, and the equal access of all to primary health care. Sustainable human settlements depended on the interactive development of policies and concrete actions to provide access to food and nutrition, safe drinking water, sanitation and primary health-care services; to eradicate major diseases, particularly childhood ones; to create safe places to work and live; and to protect the environment.

Embracing those principles, the participating States committed themselves to implementing the Habitat Agenda, through local, national, subregional and regional plans of action and/or other policies and programmes. They adopted seven commitments to objectives relating to: adequate shelter for all; sustainable human settlements; enablement and participation of all key actors in human settlements and shelter development; gender equality; financing shelter and human settlements; international cooperation in attaining the goals set out in the Habitat Agenda; and assessing progress in the Agenda's implementation. In implementing those commitments, it was noted that special attention should be given to the circumstances of people living in poverty, the homeless, women, older people, indigenous people, refugees, displaced persons, persons with disabilities and those belonging to vulnerable and disadvantaged groups. Special consideration should also be given to the needs of migrants and to the specific needs of children, particularly street children.

The global plan of action: strategies for implementation noted that there had been remarkable changes in population and social, political, environmental and economic circumstances affecting the strategic outlook since the first UN Conference on Human Settlements in 1976.

Under the strategy of the global plan of action, government efforts were based on establishing legislative, institutional and financial frameworks that would enable the private sector, NGOs and community groups to contribute fully to the achievement of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development and enable all women and men to work with each other and in their communities with Governments at all levels to determine their future collectively, decide on priorities for action, identify and allocate resources fairly and build partnerships to achieve common goals.

With regard to adequate shelter for all, Habitat II listed actions to be taken by Governments in relation to formulating enabling shelter policies. They included: decentralization of shelter policies and their administration to subnational and local levels; integration of shelter policies with macroeconomic, social, demographic, environmental and cultural policies; formulation of policies to promote the enablement approach to the development, maintenance and rehabilitation of shelter in rural and urban areas; adoption of a cross-sectoral approach to policy development; and improvement of shelter delivery systems.

Actions by Governments to improve shelter delivery systems included: enabling markets to work by ensuring market efficiency; facilitating community-based production of housing by supporting the efforts of people, individually or collectively, to produce shelter; ensuring access to land by promoting efficient land markets and the environmentally sustainable use of land, eradicating legal and social barriers to the equal and equitable access to land, and facilitating access to land and security of tenure for all socioeconomic groups; mobilizing sources of finance by improving the effectiveness of existing housing finance systems, creating new housing finance mechanisms and facilitating access to housing for those not served by existing finance mechanisms; ensuring access to basic infrastructure and services by safeguarding the health, safety, welfare and improved living environment of all people and providing adequate and affordable basic infrastructure and services, ensuring more equitable provision of basic infrastructure and service delivery systems and ensuring the efficiency of infrastructure and the provision of services and their operation and maintenance practices; and improving planning, design, construction, maintenance and rehabilitation by promoting and supporting an adequate supply of locally produced, environmentally sound, affordable and durable basic building materials and enhancing the local capacity for environmentally sound production of building materials and construction techniques. As to action on behalf of vulnerable groups and people with special needs, Governments should remove barriers and eradicate discrimination in providing shelter and make efforts to reduce vulnerability.

The Conference also listed actions to be taken by Governments with respect to sustainable human settlements development in an urbanizing world, noting that rapid urbanization, the concentration of the urban population in large cities, the sprawl of cities into wider geographical areas and the rapid growth of mega-cities were among the most significant transformations of human settlements. Actions to be taken by Governments with regard to sustainable land use included support, with the assistance of international and regional institutions, of the efforts of human settlements to establish sustainable urban land-use patterns and planning; and the development and support of improved and integrated land management. As to the eradication of poverty, creation of productive employment and social integration, Governments should promote equal access to and fair and equitable provision of services in human settlements; promote social integration, recognizing the importance of volunteer contributions and in close cooperation with NGOs, community-based organizations, the co-operative sector and public and private foundations; combat poverty in partnership with all interested parties, including workers' and employers' organizations, since urban and rural poverty and unemployment represented severe constraints for human settlements development; promote gender-sensitive planning and management of human settlements in collaboration with women's groups and other interested parties; develop the full potential of young people and prepare them to take a responsible role in developing human settlements in partnership with the private sector, non-governmental youth organizations and other NGOs, as well as community-based organizations; promote disability-sensitive planning and management of human settlements; promote the continuing progress of indigenous people and ensure their full participation in the development of the rural and urban areas in which they live, with full respect for their cultures, languages, traditions, education, social organizations and settlement patterns; prevent, reduce and eliminate violence and crime in partnership with all interested parties; and protect vulnerable and disadvantaged people.

With respect to population and sustainable human settlements development, Governments should take action to address population issues affecting human settlements and fully integrate demographic concerns into sustainable human settlements development policies. As to environmentally sustainable, healthy and liveable human settlements, Governments were to: improve the health and well-being of all people throughout their life-span, particularly those living in poverty; improve environmental conditions and reduce industrial and domestic waste and other forms of health risks in human settlements; recognize the need for an integrated approach to providing those environmental services and policies that were essential for human life; promote a healthy environment that would continue to support adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements for current and future generations; develop an integrated approach to water resources management, taking cognizance of the links between water, sanitation and health, between the economy and the environment, and between cities and their hinterland, and harmonizing land-use planning and housing policies with water sector policies; improve the liveability of human settlements; and take steps to prevent transboundary pollution and minimize its impact on human settlements when it occurred.

In connection with sustainable energy use and transport and communication systems, Governments should take actions in partnership with the private sector, NGOs, community-based organizations and consumer groups. As to conservation and rehabilitation of the historical and cultural heritage, Governments should promote historical and cultural continuity and encourage broad civic participation in all kinds of cultural activities; and integrate development with conservation and rehabilitation goals. To improve urban economies, Governments should: establish an effective financial base for urban development in cooperation with trade unions, consumer organizations, business, industry, trade organizations and the financial sector, including the cooperatively organized business sector organizations and NGOs; provide opportunities for productive employment and private investment in consultation with workers' and employers' organizations, chambers of commerce, industry, trade and consumer organizations, professional associations and the financial sector, including the cooperative sector, and in the context of comprehensive urban planning; provide opportunities for small businesses and for the micro-enterprise and cooperative sectors, in consultation with NGOs, community-based organizations, and financial and vocational training institutions; strengthen urban economies so that they could be competitive in a globalizing economy; and alleviate the adverse impacts of measures for structural and economic transition.

With respect to balanced development of settlements in rural regions, actions by Governments should include: promotion of sustainable development of rural settlements and reduction of rural-to-urban migration; promotion of the use of new and improved technologies and appropriate traditional practices in rural settlements development; establishment of policies for sustainable regional development and management; strengthening sustainable development and employment opportunities in impoverished rural areas; and adopting an integrated approach to promote balanced and mutually supportive urban-rural development. As to disaster prevention, mitigation and preparedness, and post-disaster rehabilitation capabilities, Governments should: improve natural and human-made disaster prevention, preparedness, mitigation and response in close consultation with insurance companies, NGOs, organized communities, and the academic, health and scientific community; consider providing remedial assistance in areas affected by radioactive contaminants, together with international organizations having expertise in their clean-up and disposal; establish procedures for mitigating disasters; prevent technological and industrial disasters; and prepare for and implement post-disaster relief, rehabilitation, reconstruction and resettlement, in partnership with interested parties.

Habitat II also listed actions to be taken by Governments with regard to capacity-building and institutional development, stating that economic and social development and environmental protection were interdependent and mutually reinforcing components of sustainable human settlements development. Actions should be taken to ensure effective decentralization and strengthening of local authorities and their associations/networks. With regard to popular participation and civic engagement, Governments, local authorities and/or civil society organizations should put into effect institutional and legal frameworks to facilitate and enable the broad-based participation of all people and their community organizations in decision-making and in implementing and monitoring human settlements strategies, policies and programmes. Governments at the appropriate levels, including local authorities and their associations, should facilitate capacity-building and institutional development for the improvement of human settlements planning and management. As to metropolitan planning and management, Governments should take action to address the special needs of metropolitan areas and the needs of all people living in them. In connection with domestic financial resources and economic instruments, actions by Governments should include strengthening national and local economies and their financial and economic base with a view to addressing the needs of sustainable human settlements. With respect to information and communications, Governments should: improve the capacity to exploit information and communications innovations to enhance their public good; disseminate, in partnership with social actors, experience that contributed to facilitating access to adequate housing for all and the development of sustainable human settlements to assist in formulating public policies on human settlements development; and increase the knowledge and strengthen the information base, together with research institutions, statistical offices and other interested parties.

Habitat II noted that there was a need for the political will of all States and for specific action at the international level to establish, inspire and encourage new forms of cooperation, partnership, coordination at all levels and investment from all sources, including the private sector, in order to contribute to providing and improving shelter conditions in human settlements, especially in developing countries. The need for all countries, especially developing ones, to improve living and working conditions in human settlements called for an enabling international environment and for integrated approaches at the national and international levels. Technological developments were leading to major changes in the structure of employment. In economic and social terms, housing was a productive sector and achievement of the goals of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development at the global level would be facilitated by positive actions on the issues of finance, external debt, international trade and transfer of technology. The international community should support Governments in their efforts to cope with the impact of those changes on human settlements within a framework of enabling strategies, the Conference stated. Other international cooperation and coordination actions recommended by Habitat II dealt with the need for new and additional financial resources and economic instruments to support adequate shelter and sustainable human settlements development; technology transfer and information exchange; and technical and institutional cooperation.

With regard to the implementation and follow-up of the Habitat Agenda, the Conference stated that national plans of action and/or other relevant national programmes and actions would need to be developed or strengthened and their implementation would need to be monitored and evaluated by Governments in close cooperation with their partners in sustainable development at the national level. Recommendations were made for implementation at the national and international levels and for the involvement of local authorities and civil society, including the private sector. It was further noted that it was essential to evaluate the impact of policies, strategies and actions on the provision of adequate shelter and the achievement of sustainable human settlements development and that the results of those evaluations would be considered by relevant UN organs and bodies, including the Commission on Human Settlements. All partners of the Habitat Agenda, including local authorities, the private sector and communities, should regularly monitor and evaluate their own performances in implementing the Agenda through comparable human settlements and shelter indicators and documented best practices.

Other action. In addition to adopting the Istanbul Declaration and the Habitat Agenda, the Conference adopted a resolution expressing its appreciation to President Demirel for his outstanding contribution to the successful outcome of the Conference and its profound gratitude to the Government and people of Turkey for their hospitality. It also adopted a resolution approving the report of its Credentials Committee.

Documentation. Documentation before Habitat II included the Secretary-General's report on the best practices initiative [A/CONF.165/8], which was launched as part of the preparatory process for the Conference at the first session of the Preparatory Committee [YUN 1994, p. 977]. It was conceived as: a means of forging a positive vision of an urbanizing world by focusing the world's attention on practical solutions to some of the most pressing social, economic and environmental problems facing an urbanizing world; as an integral part of the preparation of national action plans and reports for Habitat II; and as a capacity-building exercise.

Nearly 600 best practices for improving the environment—initiatives by Governments, local authorities, grass-roots organizations and community groups that had proved effective in solving some of the most pressing economic, social and environmental problems facing the urbanizing world—were submitted to a Technical Advisory Committee, which then selected 100. From those, 43 were short-listed and forwarded to a 10-member jury that met in Toronto, Canada, in March. The best practices jury selected 12 initiatives to receive awards and be highlighted at Habitat II.

The Secretary-General described preliminary lessons learned from the best practices initiative and noted that the case studies submitted, award-winning or not, demonstrated that millions of individuals and thousands of communities, associations, organizations and cities were contributing effectively to promoting shelter for most, if not all, and to establishing more sustainable forms of human settlement and development.

At Habitat II, on 4 June, the Secretary-General presented awards to the 12 best practices selected by the Toronto jury. The winning submissions came from Argentina, Brazil, Canada, China, Cote d'Ivoire, India, Morocco, the Netherlands, Poland, South Africa and the United States (2).

By a 9 May note [A/CONF.165/9], the Conference Secretary-General transmitted the draft Habitat Agenda [A/CONF.165/L.1 & Corr.1 & Add.1,2], the final version of which was adopted by the Conference (see above). As an addendum to that note [A/CONF.165/9/Add.1], the Secretariat transmitted a report of the Executive Director of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements (UNCHS) on the new objectives, role and place of UNCHS within the UN system. The report gave an account of recent action by the Commission on Human Settlements and the General Assembly with regard to the administrative arrangements for the Centre, including the issue of separate senior management. What had emerged, said the report, was the strong desire of Member States and the Secretary-General to maintain and enhance the Centre's role as the global focal point for human settlements activities and to strengthen its capabilities as a programme to meet the serious human settlements challenges of the coming years.

As to the objectives, role and place of UNCHS in the post-Habitat II period, the report discussed the Centre's future functions, indicated what should be its substantive priorities, made recommendations with regard to strengthening existing institutional arrangements, suggested ways to renew the Centre's funding base, and described ways in which the Centre could build new partnerships both within and outside the United Nations, taking into account emerging new actors in the development arena, especially at the local level.

By a second addendum [A/CONF.165/9/Add.2], the Conference Secretary-General transmitted a report on coordination and cooperation within the UN system in the implementation of the Habitat Agenda.

Also before the Conference were Secretariat notes on the future of human settlements: good policy can make a difference [A/CONF.165/7], which was a compendium of settlements and shelter issues and trends, including an evaluation of current and past policies and a look into the future; and on the role and contribution of local authorities, the private sector, parliamentarians, NGOs and other partners in the implementation of the Habitat Agenda [A/CONF.165/10/Rev.1].

Preparations for the Conference

The Preparatory Committee for Habitat II held its third and final session in New York from 5 to 16 February [A/CONF.165/PC.3/7], during which it transmitted to the Conference the texts that would constitute the draft final document of the Conference, the draft Habitat Agenda, and decided that participating States should be invited to make statements of national priorities and commitments at or in conjunction with Habitat II. It approved a list of NGOs for accreditation to the Conference and its preparatory process and decided to exclude or postpone to the pre-Conference consultations the consideration of other NGOs. It also recommended to the General Assembly that it authorize the Economic and Social Council to decide on the question of those NGOs which had not been recommended for accreditation. The Committee further approved a list of international associations of local authorities for accreditation, decided on a provisional agenda for the Conference, took note of documents relating to the status of preparations for the Conference, authorized its Bureau to meet before the Conference to resolve outstanding organizational matters, and noted a proposal to make electronic data-bank material on the Conference available in French.

In a March note [A/50/900], the UN Secretary-General drew the attention of the Assembly to the Preparatory Committee's request that it authorize the Economic and Social Council to decide on the accreditation of NGOs that had not been recommended. By decision 50/477 of 3 April, the Assembly authorized the Council to do so.

The Council, by decision 1996/223 of 3 May, decided not to accredit to Habitat II three NGOs:

Taiwan International Alliance, Canada Tibet Committee and Tibetan Rights Campaign.

Among documents before the Preparatory Committee in February were notes by the Secretariat transmitting listings of regional and subregional ministerial meetings held in 1995 and 1996 on preparations for Habitat II [A/CONF.165/PC.3/INF.3] and of international conferences, round tables and workshops organized and sponsored by Habitat II partners as part of the preparatory process [A/CONF.165/PC.3/INF.5].

Habitat II follow-up

In response to General Assembly resolution 50/100 [YUN 1995, p. 1107], the Secretary-General submitted a September report [A/51/384] on implementation of and follow-up to the outcome of Habitat II. The report summarized the Istanbul Declaration and the Habitat Agenda and explained that a main innovation of Habitat II was its promotion of new partnerships between the United Nations and civil society. National committees included among their members representatives of local authorities and of major groups in national preparations.

Recognizing that the process of reorganizing and revitalizing the UN system was under way, the Habitat Agenda had adopted a functional approach to follow-up activities by establishing critical functions for policy and operations and calling for their implementation by the most appropriate entity within the existing structures.

At the national level, the main follow-up activity to Habitat II would be the implementation and further development of the national plans of action that had been prepared by countries in preparation for the Conference. One hundred out of 124 national reports received by the Habitat II secretariat contained five-year national plans of action in which priorities for assistance were outlined. The design and implementation of international technical cooperation policies and programmes, such as those related to enablement, capacity-building and institutional development, would be based on those priorities.

At the regional/subregional level, the Habitat Agenda had emphasized the role of the regional commissions, which reflected the critical differences existing among regions of the world with regard to human settlements. A primary responsibility of the commissions was to provide advisory services and to strengthen regional networks by which Member States could exchange experience and information, and harmonize national economic, social, environmental and settlement policies and strategies, particularly those having a critical cross-border impact on migration, shared coastal zones, river basins and ecosystems, watersheds, and pollution and waste management.

The main intergovernmental actors at the international level for the implementation of the Habitat Agenda, in addition to Member States, were the UN General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council, and in particular the Commission on Human Settlements. With regard to the role of the UN system organizations, the report stated that Habitat II, in addition to being a partnership conference, was a system-wide undertaking involving the active participation of, and substantive and financial contribution by, the entire family of organizations, programmes and funds of the system. The substantive expertise, information and other resources of the UN system would be essential to supporting the broad array of activities required to further the implementation of the Habitat Agenda at the international, regional and national levels. An annex to the report contained a list of areas where collaborative arrangements had already been established or strengthened between UNCHS and other areas of the UN system.

The Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) would ensure that there would be an effective inter-agency response to the Habitat Agenda and that adequate consideration was given to the human settlements dimension in all relevant activities of the UN system.

Relevant technical cooperation activities to be undertaken by the UN system in support of the sectoral components of national plans of action would be harmonized at the country level, though the resident coordinator system. UNCHS, in close coordination with the resident coordinator, would provide support to the human settlements component of country strategy notes, where they existed, or other national planning instruments. More generally, it would cooperate with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and other concerned organizations in promoting an effective strengthening and integration of the system's overall support for national action.

International financial institutions had a major role to play in mobilizing resources for the implementation of the Habitat Agenda, at the national and local levels, in such areas as infrastructure development, basic services, land, housing finance, transport and communication, energy, the development of the construction and building industry and shelter. The active participation of the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the regional and sub-regional development banks and funds in Habitat II was testimony to their willingness to enhance policy dialogues and develop new initiatives.

Those organizations would seek to integrate further adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development goals in their programmes by giving higher priority to those goals in their lending programmes.

The report noted that existing institutional arrangements, comprising the Commission on Human Settlements and UNCHS, had contributed to creating heightened awareness and concern worldwide for human settlements issues. The Habitat Agenda had concluded that UNCHS should be designated as the focal point of its implementation and reaffirmed that the Centre's primary function was to provide substantive servicing to the Commission on Human Settlements and other intergovernmental bodies concerned with adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development. Ways of enhancing the Centre's effectiveness would be pursued in the context of the overall ongoing process of revitalization and strengthening of the Organization's economic and social sectors, and guided by the review of the Commission's mandate and the Centre's functions provided for in the Habitat Agenda. The possibilities of financial support from non-traditional sources of funding would be actively pursued by the Centre.

By helping to define the interest, capacities and potential roles and contributions of major groups, Habitat II had introduced new and innovative working relationships between governmental and non-governmental actors in the human settlements and shelter development field, said the report. The Habitat Agenda contained important recommendations aimed at promoting a continuation and strengthening of those relationships. Attention was drawn in particular to the recommendation that the Commission on Human Settlements should review its working methods in order to involve in its work the representatives of local authorities and the relevant actors of civil society, particularly the private sector and NGOs. The Secretary-General strongly encouraged Member States to facilitate the continuation of the policy dialogues between major groups and partners at the national and local levels that had begun with the Habitat II process.

ACC action. At its second regular session of 1996 (New York, 25-26 October) [ACC/1996/20], ACC requested its Task Force on Basic Social Services for All to pursue the integration of relevant aspects of the outcome of Habitat II in its work, and invited the Task Forces on the Enabling Environment for Economic and Social Development and on Employment and Sustainable Livelihoods, as well as the Consultative Committee on Programme and Operational Questions and the Inter-Agency Committee on Sustainable Development, to consider the implications of Habitat II for their work programmes and to make recommendations thereon.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/177.

Implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II)

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 47/180 of 22 December 1992, 49/109 of 19 December 1994 and 50/100 of 20 December 1995 on the convening of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II),

Recognizing the important role of cities and urban areas in economic, political, social and cultural development, and stressing the need to address urgently and comprehensively the deteriorating conditions of shelter and human settlements in rural and urban areas,

Also recognizing the critical problems common to human settlements in the developing countries, including poverty, unemployment, social disintegration, inadequate shelter and lack of proper maintenance of urban and rural infrastructure and services,

Cognizant of the importance of maintaining the momentum already generated at the national, regional and international levels for the implementation of measures designed to alleviate the deteriorating living conditions of increasing populations in both urban and rural settlements,

Recognizing the interdependence of rural and urban development,

Having considered the report of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) and the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of and follow-up to the outcome of the Conference, including the role played by the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements, Expressing its profound gratitude to the Government and people of Turkey for their support and for the facilities, staff and services placed at the disposal of the Conference and the hospitality extended to the participants,

Expressing its appreciation to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the Secretary-General of the Conference and the staff of the Secretariat for the effective preparations and services provided for the Conference,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II);

2. Endorses the Istanbul Declaration on Human Settlements and the Habitat Agenda adopted by the Conference on 14 June 1996;

3. Acknowledges with appreciation that the Conference provided a major opportunity to build upon the actions and commitments of previous United Nations conferences and summits;

4. Recognizes with satisfaction the active involvement in the Conference of all States and other relevant actors and the innovative arrangements introduced at the Conference to forge partnerships among various actors;

5. Reaffirms the commitment to the full and progressive realization of the right to adequate housing, as provided for in international instruments, and in that context recognizes an obligation by Governments to enable people to obtain shelter and to protect and improve dwellings and neighbourhoods;

6. Recognizes that Governments have the primary responsibility for the implementation of the Habitat Agenda, and further recognizes that the international community should support Governments in their efforts, by promoting international cooperation for, inter alia, the establishment of an open, equitable, cooperative and mutually beneficial international economic environment;

7. Calls upon all Governments, organizations of the United Nations system and other actors concerned with human settlements and urban management issues, such as local authorities, relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, parliamentarians, the private sector, trade unions, academicians and other community groups, to implement fully and effectively the Habitat Agenda, to give both the Habitat Agenda and the Istanbul Declaration the widest possible dissemination and, in that context, to draw attention to the best practices initiative;

8. Invites all Governments to further encourage and support all relevant actors of civil society, including the private sector, in the implementation of and follow-up to the Habitat Agenda by establishing effective partnerships and by creating an appropriate framework, in accordance with their respective national conditions, to further facilitate and expedite such actors in addressing human settlements issues, particularly servicing, finance mobilization, the provision of adequate shelter and related areas, and in that process to emphasize the need to integrate the gender perspective;

9. Reaffirms that, in formulating human settlements policies and strategies, all countries should recognize the interdependence of rural and urban areas and address the needs of both in a balanced manner;

10. Calls upon all Governments to establish or strengthen, as appropriate, participatory mechanisms for the implementation, assessment and review of and follow-up to the Habitat Agenda and national plans of action;

11. Emphasizes the need for all countries and for the international community to promote at all levels an integrated and multidimensional approach to the implementation of and follow-up to the Habitat Agenda;

12. Reaffirms that all States should exert concerted efforts to achieve the implementation of the Habitat Agenda through bilateral, subregional, regional and international cooperation, as well as through the United Nations system, including the Bretton Woods institutions, and that States may also convene bilateral, subregional and regional meetings and take other appropriate initiatives to contribute to the review and assessment of the progress made in the implementation of the Habitat Agenda;

13. Also reaffirms that the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and relevant resolutions, including Assembly resolutions 48/162 of 20 December 1993 and 50/227 of 24 May 1996, together with the Commission on Human Settlements, shall constitute a three-tiered intergovernmental mechanism to oversee the coordination of activities for the implementation of the Habitat Agenda;

14. Recommends that, at its special session to be convened from 23 to 27 June 1997 for the purpose of an overall review and appraisal of Agenda 21, the Assembly give due attention to the issue of human settlements in the context of sustainable development;

15. Reaffirms that the General Assembly should consider holding a special session in the year 2001 for an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), including the identification of obstacles, considering further actions and initiatives, and that a decision on this matter should be taken at its fifty-second session;

16. Also reaffirms that the Economic and Social Council may convene meetings of high-level representatives to promote international dialogue on the critical issues pertaining to adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development, as well as on policies for addressing them through international cooperation, and in this context the Council may consider dedicating one high-level segment before the year 2001 to human settlements and the implementation of the Habitat Agenda, with the active involvement and participation of, inter alia, the specialized agencies, including the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund;

17. Emphasizes that the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, in accordance with their respective mandates, should review and strengthen the mandate of the Commission on Human Settlements, taking into account the Habitat Agenda, as well as the need for synergy with related commissions and conference follow-ups and for a system-wide approach to its implementation;

18. Requests the Commission on Human Settlements at its forthcoming session, in 1997, to review its programme of work in order to ensure an effective implementation of and follow-up to the outcome of the Conference, in a manner consistent with the functions and contributions of other relevant organs of the United Nations system, and make recommendations thereon to the Economic and Social Council within the framework of the review of the activities of its subsidiary bodies;

19. Invites the Secretary-General to undertake, in the light of the review of the mandate of the Commission on Human Settlements, a comprehensive and in-depth assessment of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements with a view to its revitalization, to present terms of reference and a preliminary report on this assessment for the consideration of the Commission at its sixteenth session and to make a final report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session;

20. Requests the Secretary-General, in accordance with paragraph 229 of the Habitat Agenda and in consultation with the Commission on Human Settlements, to ensure more effective functioning of the Centre by, inter alia, providing sufficient human and financial resources within the regular budget of the United Nations;

21. Requests the Commission on Human Settlements to review, at its sixteenth session, its working methods in order to involve in its work the representatives of local authorities or international associations of local authorities, as appropriate, and the relevant actors of civil society, particularly the private sector and non-governmental organizations, in the field of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development, taking into account the rules of procedure of the Commission on Human Settlements and the relevant provisions of Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/31 of 25 July 1996;

22. Decides that the Commission on Human Settlements, as a standing committee of the Economic and Social Council, should have a central role in monitoring, within the United Nations system, the implementation of the Habitat Agenda and advising the Council thereon;

23. Recommends that the Economic and Social Council, in the context of the overall review process of its subsidiary bodies, and within the context of the follow-up to resolution 50/227, should review the periodicity of the meetings of the Commission on Human Settlements, taking into account the need for full and effective implementation of the Habitat Agenda;

24. Reaffirms that the Commission on Human Settlements, in developing its work programme, should examine the Habitat Agenda and consider how to integrate into its programme of work the follow-up to the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), and should consider how it could further develop its catalytic role in promoting adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development;

25. Also reaffirms that the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements shall be designated as a focal point for the implementation of the Habitat Agenda;

26. Requests the Secretary-General to include the implementation of the Habitat Agenda in the mandates of the existing inter-agency task forces of the Administrative Committee on Coordination to facilitate an integrated and coordinated implementation of the Habitat Agenda;

27. Acknowledges the importance of the regional and subregional activities undertaken during the preparations for the Conference, including the regional strategies, plans and declarations adopted as part of the preparatory process, and invites the regional commissions, other regional and subregional organizations and the regional development banks to examine the results of the Conference within their respective mandates, with a view to identifying the actions to be taken at the regional and subregional levels for the implementation of the Habitat Agenda;

28. Emphasizes that the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council should, where appropriate, promote subregional and regional cooperation in the implementation of the Habitat Agenda, that the regional commissions, within their mandates and in cooperation with regional intergovernmental organizations and banks, could consider convening high-level meetings to review progress made in implementing the outcome of Habitat II, exchange views on their respective experiences, particularly on best practices, and adopt appropriate measures, that such meetings could involve, as appropriate, the participation of the principal financial and technical institutions, and that the regional commissions should report to the Council on the outcome of such meetings;

29. Requests all the relevant United Nations organizations and specialized agencies to identify the specific actions that they will undertake, within their mandates, towards the implementation of the Habitat Agenda, and in that context invites them to inform the Administrative Committee on Coordination of their actions and to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session, through the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 1997, on their specific plans and activities;

30. Invites the Bretton Woods institutions to be actively involved in the implementation of and follow-up to the outcome of the Conference, and to enhance their cooperation with the United Nations system for that purpose;

31. Reaffirms that the demand for shelter and infrastructural services in human settlements is continuously increasing and that communities and countries, especially developing countries, have difficulty in mobilizing adequate financial resources to meet the rapidly rising costs of shelter, services and physical infrastructure, and reaffirms further that new and additional financial resources from various sources are necessary to achieve the goals of adequate shelter for all and sustainable human settlements development in an urbanizing world and that existing resources available to developing countries—public, private, multilateral, bilateral, domestic and external—need to be enhanced through appropriate and flexible mechanisms and economic instruments to support adequate shelter and sustainable human settlements development;

32. Stresses that the full and effective implementation of the Habitat Agenda, in particular in all developing countries, especially those in Africa and the least developed countries, will require the mobilization of additional financial resources from various sources at the national and international levels and more effective development cooperation in order to promote assistance for shelter and human settlements activities;

33. Invites all Governments and the international community to consider the role of the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation in the follow-up to the Habitat Agenda and to consider the scope for providing further support for the Foundation in its activities, taking into account the need to continue to improve its effectiveness;

34. Requests the programmes and funds of the United Nations system and the regional commissions, consistent with their respective mandates, to support fully the effective implementation of the Habitat Agenda, particularly at the field level, as appropriate;

35. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session, through the Economic and Social Council, on the implementation of the present resolution;

36. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session a sub-item entitled "Implementation of the outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II)".

General Assembly resolution 51/177

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/604/Add.5) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Costa Rica (for Group of 77 and China), Colombia (for Non-Aligned Movement) and Turkey (A/C.2/51/L.15/Rev.1), orally amended by United States; agenda item 96 (e).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 17, 18, 20-27, 30, 37; plenary 86.

UN Centre for Human Settlements

Activities

During 1996, UNCHS, in accordance with its work programme for 1996-1997, focused its operational activities on the following priorities: promoting housing for all; improving urban governance; reducing urban poverty; improving the living environment; and managing disaster mitigation and post-conflict rehabilitation. As of the third quarter of the year, the Centre had 236 technical programmes and projects under execution in 86 countries, of which 74 were in the least developed countries. The Centre's technical cooperation activities had grown over the last decade, from 199 projects with budgets totalling $17.2 million in 1986, to the 1996 programme level of 236 projects with budgets totalling over $39 million. Some 43 per cent of the financing for the 1996 projects came from UNDP's various sources of funds; 45 per cent came from government and third-party cost-sharing and funds-in-trust with UNDP; 10 per cent from funds-in-trust with UNCHS; and 2 per cent from the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation (mainly for preparatory assistance to help mobilize other sources of financing).

In the area of shelter and social services, UNCHS fostered partnerships with Governments, local authorities, NGOs, community-based organizations and the private sector to promote actions ranging from global policy dialogue to community action. It also worked with policy makers and leaders to encourage decentralization and citizen participation in settlements management and assisted Governments through its shelter and social services programmes to operationalize national strategies for poverty reduction. Since 1994, the Community Development Programme, which received financial support from Denmark and the Netherlands, as well as from UNCHS and UNDP, had assisted over 160 urban and rural community groups in formulating local action plans that focused on job creation, construction and environmental awareness and management. More than 50 local authorities had adopted enabling policies and strategies to facilitate implementation of those plans. As part of its continuing efforts to promote the equal participation of women in all aspects of human settlements management and development, the Women in Human-Settlements Development Programme established a networking strategy for increasing the role of women in peace-building and human settlements management. The strategy was being tested in Colombia and Rwanda. The Programme, which received support from Denmark, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden, had also developed methodologies and guidelines for base-line surveys to measure women's participation in human settlements at the local level.

With regard to urban management, the post-Habitat II strategy would concentrate on promoting better institutional management at the local level. UNCHS supported central and local government efforts in decentralization and fostering civic responsibility to improve the urban environment, complementing those policy-support activities with the provision of training opportunities for decision makers. In 1995 and 1996, the joint UNCHS/World Bank/UNDP Urban Management Programme (UMP) supported more than 100 city consultations and 80 seminars and workshops at the regional level. The consultations were aimed at improving urban policies and management practices in the fields of urban infrastructure, land management, the urban environment and municipal finance. UMP, supported by UNDP and Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom, undertook more than 70 studies in response to specific demands from cities and disseminated 20 policy and research reports on urban management themes. Phase III of UMP was launched in 1996. That phase would further decentralize UMP operations by effectively anchoring it to regional institutions whose vocation was urban management training and capacity-building. In collaboration with Denmark, Italy and the Netherlands, the Ford Foundation and the Fondation pour le Progrès de l'Homme, UNCHS defined a globally recognized policy framework for establishing city-level partnerships to reduce urban poverty. That milestone resulted from the Recife International Meeting on Urban Poverty (Recife, Brazil, 17-21 March), which was held in preparation for Habitat II. UNCHS was also implementing a poverty-reduction programme for Africa in partnership with the Ford Foundation. The programme focused on the substantive themes of improving access to basic services by the poor, improving opportunities for productive employment and supporting improved local governance. In 1995 and 1996, UNCHS trained over 500 local leaders, including local government officials and community representatives from all regions of the world, through its Training and Capacity-building Programme. The training-of-trainers component further enhanced the impact of human resources development activities at the national and local levels. In collaboration with a global network of national and local training institutions, the Programme co-produced 13 training and management development manuals in a number of languages. The Centre's activities in land management combined the efforts of a number of its operational programmes with major private-sector partners. Within UMP alone, 38 different activities were undertaken on land-management issues in 24 countries during the period 1992-1996. A further 14 activities were undertaken jointly with the World Bank.

As to environment and infrastructure, the Centre's Sustainable Cities Programme (SCP) was the capacity-building facility for urban environmental planning and management. In a joint venture with the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), SCP combined the technical and financial resources from some 30 international support organizations for conducting city demonstrations throughout Africa, Asia, Europe and Latin America. During 1995 and 1996, those activities resulted in significantly improved local environmental management in the participating cities and in more than $50 million in new investments and programmes. SCP was also helping, in collaboration with UNDP and the World Bank, to shape regional agendas for the urban environment and, at the global level, it was developing management tools based on practical experience in participating cities. In order to implement the infrastructure-related goals of Agenda 21, adopted by UNCED in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 672], and of the Habitat Agenda, the Centre's Settlement Infrastructure and Environment Programme had mobilized capital investment and human and technical resources in 15 countries in order to create among policy makers awareness of the true social and economic costs of poor living environments. The Programme combined demonstration projects in community-based environmental management, policy dialogue and consultations, and training, and had developed management tools and technical guidelines for combining the objectives of job creation, redevelopment of water supply and sanitation, waste reduction and recycling by low-income communities.

The Centre was actively engaged in reconstruction and rehabilitation following natural and other disasters. It collaborated with the United Nations Volunteers, UNDP and UNEP in different programmes to assist countries in capacity-building for disaster prevention, preparedness, mitigation and post-disaster rehabilitation. Other ongoing activities included the preparation of training manuals and organization of national workshops on disaster management. Activities of the UNEP/UNCHS Task Force on the Continuum from Relief to Development focused on the preparation and dissemination of the Strategic Action Plan for the Great Lakes Region of Africa, which concentrated on the efforts of countries and external agencies to help bring about stability, reconstruction and sustained economic development in Burundi, Rwanda, Uganda, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zaire.

Restructuring UNCHS

In order to execute the key functions as outlined in the Habitat Agenda, the organizational structure and working methods of UNCHS were being refocused to converge on new strategic tasks and responsibilities. In addition to establishing a clear relation between responsibilities and organizational units, the reorganization further aimed at achieving efficiency gains in programme implementation; operational effectiveness; concentration of limited resources around strategic tasks and functions derived directly from the Habitat Agenda; facilitating partnerships; and greater outreach capacity and visibility.

The Centre's medium-term plan for 1998-2001 [A/51/6/Rev.1] had the implementation of the Habitat Agenda as its primary goal and was organized around four substantive core areas: shelter and social services; urban management; environment and infrastructure; and assessment, information and monitoring. New working methods were also put in place as derived from the Habitat Agenda: partnership and partnership development; a concerted resource-mobilization strategy; networking as a tool and method for collaboration with partners; joint initiatives and programming with local authorities, NGOs, the private sector and the UN system; a continuous policy dialogue with Governments and partners on the Agenda's implementation; new focus on global analysis and policy evaluation; greater emphasis on awareness-building, information collection and diffusion; operational support to national and local plans of action; and increased regional visibility and effectiveness through decentralization.

Chapter IX

Social policy, crime prevention and human resource development

During 1996, the United Nations continued to promote activities aimed at social, cultural and human resource development. In addition, it implemented its crime prevention and criminal justice programme.

In May, the Commission for Social Development held a special session to consider its future role and strategies and actions for the eradication of poverty. In July, the Economic and Social Council decided that the Commission should have primary responsibility for the follow-up to the 1995 World Summit for Social Development and the review of the implementation of the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit. The core issues addressed in those documents, adopted at the World Summit, were the enhancement of social integration, poverty alleviation and expansion of productive employment.

The General Assembly in December decided that the Commission should undertake preparations for the Assembly's special session in the year 2000 for an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the outcome of the Summit. In other action relating to social development, the Assembly adopted a resolution concerning the role of cooperatives.

The Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, the principal policy-making body of the UN in crime prevention and criminal justice, at its fifth session in May, adopted resolutions dealing with the Tenth UN Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, to be held in 2000, technical cooperation and interregional advisory services in crime prevention and criminal justice, and strategic management of the UN crime prevention and criminal justice programme. The Commission also took action on the role of criminal law in the protection of the environment, measures to prevent alien smuggling and measures to prevent illicit international trafficking in children.

UN efforts to combat organized transnational crime continued, with the General Assembly adopting the United Nations Declaration on Crime and Public Security, based on a draft forwarded by the Commission. The Declaration set forth Member States' intention to protect the security and well-being of their citizens by taking measures and pledging mutual cooperation to combat serious transnational crime, including organized crime, illicit drug and arms trafficking, smuggling of other illicit articles, organized trafficking in persons, terrorist crimes and laundering of proceeds from serious crime. The Assembly also requested the Commission to consider the elaboration of an international convention against organized transnational crime. Regarding corruption, the Assembly adopted an International Code of Conduct for Public Officials and the United Nations Declaration against Corruption and Bribery in International Commercial Transactions.

Concerning the World Decade for Cultural Development (1988-1997), the Economic and Social Council in February postponed until 1997 consideration of the biennial progress report of the Secretary-General and the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization on the implementation of the Decade's goals and objectives.

The Secretary-General in 1996 inaugurated the United Nations Staff College project; its curriculum, which was to be developed in coordination with organizations of the UN system, would aim to enhance substantive knowledge and technical skills and convey a system-wide vision of goals, strategies and opportunities for coordinated action.

Social aspects of development

Follow-up to 1995

World Summit for Social Development

In 1996, action was taken at the national and international levels to follow up the 1995 World Summit for Social Development (Copenhagen, Denmark) [YUN 1995, p. 1113]. The Summit adopted the Copenhagen Declaration and the Programme of Action, which were endorsed by the General Assembly later that year [YUN 1995, p. 1122]. The Copenhagen Declaration comprised an overview of the current social situation, a section on principles and goals, and 10 commitments for action at the national and international levels. The commitments focused on social development; poverty eradication; full employment; social integration; human dignity and equality and equity between men and women; education and physical and mental health; economic, social and human resource development of Africa and the least developed countries; the inclusion of social development goals in structural adjustment programmes; adequate resources for social development; and international, regional and sub-regional cooperation for social development. The Programme of Action outlined policies, actions and measures to implement the principles and fulfil the commitments enunciated in the Declaration.

As called upon by the Assembly, relevant organs, organizations and bodies of the UN system were involved in the follow-up, adjusting their activities, programmes and medium-term strategies, as appropriate.

Report of Secretary-General. In a September report [A/51/348], the Secretary-General discussed the implementation of the outcome of the Summit. He described action taken by Governments, the United Nations and civil society, and the mobilization of financial resources to implement the Declaration and Programme of Action.

In response to his suggestion to designate national focal points and to his request for information on action taken to observe the 1996 International Year for the Eradication of Poverty and the activities planned for the first UN Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006) (see PART THREE, Chapter I), the Secretary-General received replies from over 100 Governments. The information supplied revealed that nearly 100 focal points had been designated, most of them in national ministries. For many countries, the Summit results provided the basis for review and reformulation of existing social policies and laws, based on an integrated approach to social development. National strategies and programmes for social development had been formulated in many countries to address the core issues considered by the Summit. Some countries had established national committees or special funds to finance projects for social development.

Regional meetings and seminars were held for similar purposes. At the invitation of the Netherlands and Norway, a number of interested countries and multilateral organizations met (Oslo, 23-25 April) [A/51/140] to review the implementation of the 20/20 initiative [YUN 1995, p. 1117], contained in the Programme of Action, which aimed at increasing significantly and/or utilizing more efficiently the resources allocated to social development in order to achieve the Summit's goals. The initiative was based on the Summit's objective of agreement on a mutual commitment between interested developed and developing country partners to allocate, on average, 20 per cent of official development assistance and 20 per cent of the national budget, respectively, to basic social programmes.

Leaders of the Group of Seven industrialized countries, in a final communique issued after a meeting in Lyon, France, from 27 to 29 June [A/51/208-S/1996/543], addressed issues relevant to the Copenhagen Summit, including enhancing the approach to employment problems, implementing a new global partnership for development, providing multilateral support for development, and successful integration into the global economy of countries with economies in transition.

As to UN activities, the Secretary-General presented information on the Commission for Social Development (see below), the Economic and Social Council, other functional commissions of the Council, regional commissions and the Secretariat, as well as activities of UN funds, programmes and specialized agencies.

Regarding civil society and other actors, the Secretary-General stated that non-governmental organizations (NGOs) were actively involved in increasing public awareness of the Summit. The Inter-Parliamentary Council of the Inter-Parliamentary Union (IPU), at a meeting in Beijing on 21 September [A/51/677] at which 118 countries were represented, endorsed the report of a tripartite meeting of parliamentary, governmental and intergovernmental representatives (New York, 5-6 September). The meeting was organized by IPU in cooperation with the UN Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) to establish a set of priority actions and steps to be taken by national parliaments for the effective implementation of the Declaration and Programme of Action.

In accordance with Assembly resolution 50/161 [YUN 1995, p. 1122], the Secretary-General renamed the Trust Fund for the World Summit for Social Development as the Trust Fund for the Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development, with the aim of supporting programmes, seminars and activities to promote social development in implementation of the Declaration and Programme of Action. He also revised the Fund's terms of reference.

Future role of Commission for Social Development

In accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/60 [YUN 1995, p. 1120], endorsed by the General Assembly [YUN 1995, p. 1122], the Commission for Social Development held a special session (New York, 21-31 May 1996) [E/1996/29] to consider two main items: review of the functioning of the Commission, and strategies and actions for the eradication of poverty (see also PART THREE, Chapter I). The Commission, in considering its future role, reviewed its mandate, its terms of reference, the composition of its membership, the scope of its work and the frequency of its sessions, and elaborated a multi-year programme of work. The Commission recommended, for adoption by the Council, a draft resolution on the follow-up to the Summit and the future role of the Commission (see below). It also recommended two draft decisions, one dealing with the establishment of a support group to assist the Commission to prepare for the International Year of Older Persons in 1999 (see PART THREE, Chapter XI), and the second recommending that the Council take note of the Commission's report on its special session and endorse the recommendations contained therein, and approve the provisional agenda and documentation for its 1997 session, which the Council did by decision 1996/243 of 22 July.

The Commission had before it two reports of the Secretary-General issued in May. The first [E/CN.5/1996/2] reviewed past and current work of the Commission, recalled intergovernmental decisions adopted since the Summit, and put forward points for discussion by the Commission on its future work. In the second report [E/CN.5/1996/3], the Secretary-General discussed strategies and actions for the eradication of poverty (see PART THREE, Chapter I).

The Commission held three panel meetings with invited experts, as well as a dialogue with the chairmen of the inter-agency task forces of the Administrative Committee on Coordination to follow up recent major international conferences, on issues related to strategies and actions for the eradication of poverty. By one of two decisions, the Commission decided to include the Chairman's summary of the panel discussions and the dialogue with the chairmen in its report on the special session. By the other decision, the Commission took note of a note by the Secretary-General [E/CN.5/1996/4 & Corr.1], in which he summarized his proposals for the medium-term plan for the period 1998-2001 on the review of the functioning of the Commission. He stated that the sub-programme on social development, which was implemented by the Division for Social Policy and Development, would seek to strengthen international cooperation for social development, with particular attention to the three core issues of poverty eradication, employment generation and social integration.

Regarding its membership, the Commission recommended that it be increased from 32 to 46, with 12 seats for African States, 10 for Asian States, 9 for Latin American and Caribbean States, 5 for Eastern European States, and 10 for Western European and other States. It also recommended that it should meet annually in New York, beginning in 1997, for a period of eight working days. The Commission further recommended that the Council ensure participation of experts to contribute to its work through panel discussions at future sessions.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/7.

Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development and the future role of the Commission for Social Development

The Economic and Social Council,

Welcoming the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development,

Bearing in mind Economic and Social Council resolutions 10(II) of 21 June 1946 and 830 J (XXXII) of 2 August 1961, by which the Council established the Social Commission and defined its terms of reference, and 1139(XLI) of 29 July 1966, by which the Council renamed the Commission the Commission for Social Development in order to clarify its role as a preparatory and advisory body of the Council in the whole range of social development policy,

Taking into account General Assembly resolution 50/161 of 22 December 1995 and Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/60 of 28 July 1995 concerning the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development, agreed conclusions 1995/1, approved by the Council on 28 July 1995, and Assembly resolution 50/227 of 24 May 1996 on the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields,

I

Framework for the functioning of the Commission for Social Development

Recalling that the General Assembly, in its resolution 50/161, decided that the Assembly, through its role in policy formulation, and the Economic and Social Council, through its role in overall guidance and coordination, in accordance with their respective roles under the Charter of the United Nations and Assembly resolution 48/162 of 20 December 1993, and a revitalized Commission for Social Development should constitute a three-tiered intergovernmental process in the follow-up to the implementation of the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development,

Convinced that the follow-up to the Summit will be undertaken on the basis of an integrated approach to social development and within the framework of a co-ordinated follow-up to and implementation of the results of the major international conferences in the economic, social and related fields,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General, containing a review of the functioning of the Commission for Social Development, including its future role in the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development;

2. Decides that the Commission, as a functional commission of the Economic and Social Council, shall have the primary responsibility for the follow-up to the Summit and review of the implementation of the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development;

3. Calls upon all relevant organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to be involved in the follow-up to the Summit, and invites the specialized agencies and related organizations of the United Nations system to strengthen and adjust their activities, programmes and medium-term strategies, as appropriate, to take into account the follow-up to the Summit;

4. Invites the United Nations Development Programme, the International Labour Organization and the Bretton Woods institutions to be actively involved in the follow-up to the Summit, in accordance with the relevant provisions of General Assembly resolution 50/161, and invites the World Trade Organization to consider how it might contribute to the implementation of the Programme of Action;

5. Decides that the task forces established by the Administrative Committee on Coordination for the follow-up to the Summit and other related United Nations conferences should inform the Commission and the Economic and Social Council of the progress made in their work for the purpose of system-wide coordination;

6. Stresses the importance of ensuring the participation of high-level representatives from the field of social development in the work of the Commission;

7. Reiterates the invitation extended by the General Assembly to the Secretary-General, inter alia, within the framework of the Administrative Committee on Coordination, to make appropriate arrangements, which may include joint meetings, for consultations with the heads of the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, the International Labour Organization, United Nations funds and programmes and other relevant organizations for the purpose of enhancing the cooperation of their respective organizations in the implementation of the Copenhagen Declaration and the Programme of Action of the Summit;

8. Reaffirms the need for ensuring an effective partnership and cooperation between Governments and the relevant actors of civil society, the social partners and the major groups as defined in Agenda 21, including non-governmental organizations and the private sector, in the implementation of and follow-up to the Copenhagen Declaration and the Programme of Action, and for ensuring their involvement in the planning, elaboration, implementation and evaluation of social policies at the national level;

9. Decides, in view of the traditional importance of non-governmental organizations in the promotion of social development, that such organizations should be encouraged to participate in the work of the Commission and in the monitoring and implementation process related to the Summit to the maximum extent possible, and requests the Secretary-General to make appropriate arrangements to ensure the full utilization of existing channels of communication with non-governmental organizations in order to facilitate broad-based participation and dissemination of information;

10. Also decides, in recognition of the valuable contribution of non-governmental organizations to the Summit, the Council and its Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations, to review the applications of such non-governmental organizations under Council resolution 1296(XLIV) of 23 May 1968 as expeditiously as possible, and further decides that prior to the thirty-fifth session of the Commission for Social Development, the Council will decide on the participation of those non-governmental organizations accredited to the Summit that have applied for consultative status, in the Summit follow-up and in the work of the Commission for Social Development, without prejudice to the work of the Open-ended Working Group on the Review of Arrangements for Consultation with Non-Governmental Organizations;

11. Requests the Secretary-General urgently to draw the attention of non-governmental organizations accredited to the Summit to the provisions of the present resolution and to the process established under resolution 1296(XLIV);

II

Terms of reference

12. Reaffirms the existing mandate of the Commission for Social Development as set out in its resolutions 10(II), 830 J (XXXII) and 1139(XLI);

13. Decides that the Commission, in fulfilling its mandate, shall assist the Economic and Social Council in monitoring, reviewing and appraising the progress achieved and problems encountered in the implementation of the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development and shall advise the Council thereon, and also decides that, to that end, the Commission should:

(a) Improve international understanding on social development through, inter alia, the exchange of information and experience;

(b) Integrate, within the framework of the follow-up to the Summit, consideration of issues relating to the situation of social groups, including a review of relevant United Nations programmes of action related to such groups, and consideration of other sectoral issues;

(c) Identify emerging issues affecting social development that require urgent consideration and make substantive recommendations thereon;

(d) Make recommendations regarding social development to the Economic and Social Council;

(e) Elaborate practical measures aimed at furthering recommendations of the Summit;

(f) Identify issues requiring improved system-wide coordination, taking into account substantive inputs from different organizations of the United Nations system, as well as the contributions of other functional commissions concerned, in order to assist the Council in its coordination functions;

(g) Maintain and enhance public awareness and support for the implementation of the Copenhagen Declaration and the Programme of Action of the Summit;

III

Structure of the agenda and work programme

14. Decides that the substantive items of the agenda of the Commission for Social Development for its future sessions will consist of the following:

Substantive item: Follow-Up to the World Summit for Social Development

(a) Consideration of subjects identified in the multi-year programme of work, including the situation of social groups;

(b) Review of relevant United Nations plans and programmes of action pertaining to the situation of social groups, as necessary;

(c) Emerging issues, trends and new approaches to issues affecting social development, as necessary;

15. Decides on the following multi-year programme of work for the consideration of priority subjects, bearing in mind that the core issues of the Summit are interrelated and interdependent and that issues relating to the enabling environment for social development (commitment 1 of the Copenhagen Declaration; chapter I of the Programme of Action), the special situation of Africa and the least developed countries (commitment 7 of the Copenhagen Declaration), enhancement of social development goals in structural adjustment programmes (commitment 8 of the Copenhagen Declaration), the mobilization of domestic and international resources for social development (commitment 9 of the Copenhagen Declaration; chapter V of the Programme of Action) and the framework for international, regional and subregional cooperation for social development (commitment 10 of the Copenhagen Declaration) shall be considered every year, and bearing in mind also that the Commission should apply a gender perspective when discussing the different topics under the multi-year programme of work:

1997: Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development

Theme: "Productive employment and sustainable livelihoods". Under this theme, the following specific topics will be considered:

(a) The centrality of employment in policy formulation, including a broader recognition of work and employment;

(b) Improving access to productive resources and infrastructure;

(c) Enhanced quality of work and employment;

1998: Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development

Theme: "Promoting social integration and participation of all people, including disadvantaged and vulnerable groups and persons". Under this theme, the following specific topics will be considered:

(a) Promoting social integration through responsive government, full participation in society, non-discrimination, tolerance, equality and social justice;

(b) Enhancing social protection, reducing vulnerability and enhancing employment opportunities for groups with specific needs;

(c) Violence, crime and the problem of illicit drugs and substance abuse as factors of social disintegration;

1999: Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development

(a) Theme 1: "Social services for all";

(b) Theme 2: "Initiation of the overall review of the implementation of the outcome of the Summit";

2000: Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development

Theme: "Contribution of the Commission to the overall review of the implementation of the outcome of the Summit";

IV

Membership, frequency and duration of sessions

16. Decides that the Commission for Social Development shall be composed of forty-six members elected from among the States Members of the United Nations or members of the specialized agencies according to the following pattern:

(a) Twelve seats for African States;

(b) Ten seats for Asian States;

(c) Nine seats for Latin American and Caribbean States;

(d) Five seats for Eastern European States;

(e) Ten seats for Western European and other States;

17. Also decides that the Commission shall meet annually, beginning in 1997, for a period of eight working days in New York;

V

Documentation

18. Requests that United Nations documentation be kept concise, clear, analytical and timely, with a focus on relevant issues, in accordance with Council resolution 1987/24 of 26 May 1987 and agreed conclusions 1995/1, and that, to the greatest extent possible, use be made of integrated reporting, and also requests that reports contain recommendations for action and indicate the actors, that they be available in all official languages, in accordance with the rules of the United Nations, and that the use of other methods of reporting, such as oral reports, also be explored;

19. Also requests that the relevant reports of the meetings of inter-agency mechanisms established by the Secretary-General be transmitted for information to the Commission to ensure coordination, collaboration and coherence in the implementation of the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development;

20. Decides that requests for reports of the Secretary-General should be limited to the minimum strictly necessary and that the Secretariat should use information and data already provided by Governments to the maximum extent possible, avoiding duplication of requests to Governments for such information;

21. Also decides that the voluntary submission of national information, for example national action plans or national reports by Governments, should be encouraged;

22. Requests that, in the preparation of reports, use be made of the practice of assigning task managers under which a United Nations entity is made responsible for coordinating the response of the entire United Nations system on a given subject, including the formulation of recommendations for future action;

23. Requests the Secretary-General and United Nations bodies to take appropriate measures, in a coordinated manner, to strengthen the United Nations capacity for gathering and analysing information and developing indicators of social development;

24. Requests the Secretary-General to submit the following reports to the Commission:

(a) An annual analytical report on the thematic issues before the Commission, in accordance with the multi-year work programme, including, as far as possible, progress made in national and international implementation and including progress made by the Bretton Woods institutions, other United Nations specialized agencies and other relevant entities, based on available existing data and statistics;

(b) A report on emerging issues, trends and new approaches to issues affecting social development, including the situation of specific groups;

(c) An overall report, in the year 2000, on the implementation of the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development;

VI

Methods of work

25. Recognizes that the practice of inviting experts is expected to deal effectively with the priority subjects addressed in the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development and to contribute to the effective follow-up to the Summit, and to that end, decides that:

(a) Panels of experts shall be formed, including experts appointed by the Secretary-General, experts working within the United Nations system and experts from Governments and civil society;

(b) Experts shall be chosen from the fields of study addressed under the critical areas of concern, taking into account equitable geographical distribution and the involvement of non-governmental organizations;

(c) The selection of experts, the composition of the panels and the allocation of time for dialogue shall be decided inter-sessionally by the Bureau of the Commission, taking into consideration the proposals of the Secretariat: the Secretariat shall prepare a list of candidates for the panels, based on suggestions from States and civil society, and the Bureau shall convene meetings open to the participation of all interested States to ensure a broad base of participation;

(d) Meetings shall be allotted for dialogue within the United Nations system and civil society and among governmental delegations and sufficient time shall be devoted to intergovernmental dialogue;

26. Decides that the Bureau of the Commission shall convene open-ended informal consultations of the Commission to improve organizational and procedural aspects of the Commission's sessions, and also decides that the Bureau of the Commission shall meet on a regular basis from 1996 and may consider such issues as recommendations on agenda items and subjects to be discussed, the structure of meetings and lists of guest participants for panel discussions;

27. Calls upon the Bureau to monitor the state of preparedness of documentation for the Commission and to take the necessary measures to facilitate its timely issuance in all official languages;

VII

Secretariat

28. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure an effectively functioning Secretariat within which clear responsibility is assigned to assist in the implementation of the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development and the servicing of the intergovernmental bodies involved and to ensure close cooperation at the Secretariat level between all the United Nations entities involved in the Summit follow-up;

VIII

Regional dimension

29. Invites the regional commissions, within their mandates and in cooperation with regional intergovernmental organizations and banks, to consider convening, on a biennial basis, a meeting at a high political level to review progress made towards implementing the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development, to exchange views on the respective experiences of participating bodies and to adopt appropriate measures.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 17 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/202.

Implementation of the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 46/139 of 17 December 1991, 47/92 of 16 December 1992, 48/100 of 20 December 1993 and 50/161 of 22 December 1995,

Recalling also resolution 50/227 of 24 May 1996 on the restructuring and revitalization of the United Nations in the economic, social and related fields,

Recalling further Economic and Social Council decision 1991/230 of 30 May 1991, resolutions 1992/27 of 30 July 1992, 1995/60 of 28 July 1995, 1996/7 of 22 July 1996 and 1996/36 of 26 July 1996, and agreed conclusions 1995/1 of 28 July 1995 and 1996/1 of 26 July 1996,

1. Reaffirms the commitments adopted by heads of State and Government contained in the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development and their pledge to give the highest priority to national, regional and international policies and actions for the promotion of social progress, justice and the betterment of the human condition, based on full participation by all;

2. Recognizes the necessity to create a framework for action to place people at the centre of development and direct economies to meet human needs more effectively;

3. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the outcome of the Summit;

4. Emphasizes that economic development, social development and environmental protection are interdependent and mutually reinforcing components of sustainable development;

5. Stresses the need for renewed and massive political will at the national and international levels to invest in people and their well-being to achieve the objectives of social development;

6. Emphasizes that democracy, respect for all human rights and fundamental freedoms, transparent and accountable governance and administration in all sectors of society, as well as effective participation by civil society, are indispensable foundations for the realization of social and people-centred sustainable development;

7. Stresses that social development is clearly linked to the development of peace, freedom, stability and security, both nationally and internationally;

National action and international cooperation for social development

8. Stresses that social development and the implementation of the Programme of Action of the Summit are primarily the responsibility of Governments, while recognizing that international cooperation and assistance are essential for their full implementation;

9. Notes with satisfaction the initiatives and actions taken by Governments towards the implementation of the commitments of the Summit, including, inter alia, the launching of initiatives to eradicate poverty, the review and reformulation of existing social policies and laws based on an integrated approach to social development, the organization of seminars and conferences and the establishment of national focal points, and urges Governments that have not yet done so to establish appropriate national follow-up mechanisms;

10. Reiterates its call to Governments to define time-bound goals and targets for reducing overall poverty and eradicating absolute poverty, expanding employment and reducing unemployment, and enhancing social integration, within each national context;

11. Urges national Governments to formulate or strengthen comprehensive cross-sectoral strategies for implementing the Summit outcome and national strategies for social development;

12. Acknowledges the key role of developing country actors and institutions in creating and implementing effective programmes to maximize the positive impact of investments in social development;

13. Reiterates the call of the Summit for Governments to assess on a regular basis national progress towards implementing the outcome of the Summit, possibly in the form of periodic national reports outlining successes, problems and obstacles, and encourages

Governments to submit such information on a voluntary basis to the Commission for Social Development;

14. Expresses its solidarity with people living in poverty in all countries, and reaffirms that the satisfaction of basic human needs is an essential element of poverty eradication, those needs being closely interrelated and comprising nutrition, health, water and sanitation, education, employment, housing and participation in cultural and social life;

15. Reaffirms the need to strengthen, in a spirit of partnership, international, regional and subregional cooperation for social development and implementing the outcome of the Summit;

16. Calls on all Governments and the United Nations system, in particular the relevant funds, programmes and agencies, to promote an active and visible policy of mainstreaming a gender perspective and to use gender analysis as a tool for the integration of a gender dimension into the planning and implementation of policies, strategies and programmes on social development;

Mobilization of financial resources

17. Recognizes that the implementation of the Declaration and Programme of Action will require the mobilization of financial resources at the national and international levels, as set out in commitments 8 and 9 of the Declaration and paragraphs 87 to 93 of the Programme of Action;

18. Invites Governments to contribute to the Trust Fund for the Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development to finance programmes, seminars and activities in support of the implementation of the Declaration and Programme of Action;

19. Recognizes that the implementation of the Declaration and Programme of Action in developing countries, in particular in Africa and the least developed countries, will need additional financial resources and more effective development cooperation and assistance;

20. Stresses the need for all countries to develop economic policies to promote and mobilize domestic savings and attract external resources for productive investment, and to seek innovative sources of funding, both public and private, for social programmes, while ensuring their effective utilization, and in the budgetary process, to ensure transparency and accountability in the use of public resources, and to give priority to providing and improving basic social services;

21. Welcomes the recent initiatives of the Bretton Woods institutions, including the Highly Indebted Poor Countries Debt Initiative, and the ongoing process at the international level regarding debt relief, as appropriate, for developing countries, and calls upon the international community, including international financial institutions, to implement fully and effectively all initiatives that will contribute to a durable solution of the debt problems of developing countries, in particular African countries and the least developed countries, and thus support their efforts to achieve social development;

22. Stresses the importance of encouraging national initiatives for social development, including, inter alia, credit for people living in poverty, particularly women, along the model of the Grameen Bank in Bangladesh in connection with self-employment and income-generation to address the feminization of poverty, and notes with interest the microcredit summit to be held in Washington, D.C., in February 1997;

23. Takes note of the efforts of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund to incorporate social development into their policies and programmes and urges the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and other multilateral development institutions, to continue to study the impact of structural adjustment programmes on economic and social development and to assist adjusting countries in creating conditions for economic growth, job creation, poverty eradication and social development;

24. Reaffirms the urgent need for the international community to strive for the fulfilment of the agreed target of 0.7 per cent of the gross national product of developed countries for overall official development assistance as soon as possible, an increase in the share of funding for social development programmes commensurate with the scope and scale of activities required to achieve the objectives and goals of the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development;

25. Endorses Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/48 of 26 July 1996 on new and innovative ideas for generating funds, in which, inter alia, the Council decided that funds generated by new and innovative ideas should not substitute for official development assistance, that they should be distinct from funding the regular budget and the peacekeeping budget of the United Nations, and should be part of global partnership and interdependence, and that the role of private investment in financing development should be stressed;

26. Reaffirms the importance of agreeing on a mutual commitment between interested developed and developing country partners to allocate, on average, 20 per cent of official development assistance and 20 per cent of the national budget, respectively, to basic social programmes, and takes note with appreciation of the outcome of the meeting held at Oslo from 23 to 25 April 1996, which reaffirmed that promoting access for all to basic social services was essential for sustainable development and should be an integral part of any strategy to overcome poverty;

27. Recognizes the necessity of providing appropriate technical cooperation and other forms of assistance to the countries with economies in transition, as set out in the provisions of the Declaration and Programme of Action;

Involvement of civil society and other actors

28. Reaffirms the need for effective partnership and cooperation between Governments and the relevant actors of civil society, the social partners, the major groups as defined in Agenda 21, including non-governmental organizations and the private sector, in the implementation of and follow-up to the Declaration and Programme of Action, and for ensuring their involvement in the planning, elaboration, implementation and evaluation of social policies at the national level;

29. Encourages non-governmental organizations to participate in the work of the Commission for Social Development, in accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/31 of 25 July 1996 and decision 1996/315 of 14 November 1996, and in the implementation process related to the Summit to the maximum extent possible;

The role of the United Nations system

30. Takes note of Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/7, by which it decided that the Commission for Social Development, as a functional commission of the Council, shall have the primary responsibility for the follow-up to and review of the implementation of the Summit and decided to enlarge the membership of the Commission from thirty-two to forty-six and to annualize its meetings;

31. Takes note also of the decision of the Council on a new structure of the agenda and multi-year programme of work of the Commission for the years 1997-2000, with "Follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development" as its substantive item, incorporating also the review of relevant United Nations plans and programmes of action pertaining to the situation of social groups;

32. Takes note further of the decision of the Council on the revised method of work of the Commission, including the formation of panels of experts;

33. Invites Governments to support the work of the Commission, including through the participation of high-level representatives on social development issues and policies;

34. Reaffirms that the Council will provide overall guidance and oversee system-wide coordination in the implementation of the Summit outcome and make recommendations in this regard;

35. Welcomes Economic and Social Council agreed conclusions 1996/1 on coordination of the United Nations system activities for poverty eradication and calls for their implementation by all organizations of the United Nations system;

36. Welcomes Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/36, in which it decided to continue to ensure, on a regular basis, the harmonization and coordination of the multi-year work programmes of relevant functional commissions by promoting a clear division of labour among them and providing clear policy guidance to them;

37. Renews its call to all relevant organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to be involved in the follow-up to the Summit, and invites specialized agencies and related organizations of the United Nations system to strengthen and adjust their activities, programmes and medium-term strategies, as appropriate, to take into account the follow-up to the Summit;

38. Invites the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme to continue, as a contribution, inter alia, to the United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty, the effort launched in 1996 with the Poverty Strategies Initiative, in order to strengthen assistance in the elaboration of national plans, programmes and strategies to eradicate poverty in developing countries, particularly African countries and the least developed countries, and calls upon all countries to contribute to the Initiative;

39. Welcomes the initiative taken by the Administrative Committee on Coordination to establish inter-agency task forces on follow-up to international conferences, and emphasizes the importance of continued and enhanced cooperation and coordination by all relevant organs, organizations and programmes of the United Nations system and the specialized agencies in the implementation of the programmes of action that emerged from the Summit and other recent United Nations conferences;

40. Requests the Administrative Committee on Coordination to report to the Economic and Social Council on the outcome of the work of those task forces and on future inter-agency coordination on the implementation by the United Nations system of the outcome of the Summit;

41. Takes note of the initiatives taken by the regional commissions in the implementation of the outcome of the Summit, and urges their continued involvement and support in the promotion of the implementation of the objectives of the Summit at the regional and subregional levels;

42. Renews its invitation to the regional commissions, within their mandates and in cooperation with the regional intergovernmental organizations and banks, to convene, on a biennial basis, a meeting at a high political level to review the progress made towards implementing the outcome of the Summit, to exchange views on their respective experiences and to adopt appropriate measures, and welcomes the offer by the Government of Brazil to host such a meeting at Sao Paulo in 1997, and welcomes the invitation extended by the Government of Austria to host a regional follow-up meeting to the Summit at Vienna at the beginning of 1998;

43. Reiterates its invitation to the International Labour Organization, which because of its mandate, tripartite structure and expertise has a special role to play in the field of employment and social development, to continue to contribute to the implementation of the Programme of Action and to the consideration by the Commission for Social Development of the theme "Productive employment and sustainable livelihoods" in 1997;

44. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to ensure an effectively functioning secretariat, within which clear responsibility is assigned to assist in the implementation of the follow-up to the Summit and the servicing of the intergovernmental bodies involved, and to continue to ensure close cooperation at the secretariat level between all the United Nations entities involved in the Summit follow-up;

Special session of the General Assembly in the year 2000 for an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the outcome of the Summit

45. Recalls its resolution 50/161, in which it decided to hold a special session in the year 2000 for an overall review and appraisal of the implementation of the outcome of the Summit and to consider further actions and initiatives;

46. Decides to organize the preparatory process of the special session on the following basis:

(a) The Commission for Social Development, as the functional commission of the Economic and Social Council with the primary responsibility for follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development, and for review of the implementation of the Copenhagen Declaration and Programme of Action, will undertake work in 1999-2000 for the preparations of the special session, in accordance with its programme of work as set out in Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/7;

(b) A preparatory committee of the whole of the General Assembly is to be established at its fifty-second session; the committee will hold an organizational session in 1998; it will initiate its substantive activities in 1999 on the basis of inputs by the Commission for Social Development and the Economic and Social Council; and it will also take into account contributions by other relevant organs and specialized agencies of the United Nations system;

47. Reaffirms that the follow-up to the Summit will be undertaken on the basis of an integrated approach to social development and within the framework of a coordinated follow-up to and implementation of the results of the major international conferences in the economic, social and related fields;

48. Requests the Secretary-General to report on the implementation of the outcome of the Summit to its fifty-second session;

49. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-second session the item entitled "Implementation of the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development" and to consider the implications for a more coherent treatment of related items on its agenda.

Role of cooperatives

In August 1996 [A/51/267], the Secretary-General, pursuant to General Assembly resolution 49/155 [YUN 1994, p. 1143], reported on the status and role of cooperatives in the light of new economic and social trends. He noted that an important contribution of the cooperative movement continued to be its capacity for promoting and supporting entrepreneurial development in forms compatible with the principles and objectives of the World Summit for Social Development, which called for governmental support to cooperative enterprise as a means to create productive employment, reduce poverty and enhance social integration.

The Secretary-General discussed the benefits of cooperatives for individuals and communities. They were an effective means for economic empowerment for the disadvantaged; created conditions that favoured capital accumulation and reinvestment; and, through their aggregate economic weight and lobbying capacity, were able to break monopolies and ensure fair treatment for consumers, producers and employees. A major factor contributing to the economic success of the cooperative movement was the establishment of its own financial sector, implemented through savings and credit cooperatives (credit unions), cooperative banks and cooperative insurance enterprises. User-owned health cooperatives provided a combination of insurance, service delivery and pharmacy services, with a strong emphasis on preventive health, to some 39 million members and their dependants.

Housing cooperatives provided means whereby low-income households could afford adequate shelter in the inner cities of developed countries, and in developing countries helped informal sector households to obtain access to land and key material and equipment. Cooperative enterprise had a major role in food production through agricultural and fisheries cooperatives. As to food distribution, cooperative wholesale and retail enterprises provided affordable and appropriate food, as well as household equipment and nutrition information, to members and their families, and frequently to the general public.

According to the Secretary-General, the cooperative sector was able to make a major contribution to the achievement of the goals of the International Year (1996) and United Nations Decade (1997-2006) for the Eradication of Poverty (see PART THREE, Chapter I). The capacity of the cooperative movement for creating viable and sustainable enterprises secured productive employment and self-employment, the generation of income and the payment of adequate wages and salaries. Financial cooperatives provided the means for escaping from indebtedness and for financial management. Their provision of insurance and services for health and social care, as well as affordable and appropriate housing, and their contribution to food security were major contributions to the alleviation of poverty.

The Secretary-General noted that a significant proportion of the world's poor continued to be small-scale, resource-poor farmers and other rural entrepreneurs in developing countries. Only by means of a people-centred, participatory approach would transformation of the rural sector occur, and cooperative enterprise was one of the most efficient organizational vehicles for such transformation in developing countries.

The International Day of Cooperatives, proclaimed by the General Assembly in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 840], was observed on 6 July 1996, with the theme: "Cooperative enterprise—empowerment for people-centred sustainable development". Other activities in support of cooperatives included government transfer of housing, health and social care programmes, reviews of administrative and legal constraints, improved statistics and dissemination of information and consideration of cooperatives by international conferences.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/58.

The role of cooperatives in the light of new economic and social trends

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 47/90 of 16 December 1992 and 49/155 of 23 December 1994,

Welcoming the report of the Secretary-General on the status and role of cooperatives in the light of new economic and social trends,

Recognizing that cooperatives in their various forms are becoming a major factor of economic and social development by promoting the fullest possible participation in the development process of women and all population groups, including youth, older persons and people with disabilities, and are increasingly providing an effective and affordable mechanism for meeting people's needs for basic social services,

Recognizing also the important contribution and potential of all forms of cooperatives to the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development, held at Copenhagen from 6 to 12 March 1995, the Fourth World Conference on Women, held at Beijing from 4 to 15 September 1995, and the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), held at Istanbul, Turkey, from 3 to 14 June 1996,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General on the status and role of cooperatives in the light of new economic and social trends;

2. Urges Governments, relevant international organizations and the specialized agencies, in collaboration with national and international cooperative organizations, to give due consideration to the role and contribution of cooperatives in the implementation of and follow-up to the outcome of the World Summit for Social Development, the Fourth World Conference on Women and the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) by, inter alia:

(a) Utilizing and developing fully the potential and contribution of cooperatives for the attainment of social development goals, in particular the eradication of poverty, the generation of full and productive employment and the enhancement of social integration;

(b) Encouraging and facilitating the development of cooperatives, including taking measures aimed at enabling people living in poverty or belonging to vulnerable groups to engage on a voluntary basis in the creation and development of cooperatives;

3. Encourages Governments to keep under review the legal and administrative provisions governing the activities of cooperatives with a view to ensuring a supportive environment for cooperatives, so that they can make an appropriate contribution to the attainment of the goals of national development, including that of meeting the basic human needs of all;

4. Invites Governments, relevant international organizations, the specialized agencies and national and international cooperative organizations to continue to observe annually the International Day of Cooperatives on the first Saturday of July, as proclaimed by the General Assembly in its resolution 47/90;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, within existing resources, to continue to support the goals and objectives of the cooperative movement and to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-fourth session, through the Commission for Social Development, a report containing, inter alia, information on legislative and administrative initiatives taken by countries, bearing in mind possible measures to improve the reporting procedure;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General to ascertain, in cooperation with the Committee for the Promotion and Advancement of Cooperatives, the desirability and feasibility of elaborating United Nations guidelines aimed at creating a supportive environment for the development of cooperatives and to include his findings and recommendations in his report referred to in paragraph 5 above.

General Assembly resolution 51/58

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by the Third Committee (A/51/609) without vote, 31 October (meeting 20); 30-nation draft (A/C.3/51/L.4), orally revised; agenda item 100.

UN Research Institute for Social Development

The United Nations Research Institute for Social Development (UNRISD) continued its work in conducting research into problems and policies of social development and relationships between types of social and economic development during different phases of economic growth. In October [E/CN.5/1997/7), the Secretary-General submitted to the Commission for Social Development a report of the Board of UNRISD covering activities during 1995-1996. During the period, considerable progress was made in the implementation of the Institute's work programme. A number of major research projects were virtually completed: agricultural expansion and tropical forests; crisis, adjustment and social change; ethnic conflict and development; participation and changes in property relations in communist and post-communist societies; political violence and social movements; refugees, returnees and local society—interaction and development; the social dynamics of deforestation in developing countries; the socio-economic and political impact of production, trade and use of illicit narcotic drugs; and women, environment and population.

Substantive contributions were also made to the 1995 World Summit for Social Development [YUN 1995, p. 1113], the 1995 World Conference on Women [YUN 1995, p. 1168] and the 1996 Conference on Human Settlements (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII). More than 46 books containing findings from the continuing programme of research were published or were being printed. Twenty-one discussion papers were published and seven more were in progress. The Institute established two home pages on the Internet, which provided unprecedented opportunities for disseminating research findings.

UNRISD had become more involved in applied research, responding directly to the needs of policy makers and the donor community. So-called "action-research", involving policy dialogue and consensus-building, was an important feature of two of UNRISD's largest programmes, dealing with ways of integrating gender into development planning and rebuilding war-torn societies. Through workshops, seminars and conferences, the Institute attempted to act as an international forum for the analysis of development issues and to bring together policy makers, donors, scholars, NGOs and grass-roots activists.

Under its continuing programme of research, UNRISD continued its war-torn societies project, which aimed to respond to the need for a holistic and coordinated approach to rebuilding. Country projects were established in Eritrea, Guatemala and Mozambique and an evaluation phase was under way in Somalia. In Cambodia, three independent studies were under way on food security, psychosocial vulnerability and coping mechanisms, and the development process and the Cambodian State.

The project on integrating gender into development policy aimed at strengthening the capacity of national researchers to analyse the way in which macroeconomic policies affected gender inequalities and to feed their findings into the policy formulation process. During the reporting period, the main action-research phases of the project continued in the five participating countries (Bangladesh, Jamaica, Morocco, Uganda, Viet Nam).

The UNRISD programme on environment, sustainable development and social change covered the social and political dimensions of environmental protection programmes and projects and the social and environmental impact of national parks and protected areas in developing countries. Under the former topic, research was being conducted in Costa Rica, the Philippines and Senegal, and under the latter, research teams carried out case studies in Brazil, China, Ecuador, India, Peru and southern Africa (Mozambique, South Africa and Zimbabwe).

The overall financial situation of UNRISD remained satisfactory as both core and project funding increased in 1995 and 1996. Although part of the UN system, UNRISD financed its activities by voluntary contributions from Governments, international development agencies and foundations. In 1995-1996, 25 bilateral and multi-lateral agencies and foundations contributed to its financing. Total resources grew at a rate of 20 per cent per annum, but the funding situation for 1997 remained uncertain. The share of core funds as a proportion of total expenditure continued its downward trend since 1990, with the exception of 1995. It had fallen to 35 per cent in 1996 compared to 78 per cent in 1990.

Cultural development

World Decade for Cultural Development

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1996/206 of 9 February, taking note of a letter dated 9 August 1995 [E/1996/6] from the Director-General of UNESCO to the Secretary-General, decided to postpone to its 1997 substantive session consideration of the biennial progress report of the Secretary-General and the Director-General on the implementation of the goals and objectives of the World Decade for Cultural Development (1988-1997), proclaimed by the General Assembly in 1986 [YUN 1986, p. 624]. The Decade, for which UNESCO was the lead agency, had four main objectives—acknowledging the cultural dimension of development, affirming and enriching cultural identities, broadening participation in culture and promoting international cultural cooperation.

The Director-General, in his 9 August 1995 letter, pointed out that the Intergovernmental Committee of the World Decade, at its April 1995 session, had requested him to schedule the Committee's fifth and final regular session for April 1997 so that it would coincide with the end of the Decade. Therefore, he stated, it would be preferable for the biennial report, which was to be submitted to the Council and subsequently transmitted to the Assembly, to be considered by the Assembly in 1997 rather than in 1996, as requested by the Assembly in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 1146].

Report of World Commission on Culture and Development

The UNESCO Director-General, in a 16 April letter [E/1996/41] to the Secretary-General, remarked that the World Commission on Culture and Development, established jointly by UNESCO and the United Nations in December 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 1113], had completed its report entitled Our Creative Diversity, which was to be considered by the UN General Assembly and the UNESCO General Conference. As far as UNESCO was concerned, its Executive Board would consider the report at its next session (22 April-3 May 1996), the Director-General stated, adding a request that the Economic and Social Council, at its resumed organizational session of 1996, consider transmitting the report to the Assembly for consideration later in the year.

The Council, by decision 1996/220 of 2 May, took note of the Director-General's letter and decided to transmit Our Creative Diversity to the Assembly for consideration at its fifty-first (1996) session.

A summary version of Our Creative Diversity was transmitted by the Secretary-General to the Assembly in October [A/51/451]. The Commission's report emphasized global ethics, a commitment to pluralism, creativity and empowerment, the challenges of a media-rich world, gender and culture, cultural heritage for development, culture and the environment, cultural policies and research. The Commission proposed an international agenda aimed at: providing a permanent vehicle through which issues of culture and development would be discussed and analysed at the international level; initiating a process in which principles and procedures that were commonplace within nations could be extended to the international and global arena; and creating a forum where an international consensus on central issues related to culture and development could be achieved. The Commission suggested 10 areas for action: an annual report on world culture and development; preparation of new culturally sensitive development strategies; international mobilization of cultural heritage volunteers; an international plan for gender equality; enhancing access, diversity and competition of the international media system; media rights and self-regulation; protecting cultural rights as human rights; global ethics in global governance; a people-centred United Nations; and a global summit on culture and development.

The Director-General set up a Steering Committee chaired by the President of the Commission to guide the follow-up programme. The UNESCO secretariat team that worked on the report would serve as the secretariat of the Steering Committee.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December 1996, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/179.

Report of the World Commission on Culture and Development

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 41/187 of 8 December 1986, in which it proclaimed the period 1988-1997 the World Decade for Cultural Development,

Recalling also its resolution 46/158 of 19 December 1991, in which it requested the Secretary-General to cooperate with the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in establishing an independent World Commission on Culture and Development, and expected the World Commission to submit its final report to the General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and to the United Nations General Assembly no later than three years after it began its work.

Noting that the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization has sent the report of the Commission, entitled Our Creative Diversity, to the member States of that organization for their comments, as well as to many non-governmental and academic bodies,

1. Requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, to stimulate further international debate on culture and development;

2. Encourages the General Conference of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization at its twenty-ninth session in 1997 to discuss the report further, taking into account the views, comments and proposals submitted by member States;

3. Also encourages the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to pursue its ongoing task of promoting throughout the United Nations system a greater awareness of the crucial relationship between culture and development, taking into account the diversity of cultures;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, to compile a report on culture and development for the consideration of the General Assembly at its fifty-third session, taking into account the views, comments and proposals put forth by States and the relevant intergovernmental organizations concerning the report of the World Commission on Culture and Development.

General Assembly resolution 51/179

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/604/Add.7) without vote, 2 December (meeting 38); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.34), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica, for Group of 77 and China (A/C.2/51/L.22); agenda item 96 (g).

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 17, 18, 20-27, 34, 38; plenary 86.

Olympic Truce

The President of the General Assembly, on 11 July 1996 [A/750/997], made a solemn appeal in connection with the observance of the Olympic Truce. Recalling the Assembly's 1995 resolution [YUN1995,p.1131]calling on Member States to reaffirm the observance of the Olympic Truce during each Summer and Winter Olympic Games, the President appealed to all States to observe the Olympic Truce during the games of the XXVI Olympiad, to be held in Atlanta, Georgia, United States, from 19 July to 4 August 1996, whether or not they were parties to a confrontation. By applying the principle of Olympic Truce, or ekhecheria, the world could at least hope for some respite, however temporary, from the killing and destruction which accompanied conflict. Therefore, the President appealed to those engaged in armed conflict to uphold the principle and suspend hostilities in keeping with the observance.

The General Assembly, by decision 50/486 of 16 July, took note of the President's solemn appeal.

Crime prevention and criminal justice

Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice

The Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice held its fifth session in Vienna from 21 to 31 May 1996 [E/1996/30]. The Commission, the principal policy-making body of the United Nations in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice, recommended 2 draft resolutions for adoption by the General Assembly and 10 draft resolutions and 2 draft decisions for adoption by the Council, all of which were adopted (see below and also PART THREE, Chapter X, for action relating to the elimination of violence against women).

The Commission adopted 3 resolutions to be brought to the attention of the Council on matters that dealt with the Tenth (2000) United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders; technical cooperation and interregional advisory services in crime prevention and criminal justice; and strategic management of the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme. A decision dealt with development of UN minimum rules for the administration of criminal justice (details of the Commission's actions follow).

The Commission was serviced by the Secretariat's Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1996/245 of 23 July, took note of the Commission's report on its fifth session and approved the provisional agenda and documentation for the sixth session. On the same date, by decision 1996/244, the Council decided that the Commission, at its sixth session, in addition to plenary meetings, should be provided with full interpretation services for a total of 12 meetings for informal consultations on draft proposals and for meetings of open-ended working groups, on the understanding that no more than 2 meetings would be held concurrently, in order to ensure maximum participation of delegations.

Follow-up to the 1995 Crime Congress

In response to General Assembly resolutions 50/145 and 50/146 [YUN 1995, pp. 1143 & 1185], the Secretary-General submitted an October report [A/51/327] describing action taken by Governments to give effect to the resolutions adopted at the Ninth (1995) United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders [YUN 1995, p. 1132].

Seven Governments reported that they had taken steps to give effect to the various recommendations of the Congress. In respect of international cooperation and practical technical assistance, the Governments were making efforts to strengthen the rule of law through international cooperation and assistance, improving policy development, increasing the use of bilateral and multilateral agreements and promoting the establishment of integrated regional policies, programmes, plans and mechanisms to prevent crime and ensure justice.

Regarding organized crime, a number of specific measures had been taken dealing with action against transnational and organized crime, particularly at the regional level, by updating domestic legislation in the area of money-laundering, extradition and mutual assistance; establishing separate units to deal with organized crime; and improving legislation on environmental protection. A series of steps had been taken or were under way to upgrade the training and development of law enforcement and criminal justice personnel, increase the use of non-custodial measures and improve measures against the spread of HIV and AIDS. In addition, steps had been taken to improve strategies and programmes for the prevention and control of urban crime, juvenile delinquency and violent crime, including domestic violence; to deal with problems arising from migratory flows; to improve measures against racism, xenophobia and related intolerance; and to improve the regulation of firearms.

As to links between terrorist crime and transnational organized crime, Governments were initiating action at the national level in the areas of legislation, investigation and law enforcement, in order to ensure the prevention and suppression of terrorist crimes and transnational organized crime. The enhancement of international cooperation, in particular the exchange of technical information and sharing of experience in the field, was being actively pursued.

Concerning the 1955 Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners [YUN 1955, p. 209] and children as victims and perpetrators of crime, Governments were trying to give effect to the various requests for action. As to violence against women, efforts were being made with a view to eliminating violence against women or mitigating the effects of such violence by updating the legislation on domestic violence and trafficking in human beings; training and raising of public awareness, improvement of curricula and working with the media; and supporting institutions and self-help groups for women subjected to violence. In response to requests for action on firearms, measures had been taken to tighten the regulation of certain firearms and to improve action against illicit trafficking in firearms.

UN Programme on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice

In October [A/51/327], the Secretary-General, as requested by the General Assembly in resolution 50/146 [YUN 1995, p. 1145], reported on progress made in strengthening the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme, particularly its technical cooperation capacity.

The Secretary-General described the Programme's activities, which included follow-up to the 1994 Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime [YUN 1994, p. 1160]; crime prevention in urban areas, trafficking in minors and juvenile justice; elimination of violence against women; measures to regulate firearms; statistical and computerized applications in the management of the criminal justice system; the UN survey of crime trends and operations of criminal justice systems; the implementation of UN standards in crime prevention and criminal justice; technical cooperation activities; preparations for the Tenth (2000) United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders; and the production of publications.

Concerning strengthening the Programme's capacity, the Secretary-General pointed out that in resolution 50/214 [YUN 1995, p. 1386] the Assembly had approved upgrading the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Branch to a division, but due to cost-saving measures the new posts created had remained frozen and a number of planned activities had to be postponed. The Secretary-General pointed out that the disparity between the Assembly's call to upgrade the Programme and the resources available was noted by the Commission. In its resolution on technical cooperation [E/1996/30 (res. 5/2)], the Commission requested the Secretary-General to explore with Member States the establishment of a mechanism for resource mobilization in the area of technical assistance. In addition, the Commission decided to consider the funding of international technical assistance as a separate topic at its next session. In another resolution [E/1996/30 (res. 5/3)], the Commission decided to exercise more vigorously its mandated functions of resource mobilization, and, for that purpose, to establish an informal consultative group which would report to the Commission on activities undertaken and results achieved. An organizational meeting for the establishment of an informal consultative group on resource mobilization in crime prevention and criminal justice was held in Vienna on 5 July 1996.

The Programme was developing further the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Fund, a voluntary fund used to finance operational activities such as needs assessment missions to Cambodia and the Russian Federation; the formulation of technical cooperation projects for those two countries; organization of training activities in Austria for civilian police of the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR); the provision of advisory services and training in Burkina Faso, Burundi, Rwanda, and Gaza (for the Police of the Palestinian Authority); and printing of publications.

In his conclusions, the Secretary-General stated that the programme measures currently under way could have only a relatively small impact, since the resource base of the Programme remained one of the smallest in the UN budget.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

The General Assembly, on 12 December, adopted resolution 51/63.

Strengthening the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme, particularly its technical cooperation capacity

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 46/152 of 18 December 1991 on the creation of an effective United Nations crime prevention and criminal justice programme, in which it approved the statement of principles and programme of action annexed to that resolution,

Bearing in mind the goals of the United Nations in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice, specifically the reduction of criminality, more efficient and effective law enforcement and administration of justice, respect for human rights and promotion of the highest standards of fairness, humanity and professional conduct,

Convinced of the desirability of closer coordination and cooperation among States in combating crime, including drug-related crimes, such as terrorist crimes, illicit arms trade and money-laundering, and bearing in mind the role that could be played by both the United Nations and regional organizations in this respect,

Recognizing the urgent need to increase technical cooperation activities in order to assist countries, in particular developing countries and countries in transition, with their efforts in translating United Nations policy guidelines into practice,

Recalling its relevant resolutions, in which it requested the Secretary-General, as a matter of urgency, to provide the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme with sufficient resources for the full implementation of its mandate, in conformity with the high priority attached to the Programme,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General on the progress made in the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 50/145 and 50/146 of 21 December 1995;

2. Reaffirms the importance of the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme and the crucial role it has to play in promoting effective action to strengthen international cooperation in crime prevention and criminal justice, in responding to the needs of the international community in the face of both national and transnational criminality and in assisting Member States in achieving the goals of preventing crime within and among States and improving the response to crime;

3. Also reaffirms the priority of the Programme, in accordance with the relevant resolutions, and the need for an appropriate share of the existing United Nations resources for the Programme;

4. Welcomes the upgrading of the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Branch of the Secretariat to a division, while noting the severe impact of the budgetary cuts on its capacity to deliver the services required by Member States;

5. Reaffirms its resolution 50/214 of 23 December 1995, and requests the Secretary-General to ensure, in particular, the full implementation of section III, paragraphs 29 and 30, of that resolution;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to strengthen further the Programme by providing it with the resources necessary for the full implementation of its mandate, including follow-up action to the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime and to the Ninth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders;

7. Reaffirms the high priority attached to technical cooperation and advisory services in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice, and stresses the need to continue to improve the operational activities of the Programme, in particular in developing countries and countries in transition, in order to meet the needs of Member States, at their request, for support in crime prevention and criminal justice;

8. Calls upon States and United Nations funding agencies to make significant financial contributions for operational activities of the Programme, and encourages all States to make voluntary contributions for that purpose to the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Fund, also taking into account the activities required for the implementation of the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime;

9. Calls upon the United Nations Development Programme, the World Bank and other international, regional and national funding agencies to support technical operational activities in this field and to include such activities in their programmes, utilizing the expertise of the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme in such activities and cooperating closely on relevant technical assistance projects and advisory missions;

10. Takes note with appreciation of the contributions of the Programme to United Nations peacekeeping and special missions, as well as its contributions to the follow-up to those missions, inter alia, through advisory services, and encourages the Secretary-General, as a way of strengthening the rule of law, to recommend the inclusion of the re-establishment and reform of criminal justice systems in peacekeeping operations;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to strengthen cooperation between the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division and the United Nations International Drug Control Programme, in particular in the area of money-laundering;

12. Also requests the Secretary-General to take all necessary measures to assist the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, as the principal policy-making body in this field, in performing its activities, including cooperation and coordination with other relevant bodies, such as the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, the Commission on Human Rights and the Commission on the Status of Women;

13. Calls upon the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice to give effect to its relevant resolutions on strategic management of the Programme, in particular those concerning reporting requirements, submission of proposals and resource mobilization;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report on the implementation of the present resolution to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session.

General Assembly resolution 51/63

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/51/610) without vote, 31 October (meeting 20); 42-nation draft (A/C.3/51/L.8), orally revised; agenda item 101.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 5-10, 12, 16-18, 20; plenary 82.

Plan for strategic management

In an April report [E/CN.15/1996/22], the Secretary-General provided information on the parameters and current practice of the strategic management of the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme, identified issues that needed to be dealt with and made proposals for action by the Commission. Areas that needed improvement included qualitative analysis of programme performance, provision of information linking mandated activities and resource requirements, and the balance between providing services to the Commission and implementing other mandates. The Secretary-General put forward a series of proposals by which the Commission would request the Secretariat to make information dealing with proposed activities and programme budget implications more easily available; improve inter-sessional communication with the Commission bureau, Commission members and other interested delegations; identify clearly any action required of the Commission to facilitate the decision-making process; provide detailed lists of proposed activities required to implement existing mandates; elaborate possible means of evaluating programme impact; and strengthen coordination and cooperation with UN bodies involved in crime prevention and criminal justice.

The Secretary-General suggested further that the Commission consider ensuring greater continuity in the representation of its members at annual sessions; evaluating ways to provide leadership to the Programme between sessions; mobilizing support for the Programme through closer coordination with relevant intergovernmental bodies; mobilizing extrabudgetary resources for technical cooperation and advisory services; exercising restraint in recommending new mandates in order to enable completion of existing ones; reviewing annual reporting requirements in the light of the limited resources available; providing more practical guidance for the implementation of mandates; cooperating with the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division in determining means of evaluating the Programme's impact; exploring the feasibility of its bureau holding inter-sessional meetings with the bureau of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs; coordinating its mandates and strategic management with intergovernmental bodies dealing with human rights and international law; and considering ways in which the network of government-appointed national correspondents could promote the Programme.

In its resolution on strategic management [E/1996/30 (res. 5/3)], the Commission recognized the importance of the contribution that its bureau could make in advancing the Programme's work, particularly by strengthening its strategic management, both during its sessions and in the inter-sessional periods. It decided that the bureau should hold inter-sessional meetings with the bureau of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs in order to improve coordination of work, and to enhance its mandated functions of resource mobilization, establishing for that purpose an informal consultative group. The Commission requested the Secretary-General to elaborate proposals to measure the impact of the Programme's activities and to report thereon to the Commission in 1997.

Cooperation and coordination

In March, the Secretary-General submitted to the Commission two reports on cooperation and coordination of activities in crime prevention and criminal justice—the first on activities of the institutes comprising the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme network [E/CN.15/1996/21 & Corr.1,2] and the second on coordination of activities, including activities of the United Nations International Drug Control Programme (UNDCP) [E/CN.15/1996/20].

The first report described activities carried out in 1995 by the United Nations Interregional Crime and Justice Research Institute (UNICRI), the affiliated regional institutes and the associate institutes and centres. The information provided by most institutes on their financial situation showed that their resource base was precarious. The Secretary-General suggested that the Commission consider possible measures to match programme development with the availability of funds. UNICRI and institute activities included research and projects, technical cooperation and advisory services, organizing and providing input to conferences and meetings, and information dissemination and publication services.

In his report on cooperation between the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division and UNDCP, the Secretary-General outlined the progress in and benefits drawn from collaborating with other entities on issues of mutual interest. He described collaboration between the Division and other UN bodies, such as the Centre for Human Rights (CHR), the Department of Peacekeeping Operations, the Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General in Burundi, UNDP, and the Department for Development Support and Management Services (DDSMS). The activities of intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations were described.

The Secretary-General reported that a more systematic approach to cooperation and coordination had been implemented during the reporting period. The Division had initiated new activities and had increased its visibility in the field of technical assistance in crime prevention and criminal justice. The cost-saving measures implemented throughout the UN system had affected the momentum of activities, however. Further work needed to be done to strengthen the UN crime and justice information network and to assess worldwide needs and technical assistance activities undertaken by Governments. Further Commission action might include the organization of an ad hoc inter-agency meeting, with the objective of establishing an institutional framework for closer cooperation and coordination of activities, as well as the establishment of an electronic forum for inter-agency information sharing, to be maintained by the Division.

