FOREWORD

This Yearbook recounts the activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies for the year 1953: the problems facing them and the efforts to meet those problems by the Member nations through this international machinery.

It was a year both of promise and of frustrated hopes. It saw the successful conclusion of an armistice in Korea but, at the same time, an increase in tension in the Middle East. It was marked by a bold new proposal for the peaceful development of atomic energy, but no real progress was made in reconciling the differences on control of atomic weapons. The work of the United Nations and the agencies in the economic and social field went steadily forward, but certain of their activities, for example in rendering assistance for economic development, were handicapped by lack of funds. However, it is important to remember that the work of building peace is a day-by-day, week-by-week and year-by-year affair. It is rarely marked by much-publicized achievements. It consists rather in continuing accommodations of differing interests and differing points of view and in a continuing effort to remove those obstacles that divide and hamper men and nations. For such purposes the Organization was created, and these it is steadily seeking to fulfil.

In reading this account, it is also important to remember that it represents one year in a continuing story. Many of the activities described in this volume had their origin in previous years, others will have their effect in years to come.

To be ready for the future it is necessary to know the past. To assess the United Nations and to render it that informed support without which it cannot be effective one must study the facts. It is in the hope of assisting such a study that the Yearbook of the United Nations, 1953 is here presented.

NOTE ON DOCUMENTATION

Resolutions adopted by the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council are referred to in this Yearbook by their official numbers. The number of the session at which the resolution was adopted appears in parentheses: thus, the General Assembly's resolution 727 (VIII) is its 727th, adopted at its eighth session; the Economic and Social Council's resolution 482 (XVI) is its 482nd, adopted at its sixteenth session; and the Trusteeship Council's resolution 645 (XII) is its 645th, adopted at its twelfth session. The context indicates which organ is referred to. In the case of the Security Council, the document citation of the original mimeographed resolution is given. These resolutions are, in general, reproduced in printed form in the Official Records. In the case of the International Court of Justice, the official citations are given for documents cited.

In the case of other documents, such as reports and draft resolutions, the original citation is given. The basic symbol forms are as follows: General Assembly, A/-; Security Council, S/-; Economic and Social Council, E/-; Trusteeship Council, T/-. In many instances, these documents appear as supplements to the Official Records. As far as discussions are concerned, it has been thought sufficient to specify the meetings at which the discussions took place, which correspond to the numbers of the verbatim or summary records concerned.

The Official Records of the various organs of the United Nations are available for consultation at United Nations depository libraries throughout the world and may be obtained from authorized agents for United Nations publications. In addition to the Official Records, the United Nations publishes a number of studies, reports and periodicals in many fields, including economics, finance, statistics, social welfare, human rights, demography and international law. Reference is made in the text of this Yearbook to a number of these studies and reports issued during 1953. A list of United Nations Sales Agents appears at the end of this volume and a list of abbreviations is given with the index.

I. Structure and Organization of the United Nations

A. THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

1. Charter Provisions

The General Assembly may discuss any questions or matters within the scope of the United Nations Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organ provided for in the Charter. It may make recommendations to Members of the United Nations or to the Security Council or to both on any such questions or matters, except on disputes or situations in respect of which the Security Council is currently exercising its functions.

Decisions of the General Assembly on important questions are made by a two-thirds majority of the Members present and voting and on other questions by a simple majority. Categories of questions requiring a two-thirds majority are listed in Article 18 of the Charter; the Article further provides that additional categories requiring such a majority are determined by a simple majority.

The Charter provisions concerning the General Assembly are contained in Chapter IV (Articles 9-22) which defines the composition, functions and powers, voting and procedure of the Assembly. Other provisions relating to the Assembly are contained in Articles 1, 2, 4-7, 23, 24, 35, 60-64, 66, 85-88, 93, 96-98, 101, 105, 108 and 109 of the Charter and Articles 4, 7-15, 32, 33 and 69 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.¹

2. Members

All Members of the United Nations are represented in the General Assembly; at the end of 1953 there were 60 United Nations Members.²

3. Structure³

Under the General Assembly's rules of procedure, three types of committees are established: (1) Main Committees; (2) Procedural Committees; and (3) Standing Committees. The Assembly may also establish such other subsidiary bodies as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions.

a. MAIN COMMITTEES

Each Member may be represented by one person on each Main Committee.

(1) First Committee—Political and Security (including the regulation of armaments)

(2) Second Committee—Economic and Financial

(3) Third Committee—Social, Humanitarian and Cultural

(4) Fourth Committee—Trusteeship (including Non-Self-Governing Territories)

(5) Fifth Committee—Administrative and Budgetary

(6) Sixth Committee—Legal

On 15 September, by resolution 801 (VIII), the General Assembly established for the duration of the session an Ad Hoc Political Committee on which each Member was entitled to be represented.

b. PROCEDURAL COMMITTEES

(1) General Committee

(2) Credentials Committee

c. STANDING COMMITTEES

(1) Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions

(2) Committee on Contributions

d. OTHER SUBSIDIARY BODIES

At the end of 1953 the General Assembly had the following subsidiary bodies:

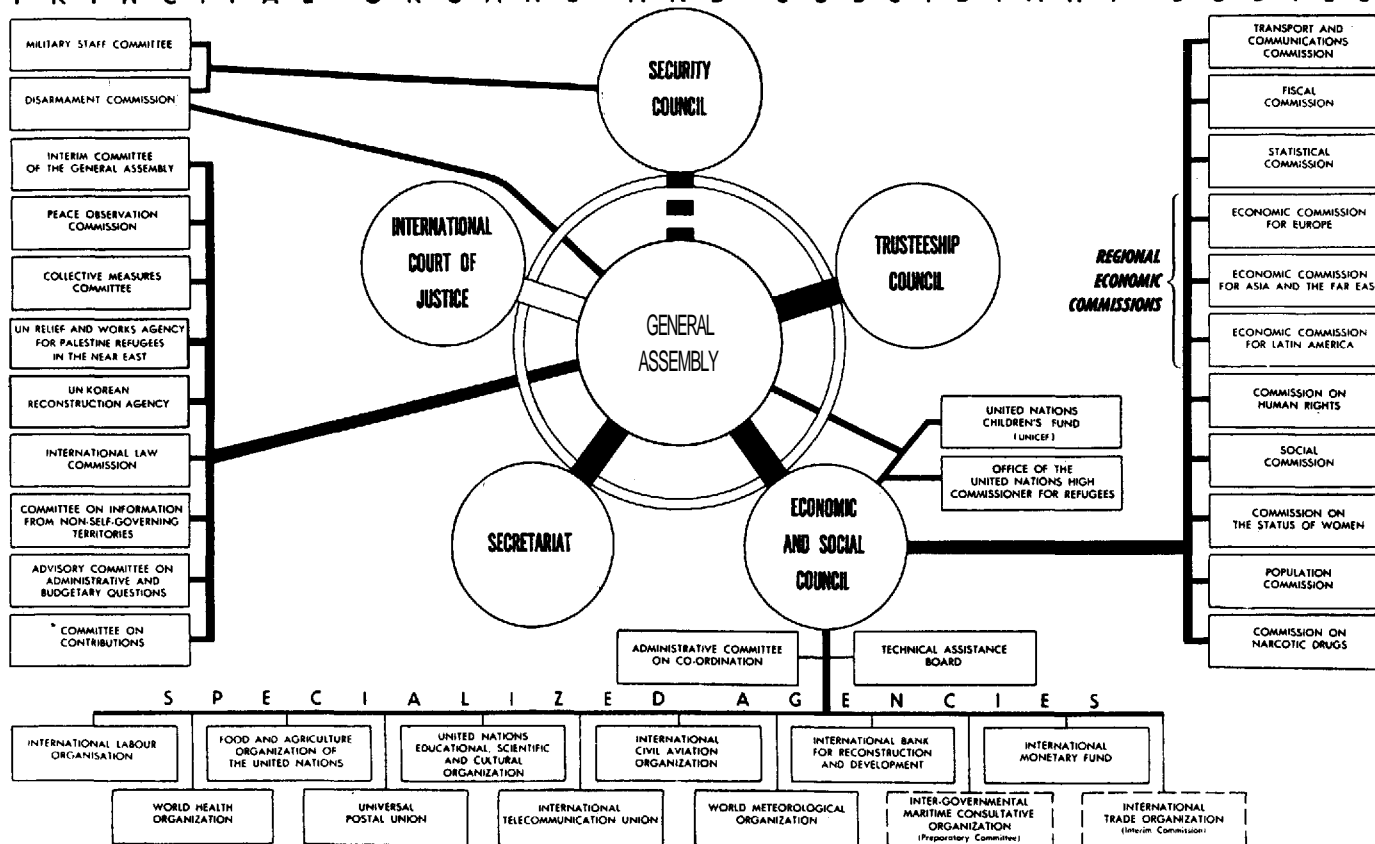

¹ A summary of the Charter provisions concerning the Assembly is to be found in Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 9-11. The text of the Charter and of the Statute of the Court is reproduced in Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 10-26.

- (9) Special Committee on Measures to Limit the Duration of Regular Sessions of the General Assembly

The following is a summary of the functions of the new bodies established during the period under review, together with a summary of changes in the functions of existing bodies:

(1) Collective Measures Committee

In accordance with Assembly resolution 703(VII) of 17 March 1953, the Collective Measures Committee, which has already submitted two reports to the General Assembly and the Security Council, was called upon to continue its work, to pursue such studies as it may deem desirable to strengthen the capability of the United Nations to maintain peace, taking into account the resolutions establishing and continuing it (337 A (V), 503(VI) and 703(VII)), and to continue the examination of information received from States pursuant to these resolutions. The Committee was asked, in the light of its studies, to suggest to the Security Council and to the General Assembly such specific ways and means as it may deem appropriate to encourage further preparatory action by States. The Committee was directed to report to the Security Council and to the General Assembly not later than the Assembly's ninth session.

(2) Committee of Good Offices on the Admission of New Members

This Committee was established by the General Assembly by resolution 718(VIII) of 23 October 1953 to consult with members of the Security Council with the object of exploring the possibilities of reaching an understanding which would facilitate the admission of new Members in accordance with Article 4 of the Charter. The Committee was requested to report to the Assembly during the eighth or, at the latest, at the ninth session.

(3) Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary funds

The terms of reference of this Committee, established by General Assembly resolution 759(VIII) of 5 October 1953, were the same as those of the Negotiating Committee which had been established by the General Assembly at its seventh session.

(4) United Nations Good Offices Commission (on the question of the treatment of people of Indian origin in the Union of South Africa)

The Commission was established by the General Assembly by resolution 615(VII) of 5 December 1952, and continued by resolution 719(VIII) of 11 November 1953, to arrange and assist in negotiations between the Government of the Union of South Africa and the Governments of India and Pakistan for a satisfactory solution of the question of the treatment of people of Indian origin in the Union of South Africa.

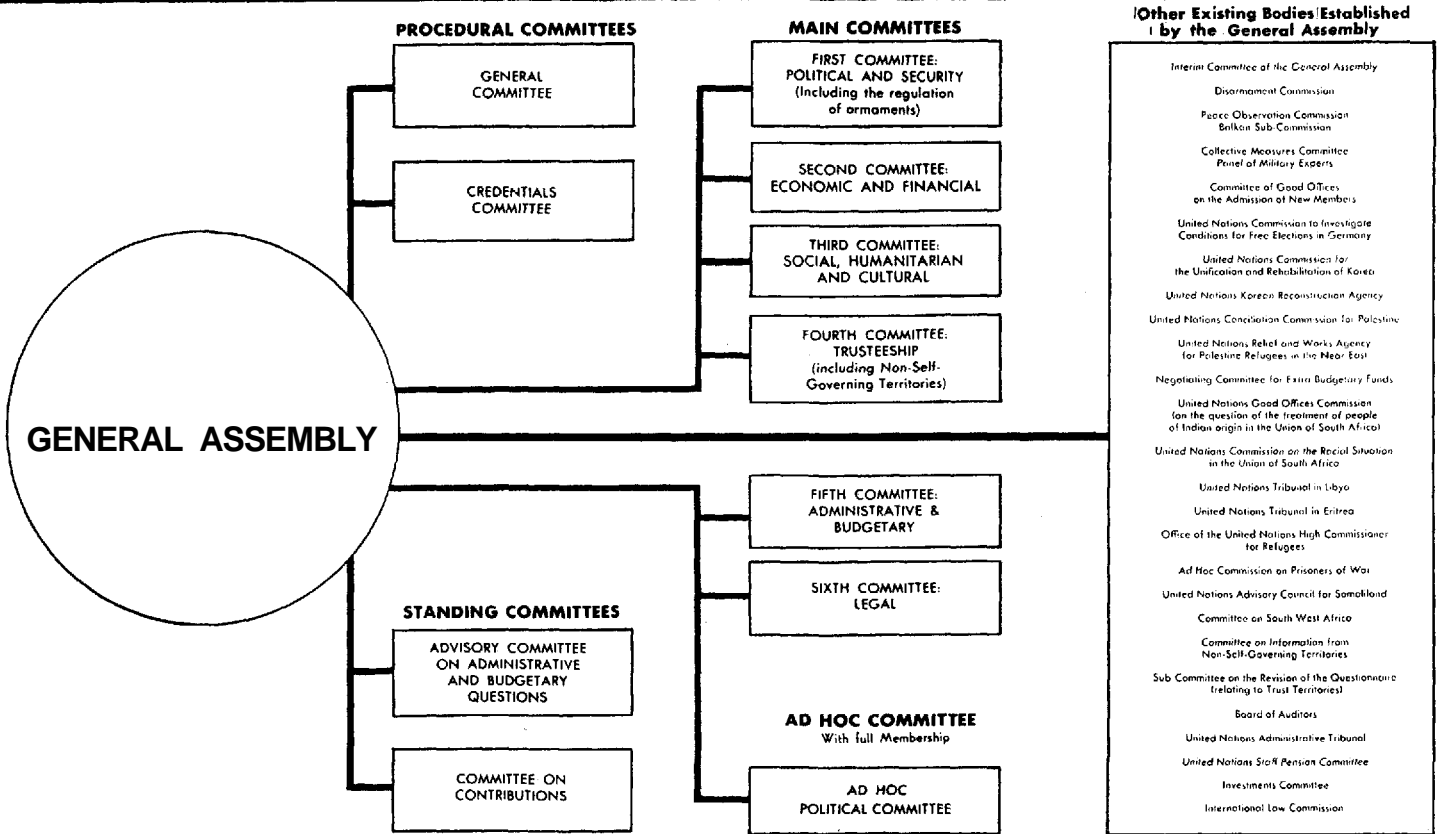

In resolution 719(VIII), the Assembly requested the Commission to report to its ninth session on the extent of progress achieved, together with its own views on the problem, and any proposals which it thought might lead to a peaceful settlement of the problem.

(5) United Nations Commission on the Racial Situation in the Union of South Africa

The Commission was established by General Assembly resolution 616 A (VII) of 5 December 1952, and continued by resolution 721 (VIII) of 8 December 1953, to study the development of the racial situation in the Union of South Africa. The Commission was requested in resolution 721(VIII) to continue this study with reference to the various implications of the situation on the populations affected and in relation to the provisions of the Charter, in particular Article 14 (which empowers the Assembly to recommend measures for the peaceful settlement of disputes deemed likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations). It was asked to suggest measures which would help to alleviate the situation and promote a peaceful settlement and to report to the General Assembly at its ninth session.

(6) Committee on South West Africa

By General Assembly resolution 749 A (VIII) of 28 November 1953, the Committee was established until such time as agreement on this question is reached between the United Nations and the Union of South Africa. It was requested to:

(a) examine, within the scope of the Questionnaire adopted by the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations in 1926, available information and documents in respect of the Territory of South West Africa;

(b) examine, as far as possible in accordance with the procedure of the former Mandates System, reports and petitions submitted to the Committee or the Secretary-General;

(c) report to the Assembly concerning conditions in the Territory, taking into account, as far as possible, the scope of reports of the League of Nations Permanent Mandates Commission; and

(d) prepare for the Assembly's consideration a procedure for the examination of reports and petitions conforming, as far as possible, to the procedure followed by the relevant League of Nations organs.

The Committee was authorized to continue negotiations with the Union of South Africa in order to implement fully the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice regarding South West Africa. It was requested to report to the regular sessions of the Assembly.

(7) Sub-Committee on the Revision of the Questionnaire (relating to Trust Territories)

The Sub-Committee was established by the General Assembly by resolution 751(VIII) of 9 December 1953 to examine the Questionnaire formulated by the Trusteeship Council, to study such changes as might be necessary to adapt it to the special conditions of each Territory and to submit its conclusions to the Trusteeship Council.

4. Sessions and Officersa. SEVENTH SESSION

The seventh regular session of the General Assembly (which opened at United Nations Headquarters on 14 October 1952 and adjourned on 22 December of that year) was resumed on 24 February 1953, recessed on 23 April, resumed on 17 August and was formally brought to a close on 28 August.⁶ The only Main Committees which met during this period were the First Committee and the Fifth Committee.

At the 451st plenary meeting on 5 October, the General Assembly was addressed by the Directors-General of the World Health Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization.

The General Assembly was also addressed by the following distinguished guests:

Colonel Jose Antonio Remón Cantera, President of the Republic of Panama, at the 450th plenary meeting on 5 October

His Majesty King Paul of the Hellenes, at the 456th plenary meeting on 3 November Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States, at the 470th plenary meeting on 8 December.

8. Organizational Questions

a. MEASURES TO LIMIT THE DURATION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY SESSIONS

At its seventh session, by resolution 689 (VII) of 21 December 1952, the General Assembly established a special committee to consider the question of measures to limit the duration of its regular sessions. The Committee was to take into account the Secretary-General's memorandum (A/2206)¹⁵ on the subject and any other relevant information communicated by Member States and to report to the Assembly's eighth session.

The Special Committee¹⁶ met at Headquarters from 25 May to 22 June 1953. In its report (A/2402), dated 26 June 1953, the Committee stated that "the best interest of the General Assembly, not the length of the session as such, must remain the overriding consideration in any study of measures designed to limit the duration of the regular sessions". Difficulties related to the duration of the regular sessions, the Committee considered, should not be resolved at the expense, either of the effectiveness of the General Assembly, or of the right of any representative freely to express the attitude of his government on problems before the Assembly. The Special Committee felt, however, that the Assembly, through the co-operation of its Members, could strengthen or initiate certain practices so as to expedite and simplify the conduct of business.

The report reviewed Assembly practice with regard to such matters as: the agenda; reports of Councils; debate in Committees; limitation of debate; points of order; consideration of items in plenary meetings without reference to Committees; and the schedule of meetings. The Committee recommended that an outline of these practices should be included in a consolidated annex to the rules of procedure of the General Assembly. It also made two specific recommendations:

(1) that rule 38 of the Assembly's rules of procedure (dealing with the composition of the General Committee) should be amended to provide that the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Political Committee, when established, would participate with vote in the General Committee; and

(2) that rule 73(113) of the rules of procedure (dealing with the procedure to limit the time of a speaker and the number of times each representative can speak on a question) be amended to provide that, in addition to the proposer of a motion to that effect, two representatives might speak in favour of the motion and two against, after which the motion would immediately be put to the vote.

At the Assembly's eighth session, the question was considered by the Sixth Committee at its 360th to 366th meetings from 29 September to 7 October 1953.

The Committee had before it a Norwegian draft resolution (A/C.6/L.292/Rev.1) which in its operative part would have the Assembly:

(1) adopt the amendments proposed by the Special Committee to rules 38 and 73(113) of the rules of procedure; (2) annex to the rules of procedure the outline of practices as recommended by the Special Committee; and (3) request the Secretary-General to consider the question of consolidating this annex and the current annexes and to publish a new edition of the rules of procedure containing the consolidated annex.

The following amendments were submitted to this draft resolution:

(1) a joint amendment by Brazil and France (A/C.6/L.293) which, in effect, would delete the provisions regarding the annex.

(2) a United Kingdom amendment (A/C.6/L.295) which would add to the Norwegian proposal provisions for: (a) amending rule 39 of the Assembly's rules of procedure to provide for the designation of the Vice-Chairman of the Ad Hoc Political Committee as a substitute for its Chairman in the latter's absence; and (b) providing that each Main Committee, in ordering its priorities, would take into account the closing date for the session fixed by the Assembly.

An amendment to the joint French-Brazilian amendment was proposed by Ecuador and Guatemala (A/C.6/L.296). It would have the effect of deleting all the recommendations of the Norwegian draft resolution except that relating to the amendment of rule 38 of the Assembly's rules of procedure.

During the discussion in the Committee, the representatives of Afghanistan, Argentina, the Byelorussian SSR, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru, Poland, Syria, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Uruguay opposed the amendment to rule 73(113) proposed by the Special Committee and in the Norwegian draft resolution.

These representatives considered that the proposed amendment would restrict the right of sovereign States to express freely the views of their governments. They contended that the existing rules of procedure already provided, under rules 75(115) and 76(116), relating to adjournment and closure of debates, means for limiting the time of a speaker and the number of times a representative could speak on a question. The amendment suggested would, they held, intensify that restriction. Moreover, it was considered, the proposed measure could not in any way limit the duration of the regular sessions of the General Assembly because the length of the sessions could not be reduced by technical devices but depended on the nature of the problems being discussed at a particular session and by the prevailing political climate.

In this connexion, the representative of Syria stated that, for example, the repeated discussion of Korean items by the First Committee could not be stopped by such considerations as the need to limit the duration of Assembly sessions. The representative of Uruguay said that the adoption of the amendment would also involve practical difficulties. For example, what test would the Chairman apply if several representatives raised their hands to speak on a motion? He would in most instances have to rely on an arbitrary decision in giving the floor to a speaker in such a case, the representative of Uruguay said.

These representatives also opposed the provision in the Norwegian draft resolution regarding the annex, stating that such an annex would have no legal validity. The representative of the USSR considered that the proposed annex would add to prolonged procedural discussions, as it was bound to give rise to varying interpretations of the rules.

The representatives of India, Indonesia, Iraq, Pakistan, Peru, Syria and Uruguay also opposed the provision regarding the amendment of rule 38 to enable the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Political Committee to participate in the General Committee. The recommendation, it was stated, was entirely unrelated to the question of limiting the duration of sessions and was outside the terms of reference of the Special Committee. It was a matter, the representatives of Syria and Uruguay, in particular, argued, for a separate decision by the General Assembly and should not be considered in connexion with the Special Committee's report.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Burma, Chile, China, Denmark, France, Greece, the Netherlands, Norway, the Philippines, Sweden, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States supported the two amendments recommended by the Special Committee to rules 38 and 73(113) of the Assembly's rules of procedure. They also expressed the view that the excessively long sessions of the General Assembly entailed expense for all States and led to the deterioration of the quality of delegations, since no government could spare its top-ranking statesmen and diplomats for long periods. The proposed amendment to rule 38, they said, was designed only to confirm an existing practice.

As regards rule 73(113) it was argued, in particular by the representatives of China and Greece, that the proposed amendment would in no way affect discussions of agenda items but would restrict prolonged procedural discussions on motions to limit the time of a speaker. It did not limit the rights of representatives but, said the representative of China, it sought to "limit the time of speakers who wanted to limit the time of other speakers". These representatives felt that the adoption of the amendment would aid efficiency and orderliness in the conduct of business.

Some of these representatives, however, were opposed to the provisions regarding the annex. The representatives of France and Greece, for example, objected that the proposed annex was not a codified body of rules but only a number of suggestions which were not of a binding nature.

In reply, the representatives of Norway, the United Kingdom and the United States said that the status of the proposed annex would be exactly similar to that of the existing annex to the Assembly's rule of procedure which also consisted of recommendations of a Special Committee. By annexing to its rules of procedure the recommendations of the current Special Committee the Assembly would have a ready reference and guide.

At the 366th meeting of the Committee, the amendments proposed by Ecuador and Guatemala were adopted by votes ranging from 24 to 21, with 3 abstentions, to 31 to 6, with 8 abstentions. The two United Kingdom amendments were adopted by 31 votes to none, with 18 abstentions, and 30 votes to 1, with 17 abstentions, respectively.

The second paragraph of the French-Brazilian amendment, by which the Assembly would take note of the report of the Special Committee, was adopted by 45 votes to 1, with 1 abstention.

The Norwegian draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 44 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The report of the Sixth Committee (A/2512 & Corr.1) was considered by the General Assembly at its 453rd plenary meeting on 23 October 1953. The draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee was voted on in paragraphs. The preamble and paragraph 1 were adopted unanimously; paragraph 2 by 49 votes to none, with 5 abstentions; and paragraph 3 by 51 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted (791(VIII)) unanimously. It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having regard to General Assembly resolution 689 (VII) of 21 December 1952,

"Having regard to the report of the Special Committee on Measures to Limit the Duration of Regular Sessions of the General Assembly,

"1. Takes note of the above-mentioned report;

"2. (a) Amends rule 38 of its rules of procedure to read as follows:

The General Committee shall comprise the President of the General Assembly, who shall preside, the seven Vice-Presidents, the Chairman of the six Main Committees and the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Political Committee when one is established. No two members of the General Committee shall be members of the same delegation, and it shall be so constituted as to ensure its representative character. Chairmen of other committees upon which all Members have the right to be represented and which are established by the General Assembly to meet during the session, shall be entitled to attend meetings of the General Committee and may participate without vote in the discussions;

"(b) Amends the second sentence of rule 39 of its rules of procedure to read as follows:

The Chairman of a Main Committee or of the Ad Hoc Political Committee shall, in case of absence, designate the Vice-Chairman of the Committee as his substitute;

"3. Amends rule 98 of its rules of procedure to read as follows:

Each Main Committee, taking into account the closing date for the session fixed by the General Assembly on the recommendation of the General Committee, shall adopt its own priorities and meet as may be necessary to complete the consideration of the items referred to it;"

b. QUESTION OF A CHANGE IN THE OPENING DATE OF REGULAR SESSIONS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The General Assembly considered this question at the 405th meeting of its Fifth Committee on 16 November and its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December 1953. In accordance with resolution 692(VII),¹⁷ it had before it a report by the Secretary-General on the practical consequences of a change in the opening date of the Assembly's regular sessions (A/2436), together with the observations and recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/2553).

The Secretary-General in his report stated that it would seem probable that an opening date during the first half of the year would reduce the risk of postponements followed by a disruption of the work of the Assembly. If any advantage was to be gained, he stated, consideration should be given to a convenient date between the beginning of the year and the early summer months, for example 20 April. This would eliminate the necessity of dividing the regular sessions into two parts and would allow the Assembly to complete a session of normal length by the beginning of summer. The report examined in detail the effect that any such change in date would have on the pattern of conferences of other United Nations organs and of the specialized agencies. From an administrative point of view, the Secretary-General pointed out that a change in the opening of Assembly sessions to the month of April would carry with it important implications for the financial arrangements of the Organization, with particular regard to the budget, the reports of the Board of Auditors, the contributions of Members and the Working Capital Fund. These factors also raised the question whether a change in the financial year would not have to be considered. In conclusion, the Secretary-General reviewed the situation which would arise, on the one hand, if the financial year were unchanged and, on the other, if it were changed.

The Advisory Committee, while agreeing that a change in date would reduce the risk of postponement of the Assembly session, emphasized, on the other hand, that the risk of interruption of the session would merely be reduced, not eliminated, by such a change. Noting that no specific proposal had been made, either by the Secretary-General or by any delegation, the Advisory Committee stated that it did not recommend a change for the following reasons:

(1) in a majority of States the period prior to 20 April was normally a period of important parliamentary activity;

(2) the Assembly sessions of the World Health Organization (WHO) and the International Labour Organisation (ILO) were normally held in May and June and this might, among other things, cause inconvenience to Treasuries and other government departments;

(3) a large-scale readjustment of the conference programme would be called for; and

(4) in the event of a change in the opening date, there were serious drawbacks or risks regarding the financial arrangements of the United Nations whether the financial year was altered accordingly or maintained.

For these reasons, the Advisory Committee recommended (A/2553) that the existing provision concerning the opening date of the Assembly sessions should be maintained. The Committee suggested, however, though without making a firm recommendation, that a deferment of the opening date, possibly by two weeks, until the first Tuesday in October might be considered, in order to afford more time for preparatory work and in particular for the drafting and printing of the annual report of the Economic and Social Council.

During the debate in the Fifth Committee, a number of representatives, including those of Cuba, Egypt and the United States, expressed support of the Advisory Committee's suggestion that regular sessions of the General Assembly should not open until the first Tuesday in October, on the understanding, however, that this would be on an experimental basis for 1954 and that it would not involve a change, at least for the time being, in the existing rules of procedure. Other representatives, among them those of Canada, China, India, Pakistan and the Union of South Africa, while recognizing the advantages of affording more time for completion of preparatory work, considered that such advantages would be outweighed by the risk of a split session. The desirability of completing the session in time to allow delegations to return home for Christmas was particularly stressed.

The representatives of Belgium and France stated that it should not be unduly difficult for the General Assembly to complete its work between the first Tuesday in October and the middle of December, thus allowing for a session of ten weeks. This would be especially so if delegations were to be furnished with better documentation and furnished with such documentation in good time. Moreover, deferment of the opening date by two weeks would tend to facilitate the attendance of important government leaders. There was no valid reason, these representatives considered, for assuming that sessions of the Assembly should necessarily last three months; if delegations exercised adequate self-discipline, it should be feasible to begin sessions early in October and to adjourn in sufficient time to enable representatives to return home before Christmas. Indeed, a slightly later opening date might prove in itself an effective means of ensuring that the duration of ordinary sessions was not unnecessarily prolonged.

Still other representatives, including those of Australia, Denmark, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, argued that, even if regular sessions were to open two weeks later, delegations would not necessarily be in possession of all relevant documentation, nor were there valid grounds for believing that Main Committees would begin their work immediately or that they would work more efficiently and expeditiously. No valid conclusions, moreover, could be drawn from an experiment which would be based on the experience of one session only. Indeed, the Assembly had experimented frequently in the past and should now make a serious effort to adhere strictly to its own rules of procedure.

The representatives of New Zealand and Australia also stated that, while a session beginning in April would have many advantages from the point of view of their respective Governments and would make it possible for them to pay their contributions earlier in the financial year, they would not press the point, although they considered that the difficulties mentioned were not insurmountable.

An oral proposal by Cuba that the opening date of the ninth session should be deferred until the first Tuesday in October on an experimental basis was rejected by 25 votes to 14, with 8 abstentions. The Committee also rejected, by 24 votes to 19, with 4 abstentions, an oral proposal by Iraq that the opening date of the ninth session should be deferred until the fourth Tuesday in September.

The Fifth Committee, by 47 votes to none, with 1 abstention, and, on the Committee's recommendation (A/2620), the General Assembly, at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December 1953, unanimously adopted a resolution (783(VIII)) in which the Assembly noted the Secretary-General's report and the Advisory Committee's observations and concurred in the Advisory Committee's recommendation that the existing provision in the rules of procedure concerning the opening date of regular sessions of the General Assembly should be maintained.

c. ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF SUBSIDIARY BODIES¹⁸

(1) The International Law Commission

At its 453rd and 454th plenary meetings on 23 October, the General Assembly elected the fifteen members of the International Law Commission for a three-year term beginning 1 January 1954.

The Assembly had before it the list of candidates nominated by Member States with statements of their qualifications (A/2399 & Corr.1, Add.1, Add.2/Rev.1 & Add.3 & 4; A/2500/-Rev.1). It elected fourteen candidates on the first ballot and the fifteenth candidate on the fourth ballot.

The following were the votes received by those elected on the first ballot: Gilberto Amado (Brazil)—49; Roberto Cordova (Mexico)—49; Jean Spiropoulos (Greece)—47; Georges Scelle (France)—46; Hersch Lauterpacht (United Kingdom)—44; Sergei Borisovich Krylov (USSR)—42; A. E. F. Sandström (Sweden)—42; John Johnston Parker (United States)—41; Shuhsi Hsu (China)—39; Francisco U. García-Amador (Cuba)—37; Radhabinod Pal (India)—37; Faris El-Khoury (Syria)—33; Jaroslav Zourek (Czechoslovakia)—33; J. P. A. François (Netherlands)—32.

On the first ballot, Maurice Bourquin (Belgium) received 29 votes and Carlos Salamaña Figueroa (Bolivia) and Jesus Maria Yepes (Colombia) received 28 votes each. On the fourth ballot, Mr. Salamaña was elected; he received 34 votes and Mr. Bourquin 24.

(2) Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories

At its 395th meeting on 7 December, the Fourth Committee elected Guatemala and Burma as members of this Committee for a three-year term beginning 1 January 1954, to replace Cuba and Pakistan, retiring members.

Both were elected on the first ballot, the voting being as follows: Guatemala—29; Burma—25; USSR—20; Colombia—13; Philippines—4; Thailand and Pakistan—one vote each.

The General Assembly took note of the election at its 470th plenary meeting on 8 December.

(3) Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds

At the 451st plenary meeting on 5 October, the President announced that, in accordance with Assembly resolution 759(VIII), she had appointed the following Member States to the Negotiating Committee established by that resolution:

Australia, Canada, Chile, Colombia, France, Lebanon, Pakistan, United Kingdom, United States.

(4) Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions

On the recommendation of the Fifth Committee (A/2537), the General Assembly, at its 456th plenary meeting on 3 November, without objection, appointed Rafik Asha, André Ganem and G. R. Kamat to the Advisory Committee for a three-year term beginning 1 January 1954 (resolution 762(VIII)). The retiring members of the Committee were Rafik Asha, André Ganem, and Braj Kumar Nehru.

(5) Committee on Contributions

On the recommendation of the Fifth Committee (A/2538), the General Assembly, at its 456th plenary meeting on 3 November, without objection, appointed O. Strauch, A. H. Clough and K. E. Book to the Committee on Contributions for a three-year term beginning 1 January 1954 (resolution 763(VIII)). The retiring members of the Committee were A. H. Clough, A. Nass and Miss Maria Z. N. Witteveen.

(6) Board of Auditors

On the recommendation of the Fifth Committee (A/2561), the General Assembly, at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December, reappointed, without objection, the Auditor-General (or officer holding equivalent title) of Colombia for a three-year term beginning 1 July 1954 (resolution 776(VIII)).

(7) Investments Committee

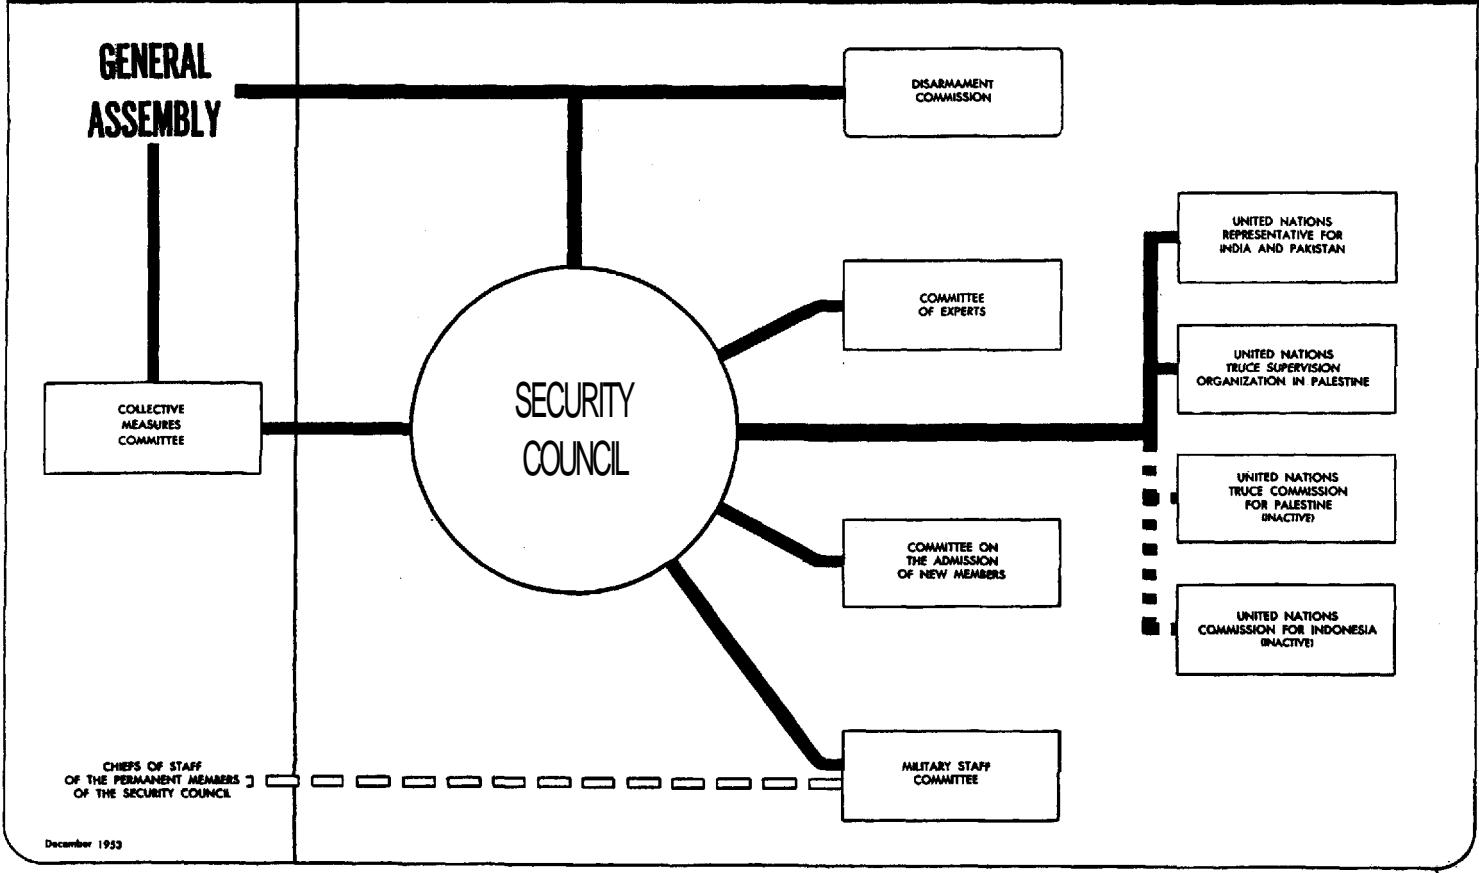

On the recommendation of the Fifth Committee (A/2560), the General Assembly, at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December, confirmed, without objection, the reappointment of Jacques Rueff as a member of the Investments Committee for a three-year term beginning 1 January 1954 (resolution 777(VIII)).

(8) United Nations Administrative Tribunal

On the recommendation of the Fifth Committee (A/2618), the General Assembly, at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December, without objection, appointed the Rt. Hon. Lord Crook and Jacob Mark Lashly to the Administrative Tribunal for a three-year term beginning 1 January 1954. The retiring members were Lord Crook and Vladimir Outrata.

¹⁸ For the election by the General Assembly at its eighth session of three non-permanent members of the Security Council (450th plenary meeting), six members of the Economic and Social Council (450th and 451st plenary meetings), two members of the Trusteeship Council (451st plenary meeting) and one member of the International Court of Justice (458th plenary meeting), see under these organs.

STRUCTURE OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL

B. THE SECURITY COUNCIL

1. Charter Provisions

The Members of the United Nations have conferred on the Security Council the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. The functions of the Council fall mainly under two headings: the pacific settlement of disputes and action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression.

Decisions of the Council on procedural matters are made by an affirmative vote of any seven members. Decisions on other matters are made by an affirmative vote of seven members, including the concurring votes of the five permanent members of the Council, provided that a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting with respect to measures for the pacific settlement of that dispute.

The Charter provisions relating to the Security Council are contained in Chapter V (Articles 23-32) which defines the composition, functions and powers, voting and procedure of the Council; Chapter VI (Articles 33-38) which deals with the pacific settlement of disputes; Chapter VII (Articles 39-51) which deals with action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression; Chapter VIII (Articles 52-54) which relates to regional arrangements; and Articles 76 and 82-84 of Chapter XII which relate to strategic areas in Trust Territories. Other provisions are to be found in Articles 1, 2, 4-7, 10-12, 15, 18, 20, 65, 93, 94, 96-99, 106, 108 and 109 of the Charter and Articles 4, 7-15, 35, 41 and 69 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.¹⁹

2. Structure²⁰

Organs reporting to the Security Council during 1953 were:

- a. MILITARY STAFF COMMITTEE
- b. DISARMAMENT COMMISSION
- c. COLLECTIVE MEASURES COMMITTEE²¹
- d. STANDING COMMITTEES
 - (1) Committee of Experts
 - (2) Committee on the Admission of New Members
- e. Ad Hoc COMMITTEES AND COMMISSIONS
 - (1) United Nations Commission for Indonesia
 - (2) Chief of Staff of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization in Palestine

(3) United Nations Representative for India and Pakistan.

3. Members and Presidents

The Security Council consists of eleven members, five permanent and six non-permanent elected for a two-year term by the General Assembly.

The following were the members of the Security Council during 1953:

PERMANENT MEMBERS

China, France, USSR, United Kingdom, United States

NON-PERMANENT MEMBERS

Elected to serve until 31 December 1953: Chile, Pakistan, Greece

Elected to serve until 31 December 1954: Colombia, Denmark, Lebanon

The Presidency of the Council is held in turn by Member States in the English alphabetical order of their names, each President holding office for one month. The following representatives held the office of President during 1953:

January	Greece	Alexis Kyrou
February	Lebanon	Charles Malik
March	Pakistan	Ahmed S. Bokhari
April	USSR	Andrei Y. Vyshinsky
May	United Kingdom	Sir Gladwyn Jebb
June	United States	Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr.
July	Chile	Rudencindo Ortega Masson
August	China	Tingfu F. Tsiang
September	Colombia	Francisco Urrutia
October	Denmark	William Borberg
November	France	Henri Hoppenot
December	Greece	Alexis Kyrou

4. Meetings of the Council and Matters Considered during 1953

The Security Council is organized to function continuously.

During 1953 it held 43 meetings, its 612th to 654th, between 11 March and 29 December. All the meetings were held at United Nations Headquarters. The following were the questions considered:

²⁰ This section lists the subsidiary bodies of the Security Council during 1953. As no new subsidiary bodies were established during the year, terms of reference are not given here; they may be found in Y.U.N., 1950, pp. 47-50 and Y.U.N., 1951, p. 42, or in Structure of the United Nations (Seventh Revision) January 1954 (ST/DPI/8). Members of subsidiary bodies and representatives serving on them during 1953 are listed in Appendix II.

5. Meetings of Subsidiary Bodies

In addition to those organs which functioned continuously throughout the year, the Council's subsidiary bodies held the following meetings:

Military Staff Committee: bi-weekly meetings throughout the year; the first meeting was held on 8 January and the last on 23 December.

6. Organizational Questions²²

a. ELECTION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THREE NON-PERMANENT MEMBERS OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL

At its 450th plenary meeting on 5 October, the General Assembly elected Brazil, New Zealand and Turkey as non-permanent members of the Security Council for a two-year term beginning

1 January 1954 to replace Chile, Greece and Pakistan, retiring members.

Brazil and New Zealand were both elected on the first ballot, receiving 56 and 48 votes, respectively.

Other votes obtained on this ballot were: Turkey—32; Poland—18; Philippines—17; Czechoslovakia—2; Ecuador—2; Mexico—1.

Following six further, inconclusive, ballots, Turkey was elected, having obtained the required two-thirds majority. Voting on the final ballot was: Turkey—40 votes; Poland—19 votes.

b. ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COUNCIL TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The annual report of the Security Council to the General Assembly (A/2437), covering the period from 16 July 1952 to 15 July 1953, was adopted by the Council at its 618th meeting (closed) on 12 August 1953. The Assembly, at its 455th plenary meeting on 3 November 1953, adopted, without objection, a resolution (803 (VIII)) taking note of the report.

C. THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

1. Charter Provisions

The Economic and Social Council is responsible, under the General Assembly's authority, for promoting: higher standards of living; full employment and conditions of economic and social progress and development; solutions of international economic, social health, and related problems; international cultural and educational co-operation; and universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

It makes or initiates studies and reports with respect to international economic, social, cultural, educational, health, and related matters. It makes recommendations on such matters to the General Assembly, to the Members of the United Nations and to the specialized agencies concerned. It also makes recommendations for the purpose of promoting respect for and observance of human rights.

It prepares draft conventions for submission to the Assembly on matters within its competence and calls international conferences on such matters.

It enters into agreements with specialized agencies, and makes arrangements for consultation with non-governmental organizations.

The Council's decisions are taken by a simple majority of the members present and voting.