Technical cooperation

One of the goals of the UN Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme was to provide technical assistance, including advisory services, particularly in respect of the planning, implementation and evaluation of crime prevention and criminal justice programmes, training and the use of modern communication and information techniques. In an April report [E/CN.15/1996/8 & Corr.1], the Secretary-General described technical cooperation and advisory services initiated or carried out from May to December 1995 and recommended a series of actions to the Commission, some of which were incorporated into a resolution adopted by the Commission in May (see below). The report also discussed crime prevention and criminal justice as a distinct area in international cooperation and development, as exemplified by the role of criminal law in the protection of the environment and the crisis of law and order in new democracies. Other issues discussed were the need for assistance in prison and correctional services, the reluctance of aid agencies to fund assistance in crime prevention and criminal justice, and the changing functions of the interregional advisers in view of the trend to include the improvement of the criminal justice system in the formulations of the development process.

The Commission, in a May resolution [E/1996/30 (res. 5/2)], reaffirmed the high priority attached to technical cooperation and advisory services as a means for the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme to respond to the needs of the international community in the face of national and transnational criminality. It also reaffirmed the importance of strengthening the operational activities of the Programme, particularly in developing countries and countries with economies in transition. Commending the Programme's contribution to UN peacekeeping and special missions, the Commission requested the Secretary-General, subject to the availability of extrabudgetary resources, to develop further training material for peacekeeping police.

The Commission called on DDSMS, CHR, UNDP, the World Bank and other international, regional and national funding agencies to support technical cooperation activities in crime prevention and criminal justice, utilizing the expertise of the Programme and the coordinating role of the Commission. Regarding cooperation between the Division and UNDCP, the Secretary-General was requested to consider the establishment of a joint unit to provide technical assistance on the control of proceeds of crime, including the prevention of money-laundering. The Commission requested the Secretary-General to make increased use of the United Nations Crime and Justice Information Network as a tool for technical cooperation, particularly as related to the dissemination of crime statistics, UN standards and norms in criminal justice, and the establishment of relevant discussion forums.

The Commission recommended that the Secretary-General strengthen the interregional advisory services to support technical assistance activities, including short-term advisory services, needs assessment, feasibility studies, field projects, training and fellowships. It called upon Member States to provide both general-purpose and earmarked contributions to the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Fund. The Secretary-General was requested to explore with Member States the establishment of a mechanism for resource mobilization and coordination of activities in the area of technical assistance. He was asked to report to the Commission in 1997.

Transnational crime

UN efforts to combat organized transnational crime focused in 1996 on the implementation of the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime, adopted in 1994 by the World Ministerial Conference on Organized Crime [YUN 1994, p. 1160]. The Secretary-General, in an April report [E/CN.15/1996/2 & Add.1] to the Commission on its implementation, presented an overview of developments in organized transnational crime, described responses to such crime and made recommendations on combating it. The Secretary-General stated that transnational criminal organizations had become an international security threat, having gone beyond the issue of domestic law and order. Policy solutions needed to be comprehensive, well coordinated and imaginative. Emphasis should be given not simply to extending the formalities of law enforcement cooperation, he said, but also to building a transnational network of coordinated measures that would eventually be global. Risk management strategies of criminal organizations should be taken into account and action should be taken to reduce or overcome them. Two priority objectives would help to increase the risks and costs incurred by transnational organizations—eliminating safe havens for criminal organizations and targeting their assets.

The Secretary-General suggested that the Commission recommend a well-structured programme of activities, leading gradually to the full implementation of the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan. It might include comparative studies of the situation of organized transnational crime and the establishment and maintenance of a central repository for information on legislation, regulatory measures, organizational structures designed to prevent and control organized transnational crime, and bilateral and multilateral cooperation arrangements. The Commission might find means to strengthen the Secretariat's capacity to undertake operational activities and provide practical assistance to requesting States. It was also suggested that the Commission urge Governments to provide the required input for the development of appropriate manuals and training guides, including model legislation and compilations of best practices in the detection, investigation and adjudication of organized transnational crime.

The Regional Ministerial Workshop on the Follow-up to the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime (Buenos Aires, Argentina, 27-30 November 1995) [E/CN.15/1996/2/Add.1] examined ways to strengthen the capacity of Latin American and Caribbean countries to respond to organized transnational crime and to improve mechanisms of regional and multilateral cooperation to combat it. In a declaration adopted by consensus at the close of the meeting, it called for increased technical cooperation, strategic coordination, legislative action and other measures to combat organized transnational crime.

Money laundering

The Secretary-General, in response to Economic and Social Council resolutions 1994/13 [YUN 1994, p. 1162] and 1995/11 [YUN 1995, p. 1152], reported to the Commission in April [E/CN.15/1996/3] on international, regional and other initiatives for prevention and control of the laundering of the proceeds of crime and the control of such proceeds. The Secretary-General summarized information provided by Member States, in response to his request, and described recent international initiatives and new trends in combating money-laundering activities.

Within the Secretariat, the two entities directly concerned with combating money-laundering, namely the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division and UNDCP, had been given specific mandates to that effect. The Division and UNDCP had worked towards developing a comprehensive technical assistance project against the laundering of the proceeds of crime.

Among new trends, the report noted that organized crime groups were increasingly a factor in money-laundering schemes, and the multiple sources of their proceeds compounded the difficulty of linking the monetary transaction to a unique predicate offence like drug trafficking. An increasing number of organized criminal organizations did not directly manage the laundering or conversion of their proceeds, but relied on professional money brokers who were able to evade normal monitoring, detection and reporting devices. Sophisticated techniques were being used, such as moving funds not only through wire transfers, but also through many varieties of licit and illicit financial instruments, including letters of credit, bonds and other securities, prime bank notes and guarantees—and without a parallel increase in the capability of the world's financial system to verify the beneficiaries or authenticity of instruments. In addition, the new practice of direct access banking by computer limited the ability of the bank to monitor account activity, and non-bank financial systems were unevenly regulated in most parts of the world. There were few controls on electronic transfers and the bank or non-bank of origin was increasingly based outside major financial centres in jurisdictions that did not adequately control money-laundering and other financial crimes. Reporting regulations needed to be redesigned to include the reporting of currency in electronic form moving to other countries via the Internet. The regulation of offshore banking was a growing concern. The assurance of absolute secrecy by many jurisdictions that licensed such facilities made it possible for those facilities to be manipulated to move and conceal or generate illicit proceeds.

The Secretary-General stated that in view of the trends, the particular needs of developing countries and of countries in transition would multiply rapidly; consequently, the Commission might wish to devote attention to ways of strengthening the capacity of the Division to undertake more operational activities in that area, in response to requests of Member States. The rapidly changing situation would make reliable information and knowledge more essential than ever, as a basis for efficient decision-making and effective concerted action at all levels. The Secretary-General also suggested that the Commission consider authorizing the Division to expand its information collection in the area of the prevention and control of the laundering of criminal proceeds. That function could be performed in cooperation with other international organizations, building on data collection instruments already developed by the International Criminal Police Organization (Interpol) and the Commonwealth Secretariat. The Commission might also wish to encourage more coordination and cooperation among relevant international organizations, in order to improve advocacy and dissemination of information, and foster action against the laundering of criminal proceeds.

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs, at its April session, adopted a resolution [E/1996/27 (res. 5(XXXIX))] on requirements for customer identi-cation and other anti-money-laundering measures. The Commission urged States to prohibit banks and other financial institutions from offering accounts identified only by number, anonymous accounts or accounts in obviously false names. It recommended that States require financial institutions to determine the true identities of clients, and pay particular attention to wire transfers. The Commission urged States to broaden money-laundering countermeasures to include the transit, conversion or other disposition of illegal proceeds from serious crime, and to consider legislative measures for the confiscation or seizure of illicit proceeds from drug trafficking and other serious crime. States should also consider bilateral or multilateral arrangements for the equitable sharing of forfeited assets in such cases. The Commission urged UNDCP and the Division to work with the Financial Action Task Force and other anti-money-laundering and counter-narcotics institutions in order to strengthen international efforts against money-laundering, and to review progress made by States in implementing the anti-money-laundering provisions of the 1988 United Nations Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances [YUN 1988, p. 690] and the recommendations of the Financial Action Task Force. The Secretary-General was requested to transmit the Commission's resolution to all Governments for consideration and implementation (see also PART THREE, Chapter XV).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 24 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/27.

Implementation of the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 49/159 of 23 December 1994, in which the Assembly approved the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime and urged States to implement them as a matter of urgency,

Recalling also its resolution 1995/11 of 24 July 1995 on the implementation of the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime,

Recalling further its resolution 1994/13 of 25 July 1994 on the control of the proceeds of crime,

Welcoming Commission on Narcotic Drugs resolution 5(XXXIX) of 24 April 1996,

Emphasizing the need for strengthened and improved international cooperation at all levels and for more effective technical cooperation to assist States in their fight against organized transnational crime,

Aware that criminal organizations vary in size, scale, bonding mechanisms, their range of activities, their geographical scope, their relationship with power structures, their internal organizations and structures and the combination of instruments that they use both to promote their criminal enterprises and to protect themselves against law enforcement efforts,

Recalling that, while not constituting a legal or comprehensive definition of the phenomenon, organized transnational crime characteristically uses group organizations to commit crime, has hierarchical links or personal relationships that permit leaders to control the group, uses violence, intimidation and corruption to earn profit or control territories or markets, launders illicit proceeds both to further criminal activity and to infiltrate the legitimate economy, has the potential to expand into new activities and beyond national borders and cooperates with other organized transnational criminal groups,

Convinced that a structured programme of activities is essential to the full implementation of the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime;

2. Takes note also of the Buenos Aires Declaration on Prevention and Control of Organized Transnational Crime, adopted by the Regional Ministerial Workshop on Follow-up to the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime, held at Buenos Aires from 27 to 30 November 1995;

3. Takes note further of the report of the Secretary-General on control of the proceeds of crime;

4. Requests the Secretary-General, taking into account work done in other international forums, to assist in the implementation of the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan to meet the needs of Member States for:

(a) Increased knowledge on the structure and dynamics of organized transnational crime in all its forms, as well as trends in its development, areas of activity and diversification, taking into account the growing dangers of links between organized transnational crime and terrorist crimes;

(b) Reviewing existing international instruments and exploring the possibility of elaborating new ones to strengthen and improve international cooperation against organized transnational crime;

(c) Intensified technical assistance in the form of advisory services and training;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to continue collecting and analysing information on the structure, dynamics and other aspects of all forms of organized transnational crime throughout the world;

6. Also requests the Secretary-General, while avoiding duplication of the work of the United Nations International Drug Control Programme, to establish a central repository for:

(a) National legislation, including regulatory measures, on organized transnational crime;

(b) Information on organizational structures designed to combat organized transnational crime;

(c) Instruments for international cooperation, including bilateral and multilateral treaties and legislation to ensure their implementation, with a view to making them available to requesting Member States;

7. Urges Member States, other entities of the United Nations system and relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to assist the Secretary-General in implementing the request contained in paragraphs 4 to 6 above by providing and regularly updating relevant information and legislative and regulatory texts;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to continue his consultations with Governments on the possibility of elaborating a convention or conventions against organized transnational crime and on the elements that could be included therein;

9. Also requests the Secretary-General, drawing on the expertise of Governments:

(a) To make a thorough analysis of the views of Governments on the possibility of elaborating a convention or conventions against organized transnational crime, taking into account, inter alia, the Buenos Aires Declaration on Prevention and Control of Organized Transnational Crime;

(b) To make proposals on the action that would be appropriate;

(c) To make proposals for the undertaking of practical activities by States to implement the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan;

(d) To report thereon to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its sixth session;

10. Decides that the Commission should establish an in-session open-ended working group at its sixth session for the purpose of:

(a) Considering the report and proposals of the Secretary-General;

(b) Identifying practical activities for effectively implementing the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan;

(c) Considering the possibility of elaborating a convention or conventions against organized transnational crime and identifying elements that could be included therein;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to provide advisory services and technical assistance to requesting Member States in needs assessment, capacity-building and training, as well as in the implementation of the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan;

12. Further requests the Secretary-General, for the purpose of providing the assistance referred to in paragraph 11 above, to develop training manuals for specialized law enforcement and investigative personnel on action against organized transnational crime, taking into account differences in legal systems;

13. Stresses the importance of the activities carried out by the United Nations to strengthen international efforts against money-laundering, including, where possible, money-laundering involving the proceeds of serious crimes other than drug-related crimes and, for this purpose, requests the Secretary-General to increase and intensify cooperation between the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division of the Secretariat and the United Nations International Drug Control Programme and to continue to work with the Financial Action Task Force and other relevant multilateral and regional institutions against money-laundering;

14. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice on the implementation of the present resolution.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/27

24 July 1996 Meeting 47 Adopted without vote

International convention

Pursuant to Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/11 [YUN 1995, p. 1152], the Secretary-General requested the views of States on the opportunity for a convention or conventions against organized transnational crime.

The Secretary-General reported [E/CN.15/1996/2] that 10 of the 20 States that responded were favourably disposed towards a convention or conventions, 3 expressed reservations on the possibility of elaborating a general convention, and 2 favoured the elaboration of conventions against various aspects of organized transnational crime or on specific modalities of international cooperation against such crime. One State opposed the elaboration of any new instrument or instruments.

During its May session, the Commission debated the feasibility of the elaboration of international instruments on organized transnational crime and the form that an international framework for cooperation would take. One State announced that it was elaborating a draft convention.

Poland, by a letter of 8 August [A/51/192] to the Secretary-General, requested that a new item, entitled "Question of elaboration of an international convention against organized transnational crime", be included in the forthcoming session of the General Assembly, and attached an explanatory memorandum to its request. By a letter of 24 September [A/C.3/51/7] to the Secretary-General, Poland transmitted a draft UN framework convention against organized crime for consideration by the General Assembly.

The General Assembly, on the recommendation of the General Committee, decided to include the question and to allocate it to the Third Committee [A/51/620 & Corr.1]. During the Third Committee's debate, Poland, on behalf of 20 States, introduced a draft resolution on the question which was adopted without a vote and recommended to the Assembly for adoption.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/120.

Question of the elaboration of an international convention against organized transnational crime

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 49/159 of 23 December 1994, in which it approved the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime, and bearing in mind the report of the Ninth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, held at Cairo from 29 April to 8 May 1995,

Taking into account Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/27 of 24 July 1996, entitled "Implementation of the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime", in which the Council decided, inter alia, that the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice should establish an in-session open-ended working group at its sixth session, for the purpose, inter alia, of considering the possibility of elaborating a convention or conventions against organized transnational crime and identifying elements that could be included therein,

Recalling also the Buenos Aires Declaration on Prevention and Control of Organized Transnational Crime, adopted by the Regional Ministerial Workshop on Follow-up to the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime, held at Buenos Aires from 27 to 30 November 1995,

Deeply disturbed by the increasingly alarming threat posed by organized transnational crime to the rule of law, stability and security of States, which calls for an urgent and appropriate response,

Concerned about the growing number and variety of crimes committed by organized criminal groups,

Convinced of the need for closer coordination and cooperation among States in combating organized transnational crime, and bearing in mind the role that could be played by the United Nations and regional and subregional organizations in this respect,

Considering that there is a need to examine the question of the elaboration of an international convention against organized transnational crime,

Taking note of the proposed draft United Nations framework convention against organized crime introduced by Poland,

Bearing in mind the discussion on the question of the elaboration of an international convention against organized transnational crime which took place in the Third Committee during the fifty-first session of the General Assembly,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to invite all States to submit their views on the question of the elaboration of an international convention against organized transnational crime, including, inter alia, their comments on the proposed draft United Nations framework convention, not later than two months before the commencement of the sixth session of the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice;

2. Requests the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice to consider, as a matter of priority, the question of the elaboration of an international convention against organized transnational crime, taking into account the views of all States on this matter, with a view to finalizing its work on this question as soon as possible;

3. Further requests the Commission to report through the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the results of its work on this question;

4. Decides to continue its consideration of this question at its fifty-second session.

General Assembly resolution 51/120
12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote
Approved by Third Committee (A/51/620 & Corr.1) without vote, 31 October (meeting 20); 34-nation draft (A/C.3/51/L.10), orally revised; agenda item 158.

UN Declaration on Crime and Public Security

The Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice agreed on the text of a draft resolution on a United Nations Declaration on Crime and Public Security and recommended it for adoption by the General Assembly [E/1996/30]. The Declaration expressed Member States' intention to protect the security and well-being of their citizens by taking effective national measures and pledging mutual cooperation to combat serious transnational crime, including organized crime, illicit drug and arms trafficking, smuggling of other illicit articles, organized trafficking in persons, terrorist crimes and laundering of proceeds from serious crime.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/9.

United Nations declaration on crime and public security

The Economic and Social Council

Recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the following draft resolution:

[For text, see General Assembly resolution 51/60 below.]

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/9
23 July 1996 Meeting 45 Adopted without vote
Draft by Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice (E/1996/30 & Corr.1); agenda item 5 (g).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/60.

United Nations Declaration on Crime and Public Security

The General Assembly,

Convinced that the adoption of a declaration on crime and public security will contribute to the enhancement of the struggle against serious transnational crime,

1. Approves the United Nations Declaration on Crime and Public Security annexed to the present resolution;

2. Urges Member States, in accordance with the provisions of the Declaration, to take all appropriate measures at the national and international levels to combat serious transnational crime;

3. Invites the Secretary-General to inform all States and the relevant specialized agencies and organizations of the adoption of the Declaration;

4. Urges Member States to make every effort to ensure that the Declaration becomes generally known and is observed and implemented in full in accordance with their respective national legislation;

5. Invites Member States to promote public campaigns, including the use of mass media, that stimulate public awareness of and participation in the process of crime prevention and promotion of public security.

ANNEX United Nations Declaration on Crime and Public Security

The General Assembly,

Recalling the Declaration on the Occasion of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the United Nations, the Declaration on Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism and the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime, Solemnly proclaims the following United Nations Declaration on Crime and Public Security:

Article 1

Member States shall seek to protect the security and well-being of their citizens and all persons within their jurisdiction by taking effective national measures to combat serious transnational crime, including organized crime, illicit drug and arms trafficking, smuggling of other illicit articles, organized trafficking in persons, terrorist crimes and the laundering of proceeds from serious crimes, and shall pledge their mutual cooperation in those efforts.

Article 2

Member States shall promote bilateral, regional, multilateral and global law enforcement cooperation and assistance, including, as appropriate, mutual legal assistance arrangements, to facilitate the detection, apprehension and prosecution of those who commit or are otherwise responsible for serious transnational crimes and to ensure that law enforcement and other competent authorities can cooperate effectively on an international basis.

Article 3

Member States shall take measures to prevent support for and operations of criminal organizations in their national territories. Member States shall, to the fullest possible extent, provide for effective extradition or prosecution of those who engage in serious transnational crimes in order that they find no safe haven.

Article 4

Mutual cooperation and assistance in matters concerning serious transnational crime shall also include, as appropriate, the strengthening of systems for the sharing of information among Member States and the provision of bilateral and multilateral technical assistance to Member States by utilizing training, exchange programmes and law enforcement training academies and criminal justice institutes at the international level.

Article 5

Member States that have not yet done so are urged to become parties as soon as possible to the principal existing international treaties relating to various aspects of the problem of international terrorism. States parties shall effectively implement their provisions in order to fight against terrorist crimes. Member States shall also take measures to implement General Assembly resolution 49/60 of 9 December 1994, on measures to eliminate international terrorism, and the Declaration on Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism contained in the annex to that resolution.

Article 6

Member States that have not yet done so are urged to become parties to the international drug control conventions as soon as possible. States parties shall effectively implement the provisions of the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs of 1961 as amended by the 1972 Protocol, the Convention on Psychotropic Substances of 1971 and the United Nations Convention against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances of 1988. Member States specifically reaffirm that, on the basis of shared responsibility, they shall take all necessary preventive and enforcement measures to eliminate the illicit production of, trafficking in and distribution and consumption of narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances, including measures to facilitate the fight against those criminals involved in this type of transnational organized crime.

Article 7

Member States shall take measures within their national jurisdiction to improve their ability to detect and interdict the movement across borders of those who engage in serious transnational crime, as well as the instrumentalities of such crime, and shall take effective specific measures to protect their territorial boundaries, such as:

(a) Adopting effective controls on explosives and against illicit trafficking by criminals in certain materials and their components that are specifically designed for use in manufacturing nuclear, biological or chemical weapons and, in order to lessen risks arising from such trafficking, by becoming parties to and fully implementing all relevant international treaties relating to weapons of mass destruction;

(b) Strengthening supervision of passport issuance and enhancement of protection against tampering and counterfeiting;

(c) Strengthening enforcement of regulations on illicit transnational trafficking in firearms, with a view to both suppressing the use of firearms in criminal activities and reducing the likelihood of fuelling deadly conflict;

(d) Coordinating measures and exchanging information to combat the organized criminal smuggling of persons across national borders.

Article 8

To combat further the transnational flow of the proceeds of crime, Member States agree to adopt measures, as appropriate, to combat the concealment or disguise of the true origin of proceeds of serious transnational crime and the intentional conversion or transfer of such proceeds for that purpose. Member States agree to require adequate record-keeping by financial and related institutions and, as appropriate, the reporting of suspicious transactions and to ensure effective laws and procedures to permit the seizure and forfeiture of the proceeds of serious transnational crime. Member States recognize the need to limit the application of bank secrecy laws, if any, with respect to criminal operations and to obtain the cooperation of the financial institutions in detecting these and any other operations that may be used for the purpose of money-laundering.

Article 9

Member States agree to take steps to strengthen the overall professionalism of their criminal justice, law enforcement and victim assistance systems and relevant regulatory authorities through measures such as training, resource allocation and arrangements for technical assistance with other States and to promote the involvement of all elements of society in combating and preventing serious transnational crime.

Article 10

Member States agree to combat and prohibit corruption and bribery, which undermine the legal foundations of civil society, by enforcing applicable domestic laws against such activity. For this purpose, Member States also agree to consider developing concerted measures for international cooperation to curb corrupt practices, as well as developing technical expertise to prevent and control corruption.

Article 11

Actions taken in furtherance of the present Declaration shall fully respect the national sovereignty and territorial jurisdiction of Member States, as well as the rights and obligations of Member States under existing treaties and international law, and shall be consistent with human rights and fundamental freedoms as recognized by the United Nations.

General Assembly resolution 51/60

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by the Third Committee (A/51/610) without vote, 6 November (meeting 26); draft by Chairman (A/C.3/51/L.11) based on informal consultations on draft recommended by ESC res. 1996/9 (A/C.3/51/L.3) and amendment thereto (A/C.3/51/L.5) by Lebanon; agenda item 101. Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 5-10, 12, 16-18, 20, 26; plenary 82.

Transnational and terrorist crimes

The Secretary-General, in an April report [E/CN.15/1996/7] to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, provided an overview of differences and similarities between transnational organized crime and terrorist crimes, as well as a summary of the responses received from 24 States on action taken to combat such crime.

Highlighting recent international initiatives against terrorist crimes, the report concluded that, while links between transnational organized crime and terrorist crimes were more circumstantial than institutional, both forms of crime presented formidable challenges to the international community and required improved international cooperation. The growing dangers of both organized transnational crime and terrorist crime threatened security, stability and the rule of law, which were fundamental for social and economic development. Intra-State cooperation had not been able to keep up with the pace of international movement of criminal assets, the possibilities afforded by instant and increasingly secure communication through electronic channels, and the ability of terrorists and members of organized criminal syndicates to pass undetected through border crossings. An international consensus on the modalities of international cooperation was necessary for overcoming legal and conceptual impediments to more effective action.

Communication. The Syrian Arab Republic, in a 15 May note [E/CN.15/1996/23] to the Secretary-General, conveyed its position on transnational crime, organized crime and the role of criminal law in the protection of the environment. It condemned terrorism and reiterated its position that it distinguished between terrorism and acts of national resistance against occupation, which it supported because they derived from the right of every people whose land had been occupied or whose rights had been violated.

Criminal law and protection of the environment

UNDP, in cooperation with the UN Interregional Crime and Justice Research Institute (UNICRI), in May issued a "Monograph on Capacity Building in Criminal Enforcement of Environmental Law", which was part of an initiative launched at the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) [YUN 1992, p. 670]. The monograph, intended to be a tool to point the direction for Governments, individuals and international organizations in formulating programmes, identified areas where concrete projects in the field of criminal enforcement of environmental law could be developed and implemented. It proposed elements on which technical assistance activities might be focused, such as the preparation of legislation, institution-building, enforcement tools, training and education.

During the debate by the Commission on the role of criminal law in the protection of the environment, Costa Rica put forward a draft resolution calling for the establishment of an international court of justice on the environment, to serve as a permanent UN body for international control, arbitration, prevention, punishment and consultation with States. Such a proposal had been made at UNCED.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/10.

The role of criminal law in the protection of the environment

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 45/121 of 14 December 1990 on the Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, in which the Assembly welcomed the instruments and resolutions adopted by the Eighth Congress, which included a resolution on the role of criminal law in the protection of nature and the environment,

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 46/152 of 18 December 1991, in which the Assembly called for strengthened international cooperation to combat transnational crime,

Recalling further its resolution 1992/22 of 30 July 1992, in section VI of which it determined that three priority themes should guide the work of the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, one of which included the role of criminal law in the protection of the environment, and in section III of which it invited Member States to establish reliable and effective channels of communication among themselves and with the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme, including the regional institutes affiliated with the United Nations,

Reaffirming the principles of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development,

Bearing in mind the activities and deliberations on sustainable development relating to the transfer of environmentally sound technology and the relevant provisions of Agenda 21 on the same subject,

Recognizing the importance of enhancing international cooperation in the enforcement of domestic and international environmental criminal laws and of promoting operational activities in that area,

Considering that for several years legal experts have been discussing the need for the establishment of an international court for environmental matters,

Bearing in mind that a number of meetings of legal experts specializing in environmental and criminal matters have suggested to Governments to consider discussing, in the United Nations, the feasibility of establishing an international court for environmental matters,

Aware that it is essential to protect the environment not only at the national level, but also at the international level, with due respect for the sovereignty of States, and that in this respect it may be appropriate to continue developing at the international level standards in criminal law for the protection of the environment,

Taking note with appreciation of the monograph on capacity-building in criminal enforcement of environmental law,

Bearing in mind that a proposal regarding the possibility of establishing a court having environmental jurisdiction was made at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, held at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, from 3 to 14 June 1992,

1. Expresses its appreciation to the Government of Costa Rica for its efforts to continue discussions on the function of criminal law as regards protection of the environment, also appreciates the offer of the Government to host, in November 1996, an expert group meeting on that issue and invites the Secretary-General to provide the necessary collaboration in the organization of the meeting;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to seek the views of Member States in order to determine the feasibility of establishing appropriate machinery for applying criminal law for the protection of the environment;

3. Decides that the question of the role of criminal law in the protection of the environment should continue to be one of the priority issues of the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its future sessions;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to establish and maintain close cooperation with Member States and intergovernmental, non-governmental and other organizations active in the field of environmental protection, in particular in the area of technical cooperation and assistance, including the formulation and implementation of joint projects on enforcement of environmental criminal law and other relevant activities within the United Nations system concerned with legal matters;

5. Also requests the Secretary-General to maintain and expand the roster of experts in this field and to continue gathering information on national environmental criminal law and regional and multinational initiatives;

6. Calls upon Member States to cooperate with each other, as well as with international organizations, in their efforts to prevent crimes against the environment and to include appropriate penal provisions in their laws and ensure their enforcement;

7. Recognizes the arrangements for preparing a manual for professionals responsible for enforcement of environmental criminal law, and recommends that this work be carried out by an expert group meeting, subject to the availability of extrabudgetary funds;

8. Calls upon Member States to support technical cooperation activities in environmental matters by making contributions in kind or by contributing to the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Fund;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its sixth session on the implementation of the present resolution.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/10

Draft by Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice
(E/1996/30 & Corr.1); agenda item 5 (g).

Alien smuggling

In a March report [E/CN.15/1996/4 & Add.1] to the Commission, the Secretary-General described measures to combat the smuggling of illegal migrants. The report traced developments in respect of criminal law and other measures taken by Governments to combat the problem, based on information received from them. The report also reviewed action taken by UN bodies and conferences and made suggestions for consideration by the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice.

The Secretary-General proposed that the Commission might specify practical measures for an international course of action to guide States in combating the phenomenon, including national, subregional, regional and interregional security plans. Measures for trans-border law enforcement needed to be specified and applied by all concerned. More dialogue and joint action between source, transit and recipient States might be fostered, particularly across regions and in international forums, including consideration of a new international instrument. The Secretary-General suggested integrated action within the UN system. He noted that the issue of the law of the sea might be explored, given the volume of illegal population movements by sea.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/62.

Measures for prevention of the smuggling of aliens

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 48/102 of 20 December 1993 in which, inter alia, it condemned the practice of smuggling aliens and urged States to take appropriate steps to frustrate the objectives and activities of smugglers of aliens,

Recalling also Economic and Social Council resolutions 1994/14 of 25 July 1994 and 1995/10 of 24 July 1995,

Concerned at the increasing activities of criminals and criminal organizations that profit illicitly by smuggling human beings, preying on the dignity and lives of migrants and adding to the complexity of the phenomenon of increasing international migration,

Aware that such activities endanger the lives of those individuals and impose severe costs on the international community, in particular upon certain States that have been called upon to rescue and to provide medical care, food, housing and transportation for those individuals,

Recognizing that international criminal groups often convince individuals to migrate illegally by various means for enormous profits and use the proceeds from smuggling human beings to finance other criminal activities,

Noting that smugglers, in particular in the State of destination of alien smuggling, frequently force migrants into forms of debt, bondage or servitude, often involving criminal activities, in order to pay for their passage,

Recognizing that socio-economic factors influence the problem of the smuggling of aliens and also contribute to the complexity of current international migration,

Reaffirming respect for the sovereignty and territorial integrity of all States, including their right to control their own borders,

Recalling the undertaking of States parties to the Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery, signed at Geneva on 7 September 1956, to take all practicable and necessary legislative and other measures to bring about progressively and as soon as possible the complete abolition or abandonment of the practice of debt bondage,

Convinced of the need to provide humane treatment and protect the full human rights of migrants,

Concerned that the smuggling of aliens undermines public confidence in policies and procedures for immigration and for the protection of refugees,

Taking into account the efforts of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the International Organization for Migration, the International Civil Aviation Organization and the International Maritime Organization in responding to the requests from States for assistance in dealing with the smuggling of aliens,

Emphasizing the importance of international cooperation and, in particular, the need for States to cooperate urgently at the bilateral and multilateral levels, as appropriate, to thwart these activities,

1. Condemns the practice of smuggling aliens in violation of international and national law or other agreements between States and without regard for the safety, well-being and human rights of the migrants;

2. Commends those States which have cooperated to combat alien smuggling and to respond to specific incidents in which smuggled aliens have needed to be dealt with according to international standards and the domestic laws and procedures of the States concerned and returned safely to appropriate destinations;

3. Urges States to take appropriate steps to frustrate the objectives and activities of smugglers of aliens and thus to protect would-be migrants from exploitation and loss of life, inter alia, by amending criminal laws, if necessary, to encompass the smuggling of aliens and by establishing or improving procedures to permit the ready discovery of false travel documents supplied by smugglers;

4. Requests States to cooperate in order to prevent the illegal transport by smugglers of third-country nationals through their territory;

5. Also requests States to cooperate bilaterally and on a multilateral basis to prevent the use of fraudulent documents, to continue to improve the requirements for registration of vessels and to implement relevant international agreements;

6. Further requests States to cooperate in the interest of safety of life at sea, to increase their efforts to prevent the smuggling of aliens on ships and to ensure, in accordance with their national legislation, that prompt and effective action is taken against the smuggling of aliens by sea;

7. Calls upon States to enhance bilateral and multilateral cooperation in the fight against criminal organizations responsible for the smuggling of aliens;

8. Calls upon Member States and the relevant specialized agencies and international organizations to take into account socio-economic factors and to cooperate at the bilateral and multilateral levels in addressing all aspects of the problem of smuggling of aliens;

9. Reaffirms the importance of existing international conventions in preventing the economic exploitation and loss of life that can result from alien smuggling, and calls upon all States to exchange information, to consider ratifying or acceding to those conventions if they have not done so and fully to implement and enforce such conventions;

10. Emphasizes that international efforts to prevent the smuggling of aliens should not inhibit legal migration or freedom of travel or undercut the protection provided by international law to refugees;

11. Reaffirms the need to observe fully international and national law in dealing with the smuggling of aliens, including the provision of humane treatment and strict observance of all human rights of migrants;

12. Requests the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice to consider giving attention to the question of the smuggling of aliens at its sixth session, to be held in 1997, in order to encourage international cooperation to address this problem within the framework of its mandate;

13. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the text of the present resolution to all Member States and to the relevant specialized agencies and intergovernmental organizations.

Administration of juvenile justice

As follow-up to the 1995 Ninth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders (Cairo, Egypt, 29 April-8 May) [YUN 1995, p. 1133], a preparatory meeting aimed at drafting an integrated international strategy on administration of juvenile justice was held in Vienna in January 1996. It recommended that a programme of action should consist of the elaboration of an integrated international strategy on juvenile justice, to be accompanied by the development and implementation of technical assistance projects for countries facing the challenge of complying with the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child [YUN 1989, p. 560, GA res. 44/25], particularly with respect to the application of juvenile justice instruments. It also recommended that an expert group meet to finalize a draft programme of action for consideration by the Commission at its next session and suggested that the group discuss two pilot projects on juvenile justice reform. The Government of Austria offered to host such a meeting, later scheduled for February 1997.

The Secretary-General, in an April report [E/CN.15/1996/10] on children as victims and perpetrators of crime, described progress towards the formulation of a programme of action to promote the effective use and application of international standards and norms in juvenile justice. The major goal of the programme of action would be to promote the use and application of relevant UN human rights instruments in the administration of justice with regard to children, as well as UN standards and norms in juvenile justice.

The Secretary-General made proposals on a programme of action consisting of an international strategy on juvenile justice and development of technical assistance projects. The strategy should be based on an inventory and analysis of the implementation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which could be accomplished by reviewing the reports of States parties. According to the Secretary-General, the strategy should deal with the issue of how to make international cooperation in juvenile justice more operational by identifying common problems faced by different countries, which would lead to proposals for improving juvenile justice systems at the local and national levels, for instance by introducing diversion programmes, improving the administration of juvenile justice, reducing the use of remand homes and pre-trial detention, improving the treatment of juveniles in prisons and creating effective rehabilitation programmes.

The Secretary-General suggested that the Commission encourage further cooperation with DDSMS, CHR, the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and UNDP to provide assistance on the reform of juvenile justice to requesting Member States. He proposed that the Commission take note with appreciation of the offer of Austria to host the meeting of the expert group to finalize, for consideration by the Commission, a draft programme of action to promote the use and application of international standards and norms in juvenile justice and to discuss two pilot projects on juvenile justice reform. He suggested that the Commission decide to consider the draft programme of action at its sixth session.

On 19 April [E/1996/23 (res. 1996/32)], the Commission on Human Rights adopted a resolution on human rights in the administration of justice, in particular of children and juveniles in detention. It called upon States to give high priority to the promotion and protection of all rights of children and juveniles in the administration of justice, and urged them to ensure compliance with the principle that depriving children and juveniles of their liberty should be used only as a measure of last resort and for the shortest appropriate period of time, and to ensure that they were separated, as appropriate, from adults when detained.

The Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, at its fifth session in May [E/1996/30], recommended a draft resolution on administration of juvenile justice for adoption by the Economic and Social Council.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/13.

Administration of juvenile justice

The Economic and Social Council,

Aware of the specific situation of children and juveniles, in particular when deprived of their liberty, and concerned about the extent to which they are used as instruments in criminal activities,

Emphasizing the importance of coordinating the activities in the field of the administration of justice carried out under the responsibility of the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice with those carried out under the responsibility of the Commission on Human Rights,

Recalling resolution 7 of 7 May 1995 of the Ninth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, on children as victims and perpetrators of crime and the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme: from standard setting towards implementation and action, and Council resolution 1995/27 of 24 July 1995,

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 50/181 of 22 December 1995 on human rights in the administration of justice,

Recalling further Commission on Human Rights resolution 1996/32 of 19 April 1996 on human rights in the administration of justice, in particular of children and juveniles in detention,

Noting that the Committee on the Rights of the Child attaches particular importance to the question of the administration of juvenile justice and that it includes in its conclusions on reports of States parties concrete recommendations concerning the provisions of advisory services and technical cooperation in this field,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on children as victims and perpetrators of crime,

1. Welcomes the progress made with regard to elaborating a programme of action to promote the effective use and application of international standards and norms in juvenile justice;

2. Recognizes the need to further strengthen international cooperation and practical technical assistance in the field of juvenile justice;

3. Calls upon Governments once again to make effective use and application of international standards in the administration of justice and, to that end, to provide for effective legislative and other mechanisms and procedures;

4. Encourages States to make use of technical assistance offered by the United Nations programmes of advisory services and technical assistance in order to strengthen national capacities and infrastructure in the field of the administration of justice;

5. Calls upon Governments to include in their national development plans the administration of justice as an integral part of the development process and, to that end, to allocate adequate resources for improving the administration of juvenile justice, as well as to make use of technical assistance offered, at their request, by the United Nations programmes of technical cooperation in this field;

6. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, as well as relevant United Nations bodies and programmes, to consider favourably requests by States for assistance in the field of the administration of justice;

7. Invites the Secretary-General, the United Nations Children's Fund, the United Nations Development Programme and the World Bank, as well as other international and regional organizations and non-governmental organizations, to place emphasis on technical assistance projects in the field of juvenile justice;

8. Also invites the Secretary-General to strengthen system-wide coordination of technical assistance projects in the field of juvenile delinquency prevention and the establishment or improvement of juvenile justice systems;

9. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to continue to pay special attention to the subject of juvenile justice and, in close cooperation with the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division of the Secretariat, the United Nations Children's Fund and the Committee on the Rights of the Child, to develop strategies to ensure effective coordination of technical cooperation programmes in the field of juvenile justice;

10. Requests the Secretary-General to organize, in cooperation with the Government of Austria, a meeting of an expert group on the elaboration of a programme of action to promote the effective use and application of international standards and norms in juvenile justice, using extrabudgetary resources made available by the Government expressly for that purpose;

11. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its sixth session on the implementation of the present resolution;

12. Decides that the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its sixth session should consider the draft programme of action on juvenile justice.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/13

International traffic in children

The Secretary-General, in response to Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/27 [YUN 1995, p. 1138], sought information from States on their views regarding the process of elaborating an international convention on the illicit traffic in children. An April report of the Secretary-General [E/CN.15/1996/10] presented the replies received from 18 States, 17 of which favoured the elaboration of the convention.

The Secretary-General presented a series of measures for action by the Commission. He suggested that it request the development of a survey on illicit traffic in children to facilitate the development of strategies of concerted action against transnational organized crime, and that States encourage exchange programmes between law enforcement personnel and other bilateral exchanges to deal with transnational trafficking in children, as well as increasing the exchange of information, such as lists of known paedophiles and crime-linked data. The Commission, he said, might call on Member States to establish a central registry of all missing children and foster the cross-border exchange of information to facilitate the tracing and monitoring of the cases concerned.

Other action. The World Congress against Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children (Stockholm, Sweden, 27-31 August), organized by Sweden in cooperation with UNICEF, End Child Prostitution in Asian Tourism (ECPAT) and the NGO Group for the Convention on the Rights of the Child, called for local, national, regional and international action against the commercial sexual exploitation of children, including legislation against and penalties for such activities. By a letter of 19 September [A/51/385], Sweden forwarded to the General Assembly the Declaration and Agenda for Action adopted by the Congress. (See also PART TWO, Chapter II.)

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 24 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/26.

Measures to prevent illicit international trafficking in children and to establish penalties appropriate to such offences

The Economic and Social Council,

Considering that illicit international trafficking in children is a criminal activity of increasing concern to the international community and a violation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, article 35,

Aware that this activity is often conducted by criminal organizations with transnational links, principally in developing countries,

Taking note of resolution 3/2 of 6 May 1994 of the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, in which the Commission decided that it should consider, at its fourth session, the question of illicit international trafficking in children in the context of its discussion on organized transnational crime,

Recalling that the Ninth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, held at Cairo from 29 April to 8 May 1995, at which this subject received priority attention, adopted resolution 7 of 7 May 1995, in which it invited the Commission to initiate the process of requesting the views of States regarding the process of elaborating an international convention on the illicit trafficking in children, which might embody necessary elements to efficiently combat that form of transnational organized crime,

Recalling also its resolution 1995/27 of 24 July 1995, section IV.B, in which it requested the Secretary-General to initiate the process of requesting the views of Member States on the elaboration of such an international convention,

Aware that it is necessary, in order to deal more rationally and effectively with the illicit international trafficking in children and to effectively coordinate activities across the United Nations system and among other relevant international organizations, to establish a global framework for analysis of such transnational criminal activity and for coordinating appropriate measures to prevent this scourge and to punish the offenders,

Welcoming the initiative of the Latin American and Caribbean States which took part in the Regional Ministerial Workshop on Follow-up to the Naples Political Declaration and Global Action Plan against Organized Transnational Crime, held at Buenos Aires from 27 to 30 November 1995, with regard to the illicit international trafficking in children,

Welcoming also the initiative of convening the World Congress against Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children, to be held at Stockholm from 26 to 31 August 1996, which has among its key themes the issue of illicit trafficking in children,

Aware that it is necessary to adopt practical measures to combat this form of organized transnational crime,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on children as victims and perpetrators of crime, in particular the views of Governments on the elaboration of an international convention on the illicit trafficking in children and the proposals contained in that report;

2. Invites interested Governments fighting illicit trafficking in children to collect, wherever possible, data and other information on the problem in accordance with national legislation, and to furnish that information to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice;

3. Requests Member States to provide information on current legal provisions and administrative rules applicable to the prevention and punishment of illicit trafficking in children, and on the misuse of international adoption agencies by criminal organizations involved in illicit trafficking in children that may have been uncovered by the relevant authorities;

4. Invites Governments to adopt the necessary measures in accordance with their legislation to ensure that all persons involved in illicit trafficking in children are subject to prosecution in a manner commensurate with the seriousness of the crime;

5. Invites the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division of the Secretariat to cooperate closely with the Centre for Human Rights of the Secretariat;

6. Also invites the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division to work and cooperate closely with the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, taking into account her role in the inter-sessional open-ended working group for the elaboration of a draft protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography;

7. Decides that the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice should include in the provisional agenda for its sixth session an item on the possible elaboration of a legally binding international instrument or instruments on the illicit trafficking in children;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to gather the opinions of Governments on the elaboration of an international convention or conventions on the illicit trafficking in children and their suggestions on possible elements to be included in the text of a future binding instrument or instruments on that subject;

9. Also requests the Secretary-General to conduct a survey, on the basis of existing international conventions, analysing the extent to which children are protected from becoming victims of illicit international trafficking, taking into account both substantive and procedural aspects of providing such protection, and to compile and analyse the data collected;

10. Further requests the Secretary-General to prepare a report on the results of the survey mentioned in paragraph 9 above, to be submitted to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its sixth session;

11. Requests the Secretary-General to ensure that United Nations system-wide activity on this and related issues is effectively coordinated.

Corruption

Action against corruption

On the recommendation of the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice [E/1996/30], the General Assembly in 1996 adopted the International Code of Conduct for Public Officials. The draft was recommended for approval by the Economic and Social Council.

At its 1996 session, the Commission had considered an April report [E/CN.15/1996/5] of the Secretary-General on action against corruption, which included a revised version of the draft code reflecting comments received from 36 Governments. The report described recent initiatives against corruption by international organizations as well as comments by States on the draft code. Support for the code was expressed by the majority of the States that responded to the Secretary-General's request for comments.

Among suggestions made in the report for action by the Commission were increasing technical assistance activities of the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division in the prevention and control of corruption, the elaboration of an international plan of action against corruption, which might include guidelines for action by the United Nations on good governance, and prevention and control of corrupt practices in public institutions and private business.

Other action. The Organization of American States considered the issue of corruption, adopting the Inter-American Convention against Corruption at the Specialized Conference for Consideration of the Draft Inter-American Convention against Corruption (Caracas, Venezuela, 27-29 March), which was transmitted to the Secretary-General by Venezuela in July [E/1996/99].

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/8.

Action against corruption

The Economic and Social Council

Recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the following draft resolution:

[For text, see General Assembly resolution 51/59 below.]

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/8

23 July 1996 Meeting 45 Adopted without vote

Draft by Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice (E/1996/30 & Corr.1); agenda item 5 (g).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/59.

Action against corruption

The General Assembly,

Concerned at the seriousness of problems posed by corruption, which may endanger the stability and security of societies, undermine the values of democracy and morality and jeopardize social, economic and political development,

Also concerned about the links between corruption and other forms of crime, in particular organized crime and economic crime, including money-laundering,

Convinced that, since corruption is a phenomenon that currently crosses national borders and affects all societies and economies, international cooperation to prevent and control it is essential,

Convinced also of the need to provide, upon request, technical assistance designed to improve public management systems and to enhance accountability and transparency,

Recalling the Inter-American Convention against Corruption, adopted by the Organization of American States at the Specialized Conference for Consideration of the Draft Inter-American Convention against Corruption, held at Caracas from 27 to 29 March 1996,

Recalling also its resolutions 45/121 of 14 December 1990 and 46/152 of 18 December 1991, and Economic and Social Council resolutions 1992/22 of 30 July 1992, 1993/32 of 27 July 1993 and 1994/19 of 25 July 1994,

Recalling in particular its resolution 50/225 of 19 April 1996, adopted at its resumed session, on public administration and development,

Recalling Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/14 of 24 July 1995 on action against corruption,

Recalling also the work carried out by other international and regional organizations in this field, including the activities of the Council of Europe, the European Union, the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development and the Organization of American States,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on action against corruption submitted to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its fifth session;

2. Adopts the International Code of Conduct for Public Officials annexed to the present resolution, and recommends it to Member States as a tool to guide their efforts against corruption;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to distribute the International Code of Conduct to all States and to include it in the manual on practical measures against corruption, to be revised and expanded pursuant to Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/14, with a view to offering both those tools to States in the context of advisory services, training and other technical assistance activities;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue to collect information and legislative and regulatory texts from States and relevant intergovernmental organizations, in the context of his continuing study of the problem of corruption;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with States, relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, as well as in cooperation with the institutes comprising the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme network, to elaborate an implementation plan and submit it to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its sixth session, in conjunction with his report to be submitted pursuant to Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/14;

6. Urges States, relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, as well as the institutes comprising the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme network, to extend to the Secretary-General their full support in elaborating the implementation plan and in implementing paragraph 4 above;

7. Urges Member States carefully to consider the problems posed by the international aspects of corrupt practices, especially as regards international economic activities carried out by corporate entities, and to study appropriate legislative and regulatory measures to ensure the transparency and integrity of financial systems and transactions carried out by such corporate entities;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to intensify his efforts to closely cooperate with other entities of the United Nations system and other relevant international organizations and to more effectively coordinate activities undertaken in this area;

9. Also requests the Secretary-General, subject to the availability of extrabudgetary resources, to provide increased advisory services and technical assistance to Member States, at their request, in particular in the elaboration of national strategies, the elaboration or improvement of legislative and regulatory measures, the establishment or strengthening of national capacities to prevent and control corruption, as well as in training and upgrading skills of relevant personnel;

10. Calls upon States, relevant international organizations and financing institutions to extend to the Secretary-General their full support and assistance in the implementation of the present resolution;

11. Requests the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice to keep the issue of action against corruption under regular review.