The Charter provisions relating to the Economic and Social Council are contained in Chapter IX (Articles 55-60) which sets forth the objectives and functions of the United Nations in the sphere of international economic and social co-operation, and Chapter X (Articles 61-72) which defines the composition, functions and powers, voting and procedure of the Council. Other provisions are to be found in Articles 1, 2, 7, 15, 17, 18, 91, 96, 98 and 101.²³

2. Structure²⁴

Subsidiary organs reporting to the Economic and Social Council are of five types:

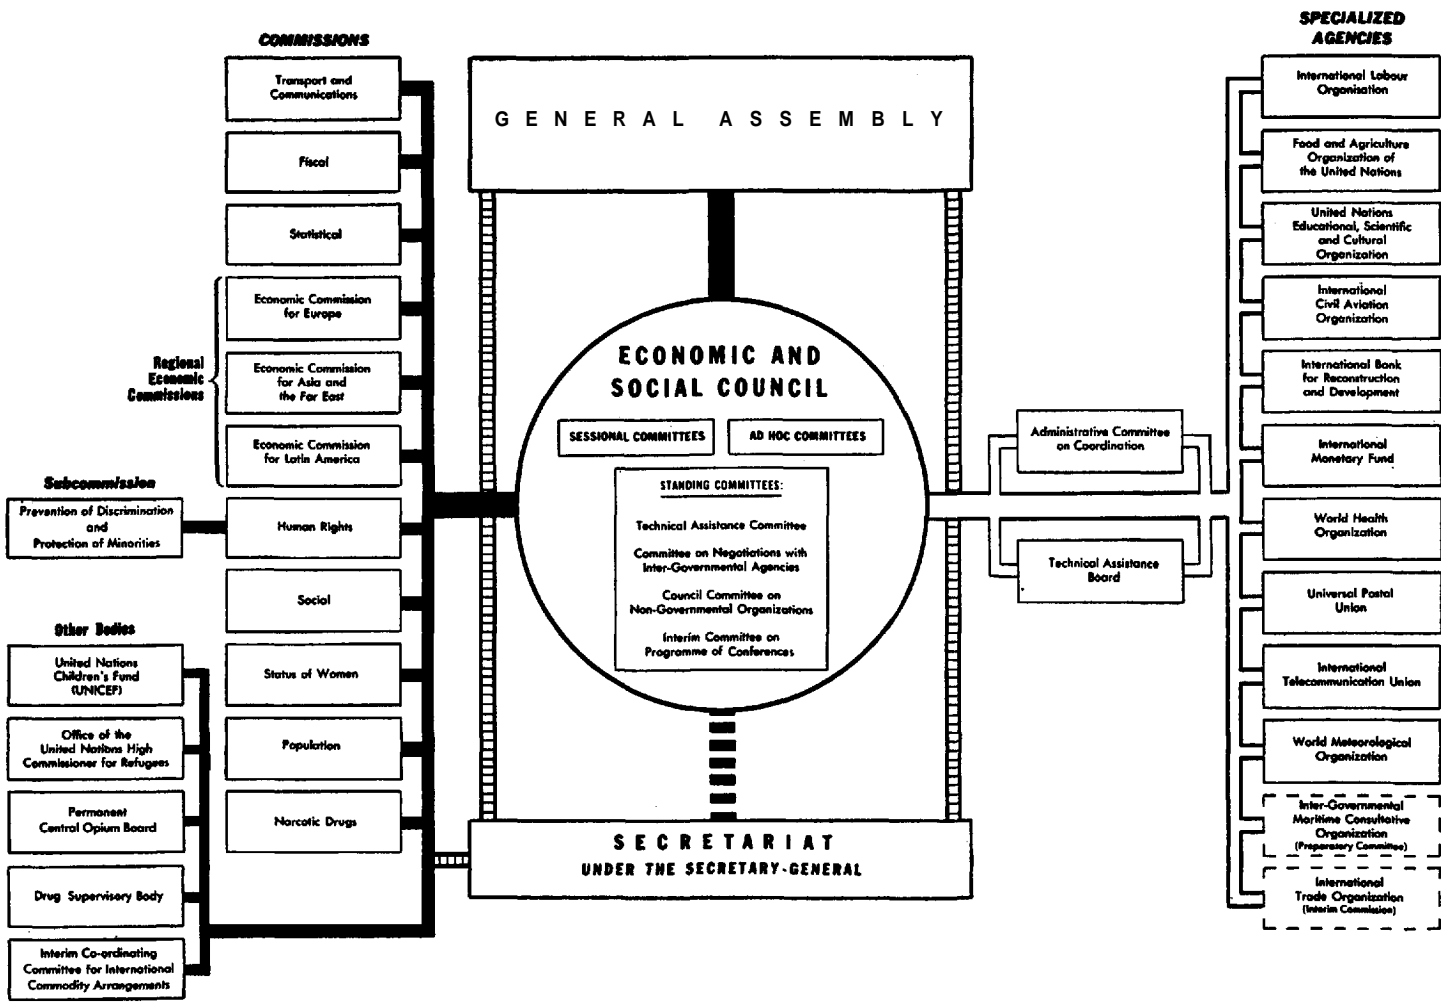

- a. Functional commissions and sub-commissions
- b. Regional economic commissions
- c. Standing committees
- d. Special bodies
- e. Ad hoc committees

²² For the election by the Security Council of a member of the International Court of justice, see under that heading.

²⁴ This section lists the subsidiary bodies of the Economic and Social Council during 1953. The terms of reference are given only for new subsidiary organs established during 1953; for the terms of reference of subsidiary organs previously established, see Y.U.N., 1950, pp. 60-66, Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 49-53 and Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 39-40. The terms of reference of subsidiary bodies existing in January 1954 are also given in Structure of the United Nations (Seventh Revision) January 1954 (ST/DPI/8). Members of subsidiary bodies and representatives serving on them during 1953 are listed in Appendix III.

6. Organizational Questions

a. ELECTIONS

(1) Election of Six Members of the Council

At its 450th and 451st plenary meetings on 5 October, the General Assembly re-elected the USSR and the United Kingdom and elected Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Norway and Pakistan for a three-year term beginning 1 January 1954, to replace the Philippines, Poland, Sweden and Uruguay, retiring members.

The United Kingdom, Ecuador, the USSR, Czechoslovakia and Norway were elected on the first ballot. The voting on this ballot was as follows: United Kingdom—47; Ecuador—45; USSR—45; Czechoslovakia—42; Norway—42; Indonesia—36; Pakistan—33; Afghanistan—28; Philippines—7; Colombia—2; and Burma, Haiti, Israel, New Zealand, Peru, Poland, Thailand and Uruguay one vote each.

Following four further, inconclusive, ballots, Pakistan was elected, having obtained the required two-thirds majority; on this ballot Pakistan received 38 votes and Indonesia 17.

(2) Vacancies in Membership of Subsidiary Bodies of the Council

At its sixteenth session, at the 747th and 749th plenary meetings on 3 and 4 August 1953, the Economic and Social Council held its annual elections for one third of the membership of the functional commissions (exclusive of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, for which see below).

The following were elected (asterisk indicates member re-elected):

Transport and Communications Commission: Byelorussian SSR*, Egypt*, USSR*, United States*, Venezuela (replacing Brazil).

Fiscal Commission: China*, France*, India*, Turkey*, United Kingdom*.

Statistical Commission: Denmark*, France*, Panama*, United Kingdom*, Yugoslavia (replacing Egypt).

Population Commission: Argentina, Belgium*, Brazil*, Canada, Syria. (The three retiring members replaced were Australia, Peru, Yugoslavia.)

Social Commission: Australia, Belgium*, Byelorussian SSR*, China*, Israel*, Uruguay. (The two retiring members replaced were Canada and Ecuador.)

Commission on Human Rights: Australia*, Chile*, Greece, Pakistan*, Turkey, United States*. (The two retiring members replaced were Sweden and Yugoslavia.)

Commission on the Status of Women: Cuba*, Dominican Republic*, France*, Poland*, Sweden, Yugoslavia. (The two retiring members replaced were the Netherlands and New Zealand.)

Commission on Narcotic Drugs: At its 749th plenary meeting, the Council also elected the five members of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs which are elected every three years (the remaining members serving for an indefinite period). It re-elected Egypt, Iran, Mexico and Poland and elected Greece to replace the Netherlands.

United Nations Children's fund (UNICEF): Members of the Social Commission being ex officio members of the Executive Board of UNICEF, the Council, in electing members of this Commission (see above), automatically elected them as members of the Board. At its 749th plenary meeting it re-elected Italy and Switzerland and elected Ecuador to replace Uruguay, as members of the Board.

Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities

At its ninth session, held from 7 April to 30 May, the Commission on Human Rights elected new members of this Sub-Commission for a term of office commencing on 1 January 1954 and terminating on 31 December 1956. The new members, elected by the Commission subject to the consent of their Governments, were: Charles D. Ammoun (Lebanon); Jorge Bocobo (Philippines); P. Chatenet (France); Nikolai P. Emelyanov (USSR); R. Hiscocks (United Kingdom); Mrs. Oswald B. Lord (United States); M. R. Masani (India); M. A. Mohammed (Egypt); H. Roy (Haiti); Hernán Santa Cruz (Chile); Max Sorensen (Denmark); Joseph Winiewicz (Poland).

b. AMENDMENTS TO THE RULES OF PROCEDURE OF THE COUNCIL AND ITS SUBSIDIARY BODIES

The Economic and Social Council had before it, at its 674th and 675th plenary meetings on 1 April 1953, a note by the Secretary-General (E/2355) on this subject.

Part I of the note contained the amendments proposed to the rules of procedure consequent upon the Assembly's endorsement (664(VII)) of the Council's opinion (456 C (XIV)) that Spanish should be adopted³⁴ as a working language of the Council and its functional commissions, namely rules 35 to 38 of the Council and rules 29 to 32 of its functional commissions.

In Part II of the note the Secretary-General proposed that rule 37 of the functional commissions concerning records should be amended on the basis of the corresponding rule 43 of the Council which had been revised at the fourteenth session (456(XIV)).³⁵ As revised, this rule would provide that participants in the discussions would have three working days, instead of 48 hours, to submit corrections to provisional summary records for incorporation in the final text and that separate corrigenda would not normally be issued.

A proposal by the USSR representative (E/L.476) that the Council should also request the Assembly to give favourable consideration to the question of adopting Russian as a working language of the Council and its functional commissions was rejected by 10 votes to 4, with 4 abstentions.

The Council, at its 675th plenary meeting on 1 April, on the basis of a draft resolution by Argentina, Cuba, Venezuela and Uruguay (E/L.477) adopted (481(XV)) the revised rules of procedure as contained in the note by the Secretary-General.³⁶

The Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, at its ninth session from 6 to 14 February 1953, decided to amend rule 5, paragraph (c) of its rules of procedure so that the provisional agenda for its sessions might include items proposed by any associate member of the Commission.

The Economic Commission for Latin America, at its fifth session from 9 to 25 April 1953, decided (E/2405) to amend its rules of procedure³⁷ with respect to the consultative status of non-governmental organizations in accordance with the recommendations of Council resolution 414 C.1 (XIII),³⁸ adopted on 18 September 1951.

c. QUESTION OF ADMISSION TO MEMBERSHIP IN THE REGIONAL ECONOMIC COMMISSIONS OF STATES NOT MEMBERS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The Council at its fifteenth session had before it an application from the Government of Afghanistan for the admission of that country to membership in the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE). The Council, at its 700th plenary meeting on 24 April 1953, adopted by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention, a draft resolution by India (E/L.501). By this resolution (465(XV)), the Council amended the list of member States in the Commission's terms of reference to include Afghanistan as a member.

At its ninth session, from 6 to 14 February 1953, ECAFE had had before it proposals to admit certain associate members to full membership. The Commission adopted a resolution (E/CN.11/370) recommending that the Council take early and full cognizance of the views of the Commission in the matter and admit to membership of the Commission those associate members who are responsible for their own international relations and who apply to the Commission for such membership.

The Council at its fifteenth session, at its 699th to 701st plenary meetings on 24 and 27 April, also had before it communications from the Governments of Cambodia (E/2400), Laos (E/2399) and Vietnam (E/2398), referring to the above-mentioned resolution of the Commission and applying for membership in ECAFE.

In place of the draft resolution recommended by ECAFE (E/2374),³⁹ a draft resolution to admit Cambodia, Ceylon, Japan, the Republic of Korea, Laos, Nepal and Vietnam as members of the Commission was submitted jointly by France and the United States (E/L.504). Paragraph (b) of the draft resolution was modified by an amendment submitted by Australia (E/L.505) and accepted by the sponsors. The draft resolution, as modified, proposed:

"(a) to amend paragraph 3 of the terms of reference of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East to include Cambodia, Ceylon, Japan, the Republic of Korea, Laos, Nepal and Vietnam as members of the Commission, provided that in each case the States agree to contribute annually such equitable amounts as the General Assembly shall assess from time to time in accordance with procedures established by the General Assembly in similar cases; and

"(b) to amend paragraph 4 to delete the above-mentioned countries from this paragraph as and when each country named in paragraph (a) becomes a full member of the Commission".⁴⁰

A number of objections were raised against the draft resolution. Some representatives, including those of India, Sweden and Yugoslavia, were doubtful as to whether the Council had the power under Article 69 of the Charter to grant full membership or voting rights to States not Members of the United Nations in its regional economic commissions. The Indian representative also considered the proposal premature. The representatives of Argentina, Egypt, India, the USSR and Yugoslavia expressed the view that the Council should decide the question of granting membership to States not Members of the United Nations by means of a general rule applicable to all regional commissions and felt that the draft resolution was not consistent with the Council's previous decision regarding voting rights for non-members of the United Nations participating in a consultative capacity in the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE). Doubts were also expressed by the representatives of Poland, the USSR and Yugoslavia as to whether certain of the States recommended for membership in ECAFE in the draft resolution were responsible for their own international relations.

On the other hand, the representatives of China, France, the United Kingdom and the United States were of the opinion that the Council was competent to act on this matter. They referred to a formal legal opinion given by the Secretariat at the Council's thirteenth session that the Council was competent to invite States not Members of the United Nations to participate as full members in the regional commissions. Furthermore, the action proposed in the draft resolution would not be inconsistent with what had been done with regard to membership in ECE, since the proposal in that connexion had been that all the non-member countries participating in the work of ECE in a consultative capacity should be given full voting rights en bloc without reference to the merits of each individual case. It would also be possible to take a separate decision regarding each individual State. With regard to the question of whether or not certain States were responsible for their own international relations, these representatives drew the Council's attention to the General Assembly's resolution 195(III), regarding the Government of the Republic of Korea, and resolution 620(VII), which expressed the General Assembly's opinion regarding the position of Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam.

The Council, at its 701st plenary meeting on 27 April, decided by 9 votes to 8, with 1 abstention, to adjourn to its sixteenth session the discussion of the question of admission to membership in the regional economic commissions of States not Members of the United Nations. At its sixteenth session the Council deferred the question to its seventeenth session.

d. ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COUNCIL TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The Economic and Social Council, at its 750th plenary meeting on 5 August 1953, discussed the arrangements for its annual report to the General Assembly and decided to follow the usual practice of authorizing its President to prepare its report in consultation with the two Vice-Presidents and the Secretariat.

The Council's report (A/2430), which covered the period from 2 August 1952 to 5 August 1953, was divided into nine chapters: Chapter I (Constitutional and organizational questions); Chapter II (General economic questions); Chapter III (Economic development of under-developed countries); Chapter IV (Social questions); Chapter V (Human rights); Chapter VI (General questions); Chapter VII (Questions, of co-ordination and relations with specialized agencies); Chapter VIII (Non-Governmental organizations); Chapter IX (Financial implications of the actions taken by the Council). The General Assembly at its eighth session considered the report in connexion with the various substantive questions.⁴¹

D. THE INTERNATIONAL TRUSTEESHIP SYSTEM AND THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

1. Charter Provisions

The United Nations Charter contains a general "Declaration Regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories" under which all Members of the United Nations responsible for administering such Territories undertake certain obligations.

For those Non-Self-Governing Territories not placed under the International Trusteeship System, they undertake to transmit to the Secretary-General information concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories. (Summaries and analyses of this information are considered by a committee of the General Assembly, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories).⁴²

The International Trusteeship System applies to those Non-Self-Governing Territories placed under it by individual Trusteeship Agreements. The basic objectives of the System are:

- (1) to further international peace and security;
- (2) to promote the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the Trust

⁴¹ See under appropriate headings.

⁴² For the functions of this Committee, see Y.U.N., 1951, p. 81; for its members in 1953, see under General Assembly's subsidiary bodies, Appendix I.

Territories and their progressive development towards self-government or independence;

(3) to encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction and to encourage recognition of the interdependence of the peoples of the world; and

(4) to ensure equal treatment to Members of the United Nations and their nationals in social, economic and commercial matters and in the administration of justice.

The System applies to Territories in the following categories placed under it by individual Trusteeship Agreements:

- (1) Territories held under Mandate;
- (2) Territories detached from enemy States as a result of the Second World War; and
- (3) Territories voluntarily placed under the System by the States responsible for their administration.

The functions of the United Nations with regard to Trusteeship Agreements for all Trust Territories not designated as strategic areas are exercised by the General Assembly with the assistance of the Trusteeship Council. For areas designated as strategic, these functions are the responsibility of the Security Council.

The Trusteeship Council, under the Assembly's authority:

- (1) considers reports submitted by the Administering Authorities of the Trust Territories on the basis of a questionnaire prepared by the Council;
- (2) accepts petitions and examines them in consultation with the Administering Authorities;
- (3) provides for periodic visits to the Territories; and
- (4) takes other actions in conformity with the terms of the Trusteeship Agreements.

Chapter XI of the Charter (Articles 73 and 74) contains the Declaration Regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories.

Chapter XII (Articles 75-85) and Chapter XIII (Articles 86-91) deal with the International Trusteeship System. Chapter XII establishes this System and Chapter XIII defines the composition, functions and powers, voting and procedure of the Trusteeship Council. Other provisions relating to the Council are to be found in Articles 1, 2, 7, 15, 16, 18, 96, 98 and 101.⁴³

2. Trusteeship Agreements

Trusteeship Agreements placing the following Territories under the International Trusteeship System have been approved; the Administering Authorities are designated in the Agreements.

Administering Authority	Trust Territory	Agreement Approved by General Assembly
Australia	New Guinea	13 Dec. 1946
Belgium	Ruanda-Urundi	13 Dec. 1946
France	Cameroons under French Administration	13 Dec. 1946

Administering Authority	Trust Territory	Agreement Approved by General Assembly
France	Togoland under French Administration	13 Dec. 1946
Italy	Somaliland under Italian Administration	2 Dec. 1950
New Zealand	Western Samoa	13 Dec. 1946
United Kingdom	Cameroons under British Administration	13 Dec. 1946
United Kingdom	Togoland under British Administration	13 Dec. 1946
United Kingdom	Tanganyika	13 Dec. 1946
United Kingdom, New Zealand and Australia (administered by Australia)	Nauru	1 Nov. 1947
	(Strategic Area)	Approved by Security Council
United States	Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands	2 April 1947

Although the terms of the Trusteeship Agreements vary, all contain provisions defining the Territory to which the Agreement applies, designating the Administering Authority and stating the obligations and rights of the Administering Authority. The Agreement for the strategic area Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and the Agreement for Somaliland under Italian Administration differ in certain respects from the other Trusteeship Agreements.⁴⁴

- (2) Standing Committee on Petitions

⁴⁴ A summary of the main provisions of the Agreements is given in Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 40-42.

⁴⁵ This section lists the subsidiary bodies of the Trusteeship Council during the year. The terms of reference are given only for subsidiary bodies established during 1953 or where there has been a change in the functions of existing bodies; for the terms of reference of bodies previously established, see Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 85-87 and Y.U.N., 1952, p. 42. The terms of reference of subsidiary bodies existing in January 1954 are also given in Structure of the United Nations (Seventh Revision) January 1954 (ST/DPI/8). Members of subsidiary bodies and representatives serving on them during 1953 are listed in Appendix IV.

STRUCTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRUSTEESHIP SYSTEM

* For relationship with Trusteeship Council, refer to Article 91 of United Nations Charter.

 Australia exercises full powers of legislation, administration, and jurisdiction on behalf of the three governments which jointly constitute the Administering Authority.

 For relationship with Trusteeship Council, refer to Article 83, paragraph 3 of United Nations Charter.

* Marshall, the Caroline, and the Mariana (with the exception of Guam).

 Italy, as Administering Authority, is aided and advised by a three-member United Nations Advisory Council. Italy participates, without vote, in the deliberations of the Council. The Territory is to become an independent State in 1960.

b. Ad Hoc COMMITTEES

(1) Committee on Rural Economic Development of the Trust Territories

(2) Committee on Participation of Indigenous Inhabitants in the Work of the Trusteeship Council

c. VISITING MISSIONS

During 1953 a visiting mission of the Trusteeship Council went to the Trust Territories in the Pacific.

The terms of reference of the Standing Committee on Administrative Unions were altered during 1953 and the terms of reference of the Committee on Participation of Indigenous Inhabitants in the Work of the Trusteeship Council established as follows:

(1) Standing Committee on Administrative Unions

The terms of reference of this Committee were enlarged by the Council at its twelfth session (resolution 645(XII)) to permit it to study administrative unions not only with regard to the four safeguards enumerated in Council resolution 293(VII)⁴⁶ but also with regard to the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory and the terms of the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement, as well as any other matters which it may deem appropriate.

(2) Committee on Participation of Indigenous Inhabitants in the Work of the Trusteeship Council

This Committee was established by the Council on 15 July by resolution 647(XII) to examine the question of participation of the indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the work of the Trusteeship Council in the light of General Assembly resolution 653(VII) and to report to the Council at its thirteenth session.

4. Members and Officers

The Trusteeship Council consists of:

(1) Members of the United Nations administering Trust Territories;

(2) Permanent members of the Security Council which do not administer Trust Territories; and

(3) As many other members elected for a three-year term by the General Assembly as will ensure that the membership of the Council is equally divided between Members which administer Trust Territories and Members which do not.

The following were the members of the Trusteeship Council during 1953:

Members Administering Trust Territories

Australia, Belgium, France, New Zealand, United Kingdom, United States

Permanent Members of the Security Council not Administering Trust Territories

China, USSR

Members Elected by the General Assembly

8. Organizational Questions

a. ELECTIONS

(1) Election by the General Assembly of Two Members of the Trusteeship Council

At its 451st plenary meeting on 5 October, the General Assembly elected India and Haiti as members of the Trusteeship Council for a three-year term, beginning 1 January 1954, to replace the Dominican Republic and Thailand, retiring members.

India and Haiti were elected on the first ballot, receiving 55 and 51 votes, respectively. Other votes obtained were: Indonesia—12; Thailand, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Norway and the Philippines—one vote each.

(2) Election of Subsidiary Bodies of the Council

At its 482nd plenary meeting on 20 July, the Council appointed Australia, Belgium, the United Kingdom (representatives of Members administering Trust Territories), El Salvador, Syria and the USSR (representatives of Members having no administering responsibilities) to serve on the Standing Committee on Petitions until the close of the thirteenth regular session in 1954.

By resolution 647 (XII), the Council, at its 481st plenary meeting on 15 July, decided that the Committee on the Participation of Indigenous Inhabitants in the Work of the Trusteeship Council should be composed of representatives of El Salvador, Syria, the United Kingdom and the United States.

b. PROCEDURES OF THE COUNCIL

By resolution 467 (XI), the Council at its eleventh session decided to adopt provisionally a number of amendments to several of its rules of procedure and to reconsider them in the light of experience at its twelfth session. It also invited the Standing Committee on Petitions to report to it at its twelfth session on the effectiveness of the new rules of procedure affecting the handling of petitions.

At its 482nd meeting on 20 July, the Council considered the report of the Standing Committee on Petitions (T/L.392), in which the Committee noted, inter alia, that since the Council had made its request it had held only one session. The Committee expressed the opinion that it would be advantageous to defer consideration of the procedural question until the new rules had been in operation for a period covering a full cycle of two sessions of the Council, in order that greater experience of their operation might be obtained.

Consequently, the Committee recommended, and the Council decided, without objection, that the time limit for the submission of the report of the Committee on the question should be extended to the thirteenth session of the Council.

At the same meeting, the Council also considered a report (T/1044 & Corr.1) on procedures of visiting missions submitted by the United Nations Visiting Mission to Trust Territories in West Africa, 1952. In its report, the Visiting Mission suggested that more flexibility should be permitted to a visiting mission in drawing up its itinerary and work programme. On the question of communications and petitions, the same Visiting Mission, which was the first mission to visit Trust Territories after the revision of the Council's rules of procedure relating to petitions, stated that, from its own experience, the changes made by the Council were timely. In order to ensure that the new procedure was most effectively applied, it recommended that, in preparing the itinerary of future visiting missions, fixed periods should be set aside at regular intervals throughout the visit for the primary purpose of enabling each mission to review the communications and other information it had received and to formulate appropriate inquiries and carry out necessary investigations into the more important petitions.

The Council decided that it would take these suggestions into account when making arrangements for its future visiting missions and that it would direct the next visiting mission to consider the suggestions when preparing its itinerary.

c. THE QUESTION OF PROCEDURE FOR ORAL HEARINGS BY THE FOURTH COMMITTEE

Recalling that at the seventh session of the General Assembly his delegation had submitted a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.240/Rev.1)⁴⁸ on the question of oral hearings of petitioners by the Fourth Committee, the representative of the Dominican Republic stated at the 317th meeting of the Fourth Committee, at the Assembly's eighth session, on 25 September that a general decision would have to be reached on how to deal with the problem of deciding which petitions warranted oral presentation in the Fourth Committee.

The United Kingdom representative, at the 318th meeting on 28 September, proposed (A/C.4/L.271) that a sub-committee be established to make recommendations concerning the procedure to be followed in considering applications from petitioners for hearings, including the considerations to be taken into account by the Fourth Committee in reaching decisions in individual cases. The proposal recommended that the sub-committee should consist of eight members, four of whom would be members of the Trusteeship Council—two administering and two non-administering. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the proposal was in no way intended to restrict the right of petition of the inhabitants of the Trust Territories. It was imperative, however, that some general rules should be adopted by the Committee in the interests of orderly procedure.

The United Kingdom proposal was subsequently revised (A/C.4/L.271/Rev.1). The provision which would require half the members of the Committee to be members of the Trusteeship Council was deleted. A provision was added that the proposed Committee should submit its report within fourteen days of the appointment of its members.

Support for the United Kingdom proposal was expressed by the representatives of Belgium, Colombia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Israel, the Netherlands and the Union of South Africa, among others. Those opposing the draft, with or without reservations, included the representatives of Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, the USSR, Uruguay, Yemen and Yugoslavia. Generally speaking, these representatives did not feel that the number of requests for oral hearings warranted making provision for a procedure concerning the hearing of petitioners by the Fourth Committee; they also felt that it was desirable not only that petitioners should have direct access to the General Assembly but that the Assembly should avail itself of the opportunity of hearing petitioners in order to aid it in its consideration of questions before it.

At the 320th meeting on 29 September, the United Kingdom proposal was put to the vote, 22 votes being cast in favour, 23 against, and 12 abstentions. The proposal was accordingly rejected.

d. ANNUAL REPORTS OF THE COUNCIL

(1) Report to the General Assembly

The annual report of the Trusteeship Council to the General Assembly (A/2427), covering the period from 4 December 1952 to 21 July 1953, was adopted by the Council at its 483rd plenary meeting on 21 July 1953 by 11 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

Under the agenda item "Report of the Trusteeship Council", the General Assembly considered, among other things, the questionnaire for the Trust Territories; measures taken or planned by Administering Authorities to bring Trust Territories toward self-government or independence; the use of scholarships for the advancement of education in the Trust Territories; the spread of information about the United Nations in those Territories; the preparation of Somaliland under Italian Administration for its coming independence in 1960; the possibility of appointing United Nations representatives to the Trust Territories; and assistance to the people of the Ngoa-Ekele Community in the Cameroons under French Administration, whose land had been expropriated.⁴⁹

At its 392nd meeting on 4 December the General Assembly's Fourth Committee adopted (A/2608 G), by 45 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, a draft resolution by Denmark (A/C.4/L.326) taking note of the report. The resolution was, in turn, adopted by 48 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, at the Assembly's 471st plenary meeting on 9 December 1953, as resolution 746(VIII). By this resolution, the Assembly took note of the Council's report and recommended that the Trusteeship Council, in its future deliberations, take into account the comments and suggestions made in the course of the discussion of the report at the Assembly's eighth session.

(2) Report to the Security Council

In accordance with Article 83 of the Charter and with the agreement reached in 1949 by the Trusteeship and Security Councils concerning their respective functions as regards strategic areas under Trusteeship, the Trusteeship Council, at its 466th to 470th and 479th plenary meetings held from 23 to 29 June and 13 July, examined the annual report (T/1047) of the Government of the United States on its administration of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands for the year ended 30 June 1952. The Council, at its 483rd plenary meeting on 21 July, adopted a report (S/3066, Part II) on the exercise of its functions in respect of this strategic area for the period 2 April 1952 to 21 July 1953. This report was transmitted by the Secretary-General to the Security Council but was not discussed by the Security Council during 1953.

E. THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

1. Provisions of the Charter and the Statute of the Court

The Court is the principal judicial organ of the United Nations. It functions in accordance with its Statute, which is an integral part of the United Nations Charter.

The Court's function is to decide in accordance with international law such disputes as are submitted to it. It applies: international conventions establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting States; international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law; the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations; judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of the rules of law.

It also gives advisory opinions to the General Assembly and the Security Council on any legal question, and opinions on legal questions arising within their activities to other organs of the United Nations and specialized agencies which are authorized by the Assembly to request them.

The Charter provisions concerning the Court are contained in Chapter XIV (Articles 92-96) which defines the position of the Court in the United Nations organization, the obligations of Members of the United Nations with respect to the Court and the relationship between the Court and the other organs of the United Nations. The Statute of the Court, which forms an integral part of the Charter, contains five Chapters. Chapter I deals with the Court's organization; Chapter II defines its competence; Chapter III sets forth its procedure; Chapter IV lays down the conditions under which the Court may give advisory opinions; and Chapter V contains provisions for amendments to the Statute.⁵⁰

2. Parties to the Statute of the Court

All Members of the United Nations at ipso facto parties to the Court's Statute. In accordance with Article 93 of the Charter, non-United Nations members may become parties in accordance with conditions determined in each case by the General Assembly on the recommendation of the Security Council.

Under this provision Switzerland became a party to the Court's Statute on 28 June 1948 and Liechtenstein on 29 March 1950. The conditions, which were identical in each case, provided for the deposit with the Secretary-General of the United Nations of an instrument containing:

acceptance of the Statute; acceptance of the obligations under Article 94 of the Charter; and an undertaking to contribute to the expenses of the Court an equitable amount assessed by the Assembly from time to time after consultation with the government concerned.

a. APPLICATIONS OF JAPAN AND SAN MARINO

During 1953, Japan on 26 October (S/3126) and the Republic of San Marino on 6 November (S/3137) applied to become parties to the Statute.

On the recommendation of its Committee of Experts (S/3146 & S/3147), the Security Council, at its 645th plenary meeting on 3 December, recommended to the General Assembly (A/2600 & A/2601) the conditions on which each of the two States might become a party. In each case the Council's recommendation was adopted by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

The Security Council's recommendations, as embodied in draft resolutions by Lebanon (A/L.174) in regard to Japan and by Chile (A/L.175) in regard to San Marino, were adopted by the General Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December 1953, each by 51 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

By these resolutions (805(VIII) and 806(VIII)), the Assembly kid down conditions identical with those previously established for Switzerland and Liechtenstein.⁵¹

⁵¹ San Marino deposited its instrument of ratification on 18 February 1954 and Japan on 2 April 1954, thereby becoming parties to the Statute on those dates.

3. Members and Officers

The Court consists of fifteen judges elected by the General Assembly and the Security Council, proceeding independently. They serve nine years and are eligible for re-election. Their term of office begins on the date of the first election, 6 February.

The names and nationality of the judges serving during 1953, in order of precedence, with the year their term of office ends were:

Sir Arnold Duncan McNair (British)	1955
Jose Gustavo Guerrero (El Salvadorean)
(Vice-President)	1955
Alejandro Alvarez (Chilean)	1955
Jules Basdevant (French)	1955
Green H. Hackworth (United States)	1961
Bohdan Winiarski (Polish)	1958
Milovan Zoricic (Yugoslav)	1958
Helge Klaestad (Norwegian)	1961
Abdel Hamid Badawi (Egyptian)	1958
John E. Read (Canadian)	1958
Hsu Mo (Chinese)	1958
Levi Fernandes Carneiro (Brazilian)	1955
Sir Benegal N. Rau (Indian) ⁵²	1961
E. C. Armand Ugon (Uruguayan)	1961
{ Sergei A. Golunsky (USSR) ⁵³	1961
{ Feodor Ivanovich Kozhevnikov (USSR)	1961
Registrar: Edvard Hambro (Norwegian)
Deputy-Registrar: Jean Garnier-Coignet (French)

a. ELECTION OF JUDGE KOZHEVNIKOV

The General Assembly at its 458th plenary meeting and the Security Council at its 644th plenary meeting, the meetings being held concurrently on 27 November, elected Feodor Ivanovich Kozhevnikov (USSR) to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge Sergei A. Golunsky. Judge Kozhevnikov's term of office, which is the unexpired term of Judge Golunsky, will expire on 5 February 1961.

The Assembly and the Council had before them the list of candidates nominated by national groups (A/2521 & Corr.1 & Add.1 & 2; S/3127 & Add. 1 & 2) and a note by the Secretary-General (A/2574 & S/3144) containing an explanation of the voting procedure. It was noted that the candidatures of Choucri Kardahi (Lebanon), Charles de Visscher (Belgium) and Jean Spiropoulos (Greece) had been withdrawn.

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 264(III), Liechtenstein and Switzerland, parties to the Statute of the Court but not Members of the United Nations, participated in the election in the General Assembly.

Mr. Kozhevnikov received an absolute majority on the first ballot in both the General Assembly and the Security Council. The voting was as follows:

General Assembly—Mr. Kozhevnikov 52 votes; Ernesto Dihigo (Cuba) and Juan Bautista de Laval (Peru) one vote each; Security Council—Mr. Kozhevnikov 9 votes; Mr. de Laval one vote, one ballot paper being blank.

4. Chamber of Summary Procedure

The members of the Chamber of Summary Procedure, elected for one year, beginning 13 May 1953 were:

MEMBERS: President: Sir Arnold Duncan McNair; Vice-President: Jose Gustavo Guerrero; Judges Basdevant, Hackworth and Hsu; Substitutes: Judges Klaestad and Badawi.

5. Matters Considered by the Court during 1953

During 1953 the Court dealt with the following matters:

Minquiers and Ecrehos Case

Ambatielos Case (Merits: Obligation to arbitrate)

Nottebohm Case (Preliminary Objection)

Case of the Monetary Gold removed from Rome in 1943 (Determination of time-limits)

Electricité de Beyrouth Company Case (Determination of time-limits)

Election of the members of the Chamber of Summary Procedure

Administrative matters

6. States Accepting the Compulsory Jurisdiction of the Court

Declarations made by the following States accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice (or made under the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice and deemed to be an acceptance of the jurisdiction of the International Court for the period for which they still have to run) had not ceased to be in force in accordance with their terms at the end of 1953:

AUSTRALIA	DENMARK	FRANCE
CANADA	DOMINICAN	HAITI
CHINA	REPUBLIC	HONDURAS
COLOMBIA	EL SALVADOR	INDIA

⁵² Died on 30 November 1953.

⁵³ Judge Kozhevnikov (USSR) was elected on 27 November to fill the unexpired term of Judge Golunsky (USSR) who resigned by letter dated 18 July 1953.

⁵⁴ Was succeeded on 1 January 1954 by Julio López Oliván.

LIBERIA	NORWAY	THAILAND
LIECHTENSTEIN	PAKISTAN	UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA
LUXEMBOURG	PANAMA	UNITED KINGDOM
MEXICO	PARAGUAY ⁵⁵	UNITED STATES
NETHERLANDS	PHILIPPINES	URUGUAY
NEW ZEALAND	SWEDEN

Most of these declarations are for a specified period⁵⁶ and are made on condition of reciprocity; most of them have reservations attached.⁵⁷

7. Organs Authorized to Request Advisory Opinions from the Court

By the end of 1953 the following were authorized to request advisory opinions from the Court:

Authorized in the Charter to request advisory opinions on any legal question:

- General Assembly
- Security Council
- Authorized by the General Assembly in accordance with the Charter to request advisory opinions on legal questions arising within the scope of their activities:
 - Economic and Social Council
 - Trusteeship Council
 - Interim Committee of the General Assembly
 - International Labour Organisation
 - Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations
 - United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization
 - International Civil Aviation Organization
 - World Health Organization
 - International Bank for Reconstruction and Development
 - International Monetary Fund
 - International Telecommunication Union
 - World Meteorological Organization

F. THE SECRETARIAT

1. Charter Provisions

The Secretariat consists of a Secretary-General and such staff as the Organization may require.

The main Charter provisions concerning the Secretariat are contained in Chapter XV (Articles 97-101). Other provisions are to be found in Articles 7, 12, 20, 73, 102, 105 and 110 of the Charter, and Articles 5, 7, 13, 14, 18, 36, 40, 67 and 70 of the Statute of the Court.⁵⁸

2. Appointment of the Secretary-General

In letters dated 6 and 7 March 1953 (S/2948 & S/2947) the representatives of France and the United Kingdom requested that a meeting of the Security Council be held to consider the recommendation to be made by the Council to the General Assembly concerning the replacement as Secretary-General of Trygve Lie, who had tendered his resignation.⁵⁹

At its 612th to 617th meetings, held in private between 11 and 31 March 1953, the Security Council considered this question.

At the 612th meeting three persons were suggested for recommendation by the Council. The representative of the United States proposed Brigadier General Carlos P. Rómulo, the representative of the USSR proposed Stanislaw Skrzyszewski and the representative of Denmark proposed Lester B. Pearson. These three proposals were voted upon by secret ballot at the 613th meeting, and all failed of adoption. The United States proposal received 5 votes in favour, 2 against, and 4 abstentions, and the USSR proposal received 1 vote in favour, 3 against, and 7 abstentions; both were not adopted because they failed to receive seven affirmative votes. The Danish proposal received 9 votes in favour, 1 against, and 1 abstention, and was not adopted owing to the negative vote of a permanent member.

The Security Council then requested the permanent members to hold consultations concerning the recommendation for the appointment of the Secretary-General.

At the 614th meeting on 19 March, the representative of the USSR proposed that the Council should recommend the appointment of Mrs. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit. The USSR proposal, voted on by secret ballot at the same meeting, was not adopted, receiving 2 votes in favour, 1 against, and 8 abstentions. The permanent members were ⁵⁵ Paraguay's declaration was made without limitation of duration. It was withdrawn by Paraguay by a decision of 26 April 1938.

⁵⁷ For details concerning declarations, including conditions, see I.C.J. Yearbook, 1951-1952, pp. 186-197.

⁵⁸ A summary of the relevant Charter provisions is contained in Y.U.N., 1951, p. 107. The text of the Charter and of the Statute is reproduced in Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 10-26.

requested to continue their consultations on the matter.

No nominations were made at the 615th and 616th meetings and the consultations among the permanent members continued.

At the 617th meeting on 31 March, the representative of France proposed that the Council recommend the appointment of Dag Hammarskjöld, Swedish Minister of State, as Secretary-General. This proposal was voted upon by secret ballot and was adopted by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

The President of the Security Council, in a letter dated 31 March (S/2975), informed the President of the General Assembly of the Council's recommendations. He also addressed a cablegram to Mr. Hammarskjöld informing him of the recommendation and expressing the hope of the members of the Council that, in view of the immense importance of the post, especially at that time, he would agree to accept the appointment if it were made by the General Assembly.

At its 423rd plenary meeting on 7 April 1953, the General Assembly considered the question of the appointment of the Secretary-General. The President stated that in taking up this item the Assembly accepted with great regret the resignation of Mr. Lie, to whom he expressed a sense of deep gratitude. He then read to the Assembly the letter from the President of the Security Council (S/2975 & A/2380).

The Assembly unanimously adopted a Canadian draft resolution (A/L.150) providing that the terms of appointment of the second Secretary-General should be the same as those of the first Secretary-General (resolution 709(VII)).⁶⁰

Voting by secret ballot, the Assembly then adopted by 57 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, the recommendation of the Security Council for the appointment of Mr. Hammarskjöld.

At the 426th plenary meeting on 10 April 1953, Mr. Hammarskjöld took the oath of office.

3. Administrative Organization of the Secretariat

At the end of 1953, the Secretariat was organized in the following principal units.⁶¹

G. CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS

1. Preparatory Work for the Possible Holding of a General Conference for Charter Review

a. STATEMENTS AT THE OPENING OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S EIGHTH SESSION

Article 109 of the Charter provides that a proposal to call a General Conference for the purpose of reviewing the Charter shall be placed on the agenda of the tenth annual session of the General Assembly if such a conference has not been held before. References to the preparatory measures for such a conference and to the revision of the Charter were made during the general debate at the opening of the eighth session of the General Assembly. A number of representatives, including those of Egypt, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, while not committing their Governments on the question of Charter revision or of the calling of a conference, expressed the view that preparatory studies should be undertaken by the Secretariat in case the Assembly at its tenth session did decide to hold such a conference.

The representatives of Brazil, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Panama, Peru and Venezuela, among others, expressed views in favour of calling such a conference and in favour of revising the Charter.

The representative of the United States said that the Charter should be reviewed in the light of experience. He referred to a resolution adopted by the United States Senate in 1948 calling for the elimination of the rule of unanimity in the Security Council from all questions involving the pacific settlement of disputes and the admission of new Members.

The representative of Sweden stated that no difficulties could be solved by the mere amendment of a document. The "veto", he said, merely reflected the fact that no Great Power would agree to be bound by decisions unacceptable to it. It was not practicable, at present, to think in terms of a world government and, in his view, there was no immediate need to revise the Charter.

The representative of Colombia, while agreeing with the view that the Charter might be improved, cautioned against any step which might harm the United Nations as a whole. The representative of Israel questioned whether the effectiveness of the Organization would be increased by a review of the Charter.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR opposed categorically the idea of revising the Charter in the present state of international tension. They characterized the suggested preparatory measures as part of a campaign directed, mainly by the United States, against the fundamental principles of the Charter, particularly against the rule of unanimity of the permanent members in the Security Council.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE SIXTH COMMITTEE

At its 435th plenary meeting on 17 September 1953, the General Assembly referred to the Sixth

Committee the following three items:

(1) An item proposed by Argentina (A/2415) entitled: "Publication of documents concerning the drafting and application of the Charter". In its explanatory memorandum, Argentina stated that since some provisions of the Charter had given rise to varying interpretations it was necessary to refer to the preparatory work in connexion with the drafting of the Charter. It was also important to know the interpretation given and the practice followed by the United Nations. The Argentine delegation therefore proposed that the Secretary-General be given the means to prepare and publish:

"(a) a systematic compilation of the documents of the San Francisco Conference not yet published;

"(b) a complete index of all the documents of the San Francisco Conference;

"(c) a systematic and comprehensive study of the legislative history of the Charter; and

"(d) a repertory of the practice followed by the main organs of the United Nations on given subjects."

(2) An item proposed by the Netherlands (A/2442) entitled: "Preparatory work with regard to the possible holding of a General Conference of the Members of the United Nations in accordance with Article 109 of the Charter". In its explanatory memorandum, the Netherlands delegation stated that, under paragraph 3 of Article 109, a proposal to call a General Conference of the Members of the United Nations for the purpose of reviewing the present Charter shall be placed on the agenda of the tenth session of the General Assembly, if such a conference has not been held before. In order to facilitate the examination at the Assembly's tenth session of the question whether to convene such a conference, the Netherlands proposed that preparatory work be undertaken by the Secretary-General and by individual Member States. The Netherlands memorandum stated that part of its proposal could be covered by the repertory of practice contemplated in the Argentine memorandum if such a study were undertaken with due regard to Article 109. The Netherlands proposal also envisaged an invitation to Member States to submit their views with regard to Charter revision prior to the tenth session.

(3) An item proposed by Egypt (A/2466/Add.1) entitled: "Amendment of the Charter; election of a technical committee to study and report on the amendment of the Charter on the basis of proposals to be submitted by Member States". The explanatory memorandum by Egypt stated that the United Nations Charter needed revision, having been drafted in special circumstances which no longer prevailed. The memorandum then referred to the General Conference envisaged in Article 109 and proposed the election of a technical committee to prepare the preliminary work in connexion with Charter revision. It stated that the proposal was complementary to those of Argentina and the Netherlands and that the three proposals could be linked together.

(1) Memorandum by the Secretary-General

The Secretary-General submitted a memorandum (A/C.6/343) to the Sixth Committee containing a detailed description of the official records of the San Francisco Conference and indicating, in particular, that the only official reords not published up to the present time were the documents of the Co-ordination Committee, including the summary reports of the Advisory Committee of Jurists. The memorandum outlined the manner in which a chronological and synoptical index of the documentation of the Conference could be prepared by the Secretariat and indicated that the preparation of a systematic and comprehensive study of the legislative history of the Charter, previously undertaken, had had to be deferred in order to give priority to the preparation of a repertory of the practice of the United Nations under the Charter. The Secretary-General suggested that the main purpose of publishing a legislative history of the Charter might be achieved by the preparation of a comprehensive index to the San Francisco documentation.

The memorandum also contained a report on the initial steps taken within the Secretariat with a view to a preparation of a co-ordinated history of the application of the Charter provisions. This study, the Secretary-General noted, would correspond closely to the Argentine and the Netherlands proposals.

A summary of the financial implications of the Argentine proposals stated that the total minimum expense would be $99,115 and the maximum $120,000. The expected revenue was between $1,250 and $5,000, the Secretary-General concluded.

(2) Proposals before the Sixth Committee

The Sixth Committee considered the three items jointly at its 371st to 380th meetings from 19 October to 4 November. The following draft resolutions were submitted:

(1) A draft resolution by Argentina (A/2415/Add.1), which in its operative part would provide for the Secretary-General to publish before the end of 1954 the studies enumerated in the Argentine memorandum (see above).

(2) A draft resolution by Costa Rica and Egypt (A/C.6/L.305), under which the General Assembly would: (a) request the Secretary-General to prepare all the relevant documents and materials necessary for the preparatory work for a General Conference; (b) establish an advisory committee of fifteen members to assist the Secretary-General in the preparatory work; (c) request the committee to prepare a questionnaire to be circulated to Member States to ascertain their preliminary views; and (d) request the committee further to receive, examine, analyse and co-ordinate the views expressed by the Member States and report to the General Assembly not later than 30 June 1955. Under the draft resolution, the General Assembly would invite Member States to submit their views on the questionnaire prepared by the committee.

(3) A draft resolution submitted jointly by Argentina, Canada, Cuba, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Pakistan (A/C.6/L.306/Rev.2), which would refer in the preamble to the provisions of Article 109 of the Charter and state: (a) that the examination of a proposal to hold a General Conference would require considerable preparation on the part of both the Secretary-General and Member States; and (b) that a study of the legislative history of the Charter and of the practice followed by the various organs of the United Nations would be one of the best methods of acquiring knowledge of the Charter and would greatly facilitate the Assembly's consideration, at its tenth annual session, of the question of calling a General Conference.

Under paragraph 1 of the operative part of this draft resolution, the General Assembly would request the Secretary-General to prepare and publish during 1954, or shortly thereafter: (a) a systematic compilation of the documents of the United Nations Conference on International Organization not yet published; (b) a complete index of all the documents of that Conference; (c) a systematic and comprehensive study of the legislative history of the Charter; and (d) a repertory of the various provisions of the Charter, taking into account their application by the various organs of the United Nations and the interpretations to which they had given rise. Under paragraph 2, the General Assembly would invite Member States to submit, preferably not later than 31 March 1955, their preliminary views with regard to the possible review of the Charter, and, under paragraph 3, it would request the Secretary-General to circulate these preliminary views to Member States as soon as they had been submitted.

The following amendments were submitted to the draft resolution of Argentina, Canada, Cuba, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Pakistan:

(1) An amendment by Belgium, Colombia, France and Mexico (A/C.6/L.307), which proposed to replace the preamble of the six-Power draft resolution with a statement: (a) that any measure likely to lead to a more thorough knowledge of the Charter would be conducive to the efficient functioning of the United Nations; (b) that a study of the preparatory work on the Charter and of the practice followed by the various organs of the United Nations would be one of the best means of acquiring knowledge of the Charter; and (c) that such a study might be made with the help of the official documents by the Secretary-General. The amendment would delete paragraphs 2 and 3 of the operative part of the draft resolution calling for the preliminary views of Member States and for their circulation by the Secretary-General.

(2) An amendment by Australia and the United Kingdom (A/C.6/L.308/Rev.1), which would: (a) add a reference in the preamble of the six-Power draft resolution to the memorandum by the Secretary-General; (b) add further that the index to the San Francisco documents would be on the lines envisaged in the Secretary-General's memorandum; (c) delete the provision in the draft resolution for a legislative history of the Charter; and (d) replace the proposed "repertory of the various provisions of the Charter" by "a repertory of the practice of the United Nations organs appropriately indexed".

(3) An amendment by El Salvador (A/C.6/L.309/Rev.2) proposing, inter alia, that in paragraph 1 of the operative part of the six-Power draft, the Secretary-General be asked not only to prepare and publish the documentation requested but also to circulate it among Member States.

(4) An amendment by Panama (A/C.6/L.310), which proposed: (a) to replace paragraph 2 of the operative part of the six-Power draft resolution by a paragraph inviting the Member States to submit, preferably not later than 31 March 1955, their objections to the Charter and their views with regard to the possible review of the Charter; (b) to replace paragraph 3 of the operative part by a request to the Secretary-General to circulate these objections and preliminary views to Member States as soon as they had been submitted so that each Member State could express its opinion thereon; and (c) to add a fourth paragraph instructing the Secretary-General to submit all the documentation which he would prepare in accordance with the resolution to the General Assembly at its session in 1955 so that the Assembly could consider whether a General Conference should be convened to take a definitive decision regarding such amendments to the Charter as might be necessary and advisable.

(5) An amendment by Czechoslovakia (A/C.6/L.312), which proposed to delete the provisions for the preparation of a legislative history and a repertory of Charter provisions.

(3) Views Expressed in the Sixth Committee

During the discussion in the Committee, the representatives of Australia, Canada, Denmark, Ethiopia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sweden, Thailand and Turkey, while not committing themselves on the substance of the question of Charter revision or on that of calling a General Conference for that purpose, supported the six-Power draft resolution in its entirety. They considered that, should the General Assembly decide, at its tenth session, to hold a General Conference for Charter review, it would be necessary and useful to have full documentation on the subject. They also considered that the provisions in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the draft resolution concerning the eliciting of preliminary views of Member States would facilitate the exchange of views and stimulate discussion on the subject.

Full support for the six-Power draft resolution was also expressed by a number of other delegations who affirmed the desirability or even the necessity of some form of Charter revision. The representatives of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru and Uruguay expressed the view that the present Charter suffered from serious shortcomings which should be remedied. Among such shortcomings they instanced the incorporation of the principle of the unanimity of permanent members in the Security Council which, it was stated, was contrary to the principle of the sovereign equality of nations. The exercise of the "veto" even on such questions as admission of new Members had, it was maintained, prevented a number of fully deserving States from participating in the work of the United Nations. Among other alleged shortcomings of the Charter was its lack of clarity regarding the powers of the General Assembly in relation to the maintenance of peace and regarding the scope of Article 2, paragraph 7, providing for non-interference in the domestic affairs of States. These representatives, therefore, supported the six-Power draft resolution and opposed the four-Power amendments.

Explaining their amendments — the effect of which would have been to eliminate from the joint draft resolution of the six Powers any reference to the revision of the Charter — the representatives of Belgium, Colombia, France and Mexico maintained that under Article 109, paragraph 3, all that the General Assembly was empowered to do was to fix the date and the place of the General Conference. The General Conference itself would then consider any proposals which might be submitted to it including those relating to the expression of views by Member States.

Apart from this purely technical objection, these representatives also considered it politically unwise to call for the views of governments two years in advance of the Conference. This, they said, would lead to the adoption of rigid attitudes which would be difficult to change in the Conference. The representative of France said that, while the six-Power proposals were apparently procedural, they actually raised the substantive question of revision.

In regard to the reference to Article 109 in the preamble of the six-Power draft resolution, the representative of France said that the Secretariat, in undertaking the proposed studies, should not have Charter revision particularly in mind since there was no necessary connexion between documentation and Charter revision.

Similar statements in support of the four-Power amendments were made by representatives of Afghanistan, Burma, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Liberia and Syria. Speaking on the substance of Charter revision, the representative of Syria expressed regret at the "revisionist" tendency which had appeared in certain countries, particularly in connexion with the "veto". He stated that the League of Nations had failed because, among other things, the United States had not participated in it and the USSR had joined it very late. He warned that any situation which would result in further division of the Great Powers in the United Nations would be detrimental to the Organization.

The four-Power amendments were also supported by the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR whose statements, however, were primarily concerned with the substantive aspects of Charter revision. These representatives considered that the entire question of preparatory work for review of the Charter was part of a United States campaign against the basic principles of the Charter. They held that, as early as 1948, the United States had called for modification of the principle of unanimity of the five permanent members of the Security Council in all matters covering the peaceful settlement of disputes and the admission of new Members. In 1953, a special committee of the United States Senate had been set up to study the proposals for Charter revision. The Chairman of that committee had said that he regarded the principle of unanimity as a great weakness in the Organization. In addition, it was stated, the United States Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles in a speech delivered in Boston on 26 August 1953, had stated that the Charter was out of date and that the principle of unanimity failed to meet the present day needs of the United Nations. The aim of the United States attack on the principle of unanimity was, these representatives held, to use the United Nations as an instrument in achieving world domination.

It was stressed that violations of the present Charter and not its alleged shortcomings were at the root of international tensions. Among the violations alleged were the setting up of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the intervention in Korea, the institution of the Marshall Plan and the non-representation of the People's Republic of China in the United Nations.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR considered that at the present time any work preparatory to Charter review could be used by aggressive Powers against the interests of peace. They stated that they would vote against the six-Power draft resolution. They agreed, however, with the amendments proposed by the representatives of Belgium, Colombia, France and Mexico and with the legal position outlined by those representatives.

Without taking any position on the question of Charter revision or on the holding of a General Conference to review the Charter, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the problem before the Sixth Committee was a technical one. He expressed agreement with the objective of the six-Power draft resolution as regards the preparation of studies but considered that the preparation of a comprehensive legislative history of the Charter would impose too heavy a burden on the Secretariat both financially and in terms of the workload involved. Further, the complete objectivity of such a history would be open to question from many delegations. A good index to the San Francisco documents, would, in his opinion, be far more useful. The amendment concerning the repertory had also been proposed, he said, in deference to the remarks of the Secretary-General in his memorandum.

Referring to the amendments proposed by Belgium, Colombia, France and Mexico, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that he was not in principle opposed to the deletion from the joint draft resolution of provisions concerning the eliciting of views of States. However, he considered, reference to Article 109 of the Charter in the preamble of the draft resolution should be retained, inasmuch as it reflected the true nature of the discussions in the Committee and the agenda item under consideration.

The representative of the United States said that his Government favoured the holding of a General Conference and would regard it as an opportunity to work for a peaceful world order, representing the true interests of all nations. He supported the six-Power draft resolution and, in particular, its provision regarding the submission of preliminary views by governments. He hoped that States whose applications for membership in the United Nations were still pending would also submit their views. His Government, however, had an open mind on the question of Charter revision and its aim would be to build up the Organization rather than to tear it down. In another intervention, the representative of the United States supported the reference in the six-Power draft resolution to Article 109 and the invitation to States to submit their preliminary views; he opposed the four-Power amendments calling for the deletion of these provisions. He indicated that he would vote for the technical amendments submitted by the United Kingdom and Australia.

While agreeing with the draft resolution submitted by the six Powers, the representative of Israel reserved his position with regard to the use of the travaux préparatoires of the San Francisco Conference for the purpose of interpreting the Charter, and with regard to the holding of a General Conference. The General Conference might not produce good results and this would be harmful to the United Nations. However, if it did produce positive results, the amendments adopted by the Conference might remain without effect for an indefinite period since they would be subject to ratification. The co-existence of the original Charter and a revised text awaiting ratification might, he said, harm the legal standing of the instrument. Examining the technical aspects of the studies contemplated in the six-Power draft resolution, the representative of Israel said that the publication of unpublished San Francisco documents would be useful. As regards an index, he recalled that an index to the documents had been prepared by Mr. Zeydel⁶⁴ and another was contained in volume 16 of the published documents of the San Francisco Conference. As the index prepared by Mr. Zeydel was no longer available, the representative of Israel felt that a new index covering the complete set of San Francisco documents would be useful if it was better than existing indexes. He fully supported the proposal for the preparation of a repertory of the practice of the United Nations. With a good index, he considered, it would be possible to do without a legislative history of the Charter which would be both difficult and expensive to prepare.

The representative of Yugoslavia stated that he was opposed to extreme trends either favouring a revision of the Charter according to certain political concepts or rejecting any revision of the Charter whatever. The best approach to revision, in his opinion, was to review the past experience of the United Nations in applying the Charter. He supported both the six-Power draft resolution and the joint Egyptian-Costa Rican draft resolution.

There was a general lack of support in the Committee for the joint draft resolution submitted by Costa Rica and Egypt, a majority of representatives supporting the view that the election of a technical committee at the present stage was premature and that, instead of assisting the Secretary-General, the Committee might actually hinder the work and affect the objectivity of the studies contemplated. The representatives of Costa Rica and Egypt therefore withdrew their draft resolution.

The representative of Argentina withdrew his draft resolution in favour of the six-Power draft resolution.

In reply to questions raised in the Sixth Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that existing staff would be inadequate for the preparation of a legislative history of the Charter. A concise study would lay a heavier workload on the Secretariat and would require the same staff (five research assistants) as a comprehensive study, but the printing costs would be less. As regards the proposed index, the debate had made it clear that the index would have to be more complete than had been expected, and the services of an indexer with legal training would be required. With respect to the repertory of the practice of United Nations organs, each department of the Secretariat would be responsible for the section which was its own special concern; two additional staff members working under a Secretariat committee would be necessary for co-ordination and editorial presentation.

In regard to the time schedule, the representative of the Secretary-General noted that publication of the Co-ordination Committee documents and of the index would be completed within one year. The repertory of the practice of the United Nations would be substantially prepared by that time but it was unlikely that it could be completed within a year, particularly since translation and publication would require additional time, the representative of the Secretary-General concluded.

At its 379th and 380th meetings, the Committee voted on the six-Power draft resolution (A/C.6/L.306/Rev.2) and the amendments submitted to it.

The part of the four-Power amendment (A/C.6/L.307) proposing the deletion of the provision regarding the invitation to States to submit preliminary views was adopted by 24 votes to 23, with 5 abstentions. An Argentine proposal to take another vote on the amendment, put to the vote under rule 122 of the rules of procedure, was voted on by roll-call and received 25 votes in favour, 24 against, and 5 abstentions. Having failed to receive the two-thirds majority necessary for the reconsideration of the decision, the proposal was defeated.

By 27 votes to 16, with 2 abstentions, the Committee decided that no vote was necessary on the part of the four-Power amendment proposing the deletion of the provision regarding the circulation of the views of Member States; this provision was considered as deleted from the draft resolution.

In view of the deletion of paragraphs 2 and 3 of the six-Power draft resolution, a vote on the amendment by Panama (A/C.6/L.310) to alter those paragraphs and to add a paragraph providing for the submission to the Assembly of the views and comments of Members was rendered unnecessary.

The two Czechoslovak amendments (calling for the deletion of the provisions regarding the preparation of a legislative history and a repertory of Charter provisions) were rejected, respectively, by 20 votes to 18, with 7 abstentions, and 24 votes to 8, with 5 abstentions.

The amendment by El Salvador asking the Secretary-General to circulate the documents prepared to Member States was adopted by 39 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions.

The amendments by Australia and the United Kingdom (A/C.6/L.308/Rev.1) (see above) were adopted by votes ranging from 29 to 17, with 4 abstentions, to 23 to 16, with 7 abstentions.

The various paragraphs of the joint six-Power draft resolution, as amended, were adopted by votes ranging from 44 to 5 to 38 to 5, with 3 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 48 votes to 5.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY IN PLENARY SESSION

The Sixth Committee's report (A/2559) was considered by the General Assembly at its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November 1953.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR reiterated the point of view that the question had been brought before the General Assembly as part of a United States campaign against the fundamental provisions of the Charter. What was needed was not a revision of the Charter but a strict adherence to its provisions. They repeated charges made in the Sixth Committee that the United States and its supporters had violated the provisions of the Charter. They opposed the preamble of the draft resolution on the ground that it referred to possible revision of the Charter. Sixteen delegations, it was pointed out, had voted against this provision in the Sixth Committee. They also opposed the paragraph requesting the Secretary-General to prepare a repertory of the practice of the United Nations organs, stating that this imposed on him an obligation which it was not within his competence to fulfil since it entailed a type of research which would unavoidably imply comment on the decisions taken by the United Nations organs.

The representatives of the Netherlands and New Zealand emphasized that the draft resolution adopted by the Sixth Committee was the result of a compromise. Although they had favoured the proposal to invite the preliminary views of governments on possible revision of the Charter, they would not reintroduce it in the Assembly.

Replying to certain points raised, the representative of the United States said that it was indeed true, as stated by representatives of the "Soviet bloc", that there was need for scrupulous adherence to the present Charter. However, he said, it was the "Soviet bloc" which had been guilty of Charter violations including illegal and aggressive intervention in Greece and Czechoslovakia. It had flouted Security Council and Assembly decisions on Korea and had sabotaged United Nations efforts in the economic and social fields and through the specialized agencies. He said that he supported the draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee because it was purely procedural in character and did not prejudice the issue of possible Charter revision.

The draft resolution was voted on by paragraphs and was adopted in votes ranging from 52 to 5, to 52 to none, with 5 abstentions. It was adopted as a whole by 54 votes to 5, as resolution 796(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having regard to the provisions of Article 109 of the Charter under which a proposal to hold a General Conference of the Members of the United Nations for the purpose of reviewing the Charter is to be placed on the agenda of the tenth annual session of the General Assembly if such a conference has not been held before that session,

"Considering that the examination of such a proposal will require considerable preparation on the part of both the Secretary-General and Member States,

"Considering that study of the legislative history of the Charter and of the practice followed by the various organs of the United Nations is one of the best methods of acquiring knowledge of the Charter and will greatly facilitate the General Assembly's consideration, at its tenth annual session, of the question of calling a General Conference,

"Having regard to the memorandum by the Secretary-General,

"Requests the Secretary-General to prepare, publish and circulate among the Member States during 1934, or shortly thereafter:

"(a) A systematic compilation of the documents of the United Nations Conference on International Organization not yet published;

"(b) A complete index of the documents of that Conference on the lines envisaged in part II and part III C of the memorandum by the Secretary-General;

"(c) A repertory of the practice of United Nations organs appropriately indexed."

2. The Question of Chinese Representation

At the opening (432nd) plenary meeting of the General Assembly's eighth session, on 15 September 1953, the representative of the USSR raised a point of order regarding the question of the representation of China in the United Nations, and submitted a draft resolution (A/L.162) proposing that the representatives of the Chinese People's Republic, appointed by the Central People's Government, should "take the lawful seat of China in the General Assembly and in the other organs of the United Nations."

In support of this draft resolution, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR maintained that the United Nations Charter and the rules of procedure of the General Assembly were being violated because there were included as representatives of China persons having neither political, legal nor moral rights to represent that State and since, on the other hand, the representatives appointed by the legal government of that country were excluded from the United Nations. The absence of the People's Republic of China from the United Nations, they said, constituted a serious hindrance to the speedy and successful solution of important problems affecting the maintenance of peace and security. Moreover, the situation with regard to the People's Republic of China had encouraged the "Kuomintang clique" to undertake various adventures threatening the preservation of peace in the Far East. The work not only of the General Assembly but also of other United Nations organs and agencies affiliated with the United Nations was adversely affected by the absence of the People's Republic of China. A just decision to recognize the lawful rights of the Chinese people in the United Nations would be in the interest of all peace-loving peoples, would increase the authority of the United Nations and would go a long way towards relieving the existing tension in the Far East and helping to strengthen international peace and security, these representatives said.

Opposing the draft resolution, the representative of China stated that admission of the Chinese People's Republic to the United Nations would be the consummation of more than 30 years of intrigue and aggression by the Soviet Union against the Republic of China. He expressed the view that the Chinese Communist regime was un-Chinese in its origin and also in its nature, and could therefore not endure. Moreover, it had re-

The representative of the United States moved that the Assembly postpone for the duration of its eighth session in the year 1953 consideration of all proposals to exclude the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and to seat representatives of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China. Three years previously, he said, the Chinese Communists had intervened as aggressors and as participants in a scheme to overpower the Republic of Korea. Although an armistice had been signed peace had not yet been secured. The Chinese Communists had not shown convincing evidence of a genuine intention to make peace and their actions elsewhere in Asia were far from reassuring. He therefore did not consider that as matters stood any proposals for the representation of the Chinese Communists in the Assembly should be considered.

The representative of the United Kingdom supported the United States proposal for postponement of the question. He said that the conclusion of the armistice in Korea had created hopes that it would be faithfully observed and that progress towards a satisfactory political settlement would follow the armistice, and, consequently, hopes that the day for settling the question of Chinese representation would have been brought nearer by the signature of the armistice.

Following the discussion of these two proposals, the Assembly decided by 40 votes to 8, with 8 abstentions, to give priority to the United States draft resolution. That proposal was then adopted by 44 votes to 10, with 2 abstentions (see below).

After the adoption of this resolution, there was a procedural discussion as to whether the Assembly should vote on the USSR draft resolution. An appeal by the United States representative against a ruling of the Temporary President that the Assembly should vote on the USSR draft was rejected by 13 votes in favour of the appeal, 22 against, and 13 abstentions. In accordance with a motion by the representative of Thailand, the Assembly then voted, under rule 91 of its rules of procedure, on whether a vote should be taken on the USSR draft resolution; it decided, by 35 votes to 11, with 11 abstentions, not to take such a vote.

The resolution adopted by the Assembly (800 (VIII)) read:

"The General Assembly

"Decides to postpone for the duration of its eighth regular session in the current year consideration of all proposals to exclude the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and to seat representatives of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China."

At the 22nd meeting of the Credentials Committee of the Assembly on 22 September, the representative of the USSR stated that, in the view of his delegation, the credentials of the representative of China should not be considered valid. The Chairman ruled that in view of the resolution adopted by the General Assembly at the 432nd meeting (see above), the discussion of the question was out of order. The Chairman's ruling was challenged by the USSR representative, but was upheld by 5 votes to 1, with 1 abstention.

During 1953, the delegation of the USSR and certain other delegations raised the question of representation of China in various other organs and bodies of the United Nations.

At the opening (484th) meeting of the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, on 28 January 1953, the representative of the USSR proposed (T/L.349) that the representative of the Republic of China should be excluded from the Council and a representative of the People's Republic of China, appointed by the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, should be invited to participate in the proceedings of the Trusteeship Council. The Council decided, by 10 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, to postpone indefinitely consideration of the USSR proposal.

At the fifteenth session of the Economic and Social Council (672nd plenary meeting on 31 March 1953) the representative of the USSR submitted a similar proposal (E/L.473). The Council, however, by 14 votes to 4, adopted a United States proposal for adjournment of the debate under rule 50 of the rules of procedure.

At the sixteenth session of the Council (708th plenary meeting on 2 July 1953) the representative of Poland, speaking on a point of order and supported by the representatives of India and the USSR, stated that his Government could recognize as the representative of China only a person having credentials signed by the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China. The President stated that the credentials in question had been presented in due form. He suggested that the incident be considered as closed. Subsequently, in this connexion, when the President and the First Vice-President reported (E/2487) that they had found that proper credentials had been communicated by the reprerepresentatives of all members of the Council, the representatives of Poland and the USSR addressed communications (E/2493 and E/2494) to the President of the Council questioning the validity of the credentials of the Chinese delegation.

At the 29th meeting of the Technical Assistance Committee on 23 March 1953, the representative of the USSR moved a draft resolution to exclude the representative of the "Kuomintang group" from the Committee and to invite a representative of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to participate in the Committee. The Chairman ruled that the Committee was not competent to effect the change in its membership. The Committee upheld the Chairman's ruling.

Similar motions were put forward in the functional commissions listed below. The Acting Chairman of those bodies, in ruling that the Commissions were not competent to effect changes in their membership, recalled the terms of reference of the functional commissions, according to which the functional commissions (with the exception of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, of which the members are States) consist of one representative from each Member State of the United Nations selected by the Council; the Secretary-General consults with the governments thus selected before the representatives are finally nominated by these governments and confirmed by the Council.

Transport and Communications Commission (sixth session, 54th meeting on 2 February 1953) (E/CN.2/L.7, E/CN.2/L.22). The Commission adopted a proposal of the United States representative under rule 52 of the rules of procedure of the functional commissions of the Council, to the effect that the proposal of the representative of the USSR should be declared out of order.

Fiscal Commission (fourth session, 24th meeting on 27 April 1953) (E/CN.8/L.2). The Chairman ruled that the draft resolution submitted by the USSR representative was out of order inasmuch as the nomination of the members of the Commission had been confirmed by the Economic and Social Council and accordingly the representative of China had been designated legally. The Chairman's ruling was upheld.

Statistical Commission (seventh session, 84th meeting on 2 February 1953) (E/CN.3/L.13). The Chairman ruled that the Commission was not competent to take a decision on the question raised by the USSR representative. The Chairman's ruling was upheld.

Population Commission (seventh session, 75th meeting on 19 January 1953). The Chairman ruled that in view of General Assembly resolution 396(V), which laid down that questions relating to the representation of a Member State in the United Nations were to be considered by the General Assembly or by the Interim Committee when the General Assembly itself was not in session, the Commission was not competent to consider the draft resolution presented by the USSR representative. The Chairman's ruling was upheld.

Social Commission (ninth session, 198th meeting on 4 May 1953) (E/CN.5/L.177). The Acting Chairman ruled the draft resolution submitted by the USSR representative out of order on the grounds that the Commission was not competent to decide on its membership. The Chairman's ruling was upheld.

Commission on Human Rights (ninth session, 339th meeting on 7 April 1953) (E/CN.4/L.219). The Chairman ruled that the draft resolution submitted by the USSR representative was out of order on the grounds that the Commission was not the appropriate body for considering the question of the representation of China on the Commission. An appeal by the representative of the USSR against the ruling of the Chairman was rejected.

Commission on the Status of Women (seventh session, 123rd meeting on 16 March 1953). The Chairman stated that the question raised by the USSR representative was outside the Commission's competence. No vote was taken by the Commission.

Commission on Narcotic Drugs (eighth session, 189th meeting on 30 March 1953). The representative of the United States moved that the Commission adjourn debate on the representation of China, under rule 45 of the rules of procedure of the functional commissions. The Chairman stated that, under rule 50 of the rules of procedure, motions for adjournment had priority over all other proposals. The Chairman's ruling was upheld and the Commission adopted the United States proposal.

Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ninth session, 107th meeting on 6 February 1953) (E/CN.11/363). The Commission adjourned until its next session the debate on the subject, under rule 26 of its rules of procedure.

Executive Board of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund. The question of the representation of China was also raised at the meetings of the Executive Board of UNICEF. At the 103rd meeting on 19 March the Board adopted a motion, under rule 25 of the Executive Board's rules of procedure, to adjourn the debate on the question of the representation of China for the current session.

H. ADMINISTRATIVE ARRANGEMENTS⁶⁵

1. Organization of the Secretariat

The General Assembly, by resolution 681 A (VII)⁶⁶ adopted on 21 December 1952, had requested the Secretary-General to present a report at its eighth session on the question of organization of the Secretariat.

The Secretary-General stated (A/2554) that he had arrived at two main conclusions: (1) that a streamlining of the Secretariat leading to substantial economies was not possible without a review of its substantive tasks; and (2) that no such economies were possible without the development of a wider degree of flexibility in the use of staff, both within and among the various organizational units.

The Secretary-General proposed that three further offices should be given a similar position to that occupied by the Executive Office of the Secretary-General, i.e., as offices under his immediate and personal direction. The three offices concerned would be a Personnel Office to replace the Bureau of Personnel, a Finance Office to replace the Bureau of Finance and a Legal Office to replace the Legal Department. The existing Department of Administrative and Financial Services, as such, would disappear. Under the suggested arrangement, he considered, the control of the Secretary-General over personnel and financial matters would become more direct, and the position of the officials responsible for these matters, who would act directly on his behalf, would be clarified and strengthened. Similarly, the change from Legal Department to Legal Office would reflect more clearly its role in providing legal advice to the Secretary-General and in acting on his behalf in legal matters. The concentration of administrative responsibility at the centre should lead, he said, to a simplification of procedures and have a good effect in the day-to-day administration.

He suggested the following arrangements with respect to the other departments: (1) the Departments of Economic Affairs and Social Affairs to be amalgamated into one department; (2) the Department of Conference and General Services to be divided into two units, a Department of Conference Services and an Office of General Services; (3) the Department of Political and Security Council Affairs, the Department of Trusteeship and Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Department of Public Information to be maintained as separate departments; (4) the Technical Assistance Administration to be maintained as an independent unit, and its close co-ordination with the new Department of Economic and Social Affairs to be supervised directly by the Secretary-General.

As currently organized at its top levels the Secretariat had two top echelons under the Secretary-General, one consisting of Assistant Secretaries-General and one of Principal Directors. The original intention, the Secretary-General stated, had been to create in the Assistant Secretaries-General a group of officials broadly representative of the Member States, on the highest responsible level, who, in addition to being heads of departments, would serve the Secretary-General in a representative capacity with individual Member countries and groups of countries. Under them, the Principal Directors were intended to function as the administrative officials charged with the conduct of operations of the various departments. The Secretary-General, however, found the arrangement, as it had developed, difficult to justify.

He believed that the reconstituted departments should be headed by one echelon of officials instead of two, namely, Under-Secretaries. Their responsibilities, as in the case of the Principal Directors, would be essentially administrative. Such political responsibilities as they might be required to exercise in particular areas or on particular issues would be theirs by delegation from the Secretary-General and exercised on his personal responsibility. In exceptional cases it might be necessary to give them the assistance of Deputy Under-Secretaries. He suggested that there might also be a need for one or two Under-Secretaries without portfolio to serve as advisers to the Secretary-General on special questions. If experience were to show that the proposed arrangement of the Under-Secretaries imposed too heavy a burden on the time of the Secretary-General, it might be desirable, he suggested, to create one post of Deputy Secretary-General.

On the basis of the policies and arrangements set forth in his report, the Secretary-General hoped to be able to achieve a reduction in the over-all budget of the United Nations of one million dollars over the coming fiscal year. The incidence of this saving, he added, could only be determined as the review of the Secretariat operations proceeded and in the light of the decisions of other organs of the United Nations as they affects the work-load. He further suggested that the abolition of posts involved need not affect the existing staff to any important extent as most of the abolitions could be absorbed by the normal turnover.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, in its 36th report to the Assembly's eighth session (A/2606), stated its general agreement with the broad outlines of the Secretary-General's suggested programme, while recognizing the tentative character of that programme. It considered, nevertheless, that certain substantial changes might be introduced during 1954 in the administrative structure of the Secretariat and that, in consequence, the General Assembly should study the proposals as carefully as possible in the time remaining at the eighth session. It had therefore limited its observations to those specific questions which the Secretary-General, recognizing their significance, had himself raised, and upon which he was looking to the General Assembly for its views and guidance.

The Advisory Committee concurred in the proposal to substitute for the two highest levels under the Secretary-General a single supervisory level. At the same time it recognized that the structure of the Secretariat at the highest levels, together with problems connected with the geographical distribution of the staff, might raise important issues of a political nature.

There was good ground, the Advisory Committee considered, for the conversion of the Legal Department into a Legal Office under the immediate, personal direction of the Secretary-General. On the other hand, a similar action in respect of Administrative and Financial Services seemed open to certain doubts if there were any risk that the authority of those functions might be reduced. Similarly, the Advisory Committee had doubts about the continued separation of the Technical Assistance Administration from the unified Department of Economic and Social Affairs, in that the Administration seemed to form a natural and integral part of its substantive counterpart in economic and social affairs.

The reports of the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee were considered by the Fifth Committee at its 427th to 429th meetings on 8 and 9 December.

The Secretary-General, in introducing his report at the Committee's 427th meeting, expressed his satisfaction at the essential agreement between the Advisory Committee and himself on the proposals as a whole. Amplifying his report, he stated that, in making his proposal for the abolition of the existing two top levels in the Secretariat and the introduction of a new unified top level, he was faced with two possibilities—either he could start out from the political angle, consulting the governments most directly concerned, and frame his proposals upon that basis, or he could outline what seemed to him to be the most rational administrative arrangement, submit it to the General Assembly for preliminary consideration and enter into consultations with governments on the basis thus established. He had chosen the latter course because otherwise it would have been difficult to have presented to the Assembly a plan which set out in clear terms what was in his opinion the best possible administrative plan. His next step would necessarily be to undertake such consultations as might be necessary in order to see how the main political considerations could be taken into account and to what extent his optimum plan would have to be adjusted in order to meet those considerations. If he then found it impossible to establish what he considered to be a proper balance on the top level in respect of national representation, he would have to present to the Assembly's ninth session definite plans for the organization of the Secretariat which might depart from his present proposals. In such a case he would inform the Assembly of the reasons for any deviations. He emphasized, however, that, under the Charter, it was for him to decide on the recruitment of persons filling top level posts in the Secretariat as well as on the distribution of responsibilities between officials at that level.

The Secretary-General emphasized that at this juncture he was requesting of the Assembly only its preliminary consideration and advice; a final decision would have to be taken on the basis of his proposals in the 1955 budget. But if the Fifth Committee and the Assembly were to endorse the general attitude of the Advisory Committee, then he would go ahead with his organization plans to the extent that this could be done without encroaching on the rights of the Fifth Committee or the Assembly to decide finally on such matters.

The majority of the representatives supported the Secretary-General's proposals and considered that they represented a constructive step towards securing improvements in the organization and structure of the Secretariat.

Representatives who participated in the discussion unanimously expressed their confidence in the capacity of the Secretary-General to carry through his reforms in a manner which would meet with the approval of Member States and which would lead to substantial economies. The representative of the United Kingdom, in particular, urged that the Secretary-General should be given full authority to proceed along the lines he had tentatively suggested without necessarily waiting for the Assembly at its ninth session to pass in detail upon arrangements which, in any event, fell largely within his administrative jurisdiction. The representative of the United States suggested that the detailed implementation of the broad plans which the Secretary-General had outlined in his report could best be left to the Secretary-General himself in consultation from time to time with the Advisory Committee.

Most representatives welcomed the proposal for merging the two highest levels immediately below the Secretary-General into a single supervisory level. The representatives of Czechoslovakia and the USSR, however, while in general agreement with the other main features of the proposed reorganization, voiced their objection to the abolition of the post of Assistant Secretary-General. Such a change, they contended, would be in violation of the gentleman's agreement made in 1946 for the distribution of top level posts among nationals of Member States; nor would it be in conformity with the decisions taken by the General Assembly itself, as embodied in resolutions of the first session, relating to the structure and staffing of the Secretariat. It would be a mistake, they argued, to change so radically the functions and roles of the Assistant Secretaries-General by replacing them with Under-Secretaries, whose responsibilities would be of an essentially administrative character. The representative of France likewise had serious misgivings about the proposal to abolish the posts of Assistant Secretary-General and Principal Director; political and geographical factors, he said, should be taken into account.

The Secretary-General explained at the 428th meeting that the functions and rights of the new Under-Secretaries would be almost identical with those of the Assistant Secretaries-General. As matters stood, the Assistant Secretaries-General did not have the wide powers envisaged at the San Francisco Conference. The Under-Secretaries would retain the powers delegated to them by the Secretary-General. It was not open to the Secretary-General to delegate the wide political powers vested in him by the Charter, by setting up a sort of international cabinet.

The representatives of China, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Turkey, among others, expressed concern lest the proposed arrangements, particularly the additional responsibilities which would devolve upon the office of the Secretary-General, might prove too heavy and time-consuming by adding unduly to the Secretary-General's administrative burdens at the expense of his political responsibilities. Some representatives, in particular the representative of New Zealand, expressed their readiness to give sympathetic consideration to any request which the Secretary-General might later feel obliged to make for the appointment of a Deputy.

The merger of the Departments of Economic and Social Affairs was, in general, welcomed. Several representatives, however, regretted that the proposed merger did not also include the Technical Assistance Administration since, they held, the maintenance of this department as a separate unit would inevitably make for a good deal of duplication. The hope was expressed that the Secretary-General would find it possible to bring about the closest possible association between the Department of Economic and Social Affairs, on the one hand, and the Technical Assistance Administration, on the other.

During the discussions, many representatives stressed the necessity of paying particular attention to the problem of ensuring wide geographical distribution of posts in the higher policy-making levels, no less than throughout the Secretariat as a whole. In this connexion, the representatives of Argentina, Syria and Turkey, among others, expressed the hope that the Secretary-General would bear in mind the interests of the smaller Member States no less than those of the larger Powers. At the same time, the representative of the United States, in particular, emphasized the importance of taking advantage of any general reorganization to improve the quality, no less than the geographical distribution, of the staff. The representative of Belgium declared that the mere desire to apply the principle of geographical distribution must not result in a lowering of the standards of recruitment. Should any conflict arise between the principle of geographical distribution and that of competence, the latter principle, he argued, must prevail.

Most representatives associated themselves with the Secretary-General's two main conclusions, as set down in his report. It was generally agreed that the economies aimed at and anticipated should be the expression not of a policy of contraction, but of one aimed at fulfilling, at the least possible expense, the tasks of the Secretariat as they arise out of the general development of the United Nations.

At its 429th meeting on 9 December, the Fifth Committee adopted, by 40 votes to 5, an oral draft resolution proposed by the Committee Chairman.

This draft resolution (A/2625) was considered by the General Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December, when the USSR representative repeated the arguments he had advanced in the Committee against the Secretary-General's proposal to abolish the office of Assistant Secretary-General and said he would vote against the draft resolution.

The draft resolution was adopted, without further discussion, by 53 votes to 5, as resolution 784 (VIII).

By it, the Assembly took note of the proposals of the Secretary-General in his report and of his statement to the Fifth Committee at its 427th meeting. The Assembly recommended that the Secretary-General should, to the extent possible, proceed along the lines he had proposed and prepare his 1955 budget estimates within the broad framework of these proposals, taking account of the observations and suggestions of the Advisory Committee and of the views expressed in the Fifth Committee at its 427th and 428th meetings on 8 December.

2. Report of the Committee on Special Administrative Questions

On 21 December 1952, the General Assembly adopted resolution 681 B (VII)⁶⁷ which, inter alia, provided for the establishment of a Committee on Special Administrative Questions to study certain parts of a memorandum (A/2214) on the administration of the United Nations which the Secretary-General had submitted to the Assembly's seventh session.

The Committee held two meetings on 4 and 8 May 1953 and a third meeting on 3 August. It had before it a memorandum by the Secretary-General (A/AC.68/1). With respect to the first task of the Committee, namely, to study the Secretary-General's suggestion that membership of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions should disqualify a person from service as a member or alternate in the Fifth Committee and that membership of the Administrative Tribunal should disqualify a person from service as a governmental representative on legislative committees of the General Assembly, the Secretary-General stated that, after further study of the question, he had found himself unable to maintain that suggestion. With regard to the second task, namely, to study the Assembly's rules of procedure concerning the Advisory Committee, the memorandum stated that the Secretary-General, after consideration of the matter, had no suggestion to make. As to the Committee's third task, namely, to study the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal, the memorandum stated that the Secretary-General believed it premature to consider amendments to the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal, and neither the President of the Tribunal nor the Secretary-General had any suggestions of a major or urgent nature which would warrant consideration by a committee. No proposals on any of the Committee's tasks had been made by governments.

On 8 May, the Committee, after noting that no proposal had been submitted by the Secretary-General or by Member States, invited the Secretary-General to report to the Committee any proposal he might wish to make or which might be made by Member States. At its third meeting on 3 August, the Committee noted that no proposals had yet been received from Member States, nor had any proposal been submitted by the Secretary-General. In the circumstances, the Committee decided not to make any recommendation in its report (A/2429) to the General Assembly on the substance of the matters referred to it, but to allow all Members and the Secretary-General time to study the question further.

The Committee's report was considered by the Fifth Committee at its 392nd meeting on 19 October. The Fifth Committee also had before it a memorandum from the Secretary-General (A/2464), stating that the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions had no comments to offer pending the further action contemplated. The Fifth Committee, without discussion or objection, and the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee (A/2539), at its 456th meeting on 3 November adopted, without discussion or objection, resolution 764(VIII) on the matter. By this resolution, the Assembly took note of the report of the Committee on Special Administrative Questions and of the observations on the report by the Advisory Committee.

3. Personnel Policies of the United Nations

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS SEVENTH SESSION

At the request of the Secretary-General (A/2327) and on the recommendation of the General

⁶⁷ See Y.U.N., 1952, p. 94.

Committee (A/2330), the General Assembly at its 406th plenary meeting on 18 December 1952 decided to include in the agenda of its seventh session the item "Report of the Secretary-General on Personnel Policy".⁶⁸ The Secretary-General's report (A/2364), which was dated 30 January 1953, was considered at the resumed seventh session of the Assembly, without reference to a Committee, at the 413th and 416th to 422nd plenary meetings on 10 March and from 28 March to 1 April 1953.

The report dealt with the basic principles governing general personnel policy and their administrative application and gave an account of the problem of alleged subversive activities by staff members against Member States.⁶⁹ It reviewed briefly the sources and nature of the privileges and immunities of the United Nations as they related to recent developments.

Among the documents attached to the report was the opinion of the Commission of Jurists appointed by the Secretary-General to advise him on questions relating to subversive activities and other matters; a Bill relating to employment by the United Nations of United States citizens, recently introduced in the United States Senate, and the United States Executive Order 10422 concerning the investigation by United States authorities of all United States staff members of the United Nations.

(1) Statement by the Secretary-General

Introducing his report, the Secretary-General stated that the Charter had conferred upon the Secretary-General and his staff exclusively international responsibilities in contrast to those of representatives on United Nations bodies who must represent national interests. In accordance with that principle, the General Assembly had affirmed the exclusive and independent authority of the Secretary-General for the selection of personnel and administration of policies laid down by the General Assembly. He said that, in a world of mounting political tensions aggravated by the political and ideological conflict between the Western world on the one hand and the USSR and its supporters on the other, the task of a Secretariat serving both sides had been an extremely difficult one. Among additional factors having a bearing on the question, the Secretary-General brought to the attention of the Assembly the following:

(1) That the United Nations Headquarters were located within the borders of one of the most powerful protagonists in the East-West conflict.

(2) That, among Member States, the concepts regarding the rights and status of any civil service differed and therefore the staff regulations approved by the General Assembly in resolution 590(VI)⁷⁰ were subject to diverse interpretations.

(3) That in 1946 and 1947, it had been necessary to recruit large numbers of staff very rapidly and there was no time to go through the careful processes of full international recruitment which had since been developed.

(4) That in the appointment and retention of staff it had often been necessary for the Secretary-General to seek the assistance of Member States in checking the character and record of applicants and staff members and that, in the Secretary-General's opinion, seeking such assistance did not derogate from his authority.

It was within this framework, the Secretary-General said, that he had sought to uphold and make more solid the constitutional position of the Secretary-General and the Secretariat in both administrative and political matters. In administrative matters he had resisted strong requests, and in some cases pressures, in the appointment or replacement of Secretariat officials. For example, he said, he had refused to replace qualified and competent staff simply because revolutions or coups d'état involving a change in government had occurred in their countries.

As far as political matters were concerned, the Secretary-General referred to the stand taken by him on such questions as those of Iran, the representation of China, the Secretary-General's ten-point peace programme and Korea as evidence of his desire to uphold and strengthen the constitutional position of the office of the Secretary-General in political matters. He further stated that, because of the stand taken by him in support of the United Nations action in Korea, the USSR and the four States supporting it had refused to recognize him as the Secretary-General and had brought to bear upon him the "crudest form of pressure". It was due to a large extent to the attitude of the USSR that he had offered his resignation and requested the Assembly to appoint his successor at the present (seventh) session.

The Secretary-General then referred to the problem of the Secretariat as it related to the United States. The Secretary-General as one of his first acts had requested the help of the United States Government in finding well-qualified personnel of United States nationality, but this request had not been complied with. The United States had after 1949 provided some assistance, but although this was helpful in some respects it was not satisfactory because in most cases the Secretary-General was not given sufficient information to enable him to take action. In 1952, in an atmosphere of growing concern in the United States respecting internal subversion, an investigation of the United States staff members of the United Nations Secretariat was begun by two United States Government agencies. One was the Federal Grand Jury, meeting in New York. The other was the United States Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee. Grand Jury proceedings, the Secretary-General stated, were secret and although reports reached him that some United States staff members were refusing to answer questions under the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, which provides that a witness cannot be compelled to answer questions which might tend to incriminate him, the United States Government refused to supply the Secretary-General with information on the ground that the proceedings were secret.