ANNEX*International Code of Conduct for Public Officials*I. General principles

1. A public office, as defined by national law, is a position of trust, implying a duty to act in the public interest. Therefore, the ultimate loyalty of public officials shall be to the public interests of their country as expressed through the democratic institutions of government.

2. Public officials shall ensure that they perform their duties and functions efficiently, effectively and with integrity, in accordance with laws or administrative policies. They shall at all times seek to ensure that public resources for which they are responsible are administered in the most effective and efficient manner.

3. Public officials shall be attentive, fair and impartial in the performance of their functions and, in particular, in their relations with the public. They shall at no time afford any undue preferential treatment to any group or individual or improperly discriminate against any group or individual, or otherwise abuse the power and authority vested in them.

II. Conflict of interest and disqualification

4. Public officials shall not use their official authority for the improper advancement of their own or their family's personal or financial interest. They shall not engage in any transaction, acquire any position or function or have any financial, commercial or other comparable interest that is incompatible with their office, functions and duties or the discharge thereof.

5. Public officials, to the extent required by their position, shall, in accordance with laws or administrative policies, declare business, commercial and financial interests or activities undertaken for financial gain that may raise a possible conflict of interest. In situations of possible or perceived conflict of interest between the duties and private interests of public officials, they shall comply with the measures established to reduce or eliminate such conflict of interest.

6. Public officials shall at no time improperly use public moneys, property, services or information that is acquired in the performance of, or as a result of, their official duties for activities not related to their official work.

7. Public officials shall comply with measures established by law or by administrative policies in order that after leaving their official positions they will not take improper advantage of their previous office.

III. Disclosure of assets

8. Public officials shall, in accord with their position and as permitted or required by law and administrative policies, comply with requirements to declare or to disclose personal assets and liabilities, as well as, if possible, those of their spouses and/or dependants.

IV. Acceptance of gifts or other favours

9. Public officials shall not solicit or receive directly or indirectly any gift or other favour that may influence the exercise of their functions, the performance of their duties or their judgement.

V. Confidential information

10. Matters of a confidential nature in the possession of public officials shall be kept confidential unless national legislation, the performance of duty or the needs of justice strictly require otherwise. Such restrictions shall also apply after separation from service.

VI. Political activity

11. The political or other activity of public officials outside the scope of their office shall, in accordance with laws and administrative policies, not be such as to impair public confidence in the impartial performance of their functions and duties.

UN Declaration on Corruption and Bribery

The General Assembly, following ongoing work on a draft international agreement on illicit payments [YUN 1995, p. 835], adopted in 1996 the United Nations Declaration against Corruption and Bribery in International Commercial Transactions.

On 26 July, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1996/305, having considered the issue of illicit payments, and having taken note of a draft resolution [E/1996/L.26] containing a UN declaration on corruption and bribery in transnational commercial activities, decided to consider the issue later in 1996. It requested the President of the Council to continue to facilitate open-ended consultations prior to its resumed substantive session in November, with a view to enhancing the prospects for achieving consensus.

The United States, in a letter of 5 November [E/1996/106] to the Secretary-General, transmitted the 1996 report to the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) by its Committee on International Investment and Multinational Enterprises. The report included a summary of progress in implementing a 1994 OECD recommendation relating to bribery in international business transactions.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 20 November, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/51.

Corruption and bribery in international commercial transactions

The Economic and Social Council

Recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the following draft resolution:

[For text, see General Assembly resolution 51/191 below.]

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/51

20 November 1996 Meeting 56 Adopted without vote

20-nation draft (E/1996/L.26/Rev.2), orally revised; agenda item 6 (i).

Meeting numbers. ESC 54, 56.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/191.

United Nations Declaration against Corruption and Bribery in International Commercial Transactions

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 3514(XXX) of 15 December 1975, in which it, inter alia, condemned all corrupt practices, including bribery, in international commercial transactions, reaffirmed the right of any State to adopt legislation and to investigate and take appropriate legal action, in accordance with its national laws and regulations, against such corrupt practices, and called upon all Governments to cooperate to prevent corrupt practices, including bribery,

Recalling also the further work carried out by the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council on the issue of illicit payments and on elaborating a code of conduct on transnational corporations, consideration of which helped call attention to and raise international awareness of the adverse consequences of bribery in international commercial transactions,

Recalling further its resolution 50/106 of 20 December 1995, in which it recommended that the Economic and Social Council consider the draft international agreement on illicit payments at its substantive session of 1996 and report to the Assembly at its fifty-first session,

Welcoming the steps taken at the national, regional and international levels to fight corruption and bribery, as well as recent developments in international forums that have further advanced international understanding and cooperation regarding corruption and bribery in international commercial transactions,

Noting the adoption in March 1996, by States members of the Organization of American States, of the Inter-American Convention against Corruption, which includes an article on transnational bribery,

Noting also significant continuing work relevant to and consistent with the objectives of the present resolution in other regional and international forums, such as the continuing work of the Council of Europe and the European Union to combat international bribery, as well as the commitment by the States members of the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development to criminalize bribery of foreign public officials in international commercial transactions in an effective and coordinated manner and further examine the modalities and appropriate international instruments to facilitate criminalization, and to re-examine the tax deductibility of such bribes with the intention of denying such tax deductibility in the member States that do not already do so,

1. Adopts the United Nations Declaration against Corruption and Bribery in International Commercial Transactions, the text of which is annexed to the present resolution;

2. Notes the work being undertaken by the United Nations and in other international and regional forums to address the problem of corruption and bribery in international commercial transactions, and invites all States concerned to pursue the completion of such work;

3. Invites Member States, in accordance with the Declaration, to take appropriate measures and cooperate at all levels to combat corruption and bribery in international commercial transactions;

4. Requests the Economic and Social Council and its subsidiary bodies, in particular the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice:

(a) To examine ways, including through legally binding international instruments, without in any way precluding, impeding or delaying international, regional or national actions, to further the implementation of the present resolution and the annexed Declaration, so as to promote the criminalization of corruption and bribery in international commercial transactions;

(b) To keep the issue of corruption and bribery in international commercial transactions under regular review;

(c) To promote the effective implementation of the present resolution;

5. Invites other bodies of the United Nations system, including the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, whose competence extends to this matter, to take action as appropriate within their mandates to promote the objectives of the present resolution and the Declaration;

6. Encourages private and public corporations, including transnational corporations, and individuals engaged in international commercial transactions to cooperate in the effective implementation of the Declaration;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to inform Member States, the relevant bodies and the specialized agencies of the United Nations system, and international, regional and non-governmental organizations, of the adoption of the present resolution, to encourage action towards making its provisions widely known and to promote its effective implementation;

8. Abo requests the Secretary-General to prepare a report, for consideration by the General Assembly at its fifty-third session, on the progress made towards implementation of the present resolution and the steps taken by Member States, international and regional organizations and other relevant institutions to combat corruption and bribery in international commercial transactions; on the results of the work in this regard undertaken by the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice and other bodies of the United Nations system; and on measures taken in accordance with the present resolution to promote social responsibility and the elimination of corruption and bribery in international commercial transactions;

9. Invites Member States and competent international, regional and non-governmental organizations to provide relevant information to assist the Secretary-General in preparing the above-mentioned report;

10. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of its fifty-third session, under an item entitled "Business and development", a review of the report of the Secretary-General concerning the implementation of the present resolution.

ANNEX

United Nations Declaration against Corruption and Bribery in International Commercial Transactions

The General Assembly,

Convinced that a stable and transparent environment for international commercial transactions in all countries is essential for the mobilization of investment, finance, technology, skills and other important resources across national borders, in order, inter alia, to promote economic and social development and environmental protection,

Recognizing the need to promote social responsibility and appropriate standards of ethics on the part of private and public corporations, including transnational corporations, and individuals engaged in international commercial transactions, inter alia, through observance of the laws and regulations of the countries in which they conduct business, and taking into account the impact of their activities on economic and social development and environmental protection,

Recognizing also that effective efforts at all levels to combat and avoid corruption and bribery in all countries are essential elements of an improved international business environment, that they enhance fairness and competitiveness in international commercial transactions and form a critical part of promoting transparent and accountable governance, economic and social development and environmental protection in all countries, and that such efforts are especially pressing in the increasingly competitive globalized international economy,

Solemnly proclaims the United Nations Declaration against Corruption and Bribery in International Commercial Transactions as set out below.

Member States, individually and through international and regional organizations, taking actions subject to each State's own constitution and fundamental legal principles and adopted pursuant to national laws and procedures, commit themselves:

1. To take effective and concrete action to combat all forms of corruption, bribery and related illicit practices in international commercial transactions, in particular to pursue effective enforcement of existing laws prohibiting bribery in international commercial transactions, to encourage the adoption of laws for those purposes where they do not exist, and to call upon private and public corporations, including transnational corporations, and individuals within their jurisdiction engaged in international commercial transactions to promote the objectives of the present Declaration;

2. To criminalize such bribery of foreign public officials in an effective and coordinated manner, but without in any way precluding, impeding or delaying international, regional or national actions to further the implementation of the present Declaration;

3. Bribery may include, inter alia, the following elements:

(a) The offer, promise or giving of any payment, gift or other advantage, directly or indirectly, by any private or public corporation, including a transnational corporation, or individual from a State to any public official or elected representative of another country as undue consideration for performing or refraining from the performance of that official's or representative's duties in connection with an international commercial transaction;

(b) The soliciting, demanding, accepting or receiving, directly or indirectly, by any public official or elected representative of a State from any private or public corporation, including a transnational corporation, or individual from another country of any payment, gift or other advantage, as undue consideration for performing or refraining from the performance of that official's or representative's duties in connection with an international commercial transaction;

4. To deny, in countries that do not already do so, the tax deductibility of bribes paid by any private or public corporation or individual of a State to any public official or elected representative of another country and, to that end, to examine their respective modalities for doing so;

5. To develop or maintain accounting standards and practices that improve the transparency of international commercial transactions, and that encourage private and public corporations, including transnational corporations, and individuals engaged in international commercial transactions to avoid and combat corruption, bribery and related illicit practices;

6. To develop or to encourage the development, as appropriate, of business codes, standards or best practices that prohibit corruption, bribery and related illicit practices in international commercial transactions;

7. To examine establishing illicit enrichment by public officials or elected representatives as an offence;

8. To cooperate and afford one another the greatest possible assistance in connection with criminal investigations and other legal proceedings brought in respect of corruption and bribery in international commercial transactions. Mutual assistance shall include, as far as permitted under national laws or as provided for in bilateral treaties or other applicable arrangements of the affected countries, and taking into account the need for confidentiality as appropriate:

(a) Production of documents and other information, taking of evidence and service of documents relevant to criminal investigations and other legal proceedings;

(b) Notice of the initiation and outcome of criminal proceedings concerning bribery in international commercial transactions to other States that may have jurisdiction over the same offence;

(c) Extradition proceedings where and as appropriate;

9. To take appropriate action to enhance cooperation to facilitate access to documents and records about transactions and about identities of persons engaged in bribery in international commercial transactions;

10. To ensure that bank secrecy provisions do not impede or hinder criminal investigations or other legal proceedings relating to corruption, bribery or related illicit practices in international commercial transactions, and that full cooperation is extended to Governments that seek information on such transactions;

11. Actions taken in furtherance of the present Declaration shall respect fully the national sovereignty and territorial jurisdiction of Member States, as well as the rights and obligations of Member States under existing treaties and international law, and shall be consistent with human rights and fundamental freedoms;

12. Member States agree that actions taken by them to establish jurisdiction over acts of bribery of foreign public officials in international commercial transactions shall be consistent with the principles of international law regarding the extraterritorial application of a State's laws.

UN standards and norms

In an April report [E/CN.15/1996/16 & Add.1-4] on UN standards and norms in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice, the Secretary-General highlighted the results of four surveys related to the implementation of the 1955 Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners [YUN 1955, p. 209], the 1979 Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials [YUN 1979, p. 779], and the 1990 Basic Principles on the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials [Eighth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, Havana, Cuba, 27 August-7 September: report prepared by the Secretariat, Sales No. E.91.IV.2.], the 1985 Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary [YUN 1985, p. 757] and the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power [YUN 1985, p. 743]. It provided an overview of activities aimed at the promotion of the use and application of existing UN standards and norms, and focused on ways to facilitate their use and dissemination, while improving cooperation and strengthening coordination with other relevant entities and institutions.

In the surveys, Member States provided information on their prison systems; their police systems, including regulations on when and how to use force and firearms; their programmes of victim assistance, redress and compensation; and their judiciaries.

The report concluded that UN standards, norms, guidelines and model treaties in crime prevention and criminal justice played an essential role in combating transnational and organized crime, in facilitating mutual assistance in criminal matters, and in creating a common basis for overall observance of human rights. The standards and norms could serve as a point of departure for national policies, and the international community had a collective responsibility to facilitate that process.

The Secretary-General proposed that the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice might wish to consider strengthening the role of the UN Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme in improving the effectiveness of UN standards and norms through various measures, including: publishing and disseminating the four reports; collecting the information into an electronic database and making it available on the World Wide Web; establishing a subgroup to make a more in-depth study of the information provided by Member States; and recommending that States establish, at the national level, mechanisms such as a coordinating body, charged with promoting the widest possible use and application of UN standards and norms, including through information exchange between relevant offices at all levels of Government.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/16.

United Nations standards and norms in crime prevention and criminal justice

The Economic and Social Council,

Reaffirming the importance of United Nations standards, norms and guidelines in crime prevention and criminal justice,

Stressing the need for further coordination and concerted action in translating those standards and norms into practice,

Recalling its resolution 1993/34 of 27 July 1993, in section III of which it requested the Secretary-General to commence a process of information-gathering to be undertaken by means of surveys, such as reporting systems, and contributions from other sources, including intergovernmental as well as non-governmental organizations and institutes,

Recalling also its resolution 1994/18 of 25 July 1994,

Recalling further its resolution 1995/13 of 24 July 1995, in which it requested the Secretary-General to develop questionnaires on the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (the Beijing Rules), the United Nations Guidelines for the Prevention of Juvenile Delinquency (the Riyadh Guidelines) and the United Nations Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty, to be considered by the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its fifth session, with a view to requesting the Secretary-General to submit a report on the replies to the Commission at a subsequent session,

1. Invites Governments to ensure the promotion and widest possible dissemination of United Nations standards and norms in crime prevention and criminal justice and to publish the Compendium of United Nations Standards and Norms in Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice in the languages of their countries;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, subject to the availability of extrabudgetary funds, to ensure the reprinting of the Compendium in sufficient numbers in all the official languages of the United Nations;

3. Reaffirms the important role of the United Nations network of institutes and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations in contributing to the effective use and application of United Nations standards and norms in crime prevention and criminal justice;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to widely disseminate, via the World Wide Web database facility of the United Nations Crime and Justice Information Network, the texts of the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, the Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials, together with the Basic Principles for the Use of Force and Firearms by Law Enforcement Officials, the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power and the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, as well as the reports of the Secretary-General on the use and application of those United Nations standards in crime prevention and criminal justice, and to make the information on which the reports are based available upon request;

5. Urges Governments that have not yet replied to the questionnaires on the four standards in crime prevention and criminal justice to submit their replies to the Secretary-General as soon as possible, with a view to enabling him to make the database more comprehensive;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its seventh session a report on the use and application of the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (the Beijing Rules), the United Nations Guidelines for the Prevention of Juvenile Delinquency (the Riyadh Guidelines) and the United Nations Rules for the Protection of Juveniles Deprived of their Liberty;

7. Also requests the Secretary-General to prepare a report, incorporating comments sought from Governments, on the desirability of establishing an inter-sessional working group to examine the reports on the use and application of United Nations standards and norms in crime prevention and criminal justice in more detail, as well as the information on which the reports were based, and to recommend to the Commission possible further action to assist Member States in translating those instruments into practice;

8. Decides that the Commission should consider the report of the Secretary-General on the desirability of establishing an inter-sessional working group at its sixth session;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to promote the use and application of United Nations standards and norms in crime prevention and criminal justice, inter alia, by providing advisory services and technical cooperation to Member States on request, including assistance to Member States in criminal justice and law reform, organization of training for law enforcement and criminal justice personnel and support to the administration and management of penal and penitentiary systems, thus contributing to the upgrading of their efficiency and capabilities;

10. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue to coordinate the activities related to the use and application of United Nations standards and norms in crime prevention and criminal justice between the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division of the Secretariat and other relevant United Nations entities, such as the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and the United Nations International Drug Control Programme, in order to heighten their efficacy and avoid overlapping in the implementation of their programmes.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/16
23 July 1996 Meeting 45 Adopted without vote
Draft by Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice
(E/1996/30 & Corr.1); agenda item 5 (g).

UN minimum rules for administration of justice

The Secretary-General reported in April [E/CN.15/1996/18] on the development of UN minimum rules for the administration of criminal justice, providing comments received from 48 States and six institutes on the advisability and specific content of the draft minimum rules. The draft rules had been prepared by an expert commission at working sessions held between 1990 and 1992, and were submitted by Argentina to the United Nations Office in Vienna and noted by the Economic and Social Council in 1994 [YUN 1994, p. 1156].

Most of the replies indicated an interest in maintaining the effort to draft minimum rules for the administration of criminal justice. Despite the marked differences that existed between procedural systems such as the inquisitorial and adversarial systems, and also between the basis of procedural rules constituted either by laws or by common law traditions, a degree of uniformity had been demonstrated among the procedural problems, as well as in the reduced range of approaches to solving them. This measure of uniformity could make it possible to achieve sufficient common ground to establish minimum mandatory rules or, at least, to formulate recommendations. The replies received did not indicate strong support for establishing new international courts.

The Commission, in a decision of 31 May [E/1996/30 (dec. 5/101)], requested the Secretary-General to continue to solicit comments from Member States on the draft minimum rules, and to seek comments from all Member States on the utility of promulgating the draft rules, the utility of convening an expert group to review them and specific areas in which such a group should consider possible changes. It also asked him to report in 1997.

Death penalty

In March [E/CN.15/1996/19], the Secretary-General reported on capital punishment and implementation of the safeguards guaranteeing the protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty (see also PART TWO, Chapter II). The report consolidated the fifth quinquennial report on the subject issued in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 747] with additional replies received on the subject. It reviewed the use of and trends in capital punishment, including the implementation of safeguards, during the period from 1989 to 1993.

While noting that the report was based on replies received from just over a third of Member States, the Secretary-General said that an unprecedented number of countries had abolished or suspended the use of the death penalty. Since 1989, 25 countries had abolished the death penalty, 23 of them for all crimes whether in peacetime or in war. The death penalty was more prevalent in Europe, including Eastern Europe, and in South America than elsewhere. Capital punishment had been re-introduced in four countries since 1989, and several countries had expanded the scope of the death penalty as a reaction to perceived upsurges in serious crime and national crises affecting internal security.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

The Economic and Social Council, on 23 July, adopted resolution 1996/15.

Safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolutions 2857(XXVI) of 20 December 1971 and 32/61 of 8 December 1977 and Economic and Social Council resolutions 1745(LIV) of 16 May 1973, 1930(LVIII) of 6 May 1975, 1990/51 of 24 July 1990 and 1995/57 of 28 July 1995,

Recalling also article 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,

Recalling further the safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty, annexed to its resolution 1984/50 of 25 May 1984, and its resolution 1989/64 of 24 May 1989 on the implementation of the safeguards,

Taking note of the report of the Secretary-General on capital punishment and implementation of the safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty,

Recalling the Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions, set forth in the annex to its resolution 1989/65 of 24 May 1989 and endorsed by the General Assembly in its resolution 44/162 of 15 December 1989, and taking note of the recommendations of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions concerning the death penalty contained in his report to the Commission on Human Rights at its fifty-second session,

Taking note of Security Council resolution 827(1993) of 25 May 1993, in which the Security Council decided to establish the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 and to adopt the statute of the International Tribunal annexed to the report of the Secretary-General pursuant to paragraph 2 of Security Council resolution 808(1993) of 22 February 1993, and taking note also of Security Council resolution 955(1994) of 8 November 1994, in which the Security Council decided to establish the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States between 1 January and 31 December 1994 and to adopt the statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda annexed to that resolution,

1. Notes that, during the period covered by the report of the Secretary-General on capital punishment and implementation of the safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty, an increasing number of countries abolished the death penalty and others followed a policy reducing the number of capital offences and declared that they had not sentenced any offender to that penalty, while still others retained it and a few reintroduced it;

2. Calls upon Member States in which the death penalty has not been abolished to effectively apply the safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty, which state that capital punishment may be imposed for only the most serious crimes, it being understood that their scope should not go beyond intentional crimes with lethal or other extremely grave consequences;

3. Encourages Member States in which the death penalty has not been abolished to ensure that each defendant facing a possible death sentence is given all guarantees to ensure a fair trial, as contained in article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and bearing in mind the Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, the Basic Principles on the Role of Lawyers, the Guidelines on the Role of Prosecutors, the Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment, and the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners;

4. Also encourages Member States in which the death penalty has not been abolished to ensure that defendants who do not sufficiently understand the language used in court are fully informed, by way of interpretation or translation, of all the charges against them and the content of the relevant evidence deliberated in court;

5. Calls upon Member States in which the death penalty may be carried out to allow adequate time for the preparation of appeals to a court of higher jurisdiction and for the completion of appeal proceedings, as well as petitions for clemency, in order to effectively apply rules 5 and 8 of the safeguards guaranteeing protection of the rights of those facing the death penalty;

6. Also calls upon Member States in which the death penalty may be carried out to ensure that officials involved in decisions to carry out an execution are fully informed of the status of appeals and petitions for clemency of the prisoner in question;

7. Urges Member States in which the death penalty may be carried out to effectively apply the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, in order to keep to a minimum the suffering of prisoners under sentence of death and to avoid any exacerbation of such suffering.

Other crime prevention and criminal justice issues

Victims of crime and abuse of power

The Secretary-General, in a February report [E/CN.15/1996/167 Add.5] to the Commission, transmitted the recommendations of the Expert Group Meeting on Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power in the International Setting (Vienna, 18-22 December 1995).

The Expert Group, in the first of two recommendations, stated its belief that wide-ranging measures, including the adoption of legislation, needed to be taken at the national and international levels to improve the access to justice and fair treatment, reparation, including restitution, compensation and satisfaction, and physical, medical and social assistance, to realize the promise held out by the 1985 Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power [YUN 1985, p. 743]. The Expert Group adopted the Integrated Plan of Action on Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power; the Model Project on the Establishment of Victim Services in the Context of Sustainable Development; the Promising Practices Resource (establishing a database to include examples of laws, services, training curricula and manuals for practitioners); and the Scheme for International Crisis Response Teams for Emergency Assistance, all of which were annexed to the Group's recommendation. Also annexed to the recommendation was the outline of a draft manual on the use and application of the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power.

By the second recommendation, the Group adopted the Principles Guaranteeing the Rights and Interests of Victims in the Proceedings of the Proposed International Criminal Court, and recommended that they be reflected in the statute and rules of procedure of the proposed international criminal court (see PART FOUR, Chapter III).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/14.

Use and application of the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power, adopted, on the recommendation of the Seventh United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, by the General Assembly in its resolution 40/34 of 29 November 1985,

Recalling also its resolution 1995/27 of 24 July 1995, section IV, paragraph 32, in which it requested the Secretary-General to seek the views of Member States and relevant organizations on the advisability of preparing a manual on the use and application of the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power,

Noting with appreciation the deliberations and work of the Expert Group Meeting on Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power in the International Setting, held at Vienna from 18 to 22 December 1995, and its recommendations,

Noting the usefulness of the manuals already published and disseminated by the Secretariat under the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme,

1. Recognizes the desirability of preparing a draft manual or draft manuals on the use and application of the Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power for submission to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its sixth session, on the understanding that the Secretary-General will seek the views of Member States on the draft manual or draft manuals and will report on those views to the Commission at its seventh session;

2. Recommends that this work be undertaken, taking into account the different legal systems and practices of each State, by expert group meetings to be convened with extrabudgetary funds in cooperation with the institutes comprising the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme network, the World Society of Victimology and other entities, and with the support of the Secretary-General;

3. Welcomes the offers by the Governments of the Netherlands and the United States of America to host the expert group meetings;

4. Recommends that the expert group meetings explore the feasibility of establishing a database on promising practices and legislation on victim-related issues, as a supplement to the manual or manuals;

5. Decides that the use and application of the Declaration should be considered by the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice as a topic under an appropriate agenda item;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to bring to the attention of the Preparatory Committee for the Establishment of an International Criminal Court the potential applicability of the basic principles contained in the Declaration.

23 July 1996 Meeting 45 Adopted without vote

Draft by Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice (E/1996/30 & Corr.1); agenda item 5 (g).

Measures to regulate firearms

The Secretary-General, in response to Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/27 [YUN 1995, p. 1141], presented replies received from Member States in response to his request for information on measures to regulate firearms [E/CN.15/1996/14 & Corr.1]. Member States reported on such issues as criminal cases, accidents and suicides involving firearms; transnational illicit trafficking in firearms; national legislation and regulations on firearms; public awareness campaigns and opinion polls on firearms regulation; and views on the possible preparation of a draft declaration concerning firearms regulation.

The Secretary-General concluded that for the first time, the UN Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme was able to garner some initial information on the subject from the standpoint of crime prevention and public safety. The report indicated how diverse, complex and fragmentary statistics on the question of firearms regulation were, and that there was a need to improve firearms statistics.

The Secretary-General suggested that the Commission might wish to recommend the continuation of the project on firearms regulation, subject to the availability of extrabudgetary funds; encourage Member States to provide firearms data to the Secretariat; broaden the scope of the project on firearms regulation; recommend the translation of replies from survey respondents from English into other official UN languages; and encourage States to initiate or intensify regional and subregional cooperation.

Other action. An advisory group of the Commission (Vienna, 18-20 December 1995) offered recommendations on ways of carrying out a project to design guidelines and a questionnaire on firearms regulation. The project was funded in large part by Japan, while Canada also contributed funds and substantive expertise. The advisory group provisionally identified 50 Member States to be approached with a request to provide requisite data. A steering committee (Vienna, 2-3 May 1996) reviewed the progress of the project and prepared an agenda for an ad hoc expert group to analyse and report on replies to the questionnaire.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

The Economic and Social Council, on 24 July, adopted resolution 1996/28.

Follow-up action on firearms regulation for the purpose of crime prevention and public safety

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling resolution 9 of 7 May 1995 of the Ninth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders,

Recalling also its resolution 1995/27 of 24 July 1995,

Recalling further General Assembly resolution 50/145 of 21 December 1995,

Mindful of the need for effective implementation of those resolutions,

Taking note with satisfaction of the report of the Secretary-General on measures to regulate firearms,

1. Welcomes the progress made by the Secretary-General in undertaking the study on regulating firearms in response to its resolution 1995/27, section IV.A, drawing upon the work of an advisory group;

2. Endorses the questionnaire and guidelines for the preparation of the survey and country reports on firearms regulation issues presented by the Secretary-General;

3. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to collect information and consult with Member States on the implementation of national measures to regulate firearms in accordance with its resolution 1995/27, section IV, paragraph 10;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to collect information and consult with Member States, as appropriate, on the basis of the above-mentioned questionnaire and guidelines, and to analyse the information obtained in order to contribute to the preparation of additional survey and country reports as requested in paragraph 3 above;

5. Approves the work plan established on the basis of the proposals presented by the representative of the Secretary-General to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its fifth session, and requests the Secretary-General to pursue his study in accordance with the work plan;

6. Again invites all United Nations organs, bodies and specialized agencies and intergovernmental and other organizations active in the field of regulating firearms to provide the Secretary-General with views and proposals on their possible contributions towards the full implementation of Ninth Congress resolution 9;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to submit the report and the recommendations requested in its resolution 1995/27, section IV, paragraph 12, to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its sixth session;

8. Decides that the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice should include in its agenda for its sixth session the item entitled "Measures to regulate firearms".

Statistics and computerization

The Secretary-General, in an April report [E/CN.15/1996/13 & Corr.1], submitted to the Commission a draft action plan on international cooperation and assistance with regard to statistical and computerized applications in the management of the criminal justice system. Fourteen States provided observations regarding their national computerization infrastructure, in response to the Secretary-General's request for information on existing and planned projects in the management of the criminal justice system.

The report reviewed the development of the computerized United Nations Crime and Justice Information Network (UNCJIN), which provided a means to facilitate the communication and exchange of information and data among members of the network. Initiated in 1988, UNCJIN activities in the area of computerization of criminal justice information had been carried out with extrabudgetary funds. Among the elements for an action plan in technical cooperation, the report suggested needs assessment; an evaluation component for technical cooperation projects; education and training of decision makers, managers, technicians, analysts and end-users of the computer application; and the maintenance of rosters of experts, organizations and resource materials.

Multilateral cooperation could be improved by the establishment of an international group of experts to oversee the technical cooperation programme, which had been requested by the General Assembly in 1990 [res. 45/109]. Financial constraints had inhibited efforts to set up such a group. A number of surveys and databases had been established, the report said, but the low rate of participation of developing countries had reduced their comparative value. Further work was required to improve the data collection instruments, the methods of administration and the quality (validity and reliability) of the data. The Secretary-General suggested that the Commission might ask Member States to make resources available for experts to undertake needs assessment missions. States could also aid data collection efforts by offering facilities for training criminal justice statisticians from developing countries in the processing, publication and dissemination of criminal justice data, or by providing in-kind contributions. The Commission might recommend to the Secretariat ways and means of allocating new resources to update, expand and maintain directories and rosters of experts.

Other action. A training seminar on "UNCJIN: providing information to and from developing countries" was held in Seoul in September, at the offer of the Republic of Korea. The course covered information management of the criminal justice system and provided a basis for the preparation of a manual on the collection and dissemination of crime and justice data through computerization and electronic networking.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/11.

International cooperation and assistance in the management of the criminal justice system: computerization of criminal justice operations and the development, analysis and policy use of crime and criminal justice information

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling General Assembly resolution 46/152 of 18 December 1991 on the creation of an effective United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme, in the annex to which it is stipulated that the general goals of the programme should be to contribute to, inter alia, more efficient and effective administration of criminal justice, with due respect for the human rights of all those affected by crime and all those involved in the criminal justice system, and in paragraph 5 of which the Assembly decided that the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme should provide States with practical assistance so as to prove their response to crime,

Recalling also General Assembly resolution 45/109 of 14 December 1990 on the computerization of criminal justice, in which the Assembly requested the Secretary-General to establish, in cooperation with the network of institutes for the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders affiliated with the United Nations, a technical cooperation programme for the computerization of criminal justice information in order to offer training, assess needs and formulate and execute specific projects,

Recalling further its resolution 1992/22 of 30 July 1992, section I, in which it reaffirmed the request of the General Assembly to the Secretary-General to strengthen the Programme as a whole, so as to enable it to further develop clearing-house facilities in relation to crime prevention and criminal justice issues, including the capacity to match the needs for training with the opportunities available to meet them,

Taking note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General on the draft action plan on international cooperation and assistance with regard to statistical and computerized applications in the management of the criminal justice system,

Mindful that the development of a more structured framework is critical to the delivery of the activities described in the above-mentioned report of the Secretary-General and that an international technical cooperation infrastructure is important in facilitating the access of Member States to relevant resources and information regarding existing programmes and projects,

Emphasizing the common problems faced by all Member States in the administration and computerization of criminal justice,

Emphasizing also that developing countries, countries with economies in transition and developed countries, by enhancing their capacity to exchange information at the international level, may benefit from international cooperation in the computerization of criminal justice information,

Acknowledging the importance of the United Nations Crime and Justice Information Network and the United Nations On-line Crime and Justice Clearing House in the development of the information-sharing capacity of the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme undertaken through collaborative efforts of the institutes comprising the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme network,

1. Urges Member States, governmental, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations and the private sector to assist the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the institutes comprising the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme network, in strengthening the technical cooperation capacity of the network by:

(a) Establishing an advisory steering group, administered by the Secretary-General in close coordination with the institutes comprising the Programme network, including assistance from the administration of the United Nations Crime and Justice Information Network and the United Nations On-line Crime and Justice Clearing House, drawing upon extrabudgetary resources, which would be responsible for:

- (i) Reviewing and assessing, at the request of Member States, their national experiences in the computerization of criminal justice operations and criminal justice information systems;
- (ii) Giving advice to the Secretary-General on the establishment of the technical cooperation programme;

- (iii) Giving advice to the Secretary-General on the activities of the technical cooperation programme;
- (iv) Informing Member States of funds and services that might be available from various donors in the governmental, intergovernmental, non-governmental and private sectors;
- (v) Informing such donors of the needs of Member States for assistance;
- (vi) Consulting with relevant experts in the field of criminal justice;
- (vii) Assisting Member States, at their request in developing criteria and mechanisms for the establishment of a platform for the exchange of information between distinct entities able to provide information and experience useful for the management of the criminal justice system;
- (b) Identifying a standing pool of experts for the practical implementation of technical cooperation activities, in particular for:
  - (i) Assessing needs in both the computerization of criminal justice operations and the development of criminal justice information systems;
  - (ii) Designing and coordinating training programmes in both the computerization of criminal justice operations and the development of criminal justice information systems;
  - (iii) Assisting in the design, development and implementation of actual computerization projects;
  - (iv) Providing other needed expert advice as requested;
  - (c) Actively participating in the United Nations Crime and Justice Information Network and the United Nations On-line Crime and Justice Clearing House through:
    - (i) Adopting the conceptual design of the Clearing House, that builds upon the Information Network, as a model for international sharing and dissemination of information and consulting with other participating Member States and United Nations bodies on information exchange policies, procedures and standards;
    - (ii) Establishing national points of contact for electronic communications in relevant government agencies;
    - (iii) Making national public information in the area of crime prevention and criminal justice available on the Internet via linkages with the Information Network and the Clearing House;

2. Requests the Secretary-General, in concert with experts from interested States and the institutes comprising the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme network, to conduct, using existing resources of the regular budget of the United Nations, a survey of national capacities for the collection of crime statistics, as a supplement to the Fifth United Nations Survey of Crime Trends and Operations of Criminal Justice Systems, using as a draft guide the form annexed to the present resolution;

3. Calls on Member States to contribute to the survey of national capacities by providing the necessary information in a timely manner;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to keep the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice informed about the progress made;

5. Calls on Member States to assist the Secretary-General in funding the establishment of the advisory steering group, in identifying the standing pool of experts and in funding the activities called for in the present resolution.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/11

UN crime prevention institutes

UN African crime prevention institute

As requested in General Assembly resolution 50/147 [YUN 1995, p. 1161], the Secretary-General, in an October report [A/51/450], highlighted issues on the status of the United Nations African Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders (UNAFRI), its operations, staffing, programme activities and funding, and provided strategic perspectives on its functions.

Among its training activities, UNAFRI cooperated with the UN Interregional Crime and Justice Research Institute (UNICRI), the Commonwealth Secretariat and the University of Botswana in organizing a regional training workshop on "Crime in southern Africa: towards the year 2000" (Gaborone, Botswana, 19-21 June). It approved two training activities for 1996, depending on the availability of funds—a training seminar on environmental crime and a ministerial workshop on the development and implementation of joint strategies to deal with transnational criminality in Africa.

UNAFRI continued its study on the resettlement of street children, despite severe financial limitations. A follow-up to the study was a training workshop on crime prevention in urban areas. The Institute continued to identify, analyse and publish trends and patterns of criminality, indicating, on the basis of studies undertaken in various African countries, the negative consequences of crime on the sustainable development of African countries, particularly when considering economic and organized crime in its transnational dimensions. Three research activities were approved, subject to the availability of funds: continuation of the African survey on crime, victimization and criminal justice administration; further studies on the resettlement of street children; and continuation of a study on prisoners' social rehabilitation. The Institute participated in a number of international, regional, subregional and national meetings and seminars, including the Pan African Conference on Youth and Development (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 18-22 March), organized by the Organization of African Unity, and an international conference on crime and justice in the 1990s (Pretoria, South Africa, 3-5 July).

The Institute was funded by contributions from its member States, a grant from the United Nations within its overall appropriation of its programme budget and income received from rental of the Institute's premises and facilities. Of the 27 members of the Institute, only one country had paid its assessed contribution during the financial year ending December 1995, and three others paid by July 1996. UNAFRI's survival depended on the willingness of member States to pay their assessed financial contributions on a regular basis and on time.

UNAFRI's Governing Board originally approved a budget for 1995-1996 in the amount of $606,414, but the budget for 1996 was revised to $235,505 to reflect the assured funds, including the 1996 allotment of $81,900 from the approved 1996-1997 UN grant and the savings of $153,605 from previous contributions of member States. The uncertainty regarding the resources available for the operational budget forced UNAFRI to terminate the services of three Professional staff in April 1996. In the meantime, the Institute had to employ consultants to execute the funded substantive activities. The Secretary-General noted that since UNDP funding ended in October 1994, the Institute had had no reliable source of funding. In addition, the expected collections of financial contributions from member States continued to be negligible. According to the Secretary-General, if no immediate action was taken to reverse the crisis, the financial situation would force the cessation of the operations of the Institute and of the implementation of other approved activities. Considering the priority that African Governments were giving to achieving economic growth and sustainable development, and considering also the challenge of growing criminality, it was imperative that all measures being taken to achieve sustainable development were linked to crime prevention and criminal justice. Consequently, as part of its contribution to sustainable development, the international community was requested to give support to UNAFRI to ensure its survival.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/61.

United Nations African Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 50/147 of 21 December 1995,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General,

1. Commends the efforts of the United Nations African Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders to promote and coordinate regional technical cooperation activities related to crime prevention and criminal justice systems in Africa;

2. Reiterates the need for the strengthening of the Institute's capacity to support a national mechanism for crime prevention and criminal justice of African countries, in view of the contribution that the Institute can make to the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme;

3. Requests the Secretary-General to intensify efforts and to mobilize all relevant entities of the United Nations system to provide necessary financial and technical support to the Institute to enable it to fulfil its mandate;

4. Also requests the Secretary-General to make concrete proposals on strengthening the programmes and activities of the Institute and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session;

5. Further requests the Secretary-General to enhance regional cooperation, coordination and collaboration in the fight against crime, especially in its transnational dimension, which could not be adequately dealt with by national action alone;

6. Appeals to all Member States and non-governmental organizations to adopt concrete practical measures to support the Institute in the development of the requisite capacity and in the elaboration and implementation of programmes and activities aimed at strengthening crime prevention and criminal justice systems in Africa;

7. Urges the States members of the Institute to make every possible effort to meet their obligations to the Institute.

General Assembly resolution 51/61

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/51/610) without vote, 31 October (meeting 20); draft by Burundi on behalf of Group of African States (A/C.3/51/L.6), orally revised; agenda item 101.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 5-10, 12, 16-18, 20; plenary 82.

Training and research centre

By resolution 1995/27 [YUN 1995, p. 1138], the Economic and Social Council decided to establish an open-ended intergovernmental working group during the fifth (1996) session of the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, to study a proposal for establishing a regional centre, to be based in Cairo, Egypt, for training and research in crime prevention and criminal justice for the Mediterranean States. By a note of 8 March [E/CN.15/1996/9 & Corr.1], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Commission a note verbale communicated by Egypt, requesting that consideration of the matter be deferred. The Secretary-General noted that the proposed organization of work and timetable of the fifth session of the Commission were prepared on the assumption that the Commission would agree to Egypt's request, and consequently the establishment of the intergovernmental working group was deferred.

Preparations for the Tenth UN Congress

In 1996, the Secretariat continued preparations for the Tenth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, to be held in 2000. In initiating the preparations for the Congress, the Secretary-General requested Governments to submit their views on its theme, format, agenda items and workshop topics. He submitted to the Commission an April report [E/CN.15.1996/15] on proposals for the preparations of the Congress and summarized ideas put forward by responding States.

The main objective of the new format of the 1995 Ninth Congress [YUN 1995, p. 1132] had been to maximize its practical and scientific value through problem-oriented workshops, demonstrations of different approaches to facilitate technical assistance and cooperation, and special sessions devoted to the priority issues of direct interest to all countries, the Secretary-General said. As the preparatory body for the congresses, the Commission was called upon to determine whether the same organization and substantive arrangements would be adequate for the next congress, or whether additional arrangements should be explored. He suggested that the Commission start considering substantive proposals made by States, with the aim of agreeing on preliminary organization and substantive arrangements.

The Commission, having considered the report, adopted a resolution [E/1996/30 (res. 5/1)] inviting States that had not yet done so to respond to the Secretary-General's inquiry. It also requested the Secretary-General to report on the views received from States, relevant agencies and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations on the theme, format, agenda items, workshop topics and possible venue of the Tenth Congress.

UN research and training institutes

UN Institute for Training and Research

The Acting Executive Director of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research

(UNITAR) in October reported to the General Assembly [A/51/14 (Parts I & II)] that, between 1 July 1994 and 30 June 1996, some 130 training programmes and two distance-learning courses were organized throughout the world, benefiting more than 7,000 participants. During the reporting period, the restructuring of UNITAR—with its headquarters moved from New York to Geneva—had been completed and steps taken to implement the decision of the Board of Trustees [YUN 1995, p. 1163] to open a liaison office in New York. The Board, which holds two annual sessions, indicated that improved dissemination of information was necessary to strengthen further the credibility of UNITAR, which could lead to a more effective mobilization of financial and political support. The Board discussed the successful conduct of some recent training activities, particularly those relating to international law, preventive diplomacy, environmental conventions and financial management.

UNITAR provided different types of training: skills-building, policy-setting, information-gathering, awareness-raising and strategic planning. Training programmes fell into two main areas: multilateral diplomacy and related disciplines, and economic and social development. Activities in multilateral diplomacy included fellowships in international law, preventive diplomacy and peacemaking, and multilateral diplomacy and international affairs. Activities in economic and social development concentrated on environment and development, external debt and financial management and disaster relief management.

While the Institute's research programmes per se had been discontinued, research on and for training, and development of training materials (training packages, distance-learning materials, workbooks with software, video training materials), had been completed, and various training books in the fields of international affairs, preventive diplomacy and peacekeeping operations had been published.

Efforts were made to strengthen inter-agency cooperation with UNDP, the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) and the secretariats of the UN environmental conventions (see PART THREE, Chapter VII). Cooperative links had been established or reinforced with national and regional training institutions, in particular in developing countries.

UN Staff College

The Secretary-General, in response to General Assembly resolution 50/121 [YUN 1995, p. 1164], reported in October [A/51/554] on possible ways to strengthen UNITAR training activities and to better define its role. He envisaged that the training activities of UNITAR and the United Nations system-wide Staff College (UNSC) project would benefit from association. Building on UN system training initiated by the International Labour Organization (ILO) Turin Centre in Italy, the UNSC project was established in 1996 as a key component in support of the Secretary-General's reform package. He inaugurated the Staff College as a facility to play an important role in assuring that UN staff learn together, understand each other, move forward together and build an esprit de corps, in order to advance a process of change and enhance collaboration with Member States and partners. In the Secretary-General's view, association between UNITAR and UNSC would yield mutual benefits in strengthening and rationalizing respective curriculum development in areas of shared interest and activity, and enhance the cost-effectiveness of programme development and delivery. Joint training and learning opportunities for government representatives and UN system staff would build operational partnerships. Programme content would reflect matters of shared interest, while adjusting to meet the specific needs of respective target programme participants.

The Secretary-General had pursued over the previous year avenues for increased cooperation between UNITAR and UNSC, including participation by UNITAR in UNSC curriculum development workshops. Priority areas identified for such cooperation included: peacekeeping and peacemaking; the provision of humanitarian assistance and management of complex emergencies; and the management of development activities.

JIU report. In November, the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly a report by the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) entitled "Feasibility study on the relocation of UNITAR to the Turin Centre" [A/51/642]. The objective of the study was to highlight the potential advantages and disadvantages, both financial and non-financial, of either maintaining UNITAR in Geneva or relocating it to Turin to take advantage of the system-wide facilities available at the training centre of ILO in Turin; and to assess whether the relocation was compatible with the objective of rationalizing the UN system within the framework of the efforts under way, taking into account the financial autonomy of UNITAR. Following the gathering of views and information, JIU concluded that there was a general consensus on the need to find ways to coordinate UN system training activities in order to use resources more rationally, avoid duplication and consolidate activities. UNSC should be regarded as part of the Secretary-General's efforts for better coordination and a potential regrouping of UN system training activities. There were many issues to be considered in assessing the nature of closer cooperation between UNITAR and UNSC as training entities within the UN system. In the meantime, JIU suggested that UNITAR should continue strengthening its cooperation with UNSC through practical measures in order to take advantage of UNITAR's experience and expertise in training. Pending further elaboration through experience of the UNSC project, and as a critical input into the thinking on regrouping training institutions within the UN system, JIU suggested that the Assembly request a comprehensive study of UN training institutions and activities, which would take stock of all institutions providing training and propose practical, concrete measures to coordinate those activities.

Secretary-General's comments. Also in November [A/51/642/Add.11, the Secretary-General submitted his comments on the JIU report. He stated that there was a need to enhance possibilities for integrated cost-effective training in areas of system-wide concern. He considered that a Staff College, with a curriculum to be developed in consultation with organizations of the system, had significant potential, not only to enhance substantive knowledge and technical skills, but also to convey a system-wide vision of goals, strategies and opportunities for coordinated action. A Staff College would not duplicate, but complement, the capabilities of UN organizations by offering multidisciplinary and cross-sectoral training with a system-wide perspective.

In that context, the Secretary-General considered that there was a natural partnership between UNITAR and the Staff College which could engender mutually beneficial cooperation in terms of curriculum development and could enhance cost-effectiveness of programme development and delivery. The Secretary-General agreed that UNITAR and UNSC should strengthen cooperation through practical measures, particularly in the areas of peacekeeping and peacemaking, humanitarian assistance and management of complex emergencies, and the management of development activities. The Secretary-General remarked that, should the Assembly so wish, he would pursue the JIU proposal that a comprehensive study of the UN training institutions and activities be conducted.

The UNITAR Board of Trustees decided to postpone any decision on the possibility of relocating the Institute.

Financial report

UNITAR was funded through voluntary contributions and received no subsidies from the UN regular budget.

The report of the United Nations Board of Auditors for the year ending 31 December 1995 [A/51/5/Add.4], based on financial statements prepared by UNITAR, indicated that $315,714 was paid by Governments and various donors as contributions to the General Fund for 1995 and payment of outstanding pledges. In addition, $372,914 was received as programme support income and $42,851 as other income, bringing the total income to $731,479, as compared with $797,844 in 1994. Expenditures for the year amounted to $843,064, resulting in a shortfall of income over expenditure of $111,585. The prior period adjustment of $29,265 reduced the shortfall to $82,320. The reserve and fund balance at the end of the year amounted to $550,555.

A total of $3,065,996 was received as special purpose grants. Total income in that fund was $3,287,553 and total expenditure $3,301,115, resulting in a shortfall of $13,562 for the year. At the end of the year, the fund balance amounted to $1,659,009. The amount allocated by UNDP was $455,851, and total expenditure amounted to $455,851, including programme support costs of $31,830.

The Board of Auditors, noting the substantial deficit in 1995, expressed concern about the significant fall in the level of voluntary donations and increase in administrative expenditure compared with 1994 (to $843,064 from $595,977 in 1994). It recommended that UNITAR implement more effective controls over its expenditure, particularly staff costs, which had increased to $593,828 from $444,164 in 1994. The Board also recommended that: disputed charges transferred to UNITAR from UN Headquarters be examined and cleared promptly; more effective control be exercised over project expenditure and sufficient donor funds located for financial commitments; UNITAR liaise with the UN Office at Geneva and UNDP headquarters to clear outstanding inter-office vouchers and advances and to establish prompter procedures for reporting expenditure made by UNDP on behalf of UNITAR; discussions be held with major donors so that projects could be funded in advance; and UNITAR improve its planning of staff expenditure to ensure that sufficient funds were available to meet staff costs.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/188.