However, in the hearings of the Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee held in 1952 and one held in February 1953, eighteen staff members refused to answer questions about past or present membership in the American Communist Party on the grounds of possible self-incrimination. Most of these staff members had been originally appointed in 1946 and 1947 at the time of very rapid recruitment. In addition, five former staff members, who had previously resigned or whose appointments had been terminated, refused to answer questions on the same grounds.

Explaining his position concerning the conduct of staff members toward the Governments of Member States, the Secretary-General said that, first of all, no staff member should engage in subversive activities against his own Government or the Government of any Member State. Secondly, with regard to United States nationals in the Secretariat, the Secretary-General believed that, in view of the existing laws and regulations of the United States toward the American Communist Party and verdicts of the courts on the leadership of that party, no United States national who was a member of the Communist Party and who was, thereby, barred from employment in the service of his own Government, should, as a matter of policy, be employed in the Secretariat. A major consideration for such a policy was, of course, the fact that the United States was the host country to the United Nations Headquarters.

In the light of these principles and policies, the Secretary-General considered that a United Nations staff member refusing to answer questions on the ground that they might tend to establish that he was guilty of a crime, drew upon himself grave suspicion of being a danger to the security of a Member State. Therefore, he felt that such a staff member committed a grave breach of the staff regulation concerning the conduct required of staff members. Furthermore, the attitude taken by these witnesses tended to discredit and cast unjustified suspicion upon their fellow staff members and even to imperil the position of the whole Organization in the host country.

The Secretary-General stated that nine of those who refused to answer questions held permanent appointments. For that reason, and because of the growing complexities and dangers involved for the United Nations in its relationship with the United States, he had appointed the Commission of Jurists to advise him on the question.

Referring to the opinion of the Jurists, he said that he had accepted only some parts of it and these were contained in part II of his report (A/2364). In particular, he had accepted the finding that refusal by United States staff members to answer questions about membership in the American Communist Party or any subversive activity on the ground of possible self-incrimination constituted a fundamental breach of the staff regulations. He also accepted their judgment that in such circumstances of fundamental breach of contract he had the power, under the present staff regulations, to terminate the appointments of staff members holding permanent contracts.

The Secretary-General stated that although the Jurists had recommended dismissal, he had decided that the staff members involved should be given a second chance. He had therefore notified the staff of his acceptance of the above findings of the Jurists and had notified those concerned that he would be compelled to dismiss them for a fundamental breach of staff regulations unless, within three days, they informed him that they had notified the appropriate United States authorities of their intention to withdraw the plea of privilege and to answer the pertinent questions put to them. Their refusal to do so constituted, in the opinion of the Secretary-General, a clear case for dismissal for misconduct under article X of the staff regulations. Nevertheless, the Secretary-General stated, he had chosen a less severe method of termination, one that would entitle them to the normal indemnities and severance pay, so that they might have a less difficult time while seeking other employment.

The Secretary-General stated that, with two exceptions, no United States staff members were called before the United States Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee in open hearings unless they had either refused to answer questions about Communist Party membership or had admitted past membership. Although these witnesses represented only about 1 per cent of the United States nationals employed by the United Nations, the impression conveyed to the public, whether intentionally or not, had been that the United Nations was employing a large number of United States nationals who were either Communists, former Communists, or had something to hide.

In December 1952, the Grand Jury, without returning a single indictment, had issued a presentment which had been given very wide publicity. It charged that there was "infiltration into the United Nations of an overwhelmingly large group of disloyal United States citizens" and that this situation constituted a "menace" to the United States Government. The Secretary-General stated that, in view of the serious effects of this situation on the relationship of the United Nations with the host country, he had requested the United States, in fairness to himself and to his staff, to provide him with evidence against which the justice of the Jury's conclusions could be weighed. This request was again denied on the ground that the proceedings of the Jury were secret under the law.

The Secretary-General called the attention of the Assembly to the fact that "not a single United States staff member of the United Nations Secretariat has ever, in the whole history of the Organization, been charged in any court of the United States—much less convicted—of espionage or any act of subversion or sabotage". He emphasized that, since almost all the documentation and meetings of the United Nations were open, the United Nations was not a profitable place for spies. Because of the very nature of the Organization no Government gave the United Nations any information which it would withhold on grounds of security.

There were indications that the situation might go from bad to worse in the atmosphere of suspicion which had been created. The Secretary-General referred to a Bill introduced in the United States Congress by the former Chairman of the United States Senate Internal Security Sub-committee included in annex IV of the Secretary-General's report. The Bill would make it a crime subject to five years in prison for United States nationals to work in the United Nations unless they fulfilled conditions laid down therein. It was also evident, he said, that investigations in search of alleged subversives in the employment of the United Nations and the specialized agencies would also be continued and these, he reported, had subsequently taken place.

In these circumstances, the Secretary-General said, the United States Government decided to issue its Executive Order of 9 January 1953 requiring a full investigation by the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation of all United States citizens employed on the professional staff of the United Nations, and a less extensive investigation by the Civil Service Commission of all other United States citizens employed by the United Nations. The Secretary-General emphasized that the Executive Order was not promulgated as the result of any agreement between the United States Government and the Secretary-General. It was an action of the United States Government alone. The Secretary-General had, however, co-operated in its implementation, he stated, and had welcomed it as a step forward in establishing orderly procedures. He considered that it was in the interest of the staff that these investigations should be completed as soon as possible. In this connexion, the Secretary-General stated that he would offer those staff members whose services had been terminated as a result of their refusal to answer questions on the ground of self-incrimination, this opportunity of having themselves cleared through the investigations to be made under the Executive Order.

If, as a result, they were cleared, he would be prepared to consider them for re-employment, he stated.

In order not to delay the investigations the Secretary-General had permitted the use by investigating officials of the United Nations Headquarters for fingerprinting and other processes, he stated. To do otherwise would have delayed the investigation by months and would have still further undermined the position and the morale of the Secretariat. The Secretary-General stated that no staff members of any nationality except United States nationality were subject to investigation under the Executive Order. In conclusion, the Secretary-General appealed to States, including the United States, which had not ratified the Convention on Privileges and Immunities, to ratify it. Non-ratification of the Convention, he stated, undermined the constitutional position of the United Nations and impeded the effective performance of its work. He reminded the Assembly that the Convention did not provide immunity from legal processes for staff members in regard to their private activities.

(2) Proposals before the Assembly

The following proposals were submitted.

A draft resolution was proposed by France, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/L.146).

In the preamble it would quote Articles 100 and 101⁷² of the Charter dealing with the principles governing the appointment and duties of the United Nations staff and state that the Assembly had considered and reviewed the Secretary-General's report on personnel policy. In the operative part it would express the confidence of the General Assembly that the Secretary-General would conduct his personnel policy with those considerations in mind and call upon Member States to assist him in the discharge of his responsibilities as chief administrative officer of the United Nations.

An amendment to this draft resolution was submitted by Belgium, Denmark, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden (A/L.147).

It would add provisions to invite the Secretary-General to submit to the next session of the Assembly a new report on the progress made in the conduct and development of personnel policy, together with the comments of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions thereon. The amendment would also invite the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee to consult with the administrative heads of the United Nations specialized agencies and then to submit "their recommendations as to any further action that may be required of the General Assembly".

This amendment was accepted by the sponsors of the three-Power draft resolution.

As amended by the five Powers, the three-Power draft resolution was finally sponsored by the following thirteen Powers: Belgium, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Ecuador, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Paraguay, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/L.146/Rev.1).

A draft resolution was proposed by Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen.

In its final revision (A/L.145/Rev.4) it would refer to the report of the Secretary-General, take note of the satisfaction reported by the Secretary-General with respect to the efficiency and integrity of the Secretariat, state the importance of maintaining and developing an international civil service in accordance with the purposes and provisions of the Charter, and state further that the problem called for a close and detailed study. Under this draft resolution, the General Assembly would: (1) resolve to appoint a committee composed of fifteen members to be nominated by the President, to study the report of the Secretary-General on personnel policy in all its implications and to report to the General Assembly at its eighth session; and (2) request the Secretary-General to communicate the report of the committee to Member States.

(3) Statement of the United States Representative

The United States representative stressed the importance attached to the United Nations by his Government in the conduct of its foreign policy. However, if the United Nations was to be an effective force, it must have the full support of world public opinion. Public opinion in the United States was concerned that the effectiveness of the United Nations might be impaired because of the existence of a serious personnel problem; this view, he said, had been summed up by Senator Wiley, Chairman of the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee, when he said: "There is absolutely no place in the international Secretariat for a single American Communist, or any American of doubtful loyalty ... The United Nations should not become a haven for disloyal Americans or for espionage." The representative of the United States observed that this "essentially administrative problem" was one of the main obstacles in the United States to increased confidence in the United Nations.

To meet the problem, the Secretary-General had dismissed individuals whose actions he regarded as failing to meet the obligations of international civil servants. He had also asked the United States Government to furnish him with full information concerning both present and prospective United States members of his staff so that he could ensure that the Charter standards were met. The United States Government had agreed to undertake investigations necessary to supply the needed information and these were now

⁷² Article 100 of the Charter states:

"1. In the performance of their duties the Secretary-General and the staff shall not seek or receive instructions from any government or from any other authority external to the Organization. They shall refrain from any action which might reflect on their position as international officials responsible only to the Organization.

"2. Each Member of the United Nations undertakes to respect the exclusively international character of the responsibilities of the Secretary-General and the staff and not to seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities."

Paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article 101 state:

"1. The staff shall be appointed by the Secretary-General under regulations established by the General Assembly.

proceeding rapidly. These investigations involved nearly 1,800 persons who had filed the requisite forms and it was hoped that the Secretary-General would have been furnished with the information he had requested by the Assembly's next session. The United States Government, he said, regarded the information provided as advice only and recognized that the responsibility for final judgment rested with the Secretary-General.

In sharing the general concern for the maintenance of an independent Secretariat, the United States, its representative said, realized that, in order for this to be accomplished, employees should not be penalized simply because they might not agree with the policies of the particular regime in power in the country of their citizenship. His Government had no interest in knowing whether any American in the Secretariat was a Democrat or a Republican or an Independent, so long as he met the Charter requirements of efficiency, competence and integrity, but it had an interest in knowing whether he was a member of a conspiracy dedicated to the overthrow of the democratic form of government of the United States. Since the power of selection rested solely with the Secretary-General and since it seemed clear from his report that the standards the Secretary-General proposed to apply would protect staff members against inadequately supported or unreliable representations from Member Governments, the continued independence of the Secretariat should be assured and individual rights safeguarded.

His Government, he continued, considered the report of the Secretary-General on personnel policy to be, on the whole, acceptable. He was not opposed to a full discussion of the report but considered that such a discussion could have no bearing on the practical situation.

His Government had therefore co-sponsored a draft resolution on personnel policy (A/L.146). It believed that at this time the Assembly should take no action which would hinder the Secretary-General in taking whatever action might be necessary to deal with the situation. The United States representative maintained that the establishment of the committee proposed in the joint twelve-Power draft resolution would make it impossible for the Secretary-General to deal adequately with the personnel problem confronting the Organization.

In summarizing the United States position on the question, its representative commended the Secretary-General's policies as "measures designed to strengthen the Secretariat and the United Nations itself, to meet challenges which face us in the unknown future". He endorsed the Secretary-General's position on the following major points: (1) that refusal to testify on grounds of possible self-incrimination was not consistent with the obligations of United Nations staff members; and (2) that the Secretary-General might dismiss a staff member if he had reasonable grounds for believing that the member was engaging, or was likely to engage in subversive activities against the Government of any Member State.

The representative of the United States then emphasized that his Government would do all in its power to provide the Secretary-General with the information necessary to enable him to make a determination on that matter. That did not, however, constitute dictation to the Secretary-General or to Member Governments.

(4) Discussions in the Assembly

The debate in the General Assembly was concerned mainly with the basic conceptions of an international secretariat, the general principles which should govern personnel policy, the problem of alleged subversive activities against Member States, the questions raised by the refusal by staff members, on the ground of possible self-incrimination, to answer questions asked by United States investigating organs, the question of the relationship of the Organization to the host country as dealt with in the report of the Commission of Jurists (A/2364, Annex III) appointed by the Secretary-General and the question of possible dismissal of staff members on the "likelihood" of their future participation in subversive activities, as envisaged in the report of the Jurists.

There was general agreement in the Assembly that the Secretary-General and his staff had exclusively international responsibilities and that the appointment and removal of the staff was solely within the competence of the Secretary-General whose independence was guaranteed under Articles 100 and 101 of the Charter. However, that competence, it was stated, was to be exercised within the limits imposed by the Charter and the staff regulations laid down by the General Assembly. In this connexion, reference was frequently made to the basic conceptions of an international secretariat contained in the recommendations of the Preparatory Commission which state (PC/20) that "for the duration of their appointments, the Secretary-General and the staff will not be the servants of the State of which they are nationals, but the servants only of the United Nations".

Further, it was stated, the report of the Preparatory Commission contained the following paragraph which showed that the obligations of United Nations officials were not purely negative: "It is essential that officials should be inspired by a sense of loyalty to the United Nations and devotion to the ideal for which it stands, and that they should develop an esprit de corps and a habit of daily co-operation with persons of other countries and cultures...Loyalty to the Organization is in no way incompatible with an official's attachment to his own country, whose higher interests he is serving in serving the United Nations. It clearly involves, however, a broad international outlook and a detachment from national prejudices and narrow national interests." These recommendations, it was stated, were adopted by the General Assembly by large majorities and continued to retain their validity in the organization of the Secretariat.

There was also general agreement that any staff member who violated article 14⁷³ of the staff regulations by engaging in subversive activities against any Member State or indeed against any State at all, committed serious misconduct and warranted dismissal.

With these general considerations in view, the representatives of Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Greece, Panama, Sweden, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States, among others, expressed confidence in the Secretary-General and the general policy followed by him in matters of personnel, as outlined in his report, with which they were in general agreement. Tributes were also paid to the efficiency, integrity, impartiality and high moral standards of the Secretariat. Reference was frequently made to the fact that, despite the unfavourable publicity which had been given to the cases of certain individuals, no staff member, with a single exception, had ever been convicted by a court of law of any offence involving espionage or other subversive activities. In the case of the United States staff members not a single indictment had been returned or conviction obtained. Some representatives, including those of France and the United Kingdom, emphasized that the United Nations did not offer opportunities for any kind of espionage since the documentation and the activities of the United Nations were open and governments did not entrust their secrets to the United Nations. This was a factor which, they stated, should always be borne in mind when measures to deal with subversive activities were being considered.

All these representatives supported the thirteen-Power draft resolution (A/L.146/Rev.1) which, they stated, did not take a position on the report of the Secretary-General but left him unfettered in the performance of his duties. At the same time it provided for a study of the problem by an expert body and for further consideration of the question at the eighth session.

All these representatives opposed the twelve-Power draft resolution which, in their view, undermined the position of the Secretary-General and cast doubt on his authority to act on personnel matters.

However, there was considerable divergence of opinion on the question as to whether staff members of United States nationality who refused, on the ground of possible self-incrimination, to answer certain questions asked by United States investigating organs drew upon themselves the suspicion of guilt and were thus liable to automatic dismissal. On this question, the representatives of Cuba, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Greece, Panama and the United States, among others, agreed with the position outlined by the Secretary-General on the basis of the report of the Jurists.

Some of these representatives took the view that it was inconceivable that, in the investigation of cases which might lead to the discovery of offences against the security of the State, a national of that State, if he were really innocent, would avail himself of the constitutional privilege granted under the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution. It was more reasonable, they considered, to suppose that an innocent person who found himself falsely involved or accused of disloyalty to his Government would deny such accusations as soon as possible. It was maintained by others, moreover, that the techniques for carrying on highly criminal and subversive activities had advanced farther than the techniques for detecting them, even where the great resources of national governments were available. The United Nations, having no such resources, had therefore to be doubly cautious in this respect and could not afford to have on its staff persons who drew suspicion of guilt upon them. These representatives believed that, in certain cases, such subversive activities might be incapable of proof. They agreed with the view expressed by the Commission of Jurists that staff members refusing to answer questions on the ground of self-incrimination should be dismissed and they fully supported the action that the Secretary-General had taken on the basis of that opinion.

On this specific question, the representatives of Belgium, Canada, France, India, Indonesia, Mexico, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway and Sweden, among others, took the stand that the automatic dismissal of staff members refusing to answer questions on the plea of constitutional privilege would amount to the automatic acceptance of a purely national criterion. They considered that any attitude which amounted to the automatic application of national standards to the personnel policies of the United Nations would infringe the fundamental requirements of Articles 100 and 101 of the Charter which laid down universally applicable and indivisible criteria. They maintained that it was impossible to establish any hard and fast rule which would be valid in all cases where a United States national refused to answer a question on the ground of self-incrimination. While the United States citizens in the United Nations were certainly not immune to interrogation and investigation by their Government, the United Nations had a duty to protect them against unjust or unwarranted dismissal. No employee, it was stated, should be dismissed at the mere request of the government of a country where the United Nations or any of its agencies was operating. The United Nations or the agency concerned must determine for itself whether or not just cause for dismissal existed. It therefore followed that the effect of a refusal to answer questions on the ground of self-incrimination must be determined by the Secretary-General through a complete evaluation of each individual case.

In this connexion, the representative of Norway enumerated some of the factors which, in his view, should be taken into account. Did the staff member stand on his constitutional right in a court of law where he was protected by all the rules ensuring him the due process of law? Or was he questioned by an investigating committee functioning in an inquisitorial manner, without benefit of advance preparation for the questions put to him and without benefit of legal counsel? Was the Committee bound by any acceptable law of evidence? Were the questions put to the witness of a concrete and limited nature and so phrased that the answers might result in criminal prosecution? Or were they vague and general in nature and did they deal with facts which were not in themselves of a criminal nature—for instance the political beliefs and opinions of the witness? To construe a refusal to answer as in itself a form of misconduct which would automatically involve dismissal from the United Nations Secretariat would be, in the opinion of the representative of Norway, contrary to the principles of law and justice accepted by most countries.

While agreeing with the general principle that dismissal should not be automatic, the representative of Australia stated that there might be cases where the refusal to answer questions on the ground of self-incrimination would justify dismissal. For example, it would be unthinkable to retain in United Nations employment any person who refused to answer the question as to whether he was engaged in "espionage". While the refusal would not lead to an inference of guilt, it would certainly draw upon the witness the suspicion of being a danger to the security of a State and necessitate his dismissal as a matter of policy. However, the representative of Australia doubted whether the same considerations would follow where the question related to "subversive activities"—a term much less finite in its content than the term "espionage". He however agreed that if a precise and agreed definition was given to that term, dismissal would be warranted if a staff member claimed privileges in relation to a question intended to establish "subversive activities".

The representative of Australia felt that while refusal to answer a question intended to establish current subversive activity would justify dismissal, if that refusal related merely to past activity there would be no reasonable ground for dismissal and no ground for the presumption that the witness would be likely to engage in subversive activities in the future. Stating that "deep cleavage of judicial opinion" existed on the question, the representative of Australia referred to case's where persons had claimed the constitutional privilege, not because they feared that answers to a specific question might incriminate them but because answering a single question might in some cases constitute the waiver of the claim to constitutional privilege in respect of a whole series of other questions.

He expressed his disagreement with the Secretary-General's contention that refusal on the part of staff members to withdraw the plea of privilege in respect of questions relating to subversive activities amounted to misconduct. That proposition he considered was entirely unworkable as a matter of law. He could not understand how availing oneself of a constitutional privilege could ever amount to misconduct. Refusal to answer a question might, he said, have a bearing on the suitability of a staff member for continued employment but it could not be invoked as a ground for dismissal for misconduct.

While agreeing with the principle that a staff member pleading constitutional privilege was not automatically liable to dismissal, the representative of the United Kingdom expressed the view that the Secretary-General's report did not provide for automatic dismissal. According to paragraph 87 of that report, much would depend on the type of the question to which an answer was refused. That, he said, was an important qualification which should not be overlooked. It was also possible that some of the staff members who had invoked that privilege might have done so, not because they had some guilty secret to conceal but from entirely honourable motives, such as the desire to protect the reputation of their friends or acquaintances. He considered that it would be difficult to maintain the high repute of the United Nations Secretariat if it included members who had invoked that privilege and his Government was therefore inclined to support the position that the Secretary-General had taken on that question.

The sponsors of the thirteen-Power draft resolution and their supporters felt, also, that most of the difficulty attending the problem posed by the refusal of United States staff members to answer questions on the ground of self-incrimination would be solved by the Executive Order of the United States which the Secretary-General had welcomed in his report. The Order, it was stated, was designed to furnish information and did not say that the Secretary-General must dismiss any United States staff member against whom United States authorities expressed an adverse opinion. Therefore, there was no question of the Secretary-General being asked to abdicate his responsibility.

However, representatives generally expressed satisfaction that the Commission of Jurists had recommended the establishment of an advisory panel of high Secretariat officials and that the Secretary-General had accepted the recommendation. The panel, it was stated, had been established under the Chairmanship of a Canadian jurist and would examine individual cases of staff members against whom derogatory opinion had been submitted by a government. The panel would advise the Secretary-General on each case. This, it was stated, would afford the staff some guarantee of fairness and impartiality. In this connexion, the representative of the Netherlands expressed the hope that the panel would not detract from the functions and powers of existing machinery, such as the Administrative Tribunal. He observed that any material which had been submitted to the panel should not be withheld from the Tribunal when it received a case which had first been dealt with by the panel.

Considerable discussion in the Assembly was devoted to the report of the Commission of Jurists appointed by the Secretary-General. The representative of India dealt primarily with the report of the Commission and, in particular, with the opinion expressed in its report assigning a special position to the host country in which the United Nations maintained its Headquarters. He considered that, while the Secretary-General had not accepted the report in its entirety, he appeared to have considered it, on the whole, as a valid interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Charter and of the staff regulations. A document of such far-reaching importance, the representative of India considered, deserved greater study than was possible in a plenary meeting of the Assembly.

The position of the Jurists, the representative of India said, was that a country had special privileges in respect of its own nationals in the United Nations when those nationals were employed within its own territory. Thus, as the Headquarters of the United Nations were located in the United States, United States nationals at Headquarters should be accepted according to the standards of security which the United States applied for employment in its own Government. This principle, the Jurists held, was to apply to nationals of the host country only, and not to United Nations employees of other nationalities. This principle of the "host country", he submitted, was a new consideration among the criteria governing United Nations recruitment and employment.

India, he said, considered this principle to be of doubtful validity. It would be difficult and not wholly desirable to apply that principle every time the United Nations met in a country, or carried out humanitarian or economic work in another country. He maintained that the application of the principle would seriously restrict the mobility of the Organization and its capacity to employ personnel of its choice at the point where it felt they would be most effective. This and other problems raised in the report of the Jurists, such as those relating to the functions and powers of the Joint Appeals Board and the Administrative Tribunal, the question of staff members invoking constitutional privilege in refusing to answer questions and questions concerning the privileges and immunities of the United Nations, deserved more detailed study. He therefore urged support for the twelve-Power draft resolution which, he emphasized, did not attempt to pass judgment but merely invited study by a competent body set up by the Assembly.

The representative of Syria expressed doubts as to the necessity for the appointment of the Commission of Jurists by the Secretary-General who, he said, had had the Charter and the General Assembly to guide him. The representative of Syria said that the report submitted by the Jurists was confused and contradictory. Thus, while stating that the Secretary-General's questions to the Commission related exclusively to nationals of the United States, the Jurists had either deliberately or otherwise extended the scope of investigation regarding subversive activity to non-American members of the staff.

In view of the fact that the Secretary-General had stated in paragraph 63 of the report that he intended to base his personnel policy on the conclusions of the Jurists, it was important that the report of the Jurists should be given more study. The representative of Syria agreed with the position adopted by the Indian representative on the principle of the "host country". He also stated that the receiving of information from governments in connexion with recruitment amounted to receiving instructions, which was contrary to the provisions of Article 100 of the Charter. Therefore, the representative of Syria concluded, he had joined in sponsoring the twelve-Power draft resolution which called for the appointment of a committee to study the problem and report to the Assembly. The final word on personnel policy, he emphasized, should rest with the Member States.

Among other representatives who commented on the opinion of the Commission of Jurists, the representatives of Canada, Sweden and the Union of South Africa agreed that it was obsolete in view of the fact that the Secretary-General had not accepted it in its entirety and had not submitted it for consideration by the General Assembly, but had instead submitted his own report.

The representatives of Mexico, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, however, dealt specifically with certain aspects of the Jurists' opinion with which they were not in agreement. The representative of Mexico said that he had serious doubts about the validity of the opinion—a feeling strengthened by the fact that the Jurists had been obliged to issue a well-known corrigendum to their opinion (A/INF/51/Corr.1) from which it appeared that in their opinion they had used, as synonymous, terms such as "disloyalty" and "subversive activities" which should be very carefully defined. Another "fundamental defect" of their opinion was, the representative of Mexico stated, that they had exceeded their terms of reference. The Secretary-General had requested their opinion solely "with respect to staff members of United States nationality" while the Jurists had, in fact, gone so far as to include staff members of all nationalities. After stating his disagreement with the principle that staff members should be dismissed for refusing to answer questions on the ground of self-incrimination, the representative of Mexico stated also his "serious reservations" regarding the principle recommended in the Jurists' opinion that one of the motives of dismissal might be the "likelihood" of a staff member engaging in subversive activities against any State.

The representative of New Zealand stated that the Jurists, who had made no distinction between new appointments and the retention of existing staff, were applying United States standards to United Nations requirements by accepting "likelihood of engaging in subversive activities" as a criterion for the dismissal of an established staff member. He said that the "Jurists' talk" of "likelihood" must be regarded as a "gloss over the staff regulations".

While he did not question the Secretary-General's decision to appoint the Commission of Jurists, the representative of the United Kingdom stated, their opinion laid greater stress on the obligations of the United Nations towards the host country than on the obligations of the host country towards the United Nations. He also felt that the report was perhaps rather too emphatic about the allegiance of international civil servants to their own governments and made too little allowance for their allegiance to the international organization in which they worked. Finally, he stated, the report suggested that an international organization must in all cases accept without question any definition of subversion or espionage which the host country might adopt—a principle which, if carried to extremes, could, in his opinion, make it impossible for any international organization to exist in certain countries.

The representative of Indonesia regretted the publicity that had attended the recent dismissals in the United Nations. He expressed concern over the "open hostility" which had been directed against the United Nations in the host country. Some European papers, he said, had commented that the United Nations had taken to "witch-hunting". He regretted the fact that some key members of the Secretariat had been dismissed without conclusive evidence to support the charges levelled against them.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR and Poland stated that the "illegal policies" followed by Trygve Lie over the past few years had harmed the independent character of the United Nations. The Secretariat, they stressed, should not be a tool in the hands of any State or group of States. But the Secretary-General's actions, they charged, had been directed towards undermining its international character and its independence of external influences. A purge had been carried out in the Secretariat on the mere suspicion of subversive activities. The United States had been allowed to take fingerprints of staff members in the United Nations Headquarters, thus transforming the building into a police station. It was quite clear, they stated, that these illegal activities of the Secretary-General had been designed to intimidate members of the staff, to root out the slightest progressive trends in the staff and to get rid of all progressive-minded staff members. The Secretary-General, it was stated, had used every effort to break the back of the Staff Council. As long ago as 1950, three members of that body, including its president and secretary, had been dismissed. The annual report of the Staff Association of that year had accused the Secretary-General of engaging in "union busting". In several cases, the Administrative Tribunal had ruled that dismissals were illegal and had granted the employees concerned substantial compensation. These representatives considered that the policy followed by the Secretary-General represented a threat to the independence of the Secretariat and was designed to transform an international staff into a national one—composed of the nationals of the "host country".

The representative of Poland, in particular, referred to the opinion of the Commission of Jurists, stating that the theory of the "host country" had been invented to legalize the violation of the principles of the Charter with regard to personnel policies. That fact, he said, was proved by the action that was being taken in the specialized agencies with headquarters outside the United States.

Towards the close of the debate, the representatives of India and Uruguay drew attention to a new factor in the situation—the appointment of a new Secretary-General. The representative of Uruguay suggested that the presence of a new Secretary-General might considerably modify the terms of the question and therefore it might be better not to adopt any resolution.

In a final statement, the Secretary-General referred to some of the criticism that had been made in the Assembly of the Jurists' opinion, stating that he had not accepted their opinion in its entirety and that the basis of the discussion should have been his own report. He said that the recommendation of the Jurists regarding the special privileges of the host country had not been accepted by him. As regards the possible dismissal of staff members invoking the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination, he said that the Executive Order of the United States made it unlikely that the question would recur. As regards the objections taken to the use of the Headquarters premises for investigatory purposes, he said that he had granted that permission in the interest of expediting the investigations. He noted that security police were admitted to the Headquarters during Assembly sessions in Paris and London.

(5) Resolution Adopted by the General Assembly

At the 422nd plenary meeting on 1 April, the two draft resolutions were put to the vote. The twelve-Power draft resolution (A/L.145/Rev.4) was rejected by 29 votes to 21, with 8 abstentions.

The thirteen-Power draft resolution (A/L.146/Rev.1) was voted on by paragraphs and adopted as follows:

The first paragraph of the preamble was adopted unanimously and the second paragraph by 41 votes to 10, with 5 abstentions. The first operative paragraph was adopted by 40 votes to 13, with 7 abstentions; the second operative paragraph by 44 votes to 3, with 11 abstentions; the third operative paragraph by 41 votes to 3, with 15 abstentions; and the fourth operative paragraph by 54 votes to 5, with 1 abstention.

The draft resolution as a whole was adopted by 41 votes to 13, with 4 abstentions. It read (resolution 708(VII)):

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the following provisions of Articles 100 and 101 of the Charter:

'Article 100

'1. In the performance of their duties the Secretary-General and the staff shall not seek or receive instructions from any government or from any other authority external to the Organization. They shall refrain from any action which might reflect on their position as international officials responsible only to the Organization.

"2. Each Member of the United Nations undertakes to respect the exclusively international character of the responsibilities of the Secretary-General and the staff and not to seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities.

'Article 101

"1. The staff shall be appointed by the Secretary-General under regulations established by the General Assembly.

"3. The paramount consideration in the employment of the staff and in the determination of the conditions of service shall be the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity. Due regard shall be paid to the importance of recruiting the staff on as wide a geographical basis as possible."

"Having reviewed and considered the report of the Secretary-General on personnel policy,

"1. Expresses its confidence that the Secretary-General will conduct personnel policy with these considerations in mind;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its eighth session a report on the progress made in the conduct and development of personnel policy, together with the comments of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions thereon;

"3. Invites the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to submit, after appropriate consultations with the administrative heads of the specialized agencies, their recommendations as to any further action that may be required of the General Assembly;

"4. Calls upon all Members of the United Nations to assist the Secretary-General in the discharge of his responsibilities as chief administrative officer of the United Nations."

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

Pursuant to resolution 708(VII) of 1 April 1953, the Secretary-General submitted his report on personnel policy (A/2533) to the General Assembly on 2 November 1953. He explained that at meetings of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination on 7 October 1953, he had consulted with the administrative heads of the specialized agencies or their representatives on the subject matter of the report, though not on its text. The Secretary-General noted that the representatives of the specialized agencies were in general agreement with him on the basic objectives to be sought and fully understood the reasons for his conclusions that a change in the staff regulations and an increase in the powers of the Secretary-General, subject to appropriate safeguards, were necessary to meet the administrative needs of the United Nations. It was also agreed that it was desirable that there should be as much uniformity in personnel policy as might be found practicable, although each organization would have to frame its own policy in the light of its special circumstances.

The report of the Secretary-General was divided into two parts: the first part contained his recommendations concerning proposed amendments to certain articles of the staff regulations and to one article of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal and the reasons which had led him to make those recommendations; the second part dealt with certain other developments of personnel policy which did not require amendments to the staff regulations, but which were submitted to the General Assembly for its approval or for its information.

Under the first part of the report, the Secretary-General pointed out that, in the course of his review of the administrative system and the rules applying to service in the United Nations, he had found that the staff regulations suffered from ambiguities and omissions which made certain revisions essential if he were to have the powers necessary to fulfil his obligations under the Charter. He further explained that his proposals were based on considerations of a general nature and were in no way adjusted to special circumstances prevailing at a particular time and in relation to a particular country. The objective of a reconsideration of the staff regulations, he added, should be to revise the regulations in the light of the Charter, so that they would provide a just and legal foundation for sound administration, taking into account the equal importance of the independence of the staff and of the effective functioning of the Organization.

The Secretary-General proposed amendments to staff regulations: 9.1(a) regarding termination of permanent appointments; 1.4 relating to conduct reflecting on integrity, independence and impartiality; and 1.7 relating to political activities on the part of staff members. He also proposed to add to the present staff regulation 9.3 a new provision and recommended amending article 9 of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal.

The question was considered by the Fifth Committee at its 406th to 422nd and 426th meetings on 18, 19, 23 to 25, 27, 28 and 30 November and 1 to 4 and 7 December 1953. The Committee had before it a report by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/2555) on part I of the Secretary-General's report, containing its observations on the amendments proposed by the Secretary-General and recommending revised texts of certain of these amendments. A further report by the Advisory Committee (A/2581) contained its observations on part II of the report of the Secretary-General.

The Fifth Committee also had before it the views of staff representatives set forth in a letter dated 14 November 1953 from the Chairman of the Staff Committee of the United Nations Secretariat at Headquarters, enclosing a statement by the Staff Council dated 13 November 1953, and in a letter dated 10 November 1953 from the Chairman of the Staff Committee of the European Office of the United Nations, enclosing a resolution adopted by the Staff Committee on 9 November 1953 (A/C.5/561).

- (1) Amendments to the Staff Regulations and the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal

A description of the proposed amendments and the action taken on them follows.

The Fifth Committee held a general discussion on part I of the Secretary-General's report at its 406th to 414th meetings from 18 to 28 November. In stating their views on the proposals as a whole, a majority of representatives were in agreement that the powers of the office of the Secretary-General should be made commensurate with his obligations under the Charter. They further believed that the proposed amendments to the staff regulations would have this effect. While it was true that the standards established would involve subjective judgments, it was pointed out that such judgments were no more difficult than those involved in determining what was unsatisfactory service or serious misconduct and that adequate safeguards would exist to protect the interests of the staff.

Several representatives, including those of Chile, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Syria, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, maintained that the Secretary-General, under the existing staff regulations, already had adequate powers to ensure respect for the Charter by the staff but that it might be desirable to state these more expressly in order to avoid misinterpretation in the future, provided that the fundamental character of the regulations was not changed.

On the other hand, the representatives of Belgium, Guatemala, Indonesia, Lebanon, New Zealand and Uruguay, among others, while expressing full confidence in the present Secretary-General, believed that the issue should be considered on an institutional rather than on a personal basis. They thought that the proposed amendments would give the broadest discretionary power to the Secretary-General and might be open to abuse in the future. They considered that no action should be taken which might threaten the security and morale of the staff or which would lead to the violation of existing contracts or acquired rights.

General emphasis was placed on the principle that decisions should be made solely to ensure the sound administration of the Organization while protecting the interests of the staff and avoiding any action which might impair their legitimate rights. Conditions of employment should be such as to create an efficient, competent and sound Secretariat, independent and international in character.

Several representatives supported a suggestion by Brazil that the question be referred to a special committee to meet between the eighth and ninth sessions of the General Assembly. The representatives of Burma, Guatemala, Mexico, Uruguay and Yugoslavia maintained that the issue involved so many complex questions that it could not be adequately dealt with in the short time available during the remainder of the eighth session. Such reference to a special committee, it was suggested, would also permit consultation with other agencies and bodies concerned, as well as receipt of the report of the International Civil Service Advisory Board. However, since there was an apparent majority which favoured resolving the issue during the eighth session, those favouring postponement did not insist on a vote.

Amendments to the texts proposed by the Secretary-General or recommended by the Advisory Committee were submitted by India, by the United Kingdom, jointly by Argentina and Chile, and jointly by Brazil, Egypt, France, India, Indonesia, Lebanon, the Netherlands and Syria (A/C.5/L.255).⁷⁴ Additional amendments to the staff regulations and to the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal were also proposed jointly by Chile and Argentina (A/C.5/L.256) and draft resolutions were submitted by Argentina (A/C.5/L.257) and by Canada (A/C.5/L.258).

Following a detailed examination of the proposed amendments, the Committee at its 422nd meeting on 4 December approved the texts which it recommended for adoption by the General Assembly.

In recommending the adoption of the amendments to the staff regulations, the Committee had in mind the statements of the Secretary-General made on 18 and 25 November 1953 (A/C.5/563 and 566) and those parts of the Secretary-General's report on personnel policy in which he set forth his views on the interpretation and application of the new regulations. It was also noted that the Secretary-General had stated that his decisions would remain subject to review by the Administrative Tribunal to the full extent of its existing legal authority.

Consideration of the individual proposals and amendments to the staff regulations and to the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal and the texts approved by the General Assembly are set out below.

(a) AMENDMENTS TO THE STAFF REGULATIONS

Staff Regulation 1.4—The Secretary-General proposed amending this regulation by adding the phrase "or on the integrity, independence and impartiality which are required by that status" to the following sentence: "They [staff members] shall avoid any action and in particular any kind of public pronouncement which may adversely reflect on their status." He explained that the amendment was not intended to alter the meaning of the staff regulation, but only to make it more explicit and to give further clarification concerning the types of action by United Nations staff members which might adversely reflect on their status.

In its report (A/2555), the Advisory Committee wondered whether the proposed addition was absolutely necessary. The conduct that befits the status of an international civil servant, it said, is defined, as regards independence and impartiality, in staff regulation 1.3 and, as regards integrity, in the Charter itself. However, the insertion, the Advisory Committee felt, might provide a useful clarification and on that ground it concurred in the Secretary-General's proposal.

In the Fifth Committee discussion, there was general agreement on the Secretary-General's proposed amendment to this regulation. The amendment was considered to be a clarification of the present regulation and an express recognition of the principles of the Charter. The amendment was unanimously approved by the Fifth Committee at its 414th meeting on 28 November.

Staff Regulation 1.7—The Secretary-General proposed to replace staff regulation 1.7 with a new provision relating to the prohibition of political activities on the part of staff members. Staff members, he said, should obviously not take part in political campaigns, or in political canvassing or management. Some types of political activities, he went on to say, such as service under ordinary conditions on a school board or town council, could not adversely affect the United Nations. In the implementation of the provision, the staff member's rights to his religious or political convictions, he said, should be fully respected.

The Advisory Committee, while concurring in the substitution of a new provision, recommended deleting from the Secretary-General's text the qualifying phrase "unless otherwise authorized in accordance with staff rules issued by the Secretary-General."

A text was also submitted by the United Kingdom (A/C.5/L.255) which, with drafting amendments, provided that staff members might exercise the right to vote but should not engage in any political activity which was inconsistent with or might reflect upon the independence and impartiality required by their status as international civil servants.

The majority of delegations recognized that special requirements for members of the international Secretariat were necessary to ensure their impartiality, and it was noted that prohibition of political activities had been approved by the representatives of the staff. Other delegations, including those of Argentina, India, Lebanon, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, while agreeing in principle with the amendment, felt that the term "political activities" should be more clearly defined, particularly as to whether it included passive membership in a political party.

The Committee took note of a statement by the Secretary-General (at the 412th meeting on 25 November) that it was his intention to implement the regulation prohibiting political activities by a staff rule, which, in relation to party membership, would be drafted along the following tentative lines:

"Membership of a legal political party is permitted provided that such membership, in the case of the staff member concerned, does not entail subjection to party discipline or action in favour of the party, other than the payment of normal financial contributions."

The Committee suggested that the Secretary-General, when drafting a final version of this rule, also consider the text put forward by the United Kingdom, which read as follows:

"Membership of a political party is permitted provided that such membership does not entail any positive action, current or potential, other than voting or payment of normal financial contributions, contrary to the provisions of staff regulation 1.7. In any case of doubt, the staff member should consult the Secretary-General."

At its 417th meeting on 1 December 1953, the Committee approved, by 41 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, the amendment to regulation 1.7 as proposed by the United Kingdom.

Regulation 9.1(a)—The Committee devoted a major portion of its debate on personnel policy to the proposed changes to this regulation, governing the termination of staff members holding permanent appointments. In his report the Secretary-General asked for power to terminate such appointments:

(i) if the conduct of a staff member did not meet the high standards of integrity required by the Charter;

(ii) if facts, anterior to the staff member's appointment and relevant to his administrative suitability should come to light, which, if they had been known should, under the standards of the Charter, have precluded his appointment; or

(iii) if such action would be in the interest of the good administration of the Organization and in accordance with the standards of the Charter.

No termination under any of these sub-paragraphs would take place until the matter was considered by a special advisory board appointed for that purpose by the Secretary-General.

Sub-paragraph (i)—The Advisory Committee concurred in the text for sub-paragraph (i) proposed by the Secretary-General.

Many representatives pointed out that this sub-paragraph merely incorporated in the regulations the standard of integrity which was already found in the Charter and considered that it was a natural corollary to the amendment to staff regulation 1.4. Other representatives, including those of Belgium, Chile, Guatemala, Syria and Uruguay, considered the amendment unnecessary since the standard of integrity was already covered by the provisions relating to unsatisfactory service and to misconduct. They believed that integrity was too indefinite a term, required subjective evaluation and might be subject to political interpretations.

Attention was drawn to the Secretary-General's statement that "integrity" applied only to actions and activities which were morally objectionable, and had no political connotations.

The representative of India orally proposed a text for this sub-paragraph which, with accepted amendments, provided that the Secretary-General might, by a properly motivated decision, terminate a permanent staff member if he learned of facts relative to his conduct during his period of employment in the United Nations, if such facts indicated that the staff member did not meet the high standards of integrity required by the Charter.

Prior to the voting, the representative of the Secretary-General accepted the oral suggestion of the representative of Israel to change the phrase "the high standards" to "the highest standards" in accordance with the wording of Article 101 of the Charter.

The text proposed by the Secretary-General and endorsed by the Advisory Committee was approved at the Committee's 417th meeting on 1 December 1953 by 27 votes to 9, with 2 abstentions.

Sub-paragraph (ii)—The Advisory Committee, after first raising the question as to whether a special provision of this nature in the regulations was required, concluded that, in view of the wide geographical area of United Nations recruitment, a formal and explicit provision was necessary, and proposed minor amendments, which were accepted by the Secretary-General.

The representative of India, in orally introducing an alternative text, considered sub-paragraph (ii) to be allied with sub-paragraph (i) in that it concerned "past integrity" and therefore opposed the proposal of the Advisory Committee to delete the restrictive term "administrative" where it referred to a staff member's suitability.

Those members of the Committee who supported the sub-paragraph considered it a natural corollary to sub-paragraph (i). An employee, they held, was obligated to disclose any present or past circumstances which might lead prospective employers to refuse to employ him.

Some members of the Committee, including the representatives of Chile, France, Guatemala, the Netherlands, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, expressed doubts as to the necessity of the proposal in that it was covered by the criterion of integrity in the first sub-paragraph, and stated that by applying to past conduct it overlooked the fact that a person could rise above his past. Others, among them the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, considered the text imprecise and open to misunderstanding.

At its 417th meeting on 1 December 1953, the Committee approved, by 27 votes to 9, with 2 abstentions, the text recommended by the Advisory Committee and accepted by the Secretary-General.

Sub-paragraph (iii)—In its report, the Advisory Committee accepted the text proposed by the Secretary-General subject to an amendment to add a phrase to permit termination if such action would be "in the general interest of the United Nations," and subject to the further safeguard that the provisions would be reviewed by the General Assembly within two years.

While agreeing that the amendment proposed by the Secretary-General would give very broad powers to the Secretary-General, members of the Committee favouring the revision believed that the observations and statements of the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee should dissipate any misgivings which existed. They believed that adequate safeguards were provided, and noted the Secretary-General's statement to the effect that the provision was intended to be used in the interest of the staff when it was desired not to stigmatize a staff member by termination or dismissal under other provisions of the regulations. Several representatives, including those of Canada, Colombia, Cuba, Lebanon and the Netherlands, conditioned their agreement on the understanding that the power requested would be granted for a period of one or two years only, after which it would be reviewed.

Doubts concerning the appropriateness of the paragraph were raised by the representatives of Belgium, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, France, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Israel, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Syria, Turkey, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR, Uruguay and Yugoslavia. Opposition was based, among other things, on the grounds that the power to be granted was so broad as to render superfluous other provisions with regard to termination; that the Secretary-General would be the sole judge of the requirements of good administration; and that contracts would be liable to termination by unilateral action by one of the contracting parties.

Explaining again, at the Committee's 412th meeting on 25 November, his intention with regard to the use of this sub-paragraph, the Secretary-General suggested moving the whole clause to the end of the amended regulation and adding the words "provided the action is not contested by a staff member concerned". Thus, he explained, the sub-paragraph would be used only with the consent of a staff member, in place of a resignation on request.

The Advisory Committee considered this new version of the sub-paragraph and concluded (A/C.5/567) that it would be preferable to delete the sub-paragraph altogether rather than to adopt the new text suggested by the Secretary-General. The Secretary-General again clarified his position by stating that he was not formally proposing the alternative text; however, he would accept it if proposed by a delegation.

The United Kingdom submitted a text (A/C.5/L.255) providing that the Secretary-General might also terminate the appointment of a staff member who holds a permanent appointment "if, in the considered judgment of the Secretary-General, after he has personally examined the case, interviewed the staff member concerned, and consulted the Advisory Board, such action would be in the interests of the Organization and in accordance with the standards of the Charter". The representative of the United Kingdom believed that final responsibility must be fixed for the interpretation of the words "in the interest of the good administration ..." as proposed in the Secretary-General's text and the United Kingdom text would lay this responsibility upon the Secretary-General.

The Committee, at its 417th meeting on 1 December, after rejecting the Secretary-General's alternative text by 27 votes to 18, with 5 abstentions, and the United Kingdom text by 36 votes to 9, with 3 abstentions, approved, at the first reading, the original text of the Secretary-General by 24 votes to 15, with 11 abstentions.

Following the first reading, the Secretary-General received a letter from the Chairman of the Staff Committee (A/C.5/573), which he transmitted to members of the Fifth Committee, stating the Staff Committee's preference for the alternative text suggested by the Secretary-General which, it was stated, would largely remove staff anxiety regarding this sub-paragraph.

The representative of Belgium, at the Committee's 422nd meeting on 4 December, orally proposed that the words "provided that the action is not contested by the staff member concerned" should be added to the text previously approved at the Committee's first reading. This sub-paragraph would then be moved to the end of the amendment, as was suggested by the Secretary-General, since reference to a special advisory board would no longer apply to this provision. This proposal was adopted by the Committee by 36 votes to 14, with 4 abstentions.

Special Advisory Board—The Secretary-General's proposal for a special advisory board to consider cases involving termination under the new provisions of regulation 9.1(a) was presented by him as one of the safeguards for the exercise of his new powers.

Argentina and Chile submitted a text (A/C.5/L.255) covering the composition of the board which, with an accepted French oral amendment (providing for the board's chairman being appointed by the President of the International Court of Justice), provided that no termination under the new paragraphs should take place until the matter had been considered and reported on by a special board consisting of five members, of whom two should be appointed by the Secretary-General and two elected by the staff, with the chairman designated by the President of the International Court of Justice. An alternative proposal submitted orally by the representative of the United Kingdom provided that the board should consist of a chairman nominated by the President of the International Court of Justice, two members nominated by the Secretary-General from among individuals of well-established reputation but not connected with the United Nations, one member of the staff representing the Secretary-General and one member representing the staff. The United Kingdom representative also proposed that his text should not be adopted as a staff regulation but included in the rapporteur's report as a suggestion for a staff rule.

On the first reading, the Fifth Committee decided, by 21 votes to 15 with 5 abstentions, in favour of the principle that the provisions governing the membership of the proposed advisory board should be embodied in a staff regulation. Following this vote, the United Kingdom representative proposed his text as an amendment to the joint Argentine-Chilean proposal. The Committee rejected, by 18 votes to 18, with 11 abstentions, the United Kingdom text. The joint amendment was then approved at the Committee's 417th meeting on 1 December at the first reading, by 28 votes to 11, with 6 abstentions.

Prior to the second reading, the Secretary-General suggested reconsideration of this decision and proposed (A/C.5/574) that the board consist of a chairman appointed by the Secretary-General on the nomination of the President of the International Court of Justice and of four members appointed by the Secretary-General in agreement with the Staff Council. He further suggested that the composition of the board be spelled out in a staff rule rather than in a staff regulation, and proposed the adoption of his original proposal that the board be appointed by the Secretary-General, leaving its precise composition to be spelled out in a staff rule along the lines he had suggested.

In a letter from the Chairman of the Staff Committee (A/C.5/262), the view was expressed that the exact manner in which the staff should choose its representatives should be left open in the text of the staff regulation.

The proposal of the Secretary-General was approved by the Committee at its 422nd meeting on 4 December by 53 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

Regulation 9.3—As a corollary to his new powers under the amended regulation 9.1(a), the Secretary-General proposed in his report an amendment to regulation 9.3 authorizing him, when he considered it justified, to pay to a staff member terminated under regulation 9.1(a) an indemnity payment twice that which would otherwise be payable under the staff regulations.

The Advisory Committee recommended that the payment of increased indemnities should be limited to cases of staff members terminated under paragraph (iii) of regulation 9.1(a), and that the increase should be no more than 50 per cent higher than that which would otherwise be payable.

Several of the representatives who opposed sub-paragraph (iii) of regulation 9.1(a) were also opposed to this amendment. Others, including the representatives of Colombia, the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom, opposed any increase in the present indemnities which they considered to be sufficient in all cases of termination.

Those supporting the text proposed by the Advisory Committee, among them the representatives of Australia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic and Turkey, believed that, since regulation 9.1(a) (iii) gave wider discretionary powers to the Secretary-General to terminate appointments, he should also have wider discretionary powers with regard to payment of indemnities for persons terminated under this provision. They could not agree, however, that there were any grounds for altering indemnity rates already approved by an earlier Assembly session for terminations under existing regulations. The Chairman of the Advisory Committee pointed out that, while terminations under 9.1(a) (iii) would be exceptional, the new provisions would entail considerable expenditure if it were extended to other cases.

The Committee first voted on an oral United Kingdom proposal that no addition should be made to regulation 9.3. This was rejected by 19 votes to 12, with 16 abstentions. The text recommended by the Advisory Committee was then approved at the Committee's 417th meeting on 1 December by 22 votes to 14, with 11 abstentions.

(b) AMENDMENTS TO THE STATUTE OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Article 9 of the Statute—In his report, the Secretary-General stated that experience had indicated that, particularly in cases involving termination of appointment, where the Administrative Tribunal found that an application was well-founded, the payment of compensation should be the rule rather than (as under the original Article 9) the exception. To reinstate an employee whom the Secretary-General has considered it necessary to terminate would, he declared, not normally be in keeping with the interest of good administration. Also, from the point of view of the staff member, it would not be desirable to require a new finding by the Secretary-General that reinstatement was "impossible or inadvisable". From the point of view of financial administration, the Secretary-General proposed that the Tribunal be limited in the amount to be awarded in cases of termination or dismissal to the maximum of two years' net base salary. These observations were embodied in the first paragraph of his proposed amendment to Article 9 of the Tribunal's Statute.

The second paragraph of the Secretary-General's proposal concerned remanding in case of procedural defects and compensation for a loss caused by a procedural delay; the third paragraph, unchanged in substance from the original text, provided that in applicable cases compensation should be fixed by the Tribunal and paid by the organization concerned.

The Advisory Committee concurred in the second and third paragraphs of the Secretary-General's proposal and recommended a new text for the first paragraph. This new paragraph retained the first sentence of the existing article 9 of the Statute, while at the same time meeting the points raised by the Secretary-General. The Advisory Committee further suggested that it was desirable from the point of view of financial administration to limit the compensation that might be awarded to one year's net base salary, or $10,000, whichever was smaller, and recommended an amendment to the Secretary-General's text to that effect. The Chairman of the Advisory Committee explained that this amount was intended to be in addition to any indemnities paid by the Secretary-General under the staff regulations at the time of termination.

The Secretary-General accepted the first part of the Advisory Committee's text, but desired to maintain his original limit on the amount of compensation which the Administrative Tribunal might award, which was two years' net base salary. It was explained by the representative of the Secretary-General that, in accordance with the practice of the Administrative Tribunal, it was intended that the amount would be less any indemnities paid at the time of termination. The Secretary-General had, however, suggested that in exceptional cases the Tribunal should be free to recommend the payment of higher compensation.

In the Fifth Committee's discussions there was a difference of opinion only on the first paragraph of the Secretary-General's proposal; there was general acceptance and no debate in substance on paragraphs 2 and 3.

A joint amendment was proposed by Brazil, Egypt, France, India, Indonesia, Lebanon, the Netherlands and Syria (A/C.5/L.255) which, with oral drafting changes, would add to the revised text the provision that the Tribunal might, in exceptional cases, when it considered it justified, order the payment of higher indemnity; a statement of the reasons would accompany each such order.

Some representatives, including those of Belgium, Chile, Guatemala, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, opposed any action on this subject on the grounds that it was undesirable to tamper with the Tribunal's Statute in a way which might alter the existing balance between the power of the Secretary-General and the Tribunal.

The Committee, at its 418th meeting on 2 December, voted on the amended text paragraph by paragraph. The Committee voted on the first paragraph in parts. It adopted the first sentence as recommended by the Advisory Committee, the second sentence with the limitation of two years' net base salary, and the eight-

Power proposal concerning higher indemnities in exceptional cases. It then accepted the first paragraph, as a whole, by 34 votes to 13, with 6 abstentions. The second paragraph was approved by 54 votes to none, with 1 abstention, and the third paragraph was approved unanimously.

Article 7 of the Statute—An amendment proposed by Argentina and Chile (A/C.5/255) to Article 7 of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal, which would have eliminated the provision preventing consideration by the Tribunal of applications unanimously decided by the Joint Appeals Board to be frivolous, was rejected by the Committee at its 418th meeting on 2 December by 20 votes to 7, with 22 abstentions. A further amendment (A/C.5/255) by these two delegations to delete the word "activities" in staff regulation 1.2, on the assignment of staff by the Secretary-General "to any of the activities or offices of the United Nations ..." was withdrawn, following explanations by the representative of the Secretary-General and comments by various delegations.

(2) Provisions for Review

As a result of a suggestion made by the Secretary-General in his report, the representative of Canada proposed (A/C.5/L.258) and the Committee unanimously approved at its 416th meeting on 1 December, a draft resolution providing that the Assembly undertake at its tenth session in 1955, on the basis of a report to be submitted by the Secretary-General and the comments thereon of the Advisory Committee, a review both of the principles and standards progressively developed and applied by the Secretary-General in his implementation of the staff regulations.

(3) Special Fund for Payment of Indemnities

In the course of the discussion of the amendment to staff regulation 9.3, the representative of Argentina proposed a draft resolution (A/C.5/L.257), requesting the Secretary-General to submit to the Assembly's ninth session a report on the possibility of establishing a special fund to be used for the payment of indemnities.

The representative of France suggested, however, that, instead of a resolution on the subject, the report by the Fifth Committee's rapporteur might contain a request to the Secretary-General and to the Advisory Committee to prepare for the ninth session a report on the financing of indemnities, taking into account the views expressed in the Committee's discussions. The representative of Turkey believed that the report should also discuss the question as to whether the establishment of a fund of this kind would be compatible with the provisions of Article 17 of the Charter (which states, inter alia, that the "General Assembly shall consider and approve the budget of the Organization"). He explained that, so far as public accounts were concerned, the standard practice was for the legislature to appropriate funds for a financial year, and to enact special legislation if it anticipated that expenditure would continue beyond that year. The General Assembly, he said, could not delegate its powers, not even to the Secretary-General, and could not relinquish its power to scrutinize expenditure each year. In this connexion, the Chairman of the Advisory Committee stated that, without wishing to anticipate the attitude of the Committee, he believed the establishment of such a fund would raise important constitutional issues.

The Secretary-General informed the Fifth Committee that, if it expressed a wish to that effect, he would undertake a study of the possibility and desirability of the proposal before making budgetary arrangements for the payment of indemnities. He used the term "budgetary arrangements" as he felt that various possible solutions should be studied and not merely the proposal for a special fund. The Fifth Committee at its 415th meeting on 30 November agreed, without objection, that the rapporteur's report should indicate the desire of the Committee that the Secretary-General should submit the study envisaged to the ninth session of the General Assembly.

(4) Other Personnel Problems

The second part of the Secretary-General's report to the Assembly's eighth session (A/2533) dealt with other personnel problems, such as the progress in reviewing temporary staff, the appointment policy, special categories of staff, and the effect on United Nations staff members of the coming into force of the United States Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952.

(a) PROGRESS IN REVIEWING TEMPORARY STAFF

A Selection Committee appointed by the Secretary-General under the chairmanship of F. P. Walters, former Deputy Secretary-General of the League of Nations, conducted a review of temporary staff at Headquarters in 1952⁷⁵ and in the European Office of the United Nations early in 1953. The review was continued at Headquarters in 1953 by two committees, one under the chairmanship of Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar and the other under the chairmanship of Ivan Kerno.

The Secretary-General declared that before the end of 1953 these committees would have completed the review of 1,082 temporary staff members at Headquarters appointed before 1 January 1951, of whom 567 were in the Professional category and 515 in the General Service category. To these numbers at Headquarters there had to be added 296 staff members, already reviewed, in the European Office of the United Nations.

Early in 1954, the Selection Committee, reported the Secretary-General, would undertake the review of the staff of the Economic Commissions for Latin America and for Asia and the Far East and of the staff serving in the United Nations Information Centres.

Simultaneously, a second form of regular review of staff members had been in operation in the Secretariat. This was the review, proposed first by the Preparatory Commission in 1945, of permanent staff members who had completed five years of service in that status. The first permanent appointments were granted during 1947 and the first group of permanent staff members was, therefore, reviewed in 1952. The Secretary-General had appointed a Five-Year Review Committee composed of senior officials of the Secretariat. At the time of the Secretary-General's report (2 November 1953), the Committee had reviewed 670 permanent staff members, and the Secretary-General had accepted its recommendations in virtually every case.

(b) APPOINTMENT POLICY

The Secretary-General declared that the basic aim of an appointment policy devised for the present needs of the Secretariat was to create the most favourable conditions for the development of a body of permanent international civil servants meeting the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity. Under such a policy, outside recruitment would be conducted mainly for the purpose of securing replacements, including candidates of nationalities not adequately represented, for posts vacated due to the process of normal turnover.

Candidates recruited for continuous service would be given appointments in probationary status, such probation to be of a duration of not less than two years. Toward the end of their second year of service they would be submitted to review and, as a result, either granted permanent appointments or separated from the service. In exceptional cases, the period of probation might be extended for one additional year.

A special type of appointment, the main characteristic of which would consist in a clear stipulation that no expectancy of continuous service was implied, would be granted to outside assistants for work of a temporary nature or limited duration or to certain recruited persons whom, because of their occupational or personal status, it was not possible or advisable to integrate in the permanent service.

The Secretary-General stated that it would be his policy to grant permanent appointments to staff members in the Principal Officer and Director category below the rank of Principal Director, to staff members in the Professional category and to staff members serving in the intermediate and higher levels of the General Service category.

As from 1 January 1954, temporary appointments would be divided into two groups: either to replace or secure staff for which continuous service was envisaged (the Probationary appointment and the Regular appointment) or to engage temporary staff to whom no expectancy of continuous service could or should be given (the Fixed-term and the Indefinite appointment).

The probationary appointment would be given to individuals under 50 years of age at the time of recruitment when the Secretary-General intended that the appointee, if he proved that he had the required qualifications, should receive a Permanent or Regular appointment.

The Regular appointment would be given to staff members in the first two salary levels of the General Service category and to manual and skilled trade personnel, after they had served a minimum of two years in Probationary appointments. The Regular appointment would be for an indefinite period which might last until retirement age.

The Fixed-term appointment, which would expire automatically on a date specified in the letter of appointment, would be given for periods not to exceed five years to individuals recruited for service of prescribed duration, including persons seconded by or on leave from national governments and institutions for service with the Secretariat.

The Indefinite appointment would be given only to: (1) individuals specifically recruited for field or mission service who did not qualify for Fixed-term or Probationary appointment, and (2) those recruited subject to a waiver of medical requirements and who were not given a Fixed-term appointment.

An Appointment and Promotion Board composed of senior officials would be appointed by the Secretary-General. The Board would make recommendations for all appointments of an expected duration of more than one year, with the exception of mission and technical assistance experts appointments, and would consider all proposals for promotion.

A Personnel Selection and Review Board, appointed by the Secretary-General, would be composed of the following: a chairman, three members appointed from among senior officials of the Secretariat, and one member appointed from among staff members nominated by the Staff Council. The functions of the Board would be: (1) to conduct the review of staff members who became eligible for a Permanent or Regular appointment; and (2) to review every five years staff members holding Permanent or Regular appointments and to advise the Secretary-General whether the staff member had maintained the standards of efficiency, competence and integrity prescribed by the Charter.

The Secretary-General stated that, while it seemed evident that the broad principles of the staff regulations were meant to be universal and to apply to all members of the staff, he had on occasions, where the circumstances warranted it, and particularly in the case of staff appointed for special service of a non-continuous or purely local character, prescribed conditions of employment which modified to some extent the specific stipulations of the staff regulations. This necessary latitude in interpreting the applicability of the staff regulations, he said, had proved to be of particular practical value in setting the conditions of employment in such subsidiary organs created by the General Assembly as the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and also for the appointment of experts specifically recruited to serve the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. He declared that, subject to the agreement of the General Assembly, he intended to continue to avail himself of a reasonable latitude of interpretation of the applicability of the staff regulations.

24 DECEMBER 1952

The Secretary-General stated that, on 24 December 1952, there came into force in the United States a new Immigration and Nationality Act which contained provisions of immediate relevance to staff members of the United Nations. Under this Act, the United States authorities could adjust to non-immigrant status any non-United States citizen in permanent residence (immigrant) visa status who had an occupational status which would entitle him to a diplomatic or international organization visa (G-4 visa). The United States Attorney General would cancel the record of such person's admission for permanent residence, and his immigrant status would therefore be terminated. The adjustment of status which was thus required was made inapplicable by the Act, however, if the individual filed with the United States Attorney General a written waiver of all rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities, under any law or any executive order, which would otherwise accrue to him because of his having an occupational status entitling him to the non-immigrant status.

According to regulations issued by the United States Attorney General, no United Nations staff member would have his residential status changed to G-4 visa status until he had received formal notice in writing from the United States authorities. The staff member would then have ten days from the receipt of that notice in which to execute the waiver of his privileges and immunities. Some staff members holding permanent residence visas were faced with the decision before the time of the general notification, for example, if they applied for a re-entry permit before proceeding on travel outside the United States.

According to an opinion by the Attorney General of the United States on the effect of these waivers, the Secretary-General stated, a United Nations staff member who signs the waiver can enjoy, under United States law, the same privileges and exemptions as are available to a United States citizen employed by the United Nations, but cannot assert privileges not available to a United States citizen. In illustration, the staff member would remain immune from suit and legal process in relation to his official United Nations functions, but he would become liable to United States income taxation on his income derived from the United Nations.

Following receipt of the text of the United States Act, the regulations adopted by the United States authorities in its implementation, and the opinion of the United States Attorney General, the Secretary-General on 26 June 1953 had issued a circular to the staff (ST/AFS/SER.A/214) in which he said in part that as far as the United Nations was concerned, the signature of the waiver might have consequences which would have to be carefully studied and might call for special rulings by the General Assembly or himself. In the meantime, the Secretary-General, who has exclusive authority to waive privileges and immunities enjoyed by United Nations staff members, was prepared to consider the request of any staff member for authorization of his signature of the waiver, with the understanding that this waiver did not constitute a limitation of the immunities related to official acts of the staff member.

The Secretary-General reported that, of some 3,356 staff members at Headquarters, some 1,755 were not citizens of the United States; 461 being, on 1 October 1953, in permanent residence status. Assuming that all these staff members elected to retain their permanent residence status in the United States, the amount of income taxation that would be reimbursable was estimated to be roughly $360,000 for the first full taxation year. Of the 461 staff members, 231 were then entitled to the benefits and entitlements associated with international recruitment, of which home leave was the most considerable, amounting to an estimated annual cost of $280,000 per annum. For the purpose of geographical distribution of the staff, some 178 of these staff members were counted as being internationally recruited.

While the financial consequences were important, the Secretary-General said, there might also be other implications in the case of staff members whose nationality was an important feature of their selection for employment with the United Nations. If such staff members elected to become permanent residents of another country, there might be an implication of an intention not to maintain ties with the country of their nationality. A question might therefore arise with regard to the application of the principle of geographical distribution.

It was proposed by the Secretary-General, and concurred in by the Advisory Committee in its observations (A/2581) on the second part of the report, that a staff member opting for permanent residence status in the country of his duty station, and thereby rendering himself liable to national income taxation on salary and other emoluments received from the United Nations, should receive reimbursement of such taxation, subject to the decision of the General Assembly to appropriate funds annually for this purpose. On the other hand, it was recommended that such staff members should:

- (1) lose any eligibility for home leave;
- (2) lose any entitlement to payment of non-resident's allowance from the date on which the staff rules were changed or from the end of the month in which he signed the waiver, whichever was later;
- (3) lose any entitlement to education grant after the completion of the 1953-1954 academic year, the staff member concerned, however, retaining eligibility for one-way travel for the dependent child between the home country and duty station on the completion of the 1953-1954 academic year;
- (4) lose any entitlement to repatriation grant; and
- (5) lose any eligibility for return transportation for himself or his dependents, and for removal of household effects, which was based on "place of home leave"

The Advisory Committee in its observations, in addition, while concurring in the transitional measure recommended by the Secretary-General as regards a staff member's entitlement to the education grant, considered as unwarranted the Secretary-General's proposal that staff members who would otherwise have been eligible for home leave during 1953 or 1954 should be permitted to take one final home leave during the year in which it would have fallen due.

The Advisory Committee further recommended:

(1) that persons in permanent residence status should in future be ineligible for appointment as internationally recruited staff members unless they were prepared to change to a G-4 (or equivalent) visa status; and

(2) that, except in the case of the present staff members who were in permanent residence status and therefore affected by the United States Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, any internationally recruited member of the Secretariat who asked and received authority to change from a G-4 (or equivalent) visa status to a permanent residence status should not thereby acquire any entitlement to reimbursement of national income taxes. This latter recommendation of the Advisory Committee was subsequently modified for the purpose of enabling the Secretary-General, in exceptional and compelling circumstances, to grant permission to a staff member to change his status without losing entitlement to tax reimbursement.

The Advisory Committee expressed the view that a decision to remain in permanent residence status in no way represented an interest of the United Nations and that, on the contrary, to the extent, if any, that it might weaken existing ties with the countries of nationality, it was undesirable from the United Nations point of view.

The Fifth Committee, at its 419th meeting on 3 December, turned its attention to the problems and policy suggestions dealt with in the second part of the Secretary-General's report (A/2533). Discussion was directed for the most part to the problems resulting from the application to United Nations staff members of the relevant provisions of the United States Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, on the basis of the observations and proposals outlined in the Secretary-General's report and the recommendations set forth in the report of the Advisory Committee (A/2581).

The Fifth Committee was informed that the number of staff members who were in permanent residence status and therefore affected by the above Act, had been reduced, by 17 November 1953, to 453. Of this total, 121 had been authorized by the Secretary-General to sign a waiver of privileges and immunities, including 49 who were entitled to benefits associated with international recruitment.

The specific recommendations of the Advisory Committee received a wide measure of support in the Fifth Committee. A number of representatives, however, including those of Egypt, France, India and Poland, recorded their strong opposition to any extension of the policy of national income tax reimbursement to a further group of staff members; they said they would not be able to support the appropriation of additional funds for this purpose.

The recommendation of the Advisory Committee that present staff members who opted for permanent residence status in the country of their duty station should, subject to annual appropriation of funds, receive reimbursement of national income taxes, on being put to the vote, was approved by 27 votes to 11, with 12 abstentions. The recommendations relating to loss of entitlement to various benefits associated with international recruitment were approved by 47 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

In the light of an explanation given by the representative of the Secretary-General, the Fifth Committee accepted, by 25 votes to 12, with 12 abstentions, a proposal by the representative of Denmark that the transitional arrangements, as recommended by the Secretary-General, should apply in the case of home leave, as well as in the case of the education grant.

The Fifth Committee, having been informed that the Secretary-General would in future refuse to recruit persons in permanent residence status for posts subject to international recruitment, concurred, by 48 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, in the recommendation of the Advisory Committee to the effect that persons in permanent residence status should in future be ineligible for appointment as internationally recruited staff members unless they were prepared to change to a G-4, or equivalent, visa status.

The Advisory Committee's recommendation concerning the granting of permission to a staff member to change his status without losing entitlement to tax reimbursement, as subsequently modified, was adopted by 45 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions. In connexion with this last recommendation, certain representatives, in particular the representative of Israel, questioned the equity of treating staff members who were already in permanent residence status differently from those who subsequently opted for that status. Doubts were also expressed as to the equity of making a distinction between United States citizens, who would continue to be entitled to the benefits associated with international recruitment, and other staff members who were not yet citizens of the United States but who had applied for or had acquired permanent residence status.

The hope was expressed that the Secretary-General would submit definite proposals in due course for dealing with the problem that had arisen with regard to the application of the principle of geographical distribution. The representatives of Argentina, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, India, Poland and the Union of South Africa, among others, considered that international officials should be true representatives of the culture and personality of the country of which they were nationals, and that those who elected to break their ties with that country could no longer claim to fulfil the conditions governing employment in the United Nations.

The representative of the Secretary-General stated that definite proposals had not yet been submitted, since the Secretary-General had as yet no clear knowledge of how large the problem would be. Should any considerable number of internationally recruited staff members decide to retain their permanent residence status, the Secretary-General would report the matter to the General Assembly at its next session, together with specific proposals for dealing with the situation.

The representative of Czechoslovakia orally proposed that staff members at Headquarters having permanent residence status should be excluded, for the purposes of geographical distribution of the staff, from the quotas appropriate to their country of nationality and should be included for such purposes within the quota appropriate to the United States. He requested that this proposal should be voted on in two parts. As the first part of the proposal was rejected by 18 votes to 18, with 10 abstentions, it was ruled that the proposal as a whole had failed of adoption.

The Fifth Committee, however, accepted, by 20 votes to 16, with 13 abstentions, an alternative proposal by the representative of Lebanon to the effect that, for purposes of applying the criterion of equitable geographical distribution as required by Article 101 of the Charter, staff members of a nationality other than that of the host country who acquired permanent residence status in the host country should be classified in a special category.

It was the understanding of the Fifth Committee that its decisions on the second part of the Secretary-General's report (A/2533) should be recorded in its report to the General Assembly (A/2615) for the guidance of the Secretary-General in giving effect to the policies thus approved through appropriate amendments to the staff rules.

(5) Resolutions Adopted by the General Assembly

The report of the Fifth Committee (A/2615) was considered by the General Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December. The only representative to comment on the report was the representative of Uruguay. He considered that some of the changes recommended in regulation 9.1 (a) gave the Secretary-General excessive discretionary powers which might open the way for possible arbitrary action and injustice sometime in the future.

The Assembly adopted the draft resolutions proposed by the Fifth Committee as follows: the first resolution by 50 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions; the second by 50 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions; and the third, unanimously. Their texts (782 A, B and C (VIII)) read:

AMENDMENTS TO THE STAFF REGULATIONS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

"The General Assembly

"Adopts, as amendments to the Staff Regulations of the United Nations, the text annexed to the present resolution. These amendments shall become effective from the date of their adoption."

ANNEX

Staff regulation 1.4 (amended text)

Members of the Secretariat shall conduct themselves at all times in a manner befitting their status as international civil servants. They shall not engage in any activity that is incompatible with the proper discharge of their duties with the United Nations. They shall avoid any action and in particular any kind of public pronouncement which may adversely reflect on their status, or on the integrity, independence and impartiality which are required by that status. While they are not expected to give up their national sentiments or their political and religious convictions, they shall at all times bear in mind the reserve and tact incumbent upon them by reason of their international status.

Staff regulation 1.7 (amended text)

Staff members may exercise the right to vote but shall not engage in any political activity which is inconsistent with or might reflect upon the independence and impartiality required by their status as international civil servants.

Staff regulation 9.1 (a) (additional provisions)

The Secretary-General may also, giving his reasons therefor, terminate the appointment of a staff member who holds a permanent appointment:

(i) If the conduct of the staff member indicates that the staff member does not meet the highest standards of integrity required by Article 101, paragraph 3, of the Charter;

(ii) If facts anterior to the appointment of the staff member and relevant to his suitability come to light which, if they had been known at the time of his appointment, should, under the standards established in the Charter, have precluded his appointment.

No termination under sub-paragraphs (i) and (ii) shall take place until the matter has been considered and reported on by a special advisory board appointed for that purpose by the Secretary-General.

Finally, the Secretary-General may terminate the appointment of a staff member who holds a permanent appointment if such action would be in the interest of the good administration of the Organization and in accordance with the standards of the Charter, provided that the action is not contested by the staff member concerned.

Staff regulation 9.3 (additional paragraph to become sub-paragraph (b))

(b) The Secretary-General may, where the circumstances warrant and he considers it justified, pay to a staff member terminated under the final paragraph of staff regulation 9.1(a) a termination indemnity payment not more than 50 per cent higher than that which would otherwise be payable under the Staff Regulations.

AMENDMENT TO THE STATUTE OF THE UNITED NATIONS ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

"The General Assembly

"Adopts, as an amendment to the Statute of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal, the text annexed to the present resolution. This amendment shall become effective from the date of its adoption."

ANNEX

Article 9 (amended text)

1. If the Tribunal finds that the application is well founded, it shall order the rescinding of the decision contested or the specific performance of the obligation invoked. At the same time the Tribunal shall fix the amount of compensation to be paid to the applicant for the injury sustained should the Secretary-General, within thirty days of the notification of the judgment, decide, in the interest of the United Nations, that the applicant shall be compensated without further action being taken in his case; provided that such compensation shall not exceed the equivalent of two years' net base salary of the applicant. The Tribunal may, however, in exceptional cases, when it considers it justified, order the payment of a higher indemnity. A statement of the reasons for the Tribunal's decision shall accompany each such order.

2. Should the Tribunal find that the procedure prescribed in the Staff Regulations or Staff Rules has not been observed, it may, at the request of the Secretary-General and prior to the determination of the merits, order the case remanded for institution or correction of the required procedure. Where a case is remanded the Tribunal may order the payment of compensation, not to exceed the equivalent of three months' net base salary, to the applicant for such loss as may have been caused by the procedural delay.

3. In all applicable cases, compensation shall be fixed by the Tribunal and paid by the United Nations or, as appropriate, by the specialized agency participating under article 12.

REVIEW OF THE STAFF REGULATIONS OF THE UNITED NATIONS, INCLUDING THE PRINCIPLES AND STANDARDS APPLIED IN THEIR IMPLEMENTATION

"The General Assembly

"1. Decides to undertake, at its tenth session in 1955, on the basis of a report to be submitted by the Secretary-General and of the comments thereon of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, including their recommendations as to such further action as may be required of the General Assembly, a review both of the principles and standards progressively developed and applied by the Secretary-General in his implementation of the Staff Regulations and of the Staff Regulations themselves;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to circulate to the governments of Member States, not later than four weeks before the opening date of the tenth session of the General Assembly, the report and comments referred to in paragraph 1 above."

4. Staff Regulations of the United Nations: Question of a Probationary Period

In resolution 682 (VII)⁷⁶ of 21 December 1952, the General Assembly asked the Secretary-General to submit, through the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, a final proposal on the question of a probationary period for consideration by the Assembly at its eighth session.

In his report to the eighth session (A/2591), the Secretary-General stated that he had consulted with the executive heads and the administrative representatives of the specialized agencies, with whom agreement had been reached, in principle, that all permanent appointments should be preceded by a trial period of service, either in the form of a specific period of probation or on a fixed-term basis, for one or two years. He said that the experience gained in the Secretariat during the past years had led to the conclusion that a period of two years was normally necessary for a proper and accurate assessment of the fitness for permanent appointment of a newly appointed staff member. Provision should also be made for the possibility of extending that period in special cases for one additional year.

Accordingly he proposed an additional paragraph to be included in staff regulation 4.5, as follows:

"(b) The Secretary-General shall prescribe which staff members are eligible for permanent appointments. The probationary period for granting or confirming a permanent appointment shall normally not exceed two years, provided that in individual cases the Secretary-General may extend the probationary period for not more than one additional year."

The Advisory Committee, in a memorandum (A/2592) addressed to the Secretary-General, agreed with the proposed text subject to certain observations. These were to the effect that the words "granting or confirming" were used in the sense that a staff member intended for the career service would normally hold a temporary appointment of a probationary nature for an initial period of two or—in exceptional cases—three years and would then either be granted a permanent appointment or his temporary appointment would be terminated and he would be separated from the service. The phrase "or confirming" it was understood, was inserted for the sole purpose of covering any exceptional cases in which a permanent appointment was granted, subject to confirmation, either on initial appointment or at any time during the probationary period. The Advisory Committee also noted that the full effect of the proposed addition to staff regulation 4.5 was intended to apply to staff appointed after 1 January 1954.

The question was considered by the Fifth Committee at its 420th meeting on 3 December, and by the General Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December. The Fifth Committee, without discussion, unanimously approved the text proposed by the Secretary-General for staff regulation 4.5 (b), and on its recommendation (A/2613), the General Assembly, without discussion and without objection, adopted the text as resolution 781(VIII).

5. United Nations Administrative Tribunal

a. JUDGMENTS OF THE TRIBUNAL

On 21 August 1953, the Administrative Tribunal, in Geneva, rendered judgments (Judgments Nos. 18-38, AT/DEC/18-38) in the cases of 21 former United Nations staff members of United States nationality who contended that their discharge was illegal. Ten of these cases related to terminations of temporary appointments, ten to terminations of permanent appointments and one to the summary dismissal for serious misconduct of a staff member who held a permanent appointment.

The Tribunal sustained the termination action of the Secretary-General in nine cases involving temporary appointments and rejected the claims of the individual applicants.

The Tribunal decided in favour of the terminated staff members in ten cases concerning permanent appointments and in one case concerning a temporary appointment. It declared, inter alia, that with respect to the cases concerning permanent appointments staff regulation 9.1(a), on termination for unsatisfactory services, and regulation 10.2, on summary dismissal for serious misconduct, did not apply. Even if it were admitted that the plea of constitutional privilege invoked by the staff members in respect of acts outside their professional duties constituted a breach of staff regulation 1.4, relating to political activity, this could not be construed as "unsatisfactory services", a term used solely to designate professional behaviour within the Organization, nor could it be held to constitute serious misconduct. In the case concerning a temporary appointment, it was ruled that staff regulation 1.4 recognizes the right of staff members not to give up their political opinions and that, in this case, the termination decision on the basis of staff regulation 9.1(c) represented a misuse of power and was therefore invalid. Reinstatement was ordered in four cases and payment of compensation in lieu of reinstatement, as requested by the applicants, was ordered in seven cases.

The Tribunal decided with respect to the summary dismissal that the proceedings of the Joint Appeals Board in the case had not been valid, that consequently the submission of the case to the Administrative Tribunal was not regular and that it should be re-submitted to the Joint Appeals Board.

In the seven cases where compensation was ordered in lieu of reinstatement, the Tribunal awarded: (1) full salary up to the date of judgment ($53,798) less the amount paid at termination in lieu of notice ($16,640) and less also the amount of termination indemnity ($32,460); (2) compensation in lieu of reinstatement in varying amounts totalling $122,500; and (3) legal costs totalling $2,100. In one case, an additional obligation estimated at $1,600 represented an award for pension entitlement.

In the case regarding the summary dismissal, the Tribunal awarded legal costs of $300.

Under the Statute of the Tribunal, the Secretary-General has the option of refusing reinstatement if he considers it inadvisable, in which case the Tribunal decides on the amount of compensation. In the exercise of the powers granted him by the Tribunal's Statute, the Secretary-General decided not to reinstate the applicants in the four cases (Judgments Nos. 18, 30, 32 and 38) where reinstatement was ordered by the Tribunal. By a letter of 2 September, the Secretary-General informed the President of the Tribunal that he had decided that it would be inadvisable from the points of view which it was his duty to take into consideration to reinstate the persons concerned.

Proceedings to determine the amounts of compensation in the four cases then took place before the Tribunal, and four judgments (Judgments Nos. 39-42, AT/DEC/39-42) were rendered, in London, on 13 October. The Tribunal awarded: (1) full salary up to the date of judgment ($30,-228) less the amount paid at termination in lieu of notice ($6,574) and less also the amount of termination indemnity ($14,911); (2) compensation in lieu of reinstatement amounting to $48,230; and (3) legal costs totalling $1,200.

On 11 December, the Tribunal, at United Nations Headquarters, rendered judgments (Judgments Nos. 43-50, AT/DEC/43-50) in the cases of eight former United Nations staff members wishing reinstatement. Six of these cases concerned the termination of temporary appointments, and two concerned the non-renewal of fixed-term appointments. Rescission of the Secretary-General's decision to terminate the employment, reinstatement and compensation, in the majority of the cases, were requested by the applicants.

The Tribunal stated that the staff rules and regulations then in force provided that the Secretary-General might terminate temporary appointments if, in his opinion, such action would be in the interest of the United Nations, and that fixed-term appointments were regarded as temporary appointments. The Tribunal noted that the Secretary-General had, in all instances, accepted the recommendations of the Walters Selection Committee regarding the applicants concerned. The Tribunal explained that the function of the Walters Committee was to make recommendations to the Secretary-General as to which temporary staff should (1) be granted permanent appointment, (2) be placed on a further probationary period of one year, or (3) be terminated. The Tribunal noted that the Committee was an internal administrative body, established by, and functioning in the way approved by the Secretary-General in order to render him advice; it was not for the Tribunal to express an opinion on internal administrative practices adopted by the Secretary-General. The Tribunal rejected all the claims put forward by the applicants.

The Tribunal, also on 11 December, rendered a judgment (Judgment No. 51, AT/DEC/51) correcting a material error in Judgment Number 37 of 21 August 1953. In that Judgment the Tribunal had awarded the applicant $10,000 damages to cover the period from the date of the judgment until the date on which she would normally have retired on pension, on 12 March 1955. The Tribunal in its Judgment of 11 Deember stated that it was now clear that the wrong date of birth and statement as to age was submitted to it by both parties and as it had had no opportunity of being made aware of the true facts prior to its Judgment of 21 August, it had no option but to correct that Judgment in the light of accurate facts belatedly produced. The Tribunal accordingly ordered that the amount of compensation provided in Judgment No. 37, which was specifically related to age and date of birth, be amended so that for the sum of $10,000 there be substituted the amended sum of $3,500. The date from which the applicant should be paid the pension referred to was amended from 12 March 1955 to 12 March 1954. The Tribunal declined to examine the request of the counsel for the applicant for a general reconsideration of the question of remedial relief.

The fifth plenary session of the Administrative Tribunal was held at United Nations Headquarters on 3 December.

b. QUESTION OF THE PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION AWARDED BY THE TRIBUNAL

In discussing at its eighth session the supplementary estimates for the financial year 1953, the General Assembly had before it a report by the Secretary-General (A/2534) which, among other things, estimated that an additional $179,420 would be required for the awards of compensation ordered by the Administrative Tribunal in the case of some eleven staff members whose appointments had been terminated during 1953.

The Secretary-General stated in his report, inter alia, that, as Chief Administrative Officer of the Organization, he was himself obviously bound by the decisions of the Tribunal and it was not for him to discuss the findings of the Tribunal as concerns the facts or as concerns the interpretations given to the relevant rules. He therefore had proposed the appropriation of the necessary funds. Since the Tribunal was not set up by the Charter, but by a special decision of the Assembly, it did not have the position of an organ with constitutional origin and independence, he continued. However, the creation of the Tribunal, with the safeguards from the legal point of view that it offered to the staff in questions of implementation of the staff regulations, introduced an important element in the contractual relations between the Organization and its employees. For that reason, he stated, the decisions of the Tribunal in the cases which had been submitted to it had as their basis, not only the unilateral decision of the Assembly by which the Tribunal was set up, but also the current contractual relationship between the Organization and its employees as established by that decision. Finally, it should be kept in mind that the administrative authority of the Secretary-General as concerns the employment of staff, according to the letter and spirit of the provisions of the Charter, was limited by regulations established by the Assembly and that, although the Assembly was entrusted with establishing the standards of employment on the basis of the Charter provisions, the compatibility of those standards with the letter of the staff regulations fell inside the competence of the Administrative Tribunal.

In its 24th report to the eighth session (A/2580), the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions concurred in this proposed appropriation on the grounds that the Secretary-General's action in including this provision was in accordance with the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal.

During its discussions of the supplementary estimates, at its 420th to 423rd and 425th to 427th meetings from 3 to 5 and 7 to 8 December, the Fifth Committee gave primary consideration to the awards of compensation.

The United States representative declared that it was the considered judgment of his Government that, in ruling that the Secretary-General had acted illegally in terminating eleven members of the staff and awarding those staff members more than $185,000 in monetary compensation, the Administrative Tribunal had made serious errors prejudicial to the interests of the United Nations.

Under the Charter, the Secretary-General was responsible for appointing and maintaining a Secretariat of the highest quality and was entitled to the Assembly's confidence in carrying out his obligations. His powers should not be infringed upon by a subordinate administrative body of the General Assembly.

The concern of the United States Government, its representative said, was all the greater owing to the circumstances of the case. The staff members involved were United States citizens who had refused to answer the questions of a duly constituted United States Senate sub-committee concerning espionage, subversive activities or United States Communist Party membership. The Tribunal had reversed the Secretary-General's findings that their conduct in refusing to answer the questions warranted dismissal and had decided that the United Nations, to whose budget the United States made such a large contribution, should pay large sums of money to those individuals.

The fact that the United States was the host country of the United Nations meant that the attention of United States citizens were focused upon their fellow nationals in the United Nations Secretariat. They could not conceive that the United Nations could be basically sound if it knowingly employed United States citizens who flouted the responsibilities of United States citizenship and were not prepared to deny under oath their involvement in subversive activities. The United States would therefore oppose the appropriation of funds to make the payments awarded by the Tribunal, for the following basic reasons: (1) the General Assembly had the legal right and responsibility to review and to refuse to give effect to decisions of the Administrative Tribunal; (2) the Tribunal had misconstrued its role and exceeded its proper powers; (3) the Tribunal had made serious errors of law in its application of the staff regulations; and (4) the Tribunal had made errors of judgment and fact in calculating the amount of the awards.

With regard to the first point, the United States representative said, among other things, that the decisions of the Administrative Tribunal were not the decisions of a court, but of an administrative body subsidiary to and created by the General Assembly. Under the Charter, the General Assembly was responsible with the Secretary-General for maintaining a Secretariat meeting the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity and had not intended in creating the Tribunal to evade that responsibility. The Tribunal had been established by the General Assembly to carry out certain functions assigned to it. It would be conceded readily, the United States representative said, that the General Assembly could change the Statute of the Tribunal or could abolish it. Surely, then, the General Assembly could take the lesser step of reviewing the Tribunal's decisions and could take action to correct the result of those decisions if the Tribunal went beyond the limits of the jurisdiction allotted to it.

A further basis for the right of the General Assembly to review the Tribunal's decisions under discussion, the United States representative maintained, was that the money for the awards had to be appropriated by the General Assembly as part of the United Nations budget, which had to be considered and approved by the Assembly. In order to fulfil its responsibility of considering and approving the appropriation, the Assembly not only could, but was bound to review the decisions of the Tribunal; it could not relinquish its power to make appropriations to a small group of four individuals, no matter how carefully they had been chosen. Thus, it was not only the right, but the duty of the Assembly to review the decisions of the Tribunal and decide upon their soundness.

With regard to the second point, the United States representative stated that it was clear from the records that the General Assembly in creating the Tribunal had intended it to have authority to review decisions of the Secretary-General in disciplinary matters in order to determine whether they had been taken in accordance with procedures set forth in the staff regulations. It appeared also to have intended it to have authority to review those actions for the purpose of determining whether there was evidence compelling a conclusion that the action by the Secretary-General had been taken in bad faith or had been wholly arbitrary without any basis in fact or reason. But it had not intended the Tribunal to have authority equal or superior to that of the Secretary-General to determine what standards of conduct were to be applied to staff members or to determine whether or not staff members had failed to meet those standards; nor to try disciplinary cases de novo; nor to substitute its judgment concerning the facts or the assessment of the gravity of an offence for that of the Secretary-General. The Tribunal was competent to deal with cases involving alleged breach of the staff member's terms of employment, including questions relating to the observance of the terms of contracts or appointments, but was not competent to inquire into the wisdom of the Secretary-General's exercise of his discretionary powers. The Tribunal had invaded the Secretary-General's jurisdiction and had substituted its evaluation of the facts and its assessment of the gravity of the offence for those of the Secretary-General. It had made no effort to confine its consideration to the question of whether the Secretary-General had exercised his judgment arbitrarily or in bad faith. That usurpation of the Secretary-General's functions had not been intended by the General Assembly when it had established the Tribunal.