United Nations Institute for Training and Research

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 47/227 of 8 April 1993, 48/207 of 21 December 1993, 49/125 of 19 December 1994 and 50/121 of 20 December 1995,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General, the report of the Acting Executive Director of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research on the activities of the Institute and the report of the Joint Inspection Unit,

Noting with interest the steps being taken to complete the restructuring process of the Institute, and welcoming the recent progress made by the Institute in its various programmes and activities, including the improved cooperation that has been established with other organizations of the United Nations system and with regional and national institutions,

Expressing its appreciation to the Governments and private institutions that have made or pledged financial and other contributions to the Institute,

Welcoming the opening of the Institute's liaison office in New York following the recommendation of the Board of Trustees of the Institute and the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly,

Reiterating that the funding of training programmes offered at the specific request of Member States or departments and units of the Organization and other organs of the United Nations system and the specialized agencies should be arranged by the requesting parties,

Recognizing that training activities should be accorded a larger and more visible role in support of the management of international affairs and in the execution of the economic and social development programmes of the United Nations system,

1. Reaffirms the relevance of the United Nations Institute for Training and Research, particularly in view of the growing importance of training within the United Nations and the training requirements of all Member States, and the pertinence of research activities related to training undertaken by the Institute within its mandate;

2. Invites the Institute to strengthen its cooperation with other United Nations institutes and relevant national, regional and international institutes;

3. Requests that relevant measures be taken by the Board of Trustees of the Institute with respect to the regularization of the post of Executive Director of the Institute;

4. Renews its appeal to all Governments and to private institutions that have not yet contributed financially or otherwise to the Institute to give it their generous financial and other support, and urges the States that interrupted their voluntary contributions to consider resuming them in the light of the progress made in the restructuring and revitalization of the Institute;

5. Takes note of the report of the Joint Inspection Unit on the relocation of the Institute, and the subsequent decision of the Board of Trustees of the Institute to postpone any decision on the possibility of relocating the Institute;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to explore in consultation with the Executive Director of the Institute, as well as with the heads of United Nations programmes and funds, ways and modalities of cooperation, in order to better define the role of the Institute in the fields of training, research and methodology, assessment and capacity-building within the United Nations system, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session;

7. Requests the Joint Inspection Unit, in close cooperation with the Institute and relevant United Nations bodies, to prepare a study, as recommended by the Unit in its report, on the training institution programmes and activities of the United Nations system, and to submit a report thereon for consideration by the General Assembly at its fifty-second session.

General Assembly resolution 51/188

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/607) without vote, 2 December (meeting 38); 21-nation draft (A/C.2/51/L.27/Rev.1), orally amended; agenda item 99.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 7, 18, 28, 35, 38; plenary 86.

United Nations University

UNU activities

The 1996 activities of the United Nations University (UNU), as described in a report of the UNU Council to the Economic and Social Council [E/1997/7], were concentrated on global problems in four programme areas: peace and governance; environment; science and technology; and development. Its academic work was done through a decentralized network of scholars and institutions. UNU had five research and training centres—the World Institute for Development Economics Research in Helsinki, Finland; the Institute for New Technologies in Maastricht, Netherlands; the International Institute for Software Technology in Macau; the Institute for Natural Resources in Africa in Accra, Ghana; and the Institute for Advanced Studies in Tokyo, Japan, which opened in April. UNU established in October an International Network on Water, Environment and Health in Hamilton, Canada; it continued its International Leadership Academy in Amman, Jordan, and its Programme for Biotechnology in Latin America and the Caribbean in Caracas, Venezuela. In addition, numerous institutions throughout the world collaborated with UNU.

The UNU postgraduate education programme was aimed at strengthening developing countries' academic institutions, enabling them to conduct high-quality research and train future scholars. Over 1,450 fellows had completed UNU training and fellowship programmes since they began in 1976. During the year, 98 UNU fellows finished their studies and another 96 began training.

Among its dissemination activities, UNU publicized conferences, promoted new publications and disseminated information, both traditionally and electronically. The UNU home page was launched in March, linking all UNU research and training centre/programmes' websites. It was updated regularly with information on the UNU structure, work, academic activities and publications. During the year, 13 edited or single-author books were published independently under the UNU Press imprint. Another eight titles were issued through cooperation-publication arrangements or as translations by other publishers. Some 10,400 books were sold in 1996, resulting in net sales revenues of approximately $175,000. Another 1,000 books were given to depository libraries located primarily in developing countries.

The Secretary-General, in response to General Assembly resolution 49/124 [YUN 1994, p. 1140], reported in September 1996 [A/51/324] on innovative measures to improve communication and interaction between UNU and other bodies in the UN system to ensure the integration of UNU work into all relevant activities of the system. He pointed out that UNU, including its Council, had stressed enhanced relations with the United Nations as a key policy objective, while preserving the autonomy of UNU within the framework of the United Nations. As the academic arm of the UN system, UNU worked with a number of organizations of the system in the conduct of its research, postgraduate training and dissemination activities. UNU had been closely involved in substantive work in support of major UN conferences, undertaking special policy studies and research that were made available to conference preparatory processes and to the conferences themselves.

UNU initiated a series of research programmes related to Agenda 21, as well as the Agenda for Peace and an agenda for development, and African recovery and development. It also launched a major research initiative on the United Nations in the twenty-first century at a symposium held at United Nations Headquarters from 21 to 22 November. The objective of the five-year research project was to explore and suggest models for international organizations, especially the United Nations, that would best serve human needs in the twenty-first century. Specific topics selected for study included States and sovereignty; global citizenship; regionalism and international organizations; and the international civil service. The project was expected to lead to the formulation of recommendations and policy suggestions.

With Canadian support, the University was establishing an international network on water, environment and health that would address critical issues that linked water to development and human health, especially in developing countries.

Its initial priorities would be educational and targeted training programmes.

Consultations between the Rector and staff of UNU and United Nations officials intensified, especially in the context of the preparations for the third UNU Medium-Term Perspective and biennial budgets. The University also endeavoured to enhance the policy content and relevance of its studies, while seeking to maintain academic excellence.

Cooperation between the University and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) was significantly reinforced, including the promotion of an interdisciplinary approach to programme conception and implementation. A number of initiatives, such as the management of social transformations, the culture of peace, the interdisciplinary programme in environmental population and preventive education, were launched. Several joint UNU and UNESCO activities were undertaken in the areas of education, science, social studies, culture and communication.

The Secretary-General stated that the involvement of UNU at various levels of UN activity—intergovernmental and inter-agency—was deep and becoming more clearly defined and institutionalized. Further efforts would be made through the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) and its subsidiary machinery, as well as through the meetings of senior officials in the economic and social fields, to strengthen the structures and modalities for communication, interaction and integration that already existed.

ACC action. At its second regular session (New York, 25-26 October), ACC agreed that UNU should be invited to be represented in the consultative and inter-agency committees comprising the subsidiary machinery of ACC. In addition, there would be periodic consultations between the Rector and ACC members to identify research topics for inclusion in UNU programme to maximize its contribution to the work of the UN system.

UNU Council

The UNU Council, at its forty-third session (Santiago, Chile, 2-6 December) [E/1997/7], focused on the University's role at the turn of the millennium and the global problems it would address. It adopted the third medium-term perspective (MTP in/1996-2001), and considered specific programmes and projects for the 1996-1997 biennium. MTPIII provided a six-year academic and institutional framework for UNU's work from 1996 to 2001 and called for its work to find solutions to global problems in the four programme areas of peace and governance, environment, science and technology, and development.

The Council also considered programme and institutional development issues, reinvestment of income in the University's Endowment Fund and the 1996 annual report, and approved a list of candidates for the position of University Rector. The Secretary-General, with the concurrence of the UNESCO Director-General, would appoint one of the candidates as Rector.

On 9 February, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1996/205 B, authorized the Secretary-General to transmit directly to the General Assembly the 1995 report of the UNU Council.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/187.

United Nations University

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming its previous resolutions on the United Nations University,

Having considered the report of the Council of the United Nations University and the report of the Secretary-General on the work of the University,

Expressing its deep appreciation for the voluntary contributions made to date by Governments and other public and private entities in support of the University,

Noting with appreciation the efforts made by the Rector of the United Nations University in intensifying his interaction with the United Nations Secretariat in the context of preparing for the third medium-term perspective,

Noting also with appreciation the efforts made by the Rector in initiating a new series of research programmes,

1. Welcomes the completion of the second medium-term perspective, 1990-1995, of the United Nations University and the ongoing work of formulating the third medium-term perspective for the period 1996-2001, being considered by the Council of the University;

2. Takes note with appreciation of the steps taken by the Council and the Rector of the United Nations University to promote the work and the visibility of the University, particularly among Member States, the United Nations and its agencies, through such measures as organizing a series of public forums for the purpose of disseminating the results of its research, and requests them to further intensify such efforts;

3. Requests the Council and the Rector to continue intensifying their efforts to improve the University's interaction and communication with other bodies of the United Nations system, and to continue their efforts to avoid the duplication of work within the system;

4. Also requests the Council and the Rector to enhance further coordination and complementarity between the University's programmes and its research and training centres;

5. Requests the Secretary-General, in this connection, to continue his consideration of innovative measures to improve the interaction and communication between the University and other bodies of the United Nations system and to ensure the integration of the work of the University into all relevant activities of the system, taking into account General Assembly resolution 49/124 of 19 December 1994, so that the United Nations system may draw more extensively upon the work of the University, and to submit a report thereon to the Assembly at its fifty-third session;

6. Welcomes the efforts of the Secretary-General to allow for the greater participation of the University in the work of the United Nations, and invites him to continue to encourage the participation, as appropriate, of the University in the activities of the Administrative Committee on Coordination and its subsidiary machinery, as well as through other existing structures and modalities for communication, interaction and integration;

7. Requests the Council and the Rector, taking into account resolution 49/124, to continue to make further efforts to ensure the efficiency and economy of the activities of the University, as well as its financial transparency and accountability, and to intensify efforts to augment its Endowment Fund and to find innovative ways to mobilize operating contributions and other programme and project support;

8. Invites the international community to make voluntary contributions to the University.

General Assembly resolution 51/187

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/607) without vote, 2 December (meeting 38); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.20), based on informal consultations on 20-nation draft (A/C.2/51/L.3); agenda item 99. Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 7, 18, 28, 35, 38; plenary 86.

Chapter X

Women

In 1996, the United Nations launched a system-wide effort to begin implementation of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action, adopted at the Fourth (1995) World Conference on Women held in Beijing. The Platform for Action comprised a comprehensive plan designed to accelerate implementation of the 1985 Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women and promote the goals of equality, development and peace for all women. Together with the Beijing Declaration, it set out an agenda for women's empowerment which established a basic group of priority actions to be carried out by the year 2000. The Beijing Conference built upon the results of three previous United Nations conferences on women—in Mexico City in 1975, in Copenhagen in 1980 and in Nairobi in 1985.

The General Assembly in 1996 addressed Conference follow-up as well as issues related to United Nations mechanisms to advance the status of women and protect their human rights. Some current issues involved the girl child, violence against migrant workers, and traffic in women and girls. The Assembly also took action related to the situation of women in Palestine (see also PART ONE, Chapter VI).

The Economic and Social Council adopted a new multi-year work programme for the Commission on the Status of Women to facilitate Conference follow-up, and it endorsed a revised draft system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women, for the period from 1996 to 2001. It also adopted resolutions on the work of the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women and improvement of the status of women in the UN Secretariat (see also PART FIVE, Chapter III).

The Commission on the Status of Women, at its fortieth session (New York, 11-22 March), reviewed its mandate and work in relation to its role in implementing the outcome of the Beijing Conference. The 45-member Commission also addressed such issues as women and poverty; women and the media; child and dependant care; violence against women migrant workers; traffic in women and girls; women and children in armed conflicts; women and the Middle East peace process; mainstreaming the human rights of women; and elaboration of a draft optional protocol to the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women.

In 1996, the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, at its fifteenth session (New York, 15 January-2 February), examined reports from nine States parties to the 1979 Convention.

Implementation of Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action

Critical areas of concern

The Commission on the Status of Women, at its fortieth session (New York, 11-22 March) [E/1996/26], considered implementation of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action [YUN 1995, p. 1170], adopted at the 1995 Fourth World Conference on Women, which embodied the commitment of the international community to advance the goals of equality, development and peace.

Regarding strategic objectives of the 12 critical areas of concern contained in the Platform for Action, the Commission took action on three of the areas: poverty, women and the media, and child and dependant care, which fell under the broader category of economic matters. The remaining critical areas of concern dealt with education, health, violence against women, armed conflict, power-sharing and decision-making, mechanisms to promote the advancement of women, human rights, the environment and the girl child.

As to poverty, the Commission, by a resolution [E/1996/26 (res. 40/9)], recognized the central role that women played in the eradication of poverty, and stressed the need for their full and equal participation in formulating and implementing policies that took into account the gender perspective and that empowered women to be full partners in development. In addition to the recommendations contained in the Platform, the Commission presented specific measures to address the feminization of poverty, including education, training and retraining policies for women and girls; legislative and administrative reforms to give women access to economic resources; the participation of women in decision-making; national strategies to promote employment and self-employment; policies to ensure adequate economic and social protection during unemployment, ill health, maternity, child-bearing, widowhood and old age, and shared responsibilities for childcare; public expenditures to promote women's economic opportunities and resources to address their basic social, educational and health needs; gender-based methodologies and research to address the contribution of women to the economy and the feminization of poverty; analysis of macroeconomic and microeconomic policies; and the reduction of military expenditures to increase resources for economic and social development. The Commission recommended that a UN system-wide effort be undertaken to review existing indicators, strengthen gender impact analysis of the design and implementation of economic reform programmes, develop complementary, qualitative assessments, and standardize measures and promote their implementation. The Secretary-General was asked to report on the implementation of the Commission's resolution within the context of his report on action envisaged to be taken in preparation for the first United Nations Decade for the Eradication of Poverty (1997-2006), proclaimed by the General Assembly in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 844, GA res. 50/107].

Regarding women and the media, the Commission adopted an agreed conclusion [E/1996/26 (1996/2)] and a resolution [res. 40/7]. The agreed conclusion contained proposals dealing with respect for the human rights of women, including freedom of expression, and the media; self-regulatory mechanisms to eliminate gender-biased programming and promote non-stereotypical images of women, and self-regulation for public and private sector industries; media education; the creation of a positive environment to promote measures towards achieving a balanced portrayal of women and girls; and strengthening the role of women in global communication networks. In its resolution, the Commission acknowledged that women journalists, because of their profession and gender, were an easy and favourite target for violent acts, intolerance and terrorist attacks. Condemning the murders and acts of violence and terrorism committed against women journalists, the Commission appealed to the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the international community to intensify efforts to combat terrorism and all forms of intolerance and violence, and all violations of women's human rights.

In another agreed conclusion [1996/3], on child and dependant care, including sharing work and family responsibilities, the Commission suggested action to reduce the burden of family responsibilities on women. It recommended recognizing economic, social and demographic changes; increasing the role of men in family responsibilities; changing attitudes and stereotypes; adapting the legal system to rebalance the sharing of family responsibilities between men and women; adopting and promoting a family support policy and encouraging reconciliation of family and professional life for women and men; developing research and information exchange; and promoting change through international co-operation.

Reports of Secretary-General. The Commission considered two reports of the Secretary-General, on the elimination of stereotyping in the mass media [E/CN.6/1996/4] and on child and dependant care, including the sharing of work and family responsibilities [E/CN.6/1996/5].

The Secretary-General discussed changes in the portrayal of women in the media. A few improvements were observed in the increased numbers of female characters, female experts and news sources, and in the decreased segregation of women into traditional stereotyped roles. However, data showed the persistence of highly stereotyped portrayals of women and gender relations in advertising. While more women were active in politics, a study on the portrayal of women leaders in the media concluded that they were less visible than their male counterparts in the news. In addition, stories about influential women focused on such exogenous factors as hairstyles and family situations. The representation in the media of violence against women, particularly sexual violence, had increased tremendously. The Secretary-General considered measures taken to achieve a more balanced portrayal, building on the recommendations contained in the Platform of Action. Those measures included codes of conduct and self-regulatory measures in the media; employment of women in the media; organizations and networks to advocate concerns and act on gender issues in the media; gender-sensitive programmes and curricula for journalism and communication studies; legislation and regulation to combat stereotyped portrayals of women; independent monitoring and lobbying; media education for producers and audiences; and incentives such as awards to those representing women fairly in the media. The Secretary-General described UN activities and concluded by defining a series of issues that needed further clarification.

Regarding child and dependant care, including sharing of work and family responsibilities, the Secretary-General presented economic, demographic and social factors affecting the sharing of responsibilities, which consisted of changes in women's and men's economic roles, the decrease in family and household network support, the rising proportion of female-headed households, the neglect by males to fulfil their responsibilities because of lack of resources and the unequal use of women's and men's time, notably the fact that women worked much longer hours than men.

The Secretary-General reviewed the effects of the double burden placed on women, namely their increasing economic responsibilities and the maintenance of their reproductive activities; measures to reduce the double burden, including redistributing family responsibilities; promoting changes in the labour market, such as leave provisions for family needs (maternity, paternity, parental); and instituting working time arrangements (part-time work). He discussed the provision of child-care services and of elder care, and support to persons with disabilities. The Secretary-General concluded by proposing areas for further study, including changes in attitudes regarding gender, changes in family and labour legislation, securing childcare, and technologies to reduce the burden of household tasks.

System-wide plan

The Commission on the Status of Women considered the proposed system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women covering the period 1996-2001, the last five years of the period designated for the implementation of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women, adopted in 1985 by the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the UN Decade for Women [YUN 1985, p. 937]. The medium-term plan, proposed by the Secretariat in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 1035], was revised in 1996 in accordance with a 1993 Economic and Social Council request [YUN 1993, p. 1036] that the plan be revised following the adoption of the Platform for Action and the second review and appraisal of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies. The revised draft plan was approved by the Ad Hoc Inter-Agency Meeting on Women (New York, 6-8 March) and transmitted to the Administrative Committee on Coordination (ACC) for approval. It represented an expression of the commitment of the participating entities to strive to collaborate in implementing the Platform for Action and was intended to reflect system-wide efforts for the advancement of women; provide a basis for synergies between various agencies; and maximize the system's comparative advantage and value added in each of the critical areas of concern. The Commission in March [res. 40/10] adopted a series of comments which focused on general guidelines for the plan, as well as on activities related to women and poverty, human rights of women, health, the media, environment, the girl child, education and training, women and the economy, women's rights in armed conflict, violence against women, power and decision-making, and institutional arrangements and mechanisms. The Commission recommended the adoption of the revised draft plan by the Economic and Social Council, taking into account its comments.

CPC action. In June, the Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC) [E/AC.51/1996/L.5/Add.34] adopted a series of conclusions and recommendations on the medium-term plan. They addressed the UN system-wide mainstreaming of a gender perspective; the implementation of the plan; and the role of civil society. CPC made observations on women and poverty; women and health; violence against women; women and the economy; women in power and decision-making; the human rights of women; and women and the media. It expressed support for the need to develop further methods for accountability and evaluation of progress in implementing the Platform for Action and eliminating gender discrimination.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 25 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/34.

System-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women, 1996-2001

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1988/59 of 27 July 1988, by which it requested the Secretary-General, in his capacity as Chairman of the Administrative Committee on Coordination, to initiate the formulation of a system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women for the period 1996-2001,

Also recalling its resolution 1993/16 of 27 July 1993, by which it endorsed the system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women for the period 1996-2001 as a general framework for the coordination of system-wide efforts, and requested the Secretary-General to revise the draft plan after the Platform for Action and the results of the second review and appraisal of the implementation of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women had been formulated and adopted by the Fourth World Conference on Women,

Considering its own role in overseeing system-wide coordination in the implementation of the Platform for Action adopted at the Fourth World Conference on Women,

Bearing in mind that the General Assembly, in its resolution 50/203 of 22 December 1995, invited the Council to consider devoting one high-level segment, one coordination segment and one operational activities segment, before the year 2000, to the advancement of women,

Having considered the report of the Secretary-General, submitted in his capacity as Chairman of the Administrative Committee for Coordination, containing the proposed revised system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women, 1996-2001, as well as the comments adopted thereon by the Commission on the Status of Women, as contained in its resolution 40/10 of 22 March 1996, and the annex to that resolution, and by the Committee for Programme and Coordination,

Welcoming the detailed comments adopted by the Commission on the Status of Women and the Committee for Programme and Coordination on the revised system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women, 1996-2001,

Welcoming also the establishment by the Administrative Committee on Coordination of the Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality as a means for enhancing the cooperation and coordination of the United Nations system in the implementation of the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women, gender-related recommendations emanating from other recent United Nations conferences and summits and the revised plan itself, and in support of mainstreaming a gender perspective in the work of the United Nations system,

Bearing in mind its resolution 1996/6 of 22 July 1996 on the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women,

1. Endorses the revised system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women, 1996-2001, taking into account the comments of the Commission on the Status of Women contained in its resolution 40/10 and the annex thereto, and the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee for Programme and Coordination;

2. Requests all organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to implement the revised plan in the light of the general and specific comments adopted thereon by the Commission on the Status of Women and the Committee for Programme and Coordination;

3. Invites the Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality of the Administrative Committee on Coordination to use the revised plan and the comments on it as a basis for monitoring increasing collaboration in and cost-effective approaches to United Nations system activities for the advancement and empowerment of women, including the assessment of methods for mainstreaming a gender perspective in all United Nations activities, ensuring accountability and carrying out impact analyses of gender-sensitive programmes and policies, and the preparation of performance indicators, outputs and other benchmarks for measuring system-wide progress in the implementation of the plan, and also invites the Committee to inform the Commission on the Status of Women, and through it the Economic and Social Council, of progress in its work for the purpose of system-wide coordination;

4. Decides to undertake, in 1998, a comprehensive mid-term review of the implementation of the revised plan as a basis for future programming and coordination of activities for the advancement and empowerment of women by the United Nations system, including a review of the progress made in mainstreaming a gender perspective in all activities of the United Nations system;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council, through the Commission on the Status of Women at its forty-second session, a progress report on the implementation of the revised plan;

6. Requests the Secretary-General, in his capacity as Chairman of the Administrative Committee on Coordination, to formulate a new system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women to cover the period 2002-2005, to submit a new draft plan to the Council at its substantive session of 2000 in order to provide guidance for the medium-term plans of the individual organizations of the United Nations system and to submit the draft plan to the Commission on the Status of Women at its forty-fourth session, for comments.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/34

25 July 1996 Meeting 50 Adopted without vote

Draft by Costa Rica, for Group of 77 and China, and 24 other States (E/1996/L.37); agenda item 5 (e).

Meeting numbers. ESC 43, 44, 47, 50.

Mainstreaming gender concerns

The Commission considered a March report [E/CN.6/1996/7] of the Secretary-General on improving the status of women in the Secretariat, as requested in General Assembly resolution 50/164 [YUN 1995, p. 1415]. The Secretary-General updated, in an annex, changes in statistical data that had taken place between June and 31 December 1995. The overall level of representation within the global Secretariat rose 0.5 per cent, falling only 0.4 per cent short of the 35 per cent target set by the Assembly in 1990 [GA res. 45/125, 14 Dec. 1990, & GA res. 45/239 C, 21 Dec. 1990]. In comparison with data contained in his 1995 report, the number of women promoted within the Professional and higher levels had generally declined. There was a small increase in the percentage of women appointed to lower and middle Professional levels.

The Secretary-General stated that his strategic plan of action for the improvement of the status of women in the Secretariat (1995-2000) [YUN 1994, p. 1383] had received the full support of the Assembly and ACC. The strategy's main goal was to achieve gender equality by the beginning of the twenty-first century. Moreover, it sought to improve the quality of the work life of women working in the Secretariat, so as to create the conditions of equality of participation of both men and women mandated under the Charter of the United Nations. The Secretariat had received a grant to finance the development of a questionnaire to gauge the degree to which harassment existed in the Secretariat. Work on the survey was expected to begin in early March.

The Secretary-General stated that his decision to designate one of the Special Advisers in his office to act as his Adviser on gender issues was an important measure designed to assist him in ensuring the mainstreaming of gender concerns system-wide and in facilitating a coordinated follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women (see also PART FIVE, Chapter III).

Follow-up mechanisms

The Commission on the Status of Women considered a February report of the Secretary-General [E/CN.6/1996/2], in which he discussed the Commission's mandate and stated that it could be assumed that from 1996 through 2000 the main focus of the Commission would be follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women and implementation of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action. With a view to improving the work of the Commission, the Secretary-General suggested a revised structure of its agenda. The proposed agenda items dealt with: reviewing implementation of the strategic objectives and actions in the Platform's critical areas of concern; issues arising from the discussions of the Economic and Social Council or other intergovernmental bodies; women's human rights; and mainstreaming in UN organizations. The Secretary-General presented a multi-year (1996-2000) work plan for the Commission and reviewed its organization of work.

Concerning its methods of work for dealing with the Platform's implementation, the Commission brought to the attention of the Council an agreed conclusion [1996/1] suggesting the practice of inviting experts, formation of expert panels, and meetings for dialogue with organizations within the UN system and civil society and among governmental delegations. The Commission stated that it should strengthen cooperation with relevant UN bodies, monitor progress on the system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women, and make relevant documents available to other commissions and relevant bodies. It encouraged the voluntary presentation of national information and encouraged States to submit national reports by the year 2000 for the comprehensive quinquennial review and appraisal of the implementation of the Platform.

In other action, the Commission, by a March decision, [dec. 40/101] took note of reports of the Secretary-General relating to follow-up to the Conference.

Enhancing UN capacity

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 50/203 [YUN 1995, p. 1173], the Secretary-General submitted in March a report [E/CN.6/1996/3] on ways to enhance the capacity of the Organization and of the UN system to support the follow-up to the Conference in the most integrated and effective way, including human and financial needs.

The Secretary-General discussed methods to mainstream a gender perspective in the work of the UN system. Regarding financial arrangements, he stated that efforts would continue to be made to attract support from a variety of sources for the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) and the International Training and Research Institute for the Advancement of Women (INSTRAW) and other voluntary funds and programmes for their work on gender issues and for the work of the specialized agencies. Concerning regional-level follow-up, the Secretary-General noted that numerous initiatives had been taken in response to his request that the Executive Secretaries of the regional commissions assist in coordinating activities for the follow-up at the regional level to major UN conferences. With respect to the status of women within the United Nations, steps had been taken to integrate the measures in the Secretary-General's strategic plan of action for the improvement of the status of women in the Secretariat (1995-2000) [YUN 1994, p. 1383] into the overall human resources strategy for the Organization.

In a July report [E/1996/82], the Secretary-General updated information contained in his previous report by indicating developments related to the implementation of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action in intergovernmental forums reporting to the Economic and Social Council and among the organizations of the UN system on an inter-agency basis.

The intergovernmental bodies covered included the Commission on the Status of Women, the Commission on Population and Development, the Commission on Human Rights, the Commission on Sustainable Development, the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, UNIFEM, INSTRAW and the regional commissions.

At the level of the UN system, steps to support the follow-up to the Conference were taken through the revised system-wide medium term plan on the advancement of women (1996-2001), the April decision of ACC to establish an inter-agency committee on women (see below) and the work of three other inter-agency task forces on basic social services, employment and sustainable livelihoods.

On 22 July, by decision 1996/239, the Economic and Social Council took note of the Secretary-General's report.

In a further report [A/51/322] on the subject, submitted in September, the Secretary-General described developments in intergovernmental forums and by organizations of the UN system. In addition, he reviewed progress in establishing national implementation plans and noted that currently there were no guidelines for their preparation. A subregional conference was scheduled to promote the formulation of the plans in countries of central and eastern Europe, organized by the Division for the Advancement of Women, jointly with the UNDP Regional Bureau for Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States, in co-operation with the Economic Commission for Europe and the Government of Romania. The Secretary-General concluded with a description of factors related to the capacity of the UN system in terms of human and financial requirements and proposed a number of possible additional steps.

Inter-Agency Committee on Women

At its first regular session of 1996 (Nairobi, Kenya, 28-30 April) [ACC/1996/4], ACC decided to establish the Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality to address, system-wide, all aspects of the implementation of the Platform for Action, as well as gender-related recommendations emanating from other international conferences.

Headed by the Senior Advisor to the Secretary-General on Gender Issues, appointed in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1173], the new Committee held its first session (New York, 22-23 October) [ACC/1996/22]. The Committee put in place a short-term and long-term programme of work, and decided to review, at its second session in March 1997, the issues of women in the peace process and in conflict resolution, and violence against women. At subsequent sessions, it was scheduled to discuss gender training and the implementation of the system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women (1996-2001).

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/6.

Follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women

The Economic and Social Council,

Welcoming the outcome of the Fourth World Conference on Women and the adoption of the Platform for Action of the Conference,

Bearing in mind Economic and Social Council resolutions 11(II) of 21 June 1946 and 48(IV) of 29 March

1947, by which the Council established the Commission on the Status of Women and defined its terms of reference, and 1987/22 of 26 May 1987, by which the Council expanded the mandate of the Commission,

Taking into account agreed conclusions 1995/1, approved by the Council on 28 July 1995, as well as General Assembly resolution 50/203 of 22 December 1995 on the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women and full implementation of the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action of the Conference, in which the Assembly invited the Economic and Social Council to review and strengthen the mandate of the Commission,

Acknowledging the decision of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women to add to its reporting guidelines an invitation to States parties to include in their report to the Committee information on measures taken to implement the Platform for Action, in order to monitor effectively, within its mandate, the rights guaranteed under the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women,

Framework for the functioning of the Commission on the Status of Women

Recalling that the General Assembly, in resolution 50/203, decided that the Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on the Status of Women, in accordance with their respective mandates and in accordance with Assembly resolution 48/162 of 20 December 1993 and other relevant resolutions, should constitute a three-tiered intergovernmental mechanism that would play the primary role in the overall policy-making and follow-up and in coordinating the implementation and monitoring of the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women, reaffirming the need for a coordinated follow-up to and implementation of the results of major international conferences in the economic, social and related fields,

Convinced that the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women should be undertaken on the basis of an integrated approach to the advancement of women within the framework of a coordinated follow-up to and implementation of the results of major international conferences in the economic, social and related fields, as well as the overall responsibilities of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council,

1. Decides that the Commission on the Status of Women shall have a catalytic role in mainstreaming a gender perspective in policies and programmes;

2. Decides also that the inter-agency committee on the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women, established by the Administrative Committee on Coordination, shall inform the Commission and the Economic and Social Council of the progress of its work, for the purpose of system-wide coordination, and that a gender perspective shall also be fully integrated in the work of all thematic task forces established by the Administrative Committee on Coordination;

3. Decides further that the Platform for Action of the Conference should be implemented through the work of all the bodies and organizations of the United Nations system during the period 1995-2000, and notes that the institutions of the United Nations especially devoted to the advancement of women, including the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women and the United Nations Development Fund for Women, are in the process of reviewing their programmes of work in the light of the Platform for Action and its implementation;

4. Decides, in view of the traditional importance of non-governmental organizations in the advancement of women, that such organizations should be encouraged to participate in the work of the Commission and in the monitoring and implementation process related to the Conference to the maximum extent possible, and requests the Secretary-General to make appropriate arrangements to ensure full utilization of existing channels of communication with non-governmental organizations in order to facilitate broad-based participation and dissemination of information;

5. Decides also, in recognition of the valuable contribution of non-governmental organizations to the Fourth World Conference on Women, that the Council and its Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations will review the applications of those non-governmental organizations under Council resolution 1296(XLIV) of 23 May 1968 as expeditiously as possible, and decides further that, prior to the forty-first session of the Commission on the Status of Women, the Council will take a decision on the participation of the non-governmental organizations that were accredited to the Conference and that have applied for consultative status, in Conference follow-up and in the work of the Commission, without prejudice to the work of the Open-ended Working Group on the Review of Arrangements for Consultation with Non-Governmental Organizations;

6. Requests the Secretary-General urgently to draw the attention of non-governmental organizations accredited to the Fourth World Conference on Women to the provisions of the present resolution and to the process established under Council resolution 1296(XLIV);

II

Terms of reference

1. Confirms the existing mandate of the Commission on the Status of Women as set out in Economic and Social Council resolutions 11(II), 48(IV) and 1987/22, bearing in mind that the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women builds upon the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women;

2. Decides that the Commission shall:

(a) Assist the Council in monitoring, reviewing and appraising progress achieved and problems encountered in the implementation of the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action of the Conference at all levels and shall advise the Council thereon;

(b) Continue to ensure support for mainstreaming a gender perspective in United Nations activities and develop further its catalytic role in this regard in other areas;

(c) Identify issues where United Nations system-wide coordination needs to be improved in order to assist the Council in its coordination function;

(d) Identify emerging issues, trends and new approaches to issues affecting the situation of women or equality between women and men that require urgent consideration and make substantive recommendations thereon;

(e) Maintain and enhance public awareness and support for the implementation of the Platform for Action;

III

Documentation

1. Requests that all United Nations documentation be kept concise, clear, analytical and timely with a focus on relevant issues and in accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 1987/24 of 26 May 1987 and agreed conclusions 1995/1, approved by the Council on 28 July 1995, that reports contain recommendations for action, indicate the actors and be issued in all official languages, in accordance with the rules of the United Nations, and that other methods of reporting, such as oral reports, also be explored;

2. Requests also that the relevant reports of the meetings of inter-agency mechanisms established by the Secretary-General be transmitted for information to the Commission on the Status of Women to ensure co-ordination, collaboration and coherence in the implementation of the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women;

3. Decides that requests for reports of the Secretary-General should be limited to the minimum strictly necessary and that the Secretariat should use information and data already provided by Governments to the maximum extent possible, avoiding duplication of requests to Governments for such information;

4. Decides also that voluntary submission of national information, for example national action plans or national reports by Governments, should be encouraged;

5. Requests that the following reports be prepared under item 3, entitled "Follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women", of the agenda set out in section IV, paragraph 3, of the present resolution, bearing in mind the need to promote integrated reporting:

(a) Report of the Secretary-General on the measures taken and the progress achieved in mainstreaming a gender perspective within the United Nations system (annually);

(b) Analytical report of the Secretary-General on the thematic issues before the Commission in accordance with the multi-year work programme, including, as far as possible, progress made in national implementation, based on available data and statistics (annually);

(c) Report on emerging issues under item 3 (b) of the agenda set out in section IV, paragraph 3, of the present resolution, as appropriate, at the request of the Commission or its Bureau;

(d) Synthesized report on implementation plans of Governments and the United Nations system, based, inter alia, on national action plans and any other sources of information already available in the United Nations system (in 1998);

(e) Mid-term review of the system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women, 1996-2001 (in 1998);

(f) Report on the implementation of the Platform for Action of the Conference, on the basis of national reports, taking into account the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women (in 2000);

IV Work programme

1. Adopts a multi-year work programme for a focused and thematic approach, culminating in a quinquennial review and appraisal of the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women: the work programme, inter alia, will provide a framework to assess the progress achieved in the implementation of the Platform for Action and will be in line with the co-ordinated follow-up to conferences;

2. Decides that the work of the Commission in relation to the work programme shall be closely related to the relevant provisions of the Platform for Action of the Conference, with a view to ensuring the effective implementation of the Platform for Action;

3. Decides that the agenda for the Commission shall consist of the following items:

1. Election of officers.
2. Adoption of the agenda and other organizational matters.
3. Follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women:
  - (a) Review of mainstreaming in organizations of the United Nations system;

Regional dimension

Recalling the important role played by regional preparatory conferences in the preparations for the Fourth World Conference on Women and that plans and programmes of action were adopted that served as essential inputs to the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action of the Conference,

1. Recommends that the regional follow-up and monitoring of the regional platforms and programmes of action should be utilized as inputs for the review and appraisal of the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action of the Conference;

2. Recommends also that the Council consider how best to integrate the inputs of regional commissions into the overall monitoring and follow-up to the Platform for Action of the Conference.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/6

22 July 1996

Meeting 43

Adopted without vote

Draft by Commission on Status of Women (E/1996/26); agenda item 5 (e).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/69.

Follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women and full implementation of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 50/42 of 8 December 1995 and 50/203 of 22 December 1995,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolutions 1996/6 of 22 July 1996 on the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women and 1996/34 of 25 July 1996 on the system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women, 1996-2001,

Reaffirming the importance of the outcome of the previous World Conferences on Women, held at Mexico City in 1975, at Copenhagen in 1980 and at Nairobi in 1985,

Recognizing the significance of the outcome of the Fourth World Conference on Women, held at Beijing in 1995, to make a real change for the empowerment of women and thus to the fulfilment of the goals adopted in the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women,

Deeply convinced that the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action, adopted at the Fourth World Conference on Women, are important contributions to the advancement of women worldwide and must be translated into effective action by all States, the United Nations system and other organizations concerned, as well as by non-governmental organizations,

Recognizing that the implementation of the Platform for Action rests primarily at the national level, that Governments, non-governmental organizations and public and private institutions should be involved in the implementation process and that national mechanisms also have an important role to play,

Bearing in mind that promotion of international co-operation is essential for the effective implementation of the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action,

Recognizing that the implementation of the Platform for Action requires commitment from Governments and the international community,

Recognizing also the important role played by States, the United Nations, the regional commissions and other international organizations, as well as by non-governmental organizations and women's organizations, in the preparatory process of the Conference and the importance of their involvement in the implementation of the Platform for Action,

Taking into account the fact that the follow-up to the Conference should be undertaken on the basis of an integrated approach to the advancement of women within the framework of a coordinated follow-up to and implementation of the results of the major international conferences in the economic, social and related fields, as well as the overall responsibilities of the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council,

Reaffirming its decision that the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on the Status of Women, in accordance with their respective mandates and with General Assembly resolution 48/162 of 20 December 1993 and other relevant resolutions, will constitute a three-tiered intergovernmental mechanism that will play the primary role in the overall policy-making and follow-up and in coordinating the implementation and monitoring of the Platform for Action, and reaffirming the need for a coordinated follow-up to and implementation of the results of major international conferences in the economic, social and related fields,

Reaffirming that the Commission on the Status of Women has a central role as a functional commission assisting the Economic and Social Council in the monitoring, within the United Nations system, of the implementation of the Platform for Action and in advising the Council thereon and should therefore be strengthened,

Reaffirming also that the Economic and Social Council should continue to oversee system-wide coordination in the implementation of the Platform for Action and ensure overall coordination of the follow-up to and implementation of the results of all United Nations international conferences in the economic, social and related fields and report thereon to the General Assembly,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the outcome of the Fourth World Conference on Women;

2. Takes note of initiatives and actions taken by Governments and the international community towards the implementation of the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action adopted by the Conference;

3. Calls once again upon States, the United Nations system and all other actors to implement the Platform for Action, in particular by promoting an active and visible policy of mainstreaming a gender perspective at all levels, including in the design, monitoring and evaluation of all policies, as appropriate, in order to ensure effective implementation of the Platform;

4. Welcomes the contribution of the report of the Secretary-General in translating the concept of mainstreaming into practical action, including the ongoing work to develop methodologies to facilitate the application of a gender perspective into all policies and programmes throughout the United Nations system;

5. Calls for intensified efforts at the international level to integrate the equal status and all human rights of women into the mainstream of United Nations system-wide activity and to address these issues regularly and systematically throughout the relevant United Nations bodies and mechanisms;

6. Stresses that Governments have the primary responsibility for implementing the Platform for Action, and reaffirms that Governments should continue to commit themselves at the highest political level to its implementation and should take a leading role in coordinating, monitoring and assessing progress in the advancement of women;

7. Calls upon States, with the assistance of non-governmental organizations, to continue to disseminate widely the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action;

8. Welcomes the progress made by Governments thus far towards meeting the commitment to developing, by 1996, comprehensive implementation strategies or plans of action, including time-bound targets and benchmarks for monitoring, and urges all Governments that have not yet done so to undertake efforts in this regard, in order to implement fully the Platform for Action;

9. Also welcomes the contribution made to the elaboration of guidelines for national strategies or plans of action by regional and subregional conferences on the implementation of the Platform for Action, such as the Outline of a Model National Action Plan by the Subregional Conference of Senior Governmental Experts held at Bucharest from 12 to 14 September 1996, which may assist other Governments, too, in meeting this commitment, and in this respect encourages the support of, inter alia, the Division for the Advancement of Women of the Secretariat;

10. Urges Governments that have not yet done so to establish or strengthen appropriate national machineries for the advancement of women at the highest political level, appropriate intra- and interministerial procedures and staffing and other institutions with the mandate and capacity to broaden women's participation and integrate gender analysis into policies and programmes, so as to ensure the full implementation of the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action, and takes note of regional initiatives for strengthening national machineries;

11. Encourages non-governmental organizations to contribute to the design and implementation of these strategies or national plans of action in addition to their own programmes that complement government efforts;

12. Calls upon Governments to invite and encourage the active support and participation of a broad and diverse range of other institutional actors, including legislative bodies, academic and research institutions, professional associations, trade unions, local community groups and the media, as well as financial and non-profit organizations, for the implementation of the Platform for Action;

13. Recognizes the importance attached to the regional monitoring of the global and regional platforms for action by regional commissions and other subregional or regional structures, within their mandates, in consultation with Governments, and the necessity of promoting cooperation among Governments of the same region in this respect;

14. Invites the Economic and Social Council, in order to facilitate the regional implementation, monitoring and evaluation process, to consider reviewing the institutional capacity of the United Nations regional commissions, in accordance with paragraph 302 of the Platform for Action, and to consider, in this context, how best to integrate the inputs by the regional commissions into the overall monitoring and follow-up to the Platform for Action;

15. Calls upon States to take action to fulfil the commitments made at the Conference for the advancement of women and for the strengthening of international cooperation, and reaffirms that adequate financial resources should be committed at the international level for the implementation of the Platform for Action in the developing countries, in particular in Africa, and in the least developed countries;

16. Invites the Secretary-General, in the implementation of the United Nations system-wide initiative on Africa, to pay special attention to the needs and role of women as actors and beneficiaries in the development process;

17. Recognizes that implementation of the Platform for Action in the countries with economies in transition requires continued international cooperation and assistance, as indicated in the Platform for Action;

18. Calls upon Member States to allocate sufficient resources for undertaking gender impact analyses in order to develop successful national implementation strategies for the Platform for Action;

19. Stresses that full and effective implementation of the Platform for Action will require a political commitment to make available human and financial resources for the empowerment of women, the integration of a gender perspective in budgetary decisions on policies and programmes, as well as adequate financing of specific programmes for securing equality between women and men;

20. Welcomes the input of the Commission on the Status of Women to the discussion on the eradication of poverty in the coordination segment of the Economic and Social Council, inter alia, in relation to mainstreaming a gender perspective in poverty eradication activities and the use of available funding sources and mechanisms, with a view to contributing to the goals of poverty eradication and targeting women living in poverty;

21. Urges Governments, the United Nations system, including the Bretton Woods institutions, relevant international organizations, non-governmental organizations and the private sector to empower women through concrete actions, policies and programmes, including integration of gender perspectives;

22. Requests Governments and the international community to implement specific programmes for the eradication of poverty and illiteracy, ensuring women's equal access to education, training, employment and the promotion of entrepreneurial activities, and strongly urges the international community to support national efforts towards the advancement of women in the developing countries, particularly in Africa, and in the least developed countries;

23. Reaffirms that, in order to implement the Platform for Action, a reformulation of policies and reallocation of resources may be needed, but that some policy changes may not necessarily have financial implications;

24. Reaffirms also that, in order to implement the Platform for Action, adequate mobilization of resources at the national and international levels, as well as new and additional resources to the developing countries, in particular in Africa, and the least developed countries, from all available funding mechanisms, including multilateral, bilateral and private sources for the advancement of women, will also be required;

25. Calls upon those States committed to the 20:20 initiative to integrate a gender perspective fully into its implementation, as referred to in paragraph 358 of the Platform for Action;

26. Recognizes that the creation of an enabling environment, at the national and international levels, is necessary to ensure the full participation of women in economic activities, and calls upon States to remove obstacles for the full implementation of the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action;

27. Calls upon Member States to commit themselves to gender balance, inter alia, through the creation of special mechanisms, in all government-appointed committees, boards and other relevant official bodies, as appropriate, as well as in all international bodies, institutions and organizations, notably by presenting and promoting more women candidates;

28. Also calls upon Member States to aim at and support gender balance in the composition of delegations to the United Nations and other international forums;

29. Reaffirms that the implementation of the Platform for Action will require immediate and concerted action by all to create a peaceful, just and humane world based on all human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the principle of equality for all people of all ages and from all walks of life, and to this end, recognizes that broad-based and sustained economic growth in the context of sustainable development is necessary to sustain social development and social justice;

30. Stresses, in relation to the United Nations, that the Platform for Action needs to be implemented through the work of all the bodies and organizations of the system during the period 1995-2000, specifically and as an integral part of wider programming;

31. Also stresses that the means of implementation of the Platform for Action should include mainstreaming a gender perspective in the context of preparation of the programme budget for the biennium 1998-1999;

32. Welcomes the endorsement by the Economic and Social Council of the revised system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women, 1996-2001 and its decision to undertake, in 1998, a comprehensive mid-term review of the implementation of the revised plan as a basis for future programming and coordination of activities for the advancement and empowerment of women by the United Nations system, including a review of the progress made in mainstreaming a gender perspective in all activities of the United Nations system;

33. Requests the Secretary-General, in his capacity as Chairman of the Administrative Committee on Coordination, to formulate a new system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women to cover the period 2002-2005, to submit a new draft plan to the Economic and Social Council at its substantive session of 2000 in order to provide guidance for the medium-term plans of the individual organizations of the United Nations system and to submit the draft plan to the Commission on the Status of Women at its forty-fourth session for comments;

34. Reiterates the need for an enhanced framework for international cooperation for gender-related issues in the integrated and comprehensive implementation, follow-up and assessment of the Platform for Action, taking into account the results of global United Nations summits and conferences;

35. Welcomes the decision of the Economic and Social Council to devote its 1997 coordination segment to mainstreaming a gender perspective, and reiterates its invitation to the Council to consider devoting one high-level segment and one operational segment to the advancement of women and the implementation of the Platform for Action, before the year 2000, taking into account the multi-year programme of work of the Commission on the Status of Women and all other functional commissions of the Council and the need for a system-wide approach to the implementation of the Platform for Action;

36. Also welcomes the establishment of the Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality, and notes the work done by the Special Adviser to the Secretary-General on Gender Issues for the system-wide implementation of the Platform for Action;

37. Further welcomes the fact that the Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality will serve as a forum for information exchange and the promotion of programme coordination and collaborative arrangements among organizations of the system and will be responsible for addressing, on a comprehensive system-wide basis, all aspects of the implementation of the Platform for Action and gender-related recommendations emanating from other recent international conferences within the purview of the United Nations system;

38. Welcomes developments in coordination at the inter-agency level, including work done by the Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality which is expected to move forward the conceptual discussion of mainstreaming, and stresses the need for further work to mainstream a gender perspective into the day-to-day work of United Nations staff throughout the system and in intergovernmental action beyond the social sectors and operational activities;

39. Also welcomes Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/6, in which the Council strengthened the mandate and the terms of reference of the Commission on the Status of Women and endorsed the Commission's multi-year work programme for the period 1996-2000, and also welcomes the agreed conclusions 1996/1 of the Commission on the Status of Women of March 1996 on the Commission's methods of work for dealing with the implementation of the Platform for Action;

40. Invites once again all other functional commissions of the Economic and Social Council, within their mandates, to take due account of the Platform for Action and to ensure the integration of gender aspects in their respective work;

41. Welcomes the measures taken by the Secretary-General to date to ensure coordination of policy within the United Nations for the implementation of the Platform for Action and the mainstreaming of a system-wide gender perspective in all activities of the United Nations system, including training, in accordance with paragraph 326 of the Platform for Action;

42. Requests the Secretary-General to present action-oriented recommendations to the Economic and Social Council at its coordination segment on means to enhance system-wide coordination on gender issues and to mainstream a gender perspective throughout the United Nations system;

43. Also requests the Secretary-General to continue to disseminate the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action as widely as possible, including to the competent organs of the United Nations and the specialized agencies;

44. Reiterates its request to the Secretary-General to ensure that the Division for the Advancement of Women can effectively carry out all the tasks foreseen for it in the Platform for Action by, inter alia, providing sufficient human and financial resources within the regular budget of the United Nations;

45. Requests the Secretary-General, in cooperation with the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme, to ensure that the resident coordinators fully incorporate a gender perspective in integrating the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women into the coordinated follow-up to recent global United Nations conferences;

46. Welcomes the decision of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women to amend its reporting guidelines in line with the recommendations of paragraph 323 of the Platform for Action to enable it to consider reports submitted by States parties, and invites States parties to include information on measures taken to implement the Platform for Action in their reports;

47. Notes the importance of the activities undertaken by the United Nations Development Fund for Women and the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women in the implementation of the Platform for Action;

48. Commends the work of the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women on the issues addressing, inter alia, the process of the economic and political empowerment of women, statistics and indicators in gender issues, and requests the Institute to incorporate in its biennial work programme appropriate actions in order to carry out research and training components relevant to the twelve critical areas of concern and the implementation of the Platform for Action, within its area of expertise;

49. Also commends the work of the United Nations Development Fund for Women in providing a strategic and focused response to the follow-up and implementation of the Platform for Action through its advocacy and operational activities in support of women's economic and political empowerment, and encourages the Fund to provide technical support to operationalize the Platform for Action at the national level through, inter alia, the resident coordinator system and taking into account decision 1996/43 of 13 September 1996 of the Executive Board of the United Nations Development Programme/United Nations Population Fund;

50. Encourages the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women, the United Nations Development Fund for Women and the Division for the Advancement of Women to strengthen their cooperation and coordination;

51. Encourages international financial institutions to review and revise policies, procedures and staffing to ensure that investments and programmes benefit women and thus contribute to sustainable development;

52. Invites the World Trade Organization to consider how it might contribute to the implementation of the Platform for Action, including activities in cooperation with the United Nations system;

53. Decides to appraise the progress on an annual basis and to retain in the agenda of its forthcoming sessions the item entitled "Implementation of the outcome of the Fourth World Conference on Women", with a view to assessing, in the year 2000, the progress achieved in the implementation of the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women and the Platform for Action in an appropriate forum;

54. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session and thereafter annually, through the Commission on the Status of Women and the Economic and Social Council, on ways to enhance the capacity of the Organization and of the United Nations system to support the ongoing follow-up to the Conference in the most integrated and effective way, including human and financial requirements and measures taken and progress achieved in the implementation of the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action.