With reference to the third point, the United States representative argued, inter alia, that the dismissed employees had been guilty of serious misconduct as charged by the Secretary-General. By refusing to answer questions put by proper authorities of the United States Government concerning subversive activities, the dismissed employees had raised a serious question concerning their integrity. Both the United Nations Charter and the staff regulations required the highest standards of integrity for all employees and when any staff member had so placed his integrity in doubt he could not measure up to the standards required for United Nations employment. His action in so doing should obviously be classified as serious misconduct warranting his immediate dismissal.

In regard to the fourth point, the awards, said the representative of the United States, varied from a minimum of less than one half of one year's salary to a maximum of more than three-and-a-half times one year's salary and the reasons given for the variations were conflicting, inconsistent and often merely capricious. For example, in some cases the Tribunal had considered the age factor, and in others not; in some cases it had taken into account certain favourable or adverse comments made by the United States State Department to the Secretary-General, and in others not; and in some cases it had made allowance for alleged employment expectations, and in others not.

The representatives of Argentina, Australia, China, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Liberia and Turkey also opposed the appropriations. They expressed the view, broadly speaking, that the General Assembly had the authority to decline to accept the findings of the Administrative Tribunal or to vary the amount of compensation awarded by the latter. They argued that the Tribunal had been established not under the provisions of the Charter, but by a special decision of the General Assembly. The Tribunal was therefore not in the position of an organ with constitutional origin and independence, and could not, as a subsidiary organ, create obligations binding upon the General Assembly. The Tribunal was subject to the Assembly's control; if the Assembly considered the Tribunal had exceeded its competence, it had a duty to put the matter right, and it could, in particular, refuse to pay certain compensation awarded by the Tribunal. They stated that it would be inadmissible for decisions of the chief administrative officer of the Organization, on whom the Charter conferred considerable responsibilities, to be subject to control by a subsidiary organ. If the Tribunal's competence were to be so far extended that it could deal with any disciplinary action taken by the Secretary-General in the interests of the Organization, the Secretary-General would be obliged to submit the administration of his staff to the Tribunal's scrutiny, which was obviously not the General Assembly's intention in establishing the Tribunal.

Those representatives felt that the decisions of the Administrative Tribunal were based on errors of fact and law. Some of the awards, they argued, were manifestly excessive, and if effect were given to them serious inequality of treatment amongst the applicants would result. The decisions, besides trespassing on the disciplinary powers of the Secretary-General, exposed the host country to serious risks and obliged it to contribute to the payment of compensation to persons lacking the impartiality and integrity required of international civil servants. The terminations to which the Tribunal's decisions related had been effected in order to protect the international civil service. The case of the staff members in question might be compared with that of those conscientious staff members who, after many years of service, retired on small pensions; such a comparison suggested that the Tribunal had placed a sort of premium on serious misconduct. Such judgments had a lamentable effect on public opinion and were harmful to the fundamental interests of the United Nations.

Other representatives, including those of Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, India, Lebanon, Mexico, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Sweden, Syria, the USSR, the United Kingdom, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, considered that the Administrative Tribunal's judgments when given in accordance with its Statute were final and without appeal and that the General Assembly was bound to pay the awards fixed by the Tribunal.

The Administrative Tribunal, they said, was an independent tribunal established by the General Assembly to ensure for staff members the security of employment and relief from political pressure which were essential if the Organization were to have international civil servants possessing the outstanding qualifications required by the Charter. By its very nature, the Tribunal was more like an independent judicial body than an ordinary organ of the General Assembly. For example, the Tribunal, inter alia, was the only organ which did not have to submit an annual report to the General Assembly, and its competence had been extended to the specialized agencies.

In the opinion of these representatives the Tribunal had not, in the cases in question, exceeded its competence and its judgments were in accordance with the staff regulations and rules in force at the time the judgments were given. It was true that the Assembly could amend those regulations and also the provisions of the Tribunal's Statute, but so long as the regulations and provisions remained in force they formed part of the staff member's terms of employment.

The Tribunal, they held, had not acted on false evidence, misinterpreted the staff regulations nor substituted its discretion for that of the Secretary-General. Any interference with the Tribunal's de-isions would impair its position irretrievably, undermine the morale of the staff and affect the contractual relationship between the staff and the Organization.

There was no principle of law, it was argued, that could justify a refusal to pay compensation already awarded by the Administrative Tribunal and, for the sake of the prestige of the United Nations, the General Assembly could not but comply with the Tribunal's judgments. To refuse to do so would set a precedent dangerous to the moral authority of the United Nations, and one which might influence the future attitude of Member States or individuals when judgments of international or national judicial bodies went against them.

As regards the financial implications, no one would contest the power of the General Assembly to approve or to refuse appropriations, but the power to appropriate funds could hardly be adduced as ground for refusing to fulfil a financial obligation devolving on the United Nations by virtue of one of its statutes.

Some representatives, including those of Canada and Colombia, while supporting the principle of payment, nevertheless expressed misgivings as to the size of the awards. However, they held that the questions involved should be referred to a competent judicial body.

In view of the diversity of opinion, the representatives of Canada, Colombia and the United Kingdom proposed (A/C.5/L.263) that the Assembly should ask the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion on the following legal questions:

"(i) Having regard to the Statute of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal and to any other relevant instruments and to the relevant records, has the General Assembly the right on any grounds to refuse to give effect to an award of compensation made by that Tribunal in favour of a staff member of the United Nations whose contract of service has been terminated without his assent?

"(ii) If the answer given by the Court to question (i) is in the affirmative, what are the principal grounds upon which the General Assembly could lawfully exercise such a right?"

The representatives of China, Turkey and the United States spoke against the draft resolution as unnecessary on the ground that there was no question of the Assembly's powers, but abstained in the vote. The representatives of Czechoslovakia and the USSR also opposed it since, in their opinion, the Statute of the Tribunal was clear on the issues involved and the Tribunal had acted in accordance with its Statute. The Argentine representative expressed the view that the Court should also consider whether a subsidiary organ could impose final decisions upon the Assembly and whether the Assembly was empowered to deal with the form and substance of any appropriation to be included in the United Nations budget. He subsequently voted for the draft resolution on the understanding that these points would be taken into consideration.

The representative of France submitted two amendments (A/C.5/L/267) to the joint draft resolution:

(1) to delete from question (i) the words "on any grounds"; and

(2) to add as a part (b) to the second question the following: "do these grounds, whatever they may be, apply to any of the decisions which have led to the request for the appropriation?"

The representative of France further proposed (A/C.5/L/268/Rev.1) to add to resolution B contained in the draft report of the Fifth Committee on the budget estimates for the financial year 1954⁷⁷ (A.C/5/L.264) a sub-paragraph (g) which would have authorized the Secretary-General to enter into commitments to meet unforeseen and extraordinary expenses for the sums needed for payment of the compensations awarded by the Administrative Tribunal, and referred to in the request by the General Assembly for an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice, if the Court were of the opinion that the General Assembly had not the right to refuse to give effect to the said awards.

At the Committee's 427th meeting on 8 December an oral USSR proposal that the Committee should first vote on the proposal of the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee for the appropriation of the funds in question was rejected by a roll-call vote of 29 to 6, with 14 abstentions.

The Committee rejected the first French amendment to the joint draft resolution by a roll-call vote of 28 to 19, with 6 abstentions, and the second amendment, also by roll-call, by 22 votes to 15, with 17 abstentions. The joint draft resolution was adopted (A/2624 A) by a roll-call vote of 35 to 7, with 12 abstentions.

The French proposal concerning resolution B was voted upon in two parts by roll-call. The first part, which concerned the sums needed for the payment of the compensations awarded by the Administrative Tribunal, was adopted by 23 votes to 22, with 12 abstentions. The second part was rejected by 28 votes to 20, with 9 abstentions. The French proposal, as a whole, was then rejected by a roll-call vote of 25 to 19, with 13 abstentions.

The draft resolution recommended by the Fifth Committee (A/2624, resolution A) was adopted by the General Assembly, at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December 1953, by a roll-call vote of 41 to 6, with 13 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen.

Against: Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR.

Abstaining: Australia, China, Costa Rica, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Indonesia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Sweden, Turkey, United States, Yugoslavia.

In plenary session the representatives of France and New Zealand stated that they supported the principle of recourse to the Court in the case of legal disputes and had therefore voted in favour of the resolution, despite the deficiencies they considered the resolution contained as a result of the rejection of the French amendments. The representatives of Mexico, Uruguay and Sweden explained their abstentions on the grounds that the questions submitted to the Court were too abstract and that, in their opinion, the Tribunal's findings were final.

The resolution adopted (785 A (VIII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering the request for a supplementary appropriation of $179,420, made by the Secretary-General in his report for the purpose of covering the awards made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal in eleven cases numbered 26, and 37 to 46 inclusive,

"Considering the concurrence in that appropriation by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions contained in its twenty-fourth report to the eighth session of the General Assembly,

"Considering, nevertheless, that important legal questions have been raised in the course of debate in the Fifth Committee with respect to that appropriation,

"Decides

"To submit the following legal questions to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion:

'(1) Having regard to the Statute of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal and to any other relevant instruments and to the relevant records, has the General Assembly the right on any grounds to refuse to give effect to an award of compensation made by that Tribunal in favour of a staff member of the United Nations whose contract of service has been terminated without his assent?

'(2) If the answer given by the Court to question (1) is in the affirmative, what are the principal grounds upon which the General Assembly could lawfully exercise such a right?'"

6. Joint Appeals Board and Joint Disciplinary Committee

During 1953, the Joint Appeals Board reported to the Secretary-General on 20 cases of appeals, most of them relating to termination of temporary indefinite appointments. The Joint Disciplinary Committee considered two cases in 1953.

These two bodies, established in accordance with General Assembly resolution 352(IV),⁷⁸ to advise the Secretary-General in cases of appeal against administrative decisions or concerning proposed disciplinary action, respectively, are each composed of three members of the Secretariat, one appointed by the Secretary-General, one elected by the Staff Committee, and a Chairman appointed by the Secretary-General after consultation with the Staff Committee.

7. United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund

a. ANNUAL REPORT OF THE UNITED NATIONS JOINT STAFF PENSION BOARD FOR 1952

In pursuance of article XXXV of the regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund, the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board (composed of representatives appointed by the Staff Pension Committees of the member organizations of the Joint Fund) presented to the eighth session of the General Assembly of the United Nations and to the governing bodies of all organizations which are members of the Joint Fund, an annual report (A/2421) on the operation of the Joint Fund for 1952. The following organizations participated in the Joint Fund during the year: the United Nations, the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), the World Health Organization (WHO) and the World Meteorological Organization (WMO), the latter being admitted to the Joint Fund on 1 January 1952.

The report indicated that on 31 December 1952 the total active membership of the Joint Fund was 8,165. The number of withdrawal benefits paid in 1952 was 765 and, in addition, 25 retirement benefits, twelve widows' benefits, eighteen children's benefits and two disability benefits were authorized. The total expenditure on benefits during the year was $726,733, of which withdrawal benefits amounted to $634,744.

The principal of the Fund at the end of 1952 was $29,153,966. The investments at cost, adjusted for amortization of premiums and discounts, amounted to $28,730,196. The income from investment in common stocks was estimated at 4.87 per cent, and the average yield on United States Government Bonds and corporate bonds taken together was 2.73 per cent. (The rate of yield assumed in the construction of the Fund was 2.50 per cent per annum.)

The annual report was considered by the Fifth Committee at its 379th meeting on 30 September. The representative of Argentina pointed out that the highest yield of the Fund's investments in bonds was on bonds of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, but that less than 1 per cent of the total value of its investments were in bonds of the Bank. He wished that the Fund would invest larger sums in Bank bonds, as it would obtain a higher yield with complete security. He also hoped that it might be possible to include in the next annual report additional data concerning the Fund's investments.

At the end of the discussion the Fifth Committee adopted, without objection, a draft resolution proposed by the Committee Chairman. The General Assembly at its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November adopted, without objection and without discussion, this draft (A/2564) as resolution 770(VIII), taking note of the report of the Joint Staff Pension Board for 1952.

b. AMENDMENTS TO THE REGULATIONS OF THE UNITED NATIONS JOINT STAFF PENSION FUND

Under the terms of resolution 680(VII)⁷⁹ of 21 December 1952, amendments which had been proposed by the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board to articles XI (concerning summary dismissal for serious misconduct) and XVI (concerning contributions on account of participants on leave without pay) of the regulations of the Joint Staff Pension Fund were referred back to the Board for reconsideration at its next session, in the light of the observations presented by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and of the views expressed in the Fifth Committee on 6 December 1952. The Board was requested to consider, at the same time, the recommendation of the Advisory Committee concerning article XXVII to the effect that expenses incurred in administering the regulations should be charged to the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund, and to report to the Assembly.

These questions were considered by the Fifth Committee at its 379th meeting on 30 September. With respect to article XI, the Board, in its report to the Assembly (A/2422), stated that it had unanimously adopted a text under which a participant would be entitled to full benefits unless the Board should decide otherwise on the recommendation of the administrative head of the member organization concerned, instead of the participant being entitled only to reduced benefits unless the administrative head of the organization recommended otherwise. The Advisory Committee, however, in its observations on the Board's report (A/2489), expressed the opinion that article XI should be retained in its present form for at least two years, after which the revised proposal of the Board might be reconsidered in the light of the experience meanwhile acquired of the circumstances in which summary dismissals were ordered in the United Nations and other member organizations.

Certain representatives, including those of Argentina, Chile, the Netherlands and Uruguay, while agreeing that the situation might be reconsidered in the light of further experience, argued that the Board's revised text should be adopted since it would afford staff members a greater feeling of justice and security than that currently enjoyed and was in keeping with current legislation in many of the more socially advanced countries. While agreeing that the Board should not pass judgment on an administrative decision, they considered that it was entitled to concern itself with the effects of such a decision on the pension rights of a staff member and his family.

The representatives of, among others, Belgium, Iraq, Pakistan, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States, opposing the Board's revised text, argued that, under it, the Board would be obliged to deal with administrative matters outside its jurisdiction. They pointed out that the benefits under discussion were not social insurance benefits but those earned as a result of service rendered. These representatives supported the Advisory Committee's recommendation, particularly in view of the fact that the Secretary-General of the United Nations was given discretion, should he consider that the circumstances so justified, to recommend the payment to dismissed staff members of a sum equivalent to the whole or part of the amounts by which the benefits had been reduced. It would be advisable moreover, they said, to defer any far-reaching amendment until such time as further experience had been gained.

At the conclusion of the discussion, the Fifth Committee decided by 41 votes to 4, with 4 abstentions, to recommend to the Assembly the retention of article XI in its present form, as recommended by the Advisory Committee.

With respect to article XVI, the principal changes in the revised version, as explained by the Chairman of the Joint Staff Pension Board, were to make explicit the rights of a participant in the Fund when on leave without pay, including leave for reasons of the performance of military service. The Advisory Committee in its observations to the Assembly had recommended acceptance of the Board's proposal. The revised text, together with consequential changes in articles V (concerning disability benefits) and VII (concerning death benefits), was approved by the Fifth Committee without objection.

The Fifth Committee also considered a new proposal put forward by the Joint Staff Pension Board for an addition to article VII under which the same benefits as those provided under that article to the widow of a male participant would be provided to an incapacitated widower of a female participant. As there were no objections, this proposal was adopted, the additional paragraph to become paragraph 7 of article VII of the regulations.

The Fifth Committee then considered article XXVII (concerning administrative expenses). In its report to the Assembly (A/2422), the Board concluded that it was premature to decide, on the basis of the actuarial valuation as at December 1951, that the Fund itself should bear the expenses incurred in the administration of the regulations of the Fund and stated that it was the Board's intention to reconsider the proposal after the report on the next actuarial valuation of the Fund had been received. In its observations (A/2489), the Advisory Committee pointed out that the valuation as at 31 December 1951 had shown a margin which was more than sufficient to cover the estimated administrative expenses and that the average interest earnings of the Fund had always been higher than the figures used in the actuarial calculations and had, furthermore, continued to increase in recent years. It therefore recommended that article XXVII should be amended to provide for the administrative expenses being charged to the Fund and that such amendment should come into force not later than 1 January 1955. It further recommended that the estimates of the administrative expenses in question should continue thereafter to be submitted for approval to the Assembly.

The representatives of Argentina and the United Kingdom, supporting the recommendation of the Advisory Committee, maintained that it involved a principle of sound financial management, the implementation of which was fully justified, having regard to the existing margin between the computed and actual rate of contribution and to the Fund's generally satisfactory position. The representatives of Australia and the Union of South Africa, on the other hand, opposed the recommendation, holding that the margin of safety was not as great as the Advisory Committee's report suggested. Since an actuarial valuation, in their view, was of necessity only an approximation, an adequate margin of safety must be provided for.

The Advisory Committee's recommendation was approved by the Fifth Committee by 40 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions.

The draft resolution proposed by the Fifth Committee (A/2576) was considered by the General Assembly at its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November, and adopted, without discussion, by 49 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 772(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the recommendations proposed by the Joint Staff Pension Board in pursuance of article XXXVII of the Regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund, with respect to amendments and additions to be made to articles V, VII, XI, XVI and XXVII of the Regulations,

"1. Approves the amendments and additions to articles V, VII and XVI of the Regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund as set forth in the annex⁸⁰ to the present resolution and decides that the articles so amended shall take effect as from 1 January 1954;

"2. Approves the amendment to article XXVII of the Regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund as set forth in the annex to the present resolution and decides that the article so amended shall take effect as from 1 January 1955;

"3. Decides that article XI of the Regulations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund shall be retained in its present form for the time being and requests the Joint Staff Pension Board to re-examine its provisions and to report to the General Assembly at its tenth session."

c. ACCEPTANCE BY THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES OF THE JURISDICTION OF THE UNITED NATIONS ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL IN MATTERS INVOLVING APPLICATIONS ALLEGING NON-OBSERVANCE OF THE REGULATIONS OF THE UNITED NATIONS JOINT STAFF PENSION FUND

By resolution 678(VII)⁸¹ of 21 December 1952, the General Assembly recommended that the appropriate governing organs of the specialized agencies which are members of the Joint Staff Pension Fund should accept the jurisdiction of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal in matters involving applications alleging non-observance of Pension Fund regulations, and requested the Secretary-General to report on the matter.

The Secretary-General reported (A/2463) to the eighth session that the recommendation had been accepted by WHO, but that decisions were still pending in the case of the other specialized agencies concerned. Since most of these decisions would not be taken until late in 1953, and, in the case of UNESCO not until 1954, the Secretary-General suggested that the Assembly should take note of his interim report, request a further report through the Joint Staff Pension Board, and consider that report at its ninth session.

The Secretary-General's report was considered by the Fifth Committee at its 379th meeting on 30 September. The Committee adopted, without objection, a draft resolution recommended by the Committee Chairman and orally amended by the United States.

The Committee's draft resolution (A/2565) was adopted, without objection and without discussion, by the General Assembly at its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November as resolution 771(VIII). By it, the Assembly took note of the Secretary-General's interim report and requested a further report from the Secretary-General through the Joint Staff Pension Board.

d. ADMISSION OF STAFF MEMBERS OF THE INTERIM COMMISSION FOR THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE ORGANIZATION TO MEMBERSHIP IN THE UNITED NATIONS JOINT STAFF PENSION FUND

The United Nations Joint Staff Pension Board in its report (A/2422) also brought to the Assembly's attention a communication from the Executive Secretary of the Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization (ICITO) pointing out that the members of its staff were not participants in the Joint Fund, although ICITO had always been closely associated with United Nations administrative co-ordination schemes, and asking the Board to examine the possibility of recommending a procedure which would enable ICITO to become a member organization in the Joint Fund.

The Board referred to the Assembly the desirability of admitting ICITO since the Fund's regulations provide that only specialized agencies referred to in Article 57 of the United Nations Charter might become member organizations in the Fund. It recommended that, in the event of an affirmative Assembly decision, the matter should be referred back to the Board for recommendation as to consequential changes in the regulations.

The question was considered by the Fifth Committee at its 380th and 402nd meetings on 1 October and 5 November. At the 380th meeting, the Committee decided, on the recommendation of the representative of Egypt, that, before taking a decision on the principle of extending membership in the Fund, the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions should be asked to study and report on the matter.

The Advisory Committee reported (A/2524) that, in principle, it considered that membership in the Fund should be limited to specialized agencies fulfilling the conditions of the regulations. While recognizing that ICITO shared several of the characteristics of a specialized agency, the Committee was anxious lest a precedent for future, perhaps less justifiable, admissions should be created. Apart from this general consideration it was clear that no actuarial disadvantages would result from ICITO's membership. The Advisory Committee therefore recommended that, should the Fifth Committee find that special circumstances warranted the admission of ICITO, the consequential amendments to be drafted in consultation with the Joint Staff Pension Board should limit the rights of the Interim Commission to an associate membership not carrying with it representation with voting rights on the Joint Board.

The report of the Advisory Committee was considered by the Fifth Committee at its 402nd meeting. The Fifth Committee also had before it a joint draft resolution by Australia and Canada (A/C.5/L.247), which, its sponsors stated, was designed to authorize the admission of ICITO to membership in the Fund subject to the condition regarding voting rights as recommended by the Advisory Committee. They pointed out that the action recommended would present no financial difficulties, since the staff of ICITO already belonged to a provident fund financed in the same manner as the Joint Staff Pension Fund. Moreover, if membership were not authorized, the Interim Commission would be obliged to proceed with the establishment of a pension fund of its own—a situation which should be avoided in the interests of the policy of administrative and budgetary co-ordination. Membership would also enable the Interim Commission's staff to benefit from the experience which the Joint Board had acquired.

The representatives of Brazil, Cuba, Egypt, France, Israel and the Netherlands supported the joint draft, expressing similar views.

The representatives of Argentina and the United Kingdom stated, however, that it would be setting a dangerous precedent to depart from the principle that specialized agencies alone should qualify for admission. ICITO, in their view, by virtue of its temporary character and the uncertainty as to its permanent status, clearly did not fulfil the conditions required by Article 57 of the Charter. They also expressed doubt as to whether actuarial disadvantages might not in fact arise if ICITO, after being admitted to the Fund, were to be dissolved. For these reasons, the representative of the United Kingdom orally proposed that further examination of the question should be deferred until the next Assembly session, by which time a decision would no doubt have been taken with regard to ICITO's future status.

The United Kingdom proposal was rejected by 20 votes to 16, with 11 abstentions. The joint draft resolution was then adopted by 30 votes to none, with 20 abstentions.

The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the necessary amendments to the Fund's regulations would first have to be formulated for the Assembly's approval at its ninth session. Admission would, however, be retroactive from the date of the first payment of contributions by ICITO.

The draft resolution recommended by the Fifth Committee (A/2576) was considered by the General Assembly at its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November, and adopted, without discussion, by 48 votes to none, with 10 abstentions, as resolution 773(VIII).

By it, the Assembly decided that, upon request of the competent authority, ICITO might be admitted to participation in the Joint Fund, but without voting rights. The Assembly requested that, upon the receipt of such a request on behalf of ICITO, the Joint Staff Pension Board prepare amendments to the Fund's regulations which would give effect to this decision and that it report to the Assembly's ninth session.

8. United Nations Interne Programmes

Two United Nations interne programmes were held in 1953. The third programme, usually held during the General Assembly, was omitted for budgetary reasons.

The first programme was held from 30 March to 22 May. Twenty-five internes from 19 countries participated in the programme, the specific purpose of which was to study the working methods and procedures of the United Nations Secretariat.

The second programme was for students, and was held in New York only; 29 students were selected from 26 countries; in addition there was one representative of a non-governmental organization, ten scholarship candidates and nine auditeurs libres, making a total of 49 students from 32 countries. The work of the group was again concentrated on the organization and procedures of the Secretariat, but they also had an opportunity to study the functioning of the General Assembly.

In the course of seven years, 642 internes from 58 countries have participated in these eight-week programmes.

I. BUDGETARY ARRANGEMENTS

1. financial Reports and Accounts and Reports of the Board of Auditors

a. UNITED NATIONS: YEAR 1952

At its eighth session, at the 451st plenary meeting on 5 October, the General Assembly, by 48 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions, adopted resolution 760(VIII), accepting the financial report and accounts of the United Nations for the financial year ended 31 December 1952 and the certificate of the Board of Auditors (A/2392). The Assembly also concurred in the observations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/2403) on the report. The resolution was adopted on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee (A/2492), which considered the question at its 378th meeting on 24 September.

The financial report and accounts stated that obligations incurred in 1952 amounted to $50,270,153 compared with total appropriations of $50,547,660, and were less than income credited for the year by $298,366. The balance on surplus account at 31 December 1952 was $1,313,853, of which $260,797 was transferred to the Working Capital Fund in 1953, $340,380 was credited to Members' contributions for 1953 and $712,676 was available for credit to Members against 1954 contributions.

In its observations, the Advisory Committee stated, inter alia, that it took note of the view expressed by the Board of Auditors, in connexion with adjustments of accounts of Member States, that it was undesirable indefinitely to continue a situation in which the finance officers of a Member were at variance with those of the United Nations. (The Board had called attention to discrepancies resulting from different exchange rates.) Where financial matters were concerned, the Committee stated, there was no established procedure for the settlement of such divergencies of view, and it suggested that the Assembly might wish to consider the desirability of adopting a procedure similar, perhaps, to existing arrangements for the arbitration of international disputes. The Advisory Committee also supported the Board's suggestion that a study might be made to determine the most efficient and economical means to control, finance and operate revenue-producing services.

b. UNITED NATIONS CHILDREN'S FUND (UNICEF): YEAR 1952

At the 451st plenary meeting on 5 October 1953, the General Assembly adopted, without objection, resolution 761(VIII), accepting the financial report and accounts of UNICEF for the financial year ended 31 December 1952 and the certificate of the Board of Auditors (A/2396). The Assembly also took note of the observations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/2455) on the report. The resolution was adopted on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee (A/2493), which considered the question at its 378th meeting on 24 September.

The financial report and accounts of UNICEF showed that the principal of the Fund on 1 January 1952 was $27,199,237.25. The income from all sources during 1952 was $10,271,793.24 and the expenditure during 1952 was $13,526,630.52. The excess of expenditure over income, representing decrease in principal of the Fund during 1952 was $3,254,837.28, leaving the principal of the Fund on 31 December 1952 at $23,944,399.97.

In its observations, the Advisory Committee declared that the information submitted in UNICEF's financial report showed that the administrative costs represented 13.8 per cent of the total expenditure. Annual expenditure on assistance had shown a progressive and sharp decrease since 1949 but a proportionate reduction in net administrative cost had not accompanied the decreased assistance. This apparent discrepancy was due in part to the change in policy directed by the Assembly in December 1950; the transition from mass-feeding to long-range health and welfare programmes had resulted in a considerable increase in the number of countries aided by the Fund as well as in the number of individual procurement contracts to be negotiated.

c. UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES IN THE NEAR EAST (UNRWA): YEAR ENDING 30 JUNE 1953

At the 458th plenary meeting on 27 November 1953, the General Assembly adopted, without objection, resolution 766 (VIII), accepting the accounts of UNRWA for the financial year ended 30 June 1953 and the certificate of the Board of Auditors (A/2491), and taking note of the observations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/2541) thereon. The resolution was adopted on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee (A/2568), which considered the question at its 404th meeting on 11 November.

The accounts concerned showed that the total income during the year under review amounted to $49,527,646 and the total expenditure to $26,778,934 ($23,400,729 being spent for the relief programme and $3,378,205 being spent for the projects programme), thus leaving an excess of income over expenditure of $22,748,712. With the addition of the balance of $22,590,729 on hand at 30 June 1952, the amount of $45,339,441 thus remained available for activities after 30 June 1953.

In its observations, the Advisory Committee stated, inter alia, that the new accounting system, which was introduced in July 1952, would continue in force for the financial year 1953-1954. Under this new system, expenditure was broken down into a number of categories in order to ensure, through a more accurate analysis and classification, that the cost of any function should be identified as far as possible with the programme for which it was incurred. It was expected that, with the completion of this process, the cost of common services would be reduced to a minimum, and that the amount of such services to be allocated between the two programmes (relief and projects) might approximate to the figure for general administration in the existing accounts. It followed that the accounting charges to the relief programme would be correspondingly increased, and the Advisory Committee trusted that this increase would not prove detrimental to the programme.

d. UNITED NATIONS KOREAN RECONSTRUCTION AGENCY (UNKRA): YEAR ENDING 30 JUNE 1953

At the 458th plenary meeting on 27 November, the General Assembly adopted, by 52 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, resolution 767 (VIII), accepting the financial report and accounts of UNKRA for the financial year ended 30 June 1953 and the certificate of the Board of Auditors

(A/2487). The Assembly also took note of the observations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/2542). The resolution was adopted on the recommendation of the Fifth Committee (A/2569), which considered the question at its 404th meeting on 11 November.

The accounts concerned showed that total income for the period under review amounted to $67,795,963 while total expenditure amounted to $52,964,159, leaving an excess of income over expenditure of $14,831,804 available, as of 30 June 1953, for future operations.

In its observations, the Advisory Committee, inter alia, noted that UNKRA's ratio of administrative costs to programme expenditure had improved, amounting during 1952-1953 to 3.11 per cent. Account was taken of the exceptional circumstances that had resulted in a long delay between the date of a donation of $100,000 received from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) for the purchase of a printing plant to produce textbooks in Korea and the actual undertaking of the project.

2. Supplementary Estimates for the Financial Year 1953

In a report (A/2534) to the eighth session of the General Assembly, the Secretary-General estimated that, in addition to the appropriation of $48,327,000 authorized for the financial year 1953, an additional net amount of $1,721,170 would be required. Of this supplementary provision $179,420 was estimated for the awards of compensation by the Administrative Tribunal⁸² and $1,800,000 for reimbursement of national income taxes. Other major items for which budgetary provision was requested included additional expenditures for political missions ($80,800), meetings of Assembly and Economic and Social Council committees, commissions and conferences ($57,100) and designations of ad hoc judges of the International Court of Justice ($10,000). The Secretary-General noted that no provision was included for expenses which might be incurred by the United Nations in connexion with the Korean political conference.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions in its 24th report to the eighth session of the General Assembly (A/2580) recommended the appropriation of the supplementary funds requested by the Secretary-General. The Advisory Committee noted that the Secretary-General planned further negotiations with the United States Government regarding the exemption of United States staff members from national taxation and recommended that he report to the next session on these negotiations, as well as on the general problem of national income taxes.

The Fifth Committee considered the Secretary-General's report and the report of the Advisory Committee at its 420th to 423rd and 425th to 427th meetings from 3 to 5 and 7 and 8 December. Discussion was concerned primarily with the payment of awards of compensation ordered by the Administrative Tribunal.

During the debate, the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR referred to the supplementary request of $1,800,000, representing the estimated total to be reimbursed to certain staff members in respect of their income tax liability on 1953 emoluments. They reiterated their strong opposition to the appropriation of funds for this purpose, and considered that the increasingly heavy charge added to the United Nations budget was entirely unwarranted. In answer to a question addressed to him by the representative of Czechoslovakia, the Secretary-General informed the Committee that no reply had yet been received to the communication he had recently addressed to the Government of the United States, calling attention to the terms of relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and urging that all possible remedial steps should be taken. The Secretary-General further stated that it was his intention to submit for the consideration of the Fifth Committee and of the General Assembly at its ninth session a definite proposal which he hoped would go far towards solving existing problems. The Committee decided that a paragraph to this effect should be inserted in the Rapporteur's Report (A/2624).

A separate vote was requested by the Egyptian representative on the proposed provision of $1,800,000 for reimbursement of national income taxes and the Committee approved, by 27 votes to 7, with 16 abstentions, the inclusion of this sum in the 1953 supplementary estimates.

The Committee noted that the supplementary estimates under review modified a number of budget sections as compared with the appropriation for those sections adopted at the seventh session of the General Assembly. While appreciating the difficulty in estimating with precision budget estimates which had to be prepared well before the opening of the financial year to which they related, it urged the necessity of ensuring a strict control on expenditure throughout the working year so that transfer actions might be kept to a minimum.

In the light of its decision regarding the payment of compensation awarded by the Tribunal⁸³

the Committee decided, by 46 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, to recommend (A/2624 B) to the General Assembly that the amount of $48,327,700 appropriated for the financial year 1953 by resolution 674(VII), adopted on 21 December 1952, should be increased by $1,541,750, instead of by $1,721,170.

The draft resolution was adopted by the General Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December 1953, without discussion, by 52 votes to 5, as resolution 785 B (VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly

"Resolves that the amount of $48,327,700 appropriated for the financial year 1953 by resolution 674 (VII), adopted on 21 December 1952, is increased by $1,541,750 as follows:

(See table on pp. 93-94)

3. Budget of the United Nations for 1954⁸⁴

The Secretary-General submitted to the eighth session of the General Assembly budget estimates for 1954 and information annexes (A/2383 & Add.1) totalling $48,123,400, with an income estimated at $6,463,200, leaving a net estimated expenditure for the year of $41,660,200. The gross estimate of $48,123,400 for 1954 compared with an approved budget of $48,327,700 for 1953 and a total expenditure of $50,270,153 for 1952.

The total number of posts proposed amounted to 4,099, compared with 4,095 the preceding year. Thus, the Secretary-General stated, the intention of achieving stability in the regular international Secretariat and of working, together with other United Nations agencies, to complete assigned tasks without necessarily increasing staff was being carried forward progressively.

The main features of the 1954 estimates were reflected in the following table, which showed a comparison, part-by-part with the 1953 appropriations:

Under Part I, sessions of the General Assembly, councils, commissions and committees, the decrease of $148,000 was mainly a reflection of the economies resulting from Economic and Social Council resolution 414(XIII) on organization and operation of the Council and its commissions, and was also due to the permanent transfer of technical staff from Headquarters to the Geneva Office, enabling a reduction in staff travel costs.

The total increase of $291,800 under the provision for Headquarters (Part III) reflected additional staff costs, including within-grade salary increments, the filling of posts left vacant during 1953, the provision of Spanish as a working language of the Economic and Social Council, and common staff costs.

A considerable portion of the increase for the European Office of the United Nations at Geneva (Part IV) was due to the transfer of posts from Headquarters and the removal of a 5 per cent salary differential formerly applied to salaries of staff at Geneva.

While provision for the Information Centres showed an increase of $37,500 (Part V), due almost wholly to the cost of within-grade salary increments, the Secretary-General proposed to reduce expenditures for some Centres in order to allow for the opening of two additional sub-centres, one in Greece and the other in Colombia.

Normal salary increments, a rise in local wage scales, rising prices and adverse exchange rates were the principal reasons for the increase of $181,100 in the estimates for the two regional economic commissions (under Part VI).

Finally, the Secretary-General reported, the increase of $147,800 in the estimates for the International Court of Justice (Part XI) was due to the proposed establishment of a pension fund for the judges.

As in previous years, the budget estimates prepared by the Secretary-General were reviewed by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions. In its first, fourth and fifth reports to the eighth session of the General Assembly (A/2403, A/2499 and A/2501), the Advisory Committee recommended an over-all reduction of $843,800 in the Secretary-General's gross estimates for 1954. It noted that commendable efforts had been made during the past two years toward stabilizing the budget at a level to ensure the orderly execution of essential projects without imposing on Members an unduly heavy financial burden. Any major reduction in expenses, the Committee recognized, could be achieved only in conjunction with a review of future work programmes and with a reorganization of administrative services.

The Advisory Committee called special attention to the volume of documentation produced by the Organization and, though recognizing that substantial efforts had been made to reduce this, believed that much remained to be done. It recommended a reduction of $200,000 in the estimate for 1954 printing costs, the largest single reduction proposed by the Committee.

With respect to the number of established posts on the Secretariat in relation to work programmes, the Committee felt that a revision of the administrative structure combined with a review of programmes and projects might lead to major economies. It considered that the number of senior posts in many cases was too large in proportion to the number of subordinate posts.

The Advisory Committee suggested greater versatility among staff members to help overcome high expenditures for temporary assistance and consultants. It suggested that the Secretary-General might undertake, prior to the submission of the 1955 estimates, a critical examination of such requirements.

It concurred with the proposal of the Secretary-General to maintain the Working Capital Fund at the level of $21,500,000 for 1954, and also with a related proposal that the provision for unforeseen and extraordinary expenses should continue to be the subject of a separate resolution.

The report of the Advisory Committee itemized, by departments, the various reductions proposed and presented detailed recommendations on each section of the estimates.

Also before the Committee were a statement of the 1953 budget expenses to 30 September (A/-

C.5/547) and revised estimates: (1) reflecting decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council at its fifteenth and sixteenth sessions (A/C.5/542); (2) for the holding of the 1954 session of the International Law Commission at Geneva (A/C.5/555); (3) for the acquisition and operation of radio transmitters at Headquarters and Geneva (A/C.5/559); (4) for the enlargement of the dining room and cafeteria facilities (A/C.5/557),⁸⁵ as well as detailed estimates for various field missions under section 5 (see below, budget as adopted) for which only a token global provision had been presented in the original budget estimates. The Committee had before it the reports of the Advisory Committee on these items (A/2522 & Corr.1; A/2549-A/2552; A/2557; A/2583-A/2585; A/2594-A/2598)—8th, 16th-19th, 22nd, 27th-29th, 31st-35th reports to the eighth session.

The Fifth Committee at its 379th to 391st, 396th to 401st, 403rd to 406th, 411th, 424th, and 426th meetings on 30 September, 1, 2, 6, 7, 9, 12 to 15 and 26 to 29 October, 2, 3, 6, 11, 16, 18, and 24 November and 5, 7 December 1953 considered the United Nations budget estimates for 1954 as submitted by the Secretary-General and reviewed by the Advisory Committee.

Preceding the general discussion on the estimates, the Committee heard statements by the Secretary-General (A/C.5/544) and by the Chairman of the Advisory Committee (A/C.5/545). The Secretary-General said that the estimates represented a conscientious and informed effort to gauge the needs of the Organization during 1954. They were based, he stated, on existing lines of administrative policy, since it was essential that major changes should rest on a sound and solid foundation and could not be safely initiated pending further careful study. He understood, he said, and sympathized with the widespread desire for early and effective action to simplify the internal structure and functioning of the Secretariat and the concrete proposals which he expected to present would, he added, point in the direction of economy as well as greater efficiency. Meanwhile, he urged the Fifth Committee to proceed with its review of the estimates on the basis of the reports before it and, without any special pleading on his part, to come to its own conclusions as to the suitable level of appropriations for 1954.

The Chairman of the Advisory Committee emphasized that none of the recommended cuts in the 1954 estimates were intended to discount whatever further economy might prove possible under the Secretary-General's subsequent plan for re-organization. He paid a tribute to the wisdom of the Secretary-General in not contesting the figures recommended by the Advisory Committee and said that a tight budget was a healthy feature in an administrative structure such as the United Nations, and that, should the Secretary-General be confronted with any hardship in maintaining essential activities, the Advisory Committee would assist him. He drew attention to the prominence given in the Advisory Committee's report to the problem of documentation, stating that if it was that Committee's view that the documentation had long since become excessive, but it was for the Fifth Committee to judge whether this was the case.

In the Committee's general discussion of the 1954 estimates (at its 380th to 386th meetings), substantial support was expressed for the recommendations of the Advisory Committee. Many representatives considered that the reductions could be achieved without detriment to any essential activity or service and that they would contribute towards the principal aim of stabilizing the ordinary annual expenditures of the Organization.

A number of representatives, particularly those of Brazil, the Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, the Netherlands, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR, the United Kingdom, the USSR, and Yugoslavia, stressed the need for re-examining current work programmes with a view to eliminating non-essential activities and concentrating on a programme of priorities.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR reaffirmed the view expressed previously in meetings of the Fifth Committee that the objective should be to operate within a given budget ceiling and suggested that an amount of $35,000,000 net should be considered as an appropriate figure to cover all essential work. This target, they suggested, could be achieved by effecting economies in addition to those recommended by the Advisory Committee, particularly by reducing the excessively high staff costs and by eliminating certain activities which they deemed were incompatible with the principles and provisions of the Charter.

Other representatives, including those of Egypt, India, Iraq, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sweden and Syria, though also expressing themselves in favour of reducing the budget to the minimum necessary for effective operations, held that it was neither practicable nor desirable to impose a ceiling. They considered that the soundness of the United Nations structure, as well as the efficiency of its operations, should not be impaired solely on the grounds of economy.

Most representatives expressed their concern over what they considered the unnecessarily large number of documents produced by the Organization. In their opinion, this not only caused automatic expenditures but also tended to lower the quality of the publications. However, the representatives of Canada, Egypt and Yugoslavia, among others, while agreeing that reasonable economies were possible, urged caution in reducing appropriations for what they considered a part of the essential substantive work of the Organization.

The Committee felt that it was necessary to strengthen the hands of the Secretary-General on the problem of documentation by reaffirming a previous Assembly resolution (593(VI)) on the subject. To this end, the Committee at its 404th meeting unanimously adopted a United Kingdom draft resolution, as amended by Belgium and Denmark (see resolution "D" below).

During the general discussion, several representatives, including those of Denmark, Egypt, France, Iraq, the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom, referred to the necessity of adhering strictly to the terms of Assembly resolution 694 (VII) concerning the programme of conferences at Headquarters and Geneva. On the other hand, certain representatives, including those of Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Israel and the Netherlands, while not denying the importance of adhering to the pattern, saw no point in requesting the Assembly to confirm a decision it had so recently taken. The Committee, however, adopted a United Kingdom draft resolution embodying the views of the Advisory Committee (see resolution "E" below).

Many representatives also commented on the matter of the reimbursement to staff members of income taxes paid in respect of payments from the United Nations, noting the heavy charge for tax reimbursement which was added to the United Nations budget each year. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, France, Pakistan, Poland, Syria, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Yugoslavia, among others, expressed the view that this charge was unwarranted and hoped that all governments—and particularly the United States Government—would comply with the terms of previous Assembly resolutions (13(I) and 239 C (III)) so that such reimbursement would be avoided.

Recurrent references were made to the need for correcting existing defects in the structure of the Secretariat, bearing in mind the comments of the Advisory Committee on the high ratio of senior to junior posts in a number of departments. In this connexion, the representatives of India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Pakistan and Syria, among others, called attention to the need for a more equitable geographical distribution of staff, particularly from the under-developed areas of Asia and the Middle East, and to the desirability of extending the principle to cover posts at all levels and grades.

At its 411th meeting on 24 November 1953, the Committee considered the report of the Advisory Committee (A/2557) on the proposal by the Secretary-General (A/C.5/559) for the acquisition of radio transmitters by the United Nations and for their operation at New York and Geneva in replacement of the existing system of a rented teletype circuit. It was noted that, although the proposal would necessitate an increase in the 1954 estimates of $43,400, against which offsetting revenue would amount to $9,000, in subsequent years the relevant appropriations would be reduced by a total of $17,700 by comparison with the 1953 figure, and miscellaneous income would be increased, as in 1954, by $9,000 per annum.

The Committee approved the proposal to acquire the transmitters on the understanding: (1) that the scheme was consonant with the provisions of Section 4 of Article II of the Headquarters Agreement;⁸⁶ and (2) that a strict control would be exercised over the nature and length of cable messages accepted for transmission over the new system. The Committee approved the necessary adjustments in Sections 18, 19 and 20 of the budget estimates by 39 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

After approving, by varying votes, the individual sections of the budget estimates, the Committee, at its 426th meeting on 10 December 1953, decided by 45 votes to 5, to recommend that the estimates be approved in the total amount of $47,827,110. At the same time, it recommended that miscellaneous income for the financial year 1954 should be approved at an estimate of $6,760,000, which amount, applied as an offset against estimated gross expenditure for 1954, would produce a net figure of $41,067,110.

The net expenditure amount would be subject to adjustments in accordance with the terms of financial regulation 5.2, estimated as follows:

Increase

- | | |
|---|-------------|
| (a) Supplementary appropriation for the financial year 1953 | $1,541,750 |
|---|-------------|

Decrease

(b) Adjustment for an estimated increase in miscellaneous income for the financial year 1953	300,000
(c) Appropriations to be surrendered under financial regulations 4.3 and 4.4 in respect of the financial year 1952	1,008,860
NET ADDITIONAL INCREASE	$ 232,890

As a result of these adjustments, assessment of contributions from Member States for the financial year 1954, if appropriations were approved as recommended, would amount to $41,300,000 as compared with $44,200,000 for 1953; a decrease of $2,900,000.

At its 426th meeting, the Committee adopted, by 48 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, a draft resolution relating to unforeseen and extraordinary expenses (see resolution "B" below). It also approved, by 50 votes to 5, a draft resolution relating to the Working Capital Fund (see resolution "C" below).

The draft resolutions recommended in the Fifth Committee's report (A/2622) on the 1954 budget estimates were considered by the General Assembly at its 471st meeting on 9 December 1953.