General Assembly resolution 51/69

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/51/613) without vote, 13 November (meeting 35); draft by Chairman (A/C.3/51/L.29), based on informal consultations; agenda item 104.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 13-18, 35; plenary 82.

Women's rights

The 30-article Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, adopted in 1979 [GA res. 34/80] sets forth constitutional, legislative and other measures which aim to promote equality for women through affirmative action, maternity protection, equal education and employment opportunities, and equality before the law, among other things. It also sets standards by which countries aim to improve the overall situation of women, especially the conditions in which they live and work.

The girl child

In 1996, the General Assembly again adopted a resolution on the girl child, a subject it had deemed important because, it noted, the advancement and development of women throughout their life cycle must begin with the girl child [YUN 1995, p. 7701. (See also PART TWO, Chapter II).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/76.

The girl child

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolution 50/154 of 21 December 1995 and its resolutions 50/42 of 8 December and 50/203 of 22 December 1995 concerning the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women, held at Beijing from 4 to 15 September 1995,

Recalling also the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women, the Copenhagen Declaration on Social Development and the Programme of Action of the World Summit for Social Development, held at Copenhagen from 6 to 12 March 1995, the Programme of Action of the International Conference on Population and Development, held at Cairo from 5 to 13 September 1994, the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action of the World Conference on Human Rights, held at Vienna from 14 to 25 June 1993, the Plan of Action for Implementing the World Declaration on the Survival, Protection and Development of Children in the 1990s of the World Summit for Children, held in New York on 29 and 30 September 1990, the World Declaration on Education for All and the Framework for Action to Meet Basic Learning Needs adopted at the World Conference on Education for All, held at Jomtien, Thailand, from 5 to 9 March 1990,

Welcoming with satisfaction the adoption and dissemination of the Declaration and Agenda for Action of the World Congress against Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children, held at Stockholm from 27 to 31 August 1996, which constitute an important contribution to the global efforts aimed at the eradication of such practices,

Noting with appreciation the report of the Secretary-General on the mid-decade review of progress made in achieving the goals of the World Summit for Children,

Welcoming the report of the expert of the Secretary-General on the impact of armed conflict on children,

Deeply concerned about discrimination against the girl child and the violation of the rights of the girl child, which often result in less access for girls to education, nutrition, physical and mental health care and to girls enjoying fewer rights, opportunities and benefits of childhood and adolescence than boys and often being subjected to various forms of cultural, social, sexual and economic exploitation and to violence and harmful practices such as incest, early marriage, female infanticide, prenatal sex selection and female genital mutilation,

Reaffirming the equal rights of women and men as enshrined in the Preamble to the Charter of the United Nations, and recalling the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and the Convention on the Rights of the Child,

1. Urges all States to take all necessary measures and to institute legal reforms to ensure the full and equal enjoyment by the girl child of all human rights and fundamental freedoms and to take effective action against violations of those rights and freedoms;

2. Also urges all States to enact and enforce legislation protecting girls from all forms of violence, including female infanticide and prenatal sex selection, female genital mutilation, incest, sexual abuse, sexual exploitation, child prostitution and child pornography, and to develop age-appropriate safe and confidential programmes and medical, social and psychological support services to assist girls who are subjected to violence;

3. Calls upon all States and international and non-governmental organizations, individually and collectively:

(a) To set goals and to develop and implement gender-sensitive strategies to address the rights and needs of children, in accordance with the Convention on the Rights of the Child, to take into account the rights and particular needs of the girl child, especially in education, health and nutrition, and to eliminate negative cultural attitudes and practices against the girl child;

(b) To generate social support for the enforcement of laws on the minimum legal age for marriage, in particular by providing educational opportunities for girls;

(c) To give attention to the rights and needs of adolescent girls, which call for special action for their protection from sexual exploitation and abuse, harmful cultural practices, teenage pregnancy and vulnerability to sexually transmitted diseases and human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome and for the development of life skills and self-esteem, reaffirming that the advancement and empowerment of women throughout the life cycle must begin with the girl child at all ages;

(d) To take measures to increase awareness of the potential of the girl child and to promote gender-sensitive socialization of boys and girls from early childhood, aimed at achieving gender equality, development and peace within the family and the community;

(e) To ensure the equal participation of girls and young women on the basis of non-discrimination and as partners with boys and young men in social, economic and political life and in the development of strategies and the implementation of action aimed at achieving gender equality, development and peace;

(f) To strengthen and reorient health education and health services, in particular primary health care programmes, including sexual and reproductive health, and to design quality health programmes that meet the physical and mental needs of girls and attend to the needs of young expectant and nursing mothers;

4. Urges States to enact and strictly enforce laws to ensure that marriage is entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses, to enact and strictly enforce laws concerning the minimum legal age of consent and the minimum age for marriage and to raise the minimum age for marriage where necessary;

5. Also urges States to eliminate all barriers so as to enable girls, without exception, to develop their full potential and skills through equal access to education and training;

6. Encourages States to consider ways and means to ensure the continuing education of married women, pregnant women and young mothers;

7. Urges States to take special measures for the protection of children, in particular to protect girls from rape and other forms of sexual abuse and gender-based violence in situations of armed conflict, in line with the recommendations of the expert appointed by the Secretary-General to study the impact of armed conflict on children;

8. Urges States parties to fulfil the obligations they have undertaken under the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women to protect women and girls from all forms of violence, including domestic violence, sexual trafficking and child prostitution;

9. Urges States to implement measures to protect women and girls from all forms of violence, in line with the recommendations of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on violence against women, its causes and consequences;

10. Requests all States to implement, on an urgent basis, measures to protect children from all forms of sexual exploitation, including measures in line with those outlined in the Declaration and Agenda for Action of the World Congress against Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children;

11. Requests the Secretary-General, as Chairman of the Administrative Committee on Coordination, to ensure that all organizations and bodies of the United Nations system, individually and collectively, in particular the United Nations Children's Fund, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the World Food Programme, the United Nations Population Fund, the World Health Organization, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, the United Nations Development Programme and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, take into account the rights and the particular needs of the girl child, especially in education, health and nutrition, and eliminate negative cultural attitudes and practices against the girl child in the implementation of the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women and the system-wide medium-term plan for the advancement of women for the period 1996-2001;

12. Calls upon the Commission on Human Rights, while considering, in accordance with the agreed conclusions 1996/1 of the Economic and Social Council, its input to the Commission on the Status of Women on ensuring women's equal enjoyment of human rights relating to economic resources, to pay particular attention to all the human rights of the girl child;

13. Calls upon States and international and non-governmental organizations to mobilize all necessary resources, support and efforts to realize the goals, strategic objectives and actions set out in the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women;

14. Calls upon all States, all relevant organizations and bodies of the United Nations system and non-governmental organizations to implement commitments to goals and actions relating to the girl child and to report on initiatives and progress to the Commission on the Status of Women at its forty-second session, pursuant to the decision of the Commission to review the progress made in the implementation of the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women relating to the girl child in 1998.

General Assembly resolution 51/76

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/51/615) without vote, 20 November (meeting 46); 120-nation draft (A/C.3/51/L.31), orally revised; agenda item 106.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 30, 32-35, 42, 46; plenary 82.

Violence against women

In February [F/CN.6/1996/11], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Commission a report of the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) on its role in eliminating violence against women, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 50/166 [YUN 1995, p. 1188].

UNIFEM supported initiatives that demonstrated effective development alternatives and facilitated a more gender-sensitive enabling policy environment. It had increasingly utilized a programme framework that viewed the pursuit of sustainable human development as a fundamental human rights issue. UNIFEM's activities in the area of human rights, particularly violence against women, drew much support from grassroots constituencies, partner agencies, the Fund's Consultative Committee and the international human rights community in general, and resulted in UNIFEM's establishment of a women's human rights programme.

The initial steps to be taken by the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) would be a process of consultation, keeping the Commission on the Status of Women and the Commission on Human Rights apprised of its progress. In addition, UNIFEM had asked that its staff in the field gather information, from governmental and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) working in the area of violence against women, on the types of interventions that would result in significant progress towards eliminating violence against women.

Reports of Secretary-General. The Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice (Vienna, 21-31 May) (see PART THREE, Chapter IX) considered two reports on the elimination of violence against women submitted by the Secretary-General.

In a March report [E/CN.15/1996/12 & Corr.1], the Secretary-General described activities taken by institutes comprising the UN crime prevention and criminal justice programme network which focused on producing publications, holding meetings and conferences, conducting research and technical cooperation activities.

The Secretary-General, in an April report [E/CN.15/1996/11 & Corr.1], presented a draft plan of action on the elimination of violence against women. He defined the framework and scope of the plan, which set out elements of adequate response measures at the national level, mainly by the criminal justice system. The Secretary-General also provided information on action to be taken at the regional and international levels, and measures to be taken to promote and utilize the plan of action under different legal systems.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 23 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/12.

Elimination of violence against women

The Economic and Social Council,

Welcoming the proclamation by the General Assembly, in its resolution 48/104 of 20 December 1993, of the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women, and recalling the definition of violence against women contained in articles 1 and 2 of the Declaration,

Reaffirming the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights, held at Vienna from 14 to 25 June 1993, and its confirmation that the human rights of women and of the girl child are an inalienable, integral and indivisible part of universal human rights, as well as its affirmation that gender-based violence and all forms of sexual harassment and exploitation are incompatible with the dignity and worth of the human person and must be eliminated,

Recognizing that violence against women both violates human rights and fundamental freedoms and impairs or nullifies the enjoyment by women of those rights and freedoms, and concerned about the long-standing failure to protect and promote those rights and freedoms,

Strongly condemning all forms of violence against women as set out in article 2 of the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women,

Recognizing that the effective implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 34/180 of 18 December 1979, contributes to the elimination of violence against women and that the Declaration strengthens and complements that process,

Bearing in mind that, as stated in article 4 of the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women, States should not invoke any custom, tradition or religious consideration to avoid their obligations with respect to the elimination of violence against women,

Recalling that the General Assembly, in its resolution 48/104, recognized that violence against women was a manifestation of historically unequal power relations between men and women which had led to domination over and discrimination against women by men and to the prevention of the full advancement of women and that violence against women was one of the crucial social mechanisms by which women were forced into a subordinate position compared with men,

Recalling Commission on Human Rights resolutions 1995/85 of 8 March 1995 and 1996/49 of 19 April 1996 on the elimination of violence against women,

Welcoming the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 50/166 of 22 December 1995 on the role of the United Nations Development Fund for Women in eliminating violence against women,

Recalling the appointment by the Commission on Human Rights of the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, and the conclusions and recommendations of the Special Rapporteur that States have an affirmative duty to promote and protect the human rights of women and must exercise due diligence to prevent violence against women, as outlined in Commission on Human Rights resolution 1996/49,

Also recalling the statement of the Special Rapporteur that pornography is perhaps the extreme manifestation of the media's violence against women,

Commending the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division of the Secretariat for its work on the elimination of violence against women and its ongoing cooperation with the Special Rapporteur,

Welcoming the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action, adopted by the Fourth World Conference on Women and, in particular, the determination of Governments to prevent and eliminate all forms of violence against women and girls, including in armed conflict,

Recognizing the need to implement the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice and to develop practical measures, strategies and activities in that field,

Reaffirming that rape in the conduct of armed conflict constitutes a war crime and that under certain circumstances it constitutes a crime against humanity and an act of genocide as defined in the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide,

Expressing deep concern about the high social, health and economic costs to the individual and society that are associated with violence against women,

Bearing in mind that criminal justice agencies should work closely with practitioners in other sectors, including health, social services and education, and with members of the community to address the problem of violence against women,

Recognizing that various groups of women, such as women belonging to minority groups, indigenous women, refugee women, women migrants, including women migrant workers, women in poverty living in rural or remote communities, destitute women, women in institutions or in detention, female children, women with disabilities, elderly women, displaced women, repatriated women, women living in poverty and women in situations of armed conflict and other situations of violence, foreign occupation, war of aggression, civil war and terrorism, including hostage-taking, are also particularly vulnerable to violence,

Welcoming the role of non-governmental organizations, women's equality-seeking organizations and community agencies in addressing and working towards the elimination of violence against women, in particular in drawing attention to the nature, severity and magnitude of violence against women and in assisting women who are victims of violence,

1. Urges Member States to ensure that all forms of violence against women are, in the absence of existing laws, legislatively proscribed;

2. Also urges Member States to review or monitor legislation and legal principles, procedures, policies and practices relating to criminal matters, in a manner consistent with their legal systems, to determine if they have an adverse or negative impact on women and, if they have such an impact, to modify them in order to ensure that women are treated fairly by the criminal justice system;

3. Further urges Member States to undertake strategies, develop policies and disseminate materials to promote women's safety in the home and in society at large, including specific crime prevention strategies that reflect the realities of women's lives and address their distinct needs in areas such as social development, environmental design and educational programmes in crime prevention;

4. Urges Member States to promote an active and visible policy of ensuring that a gender perspective is brought to the development and application of all policies and programmes that address violence against women so that, before decisions are taken, an analysis may be made of their effects on women and men, respectively;

5. Also urges Member States to adopt measures to ensure that acts of violence against women, whether in public or private, are recognized as criminal matters that are, as appropriate, open to public scrutiny and intervention;

6. Further urges Member States and international and regional organizations to take all measures required for the protection of women and children from rape, systematic rape, sexual slavery and forced pregnancy in the conduct of armed conflict and to strengthen mechanisms to investigate and punish all those responsible for the perpetration of such crimes and to bring the perpetrators to justice;

7. Encourages the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division of the Secretariat and other crime prevention bodies and mechanisms to avail themselves of the information and materials on violence against women, including violence in the family, violence in the community and violence by the State that are being gathered by Governments and United Nations treaty bodies, other special rapporteurs, the specialized agencies, bodies and organs, and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, including women's equality-seeking organizations;

8. Calls upon the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, through the Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Division and the institutes comprising the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme network, to coordinate with all relevant organs, bodies and other entities of the United Nations system their activities on issues relating to violence against women and to the removal of gender bias in the administration of criminal justice;

9. Calls upon the institutes comprising the Programme network to consolidate and disseminate information on successful intervention models and preventive programmes at the national level;

10. Urges United Nations entities and the institutes comprising the Programme network to continue and to improve training concerning the human rights of women and issues of gender bias and violence against women for all United Nations personnel and officials, especially those in human rights and humanitarian relief, peacekeeping and peacemaking activities, and to promote their understanding of the human rights of women so that they can recognize and deal with violations of the human rights of women and can fully take into account the gender aspect of their work;

11. Requests the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice to ensure that Strategies for Confronting Domestic Violence: A Resource Manual, which has been published in English, is published in the other official languages of the United Nations, subject to the availability of regular budgetary or extrabudgetary funds;

12. Calls upon Governments, international organizations and non-governmental organizations, as appropriate, to translate Strategies for Confronting Domestic Violence: A Resource Manual and to ensure its wide dissemination for use in training and education programmes;

13. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General on practical measures in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice to eliminate violence against women, commends the work of the institutes comprising the United Nations Programme network in undertaking practical measures to eliminate violence against women, and urges them to continue their work on this issue;

14. Welcomes the report of the Secretary-General on the draft plan of action on the elimination of violence against women, and takes note of the revised document prepared by the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its fifth session, entitled "Practical measures, strategies and activities in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice for the elimination of violence against women";

15. Requests the Secretary-General to seek the views of Member States, institutes comprising the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme network, relevant United Nations entities and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, on the draft practical measures, strategies and activities in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice for the elimination of violence against women and, taking into account the views received, to submit a report containing the text of the draft practical measures, strategies and activities, as well as a report on the views received, to the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice at its sixth session so that it may be discussed by the open-ended in-session working group of the Commission;

16. Calls upon Member States, in providing their views, as noted in paragraph 15 above, to include the multidisciplinary views of their ministries, departments and agencies that have responsibilities related to the elimination of violence against women;

17. Decides that the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice should continue to consider the elimination of violence against women within its priority themes and that the Commission should consider, at its sixth session, the reports of the Secretary-

General referred to in paragraph 15 above and the draft practical measures, strategies and activities in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice for the elimination of violence against women.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/12

23 July 1996

Meeting 45

Adopted without vote

Draft by Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice (E/1996/30 & Corr.1); agenda item 5 (g).

Women migrant workers

Commission action. The Commission on the Status of Women, by a March resolution [40/6], called on Member States to implement the 1993 Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women [YUN 1993, p. 1046, GA res. 48/104] and to explore the possibility of adopting measures to prevent the victimization of women migrant workers by sexual traffickers. It recommended that the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, the Centre for Human Rights and the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on violence against women, as well as all relevant UN bodies and programmes, give attention to violence perpetrated against women migrant workers, and to provide the Secretary-General with information for inclusion in his report to the General Assembly.

Expert meeting. In a March note [E/CN.6/1996/12], the Secretary-General stated that he would convene an expert group meeting on violence against women migrant workers (Manila, 27-31 May), as requested in General Assembly resolution 50/168 [YUN 1995, p. 1186]. In accordance with the terms of the 1995 Assembly resolution, the Secretary-General had sought the views of Member States on various issues raised in the resolution.

As scheduled, the expert group meeting took place and discussed migration patterns and trends, the dynamics of violence against women migrant workers, the impact of migration on employment, abuses faced by women migrant workers, policies and mechanisms to address the problem, collaborative efforts, the collection of indicators and statistical data, empowerment strategies and the role of NGOs [E/1996/71].

The expert group made recommendations on indicators of violence and of vulnerability and on data on the general characteristics of women migrant workers and their situations. Indicators of violence included economic exploitation, social/psychological violence, physical/sexual violence and violence emanating from the operation of the legal system. Indicators of vulnerability involved invalid documentation, recruitment of under-age women and girls, recruitment by unauthorized agents, inadequate sources of support, inadequate reintegration services, violence in the country of origin and inadequate governmental or international regulations. The expert group recommended the collection of data on the general characteristics of: departing women; women migrant workers in receiving countries; the situation prevailing in countries of origin; and the situation prevailing in receiving countries.

The expert group set out measures to improve the coordination of efforts of the UN system on violence against women migrant workers, and action to be taken by Governments, regional inter-governmental bodies and the United Nations.

On 22 July, by decision 1996/239, the Economic and Social Council took note of the report on the expert group meeting.

Report of Secretary-General. In a September report [A/51/325], the Secretary-General discussed the expert group's conclusions and recommendations, as well as actions taken by organizations of the UN system. He presented comments provided by Governments, highlighting the main trends in their approach to dealing with the issue of violence against women migrant workers.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/65.

Violence against women migrant workers

The General Assembly,

Recalling all previous resolutions on violence against women migrant workers adopted by the General Assembly, the Commission on the Status of Women and the Commission on Human Rights, as well as the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women,

Affirming the outcome of the World Conference on Human Rights, held at Vienna from 14 to 25 June 1993, the International Conference on Population and Development, held at Cairo from 5 to 13 September 1994, the World Summit for Social Development, held at Copenhagen from 6 to 12 March 1995 and the Fourth World Conference on Women, held at Beijing from 4 to 15 September 1995, specifically as the results pertain to women migrant workers,

Noting the holding of the expert group meeting on violence against women migrant workers at Manila from 27 to 31 May 1996, and expressing its appreciation to the Government of the Philippines for hosting the meeting,

Taking note of resolution 1996/12 of the Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities concerning, inter alia, women migrant workers,

Conscious of the great importance given to the promotion and protection of the human rights of persons belonging to groups that have been rendered vulnerable, including migrant workers, the elimination of all forms of discrimination against them and the strengthening and more effective implementation of existing human rights instruments,

Noting the large numbers of women from developing countries and from some countries with economies in transition who continue to venture forth to more affluent countries in search of a living for themselves and their families as a consequence of, inter alia, poverty, unemployment and other socio-economic conditions, and acknowledging the duty of sending States to work for conditions that provide employment and security to their citizens,

Acknowledging the economic benefits that accrue to sending and receiving States from the employment of women migrant workers,

Emphasizing the need for accurate, objective and comprehensive information and data as a basis for policy formulation,

Concerned by the continuing reports of grave abuses and acts of violence committed against the persons of women migrant workers by some employers in some host countries,

Encouraged by measures adopted by some receiving States to alleviate the plight of women migrant workers residing within their areas of jurisdiction,

Reiterating that acts of violence directed against women impair or nullify their enjoyment of their human rights and fundamental freedoms,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General on violence against women migrant workers;

2. Determines to prevent and eliminate all forms of violence against women and girls;

3. Encourages Member States to enact and/or reinforce penal, civil, labour and administrative sanctions in domestic legislation to punish and redress the wrongs done to women and girls who are subjected to any form of violence, whether in the home, the workplace, the community or society;

4. Also encourages Member States to adopt and/or implement and periodically to review and analyse legislation to ensure its effectiveness in eliminating violence against women, emphasizing the prevention of violence and the prosecution of offenders, and to take measures to ensure the protection of women subjected to violence and their access to just and effective remedies, including compensation and indemnification and healing of victims, and for the rehabilitation of perpetrators;

5. Invites Member States concerned, specifically the sending and receiving States, to consider adopting appropriate legal measures against intermediaries who deliberately encourage the clandestine movement of workers and who exploit women migrant workers;

6. Reiterates the need for States concerned, specifically the sending and receiving States of women migrant workers, to conduct regular consultations for the purpose of identifying problem areas in promoting and protecting the rights of women migrant workers and ensuring health, legal and social services for them, adopting specific measures to address those problems, setting up, as necessary, linguistically and culturally accessible services and mechanisms to implement those measures and, in general, creating conditions that foster greater harmony and tolerance between women migrant workers and the rest of the society in which they reside;

7. Encourages Member States to consider signing and ratifying or acceding to the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families, as well as the Slavery Convention of 1926;

8. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, the Centre for Human Rights of the Secretariat and the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on violence against women, its causes and consequences, as well as all relevant bodies and programmes in the United Nations system, when addressing the issue of violence against women, to give particular attention to the issue of violence perpetrated against women migrant workers;

9. Invites Member States, as well as relevant international organizations, to provide their views and comments to the Secretary-General on the issue of indicators as a basis for addressing the situation of women migrant workers, as set forth in the report of the Secretary-General;

10. Also invites the Administrative Committee on Coordination, within its mandate, to examine how to improve coordination within the United Nations system on the question of violence against women migrant workers;

11. Invites the regional commissions and the regional offices of the International Labour Organization to examine ways and means, within their mandates, of dealing with concerns pertaining to women migrant workers;

12. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution, including the reports received from all authorities and bodies of the United Nations system, Member States, intergovernmental organizations and other concerned bodies, with due regard for possible measures to improve reporting procedure.

General Assembly resolution 51/65

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/51/612) without vote, 18 November (meeting 42); 22-nation draft (A/C.3/51/L.17/Rev.1), orally revised; agenda item 103.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 13-18, 29, 35, 42; plenary 82.

Women in armed conflict

Following its consideration of the situation of women and children in armed conflict, the Commission on the Status of Women in a March resolution [40/1] condemned violent acts in contravention of international humanitarian law against civilian women and children, and urged all parties to armed conflicts to take all measures required for the protection of women and children, in particular the immediate release of women and children taken hostage or imprisoned. The Secretary-General was asked to facilitate the release of all women and children taken hostage in areas of armed conflict and to report in 1997 on the implementation of the Commission's resolution.

(See also PART TWO, Chapter II.)

Traffic in women and girls

Commission action. The Commission on the Status of Women, in a March resolution [40/4], called for the implementation of the Platform for Action by Governments of countries of origin, transit and destination, and regional and international organizations, by: considering ratification of international conventions on trafficking in persons and on slavery; taking measures to address the root factors that encouraged trafficking in women and girls for prostitution and other forms of commercialized sex, forced marriages and forced labour; stepping up cooperation and action by law enforcement authorities with a view to dismantling national, regional and international networks in trafficking; allocating resources to the rehabilitation of victims of trafficking; and developing educational programmes and legislation aimed at preventing sex tourism and trafficking, giving special emphasis to the protection of young women and children. The Commission welcomed a 1995 decision of the General Assembly [YUN 1995, p. 1189] to focus the International Day for the Abolition of Slavery, 2 December 1996, on the problem of trafficking in human persons, especially women and children.

Report of Secretary-General. In August, the Secretary-General submitted a comprehensive report [A/51/309] on all aspects of the issue of traffic in women and girls, with due regard for possible measures to improve the reporting procedure, which did not adequately monitor either the dimensions of the issue or State compliance with international norms. The Secretary-General provided a survey of national and international legal norms regarding trafficking and current approaches and measures to address the problem (see also PART TWO, Chapter II).

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/66.

Traffic in women and girls

The General Assembly,

Reaffirming the principles set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, the International Covenants on Human Rights, the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women,

Recalling the Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others, and taking note of the comments contained in the report of the Secretary-General,

Recalling also all previous resolutions on the problem of the traffic in women and girls,

Affirming the provisions of the outcome of the World Conference on Human Rights, held at Vienna from 14 to 25 June 1993, the International Conference on Population and Development, held at Cairo from 5 to 13 September 1994, the World Summit for Social Development, held at Copenhagen from 6 to 12 March 1995, the Fourth World Conference on Women, held at Beijing from 4 to 15 September 1995, and the Ninth United Nations Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, held at Cairo from 29 April to 8 May 1995, pertaining to the traffic in women and children,

Acknowledging the work done by intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations in compiling information on the scale and complexity of the problem of trafficking, in providing shelters for trafficked women and children and in effecting their voluntary repatriation to their countries of origin,

Noting with concern the increasing number of women and girl children from developing countries and from some countries with economies in transition who are being victimized by traffickers, and acknowledging that the problem of trafficking also victimizes young boys,

Convinced of the need to eliminate all forms of sexual violence and sexual trafficking, including for prostitution and other forms of commercial sex, which are violations of the human rights of women and girl children and are incompatible with the dignity and worth of the human person,

Realizing the urgent need for the adoption of effective measures nationally, regionally and internationally to protect women and girl children from this nefarious traffic,

1. Takes note with appreciation of the report of the Secretary-General on the traffic in women and girls;

2. Welcomes the convening of the World Congress against Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children at Stockholm from 27 to 31 August 1996;

3. Calls upon Governments of countries of origin, transit and destination and regional and international organizations, as appropriate, to implement the Platform for Action of the Fourth World Conference on Women by:

(a) Considering the ratification and enforcement of international conventions on trafficking in persons and on slavery;

(b) Taking appropriate measures to address the root factors, including external factors, that encourage trafficking in women and girls for prostitution and other forms of commercialized sex, forced marriage and forced labour in order to eliminate trafficking in women, including by strengthening existing legislation with a view to providing better protection of the rights of women and girls and to punishing the perpetrators, through both criminal and civil measures;

(c) Stepping up cooperation and concerted action by all relevant law enforcement authorities and institutions with a view to dismantling national, regional and international networks in trafficking;

(d) Allocating resources to provide comprehensive programmes designed to heal and rehabilitate into society victims of trafficking, including through job training, legal assistance and confidential health care and by taking measures to cooperate with non-governmental organizations to provide for the social, medical and psychological care of the victims of trafficking;

(e) Developing educational and training programmes and policies and considering enacting legislation aimed at preventing sex tourism and trafficking, giving special emphasis to the protection of young women and children;

4. Invites Governments to accord standard minimum humanitarian treatment to trafficked persons, consistent with human rights standards;

5. Also invites Governments, with the support of the United Nations, to formulate manuals for the training of personnel who receive and/or hold in temporary custody victims of gender-based violence, including trafficking, with a view to sensitizing them to the special needs of victims;

6. Encourages, in this regard, relevant United Nations organizations and bodies, including the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women, the United Nations Development Fund for Women and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, to contribute to the preparation of guidelines for the use of Governments in the elaboration of their manuals, in cooperation with all relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, including those concerned with traumatic stress, taking into account existing research material or studies on the subject;

7. Calls upon all Governments to criminalize trafficking in women and girls in all its forms and to condemn and penalize all those offenders involved, including intermediaries, whether their offence was committed in their own or in a foreign country, while ensuring that the victims of these practices are not penalized, and to penalize persons in authority found guilty of sexually assaulting victims of trafficking in their custody;

8. Urges Governments concerned to support comprehensive practical approaches by the international community to assist women and children victims of transnational trafficking to return home and to be re-integrated in their home societies;

9. Invites relevant intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to provide advisory services to Governments, upon their request, in planning and setting up rehabilitation programmes for victims of trafficking and in training personnel who will be directly involved in the implementation of those programmes;

10. Encourages Governments, institutions and non-governmental organizations to take preventive and assistance measures, including by establishing helplines to enable victims or potential victims of trafficking to seek assistance, and to provide targeted training to those groups dealing with this problem, including law enforcement and judicial personnel, using as far as possible female police officers to assist victims;

11. Invites the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, in addressing the obstacles to the realization of the human rights of women, in particular through his contacts with the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on violence against women, its causes and consequences and the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, to include the traffic in women and girls among his priority concerns;

12. Invites States parties to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women and the Convention on the Rights of the Child to include information and statistics on trafficking in women and girls as part of their national reports to the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, taking into account the general recommendation of the Committee, and to the Committee on the Rights of the Child, respectively;

13. Encourages the Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality to continue to address the issue as part of the integrated follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women;

14. Encourages all Governments to develop methodologies and to collect national information, including statistical data, on trafficking in women and girls in countries with special vulnerability;

15. Encourages countries with special vulnerability to conduct campaigns designed to increase public awareness of the problem;

16. Welcomes the consideration given to the problem of trafficking in women and girls by the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice, and invites the Commission to continue to consider appropriate measures to address this issue;

17. Also welcomes the decision of the Economic and Social Council to devote its coordination segment of 1997 to mainstreaming a gender perspective;

18. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-second session on the implementation of the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 51/66
12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote
Approved by Third Committee (A/51/612) without vote, 15 November (meeting 40); 29-nation draft (A/C.3/51/L.18/Rev.1), orally revised; agenda item 103.
Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 13-18, 29, 35, 40; plenary 82.

Women in the Middle East

The Commission on the Status of Women, in a March resolution [40/2], urged Governments, intergovernmental bodies and NGOs to include women in the Middle East peace process, and expressed its support for the Declaration of the Summit of the Peacemakers (Egypt, 13 March 1996) (see PART ONE, Chapter VI), which included among its objectives promoting security and condemning terrorist attacks in the Middle East, which had caused the loss of life and injuries among women and their families. Member States were urged to ensure that all economic, financial and technical assistance to parties in the region took into account the role of women as full participants and beneficiaries.

Palestinian women

In accordance with a 1995 Economic and Social Council request [YUN 1995, p. 637], the Secretary-General continued to monitor the situation of and assistance to Palestinian women. In a March report [E/CN.6/1996/8], he stated that his emphasis had shifted from monitoring the general living conditions of Palestinians to monitoring aspects of their development and human rights, while not neglecting the specific political framework. The Secretary-General summarized new developments, focusing on projects carried out by the UN system, addressed emerging concerns related to Palestinian women and provided suggestions in line with the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action.

The Council, on 22 July, adopted resolution 1996/5 on Palestinian women (see PART ONE, Chapter VI).

UN machinery

Convention on Elimination of Discrimination Against Women

As at 31 December 1996, there were 154 States parties to the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women [YUN1979,p.895,Gares.34/180], with the addition during the year of Algeria, Botswana and Pakistan. Also, at year's end, 11 States parties had accepted the amendment to article 20, paragraph 1, of the Convention in respect of the meeting time of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), which had been adopted by the States parties in May 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1178]. The amendment would enter into force when accepted by a two-thirds majority of States parties. At its fifteenth session (New York, 15 January-2 February) [A/51/38], CEDAW adopted a decision [(dec. 15/I)] in which it looked forward to the ratification of the amendment and stated that it considered necessary, to alleviate its heavy workload, at least two 3-week sessions annually, each preceded by a pre-session working group. It asked the Secretariat to inform it in 1997 of action taken at the ninth meeting of States parties (see below).

In August, the Secretary-General submitted his annual report [A/51/277 & Corr.1] to the General Assembly on the status of the Convention, which contained information on signatures, ratifications, successions, accessions, and reservations and declarations, or withdrawals thereof, made as at 1 August 1996.

On 12 December, the Assembly by decision 51/417 took note of the Secretary-General's report.

Meeting of States parties. The States parties at their ninth meeting (New York, 29 February) [CEDAW/SP/1996/5] adopted a resolution in which they recognized the need to introduce a temporary measure to enable CEDAW to reduce the backlog in reports of States parties awaiting review until the amendment to article 20, paragraph 1, entered into force. They also recommended that the General Assembly approve CEDAW's request for at least two 3-week sessions annually, preceded by a pre-session working group.

Optional protocol

In a decision [15/IV] adopted at its 1996 session, CEDAW urged the Commission on the Status of Women to prepare at its fortieth (1996) session an optional protocol, which was agreed upon by CEDAW in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1176]. The optional protocol would introduce petition procedures to the Convention. CEDAW adopted a suggestion [15/I] proposing that the Commission consider inviting two Committee experts to participate as resource persons in the deliberations of an open-ended working group of the Commission concerning the elaboration of the optional protocol.

In accordance with a 1995 Economic and Social Council request [YUN 1995, p. 1177], the Secretary-General, in a January report with later addenda [E/CN.6/1996/10], presented a synthesis of views received from Governments, intergovernmental organizations and NGOs on the optional protocol.

In a 22 March resolution [res. 40/8], the Commission requested the Secretary-General to invite Governments, intergovernmental organizations and NGOs to submit additional views on the optional protocol and to report thereon in 1997, and to provide a summary of existing communications and inquiry procedures and practices under international human rights instruments and under the UN Charter. It recommended a draft for adoption by the Economic and Social Council, renewing the mandate of the open-ended Working Group on the elaboration of the draft optional protocol, which the Council adopted as decision 1996/240 on 22 July.

CEDAW

The 23-member Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, established in 1982 [YUN 1982, p. 1149] to monitor compliance with the 1979 Convention, considered, under article 18 of the Convention, the initial and periodic reports of eight States parties (Belgium, Cuba, Cyprus, Ethiopia, Hungary, Iceland, Paraguay, Ukraine) on measures they had taken to implement the Convention. On an exceptional basis, Rwanda submitted an oral report concerning the situation of women in the country. The Committee established two working groups, one of which focused on ways to expedite the Committee's work and the other on ways to implement article 21 of the Convention. It adopted four decisions covering the submission in 1997 by the Secretariat of an analysis of the practice of other human rights treaty bodies in receiving information from NGOs and participation of NGOs in meetings of those bodies [15/II]; its reporting methods [15/III]; an optional protocol to the Convention [15/IV]; and the amendment to article 20 [15/I].

CEDAW adopted suggestions regarding the optional protocol, closer cooperation and coordination between it and the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and an appeal to States parties to submit their reports promptly. Annexed to the Committee's report were a list of States parties to the Convention and a chart showing the status of submission and consideration of reports submitted by States parties under article 18 of the Convention, both as at 2 February 1996.

On 22 July, by decision 1996/239, the Economic and Social Council took note of the report of CEDAW on its fifteenth session.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/68.

Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women

The General Assembly,

Bearing in mind that one of the purposes of the United Nations, as stated in Articles 1 and 55 of the Charter, is to promote universal respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction of any kind, including distinction as to sex,

Affirming that women and men should participate equally in social, economic and political development, should contribute equally to such development and should share equally in improved conditions of life,

Recalling the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action, adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights on 25 June 1993, in which the Conference reaffirmed that the human rights of women and the girl child were an inalienable, integral and indivisible part of universal human rights,

Welcoming the growing number of States parties to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, which now stands at one hundred and fifty-four,

Having considered the reports of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women on its fourteenth and fifteenth sessions,

Noting that the number of reports to the Committee has increased as a result of the growing number of States parties to the Convention and that the annual session of the Committee has been the shortest of all the annual sessions of the human rights treaty bodies, thus creating a considerable backlog of reports submitted but not considered,

1. Urges all States that have not yet ratified or acceded to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women to do so as soon as possible, so that universal ratification of the Convention can be achieved by the year 2000;

2. Emphasizes the importance of full compliance by States parties with their obligations under the Convention;

3. Urges States to limit the extent of any reservations they lodge to the Convention, to formulate any such reservations as precisely and as narrowly as possible, to ensure that no reservations are incompatible with the object and purpose of the Convention or otherwise incompatible with international treaty law, to review their reservations regularly with a view to withdrawing them and to withdraw reservations that are contrary to the object and purpose of the Convention or that are otherwise incompatible with international treaty law;

4. Invites States parties to the Convention to make all possible efforts to submit their reports on the implementation of the Convention in accordance with article 18 thereof and with the guidelines provided by the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women and to cooperate fully with the Committee in the presentation of their reports;

5. Urges States parties to the Convention to take appropriate measures so that acceptance of the amendment to article 20, paragraph 1, of the Convention by a two-thirds majority of States parties can be reached as soon as possible in order for the amendment to enter into force;

6. Approves the request made by the Committee and supported by the States parties to the Convention for additional meeting time so as to allow the Committee to hold two sessions annually, each of three weeks' duration, preceded by a pre-session working group, for an interim period starting in 1997;

7. Welcomes the report of the Open-ended Working Group on the Elaboration of a Draft Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women of the Commission on the Status of Women;

8. Decides to authorize the Open-ended Working Group to meet for ten working days, in parallel with the Commission on the Status of Women at its forty-first session;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session a report on the status of the Convention and the implementation of the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 51/68

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/51/612) without vote, 20 November (meeting 46); 80-nation draft (A/C.3/51/L.21), orally revised; agenda item 103.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 13-18, 29, 35, 46; plenary 82.

Commission on Status of Women

The fortieth session of the Commission on the Status of Women (New York, 11-22 March) [E/1996/26], which focused mainly on follow-up to the Fourth (1995) World Conference on Women

(see above) and the elaboration of a draft optional protocol to the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, adopted 10 resolutions, one decision and three agreed conclusions. The Commission recommended to the Economic and Social Council two draft resolutions for adoption, concerning Palestinian women and follow-up to the Fourth World Conference, and two draft decisions, one on the mandate of the Working Group to elaborate a draft optional protocol to the 1979 Convention and the other on the report on the Commission's fortieth session and documentation for its forty-first (1997) session.

On 22 July, by decision 1996/241, the Council took note of the report on its fortieth session and approved the provisional agenda and documentation for the forty-first session.

Communications on status of women

On 21 March, the Commission, at a closed meeting, considered and adopted the report of its Working Group on Communications on the Status of Women [E/1996/26], established in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 1050] to consider ways of making the communications procedure more transparent and efficient. The Working Group considered three confidential communications received directly by the UN Division for the Advancement of Women, which concerned violations of the rights of freedom of expression and of movement, and discrimination in the right to citizenship. It also took note of 16 communications taken from the confidential list of communications received from the UN Centre for Human Rights, including allegations of forced abortion and other violations of women's human rights in situations of war and armed conflict, such as the systematic practice of rape and abuse as a tactic of war; rape, sexual molestation and torture by security and armed forces; rape, torture and murder in detention; and alleged cases of discriminatory treatment of female babies and rape and abuse of migrant women workers. Regarding a non-confidential list of communications prepared by the Secretariat, the Working Group took note of alleged cases of violence against women; the lack of women in decision-making, particularly as regards war and conflict resolution; and communications relating to the right to inheritance and ownership of land and property. The Working Group concluded its report by noting that the communications procedure of the Commission was not sufficient and should be further improved.

UN Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM)

During 1996, the United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM) began to shift from its more traditional approach of being a broad-based grant-awarding organization to providing strategic and technical know-how and support as a catalyst and mediator within the UN system. To strengthen its operational work and maximize the impact of its projects, UNIFEM concentrated and consolidated its programme focus for 1996 around two main areas of action: economic and political empowerment. UNIFEM's programme on political empowerment concentrated on women in governance and decision-making at all levels; human rights and violence against women; and peace-building and conflict resolution. The economic empowerment programme focused on globalization and economic restructuring; women and enterprise development; and natural resources management.

During the year, UNIFEM increased its coordination and collaboration with other UN and international agencies. Its activities revolved around five strategies towards the economic and political empowerment of women, which included building the capacity and leadership of women's organizations to advocate for gender-sensitive development; undertaking advocacy activities to leverage political and financial support for women; facilitating effective partnerships between women's organizations, Governments, the UN system and the private sector; undertaking pilot and demonstration projects for mainstreaming to benefit women; and documenting and disseminating information on best practices and lessons learned.

UNDP action. In a February report [DP/1996/14], the UNDP Administrator discussed a 1995 evaluation of UNIFEM conducted by the Office for Evaluation and Strategic Planning. Concerning the evaluation of UNIFEM as a special programme resources (SPR)-funded programme, the recommendations stressed the need for clearer programme guidelines, greater emphasis on gender in development rather than on women in development, improved communication between the gender-in-development programme and the regional bureaux; the integration of gender-in-development activity into country programmes through SPR allocation; and encouraging country office interest and ownership of gender programmes. As to evaluations undertaken by UNDP-administered funds and programmes, the Administrator cited two projects, one in Latin America and one in Africa, which reconfirmed the important role played by civil-society institutions in ensuring delivery of development assistance. In both instances, the Administrator noted, the intermediary organizations were able to reach large numbers of women more efficiently than UNIFEM would have been able to directly.

In July [DP/1996/34], the Administrator circulated to the UNDP Executive Board a report describing an evaluation of UNIFEM conducted by an external consulting firm. The evaluation covered UNIFEM's activities from 1990 to 1995 and recommended that UNIFEM remain an autonomous and separate organization with the United Nations; increase its resource base; continue its current programme directions in the light of the Fourth World Conference; continue to improve the conditions and minimize the discrimination faced by women, especially poor women; continue to play a strong brokering role between Governments, the women's movement, and women's organizations and networks; continue to work with women's organizations and networks; strengthen project design and management systems; continue to document and disseminate its own experiences as well as women's experiences and encourage the sharing of experiences across regions; continue to bring its experience and technical capacity into international conferences and forums; find mechanisms to leverage UNDP's financial resources to benefit women; summarize, publish and widely disseminate its advocacy tools, approaches and methods; maintain flexibility and accountability in its administrative procedures; strengthen its staff and human resources; increase its number of regional programme advisers; strengthen and increase the number of training programmes it offered yearly for Women-in-Development Focal Point persons; align its organizational structure to enhance inter- and intra-regional collaboration and communication; upgrade its work space and computer software and hardware; and institute a management information system to track all activities, programmes and projects from design to completion. Other recommendations proposed that UN agencies be encouraged to recognize the value of the experience and expertise accumulated in UNIFEM, and to consider devising mechanisms to pay for it when it was accessed, and that UNDP should prescribe specific levels of resources in each country for the implementation of the Platform for Action, as well as UNIFEM's technical assistance and guidance in the process.

Note by Secretary-General. By a September note [A/51/391], the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly information describing initiatives taken by UNIFEM and its initial response to the recommendations of the external evaluation. The Consultative Committee of UNIFEM at its thirty-sixth session (New York, 31 January-2 February) approved the reformulation of UNIFEM's work around two thematic areas, economic and political empowerment, as called for in the Platform for Action. UNIFEM, formerly the Voluntary Fund for the United Nations Decade for Women [YUN 1976, p. 626], was created to support innovative activities benefiting women in line with national and regional priorities, as well as to serve as a catalyst within the UN system for ensuring the appropriate involvement of women in mainstream development activities and cooperation. The Consultative Committee also provided policy guidance to and approved UNIFEM efforts to participate in and support activities of the UN system-wide coordinated initiatives in the implementation of gender aspects of recommendations emanating from recent UN conferences. It approved a programme that enabled UNIFEM to analyse, publish and disseminate findings and lessons learned from both its own work and experiences gathered in partnership with international, UN system, regional and national organizations on promoting women's political and economic empowerment.

On 16 December, the General Assembly, by decision 51/447, took note of the Secretary-General's note.

UNDP Executive Board action. On 13 September [E/1996/33 dec. 96/43], the UNDP Executive Board, welcoming the report of the external evaluation, took note with appreciation of the initial actions being taken by UNIFEM. It asked UNIFEM to prepare in 1997 a response to the evaluation. The Board decided that UNIFEM should produce a concise strategy and supporting business plan, for submission in 1997, that emphasized its catalytic, mainstreaming and advocacy roles and demonstrated the Fund's intention to work increasingly with strategic and capacity-building activities. It also decided that the strategy should give due consideration to activities in the least developed countries and low-income countries, particularly in Africa, and recommended that UNIFEM continue to focus its programme and strengthen programme design and performance. As to coordination, the Board requested UNIFEM to cooperate closely with the relevant UN bodies and organs to ensure that the Fund's advocacy activities formed part of the UN system-wide efforts in the follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women. The Board decided to consider in 1997 the access to funds by UNIFEM from the support to policy and programme development facility, and that arrangements be explored regarding access by UNIFEM to UNDP resources for purposes within the Fund's mandate and in accordance with the UNDP mandate and objectives.

UNIFEM financing

In a July report [DP/1996/33], the UNDP Administrator provided information on the financial situation of UNIFEM and on steps it proposed to take to re-establish its operational reserve. In addition, he discussed UNIFEM programme strategies since the 1995 World Conference.

As a result of strict monitoring of income and expenditures and diligent management, actual general resource expenditures totalled $12,367,000, which amounted to $4,693,000 less than the amount projected in 1995. As a result of those savings, the unexpended general resource balance at 31 December 1995 amounted to $4,101,000, thus providing a significant step towards the resources needed to rebuild the required operational reserve.

UNDP Executive Board action. On 19 January [E/1996/33 (dec. 96/08)], the UNDP Executive Board authorized UNIFEM, on an exceptional basis in view of the positive balance of resources, to formulate additional new projects in 1996 for a total amount not exceeding $2 million. It asked that UNIFEM in the future submit in writing all proposals requiring the Board's action, in accordance with the established rules for the submission of documentation.

On 13 September [(dec. 96/43)], the Executive Board agreed to the re-establishment of the operational reserve at the initial level of $3 million and asked UNIFEM to submit in 1997 a detailed proposal for the methodology for calculating both the annual approval ceilings and the maintenance of the operational reserve level, in preparation for the re-establishment of the partial funding system. It asked the General Assembly to review the role of the Consultative Committee of UNIFEM, and asked UNIFEM to continue its efforts to diversify its resource base by, among other things, fund-raising from the private sector. The Board decided that UNIFEM should resume biennial reporting on its work to the Board, preferably at its annual session.

Pledging conference. A pledging conference held in November 1996 resulted in $6.4 million in pledges for 1997 from 28 donors, an increase of $674,000 over 1996 pledges.

International Research and Training Institute (INSTRAW)

The Board of Trustees of the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women held its sixteenth session at INSTRAW headquarters in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, from 19 to 23 February 1996 [E/1996/56]. INSTRAW, which began work in 1979 [YUN 1979, p. 901], is an autonomous institution undertaking research and training programmes for the advancement and mobilization of women in development, and aims to raise awareness of women's issues worldwide.

During its 1996 session, the Board reviewed the proposed programme budget for the 1996-1997 biennium and preparations for INSTRAW's participation at the second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) (see PART THREE, Chapter VIII). The Board noted that, in compliance with General Assembly resolution 50/163 [YUN 1995, p. 1181], INSTRAW would start reporting to the Second (Economic and Financial) Committee of the General Assembly on agenda items relating to its research and training activities.

Concerning INSTRAW's overall programme of action, the Board stated that the programme of work should continue to focus on and establish priorities in areas where INSTRAW had already acquired expertise, such as the political and economic empowerment of women; statistics and indicators in gender issues; natural resources and sustainable development; water and waste management; renewable sources of energy; access to credit; women and the media; and issues related to different population groups, especially the elderly and displaced, refugees and migrant women. It was proposed that the girl child be included as a priority area. The Board requested that INSTRAW update its communication technologies and stressed the importance of strengthening communications and networking mechanisms between INSTRAW and its focal points. Recommendations also dealt with strengthening collaboration between INSTRAW, the regional commissions and the Division for the Advancement of Women, and addressing the Platform for Action's 12 critical areas of concern relevant to INSTRAW's research and training programme.

The Board adopted a series of recommendations regarding operational and budgetary matters.

In a June note with later addenda [E/1996/79 & Add.1,2], the Secretary-General circulated biographical material on candidates submitted by Governments to replace three Board members whose terms of office were expiring on 30 June. The Commission on the Status of Women, in March, adopted a resolution [40/5] emphasizing the unique function of INSTRAW as the only entity within the UN system devoted exclusively to research and training for the advancement of women. It recognized the special role that INSTRAW must play in implementing the Platform for Action, and stressed the need for it to further develop active and close cooperation with the specialized agencies and related organizations of the UN system and with other institutions.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ACTION

On 26 July, the Economic and Social Council adopted resolution 1996/39.

International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women

The Economic and Social Council,

Recalling its resolution 1995/45 of 27 July 1995, in which it took note of the report of the Board of Trustees of the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women on its fifteenth session,

Recognizing also General Assembly resolution 50/163 of 22 December 1995, in which the Assembly took note of the same report,

Taking note of the analysis done by the Board of Trustees and its recommendation that the Institute not only report to the Third Committee of the General Assembly, but also to the Second Committee of the General Assembly, under the relevant agenda items, in order to improve the coordination and synergy of its programmes with other economic and social issues,

Recognizing the important role played by the Institute at the Fourth World Conference on Women and in the follow-up to that Conference,

Also recognizing the equally important contributions that the Institute is making in its area of expertise to activities related to the International Conference on Population and Development, the World Summit for Social Development, the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations, the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), held at Istanbul, Turkey, from 3 to 14 June 1996, and the International Year of Older Persons,

Reaffirming the original mandate and distinct capacity of the Institute to carry out research and training for the advancement of women, as stipulated in General Assembly resolution 3520(XXX) of 15 December 1975,

1. Takes note of the report of the Board of Trustees of the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women on its sixteenth session and the decisions contained therein;

2. Commends the work of the Institute on the issues addressing the process of the economic and political empowerment of women; statistics and indicators in gender issues; women, natural resources and sustainable development: water, waste management and renewable sources of energy; and issues related to different groups, such as elderly, displaced, refugee and migrant women;

3. Also commends the Institute for its efforts to further develop active and close cooperation with the specialized and related agencies of the United Nations system, and with other organs, programmes and institutions, so as to promote programmes that contribute to the advancement of women;

4. Reiterates the importance of maintaining the level of resources devoted to independent research and related training activities that are crucial for the empowerment of women;

5. Calls upon States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to contribute through voluntary contributions and pledges to the United Nations Trust Fund for the International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women, thus enabling the Institute to continue to respond effectively to its mandate.

Economic and Social Council resolution 1996/39
26 July 1996 Meeting 51 Adopted without vote
Draft by Guatemala, for Latin American and Caribbean Group, and 10 other States (E/1996/L.36), orally revised; agenda item 5 (e).

Human rights mechanisms

Pursuant to a 1995 request [YUN 1995, p. 1191] of the Commission on the Status of Women, the Secretary-General, in a February report [E/CN.6/1996/9] on the extent to which violations of women's human rights had been addressed by human rights mechanisms, reviewed progress in mainstreaming the human rights of women into the UN human rights programme. The report concluded that, although impressive progress had been made, more remained to be done. Accordingly, the Secretary-General presented various recommendations for action by treaty bodies, non-treaty human rights mechanisms, including the Centre for Human Rights, and through the UN Decade for Human Rights Education (1995-2004) [YUN 1994, p. 1039].

To facilitate the mainstreaming of women's human rights, the Commission had also asked the Secretary-General in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1191] to prepare a joint work plan for the Centre for Human Rights and the Division for the Advancement of Women. In March, he presented a joint work plan for 1996 [E/CN.6/1996/13], which identified areas in which the two bodies could jointly promote the mainstreaming of women's human rights in the human rights regime, in terms of development of norms and standards, monitoring of and reporting on human rights, advisory services and institutions and human rights education, as well as special themes.

Commission action. In March, the Commission on the Status of Women adopted a resolution [40/3] welcoming both reports and emphasizing the need to develop and enhance the role of focal points on the human rights of women, in both the Centre and the Division. The Commission also stressed the need to intensify efforts of cooperation and coordination to ensure that the equal status and the human rights of all women and the girl child were integrated into the mainstream of UN system-wide activities and were addressed regularly and systematically in relevant UN bodies and mechanisms.

Other matters

Education for peace

A January report [E/CN.6/1996/6] of the Secretary-General contained information reflecting changes which occurred in approaches to the role of women in education for peace during the past decade, particularly after the end of the cold war. The Secretary-General examined efforts to move towards a culture of peace in the new political environment and suggested a set of questions that might be addressed by the Commission. Annexed to the report were recommendations made by an expert group meeting (Manila, Philippines, April 1995) on women's contribution to a culture of peace, organized by UNESCO in cooperation with the UN Division for the Advancement of Women.

Chapter XI

Children, youth and ageing persons

During 1996, the year of its fiftieth anniversary, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) continued to focus on improving the situation of children worldwide. In December, the General Assembly commended the Fund for its contribution in promoting child survival, development and protection. A new statement on the mission of UNICEF was adopted by the Executive Board in January, sending out a strong message of support and consensus on the core of the organization's work in the year of its anniversary.

UNICEF cooperated in programmes in 161 countries, the majority of which were in Africa. Total programme expenditures amounted to $684 million, of which the biggest share was spent on child health, including the expanded programme on immunization and oral rehydration therapy. Approximately one fifth of the Fund's expenditures went into emergency operations.

In 1996, UNICEF continued to encourage adherence to the 1990 Convention on the Rights of the Child (see also PART TWO, Chapter I). UNICEF also developed a framework for its emergency operations, including strategies regarding children in need of special protection. Its Executive Board reviewed the mid-decade goals of the 1990 World Summit for Children and urged all countries to develop strategies and programmes to achieve national goals for children by the year 2000. In December, the General Assembly welcomed the progress by most countries in achieving the goals.

In 1996, steps were also taken to implement the World Programme of Action for Youth to the Year 2000 and Beyond, adopted by the Assembly in 1995.

The Economic and Social Council established an informal open-ended support group to assist the Commission for Social Development in the preparations for the International Year of Older Persons, to be observed in 1999.

Children

UN Children's Fund

In 1996, the United Nations Children's Fund cooperated in programmes in 161 countries, the majority of which were in Africa (46), followed by the Americas and the Caribbean (37), Asia (33), Central and Eastern Europe, the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) and the Baltic States (27) and the Middle East and North Africa (18).

Programme expenditures totalled $684 million, of which $232 million (34 per cent) was spent on child health, including the expanded programme on immunization and oral rehydration therapy; $151 million (22 per cent) on planning, advocacy and programme support; $87 million (13 per cent) on water supply; $79 million (12 per cent) on education; $46 million (7 per cent) on child nutrition; and $2 million on emergency operations. The remainder of $87 million (13 per cent) was spent on other programme areas.

Total expenditure on emergency activities was $145 million, of which 34 per cent was for health; 18 per cent for planning, advocacy and programme support; 12 per cent for water; 12 per cent for nutrition; 8 per cent for education; and 14 per cent for other areas. UNICEF operations in 1996 were described in the 1997 UNICEF Annual Report and the report of the Executive Director [E/ICEF/1997/10 (Parts I&II)].

The UNICEF Executive Board held its first regular session from 22 to 25 January, the second from 9 to 12 April, its annual session from 17 to 21 June and the third regular session from 16 to 19 September, all in New York [E/1996/32/Rev.1].

The September session was authorized by General Assembly decision 51/403 A of 17 September. During those sessions, the Board adopted 36 decisions. Its deliberations were reflected in the UNICEF annual report to the Economic and Social Council [E/1996/69].

Programme policies

During 1996, the Executive Board took a number of decisions pertaining to UNICEF programme policies.

In January, the Board adopted the UNICEF mission statement and requested the secretariat to present a conceptual framework, including guiding principles and methodologies, for UNICEF emergency operations. It also endorsed the framework for follow-up to the 1995 Fourth World Conference on Women (see PART THREE, Chapter X). In April, the Board requested the Executive Director to present an information and publication policy. In June, it endorsed the perspectives, policies and strategies regarding children in need of special protection measures.

UNICEF mission statement

In January, the Executive Board adopted a statement on the mission of UNICEF [E/1996/32/Rev.1 (dec. 1996/1)]. It declared, among other things, that UNICEF was guided by the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child [GA res. 44/25] and strove to establish children's rights as enduring ethical principles and international standards of behaviour towards children. UNICEF was non-partisan and its cooperation free of discrimination; it was committed to ensuring special protection for the most disadvantaged children—victims of war, disasters, extreme poverty, all forms of violence and exploitation, and those with disabilities. It worked with all partners towards the attainment of the sustainable human development goals by the world community and the realization of peace and social progress.

Emergency conceptual framework

The Executive Board considered a report on the mission and strategies of UNICEF emergency services [E/ICEF/1996/4], which summarized the purpose of UNICEF, the guiding principles which underpinned its emergency response strategies, and the initiation of measures to ensure UNICEF capacity as an effective humanitarian partner in emergency cooperation.

In January [dec. 1996/2], the Board took note of the report and requested the secretariat to present a conceptual framework, including guiding principles and methodologies, for UNICEF emergency interventions to be presented to the Board at its annual session. It also requested the secretariat to formulate operational papers on the issues listed in the annex to the decision, to be presented to relevant sessions of the Board in 1996 and 1997.

In May, in response to the Board's request, the secretariat presented a report on a conceptual framework for UNICEF emergency interventions [E/ICEF/1996/16]. It discussed the well-being of the child; emergencies and armed conflict as threats to child welfare; principles of emergency action for UNICEF; and implications for UNICEF action. The report stated that the rights and well-being of the child were best assured within a stable and nurturing framework. Armed conflicts, or emergencies that arose as a consequence of natural disaster, increased exponentially the rapidity of negative social change and disrupted or destroyed the political, economic and social structures that underpinned community cohesion and the capacity of families to protect and care for their children. UNICEF sought to facilitate and support interventions not only for child survival, but also for a range of protections and developmental outcomes. The family, especially the mother, must be empowered—through direct interventions as well as through community and supportive social structures—with the knowledge, skills and resources to care for and protect the child. At all levels of society, basic principles which placed value on children were promoted and reinforced by UNICEF. UNICEF emergency programme actions, therefore, were a mixture of advocacy, capacity-building and support to service provision, directed towards mothers, families, communities and the national social and economic environment. While the primary role of UNICEF was to assist government authorities in meeting their obligations towards children, it also might collaborate with and through non-governmental organizations (NGOs) working at community and family levels for child care and protection.

In June, the Board took note [dec. 1996/28] of the conceptual framework for UNICEF emergency interventions and requested the secretariat to finalize all the operational papers identified in its January decision for presentation in a consolidated form to the Board at its first regular session in 1997, reflecting a clear conceptual framework together with its operational implications.

Follow-up to 1990 World Summit for Children

In April, UNICEF submitted a progress report [E/ICEF/1996/15] on follow-up to the 1990 World Summit for Children. It described the mid-decade review of progress in the implementation of the World Declaration on the Survival, Protection and Development of Children and the Plan of Action [A/45/625]; presented the Secretary-General's review of progress since the World Summit; described the goals of the Summit and the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child; and outlined progress at mid-decade. The report was a preview of the Secretary-General's report, which would compile the reports received from Governments and UN agencies.

Report of Secretary-General. In July, the Secretary-General submitted a report [A/51/256] on progress at mid-decade on implementation of General Assembly resolution 45/217 on the World Summit for Children. The report was based on the results of national mid-decade reviews, including reviews from industrialized countries. It discussed the significance of the World Summit and trends at mid-decade; described the Summit follow-up process; examined progress towards the mid-decade goals at the global and regional levels; and gave a goal-by-goal review.

The report concluded that the goals of the World Summit had generated a renewed level of activity on behalf of children around the world, creating new partnerships between Governments, NGOs, donors, the media, civil society and international organizations in pursuit of a common purpose. The most striking progress had been made in immunization coverage, control of diarrhoeal diseases, polio, Guinea worm disease, and iodine deficiency disorders (IDDs), access to safe drinking water and promotion of breastfeeding. Already, 89 countries had reached the end-of-decade target of over 90 per cent coverage of immunization, and the goal of eradication of polio by the year 2000 was promising. In the context of diarrhoeal disease, major progress on the spread of oral rehydration salt/recommended home fluid treatment had been achieved. In iodine deficiency control, almost all countries with an IDD health problem were iodizing salt and about 1.5 billion more people were consuming iodized salt in 1995 than in 1990. The population without access to safe drinking water had fallen by about one third since 1990. The mid-decade goal of promoting breastfeeding by implementing "baby-friendly" regimes in maternity facilities was also effectively met. On the other hand, the lack of progress made in the achievement of certain other goals had to be acknowledged. While under-five mortality had declined in all regions, progress had been too slow to meet the end-of-decade goal, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa and South Asia. There had also been weak, uncertain or even negligible progress towards achieving malnutrition, maternal mortality, sanitation and girls' education goals. However, the overall message was not one of discouragement but the opposite.

The main challenge ahead was the achievement of the goals by the year 2000. That would entail country-level adjustment and mid-course correction on the basis of lessons learned over the past five years. The reviews had generated ideas about new directions, requiring adjustments to national programmes of action or reformulation of goals and strategies in some countries, or paying special attention to capacity-building to ensure sustainability of achievements in others. In the second half of the decade, there would be increasing emphasis on the prioritization of goals and adaptations to suit local situations. Newly created partnerships would have to be strengthened and expanded, inter-agency collaboration built up and support by NGOs, the media and civil society developed to their full potential. In that regard, continued advocacy by UNICEF was important. Fulfilment of the goals would also require continued mobilization of resources at all levels and their cost-effective use to achieve sustainability of universal access to basic social services. The General Assembly should hold a special session in five years' time to examine how far nations had managed to fulfil their "promises for children" and to implement the 1990 World Summit for Children Declaration and Plan of Action.

In June [dec. 1996/21], the Board urged all Governments that had not completed the national review of progress towards implementation of the Declaration and Plan of Action to do so during 1996, and also urged all countries to develop feasible and sustainable strategies and programmes to achieve the nationally adopted goals for children for the year 2000. It requested the Executive Director to encourage all partners to use the lessons learned from the mid-decade review to develop strategies and actions to achieve the goals for the year 2000.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/186.

Progress at mid-decade on the implementation of General Assembly resolution 45/217 on the World Summit for Children

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 45/217 of 21 December 1990 and 50/120 of 20 December 1995 and its decisions 47/447 of 22 December 1992, 48/446 of 21 December 1993 and 49/439 of 19 December 1994,

Noting with appreciation the near universal ratification of the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the significant progress made in national capacities to plan, implement and monitor progress for children within the framework of the needs and rights of the child,

Recognizing the linkage between the eradication of poverty and the achievement of the goals of the World Summit for Children,

1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General, and welcomes the conclusions contained therein;

2. Welcomes the significant progress reported by most countries on achieving the majority of the mid-decade goals and objectives of the World Summit for Children, particularly in immunization, the control of diarrhoeal diseases, poliomyelitis, Guinea worm and iodine deficiency disorders, and access to safe water;

3. Also welcomes the overwhelming response of all countries, especially the developing countries, to the commitments agreed upon at the World Summit for Children;

4. Notes with appreciation the contributions of international and bilateral donors and civil society to the achievement of the goals of the World Summit for Children;

5. Takes note with concern of the considerable variation in the progress made across countries and regions owing to different baseline conditions in 1990 and the varying rates of progress in relation to the goals;

Q. Expresses particular concern that progress on malnutrition, maternal mortality, sanitation, and girls' education has been inadequate, and in some cases negligible;

7. Reaffirms the need for effective follow-up to the World Declaration on the Survival, Protection and Development of Children and the Plan of Action for Implementing the World Declaration on the Survival, Protection and Development of Children in the 1990s;

8. Recognizes the need for more intensive efforts to reach the goals for child mortality, the education of children, in particular girl children, maternal mortality, child malnutrition and sanitation;

9. Also recognizes the important role of the United Nations system in providing coordinated support for the implementation, monitoring and evaluation of the World Declaration and the Plan of Action and the leadership role of the United Nations Children's Fund;

10. Invites Governments to increase, as appropriate, their budget allocations to basic social services for covering the special needs of children in order to facilitate the achievement of the goals set out in the World Declaration and the Plan of Action;

11. Urges developed countries to make increased efforts to mobilize additional resources for the fulfilment of the goals and objectives of the World Summit for Children and to ensure, in the context of their development assistance, that programmes to that end will have a priority when resources are allocated;

12. Encourages civil society and the private sector to continue to support generously the implementation of the goals of the World Summit for Children;

13. Stresses the need for according priority to the special needs of children in regions of slow progress, particularly the least developed countries and sub-Saharan Africa, and in other developing countries that have not yet reached the mid-decade goals;

14. Recognizes the need for continued cooperation and partnership and appropriate international support to those developing countries that have already reached the mid-decade goals or the end-of-decade goals, so as to ensure the sustainability of such achievements;

15. Also recognizes the contribution to the achievement of the goals of the World Summit for Children of the mutual commitment of interested developed and developing country partners to allocate, on average, 20 per cent of official development assistance and 20 per cent of national budgets to basic social programmes;

16. Stresses the need to continue strengthening and expanding effective partnerships between Governments, the United Nations system and other international organizations, international donor agencies, civil society, including non-governmental organizations, the private sector and the media, so as to ensure full achievement of the goals by the year 2000;

17. Also stresses the need for greater efforts to involve children themselves, in accordance with article 12 of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, in all matters affecting them;

18. Further stresses the need for sustainable progress in the attainment of goals through, inter alia, support for national capacity-building, including that of local communities, civil society and non-governmental organizations;

19. Recognizes the importance of fostering exchanges of experience between countries, including South-South cooperation, in order to help disseminate successful programmes;

20. Calls upon all relevant organs, organizations and bodies of the United Nations system to take into account the lessons learned at mid-decade, and invites relevant governing bodies to consider specific measures, within their respective competencies, to address the special needs of children for the achievement of the goals for the year 2000, giving priority to issues and areas where progress has been slow;

21. Also calls upon all relevant bodies and organizations of the United Nations system to strengthen inter-agency collaboration regarding improved protection and assistance for children in especially difficult circumstances, including displaced and refugee children, as well as those suffering from exploitation, and to take the necessary steps to ensure that such collaboration is considered in related policies and programmes;

22. Stresses the necessity and importance of setting measurable indicators and targets and of improving data collection and assessment concerning the implementation of all the goals of the World Summit for Children with regard to the development, protection and survival of children, including the goal of improved protection of children in especially difficult circumstances;

23. Calls upon Governments and their partners, taking into account lessons learned during the mid-decade reviews, to adjust, refine and prioritize, where necessary, their goals and strategies, within the framework of the World Declaration and the Plan of Action and in conformity with the Convention on the Rights of the Child, to respond to local situations;

24. Also calls upon Governments and the United Nations system to promote an active and visible policy of mainstreaming a gender perspective in the implementation of the goals of the World Summit for Children;

25. Urges full integration of the follow-up to the goals of the World Summit for Children into the work of the inter-agency task forces and other mechanisms established to ensure a coordinated and effective follow-up to major United Nations conferences;

26. Urges once again all States that have not yet done so to sign and ratify or accede to the Convention on the Rights of the Child as a matter of priority, with a view to reaching the goal of universal adherence established by the World Summit for Children;

27. Decides to convene a special session of the General Assembly in 2001 to review the achievement of the goals of the World Summit for Children, and to consider the arrangements for the special session at its fifty-third session;

28. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its special session a review of the implementation and results of the World Declaration and the Plan of Action, including appropriate recommendations for further action;

29. Also requests the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session on the preparations for the special session and on progress on the implementation of the present resolution.

General Assembly resolution 51/186

16 December 1996 Meeting 86 Adopted without vote

Approved by Second Committee (A/51/606) without vote, 2 December (meeting 37); draft by Vice-Chairman (A/C.2/51/L.44), based on informal consultations on draft by Costa Rica (for Group of 77 and China), Mexico and Turkey (A/C.2/51/L.8) and orally revised; agenda item 98. Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 2nd Committee 7, 9, 22, 37; plenary 86.

Other action. On 24 July, the Economic and Social Council, by resolution 1996/26, took note of the views of Governments on the elaboration of an international convention on the illicit trafficking in children and the proposals to that effect. It requested the Secretary-General to continue to gather the opinions of Governments on the elaboration of that convention and their suggestions on possible elements to be included in the text of a future binding instrument or instruments on that subject.

Sweden, in cooperation with UNICEF, End Child Prostitution in Asian Tourism and the NGO Group for the Convention on the Rights of the Child, convened the World Congress against Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children (Stockholm, 27-31 August), at which a Declaration and Agenda for Action were adopted.

On 12 December, the General Assembly, by resolution 51/76, urged States to take all necessary measures and to institute legal reforms to ensure the full and equal enjoyment by the girl child of all human rights and fundamental freedoms and to take effective action against violations of those rights and freedoms.

Also on 12 December, the Assembly adopted resolution 51/77 on the rights of the child (see also PART TWO, Chapter X).

Follow-up to the 1995 Fourth World Conference on Women

The Executive Board had before it a follow-up report [E/ICEF/1996/3] on the 1995 Fourth World Conference on Women [YUN 1995, p. 1168]. It stated that UNICEF follow-up action in the implementation of the Beijing Platform for Action would focus on girls' education, adolescent girls' and women's health, and children's and women's rights. Other action included initiatives to help end harmful traditional practices, attention to the gender dimension of emergency programmes and the empowerment of women. UNICEF would support Governments and NGOs and collaborate with other UN agencies and intergovernmental bodies at international, regional and national levels, especially in the implementation of the girl child section of the Platform for Action, focusing on identified priority areas. It would further support the development of networks on those priorities.

In January [dec. 1996/3], the Board endorsed the framework for follow-up to the Conference, emphasizing priorities in advocacy and programming to girls' education, health of the girl child, adolescent girls and women, and children's and women's rights. It encouraged UNICEF to strengthen partnership, coordination and collaboration with UN agencies and entities and NGOs. It requested the Executive Director to report in 1997 on the process undertaken to integrate the Platform for Action into UNICEF country programmes, taking into account the UN commitment to an integrated follow-up of UN conferences (see also PART THREE, Chapter X).

Child protection policy review

The Executive Board discussed a report [E/ICEF/1996/14] on a review of UNICEF policies and strategies on child protection. The report described the background of UNICEF's concern with child protection; reviewed UNICEF's experience during the 10 years since the application of its 1986 policy on behalf of children in especially difficult circumstances [YUN 1986, p. 817]; analysed causes and identified circumstances requiring special protection measures for children; addressed programming and advocacy for special child protection; and detailed organizational implications for UNICEF. The review moved beyond the idea of "children in especially difficult circumstances", as describing certain categories of children in need of additional services, to the idea of "especially difficult circumstances" and the need of "special protection measures" as an important perspective for designing UNICEF programmes of cooperation. The circumstances that put children in special disadvantage included: disabling child labour; war and other forms of organized violence; sexual abuse and exploitation of children; childhood disabilities; loss of family and primary caregivers; and deficient laws and juvenile justice systems. The review recognized that gross violations of children's rights often correlated with poverty indicators such as low family income and high child morbidity and illiteracy. It proposed measures for mainstreaming sectoral programmes to reach and serve specially disadvantaged children and suggested that specific targeted programme activities and advocacy measures be designed and implemented.

In June [dec. 1996/27], the Executive Board endorsed the perspective, policies and strategies presented in the review, emphasizing that the special protection measures should be implemented within the framework of the rights of children. It requested the Executive Director to incorporate the policies and strategies in all relevant UNICEF programmes through mainstreaming and the further development of preventive and protection programmes for all children, especially targeted towards those in need of special protection measures; to enhance UNICEF capacities to assist member States in analysing the situation of children in need of special protection measures and in implementing policies and strategies to that end, in the context of the country programming process; to monitor UNICEF activities in implementing those policies and strategies at the country level; and to strengthen UNICEF partnerships with UN agencies, NGOs, civil society and others active in the issue of children in need of special protection measures. It also requested the Executive Director to report to the Board at its 1997 annual session and to present a plan and a time-frame for further implementation of those policies and strategies.

Maurice Pate Award

The 1996 Maurice Pate Award, established in 1966 [YUN 1966, p. 385] to commemorate the first UNICEF Executive Director, was presented [dec. 1996/9] to the Centre regional pour le développement et la santé (Regional Centre for Health and Development) of Benin for its work in community financing and primary health care.

UNICEF programmes by region

Africa

During 1996, programme expenditure in Africa amounted to $256 million, representing 37 per cent of total UNICEF programme expenditure.

One of UNICEF's highest global priorities was to work with African nations in building solid foundations for peace, democracy and equitable development, based on the rights of children.

In Africa, the turmoil in the Great Lakes region cast a shadow on progress made elsewhere. Armed conflict in Zaire late in the year led to the sudden return of more than 1 million refugees to Rwanda, adding enormous pressures to a country which was beginning to recover from the 1994 civil war. Civil strife persisted in Burundi and worsened in northern Uganda, where civilians, especially children, were victims of rebel raids. Sporadic conflict also continued in parts of Somalia.

In Burundi and Rwanda, UNICEF helped rehabilitate basic health and education services and supplied vaccines, drugs and food supplements. It assisted refugees returning to Burundi and Rwanda from the United Republic of Tanzania and Zaire and helped provide transient and conflict-affected communities with safe water, sanitation, health services, adequate nutrition and the tracing of relatives of unaccompanied children. It also assisted refugees in the United Republic of Tanzania and, with the World Food Programme, provided seeds, tools, health supplies and transportation to some 5,000 displaced persons in Somalia. To assist Mozambique's post-war recovery, UNICEF promoted local and international efforts to clear landmines around schools and health posts.

Joining the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the World Bank and other partners, UNICEF worked with several Governments during the year to plan and implement social programmes aimed at meeting basic needs such as health, sanitation and education. The United Republic of Tanzania and Uganda produced broad strategies to combat poverty that emphasized grass-roots delivery of services. Botswana and South Africa began detailed poverty analyses with advice from UNICEF and others. Madagascar made progress in health care reform and revitalization of local health services based on the community-participation approach of the 1987 Bamako Initiative [YUN 1987, p. 859]. Ethiopia and Malawi launched social action funds that provided matching grants to community initiatives. South Africa launched its national programme of action (NPA) for children. UNICEF supported the NPA steering committee in setting national goals for children and in giving provinces a more active role in achieving them. In Uganda, where 12 out of 39 districts had finalized plans of action for children and another 15 had drafted their plans, the Government provided grants directly to districts, mainly for health and education.

A number of countries in the region streamlined basic services by shifting responsibility for their planning and maintenance from central to local authorities. Cost savings provided a bonus to Zambia's community-managed and district-facilitated programmes that since 1995 had brought safe water and sanitation to 10 districts most afflicted by drought and water-borne disease. By the end of 1996, some 500 village management committees had been established and 150 villagers had been trained in handpump installation and repair, latrine construction and hygiene education. In Ethiopia and Uganda, UNICEF helped the Governments test ways of involving community members more closely in the planning of social services.

While all countries in the region had ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child, only eight had submitted their first reports on implementation of the Convention. Country programmes were placing more emphasis on rights of care and protection for children who lived and worked on the street or who were affected by violence and HIV/AIDS. Other priorities included protection for children in hazardous employment or in conflict with the law, and the health needs and rights of adolescents.

A broad range of communication projects targeted issues such as HIV/AIDS prevention and female genital mutilation. To combat HIV/AIDS, which was growing in the region, UNICEF assisted programmes that combined communication for behavioural change and prevention with better medical treatment of sexually transmitted diseases.

In the area of education, in addition to providing funds and training, UNICEF helped Governments to design innovative teaching methods and update textbooks. In Madagascar, with the support of UNICEF, over 200 communities so far had drawn up school-improvement contracts. In Uganda, a UNICEF-assisted school project set up one- and two-room "complementary" schools benefiting 3,200 children in areas with limited access to conventional schools. The African Girls' Education Initiative, launched in 1996 and funded by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) and Norway, would expand education opportunities for girls in 19 African countries.

In West and Central Africa, poverty continued to be the silent killer of children. The region was enjoying slow but steady economic growth in most countries, but the benefits were not well distributed and rarely reached the poor.

One of the most important and successful ways communities were helping themselves was through participation in the Bamako Initiative, which aimed to improve the health of women and children through community-level funding and management of essential drugs. As a result of strong community involvement, more than 80 per cent of Bamako Initiative health centres in the region self-financed their operating costs, excluding salaries and vaccines.

Largely through the Bamako Initiative and similar community-based programmes, many countries were able to make substantial progress in achieving several mid-decade and year 2000 goals for children. With regard to immunization, in some two thirds of the countries, 60 per cent of children were vaccinated against tuberculosis. Almost half of the region's countries provided more than 60 per cent of their children with immunization against diphtheria, pertussis and tetanus, while only a third managed that level of immunization against polio and measles. With regard to Guinea worm disease (dracunculiasis) eradication, in just 10 years (1986-1996), the region reduced the number of cases from 3 million to a little over 30,000. In the area of iodine deficiency disorders, every country in the region had passed or was drafting laws requiring salt iodization.

Efforts to improve access to education presented mixed results in the region. In Central Africa, the numbers of children enrolling in primary school had stagnated or fallen, while in West Africa the numbers had risen, especially for girls. The once bleak education prospects for girls had brightened recently as a result of several new initiatives aimed at making school a more inviting, rewarding place. Ten countries in the region (Benin, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Chad, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Niger, Senegal) stood to benefit from the Girls' Education Initiative. UNICEF assisted Governments to set up programmes that would benefit girls, especially in Burkina Faso, Mali and Senegal. Programmes were also carried out to raise girls' self-esteem.

Armed conflict profoundly affected the region during 1996. At a two-day mini-summit held in July (Yaounde, Cameroon), 100 children from 10 countries affected by conflict discussed UNICEF'S Anti-war Agenda and presented government officials with proposals for action. To help meet the needs of children and women in fast-deteriorating situations, UNICEF in 1996 strengthened its field office capacity to forecast emergencies by establishing easily accessible indicators to analyse socio-economic and political conditions in countries, many of which were becoming increasingly tense and unstable.

Asia and the Pacific

In 1996, programme expenditure in Asia totalled $210 million, or 31 per cent of UNICEF's total programme expenditure for the year.

In East Asia and the Pacific, while economic growth had increased resources that could be channelled into programmes for children's rights and had pushed awareness of social and political issues to a new high in some countries, the rapid development had widened the gap between rich and poor and weakened the traditional social fabric. Millions of the region's children were increasingly prey to abuse and neglect, family violence, crime, drugs and HIV/AIDS, trends that were growing along with national economies.

With the exception of the Cook Islands, every country in the region had ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child. In 1996, UNICEF provided technical support to more than a dozen countries engaged in reviewing and revising legislation and national policies to make them consistent with the Convention. Regional efforts to implement child rights included the first Asian Summit on Child Rights and the Media held in July 1996 (Manila, Philippines).

Efforts to achieve the year 2000 goals for children established at the 1990 World Summit greatly advanced children's survival and development prospects throughout the region. Between 55 and 75 per cent of children were covered against the six major vaccine-preventable childhood diseases. However, difficult challenges remained in other areas, including maternal mortality, child malnutrition and access to adequate sanitation, with 60 per cent of the population still not covered. To reach the 10 to 20 per cent of children in the region not covered by programmes to improve access to basic services such as health care and nutrition, water and sanitation and primary schooling, UNICEF was working with Governments. For example, Cambodia, China, the Lao People's Democratic Republic, the Philippines and Viet Nam began reducing gender inequalities that could hinder access to services for girls and women. In addition to boosting girls' education, they combined income-generating projects with functional literacy and "Facts for Life" training to increase women's skills, decision-making power and opportunities. In Viet Nam, UNICEF-supported microcredit programmes reached over 43,000 women.

The spread of HIV/AIDS was a major concern in the region, especially among young children, teenagers and those exploited in the sex industry. A three-year $6.1 million project was launched, with funds from the Netherlands Government and the Netherlands National Committee for UNICEF, targeting the six countries of the Mekong region (Cambodia, China, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Myanmar, Thailand, Viet Nam) to support awareness-raising, training and information-sharing activities, and the introduction of life-skills training into formal and non-formal educational curricula.

In South Asia, major successes had been achieved with little means, especially when communities had become motivated to effect profound and lasting change. Bangladesh, for example, had achieved the majority of its mid-decade goals for children, doubled the percentage of households with access to sanitary facilities and increased measles immunization coverage from 54 per cent to nearly 80 per cent of children.

Every country in the region had ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child. Several had taken steps to incorporate those rights into laws, programmes and national policies. Child protection issues received unprecedented attention at the Third Ministerial Conference on South Asian Children held in August (Raw-alpindi, Pakistan). The Conference agreed to work towards the elimination of hazardous child labour by the year 2000 and of all other forms of child labour by the year 2010.

Regional achievements in meeting mid-decade goals for children included the virtual elimination of Guinea worm disease, significant progress in the promotion of breastfeeding and the reduction of measles deaths. In addition, about 80 per cent of the region's population had access to safe water, but the rapid decrease in the underground water supply, with the lowering of water-tables, could pose severe problems in the future.

In Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and several states in India, UNICEF supported household surveys on vital aspects of the situation of children and women and, in Bangladesh, assisted the collection of comparable data on child health annually in 39,000 households for the last four years.

Unfortunately, strategies to combat malnutrition had largely failed, with tragic consequences for South Asia's children, especially in urban areas where it was on the increase. Addressing malnutrition was a top priority for UNICEF, whose initiative was aimed at improving caring practices of families and planning community-wide action. The success of nutrition and other UNICEF programmes depended on strong community involvement. Among the many efforts to support opportunities for girls and women and increase their involvement in community life, UNICEF expanded the Meena communication initiative, an animation and multimedia project that offered positive solutions to discrimination against girls in family and community life.

Americas and the Caribbean

Programme expenditure in the Americas and the Caribbean totalled $95 million in 1996, or 14 per cent of total expenditure.

The resources of many countries of the region were strained by poverty, debt or the lingering effects of violent conflict, which made the realization of children's rights difficult. Economic growth was a modest 3 per cent in 1996, well short of the 6 or 7 per cent the World Bank estimated countries would need to reduce poverty.

Nevertheless, child rights found vital expression in the region's activities, which had widened to include not only protection for children in difficult circumstances but also the survival, protection and development of all children. Nine countries (Bolivia, Brazil, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Peru) reformed legislation to incorporate the rights set forth in the Convention on the Rights of the Child. At the Caribbean Conference on the Rights of the Child (Belize, October 1996), 16 heads of State or Government agreed to harmonize national laws with the principles of the Convention. Thirty countries signed the Santiago Accord, which identified new priorities for the realization of child rights.

An assessment of progress made towards achieving the World Summit goals highlighted positive results on several fronts, but indicated the need for redoubled efforts on others, especially in the areas of infant and maternal mortality. Immunization against the six basic vaccine-preventable diseases of childhood, with the exception of measles, reached well over 80 per cent of children under one year old by mid-decade. In 1996, Rotary International agreed to work with UNICEF to eliminate measles in the region by the year 2000. The region achieved notable success with programmes fortifying common foods with micronutrients to counter widespread deficiencies of vitamin A, iodine and iron:

In maternal and child health, Bolivia launched a UNICEF-assisted National Insurance System for Maternity and Childhood, a programme of basic health services, and made substantial progress in tackling diarrhoea. The use of oral rehydration therapy increased from 32 per cent in 1989 to 84 per cent in 1996, while the regional average was 64 per cent. Haiti began a nationwide project to upgrade the training of skilled birth attendants and to renovate 12 maternity units.

Access to primary education in the region was almost universal and most countries had more than 50 per cent of students reaching grade 5; the regional average was 73 per cent. Those numbers, however, masked hidden and lingering problems, such as low-quality education and lack of access for marginalized children and the poor, especially in remote areas. More than 30 million children in Latin America had no access to basic education.

Middle East and North Africa

Programme expenditure in 1996 totalled $69 million in the Middle East and North Africa, or 10 per cent of total expenditure.

Children's needs in much of the region, which devoted a higher proportion of its national budgets to defence than any other region, were hostage to military budgets and poverty. One third of its children were directly affected by war or civil strife, which disrupted food production, health services, water and sanitation systems and schooling, adding to the burdens of growing numbers of people already living in poverty. Among the region's challenges were providing children with care and protection during and after armed conflict, and ensuring that girls' rights to equality were taken seriously by families, communities and Governments.

All countries of the region had ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child, and it was endorsed by the Palestinian Authority in 1996. Nine countries (Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Morocco, Oman, Sudan, Syrian Arab Republic, Yemen) had also established special task forces or councils for children.

Most countries had already achieved or exceeded the year 2000 goals for education, which meant that at least 80 per cent of their primary school-age children had reached grade 5. However, persistent problems included low quality of materials and curricula, poor teacher training, insufficient understanding of material being taught, and cultural ideas and practices favouring the success of boys. To increase girls' enrolment and achievement in school, Egypt, Morocco, the Sudan, Tunisia and Yemen set up innovative, community-based programmes, many of which relied on non-formal schooling centres set up close to girls' homes. One indicator of the low priority given to the rights of females was the fact that only 9 out of 19 countries in the region had ratified the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women [GA res. 34/180], and many of those countries had attached reservations. To promote the rights of girls and women in Egypt, a UNICEF-supported credit programme for women, based on the highly successful Grameen Bank model in Bangladesh, provided credit to some 4,000 women by the end of 1996, with 1,000 new loans given out during the year.

To help reduce the region's high maternal death rate, UNICEF broadened its approach to safe motherhood to incorporate human rights, communication, education and gender programmes, with a special focus on the rights and needs of adolescents. In Iraq, 1,500 health workers and midwives received training in how to identify high-risk pregnancies and make timely referrals to clinics and hospitals. In Yemen, a country with one of the highest maternal death rates in the world (1,400 per 100,000 births), the Ministry of Health launched a five-year plan to upgrade the skills of 4,000 community midwives and strengthen local health services for women.

For most countries, immunization rates in 1996 were substantially higher than in 1990. Polio immunization reached 87 per cent of children, up from 79 per cent in 1990. Measles coverage increased from 70 to 86 per cent in the same period. No polio cases had been reported in the past two years in Jordan, Morocco, Oman, Qatar, Tunisia and the West Bank and Gaza. In Djibouti, Egypt, Iraq, Oman, the Sudan and the West Bank and Gaza, vitamin-A supplements became a part of primary health care and nutrition programmes. During the year, the Sudan reached 4.5 million children under two years old with vitamin-A supplements.

In the region's several emergency countries, especially Iraq and the Sudan, UNICEF helped provide communities with the means to operate and maintain programmes covering health, nutrition, water and sanitation and primary education.

Central and Eastern Europe, CIS and the Baltic States

Programme expenditure in Central and Eastern Europe, CIS and the Baltic States totalled $50 million in 1996, or 7 per cent of total programme expenditure.

UNICEF focused most of its support activities on strengthening local health services, which had seriously deteriorated along with many families' income. To address the problem of high death rates among infants and women, UNICEF was placing strong emphasis on preventive measures, such as upgrading local health services and improving infant and child nutrition. Diphtheria, which had reached epidemic proportions in all 15 of the newly independent States in the early 1990s, was one of the first targets of emergency vaccination. As a result of a mass campaign undertaken by UNICEF, the World Health Organization (WHO), the United States Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies from July 1995 to June 1996, 145 million people between the ages of 3 and 50 were immunized against diphtheria. Thirteen countries continued national immunization days against polio, started in 1995, and six others concentrated their medical resources on groups or areas at special risk. Emergency campaigns immunized 3 million children and adults in Albania and 230,000 under-five-year-olds in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro). Polio vaccines and other assistance were provided by UNICEF in conjunction with WHO, Rotary International and local NGOs.

UNICEF launched a winter emergency programme in Kyrgyzstan to provide heating fuel, blankets, basic drugs and school supplies to remote rural areas. Two surveys in Kyrgyzstan identified serious vitamin-C deficiencies and a high incidence of goitre, a problem in nearly every country in the region. UNICEF worked with Belarus, the Russian Federation and Ukraine to promote salt iodization and help salt manufacturers meet standards. A survey in the Republic of Moldova found that between 20 and 50 per cent of under-two-year-olds had rickets. In March, experts and policy makers in Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan mapped out strategies for increasing breastfeeding promotion and child nutrition research, among other goals.

The situation of children living in institutions (orphaned, abandoned or imprisoned for juvenile offences) demanded urgent attention throughout the region. UNICEF's Romania office evaluated the country's institutions in 1996, recommending that State funds be shifted from institutionalizing children to strengthening foster care and adoption services. Azerbaijan launched a pilot programme with the Ministry of Education to improve living conditions in orphanages. UNICEF assisted the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to train teams of psychologists, teachers and social workers in procedures for placing children in foster care.

All countries in the region had ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child, and 12 had submitted their initial reports on its implementation.

UNICEF programmes by sector

Strengthening health systems

UNICEF continued to be a key partner in health systems reforms. A major review of the Bamako Initiative [YUN 1987, p. 859] was undertaken in several African and Asian countries, and operations research activities were completed in 1995-1996. Results of the studies had been disseminated widely, and lessons learned from the process were applied by country programmes involved in health reform and strengthening of essential health services. Experiences in health reform in Bangladesh, Botswana, Ecuador, Indonesia, Zambia and Zimbabwe were reviewed, leading to recommendations and the formulation of a two-year plan of action to be approved by the Executive Board.

UNICEF and WHO launched the State of World's Vaccines and Immunization, which highlighted the current development of a range of new and improved vaccines, while drawing attention to their unavailability and unaffordability for developing countries. In 1996, UNICEF continued to play a major role in vaccine procurement, with 1.2 billion doses procured, more than half of which were oral polio vaccines for the global polio eradication programme. In April [dec. 1996/17], the Executive Board approved an extension of the programme of cooperation with the PolioPlus programme of Rotary International from 1996 to 2000; it also approved extension of the Vaccine Independence Initiative for the same period.

UNICEF and WHO promoted an integrated approach to the prevention and management of childhood diseases (Integrated Management of Childhood Diseases) and strengthened their support to the implementation of a Geographical Information System (GIS) at the country level to better monitor the health status of children and women. Initially implemented for the monitoring of Guinea worm disease in 20 African countries, GIS had been gradually expanded to other programmes, such as immunization surveillance and maternal mortality monitoring, and to other regions, such as Asia.

In September [dec. 1996/31], the Executive Board took note of the outline of an implementation plan for the health strategy [E/ICEF/1996/19].

Maternal mortality

In 1996, UNICEF released new estimates for maternal mortality which indicated a worldwide total of 585,000 deaths per year, almost 20 per cent higher than previously thought. Those figures had served to raise awareness and reinvigorate activities to reduce maternal mortality. In response, UNICEF programmes gave heightened attention to the goal of maternal mortality reduction. There was a common understanding of the major immediate causes of maternal deaths and of health interventions required to significantly reduce women's risk of dying during childbirth or of pregnancy-related causes, including increased access to family planning services, pregnancy-related health care and emergency obstetric service in the case of complications. UNICEF reinforced cooperation with several agencies working towards the reduction of maternal mortality. A number of countries, notably Bangladesh, Indonesia, Mali, Romania and Viet Nam, initiated programmes that combined training of midwives, better access to family planning and women's health services, and improved emergency obstetric care.

Adolescent health

Young people's health was a relatively new priority for UNICEF, but it had been identified as a UNICEF priority in a growing number of countries such as Benin, the Caribbean countries, Cote d'Ivoire, Honduras, Myanmar, the Philippines, South Africa, Thailand, Uganda, Zambia and Zimbabwe. Programme priorities included national planning and policies for youth health, school health programmes, youth-friendly health services, youth NGOs, and news and entertainment. To address the issue of adolescents seriously affected by HIV/AIDS, UNICEF reinforced its involvement in AIDS prevention world-wide through the coordination mechanism of the Joint and Co-sponsored UN Programme on HIV/AIDS, and at the country level through the implementation of multisectoral approaches, including HIV/AIDS prevention and care activities targeted at women and young people. In particular, UNICEF supported several school-based interventions in Thailand, Uganda and Zimbabwe; had been involved in a major communication project on HIV/AIDS in South Africa; and was working on that issue at a subregional level in the Mekong project in South-East Asia.