In explanation of his vote, the representative of the USSR said that his delegation would oppose the 1954 budget appropriations because they included provisions for an inflated staff, for United Nations bodies which, in his opinion, were established in violation of the Charter, and also for reimbursement of income taxes paid to the United States on earnings of United States nationals employed by the United Nations. The USSR delegation, he added, believed that the 1954 appropriation should not exceed $35,000,000 net. The USSR delegation also believed that the Working Capital Fund would be perfectly adequate at a figure of $20,000,000 rather than $21,500,000, as proposed by the Fifth Committee.

The Assembly approved the five resolutions recommended by the Fifth Committee, as follows:

Resolution A (Budget Appropriations for 1954): Approved by 53 votes to 5, as resolution 786(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly

"Resolves that for the financial year 1954:

"1. Appropriations totalling $US 47,827,110 are hereby voted for the following purposes:

{See table on pp. 99-100}

"2. The appropriations voted by paragraph 1 above shall be financed by contributions from Members after adjustment as provided by the Financial Regulations, subject to the provision of paragraph 1 of the resolution relating to the Working Capital Fund. For this purpose, miscellaneous income for the financial year 1954 is estimated at $US 6,760,000;

"3. The Secretary-General is authorized:

"(i) To administer as a unit the following appropriations:

"(a) Provisions under section 3 (a); section 20, chapter III; and section 25, chapter V;

"(b) Provisions under section 13; section 20, chapter II; section 21; and in respect of section 26 for items relating to public information;

"(ii) With the prior concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, to transfer credits between sections of the budget;

"4. In addition to the appropriations voted by paragraph 1 above, an amount of $US 13,000 is hereby appropriated for the purchase of books, periodicals, maps and library equipment, from the income of the Library Endowment Fund, in accordance with the objects and provisions of the endowment."

Resolution B (Unforeseen and Extraordinary Expenses for the Financial Year 1954): Approved by 50 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, as resolution 787(VIII). It read:

"Resolves that, for the financial year 1954,

"The Secretary-General, with the prior concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and subject to the Financial Regulations of the United Nations, is authorized to enter into commitments to meet unforeseen and extraordinary expenses; provided that the concurrence of the Advisory Committee shall not be necessary for:

"(a) Such commitments not exceeding a total of $US 2 million if the Secretary-General certifies that they relate to the maintenance of peace and security or to urgent economic rehabilitation;

"(b) Such commitments not exceeding a total of $50,000 as are required for the United Nations Good Offices Commission on the treatment of people of Indian origin in the Union of South Africa;

"(c) Such commitments not exceeding a total of $50,000 as may be required for the United Nations Commission on the Racial Situation in the Union of South Africa;

"(d) Such additional commitments as are required for the Ad Hoc Commission on Prisoners of War;

"(e) Such commitments not exceeding a total of $184,000 as are required for the purchase of Korean service medals and ribbons;

"(f) Such commitments, duly certified by the President of the International Court of Justice, relating to expenses occasioned:

"(i) By the designation of ad hoc judges (Statute, Article 31)

"(ii) By the appointment of assessors (Statute, Article 30), or by the calling of witnesses and the appointment of experts (Statute, Article 50),

"(iii) By the holding of sessions of the Court away from The Hague (Statute, Article 22), and not exceeding $24,000, $25,000 and $75,000 respectively, under each of the above three headings;

"The Secretary-General shall report to the Advisory Committee and to the General Assembly at its next regular session all commitments made under the provisions of the present resolution, together with the Resolution C (Working Capital Fund): Approved by 52 votes to 5, as resolution 788(VIII).

It read:

"The General Assembly

"Resolves that:

"1. The Working Capital Fund shall be maintained to 31 December 1954 at the amount of $US 21,500,000, to be derived:

"(a) As to $20,000,000 from cash advances by Members in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs 2 and 3 of the present resolution:

"(b) As to $1,500,000 by previous transfer from surplus account as follows:

"(i) $1,239,203 being the balance of surplus account as at 31 December 1950 not already applied against Members' assessments for 1951, in accordance with the General Assembly resolution 585A (VI) of 21 December 1951;

"(ii) $260,797 as part of the balance of surplus account as at 31 December 1951 not already applied against Members' assessments for 1952, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 676(VII) of 21 December 1952;

"2. Members shall make cash advances to the Working Capital Fund as required under paragraph 1(a) above in accordance with the scale adopted by the General Assembly for contributions of Members to the ninth annual budget;

"3. There shall be set off against this new allocation of advances the amounts paid by Members to the Working Capital Fund for the financial year 1953 under paragraph 2 of General Assembly resolution 674 (VII) of 21 December 1952, provided that, should the advance paid by any Member to the Working Capital Fund for the financial year 1953 exceed the amount of that Member's advance under the provision of paragraph 2 hereof, the excess shall be set off against the amount of contributions payable by the Member in respect of the ninth annual budget, or any previous budget;

"4. The Secretary-General is authorized to advance from the Working Capital Fund:

"(a) Such sums as may be necessary to finance budgetary appropriations pending receipt of contributions; sums so advanced shall be reimbursed as soon as receipts from contributions are available for the purpose;

"(b) Such sums as may be necessary to finance commitments which may be duly authorized under the provisions of the resolution relating to unforeseen and extraordinary expenses. The Secretary-General shall make provision in the budget estimates for reimbursing the Working Capital Fund;

"(c) Such sums as, together with net sums outstanding for the same purposes, do not exceed $125,000 to continue the revolving fund to finance miscellaneous self-liquidating purchases and activities. Advances in excess of the total of $125,000 may be made with the prior concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions. The Secretary-General shall submit, with the annual accounts, an explanation of the outstanding balance of the revolving fund at the end of each year;

"(d) Loans to specialized agencies and preparatory commissions of agencies to be established by inter-governmental agreement under the auspices of the United Nations to finance their work, pending receipt by the agencies concerned of sufficient contributions under their own budgets. In making such loans, which shall normally be repayable within two years, the Secretary-General shall have regard to the proposed financial resources of the agency concerned, and shall obtain the prior concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions for any cash issues which would increase the aggregate balance outstanding (including amounts previously advanced and outstanding) at any one time to an amount in excess of $3,000,000 and for any issue which would increase the balance outstanding (including amounts previously advanced and outstanding) in respect of any one agency to an amount in excess of $1,000,000, provided that, notwithstanding the above provisions, the Interim Commission of the International Trade Organization shall be authorized to postpone until 31 December 1954 repayment of the outstanding balance of the loans made to the Interim Commission;

"(e) Such sums not exceeding $45,000 as may be required to finance payments of advance insurance premiums where the period of insurance extends beyond the end of the financial year in which payment is made. This amount may be increased with the prior concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions. The Secretary-General shall make provision in the budget estimates of each year, during the life of the related policies, to cover the charges applicable to each such year."

Resolution D (Control and Limitation of Documentation): Approved unanimously as resolution 789(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly:

"Recalling its resolution 593(VI) of 4 February 1952 on the control and limitation of documentation,

"Noting the observations and suggestions of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions in its first report to the eighth session of the General Assembly, and the action taken by the Secretary-General, inter alia, by his instruction of 20 August 1953, to ensure a more effective control of documentation,

"Noting further the steps initiated by the Economic and Social Council, in its resolution 497 D (XVI) of 29 July 1953, to reduce the number and volume of certain categories of documents required by it,

"Considering that this reduction can be carried out in full only with the cooperation of Member States,

"Expressing the wish that Member States should cooperate in giving effect to the present resolution,

"1. Invites the Economic and Social Council to pursue and intensify its efforts to reduce further the documentation required by it, and also by its functional and regional commissions;

"2. Invites organs of the United Nations likewise to scrutinize their existing documentation and effect such reduction therein as may be feasible, and to cooperate with the Secretary-General in his efforts to reduce the volume and at the same time to improve the quality of the documentation of the United Nations."

Resolution E (Programme of Conferences at Headquarters and Geneva): Approved unanimously, as resolution 790(VIII) It read:

"The General Assembly:

"Having noted the recommendations of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination in its thirteenth report to the Economic and Social Council to the effect that the regular four-year pattern of conferences approved by the General Assembly at its seventh session can only fulfil its purpose if it is strictly adhered to by all the organs concerned,

"Noting also the opinion of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions in its fifth report to the eighth session of the General Assembly to the effect that the Advisory Committee regards the programme as firmly fixed for the period 1954 to 1957 and that any variations will presumably be authorized only by a special decision of the General Assembly,

"1. Endorses the opinion of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

"2. Reaffirms its recommendation that all organs of the United Nations arrange their meetings in accordance with the dates and places set forth in the pattern presented by the Secretary-General and that the specialized agencies concerned be invited to give due consideration to this pattern in drawing up their own programmes of meetings."

4. Scale of Assessments for the Apportionment of the Expenses of the United Nations

The scale of assessments for the apportionment of the expenses of the United Nations for the financial year 1954 was considered at the eighth session of the General Assembly, at the 393rd to 396th meetings of the Fifth Committee from 20 to 26 October and at the 458th plenary meeting on 27 November 1953.

Before the Fifth Committee was the report of the Committee on Contributions (A/2461) recommending the following changes in the scale of assessments of 22 Member States:

Member State	Percentage of total contributions payable by Member States		Change
	Official Scale for 1953	Recommended Scale for 1954

Venezuela	0.35	0.39	+0.04

In framing its recommendations, the Committee applied previous decisions of the Assembly that the assessment of the largest contributor (the United States) should not exceed one third of the total assessment and that continued recognition should be given to the position of countries with low per capita incomes. In line with Assembly recommendations that application of the per capita ceiling principle⁸⁷ be deferred until new Members were admitted or substantial improvements occurred in the economic capacity of existing Members, it decided to retain the 1953 assessments for those countries to which this ceiling would apply.

In view of the dollar stringency, the Committee recommended that arrangements for payments in currencies other than United States dollars should be extended as far as possible.

It considered that a decision to adopt a three-year scale, as envisaged by the Assembly's rules of procedure, should be deferred and that a further review of the scale should be undertaken in 1954.

The Committee had also reviewed the assessments of Switzerland and Liechtenstein for contributions to the International Court of Justice and of non-member States signatories of international instruments relating to the control of narcotic drugs.

During the discussions in the Fifth Committee, widespread agreement was expressed with the recommendation that the scale of assessments should apply for one year only, since it was not currently possible to remove all divergencies. It was hoped that it would be possible to submit proposals to the next Assembly session for a scale to be valid for at least three years, and many representatives welcomed the Committee's decision that for such a scale it would base its calculations on relative capacity to pay on a three-yearly average of national income estimates, while also having regard to economic trends manifested in individual countries during the current year.

A number of representatives, and, in particular, those of Canada, New Zealand and Sweden, three countries affected by the per capita ceiling principle, stressed the importance which they attached to this principle. It was pointed out that the deferment of the application of this principle would result in an increasing discrepancy between the per capita contribution of certain countries and that of the United States, the country with the largest assessment. The fear was also expressed by, among others, the representatives of Belgium and the Netherlands, that the middle income group of contributors might be called upon to pay a disproportionate share of the budget in view of the reduction of the assessment of the highest contributor and the special relief given to countries with low per capita incomes.

The representative of the USSR opposed the recommended scale on the grounds that the Committee on Contributions, in proposing increases for the Byelorussian SSR, Poland, the Ukrainian ⁸⁷ The per capita ceiling principle is to the effect that the per capita contribution of any Member shall not exceed the per capita of the Member with the highest contribution, i.e., the United States.

SSR and the USSR, had not given due attention to the basic criteria for arriving at an equitable scale, namely, the comparative per capita income, the temporary dislocation of national economies arising out of the Second World War and the ability of Member States to secure foreign currency. Since 1951, he maintained, there appeared to be a systematic policy of increasing the assessment of the above group of countries and reducing those of another group, particularly the United States, the United Kingdom and the Union of South Africa. The United States, in particular, he said, had not suffered from war damage, benefited from the fact that the greater part of United Nations expenditure was made in the United States and had no difficulty in obtaining dollar currency. The views of the Soviet representative were supported by the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR.

On the other hand, several representatives maintained the view that the substantial economic progress admittedly achieved by the USSR and the East European countries since the end of World War II made it imperative for the contributions of those States to be brought more closely into line with their increased capacity to pay.

Some representatives, including those of Egypt, Greece, India, Iran and Iraq, stressed the importance of continuing to give special consideration to those countries with low per capita incomes. The representatives of Afghanistan, Bolivia, Chile, Cuba and the Philippines, among others, felt that the Committee on Contributions had not given sufficient allowance to this factor of low per capita income.

The representative of Greece sought relief from any increase also because of the damage suffered in the Ionian Islands as a result of the earthquakes during 1953, and the Fifth Committee agreed that the Committee on Contributions should consider Greece's difficulties when considering the 1955 scale, together with the possibility of adopting a "unit system" of assessment rather than the current percentage system, so as to give greater flexibility in applying unforeseen changes in the scale.

Other representatives, including those of China, Colombia, Pakistan and the Philippines, also felt that the Committee on Contributions had been over-optimistic in its assessment of their countries' capacity to pay.

The representative of the Philippines proposed a draft resolution (A/C.5/L.245), which would have the Assembly call upon the Committee on Contributions to consult with Member Governments, particularly those whose contributions were likely to be increased, before a new scale of assessments was submitted to the Assembly. However, he withdrew this proposal on the assurance of the Chairman of the Committee on Contributions that all delegations would be informed of that Committee's next meeting so that they could transmit to it any relevant information which they might wish it to consider in preparing its recommendations. In this connexion, the opinion was expressed by several representatives that the Committee should not be transformed into a negotiating body.

A draft resolution (A/C.5/L.244), embodying the recommendations of the Committee on Contributions, was adopted, paragraph by paragraph, in votes ranging from a unanimous vote to 39 votes to 7, with 2 abstentions. It was adopted, as a whole, by 39 votes to 6, with 3 abstentions, at the Fifth Committee's 396th meeting (A/2577) and by the General Assembly, at its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November 1953, by 50 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions.

In explaining their votes in the plenary meeting in opposition to the proposed scale of contributions, the representatives of Poland and the USSR reiterated arguments adduced in the Fifth Committee. The representative of the United States expressed his country's gratitude for the proposed reduction of the United States assessment to 33.33 per cent, and pointed to various factors relating to the Soviet Union's relative capacity to pay more toward the support of the Organization.

The resolution adopted by the General Assembly (365(VIII)) read:

5. Appointment of a Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary funds

The General Assembly, at its seventh session, decided (resolution 693 (VII))⁸⁸ to establish again a Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds, on the same lines as in the previous year, to assist in obtaining funds for the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), for the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA), for the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF), and for such other special programmes not provided for in the regular budget of the United Nations as might be designated by the Assembly.

The Committee, composed of nine members,⁸⁹ began its work on 14 November 1952, and summarized its activities between that date and 1 September 1953 in a report to the Assembly's eighth session (A/2478).

⁸⁹ For membership, see Appendix I.

With respect to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, it announced that pledges for the calendar year 1953 amounting to $22,393,313 had been received from 69 countries against a target of $25 million. As regards UNRWA and UNICEF, the Committee stated that it had invited those governments which had not yet contributed to either or both of these programmes to meet with it. For UNRWA, pledges for the fiscal year 1952-1953 had been made by 39 governments, amounting to an actual total of $67,086,830, and a total sum of approximately $147 million had been pledged against the three-year target figure of $250 million set by the Assembly (resolution 513(VI)). Pledges for the fiscal year 1953-1954 totalling $388,758 from six governments had also been received by September, 1953. For UNICEF, pledges for the current fiscal year totalling $14,206,020 from 47 governments had been made against a target of $20 million established by the UNICEF Executive Board. With respect to UNKRA, the Negotiating Committee had called to the attention of governments which had not yet contributed to the Agency the fact that approximately $44 million still remained to be pledged to meet the $250 million budget for three years. As a result, by 1 September 1953, pledges in cash and kind had been made by 33 governments in the amount of $207,518,517.

The Committee considered that it would be of value to continue similar negotiations both formally and informally during the Assembly's eighth session and stressed again the importance of universal support of extra-budgetary programmes. It recommended that the Assembly should consider making early provision for the continuation of its work by a Committee of Member Governments.

The report of the Negotiating Committee was considered by the General Assembly at the 378th meeting of its Fifth Committee on 24 September and at the 451st plenary meeting on 5 October 1953. Following a brief discussion, in which several representatives expressed appreciation of the work of the Negotiating Committee, the Fifth Committee unanimously adopted a joint draft resolution by Australia, Canada, Colombia, France, Haiti, Lebanon and the United States (A/C.5/L.235) providing for the appointment of a further Negotiating Committee with the same terms of reference as the previous one. The draft resolution, as recommended by the Fifth Committee (A/2491), was adopted by the General Assembly without objection as resolution 759 (VIII).

The President on the same day accordingly appointed the following Member States to constitute the Committee: Australia, Canada, Chile, Colombia, France, Lebanon, Pakistan, the United Kingdom and the United States.

J. HEADQUARTERS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

1. Report of the Secretary-General

The General Assembly in resolution 663 (VII)⁹⁰ of 25 November 1952 asked the Secretary-General to submit to its eighth session a final report on the construction of the Headquarters. The Secretary-General reported (A/2544) to the eighth session that it would not be possible, during that session, to present a final report due to unforeseen delays in the completion both of the work on the United Nations site itself and of the additional work which the City of New York was carrying out on the approaches to it.

Work remaining to be completed on the Headquarters site, the Secretary-General reported, consisted for the most part of some minor phases of the construction programme; certain adjustments in interior and exterior layouts required for the better operation, maintenance and security of the buildings; portions of the landscaping programme; and the installation of artistic objects of a decorative nature donated by Member States.

All the principal structures, the Secretary-General reported, had been substantially completed and both the buildings and the garage areas were fully occupied. The remaining construction items included, among others: completion of the guard houses on First Avenue at 43rd and 47th Streets; the installation of numerous illuminated and non-illuminated directional signs and bulletin boards; the installation of a complete security alarm system providing proper coverage of the entire group of buildings; interior painting; construction and installation of revolving doors at the north end of, and at the delegates' entrance to, the General Assembly building; and completion of the podium in the General Assembly hall. These items, he said, would not be completed until the spring of 1954.

Work within the general area of Headquarters, for which the City of New York had assumed responsibility, the Secretary-General stated, had been proceeding simultaneously with the construction of the Headquarters itself. The First Avenue tunnel had been opened in the spring of 1953, 42nd Street and 47th Street had been widened and beautified and similar improvements had been carried out in the two park areas north and south of 42nd Street at the west side of First Avenue. The reconstruction of First Avenue as well as the erection of the fence on the boundaries of the site were approaching completion. The City of New York had renamed First Avenue between 42nd and 47th Streets "United Nations Plaza". The Franklin D. Roosevelt Drive, including the overpasses from the Drive to First Avenue at 42nd and 48th Streets, had been realigned and rebuilt from 37th to 52nd Streets. The completion of certain adjacent work on the Headquarters site was delayed as a result of the delay in work which the City had undertaken, it was reported.

The landscaping of the north area, consisting of the rose gardens (containing some 1,500 roses), flowering cherry trees (185), hawthorns, sweet gum and honey locust trees, together with ground cover, would, the report stated, be substantially completed in late 1953. The balance of the landscape work, namely, the area west of the Library at 42nd Street and west of the ventilator at 43rd Street and First Avenue had been contracted for. The property line curbs and fence work, which tied in with the landscape programme, were progressing and should be completed by the City of New York by the early spring of 1954.

The sinking of a cargo ship in the Spring of 1953 just off the 46th Street Pier had delayed the construction work connected with the removal of that Pier. The Secretary-General stated that he had been advised that the United States Army Engineers was preparing another contract for the removal of the wreck and that it was expected to complete this operation by the beginning of 1954. The removal of the wreck would permit the United Nations to proceed, early in the Spring of 1954, with the work it was obligated to undertake with respect to the pier and bulkhead.

The Secretary-General stated that as of 30 September 1953, approximately $67,000,000 had been expended, obligated or budgeted for the completion of the Headquarters construction programme. It was anticipated that after the remaining work had been completed, an amount of not less than $1,000,000 out of the total of $68,000,000 budgeted for the construction of Headquarters would be available for surrender in 1954. These savings, he said, were the result of determined efforts on the part of officials responsible for the construction of the Headquarters in effecting all possible economies in the expenditure of the funds available and in securing advantageous settlement of contractors' claims against the United Nations.

The non-interest-bearing loan of $65,000,000, made available by the United States Government for the construction of the Headquarters, the report stated, had been withdrawn in its entirety by requisition and expended. A total of $3,500,000 had been repaid by the United Nations to the United States Government. Withdrawals against the supplementary request of $3,000,000 to complete the construction of the Headquarters had been made in the amount of $1,500,000.

The procedure of clearing with the Board of Art Advisers all matters relating to the selection of art objects, decorative materials and gift offers remained in effect. A complete list of gifts together with the names of the donors, would be submitted in the final report to the Assembly.

The Secretary-General's report (A/2544) was considered by the Assembly's Fifth Committee at its 405th meeting on 16 November 1953. Discussion in the Committee was concerned for the most part with the problem of providing more adequate amenities and facilities for delegates, particularly during Assembly sessions. The representative of the Netherlands called attention to the fact that there was no place in the Headquarters buildings where delegates could quietly write, read or hold private consultations without serious disturbance and interruption. The delegates' lounge, it was stated, had become, to all intents and purposes, a public area and was therefore wholly unsuited to the working needs of delegations. Other representatives, in particular those of Chile and the United Kingdom, joined the representative of the Netherlands in expressing the hope that urgent consideration would be given to ways and means of remedying the existing unsatisfactory situation without undue expense. Attention was also called to the overcrowded conditions prevailing in the delegates' dining room and to the difficulty of access to it. The representative of the Secretary-General assured the Fifth Committee that the views expressed and the suggestions made would be taken fully into account.

The representative of Belgium, supported by, among others, the representatives of Australia, Iran and the Union of South Africa, suggested that the practice, which appeared to have been discontinued, of holding regular meetings between rep-representatives of the Secretary-General and the Secretaries-General of permanent delegations might usefully be revived. The Fifth Committee was assured by the Secretary-General that arrangements would be made to reconvene meetings between appropriate officials of the Secretariat and the Secretaries-General of the delegations.

The Committee, by 37 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, adopted the draft resolution proposed by the Secretary-General in his report. The USSR representative explained his abstention as a protest against the fact that the expenditure originally provided for had been exceeded.

The draft resolution recommended by the Fifth Committee (A/2614) was adopted by the General Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December, without discussion, by 55 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 780(VIII). Under the resolution, the Assembly, after reviewing progress to date, called for a final report to be submitted for its consideration at the ninth session.

2. Question of the Enlargement of the Dining Room and Cafeteria

As a supplementary budgetary item (19(a)), the Secretary-General on 11 November 1953 submitted a request (A/C.5/577) for an appropriation in 1954 of $565,000 for the enlargement of the dining room and cafeteria and the installation of additional means of access to them.

The need for increasing the capacity of the dining room and cafeteria, the Secretary-General explained, had been apparent for some time, and had been particularly evident during the Assembly's eighth session. In the dining room the demand from various delegations for reservations had been in excess of the seating capacities, and in the cafeteria the serving and seating capacities had been found to be insufficient on many occasions especially on inclement days. The Secretary-General's proposals provided for an increase in seating capacity from 752 to 1,176 to be distributed as follows: dining room, from 278 to 402; private dining rooms, from 64 to 166; and cafeteria, from 410 to 608.

The Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions in its 31st report to the eighth session of the General Assembly (A/2594) suggested possible alternatives to the Secretary-General's proposal, whereby the projected expenditures might either be reduced in amount or be spread over a longer period.

Both reports were considered by the Fifth Committee at its 424th meeting on 5 December. Most representatives recognized there was a need to improve both the seating capacity in the existing dining room and cafeteria and the means of access to them. Certain representatives, in particular those of Belgium, Chile and Cuba, favoured postponing consideration of the plan until a more thorough study had been undertaken. The Secretary-General explained that his proposals had been formulated with the intention of covering needs up to the limits imposed by the structure of the part of the building involved. The carrying out of the construction work proposed would not affect a more radical approach to the problem at a later date.

The estimate for the appropriation of $565,000 under section 19(a), requested by the Secretary-General, was approved by the Fifth Committee by 31 votes to 8, with 8 abstentions.

The General Assembly in approving the 1954 budget at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December⁹¹ accepted the figure of $565,000 recommended by the Fifth Committee.

K. UNITED NATIONS POSTAL ADMINISTRATION

The United Nations Postal Administration, established as of 1 January 1951 by General Assembly resolution 454(V)⁹² of 16 November 1950, continued its operations throughout 1953. The working of the postal agreement entered into by the United Nations and the United States continued to function smoothly and relationships with the Universal Postal Union were in line with the resolution adopted at its Congress on 8 July 1953.⁹³

The total gross revenue⁹⁴ of the United Nations Postal Administration for 1953 was $392,537.23.

The sales counter in the General Assembly Building at United Nations Headquarters during 1953—its first full year of activity—handled approximately 800,000 pieces of mail, and operated on a seven-day week basis to accommodate visitors to Headquarters.

On 26 May 1953 a branch office of the United Nations Postal Administration was established at Russell Square House, Russell Square, London, W.C.1, England, for philatelic sale to countries in the sterling area. The sale of United Nations stamps for philatelic purposes at the European Office of the United Nations at Geneva was continued.

During 1953, four new commemorative stamps and a 3¢ embossed envelope were issued.

The envelope was issued on 15 September in two sizes—standard and legal. Its design shows the emblem of the United Nations surrounded by the lettering "United Nations Unies Postes—3 cent-Postage," the background being blue, and the emblem and lettering white.

On 24 April, a stamp was issued to serve as a reminder of the continuing need for the protection and care of refugees. The design depicts a typical refugee family, with the lettering "Protection for Refugees—Protection des Réfugiés". The stamp was issued in the 3¢ (maroon) and 5¢ (blue) denominations.

On 12 June, a stamp was issued in the 3¢ (sepia) and 5¢ (blue) denominations in honour of the Universal Postal Union. The theme of this stamp was an envelope superimposed on a map of the world, the emblem of the United Nations being used as a seal on the envelope.

On 24 October—United Nations Day—a commemorative stamp drawing attention to the activities of the United Nations in the field of technical assistance to under-developed areas, was issued in the 3¢ (grey) and 5¢ (jade green) denominations. The stamp's design shows three cogwheels enmeshed, with the central wheel encircling the emblem of the United Nations, and the words "Technical Assistance Technique" curved above the wheels.

On 10 December—Human Rights Day—a commemorative stamp was issued in the 3¢ (blue) and the 5¢ (crimson) denominations. The design shows two hands reaching towards a flame which is encircled by the words "Human Rights" in the five official languages of the United Nations—English, French, Spanish, Russian and Chinese. The dates "10.XII 48-53" are shown inside the circle made by the wording to mark the anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the General Assembly on 10 December 1948.

First day covers for these issues were serviced as follows:

Refugee stamp—24 April	234,082
UPU stamp—12 June	231,627
3¢ embossed envelope—15 September	102,278
United Nations Day stamp—24 October	229,211
Human Rights Day stamp—10 December ..	265,186

In order to identify the cancellation of stamps affixed to pieces of registered mail deposited at the United Nations Post Office Station, agreement was reached with the United States Post Office Department during 1953 for the use of the identifying letters "U.N." and "N.Y." between the loops of the cancellation stamp used on registered pieces of mail. The first day of use of this cancellation was 1 July.

The stamp programme for 1954 calls for the following issues:

11 February... 3¢ and 8¢ stamp in honour of the activities of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations.
10 May..... 3¢ and 8¢ stamp in honour of the work of the International Labour Organisation.
25 October.... stamps in two denominations in honour of United Nations Day.
10 December.. stamps in two denominations in honour of Human Rights Day.

II. Political and Security Questions

A. THE QUESTION OF KOREA

1. United Nations Command Reports¹

Reports of the United Nations Command operations in Korea were submitted by the representative of the United States to the Security Council, in accordance with the Security Council resolution (S/1588) of 7 July 1950. The following information on the progress of truce negotiations and of operations is taken from reports Nos. 61 to 76 and from a special report of the Unified Command to the Security Council (S/3079)² dated 7 August 1953.

a. TRUCE NEGOTIATIONS³

By the end of 1952, agreement had been reached on all major questions relating to the conclusion of an armistice and a tentative draft armistice agreement⁴ had been worked out covering all agreed points. The differences between the United Nations Command and the Chinese-North Korean side which had prevented the conclusion of an armistice had been narrowed, by the end of April 1952, to the question of the disposal of prisoners of war. The United Nations Command had insisted that force should not be used to repatriate any prisoner of war. The Chinese-North Korean side had insisted on the unconditional repatriation of all prisoners of war. Armistice negotiations were recessed on 8 October 1952, following the rejection by the Chinese-North Korean side of United Nations Command proposals on the question of repatriation of prisoners of war. They were resumed on 26 April 1953.

Following a resolution adopted by the Executive Committee of the League of Red Cross Societies on 13 December 1952, which appealed to the parties, as a gesture of good will, to implement the humanitarian principles of the Geneva Convention by repatriating sick and wounded prisoners of war, the Commander-in-Chief of the United Nations Command, on 22 February, addressed a letter to the Chinese-North Korean Commanders, stating that the United Nations Command still remained ready to implement, immediately, the repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners of war and asking if the other side was prepared to proceed with such repatriation.

On 28 March, the Chinese-North Korean Command agreed to the principle of the exchange of the sick and wounded, which, they stated, "should be made to lead to the smooth settlement of the entire question of prisoners of war". Arrangements for the exchange were initiated through the respective liaison officers on 6 April.

The agreement was followed on 30 March by a statement by Chou En-lai,⁵ Foreign Minister of the People's Republic of China, subsequently endorsed by the Prime Minister of the North Korean regime, indicating a desire to resume negotiations on the entire prisoner-of-war question.

On 11 April 1953, agreement was formally reached on the repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners of war. The initial Chinese-North Korean figure for prisoners of war to be repatriated was 600, including 450 Koreans and 150 non-Koreans. The United Nations Command initially agreed to repatriate 5,800 prisoners, including 5,100 Koreans and 700 Chinese. Pur-

The report (S/3148) for the period of 1 to 15 August stated that in view of the reduced activities of the United Nations Command after the signing of the Armistice Agreement no further regular fortnightly reports would be issued. However, reports would be submitted from time to time on the implementation of the Armistice Agreement.

⁵ In his statement (A/2378), the Foreign Minister of the People's Republic of China stated, inter alia, that the two Governments concerned proposed that "both parties to the negotiations should undertake to repatriate immediately after the cessation of hostilities all those prisoners of war in their custody who insist upon repatriation and to hand over the remaining prisoners of war to a neutral State so as to ensure a just solution to the question of their repatriation." See also p. 270.

suant to the agreement, sick and wounded prisoners of war were exchanged between 20 April and 3 May.

Total deliveries of both sides including those recently wounded, are summarized in the following table:

Delivery of United Nations Command Personnel
United States	149
United Kingdom	32
Canada	2
Colombia	6
Greece	11
Australia	5
Turkey	15
South Africa	1
Philippines	1
Netherlands	1
Republic of Korea	471
Total	684
Delivery of Chinese-North Korean Personnel
North Korea	5,194
China	1,030
Civilian Internees	446
Total	6,670

On 17 April (S/3090), in response to the Chinese-North Korean suggestion for a resumption of the armistice negotiations for settling the entire prisoner-of-war question, the Commander-in-Chief of the United Nations Forces proposed that prisoners of war not directly repatriated should be released in Korea to the custody of a neutral State, such as Switzerland, and that after allowing a reasonable time, such as 60 days, for determining the attitudes of individuals in its custody with respect to their status, the neutral State should make arrangements for the peaceable disposition of those remaining in its custody.

The armistice negotiations, which had been in recess since 8 October 1952, were resumed on 26 April 1953 when the Senior Delegate of the Chinese-North Korean Command presented a six-point proposal under which all prisoners desiring repatriation would be returned within two months after an armistice. Within one month after completion of direct repatriation, the remainder would be sent to a neutral State, where, for six months, representatives of their home countries would be enabled to explain to them matters regarding their repatriation. Prisoners requesting repatriation would be afforded a speedy return. If at the end of six months any prisoners were unrepatriated, the question of their disposition would be submitted to the political conference which, in accordance with the draft armistice agreement, was to take place after the armistice.

In reply, the United Nations Command stated that the period of detention proposed by the Chinese-North Korean Command would result in the indefinite detention of those prisoners who were opposed to repatriation. On 29 April, the Chinese-North Korean Command indicated that the neutral State proposed should be an unnamed Asian country.

On 2 May, the Chinese-North Korean side asked whether it could be said that India, Burma, Indonesia and Pakistan were not suitable as neutral nations. It also asked if the United Nations Command would agree to sending to Switzerland, Sweden, Poland and Czechoslovakia all the prisoners not directly repatriated.

The United Nations Command pointed out that it had suggested that the neutral State agreed upon should keep custody of the prisoners in Korea and that it could not agree to the prisoners being transported to another country.

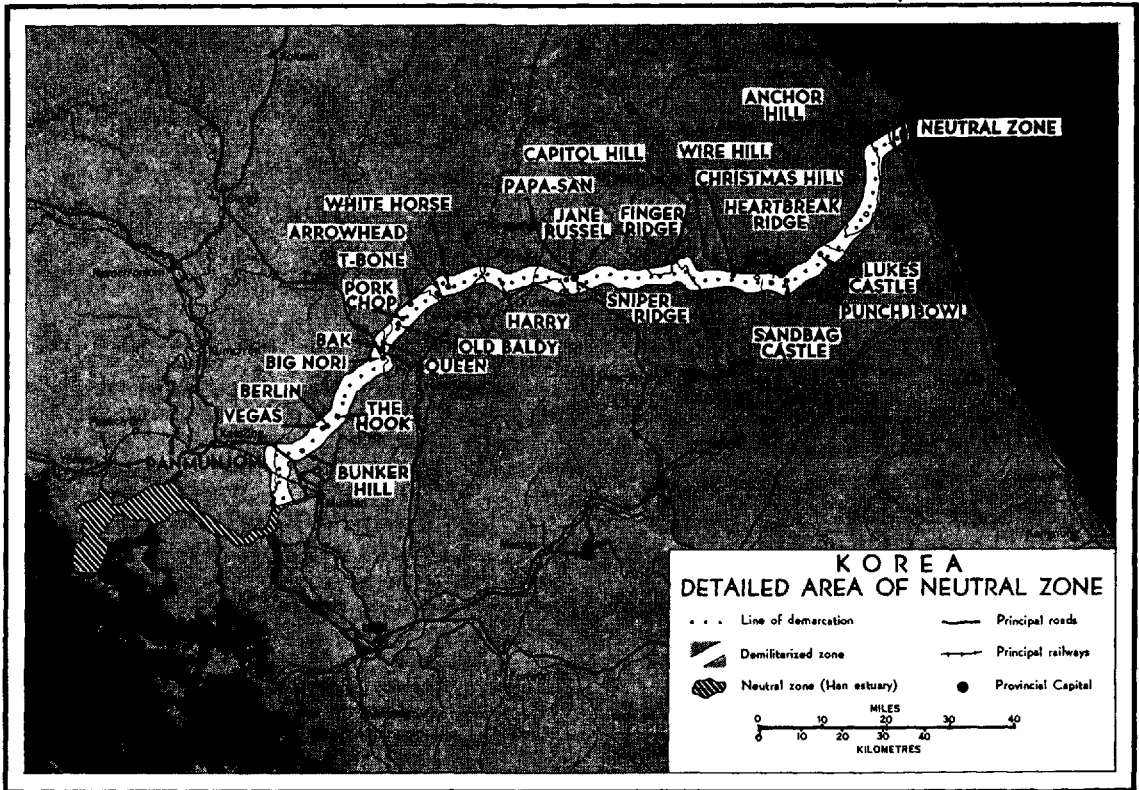

On 4 May, the United Nations Command nominated Pakistan as the neutral nation to assume custody of the prisoners.

On 7 May, the Chinese-North Korean side put forward a new proposal, providing for the establishment of a Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission to be composed of the four States already nominated for membership of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission (namely, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden and Switzerland) and India, as agreed upon by both sides.⁶ This Commission, it was proposed, was to take custody of the prisoners in Korea.

On 13 May the United Nations Command presented a counter-proposal shortening the period of time in which the non-repatriates would remain in neutral custody, providing for the release of Korean non-repatriates immediately after the armistice, and proposing that only Indian forces take actual custody of the non-repatriates. The Chinese-North Korean side rejected these proposals.

On 25 May, the United Nations Command made a new proposal, providing for the transfer of both Korean and Chinese non-repatriates to neutral custody and for consideration of the disposition of any remaining non-repatriates by the political conference for a limited period, after which they might either be released to civilian status or the question of their disposition referred to the General Assembly.

On 4 June, the United Nations Command stated (S/3079), the Chinese-North Korean Command offered a counter-proposal in effect based on "the mechanics of General Assembly resolution 610 (VII),⁷ also closely paralleling the United Nations Command proposals of 25 May (see above), but vague on the basic principle of "non-forcible repatriation". The United Nations Command reported that it succeeded in reaching agreement with the other side on the elaboration of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission's terms of reference to ensure that the principle approved by the General Assembly that force should not be used to compel or to prevent repatriation of any prisoners of war would be fully observed.

On 8 June, it was stated, the Senior Delegates for the United Nations Command and for the Communists signed the Prisoner of War Agreement, which was incorporated by reference in the Armistice Agreement.⁸ The delegations then proceeded to the final arrangements toward an early conclusion of the armistice.

The United Nations Command further reported that on 18 June "officials of the Republic of Korea brought about a break-out from prisoner-of-war camps of some 27,000 Korean prisoners of war who had previously indicated that they would resist repatriation to North Korea". This action by the Republic of Korea, it was stated, was inconsistent with the Agreement of 8 June on prisoners of war and the United Nations Command at once protested to the Republic of Korea Government. It also informed the Chinese-North Korean Command of the event and told them that, while efforts would be made to recover as many of the escapees as possible, there was not much hope that many of these could be recaptured since they had melted into the South Korean population. This incident, it was reported, led to immediate conversations with the Republic of Korea by the representatives of the Unified Command. After prolonged discussions, it was stated, the Republic of Korea gave assurances that it would not obstruct the implementation of the terms of the Armistice Agreement.

⁷ On 3 December 1952, the General Assembly adopted resolution 610(VII), by which it recommended a procedure for the repatriation of prisoners of war. The Assembly recommended, inter alia, that the repatriation of prisoners of war should be in accordance with the Geneva Convention of 1949 and that force should not be used to prevent or effect their return. For the text of the resolution see Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 201-202.

The conclusion of an armistice was, however, further delayed, the United Nations Command stated, since the Chinese-North Korean side demanded assurances that the United Nations Command would "live up" to the terms of the Armistice Agreement. While giving these assurances, the United Nations Command made it clear that it would not use force against the Republic of Korea forces to ensure compliance with the armistice by the Republic of Korea.

The Armistice Agreement was finally signed on 27 July 1953, at 10 a.m. Korean time.

In its special report to the Security Council (S/3079), the Unified Command stated that it had agreed to waive certain safeguards, e.g., in regard to the construction and rehabilitation of military airfields in North Korea, but had asked that governments with forces under the Command should make it clear in a declaration to be issued after the signing of an armistice that "if there was an unprovoked renewal of the armed attack by the Communists the sixteen governments would again be united and prompt to resist". The Declaration, which was signed by representatives of the sixteen participating nations in Washington on 27 July 1953, was as follows:

"We the United Nations Members whose military forces are participating in the Korean action support the decision of the Commander-in-Chief of the United Nations Command to conclude an armistice agreement. We hereby affirm our determination fully and faithfully to carry out the terms of that armistice. We expect that the other parties to the agreement will likewise scrupulously observe its terms.

"The task ahead is not an easy one. We will support the efforts of the United Nations to bring about an equitable settlement in Korea based on the principles which have long been established by the United Nations, and which call for a united, independent and democratic Korea. We will support the United Nations in its efforts to assist the people of Korea in repairing the ravages of war.

"We declare again our faith in the principles and purposes of the United Nations, our consciousness of our continuing responsibilities in Korea, and our determination in good faith to seek a settlement of the Korean problem. We affirm, in the interests of world peace, that if there is a renewal of the armed attack, challenging again the principles of the United Nations, we should again be united and prompt to resist. The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that, in all probability, it would not be possible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea.

"Finally, we are of the opinion that the armistice must not result in jeopardizing the restoration or the safeguarding of peace in any other part of Asia."

The report of the United Nations Command (S/3148) covering the period 1 to 15 August stated that the period had marked the beginning of the implementation of the Armistice Agreement. During this period, it was stated, agreement was reached on the method of operation of joint observer teams, which were dispatched to their assigned areas. Marking of boundaries, clearing of hazards and construction of the various installations were begun within the demilitarized zone. Agreement was also reached on the civil police and the type of arms they might carry within the demilitarized zone. Neutral nations inspection teams were dispatched to the ports of entry of both sides.

The report stated that, during the first week of August, an advance party representing the Indian contingent of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission and the Custodial Forces of India arrived in Tokyo. A "Memorandum of Understanding" between the Indian group and the group representing the Senior Member of the United Nations Command Military Armistice Commission and his staff was drafted. It related to facilities and support to be furnished by the United Nations Command to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission installation within the demilitarized zone on the United Nations Command side of the demarcation line.

Dealing with the repatriation of Chinese-North Korean prisoners, the report of the United Nations Command for 1 to 15 August stated that the United Nations Command had provided adequate food, clothes and medical care for all the prisoners of war in its custody but that, for propaganda purposes, Communist prisoners had torn newly issued clothing and cast aside comfort items. At the same time, the report mentioned that United Nations Command repatriates bore evidence of brutal treatment. In their individual stories, these prisoners stated that the Communists had taken every possible measure for their indoctrination. The idea had been instilled into their minds that the United Nations and, in particular, the United States had started the war.

The United Nations Command report (A/3185) for the period 15 to 31 August stated that by the end of that period a total of 61,415 prisoners had been returned by the United Nations Command to Communist control. By the same date, the following numbers of United Nations Command personnel had been released from Communist captivity:

United States	2,827
Other United Nations	1,208
Republic of Korea	6,979
Total	11,014

The United Nations Command reported that Communist members of the joint Red Cross teams had not acted in conformity with the Armistice Agreement since they had not been interested in providing humanitarian service to the prisoners, but in propaganda.

On 19 August, it was reported, the Communist side delivered a roster of deceased United Nations Command military personnel. The total number reported was 1,078. Agreement was reached later on the recovery of bodies of deceased personnel from the demilitarized zone under the control of both sides, the reports said.

b. MILITARY ACTION

(1) Ground Operations

The United Nations Command reported that after the opening of armistice negotiations neither the United Nations forces nor the Chinese-North Korean side undertook sustained offensive action. However, it was stated, there was consistent and often heavy military contact, resulting in serious personnel casualties. During the last stages of negotiations, the Chinese-North Korean forces, on the night of 13 and 14 July, launched their heaviest offensive in over two years, resulting in limited advances by the enemy and heavy casualties to the United Nations forces, as well as "appalling" losses for the Chinese-North Korean attackers.

Giving particulars of the attack, The United Nations Command report (S/3143) for the period 16 to 31 July stated that, on 13 July, Chinese forces with five armies massed between Kumhwa and Pukhan River "launched wave upon wave of assault infantry against United Nations Command positions along the Kumsong salient". Initially, the enemy employed elements of five divisions in the assault and at the close of the battle eight divisions from the five Chinese armies were identified. The United Nations Command stated that this attack resulted in the loss of the Kumsong salient and required a major adjustment of United Nations Command front line defences.

Giving an estimate of the casualties incurred during the entire Korean conflict, the United Nations Command reported (S/3079) that on the United Nations side the number of killed, wounded and missing from the armed forces of the Republic of Korea exceeded 300,000; the total casualties of the United States armed forces were approximately 141,000; and of the armed forces of other fifteen Members, approximately 14,000. At the same time, the report continued, the United Nations forces inflicted on the enemy a far greater number of casualties, estimated at between one and a half to two million.

(2) Air Operations

During the period up to the cessation of hostilities, United Nations Command naval aircraft, operating from fast carriers in the Sea of Japan, continued their attacks on pre-selected targets and targets of opportunity from the main line of resistance to the Manchurian border, the reports said. Heavy strikes were carried out against the enemy's transportation system, supply storage and billeting areas, factories, bunkers, gun and mortar positions and other targets of military significance. Other United Nations aircraft provided front-line units with close air-support and flew combat, reconnaissance and escort sorties deep into enemy territory.

In the latter half of March, it was reported (S/3070), the United Nations Command carried out a major air-strike on the Pongha-dong supply troop and factory complex, destroying it completely. This, it was stated, was the first attack of the Korean war against this particular military concentration.