Nutrition and household food security

All but 15 developing countries in the world had introduced programmes to iodize all edible salt to combat iodine deficiency, and some of those 15 countries were expected to do so in the near future. During 1996, due to the worldwide increase in the use of iodized salt, it was estimated that up to 12 million newborns were spared from any risk of mental retardation based on iodine deficiency. Based on iodized salt usage, the number of babies born in 1996 who would suffer from cretinism due to iodine deficiency was likely to be less than 40,000 worldwide. Many countries had also dramatically reduced the incidence of severe vitamin-A deficiency. However, the prevalence of mild and moderate vitamin-A deficiency, which had no obvious clinical signs, had been recognized to be far more widespread and to have more serious consequences for child survival. Therefore, the goals had been modified to focus on ensuring that all children received an adequate intake of vitamin A rather than eliminating clinical deficiency. Linking vitamin-A supplementation with national immunization days had been a highly successful strategy and had resulted in very high "coverage" of vitamin A in several large countries, including Bangladesh. In Mauritania, an innovative "health and nutrition day" immunized children and, at the same time, administered both vitamin-A capsules and an anti-helminthic drug. In Bolivia, UNICEF supported the introduction of vitamin-A-fortified sugar as a cost-effective way of increasing vitamin-A intake in the medium term; similar approaches were being considered in the Philippines and Uganda.

Several UNICEF country offices in Latin America and the Middle East were working with Governments and the food industry to support the introduction of iron fortification programmes. In Venezuela, an evaluation of legislation which required all wheat and maize flour to be fortified with iron and B vitamins concluded that the programme had halved the prevalence of anaemia in children between the ages of 7 and 15 years at a time when economic conditions were deteriorating.

During 1996, the number of baby-friendly hospitals almost doubled, from 4,282 to 8,319, as a result of a strong partnership with Governments, NGOs and individual hospitals.

Basic education

UNICEF consolidated its major initiative in girls' education, focusing on efforts to make education affordable for Governments and parents; revising curricula and learning materials to eliminate stereotypes; transforming the learning environment to attract and retain girls in schools; recruiting more women teachers; ensuring that teacher-education curricula included gender discrimination issues; and encouraging greater community participation. CIDA, Norway and the Rockefeller Foundation were among the partners for the girls' education initiative. A programme to strengthen NGOs in Africa to support and provide girls' education was initiated; 34 countries had already committed to the programme.

The mid-decade review of educational achievement took place in Amman, Jordan, in 1996. UNICEF organized two meetings regarding mid-decade reviews of education for Africa, one in Yaounde, Cameroon, for West and Central Africa and the other in Johannesburg, South Africa, for eastern and southern Africa. African ministers of education attending the reviews pledged to give priority to the collection and analysis of education statistics and to use them in planning. They also committed themselves to examine issues related to the cost and financing of education, especially to ensure girls' education. During the mid-decade period, there was little improvement in closing the gender gap and in advancing the quality of learning in primary education. UNICEF assisted in re-establishing education programmes in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Rwanda after the disruptions caused by the civil conflicts. The "edukit", developed for education in emergency situations, was being expanded to combine the provision of basic materials for teaching and learning with in-service teacher training for community teachers.

Water supply and sanitation

During 1996, country programmes in Bangladesh, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Guinea, Honduras, Mali, Panama and Viet Nam demonstrated renewed emphasis on promoting sanitation and hygiene education at the primary-school level. In Burkina Faso and Guinea-Bissau, new approaches to health and sanitation at the community level were being developed in collaboration with the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine and the International Water and Sanitation Centre in the Netherlands. The Swedish International Development Authority helped UNICEF to strengthen sanitation programmes in southern Africa and to introduce appropriate sanitation technology in West and Central Africa. Consensus was reached with the World Bank on collaboration in several countries in Africa to accelerate progress in household water security and environmental sanitation in the context of the United Nations System-wide Special Initiative on Africa (see PART THREE, Chapter III). A joint strategy for water supply and sanitation was developed with WHO.

UNICEF finances

In 1996, UNICEF income totalled $944 million, compared to $1,011 million in 1995. Contributions from Governments and intergovernmental organizations accounted for 64 per cent of total income, with the remainder coming from non-governmental sources and UN agencies. Of the total, $551 million went to general resources, $287 million to supplementary funds, and $106 million to emergency funds.

Budget appropriations

In April [dec. 1996/7], the UNICEF Executive Board approved the following respective amounts for general resources and supplementary funding: Africa, $841,000 and $490,000; the Americas and the Caribbean, $18,479,000 and $92,301,000; Asia, $117,470,000 and $234,138,000; Central and Eastern Europe, CIS and the Baltic States, $16,900,000 and $54,150,000; and the Middle East and North Africa, $156,000 for general resources.

In September [dec. 1996/29], it approved additional amounts for Africa, $198,900,000 and $333,344,000; for the Americas and the Caribbean, $53,750,000 and $145,602,000; for Asia, $43,257,649 and $74,689,000; for Central and Eastern Europe, CIS and the Baltic States, $8,670,000 and $12,600,000; and for the Middle East and North Africa, $43,010,000 and $61,000,000.

In April, the Board also approved, under the general resources programme budget for 1996-1997, $29,540,000 for allocation to field offices, in view of the integrated budget proposed for headquarters and regional offices [dec. 1996/12], and $81.7 million under the supplementary-funded programme budget for the same biennium [dec. 1996/13].

Also in April, the Board considered the proposed integrated UNICEF budget for 1996-1997 for headquarters and regional offices

[E/ICEF/1996/AB/L.5 & Corr.1] and the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) [E/ICEF/1996/AB/L.7]. On 12 April [dec. 1996/10], the Board requested the Executive Director to consider how further progress could be made towards greater transparency in the UNICEF budget and greater clarity in the budget document. It took note of the report of ACABQ, and approved a commitment of $346 million for the headquarters and regional offices budget for the 1996-1997 biennium. It affirmed UNICEF's policy commitment to sustain implementation of the Bamako Initiative in the field and to preserve professional assistance.

The Board approved [dec. 1996/14] an additional allocation of $715,900 for administrative and programme support, to be added to the $174.8 million approved for field offices, for additional offices in Central and Eastern Europe, CIS and the Baltic States for 1996-1997, and authorized the secretariat to establish liaison offices in Minsk (Belarus), Moscow (Russian Federation) and Kiev (Ukraine).

In September [dec. 1996/34], the Board took note of proposals for the allocation of general resources. It reaffirmed the principles of eligibility, and that the modified allocation system should continue to be based on the core criteria of child population, the under-five mortality rate and per capita gross national product; reflect the need to give higher priority to the low-income countries, in particular the least developed; and be sufficiently flexible to accommodate evolving needs of children in recipient countries and in countries in special circumstances.

In June [dec. 1996/26], the Board approved a medium-term plan [E/ICEF/1996/AB/L.10] as a framework of projections for 1996-1999.

Harmonization of budgets

In April, the Executive Board heard an oral progress report on the harmonization of budget presentations by UNDP, the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) and UNICEF, in response to General Assembly resolution 49/216 E [YUN 1994, p. 1370]. The report said a preliminary comparison of the three organizations' budgets covering headquarters activities had been completed and a comparison of field activities would be undertaken in 1997. More work was needed to present a comprehensive picture of the substantive issues involved.

On 12 April [dec. 1996/16], the Board asked for a comparison of budget presentations, definitions of terms used by the three organizations, and an indication of steps needed for further harmonization.

At its annual session in June, UNICEF stated that the organizations had agreed on the development of a common resource plan and the related definitions or components to be included under each heading. The plan would have three sections: total resources available to the organization; use of resources under programme activities, programme support activities and management and administration of the organization; and a reconciliation between estimates included under the use of resources and the budget estimates.

On 26 July, the Economic and Social Council, in resolution 1996/42, urged the funds and programmes of the UN system to finalize work on the harmonization of their budget presentations in time for a final decision to be made by their respective Boards in advance of the 1998-1999 biennium, and to include in that work a common presentational framework for the budget based on agreed definitions and usage of budget terms and the identification of additional steps required for further harmonization and improved transparency.

Greeting Card Operation

In a financial report for the year ended 30 April 1996 [E/ICEF/1997/AB/L.9], the Executive Director stated that in 1995 the contribution of the Greeting Card Operation (GCO) to UNICEF general resources was $150 million with 158 million cards sold, about the same as in 1994. However, gross proceeds increased from $153.6 million in 1994 to $166.5 million in 1995.

In June [dec. 1996/22], the Board approved budgeted expenditures of $99.8 million for the fiscal year 1 May 1996 to 30 April 1997 and noted that, for the fiscal year 1 May 1996 to 30 April 1997, GCO net proceeds were budgeted at $274.4 million, as set out in the budget document [E/ICEF/1996/AB/L.11]. It also approved changes in posts with a net increase of eight posts. It renewed the Fund-raising Development Programme with $7.8 million established for 1996; the Market Development Programme with $4 million; and the Central and Eastern European National Committees Development Programme, which included 10 countries, with a budget of $1.5 million. The Board further approved the change of the GCO fiscal year from 1 May-30 April to 1 January-31 December and authorized the Executive Director to incur expenditures in the 1996 fiscal year related to costs of goods delivered (production/purchase of raw materials, cards and other products) for the 1997 fiscal year up to $45 million. It encouraged GCO to work with National Committees to ensure that a larger portion of funds raised by them were channelled to UNICEF general resources.

Organizational and administrative questions

Joint Committees

At its fifth meeting (Paris, 6-7 May), held in the context of the mid-decade review of Education for All (EFA), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization/UNICEF Joint Committee on Education reviewed the implementation of the recommendations of its last (1994) meeting [YUN 1994, p. 1212]. While recognizing the significant progress made in the common efforts for achieving EFA goals, the meeting underlined the formidable obstacles that were faced in that regard. The need for even greater synergy and complementarity in the work of the two organizations was strongly emphasized by all participants. The Joint Committee made recommendations on, among other things, continued collaboration in the area of capacity-building for planning and management of basic education, educational statistics, monitoring learning achievement, teachers, education of girls and women and education in emergency situations, as well as collaboration in relation to the Rights of the Child Convention.

In June [dec. 1996/23], the Board took note of the Joint Committee's report and its recommendations [E/ICEF/1996/P/L.63].

The UNICEF/World Health Organization (WHO) Joint Committee on Health Policy held a special session (Geneva, 15-16 May), during which it reviewed WHO resolutions and UNICEF decisions; considered the progress made at mid-decade and the preparation for the year 2000 as a follow-up to the 1990 World Summit for Children; and discussed the UN System-wide Special Initiative on Africa.

In April [dec. 1996/19], the Executive Board elected to the Joint Committee on Health Policy for the remainder of the 1995-1996 biennium from the Asian group of States: Suyono Yahya, as member, and Nyoman Kumara Rai, as alternate, both from Indonesia.

In June [dec. 1996/24], the Board took note of the Committee's report and recommendations [E/ICEF/1996/P/L.64].

International Child Development Centre

In July, the Executive Director presented a progress report [E/ICEF/1996/20] and proposed activities for 1997-1999 for the International Child Development Centre in Florence, Italy. It summarized the work carried out by the Centre during 1994-1996 and, in an annex, provided an estimated breakdown of expenditures for 1997-1999.

In September [dec. 1996/30], the Executive Board authorized a three-year extension for the Centre for the period 1997-1999, with a total allocation of $10.5 million in supplementary funding, of which 10.5 billion lire (approximately $6.7 million) had been pledged by Italy, for the Centre's core activities, with the remainder to be sought from other donors for specific activities.

Strengthening accountability and oversight

In January [dec. 1996/4], the Executive Board noted a November 1995 report on the audit of the Kenya country office [YUN 1995, p. 1207], revealing irregularities, mismanagement and fraud. In March [E/ICEF/1996/CRP.10], the secretariat submitted to the Board for comment the draft report of the Secretary-General on enhancing the internal oversight mechanisms in operational funds and programmes.

A further report on the audit of the Kenya office by the Office of Internal Audit [E/ICEF/1997/AB/L.2] stated that UNICEF internal auditors undertook a follow-up audit in September 1996.

The follow-up confirmed that efforts to implement the auditors' 67 recommendations and to establish a strong internal control environment within the Kenya office had secured positive results. Until the strengthened controls could be fully tested, the UNICEF Regional Office for Eastern and Southern Africa would be undertaking quarterly checks to ensure that internal controls were operating effectively. More generally, oversight of all field offices had been strengthened, and UNICEF internal auditors, when selecting field offices to visit, were taking into account the type of risk factors that had been evident in the case of the Kenya office.

Management excellence programme

In January, the Executive Board considered a progress report on the management excellence programme in UNICEF [E/ICEF/1996/AB/L.3]. The report discussed the mission statement of UNICEF (see above), external consultancies on supply, information resources and financial management, and staff participation.

A February report [E/ICEF/1996/AB/L.6] outlined staff participation; described consultation with the Board; and presented proposals for further action. An annex contained UNICEF guiding principles for staff commitment and conduct. A report in May [E/ICEF/1996/AB/L.9] discussed the convergence of management excellence recommendations and their linkages to a Booz-Allen & Hamilton study. An annex to the report contained a timetable for management excellence recommendations.

A July progress report [E/ICEF/1996/AB/L.13] contained recommendations on the roles of country, regional and headquarters offices and responsibility for managing relations with National Committees for UNICEF. It described recent progress in UNICEF organizational reform in the areas of strengthening accountability, streamlining of headquarters, strengthening operations systems, improving human resources management and strengthening cooperation with UN agencies, and provided background information for policy discussions. In an annex, follow-up action in response to the Booz-Allen & Hamilton study was presented.

In September [dec. 1996/33], the Board endorsed the future roles of National Committees and the UNICEF-wide integrated strategy to manage the relationship in partnership with them, including the required structure and accountability, and encouraged UNICEF to consider ways in which it could work with the civil society in each country. The Board noted that the establishment of a new National Committee in a country where there was a UNICEF office and an approved country programme would depend on the mutual agreement between UNICEF, the respective Government and the potential organizers of the National Committee. It requested the Executive Director to present an oral report on the implementation of that policy to its 1998 annual session.

Also in September [dec. 1996/32], the Board endorsed the incremental approach of the secretariat to implement the management excellence programme. It requested the secretariat to submit at its 1997 second regular and annual sessions an oral report and a paper reflecting the status of the organizational changes and the lines of communication and responsibility for UNICEF as a whole and individually at the headquarters, regional and country levels. The UNICEF secretariat was to report on oversight in 1997. The Board welcomed the intention of the secretariat to develop systems for finance, supply functions, improved information technology and management information resources, including the Programme Manager System.

Communication and information

In April [dec. 1996/15], the Executive Board reaffirmed the importance of public information and advocacy measures to promote increased awareness and better understanding of the activities of UNICEF. It requested the Executive Director to take into consideration accessibility and linguistic balances in the development of electronic dissemination of information and encouraged her to present an information and publications policy, taking account of the need to prioritize UNICEF's publications, with special attention to the risk of duplication with other UN publications and the financial and human constraints of UNICEF.

Documentation

In 1996 UNICEF, UNDP and UNFPA established a working group on document distribution issues.

In May [E/ICEF/1996/17], the Working Group on Documentation made recommendations on length of documents, submission of documents to the UN Office of Conference and Support Services, electronic distribution of documentation and translation and processing of documents outside the UN system.

In September [dec. 1996/35], the Board established page limits for documents.

Annual reports

In April [dec. 1996/8], the Executive Board took note of the Executive Director's annual report to the Economic and Social Council [E/ICEF/1996/10 (Part II)] and decided to transmit it to the Council, together with its comments.

The Council, by decision 1996/228 of 10 July, took note of the Board's reports on its first and second regular sessions and the extract from its report on its 1996 annual session [E/1996/L.19]. It also took note of the UNICEF annual report to the Council [E/1996/69].

In April [dec. 1996/20], the Board approved dates for its 1997 sessions: first regular session, 20-24 January; second regular session, 17-21 March; annual session, 2-6 June; and third regular session, 8-12 September.

Fiftieth anniversary of UNICEF

In 1996, UNICEF commemorated its fiftieth anniversary under the overall theme "Children First".

In January [dec. 1996/4], the Executive Board took note of the report on preparations for commemorating the anniversary [YUN 1995, p. 1209].

In April [dec. 1996/18], the Board recommended to the General Assembly that it allocate a plenary meeting during its fifty-first (1996) session to the commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of UNICEF and requested the Executive Director to make all the preparations for that event on the understanding that there were no financial implications.

The Economic and Social Council, by decision 1996/226 of 10 July, endorsed the Board's decision and recommended its approval by the Assembly.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 16 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/192.

Commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the operations of the United Nations Children's Fund

The General Assembly,

Recalling its resolutions 57(I) of 11 December 1946, by which it established the International Children's Emergency Fund, 417(V) of 1 December 1950, by which it affirmed the Fund's decision to devote a greater share of its resources to programmes outside Europe, 802(VIII) of 6 October 1953, by which it changed the name of the organization to the United Nations Children's Fund and removed the time limits from its mandate, 1391 (XIV) of 20 November 1959, in which it saw aid provided by the Fund as a practical way to carry out the aims proclaimed in the Declaration on the Rights of the Child, 2057(XX) of 16 December 1965, in which it applauded the award of the Nobel Peace Prize for 1965 to the United Nations Children's Fund, and 2855(XXVI) of 20 December 1971, in which it commended the Fund for its very substantial and significant achievements during its twenty-five years of operation,

Also recalling its resolutions 33/83 of 15 December 1978 on the International Year of the Child, 44/25 of 20 November 1989 on the Convention on the Rights of the Child and 45/217 of 21 December 1990 on the World Summit for Children,

1. Congratulates the United Nations Children's Fund on the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary;

2. Commends the Fund for the important contribution it has made during its first fifty years in promoting the survival, development and protection of children and as an advocate of children's rights, and all who helped to contribute to its substantial achievements, including the staff of the United Nations Children's Fund, the National Committees for the Fund and other partners.

Youth

Implementation of the World Programme of Action for Youth

During 1996, the World Programme of Action for Youth to the Year 2000 and Beyond, adopted by General Assembly resolution 50/81 [YUN 1995, p. 1211], was officially launched at the Global Indigenous and Youth Cultural Olympics/Summit for Peace and Sustainable Development (Manila, Philippines, 24 February-4 March). The meeting, whose theme was "Partnership in action with youth for peace and sustainable development", adopted the Manila Declaration [A/51/2931, in which youth confirmed the need for them to play an active part in all aspects of social, economic, political, educational, cultural, spiritual and moral life as partners in the development of society. A section of the Declaration focused on youth in relation to education and health, human rights and responsibilities, participation, peace and sustainable development, and the arts, media and sports. It outlined a new partnership for achieving peace and people-oriented development.

The major event in 1996 for promoting implementation of the Programme of Action for Youth was the holding of the World Youth Forum of the United Nations System (second session, Vienna, 25-29 November), pursuant to Assembly resolutions 44/59 [YUN 1989, p. 685] and 50/81. Convened by the Department for Policy Coordination and Sustainable Development of the Secretariat, in partnership with the Austrian Federal Youth Council, the Forum brought together some 400 representatives of non-governmental youth organizations, UN youth-related agencies and organizations and other intergovernmental organizations. The main objective of the Forum was to promote implementation of the World Programme of Action for Youth through the identification and promotion of joint youth policies and projects. The outcome of the Forum consisted of a report [A/52/80-E/1997/14] and networking arrangements based on the recommendations adopted by the Forum for joint action regarding youth policy, youth communications, youth training and youth projects proposed by the Forum's 12 working groups on the priority issues of the Programme of Action. A system of co-management was agreed upon, bringing together representatives of non-governmental youth and youth-related organizations and UN agencies to co-chair the working groups and to form a bureau to provide overall direction of those organizations and agencies.

In its specific recommendations, the Forum affirmed education to be a "universal right" and recommended development of a multicultural curriculum to be used worldwide in formal and informal education. It stressed that education and leisure required new methods of organization, financing and conceptualization to respond to the emerging challenges of the twenty-first century. Concerning employment, the Forum emphasized the seriousness of the employment problems confronting world youth and called for UN funding for youth groups involved in programmes for the promotion of self-employment.

It affirmed the need to invest in young people's health and called on the media and entertainment industry to promote positive role models and images that supported health and development. In the area of poverty, the Forum recommended action for Governments and the UN system to enhance participation of youth in projects on eradication of hunger and poverty. The Forum called for channels of communication to echo youth concerns on the environment and sustainable development and for a "Youth Project Contract" to empower young people to forge partnerships with UN entities, organizations, governmental institutions, local authorities, NGOs and scientific institutions. The recommendations of the second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) in the areas of shelter and urban planning should be given higher priority in all UN programmes. Concerning drug abuse, the Forum proposed the development of "youth-friendly" methods to communicate anti-drug-abuse messages to young people at risk. It called on the United Nations to support youth projects on drug prevention, encourage training in drug prevention for youth leaders and support workshops and youth groups on drug prevention and youth programmes to enable young people to make informed choices in relation to substances. In the area of juvenile delinquency, the Forum called for training seminars for juvenile justice professionals, parents and concerned adults. It called for the promotion of increased knowledge to counter intolerance, and asked that intolerance be identified as an additional priority area to be included in the World Programme of Action for Youth. It also called for better dissemination of information to all women concerning international issues that affected women and girls, including disaffected groups. The Forum proposed the creation of a UN "Youth Rights Charter" and the appointment by the Assembly of a special rapporteur to monitor youth rights. Governments should include human rights education in school curricula, and training courses should be established for trainers in human rights and for the development of training material to enhance youth participation and rights. The Forum suggested a number of research projects to identify channels of communication favoured by youth and the establishment of an information centre for conflict areas. Particular emphasis should be placed on the need to incorporate mass media education in school curricula.

At the regional level, the United Nations Asia-Pacific Meeting on Human Resources Development for Youth (Beijing, China, 22-26 October) adopted the Beijing Statement on Human Resources Development for Youth as a contribution of Asia and the Pacific to the World Youth Forum of the UN System (see PART THREE, Chapter V, for details.) Other regional activities included the convening of the Pan-African Conference on Youth and Development (Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 18-22 March) by the Organization of African Unity, in cooperation with the Economic Commission for Africa.

Ageing persons

International Year of Older Persons (1999)

The International Year of Older Persons, to be held in 1999, was declared by the General Assembly in 1992 [YUN 1992, p. 889, GA res. 47/5].

On 22 July, the Economic and Social Council, by decision 1996/242, established an ad-hoc informal open-ended support group to assist the Commission for Social Development in the preparations for the Year.

The support group held an organizational meeting in October and a substantive meeting in December.

Chapter XII

Refugees and displaced persons

In 1996, individuals being assisted by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) totalled about 26 million. Of those, about half—13.2 million—were refugees, the number of whom had decreased somewhat from 14.5 million the year before. Others of concern to UNHCR included 3.3 million repatriated refugees in the early stages of reintegration, 4.7 million internally displaced persons, and 4.9 million others affected by humanitarian crises.

During the year, more than 1 million refugees returned to their country of origin, reflecting the increasing focus on voluntary repatriation. The conflict in eastern Zaire and the sudden and large-scale return of Rwandans from Zaire and the United Republic of Tanzania posed unprecedented challenges.

Africa hosted some 9 million refugees, internally displaced persons and other people of concern to UNHCR in early 1996, of whom there were some 1.8 million in the Great Lakes region. The crisis in the region led to the return of over 1.2 million Rwandan refugees between July and December. In Mozambique, the repatriation and reintegration programme was successfully concluded, and, as a result of peace accords, Sierra Leone requested UNHCR assistance to repatriate some 380,000 Sierra Leoneans. Unfortunately, renewed fighting in Liberia led to new refugee flows.

In Central America, the successful conclusion of peace negotiations in Guatemala and the launching of a migratory stabilization plan for Guatemalan refugees in Mexico paved the way for definitive solutions to the last major group of Central American refugees.

In Asia and Oceania, the Comprehensive Plan of Action for Indo-Chinese Refugees was successfully concluded, while UNHCR gradually reduced its programmes in Western Europe, shifting resources to the Baltic and the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS). In Eastern Europe, it assisted refugees in Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia and Chechnya (Russian Federation). A regional Conference to address the problems of refugees, displaced persons, other forms of involuntary displacement and returnees in CIS countries and relevant neighbouring States was held in Geneva on 30 and 31 May. The General Assembly, in December, welcomed the Programme of Action adopted by the Conference, as well as the Joint Operational Strategy for 1996-2000, which continued the practical dimensions of implementing the Conference results.

In October, the UNHCR Executive Committee considered such topics as comprehensive approaches within a protection framework, conclusion of the CIS Conference on refugees, and coordination of emergency humanitarian assistance, as well as the budget structure and governance of UNHCR, and its working methods. The annual theme for the general debate was the pursuit and implementation of durable solutions to the problems of refugees.

The General Assembly urged States to ensure access for all asylum-seekers to fair procedures for the determination of refugee status and the granting of asylum. It deplored the fact that in certain situations, refugees, returnees and displaced persons had been subjected to armed attack, murder, rape and other human rights violations and threats to their personal security. It called on States to ensure respect for the principles of refugee protection, urged them and international organizations to support the High Commissioner's search for durable solutions to refugee problems and, underlining the interrelationship between protection and solutions, reiterated its support for the role of UNHCR in exploring further measures to ensure international protection to all who needed it. The Assembly called on Governments and donors to contribute to UNHCR programmes and to assist the High Commissioner in securing additional and timely income from government sources and the private sector to ensure that the needs of refugees, returnees and displaced persons were met.

Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees

Programme policy

Executive Committee action. At its forty-seventh session (Geneva, 7-11 October 1996) [A/51/12/Add.1], the Executive Committee of the UNHCR Programme recognized that the complexity of the current refugee problems underlined both the importance of the High Commissioner's function of international protection and the difficulties inherent in the exercise of that function. The Committee called on Governments and UNHCR to continue to respond to the assistance needs of refugees until durable solutions were found. It appealed to States to ensure that measures adopted to discourage the abuse of asylum procedures had no detrimental effect on the fundamental principles of international protection, including the institution of asylum. The Committee called on UNHCR to organize informal consultations on measures to ensure international protection, and encouraged it to continue the process. The High Commissioner was asked to expand and strengthen the promotion and training activities of the Office, including in the area of prevention and reduction of statelessness and related nationality issues, with the support of States and through increased cooperation with other international organizations, academic institutions and non-governmental and other relevant organizations. The Committee encouraged UNHCR to strengthen its efforts for the protection of women having a well-founded fear of persecution and called on States to adopt an approach sensitive to gender-related concerns, which ensured that those women were recognized as refugees. It encouraged the regular exchange of information as part of the ongoing consultations of UNHCR with Governments and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) on resettlement, and recommended to States that strategies for facilitating the return of persons not in need of international protection be examined within the framework of international cooperation. In that context, the Committee encouraged UNHCR, in cooperation with other international organizations, to continue the consultative process initiated in 1995 on ways of facilitating the return process. It called on UNHCR to continue supporting national legal and judicial capacity-building and to cooperate with the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights and relevant organizations.

Concerning comprehensive and regional approaches within a protective framework, the Executive Committee encouraged States, in cooperation with each other and with international organizations, to adopt protection-based comprehensive approaches to particular problems of displacement, and identified the principal elements of such approaches. It invited UNHCR to provide support and expertise in formulating the comprehensive approaches and in assisting States to explore where and how such approaches might be appropriate or feasible.

In her opening statement to the Committee, the High Commissioner referred to the UNHCR change process, announced in 1995 [YUN 1995, p. 1228], known as Project Delphi, designed to give the Office better tools to perform its mission of ensuring international protection and achieving durable solutions, in an ever more complex and critical environment. Its programmes and operational structures would be based on better-defined objectives tailored to the needs of each situation, but consistent with the overall strategic dimensions of the Office. A new operational orientation, the "situational" approach, was introduced, aimed at finding and exploiting openings for solutions. Greater delegation and support should enable managers to take greater responsibility, while more finely tuned and expanded oversight from the centre should allow the Office to hold them accountable for reaching their objectives. The senior management structure had been reorganized and progress was made in developing clear policy directives. A global strategy paper was issued to provide better information about the content of the policy- and decision-making process, while planning and evaluation capacities were also strengthened.

By decision 1996/238 of 19 July, the Economic and Social Council took note of the High Commissioner's report for 1995/96 [A/51/12].

Coordination of emergency humanitarian assistance

In response to Economic and Social Council resolution 1995/56 [YUN 1995, p. 927] on strengthening the coordination of emergency humanitarian assistance, which urged the governing bodies of relevant UN organizations to review their role and operational responsibilities, as well as their operative and financial capacities to respond in the context of broad and comprehensive humanitarian programmes, UNHCR was involved in an intensive process of inter-agency consultations within the Inter-Agency Standing Committee (IASC) and its working group.

The Office was of the view that those consultations had made significant progress in a number of important areas. However, it expressed reservations about recommendations made by IASC with respect to a unitary field coordination model based on the resident coordinator system. The Office believed that the lead agency model should be retained among the options available to the Secretary-General and the Emergency Relief Coordinator for ensuring a coordinated response to complex emergencies. That approach had the advantage of avoiding multiple layers of coordination, minimizing costs, avoiding diffused accountability and ensuring the flexibility to cover cross-border and regional dimensions of complex emergencies. In addition, clearer terms of reference for the Emergency Relief Coordinator, the UN Department of Humanitarian Affairs (DHA) and IASC, as well as for the relationship among them, was an essential element of improved coordination.

In 1996, UNHCR continued to develop linkages with other members of the UN system by concluding and updating memoranda of understanding. A memorandum of understanding was signed with the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) in March, and a local memorandum of understanding was concluded with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) for Rwanda, defining joint activities in the continuum from humanitarian assistance to development. Another memorandum was signed with the Southern African Development Community to address regional humanitarian, social, economic and human rights issues. Staff of other UN bodies participated in UNHCR training courses.

In an October conclusion [A/51/12/Add.1], the Executive Committee emphasized the importance to UNHCR of greater predictability and timeliness on the part of the UN system in emergency response and the pursuit of solutions, and of inter-agency coordination in that respect. It called on UNHCR to ensure the effectiveness of its emergency preparedness and response mechanisms and urged it, in its relations with other intergovernmental and non-governmental agencies, to develop common standards and practices for responding to emergencies. The Committee underlined the leadership role of the Emergency Relief Coordinator in ensuring a coordinated response and called on UNHCR to participate actively in IASC as the primary mechanism for inter-agency decisions on system-wide policy issues relating to humanitarian assistance. It urged the Office to play its part in ensuring that IASC fully developed its institutional role, to work within IASC to examine priority options and proposals to improve the functioning of IASC and its working group, to strengthen IASC's role in reaching decisions and providing inter-agency guidance to the UN system, and to increase the effectiveness of the IASC secretariat. Recommendations to those ends should be included in the Secretary-General's report to the 1997 substantive session of the Economic and Social Council. The Committee called on UNHCR to participate in IASC's analysis of various coordination models to ascertain their comparative effectiveness. It underscored the importance of establishing memoranda of understanding with intergovernmental agencies, including at the level of field operations, as a mechanism to ensure that operations were effective, complementary and practicable, and urged UNHCR to establish predictable operational relationships through the conclusion or enhancement of memoranda of understanding and other agreements with relevant partners, notably UNDP and the World Health Organization. The Committee called on the High Commissioner to report to it on lessons learned from such inter-agency agreements. UNHCR should continue to participate actively in the consolidated appeals process, ensuring that they reflected priorities established through joint needs assessments and strategic planning and were effectively coordinated with other resource mobilization efforts, including round tables and consultative group mechanisms. The Committee stressed the importance to UNHCR of the timely issuance of appeals, their alignment with the calendar year and their responsiveness to the regional dimensions of complex emergencies. It underlined the importance of inter-agency training in preparing personnel for a coordinated approach to emergencies and of contingency planning as a prerequisite for effective emergency response. It encouraged efforts to establish common guidelines and joint contingency planning activities, including through the DHA focal point for preparedness and response measures related to the use of government assets in support of humanitarian operations. The Committee emphasized the importance of joint needs assessments and of joint monitoring and evaluation of the collective response of the UN system, and looked forward to their becoming a regular feature of emergency operations. It urged UNHCR, with IASC, to develop ways of implementing effective and predictable linkages between humanitarian assistance, rehabilitation and development in countries of origin and to analyse lessons learned in that regard. UNHCR should continue, with DHA, to ensure that humanitarian agencies had access to early information regarding potential flows of refugees and displaced persons and, with IASC, establish an effective and predictable division of labour in respect of internally displaced persons.

The Committee reaffirmed that UNHCR's involvement with returnees in their countries of origin must be limited in scope and duration and should include, from the outset, a clearly defined strategy, in cooperation with the Government concerned and in consultation with the donor community and relevant UN agencies, to ensure the sustainability of reintegration after UNHCR's withdrawal. UNHCR should continue, at the request of Governments concerned and in collaboration with other relevant actors, in particular the High Commissioner for Human Rights, as well as regional organizations, to reinforce national legal, judicial and administrative capacity, including training opportunities, and should collaborate with concerned Governments and agencies with specific competence in the fields of development and human rights. The Committee called on UNHCR to continue its initiatives to resolve the problem of statelessness in the prevention of refugee movements. It emphasized DHA's role in bridging and integrating the discussions in various governmental forums and in IASC, and underscored the need for intensified efforts to ensure that those discussions converged into a commonly held and comprehensive set of objectives and proposals. It called on UNHCR, in coordination with DHA, to report to the January 1997 IASC meeting on progress made in the inter-agency consultations on the formulation of a comprehensive set of proposals, recommendations and options for submission to the 1997 substantive session of the Economic and Social Council. (See also PART THREE, Chapter III.)

Evaluation of UNHCR

Pursuant to General Assembly resolution 48/218 B [YUN 1994, p. 1362], the Secretary-General transmitted to the Committee for Programme and Coordination (CPC) a March report by the Office of Internal Oversight Services (OIOS) [E/AC.51/1996/4] on the triennial review of the implementation of the recommendations on the evaluation of UNHCR, made by CPC. The report examined the implementation of recommendations related to international protection and programmatic, administrative and financial matters. The evaluation showed that a concerted effort had been made to follow through on the recommendations of CPC. Progress was reported on new approaches to international protection and the search for durable solutions, external relations strategies, budgetary questions and emergency response capacity. With regard to other recommendations, particularly those relating to NGOs, progress was somewhat mixed, and in a few instances, due to external circumstances, there was little progress to report or a different approach had been taken from that recommended.

CPC, in June [A/51/16 (Part I)], expressed appreciation for the comprehensive report and noted that its recommendations had helped UNHCR to improve its effectiveness. CPC recommended that the review, together with its own discussion and conclusions, be submitted to the UNHCR Executive Committee for action. An oversight review of follow-up action by UNHCR and other organizations should be undertaken by OIOS.

UNHCR inspection and evaluation activities were outlined in an August report [A/AC.96/870] to its Executive Committee. In October [A/51/12/Add.1 (dec. D)], the Committee noted the evaluation report, as well as other reports, i.e., of the Board of Auditors on the accounts of the Voluntary Fund administered by UNHCR for the year ended 31 December 1995 [A/AC.96/869] and of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) on UNHCR activities financed from voluntary funds [A/AC.96/865/Add.4]. The Executive Committee requested that it be kept informed on the measures taken to address the recommendations and observations raised in those oversight documents.

UNHCR/NGO Partnership in Action

In 1996, UNHCR continued to follow up on the UNHCR/NGO Partnership in Action (PARINAC) process, launched in 1993 [YUN 1993, p. 1072] to establish a common agenda for field activities, and to implement the recommendations of the Oslo Declaration and Plan of Action, adopted at the 1994 PARINAC Global Conference [YUN 1994, p. 1217]. To respond more effectively to NGO needs, UNHCR made the NGO Coordinator the focal point for all policy issues concerning NGOs at Headquarters and appointed NGO focal points in the Regional Bureaux. In late 1996, UNHCR began a review of progress made under PARINAC to assess achievements and to identify outstanding priorities. At the CIS Conference in May (see below), 136 NGOs were accredited. The involvement of NGOs was considered key to the implementation of the decisions of the Conference. During the year, UNHCR concluded 974 sub-agreements with NGOs in 128 countries for operational activities with refugee and other populations. Under those agreements, some 606 projects were implemented by national and 368 by international NGOs. In 1996, some 6,370 members of NGOs benefited from UNHCR training in protection, refugee law, people-oriented planning, programme management and emergency management and resettlement. Several technical workshops were also held.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 12 December, the General Assembly adopted resolution 51/75.

Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees on the activities of her Office and the report of the Executive Committee of the Programme of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees on the work of its forty-seventh session,

Recalling its resolution 50/152 of 21 December 1995, Reaffirming the fundamental importance of the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees, in particular their implementation in a manner fully compatible with the object and purpose of those instruments, and noting with satisfaction that one hundred and thirty-two States are now parties to one or both instruments,

Commending the High Commissioner and her staff for the competent, courageous and dedicated manner in which they discharge their responsibilities,

Paying tribute to those staff members who have endangered or lost their lives in the course of their duties, and emphasizing the urgent need for effective measures to ensure the security of staff engaged in humanitarian operations,

Distressed at the widespread violations of the principle of non-refoulement and of the rights of refugees, in some cases resulting in the loss of their lives, and seriously disturbed at reports indicating that large numbers of refugees and asylum-seekers have been subjected to refoulement and expulsion in highly dangerous situations,

1. Strongly reaffirms the fundamental importance and the purely humanitarian and non-political character of the function of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees of providing international protection to refugees and seeking permanent solutions to the problem of refugees and the need for States to cooperate fully with the Office in order to facilitate the effective exercise of that function;

2. Calls upon all States that have not yet done so to accede or succeed to and to implement fully the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol relating to the Status of Refugees and relevant regional refugee instruments, as applicable, for the protection of refugees;

3. Reiterates that everyone, without distinction of any kind, has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution, and calls upon all States to uphold asylum as an indispensable instrument for the international protection of refugees and to respect scrupulously the fundamental principle of non-refoulement, which is not subject to derogation;

4. Urges States to ensure access, consistent with relevant international and regional instruments, for all asylum-seekers to fair and efficient procedures for the determination of refugee status and the granting of asylum to eligible persons;

5. Deplores the fact that in certain situations refugees, returnees and displaced persons of concern to the Office of the High Commissioner have been subjected to armed attack, murder, rape and other violations of or threats to their personal security and other fundamental rights, and calls upon States to take all measures necessary to ensure respect for the principles of refugee protection and the humane treatment of asylum-seekers in accordance with internationally recognized human rights and humanitarian norms;

6. Emphasizes the importance of ensuring access by the Office of the High Commissioner to asylum-seekers, refugees and other persons of concern in order to enable it to carry out its protection functions in an effective manner, expresses deep concern at conditions in a number of countries or regions that seriously impede the delivery of humanitarian assistance and protection, and calls upon States to take all necessary measures to ensure such access and to ensure the security of staff engaged in humanitarian operations;

7. Reiterates its support for the role of the Office of the High Commissioner in exploring further measures to ensure international protection to all who need it, consistent with fundamental protection principles reflected in international instruments, and supports the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in continuing further consultations and discussions in this regard;

8. Encourages the Office of the High Commissioner to continue and strengthen its efforts for the protection of women having a well-founded fear of persecution, and calls upon States to adopt an approach that is sensitive to gender-related concerns and ensures that women whose claims to refugee status are based upon a well-founded fear of persecution, including persecution through sexual violence or other gender-related persecution, are recognized as refugees for reasons enumerated in the 1951 Convention and its 1967 Protocol;

9. Urges all States and relevant United Nations, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations to support the High Commissioner's search for durable solutions to refugee problems, including voluntary repatriation, integration in the country of asylum and resettlement in a third country, as appropriate, and welcomes in particular the ongoing efforts of the Office of the High Commissioner to pursue, whenever possible, opportunities to promote conditions conducive to the preferred solution of voluntary repatriation;

10. Underlines the interrelationship between protection and solutions, as well as the desirability of prevention, including through respect for human rights and the implementation of relevant instruments and standards, and emphasizes the responsibility of States to resolve refugee situations and to ensure conditions that do not compel people to flee in fear, to uphold the institution of asylum, to create conditions conducive to voluntary repatriation, to take steps to meet essential humanitarian needs and to cooperate with countries on whom the large-scale presence of refugees weighs most heavily;

11. Acknowledges the desirability of comprehensive approaches by the international community to the problems of refugees and displaced persons, including addressing root causes, strengthening emergency preparedness and response, providing effective protection and achieving durable solutions;

12. Emphasizes the value of comprehensive, regional approaches in which the High Commissioner has played a significant part both in countries of origin and countries of asylum, encourages States, in coordination and cooperation with each other and with international organizations, if applicable, to consider adopting protection-based comprehensive approaches to particular problems of displacement, and endorses, in this connection, the conclusion on comprehensive and regional approaches within a protection framework adopted by the Executive Committee of the Programme of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees at its forty-seventh session;

13. Recalls that the Office of the High Commissioner may be called upon by the appropriate organs of the United Nations and with the consent of the State concerned to extend its assistance to other groups, such as internally displaced persons, recognizing that such involvement may contribute to the prevention or mitigation of refugee situations, yet emphasizing that activities on behalf of internally displaced persons must not undermine the institution of asylum, including the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution;

14. Reiterates the relationship between safeguarding human rights and preventing refugee situations, recognizes that the effective promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, including through institutions that sustain the rule of law, justice and accountability, are essential for States to fulfil their humanitarian responsibilities in reintegrating returning refugees, and, in this connection, calls upon the Office of the High Commissioner, within its mandate and at the request of the Government concerned, to strengthen its support of national efforts at legal and judicial capacity-building, where necessary, in co-operation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights;

15. Also reiterates that development and rehabilitation assistance is essential in addressing some of the causes of refugee situations and in the context of the development of prevention strategies;

16. Reaffirms that voluntary repatriation is the ideal solution to refugee problems, and calls upon countries of origin, countries of asylum, the Office of the High Commissioner and the international community as a whole to do everything possible to enable refugees to exercise their right to return home in safety and dignity;

17. Reiterates the right of all persons to return to their country, and emphasizes in this regard the prime responsibility of countries of origin for establishing conditions that allow voluntary repatriation of refugees in safety and with dignity, and, in recognition of the obligation of all States to accept the return of their nationals, calls upon all States to facilitate the return of their nationals who have sought asylum but have been determined not to be refugees;

18. Encourages the High Commissioner to continue her activities on behalf of stateless persons, as part of her statutory function of providing international protection and of seeking preventive action, as well as her responsibilities under General Assembly resolutions 3274(XXIV) of 10 December 1974 and 31/36 of 30 November 1976, and calls upon States to assist the High Commissioner in fulfilling her responsibilities and to consider acceding to the 1954 Convention relating to the Status of Stateless Persons and the 1961 Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness;

19. Reaffirms that the Inter-Agency Standing Committee is the primary mechanism for inter-agency decisions on system-wide policy issues relating to humanitarian assistance, for formulating a coherent and timely response to major disasters and complex emergencies and for inter-agency decisions of an operational nature, and calls upon members of the Standing Committee to continue to examine, as a matter of priority, options and proposals to improve its functioning;

20. Calls upon all Governments and other donors to demonstrate their international solidarity and burden-sharing with countries of asylum through efforts aimed at continuing to alleviate the burden borne by States that have received large numbers of refugees, in particular developing countries and those with limited resources, to contribute to the programmes of the Office of the High Commissioner and, taking into account the effects on countries of asylum of the increasing requirements of large refugee populations and the need to widen the donor base and to achieve greater burden-sharing among donors, to assist the High Commissioner in securing additional and timely income from traditional governmental sources, other Governments and the private sector in order to ensure that the needs of refugees, returnees and other displaced persons of concern to the Office of the High Commissioner are met.

General Assembly resolution 51/75

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/51/614) without vote, 8 November (meeting 29); 70-nation draft (A/C.3/51/L.20), orally revised; agenda item 105.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 19-23, 27, 29; plenary 82.

Singapore expressed reservations on paragraph 3, stating that it had never recognized an unrestricted or automatic right to asylum. Moreover, a more restricted and qualified interpretation of that right had been developed in recent years, which was not accurately reflected.

The Sudan said it had been unable to join the resolution's sponsors in view of its relations with UNHCR and the language used in the text with regard to UNHCR.

Enlargement of UNHCR Executive Committee

At its organizational session, the Economic and Social Council had before it a letter [E/1996/5] from Ireland requesting membership in the Executive Committee of UNHCR. By decision 1996/212 of 9 February, the Council recommended that the General Assembly take a decision at its resumed fiftieth session on the question of increasing the membership of the Executive Committee from 50 to 51 States. The Assembly acted on that recommendation on 7 June (see below).

By decision 1996/221 of 2 May, the Council took note of the requests for membership of Poland [E/1996/20] and South Africa [E/1996/21], and recommended that the Assembly take a decision at its fifty-first session on increasing the Committee's membership to 53. The Assembly did so on 12 December (see below).

By decision 1996/298 of 25 July, the Economic and Social Council elected Ireland to the Executive Committee.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY ACTION

On 7 June, the General Assembly adopted resolution 50/228.

Enlargement of the membership of the Executive Committee of the Programme of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees

The General Assembly,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council decision 1996/212 of 9 February 1996 concerning the enlargement of the Executive Committee of the Programme of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees,

Taking note also of the request regarding the enlargement of the Executive Committee contained in the letter dated 23 November 1995 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ireland to the Secretary-General,

1. Decides to increase the number of members of the Executive Committee of the Programme of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees from fifty to fifty-one States;

2. Requests the Economic and Social Council to elect the additional member at its substantive session of 1996.

General Assembly resolution 50/228

7 June 1996 Meeting 120 Adopted without vote

Draft by Ireland (A/50/L.74); agenda item 109.

On 12 December, the Assembly adopted resolution 51/72.

Enlargement of the Executive Committee of the Programme of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees

The General Assembly,

Taking note of Economic and Social Council decision 1996/221 of 2 May 1996 concerning the enlargement of the Executive Committee of the Programme of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees,

Taking note also of the requests regarding the enlargement of the Executive Committee contained in the note verbale dated 11 April 1996 from the Permanent Representative of Poland to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General and the note verbale dated 12 April 1996 from the Permanent Representative of South Africa to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General,

2. Requests the Economic and Social Council to elect the additional members at its organizational session of 1997.

General Assembly resolution 51/72

12 December 1996 Meeting 82 Adopted without vote

Approved by Third Committee (A/51/614) without vote, 11 November (meeting 31); 2-nation draft (A/C.3/51/L.14); agenda item 105.

Sponsors: Poland, South Africa.

Meeting numbers. GA 51st session: 3rd Committee 19-23, 27, 29, 31; plenary 82.

Financial and administrative questions

In 1996, UNHCR's final budget was $1.3 billion [A/52/12], compared to $1.17 billion in 1995. Donors contributed some $970 million in voluntary contributions towards the General and Special Programmes, slightly less than the $1 billion the previous year. The upward trend in the funding of General Programmes continued. Those programmes represented core activities for refugees and provided the High Commissioner with considerable flexibility to deal with emergencies and voluntary repatriations, in addition to some $25.3 million from the UN regular budget which went towards administrative support.

UNHCR expenditures in 1996 amounted to $1.14 billion. Disbursements under General Programmes amounted to $423.5 million and those under Special Programmes to $720.5 million. Some 36.3 per cent of Special Programme expenditure pertained to UNHCR's Programme for Humanitarian Assistance in the Former Yugoslavia and a further 33.4 per cent to the operation in the Great Lakes region of Africa. Other important expenditures related to the Comprehensive Plan of Action for Indo-Chinese Refugees and repatriation programmes in the Horn of Africa and Afghanistan.

Regional apportionments were as follows: Africa, $474.4 million; Europe, $320.3 million; Central Asia, South-West Asia, North Africa and the Middle East, $98.3 million; Asia and Oceania, $83.9 million; and the Americas, $32.6 million.