On 13 July, in order to counter an apparent effort by the Chinese-North Korean forces to gain ground along the front line prior to an armistice, maximum support was directed along the battle-line. In furtherance of this effort, four carriers carried out operations on a round-the-clock basis until 27 July at 2201 hours, the time when fighting ceased.

A large portion of air effort was concentrated on enemy air-fields, most of which were rendered unserviceable.

(3) Naval Operations

United Nations Command surface units, operating along the Korean East Coast, continued their blockade from the front lines north of Chongjin. In addition, they fired daily at transportation facilities and supply and industrial areas close to the coast. These units made rail and road cuts, and destroyed rail and road bridges, rolling stock, tunnels, industrial areas and supply dumps.

On the west coast of Korea surface units continued to carry out patrols and blockade of the coast. These ships successfully defended the islands off the coast by maintaining constant watch and by harassing enemy troop concentrations and gun positions on the mainland opposite the islands. In addition, the approaches to these islands were illuminated almost nightly to detect any aggression by the enemy forces.

United Nations Command minesweepers continued their daily sweeps and check sweeps of the channels, coastal areas and anchorages in order to keep them free of mines; patrol planes continued their support of the United Nations Command's effort in Korea by daily anti-submarine, reconnaissance and weather data missions over the waters adjoining Korea; and United Nations Command auxiliary vessels and transports provided personnel lifts and logistic support for the United Nations Command forces in Korea.

The United Nations Command report (S/3148) for the period 1 to 15 August stated that, in accordance with the Armistice Agreement, all hostilities ceased and the United Nations naval blockade of the Korean coast was terminated.

The reports (S/3148 & S/3185) for the period 1 to 31 August stated that the "basic concept" of all United Nations naval operations in the first fortnight of the armistice had been to maintain forces in position to counter renewed aggression and to conduct training exercises. Similar activity was reported in the case of the ground forces and the air force.

c. ECONOMIC AND RELIEF ASSISTANCE

The United Nations Command report (S/3017) for the period 1 to 15 February stated that although the United Nations Command was able to assist the Government of the Republic of Korea in meeting the basic minimum needs of the Korean people for food from United States appropriated funds and contributions made by Member States, such aid was necessarily adapted to meet the general needs and usually involved bulk foods, such as grain.

However, there was an ever present need for specialized and supplementary foods not adaptable to normal programming in large quantities. These special needs, it was reported, related to hospitals, welfare institutions, convalescent centres and, particularly, to feeding stations. Forty-five feeding stations, the report stated, were providing 44,000 meals a day to persons with certificates from medical authorities, all requiring special or supplementary foods, the principal recipients being the sick, pregnant mothers and children. The United Nations Command asked for voluntary contributions of powdered eggs, fats, yeast, sugar, cereals, cod liver oils, dry foods and canned meats which, it said, it could transport to Korea at no expense to the donors.

On 25 February, the United States agreed to pay $85,800,000 to the Republic of Korea for full and final settlement of all unpaid Korean currency provided to the United States forces prior to 7 February 1953. This payment brought to $163,490,444.99 the total which the United States Government had paid for Korean currency provided by the Republic of Korea.

The United Nations Command stressed the shortage of trained medical personnel in Korea and acknowledged the valuable work of the Italian Red Cross and of a Swedish group in this field. It also acknowledged the aid provided by the American-Korean Foundation to help disabled persons. This group, the United Nations Command said, in conjunction with the Republic of Korea, the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA) and the United Nations Command, had initiated a programme of voluntary assistance from the people of the United States in the rehabilitation of Korean disabled civilian and military personnel—including medical, prostheses and training aspects.

In June the United Nations Command reported (S/3132) that the United Nations Civil Assistance Command (UNCACK) was reorganized and redesignated as the Korea Civil Assistance Command (KCAC), so as to operate under the direct supervision of the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command. The purpose of the change was to assure a more efficient administration of the economic assistance being extended to the Republic of Korea by Member States through the Unified Command. Under the new arrangement, the Korean Civil Assistance Command would administer all phases of civil assistance rendered by the United Nations Command to the Republic of Korea, including the formulation of programmes for the relief and support of the civilian population, the distribution of relief supplies and the carrying out of projects of reconstruction and rehabilitation other than those undertaken by the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency.

2. Consideration of the Korean Question by the General Assembly at its Resumed Seventh Session, between 24 February and 23 April 1953⁹

posals for the repatriation of prisoners of war to be transmitted by the President of the Assembly to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and the North Korean authorities. On 20 December the President reported (A/2354)¹¹ to the General Assembly on the implementation of that resolution stating, inter alia, that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and the North Korean authorities had rejected the Assembly's proposals.

a. DISCUSSIONS IN THE FIRST COMMITTEE

The President's report came up for discussion at the resumed seventh session of the General Assembly in February 1953 and was considered by the First Committee during its consideration of the following other Korean items:

(1) the report of the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea (UNCURK) (A/1881)¹² to the Assembly's sixth session, consideration of which had been deferred at that session in view of the armistice negotiations then proceeding in Korea;

(2) the Commission's report (A/2187)¹³ to the seventh session of the Assembly, the discussion of which was begun at the first part of the seventh session;

(3) a report of the Agent General of the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA) (A/2222)¹⁴ to the Assembly's seventh session;

(4) two supplementary reports of the Agent General of UNKRA (A/2222/Add.1; Add.2);¹⁵ and

(5) an interim report from UNCURK (A/2298) containing the Commission's comments on the report and the first supplementary report of the Agent General.

At its 557th meeting on 25 February 1953, the First Committee decided to consider these items together. It discussed them at its 557th to 569th meetings, between 25 February and 9 March.

(1) Question of Inviting Representatives of North Korea

At the 557th meeting, the representative of the USSR submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.19), providing that representatives of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea be invited to participate in the Committee's discussion of the Korean question.

The proposal was opposed by the representatives of Australia, Greece, Peru, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, who shared the view that North Korea had been named an aggressor by the United Nations and had therefore no status in the Organization. Moreover, they held, the Committee had before it all the facts it needed for the consideration of the question, including the reply of the North Korean regime to the conciliatory proposal transmitted to it by the President regarding the repatriation of prisoners of war. Furthermore, it was stated, that regime had its spokesmen in the Committee who could place any new facts before it if they so desired.

In support of the USSR draft resolution, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR, and the USSR said that the Korean question could not be discussed in the absence of the representatives of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea. They denied that it had been proved that North Korea was the aggressor in the Korean conflict, stating that the United States refusal to invite North Korean representatives stemmed from the fear of disclosure of the true facts regarding the war in Korea.

The representative of Indonesia considered, first, that by carrying on armistice negotiations with North Korea the United Nations had formally recognized North Korea as a party to the conflict and, secondly, that by inviting the North Koreans, a better climate might be created for a solution of the problem of an armistice.

The Committee rejected the USSR draft resolution by 35 votes to 16, with 6 abstentions.

At the following meeting, the representative of Pakistan, explaining his vote in favour of the USSR draft resolution, recalled that, when a similar proposal had been submitted at the 511th meeting, his delegation had stated that the presence of North Korean representatives in the Committee would have only one of two results: either, if they persisted in their rather unreasonable attitude, the position of the United Nations would be strengthened; or, if they contributed new elements, that might help the United Nations to attain its objectives more quickly.

(2) Discussion of the President's Report

Most of the discussion in the Committee centred in the report (A/2354) of the President on the implementation of the Assembly's proposals regarding the repatriation of the prisoners of war which had been transmitted to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and to the North Korean authorities and which the latter had rejected in their replies¹⁶ (A/2354,—Annexes II & III) dated 14 and 17 December 1952.

During the debate, the representative of the United States said that the American people desired a lasting peace through the United Nations and that no important group could be found in the country which did not believe in peace. The United States had therefore voted for the resolution of 3 December 1952, which spared no effort to meet the issues involved. The Chinese and North Korean regimes, however, had rejected that resolution and had virtually told the world that they would continue the struggle in Korea and that the Korean problem could be solved only on their terms. He charged the USSR with active support of the Chinese Communists and the North Korean authorities in the Korean war, and, in that connexion, submitted ten facts to show that the USSR had supplied them with equipment, including planes, tanks and heavy weapons, that the Chinese Communists who had entered Korea in 1950 had been almost completely equipped with weapons manufactured in the USSR and that the flow of USSR equipment had been constant and steady and on such a scale that it had made possible the aggression, which had originated from the North, and had determined its scope. He challenged the USSR representative to disprove those facts. The USSR, he said, could stop the war at will and its representative knew it. There was therefore little point in reformulating now the principles on which the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on 3 December 1952 was based. When the aggressors for any reason had a change of heart, it would not be difficult for them to show it. Failure to end the fighting in Korea was due to the frankly announced desire of the Communists to continue the war.

Endorsing the replies from the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea regarding the General Assembly resolution of 3 December 1952, the USSR representative stated that it was the United States which had thwarted the conclusion of an armistice in Korea, although agreement on almost all the articles of the draft armistice agreement had been reached. At the same time, the United States had intensified its air raids over Korea and China and had undertaken a number of measures to expand the warfare in the Far East. The statement of the representative of the United States that love of peace applied to all Americans, without distinction as to party adherence, had been repudiated by his colleagues in both the Republican and Democratic parties. Republican members, for example, had introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives which, with a view to bringing the Korean war to a rapid conclusion, called for the use of the atomic weapon. This and other facts, the USSR representative said, fully repudiated false speeches that were made about the desire of the ruling circles of the United States for peace.

The representative of the USSR then adduced a number of facts which he said had never been refuted and which he believed disproved all claims about the aggression having originated from North Korea. In this connexion, he cited the professed intention, as early as 1949, of President Syngman Rhee to attack North Korea, the assistance allegedly provided by the United States to the "Syngman Rhee clique" for the contemplated attack and the strategic map allegedly found in the archives of the Syngman Rhee Government when those archives fell into the hands of North Korean forces. For the American ruling circles, he said, the Korean war was merely a phase in the preparation of a world war. To that end, the industry of the United States was being militarized and the programme of military preparation was being intensified. Aggressive blocs were being forged and those already in existence were being strengthened. The more the ruling circles of the United States prepared for war, the more they attempted to throw on to the peace-loving countries the responsibility for the growing threat to peace and security and to disguise their true aggressive purposes. That was the explanation of the supposed facts adduced by the representative of the United States, the USSR representative said. The USSR had never concealed the fact that it had sold and continued to sell armaments to its Chinese ally, while China sold the USSR various types of raw materials, including strategic materials, in line with the treaties of friendship and alliance between the two countries. The USSR had no treaty for mutual assistance with Korea and, consequently, did not sell armaments to Korea. However, as had been stated previously, the USSR, when it had withdrawn its troops from Korea in 1948, had sold to that country the surplus of USSR armaments on the spot. The representative of the Soviet Union said that the fact of USSR neutrality in the Korean campaign had been admitted even by the United States Press. The statement that the USSR could end the war in Korea at will was meaningless. It was the USSR which had taken the initiative for the armistice negotiations in Korea and had made proposals for the cessation of hostilities in Korea in August and October 1950, at the sixth session of the General Assembly in 1951, and during the earlier meetings of the seventh session—proposals which had all been rejected by the United States and its allies. In the light of those facts, the statement of the representative of the United States was unfounded and false and was designed to cover up the refusal of the United States to accept the USSR proposals.

The representative of the United States replied that the USSR representative had admitted that his country had been assisting the Chinese Communist forces, which the United Nations had branded as aggressors. The report of the United Nations Commission on Korea in 1950 had cleared up the question of who had been the aggressor, a question decided by the United Nations on several occasions. The USSR representative had accused the United States of wanting to continue the Korean action and of rejecting his so-called peace proposals. The proposal (A/AC.1/729/Rev.1/Corr.1 & Rev.1/Corr.1/Add.1)¹⁷ submitted by the USSR earlier in the session had called for a commission of eleven States to consider the prisoner-of-war question and other political questions, and included the provision that there should be a two-thirds vote in that commission to reach a decision. Since four of the proposed eleven members would be Communists, it was obvious that the USSR "camp" would in effect have a veto. The USSR representative called for a cease-fire now, leaving the question of the prisoners of war to be decided later, but that would mean a cease-fire on condition that thousands of United Nations and Republic of Korea soldiers would be left in Communist hands as hostages.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Colombia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Mexico, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Paraguay, Peru, the Philippines, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom, Uruguay and Yugoslavia voiced their support of the views expressed by the representative of the United States.

The representative of Indonesia regretted the rejection of resolution 610 (VII) by North Korea and the People's Republic of China. While recognizing that the prospects for a cease-fire and armistice were dim, his delegation was anxious for an opportunity of bringing the parties closer together. It considered that there was a possibility of an approach through procedures for lessening world tensions and that a United Nations recommendation urging a meeting between the two principal Powers might open an avenue.

The representative of India recalled that, when submitting the draft resolution which had formed the basis of resolution 610(VII), his delegation had never said that its proposals were the last word on the subject. They had been designed to open the way to negotiations and not to act as a barrier against them. Negotiations could still go on either with the help of that resolution or of any proposals submitted previously. His delegation had no new proposal to put forward. It merely sought to promote agreement on the basis of international law and the Committee must continue patiently to speak with the voice of peace, reason and moderation and to work towards the restoration of peace in Korea.

The representative of Egypt, stressing that conciliation was essential, pointed to the statements of the representatives of Indonesia and of India as being directed towards that aim.

At the 569th meeting of the Committee, the Chairman stated that three draft resolutions concerning proposals for the repatriation of prisoners of war—which had been presented to the Committee at the first part of the seventh session and on which no decision had been taken in view of the adoption of the Indian draft resolution—had been withdrawn by their sponsors. These draft resolutions were: a 21-Power draft resolution (A/C.1/725), a Mexican draft resolution (A/C.1/730) and a Peruvian draft resolution (A/C.1/732).¹⁸ Since no draft resolution was submitted on the President's report, the Committee took no formal action on the question.

(3) Consideration of the Reports of the Agent General of UNKRA

The Committee then turned to the consideration of the reports of the Agent General of UNKRA (A/2222 & Add.1 & 2). In this connexion, it also had before it an interim report of UNCURK (A/2298) containing comments on the report of the Agent General and his first supplementary report. The interim report noted that, while UNCURK did not have any comments on the details of the $70 million programme¹⁹ proposed by UNKRA, it wished to emphasize the necessity of the Agency's beginning a programme on a significant scale immediately aiming at an early increase in Korean domestic production and providing for sustaining imports to help combat inflation.

The debate on the report of the Agent General centred on a joint draft resolution by Canada, Denmark, France, the Philippines, Thailand, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/C.1/L.21), under which the General Assembly would, inter alia:

(1) take note of the reports of the Agent General on the work of UNKRA for the period February 1951 to 15 February 1953;

(2) note with approval that the Agent General had undertaken a programme of relief and rehabilitation projects for the period ending June 1953; and

(3) request all governments, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations to assist in meeting the great and continuing need of the Korean people for relief and rehabilitation assistance.

An Egyptian amendment (A/C.1/L.22) to the draft resolution was accepted by the sponsors.

It provided that the assistance of governments, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations referred to should be "within the limits of their financial possibilities and in accordance with the provisions of their constitutions and statutes".

The representatives of Canada, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Greece, India, Mexico and Uruguay spoke in favour of the draft resolution and commended the Agent General for the manner in which he had performed the task of providing for relief and rehabilitation needs of Korea. In this connexion, the representatives of Canada and Uruguay felt that the reconstruction of Korea must continue to be one of the great objectives of the United Nations. The representatives of Cuba and the Netherlands said that, although the stabilization of the military front had made substantial reconstruction feasible, the continuation of the war had caused further economic deterioration leading to inflation and plunging the inhabitants into frightful misery. The needs of the Korean people were so great, they felt, that only a well-planned effort in collective assistance could meet the difficulties.

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that, at the time the resolution establishing UNKRA was passed, it had been hoped that the fighting would soon come to an end and that UNKRA would start its work without delay. Unfortunately that hope had been still-born and relief work had to remain under the direct supervision of the United Nations military authorities. In those circumstances, the long-term plans of the Agency had to be laid aside, and the Agent General had worked out a more modest programme for the current year. The United Kingdom had contributed a sum of £2,800,000, and would do its utmost to make the programme a success. In summarizing his country's contribution to Korean relief, the representative of Australia stated that Australia had pledged itself in March 1951 to give the equivalent of nearly four and a half million dollars, including the amount of $400,000 already made available to the emergency programme. His Government felt that contributing governments should continue to make available amounts required as the programme expanded and as the actual need of the Agency for further funds arose when specific projects were put into operation in Korea, rather than handing over the full amount pledged in one payment. The Australian paid contribution was therefore one third of its total pledge.

In an appeal for economic assistance for his country, the representative of Korea stressed that the war reduced the Korean people to a disturbing state of misery. A recent report to the United Nations showed that the per capita consumption in South Korea was 25 per cent below of 1949, when the standard of living in Korea had already been far below normal. The Korean Minister for Trade and Industry had stated that 60 per cent of the textile industry had been put out of action, the coal mines and electric power stations had been drastically crippled, 65 per cent of the livestock had disappeared and total production had been reduced by at least a third compared with the pre-war level. The representative of the Republic of Korea emphasized certain points which, his Government felt, should underlie any programme of reconstruction, in particular that the main need was to rebuild towns, factories, mines and productive undertakings.

In conclusion, the representative of the Republic of Korea reviewed the work which had been accomplished in his country both under the emergency programme and by UNKRA. In supporting the draft resolution, he expressed the gratitude of the people and the Government of the Republic of Korea to all who were aiding them in their task of reconstruction; nevertheless, he stated their need continued to grow and was assuming alarming proportions. If immediate steps were not taken to remedy the economic devastation caused by the war the United Nations effort to fight aggression in Korea would have been in vain. That task, he concluded, could not be postponed until hostilities had ended.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR could not agree with the favourable assessment of the activities of the Agent General. UNKRA, it was stated, had done its utmost, not to perform the tasks assigned to it, but to assist the United Nations armed forces in their military operations. The prerequisites for the rehabilitation of Korea were, in fact, an immediate cessation of hostilities, the conclusion of an armistice and the evacuation of foreign troops. It was noted that more than ten times as much was spent on the continuation of the war as was spent on the reconstruction of Korea. These representatives indicated that they would vote against the seven-Power draft resolution.

The representative of the United States, speaking at the close of the debate, assessed the aid which governments had given for the relief and rehabilitation of the Republic of Korea. He said that under the emergency programme set up under Security Council resolution of 31 July 1950 (S/1657), governments of 30 Members and non-members of the United Nations had, by the end of 1952, made contributions totalling $358 million, of which $321,688,000, exclusive of services, had been contributed by the United States, $17,389,000 by other governments, and $20 million by United Nations specialized agencies and private voluntary organizations. This emergency programme had saved the population from starvation and epidemics under extremely difficult conditions. In addition, the United Nations Command had made substantial repairs to railroads, bridges and highways, to water systems and to power-generating and distributing systems.

UNKRA, he continued, was symbolic of the collective responsibility to supply means by which the Korean people could begin to rebuild their unhappy land. In recent months it had been possible to undertake an expansion in UNKRA's activities and, in co-operation with the Unified Command, a programme of $70 million had been approved, some of which was now under way. Under it, grain and consumer goods were being imported to combat inflation. The reorganization of the Taegu Medical College and Hospital was in progress. Supplies were being purchased for the production of vaccines at the National Veterinary Laboratory and preparations for restoring the harbour of Kunsan were under way. Engineers were surveying the possibilities of increased coal production and work had been started in housing, education, vocational training, school repair and health clinics. The free world could not allow free Koreans to suffer destruction without aid in the reconstruction of their economy any more than it could allow them to be overrun without coming to their assistance.

At its 569th meeting on 9 March, the Committee adopted the seven-Power draft resolution (A/C.1/L.21), as amended by Egypt, by 54 votes to 5.

(4) Report of UNCURK

With reference to the report of UNCURK (A/2187)²⁰, the First Committee had before it a draft resolution by the USSR (A/C.1/L.24), providing for the termination of the Commission as being incapable of fulfilling the tasks assigned to it. In support of the draft resolution, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR expressed the view that the Commission had become a subsidiary organ of the United States Command in Korea and had done nothing for the unification and rehabilitation of Korea.

At its 569th meeting, the Committee rejected the USSR draft resolution (A/C.1/L.24) by 54 votes to 5.

b. RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The report of the First Committee (A/2368) was considered by the General Assembly at its 414th plenary meeting on 11 March 1953. The majority of the representatives made brief statements concerning the possibility of an early cessation of hostilities and the need for Korean reconstruction. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR spoke in favour of a USSR draft resolution (A/L.144) requesting the termination of UNCURK as being incapable of discharging the tasks assigned to it. This draft resolution was rejected by 54 votes to 5 and the draft resolution submitted by the First Committee (A/2368) was adopted by 55 votes to 5, as resolution 701(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly

"1. Reaffirms the objective of the United Nations, adopted in General Assembly resolution 410 (V) of 1 December 1950, to provide relief and rehabilitation in assisting the Korean people to relieve their sufferings and to repair the great devastation and destruction in their country;

"2. Recognizes that the need of such relief and rehabilitation continues to be most urgent;

"3. Takes note of the reports of the Agent General on the work of the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency for the period February 1951 to 15 February 1953;

"4. Notes with approval that the Agent General has now undertaken, in co-operation with the Government of the Republic of Korea and the United Nations Command, and in consultation with the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea, a programme of relief and rehabilitation projects for the period ending June 1953, which has received the approval of the United Nations Advisory Committee to the Agent General, and looks forward to its successful execution;

"5. Expresses its appreciation of the contributions which have been made by governments, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations;

"6. Requests those governments which have made pledges to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency to make prompt payment of such pledges;

"7. Further requests all governments, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations to assist, within the limits of their financial possibilities and in accordance with the provisions of their constitutions and statutes, in meeting the great and continuing need of the Korean people for relief and rehabilitation assistance."

3. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Resumed Seventh Session, between 17 and 28 August 1953

On 18 April 1953, during the consideration of the item entitled: "Measures to avert the threat of a new world war and to strengthen peace and friendship among nations",²¹ the General Assembly adopted resolution 705(VII) to reconvene the Assembly session in order to resume consideration of the Korean question upon notification by the United Nations Command to the Security Council, of the signing of an armistice agreement, or when, in the view of a majority of Members, other developments in Korea required it.

In a letter (A/2425) dated 26 July 1953, the permanent representative of the United States informed the Secretary-General that, on 27 July, an Armistice Agreement had been entered into between the United Nations Command and the Commanders of the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers.²²

In a cable of the same date, the President of the General Assembly informed the Governments of all Member States, that, in accordance with resolution 705(VII), the seventh session of the Assembly would reconvene on 17 August to resume consideration of the Korean question.

By a letter (A/2431; S/3079) dated 7 August, addressed to the Secretary-General, the acting permanent representative of the United States transmitted, for the information of the Security Council and the General Assembly, a special report of the Unified Command on the armistice in Korea, together with the official text of the Armistice Agreement entered into on 27 July.

At the 429th plenary meeting of the General Assembly, on 17 August, it was agreed that the First Committee should resume its consideration of the Korean question.

a. DISCUSSIONS IN THE FIRST COMMITTEE

The First Committee considered the question at its 613th to 625th meetings, between 18 and 27 August.

At the opening of the debate, a draft resolution was submitted by the representative of the USSR (A/C.1/L.49), providing, inter alia, that the Committee should invite representatives of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and of the Chinese People's Republic to participate in the discussion of the Korean question. The Committee decided, by 34 votes to 18, with 7 abstentions, not to reconsider the question of inviting representatives of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, and, thereafter, rejected, by 34 votes to 14, with 9 abstentions, the proposal to invite representatives of the Chinese People's Republic.

The Committee had before it the following draft resolutions and amendments:

(1) A joint draft resolution (originally submitted in the plenary meeting of the Assembly) entitled "Implementation of paragraph 60 of the Korean Armistice Agreement" submitted by fifteen of the sixteen nations having armed forces under the Unified Command: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Philippines, Thailand, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/L.151/Rev.1).

Under this draft resolution, the General Assembly would recommend:

(a) that the side contributing armed forces under the Unified Command should have as participants in the political conference to be held under paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement²³ those among the Member States contributing armed forces which desired to be represented, together with the Republic of Korea, and the participating governments should act independently at the conference with full freedom of action and should be bound only by decisions or agreements to which they adhered;

(b) that the United States Government, after consultation with the other participating countries on that side, should arrange with the other side for the political conference to be held as soon as possible, but not later than 28 October 1953, at a place and on a date satisfactory to both sides;

(c) that the Secretary-General should, if this was agreeable to both sides, provide the conference with services and facilities; and

(d) that the Member States participating should inform the United Nations when agreement was reached at the conference and keep the United Nations informed at other appropriate times. Finally, under the draft resolution, the General Assembly would reaffirm its intention to carry out its programme for relief and rehabilitation in Korea and appeal to all Member Governments to contribute to that task.

(2) As an alternative to the above draft resolution, the USSR submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.48)

²³ For paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement, relating to the holding of a political conference, see p. 144.

by which the Assembly, "deeming it necessary to ensure the most favourable conditions for the successful work of the political conference", would recommend as participants the United States, the United Kingdom, France, the USSR, the Chinese People's Republic, India, Poland, Sweden, Burma, the People's Democratic Republic of Korea and South Korea. A later revision of the draft (A/C.1/L.48/Rev.1) added Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Indonesia, Mexico and Syria to the list of participants and omitted Sweden, which had expressed a wish not to participate. The revised draft resolution also provided that "the decisions of the conference will be deemed to have been adopted if they have the unanimous consent of both parties which have signed the Armistice Agreement."

The USSR also submitted the same proposals in the form of an amendment (A/C.1/L.52) to the fifteen-Power draft resolution on the composition of the conference. The amendment would delete the provision for participation of the Powers contributing armed forces under the Unified Command and further delete the provision asking the United States to arrange for the conference. It would then substitute the USSR proposals regarding the composition of the conference (see above).

(3) A joint draft resolution, originally submitted in plenary meeting, by Australia and New Zealand (A/L.152) later co-sponsored by Denmark (A/L.152/Rev.1) and by Norway (A/L.152/Rev.2) providing that the General Assembly, having adopted the resolution entitled "Implementation of paragraph 60 of the Korean Armistice Agreement" (see above), recommend that the USSR participate in the political conference provided the other side desired it.

To this draft resolution, the USSR submitted an amendment (A/C.1/L.53) to delete the reference to the adoption of the resolution on the implementation of paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement and the words "provided the other side desires it" in the operative part.

(4) A joint draft resolution, originally submitted in plenary meeting, by Australia, Canada, New Zealand and the United Kingdom (A/L.153), providing that the General Assembly, having regard to the resolution entitled "Implementation of paragraph 60 of the Korean Armistice Agreement" recommend that India participate in the political conference.

To this draft resolution the USSR submitted an amendment (A/C.1/L.53) to delete the reference in the preamble to the adoption of the fifteen-Power draft resolution.

(5) A joint draft resolution originally submitted in the plenary session, by the same fifteen Powers which had submitted the draft resolution regarding the composition of the conference (A/L.154/Rev.1). Under this draft resolution, the General Assembly would pay tribute to the soldiers who had fought under the United Nations Command in Korea.

The First Committee agreed that this draft resolution should be dealt with in a plenary meeting of the Assembly itself rather than in the Committee²⁴

(6) A joint draft resolution by Burma, India, Indonesia and Liberia (A/C.1/L.50), requesting the Secretary-General to communicate the proposals on the Korean question submitted to the third part of the seventh session and those recommended by it, together with the records of the relevant proceedings of the General Assembly, to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and to the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, and to report to the General Assembly as appropriate.

To this draft resolution an amendment was submitted by Peru (A/C.1/L.51), which would delete the words "report to the General Assembly as appropriate" and substitute the words "inform the Members of the United Nations of any communication received". On a statement by the representative of India that he would delete the words "to the General Assembly" if the representative of Peru would withdraw the amendment, the Peruvian amendment was withdrawn.

Most of the discussion in the Committee was concerned with the three draft resolutions on the composition of the conference: one submitted by the fifteen of the sixteen Member States having armed forces under the Unified Command in Korea, the second the alternative draft by the Soviet Union, and the third that concerning the participation of India submitted by Australia, Canada, New Zealand and the United Kingdom.

Introducing the fifteen-Power draft resolution, the representative of the United States stressed that paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement should be the basis of all decisions concerning the political conference. The United States, he said, adhered to that paragraph with its concept of two sides because it was one of the few things that seemed definite in the whole picture. If there was a desire for agreement, a conference of both sides could do as well as any other type of conference. The fifteen-Power draft resolution (A/L.151/Rev.1) provided that each government would be bound only by its own vote. That meant that, if two nations agreed, their agreement would apply as far as they were concerned. That seemed to be the best way to get results, the United States representative said. No results would be reached in a large conference where unanimity on all decisions was required. The fifteen-Power draft resolution further recommended that on the one side, in addition to the Republic of Korea, any nation which had contributed forces to the United Nations in Korea might attend the conference if it desired, since those nations had earned that right. The draft resolution did not deal with participants on the other side. If that side wished to have another country, such as the Soviet Union, participate on its side, the United States would have no objection. However, the Soviet Union could not take part as a neutral, since paragraph 60 did not contemplate the inclusion of any neutral. Moreover, the Soviet Union could certainly not qualify as a neutral nation in the conflict, the representative of the United States said. The matter of who would participate on the other side was basically one for the other side to determine. The United States, he said, was willing to have the Soviet Union participate in the conference if for no other reason than to bear its share of the responsibility and accountability for peace.

The draft resolution, he stressed, made no provision for participation by other Members of the United Nations which did not properly belong on either side, under paragraph 60. There were several States which had a general interest in the area, and all Members of the United Nations had an interest in peace. None of them, however, had any greater interest in Korea than several others. If any other nations were to be invited, there was no logical reason for not inviting neighbours of Korea with direct interest in the area, and the question would be where the process would end.

Regarding the questions to be considered at the conference, the United States representative said that paragraph 60 again should be followed, and the details should be worked out at the conference itself. The United States favoured its concentrating on Korea and believed that the objective should be a unified, independent and democratic Korea. If the discussion developed in such a way as to suggest that consideration of other subjects in the Far East or elsewhere would be useful, the United States would be pleased, but it believed that such developments would call for another conference with different participants.

With regard to the USSR draft resolution, he considered that it was not a very democratic one, since it established two classes of nations. According to that resolution, he said, the Chinese People's Volunteers would have a final say as to whether agreements went into effect, whereas the Government of the Republic of Korea would be bound by the decisions of the conference without its consent being required. Moreover, the USSR draft resolution would exclude the majority of the countries whose young men gave their lives to repel aggression in Korea. Furthermore, that draft discriminated not only between members of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, but even between the Soviet satellites. Some were chosen, while others were dropped.

The representative of France considered that the political conference should take place in a neutral country removed from the combat theatre and suggested that Geneva offered particular advantages.

With regard to participants, he believed that the terms of paragraph 60 should not be interpreted too literally. The conference should attain, in the best possible conditions, the re-establishment of peace in the Far East. All those who could usefully participate should be invited, and it was desirable that the conference should not consist of two opposing camps confronting one another.

The conference itself should decide upon its own competence; but the Korean question should be considered first, for until that was settled it would be useless to go further. The question, however, was not an isolated one. It was hard to see how there could be a valid peace in the Far East when war continued elsewhere in Asia.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government did not wish to perpetuate the concept of two sides and was gratified that the provision of the first fifteen-Power draft resolution (A/L.151/Rev.1), according to which the participating governments would act independently, would make it possible for many voices to be heard at the proposed conference.

He also considered that successful progress on Korean questions at the political conference should lead to discussions or negotiations on wider issues affecting the Far East.

Besides its sponsors, the fifteen-Power draft resolution was also supported by, among others, the representatives of Brazil, Chile, China, Cuba, Haiti, Israel, Liberia, Norway and South Africa. These representatives considered that the criterion applied in selecting the participants was a fair one. Under the draft resolution, it was pointed out, the participating governments would only be bound by decisions and agreements to which they adhered. That provision was sensible and realistic and avoided the concept of the conference consisting of two negotiating teams facing each other. Also, since Members whose participation on the United Nations side was proposed under the draft resolution would represent the United Nations as a whole, there was no question of excluding any one.

The sponsors of the joint draft resolution and other representatives supporting it expressed opposition to the USSR draft resolution concerning the composition of the conference. They considered that it was impossible to accept the proposition that from among those who fought on the United Nations side, only the United States, the United Kingdom, France and South Korea should be present. Australia, for example, its representative said, had an unassailable claim to participation, due to its contribution to the United Nations action in Korea and its geographical position. A similar claim to representation was put forward by the representative of New Zealand.

It was stated that the last sentence of the USSR draft resolution, that "decisions of the conference will be deemed to have been adopted if they have the unanimous consent of parties which have signed the Agreement", provided in effect that the parties which had signed the Armistice Agreement were to have a veto. The United Nations side however, did not agree with the idea of vetoes. It agreed that any government which was to have any part in implementing any particular decision had to agree with that decision, which would otherwise have no effect. But it did not like the idea that every government represented at the conference had to agree to every word that was said. The only sensible basis for such a conference, it was emphasized, was contained in the joint draft resolution, which provided that the participating governments would be bound only by decisions or agreements to which they adhered.

The representative of the USSR considered that the views of the representative of the United States and the other sponsors of the first fifteen-Power draft resolution (A/L.151/Rev.1) concerning the composition of the political conference were based on a fallacious interpretation of paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement. This, he considered, was made clear by the fact that a proper functioning of the conference was of interest not only to the sides mentioned in paragraph 60, but also to all peace-loving peoples and particularly to the peoples neighbouring Korea. The text of paragraph 60, he said, did not state that the representatives of the two sides could be only the countries which had actually taken part in the hostilities. In paragraph 60 it was recommended to the Governments of the countries concerned on both sides that a conference of a higher level of both sides should be held between representatives appointed respectively. It was clear that the question of participation as understood by the expression "countries concerned" was one thing, whereas the question of who should represent those countries at the conference was another matter altogether. Thus, participation by Members of the United Nations who had not taken part in the hostilities was not excluded by the wording of paragraph 60, which could not be construed as limiting participation in the conference to nationals of the two sides. In the opinion of his delegation the political conference was likely to succeed only if it was based on the principle of the round table at which not only the representatives of both sides would participate, but also representatives of other countries which were truly interested in the peaceful settlement of the Korean question.

The USSR draft resolution (A/C.1/L.48), he said, would limit the conference to a small number, for it was true that a large group would multiply the difficulties. While limiting the number, the Soviet Union held that it was necessary to have as participants some States which had not been engaged in hostilities and especially the neighbouring States. It considered that a neighbour had a greater interest in obtaining peace next door than a more distant State and that it was inadmissible to try to include the latter and exclude the neighbours on the basis of contribution of troops. From the political and practical point of view there should be included not only the Soviet Union but also such States as India, which had made a considerable contribution to the cessation of hostilities, and Poland, Czechoslovakia and Burma, which had made every effort in the United Nations to bring the war to a conclusion. The Soviet Union did not suggest that South Korea should be ruled out in the making of decisions. One of the basic principles of the USSR draft resolution was that North Korea and South Korea should be the principal parties whose consent would be required, since it was the view of the Soviet Union that the Korean people must settle their internal affairs by and between themselves.

The position that decisions would be adopted if they had the consent of the two parties which had signed the Armistice Agreement was, the representative of the USSR stated, also supported by the Foreign Minister of the Chinese People's Republic. The People's Republic of China, he said, wished that the conference should take the form of a round table conference, rather than the form of negotiations only between the parties which had signed the Agreement. Its views were that the decisions of the conference would be accepted only if they commanded the unanimous agreement of the parties which had signed the Agreement. Secondly, the scope of action and terms of reference should be in keeping with paragraph 60. There should first be settled by negotiation the question of the withdrawal of all foreign troops. Then a peaceful settlement in Korea should be negotiated and, thereafter, other questions should be discussed. Thirdly, the People's Republic of China supported the Soviet Union draft resolution regarding the membership of the conference and considered that all the countries whose troops participated on the side of the United Nations might be regarded as one of the sides that signed the Armistice Agreement. Fourthly, the General Assembly had acted unreasonably in not inviting representatives of the People's Republic of China and of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to take part in the consideration of the organization of the conference. Accordingly, to facilitate convening the conference, the General Assembly had the responsibility of keeping those Governments informed concerning all proposals and recommendations relating to the conference. Finally, any recommendations of the General Assembly in keeping with the foregoing principles would be considered by the Central People's Government as a possible basis for the carrying out of the political conference.

The representative of the USSR charged that the Mutual Security Treaty between the Republic of Korea and the United States was a link in a chain of measures taken with a view to ensuring military bases for United States forces for possible future use in aggressive military actions in the Pacific area, and that the sixteen-Power Declaration (A/2431; S/3079)²⁵ was tantamount to a threat to start a third world war if a new local incident were to arise in Korea. The representative of the United States declared that no secret agreement had been concluded between the United States and the Republic of Korea.

In reply to the assertion that the USSR draft resolution would oblige South Korea to accept any decisions reached between the two sides without its consent, the representative of the USSR said that that was a misinterpretation of his text. Politically and factually, he said, such a position would be utterly senseless. Without South Korea's consent no decision could be taken by the conference.

He stated further that four of the participants in the hostilities, proposed in his revised draft resolution, had been suggested to represent the side described as that of the United Nations. The other side would be represented by North Korea and the Chinese People's Volunteers, that was to say, two representatives. Therefore, there would be four countries on one side and two countries on the other along with nine neutrals of which six were Arab or Asian countries. That composition was based on the principle of a multi-lateral conference and the elimination of the notion of having only two sides opposing each other.

Supporting the USSR position, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR expressed the view that the USSR draft resolution was correctly based on the principle of a round table conference thereby breaking with the concept of two opposite parties. The composition of the conference as proposed under that draft resolution stemmed from the fundamental position of the primary responsibility of the five Great Powers for the issues of world peace and international security.

The representative of the Republic of Korea expressed his Government's opposition to a round table conference. He stated that, in dealing with Communists, past experience had shown that it was dangerous to have more than two sides, because the intermediate side or sides seldom failed to serve the Communist ends. His delegation also wished that the membership of the conference should be limited to the parties to the war in Korea. The conference, he said, would finally decide whether Korea would go to the Communist empire or remain in the free world, and his Government felt that it should have at its side in the fateful conference only those who had sent military aid.

He also stated the Mutual Security Treaty between the Republic of Korea and the United States, as well as the sixteen-Power Declaration (A/2431, part I) were defence arrangements designed to counterbalance the military pacts between the North Korean regime and Communist China and between the latter and the USSR.

There was general support in the Committee for the five-Power draft resolution (A/L.152) concerning the participation of the USSR, most representatives expressing the view that for the success of the conference USSR participation was essential.

The United Kingdom representative stated that he considered that the USSR should be represented at the conference because it was a great Far Eastern Power having a land frontier with Korea and because its presence would be necessary for the success of the conference. The representatives of China, the Philippines and the United States, however, emphasized that, while it would be unrealistic to plan a political conference without the participation of the USSR, the invitation should come not from the United Nations but from the Chinese-North Korean side. They held that the USSR, on account of its sympathy with the aggressors and the assistance it had rendered to them, had lost the right to be invited by the United Nations to participate in the Conference.

While a majority of the Committee supported the participation of India, its participation was opposed by the representatives of Bolivia, Brazil, China, Colombia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Greece, Haiti, Israel, the Philippines, Peru and the United States, among others.

The United States representative stated that his delegation would not support the participation of India, because it believed that the conference was most likely to succeed if it was limited to the belligerents on both sides. It was not India that it opposed; it did not favour the inclusion of any non-belligerent. Secondly, a principal participant on the United Nations side was the Republic of Korea, and its consent was indispensable to any result at the conference. In view of the known attitude of the Republic of Korea, his delegation believed that the participation of India would jeopardize the success of the conference. Thirdly, there were other countries more directly concerned in Korean affairs than India, namely, Japan and Nationalist China. Thus, the inclusion of India or of any other non-belligerent would make the claim of the Governments of those countries to participate virtually undeniable.

On the other hand, the United Kingdom representative considered that India should be a participant because, as a major Asian Power, it could make an important contribution to the success of the conference. It had already contributed significantly towards the solution of the Korean problem and had provided the Chairman of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission.

Some representatives based their opposition on the interpretation of paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement, according to which the conference should be restricted to the belligerents, with the exception of the USSR which, it was said, occupied a special position as a great Power and a neighbour of Korea. Others, including the representatives of Brazil, China, Colombia, the Dominican Republic and Haiti, expressed the view that India's participation might endanger the conference in view of the uncompromising opposition to its participation expressed by the Republic of Korea. The representative of the Republic of Korea strongly opposed participation of India in the conference, arguing that India had followed a policy of appeasement towards the Communists.

The representative of India stressed that his country had no desire to seek a place in the conference unless it was clear that it could perform some useful function in the interests of peace and that the major parties concerned desired its assistance in the matter.

At its 625th meeting, the Committee voted on the draft resolutions and amendments before it (see above).

The two parts of the USSR amendment to the fifteen-Power draft (A/C.1/L.52) were rejected by roll-call votes; the first, to delete the provisions regarding participation in the conference and the provision that the United States arrange for the conference was rejected by 41 votes to 5, with 13 abstentions; and the second, to substitute the USSR proposals, by 40 votes to 5, with 14 abstentions.

The fifteen-Power draft resolution (A/L.151/Rev.1), on the implementation of paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement, was voted on in parts, some of them by roll call. They were adopted in votes ranging from 59 to none to 42 to 5, with 12 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 42 votes to 5, with 12 abstentions (A/2450, resolution A).

The USSR draft resolution (A/C.1/L.48/Rev.1) concerning participation in the conference was rejected by 41 votes to 5, with 13 abstentions.

The USSR amendment (A/C.1/L.53) to the draft resolution by Australia, Denmark, New Zealand and Norway (A/L.152/Rev.2) on USSR participation was rejected; the first part, to delete the reference to the adoption of the resolution entitled "Implementation of paragraph 60 of the Korean Armistice Agreement", was rejected by 39 votes to 5, with 15 abstentions; and the second part, to delete the phrase "provided the other side desires it", by 36 votes to 15, with 8 abstentions. The draft resolution (A/L.152/Rev.2) was voted upon by paragraphs; the first paragraph was adopted by 43 votes to 6, with 10 abstentions, and the second by 54 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions. The resolution was adopted, as a whole, by 55 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions (A/2450, resolution B).

The USSR amendment (A/C.1/L.53) to the draft resolution (A/L.153) on India's participation, to delete the reference to the adoption of the resolution entitled "Implementation of paragraph 60 of the Korean Armistice Agreement", was rejected by 38 votes to 5, with 15 abstentions. The two paragraphs of the draft resolution were voted upon separately and adopted, the first by 37 votes to 7, with 11 abstentions, and the second by a roll-call vote of 27 to 21, with 11 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 27 to 21, with 11 abstentions (A/2450, resolution C).

The draft resolution by Burma, India, Indonesia and Liberia (A/C.1/L.50), concerning the communication of documentation to the People's Republic of China and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, after inclusion of a drafting change by the sponsors, was adopted by 54 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions (A/2450, resolution D).

b. RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY
THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The First Committee's report (A/2450) was considered by the General Assembly at its 430th plenary meeting on 28 August.

In a statement regarding the draft resolution concerning Indian participation, the representative of India explained that his delegation had not participated in any of the voting of the First Committee, except on the part of the fifteen-Power draft resolution stating that the General Assembly welcomed the holding of a political conference, because his Government considered that the Korean question had now emerged into a post-armistice period and that further negotiations should not rule out any possibility, provided all those possibilities moved in the one direction of peace. Taking everything into consideration, he thought that the purposes of peace were best reached by not forcing the draft resolution regarding India's participation in the political conference to a decision in the Assembly.

At the request of the representative of New Zealand, who spoke on behalf of the original sponsors of the draft resolution in question, the President suggested that the draft resolution be withdrawn, and the Assembly so decided.

The USSR submitted (A/L.157) a draft resolution on the composition of the political conference, identical to that (A/C.1/L.48/Rev.1) which had been rejected in the First Committee. It was rejected by the Assembly by 42 votes to 5, with 12 abstentions.

The USSR also reintroduced (A/L.155) the amendments (previously rejected in the Committee—A/C.1/L.52) to the draft resolution "A" recommended by the Committee on the implementation of paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement. These were rejected, respectively, by 40 votes to 5, with 11 abstentions, and 43 votes to 5, with 10 abstentions.

An amendment to this draft resolution was also submitted by Bolivia, Chile, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras, Paraguay and Peru (A/L.158). It provided that the words "Member States contributing armed forces" in the first operative paragraph, should be followed by the additional phrase "pursuant to the call of the United Nations". The amendment was adopted by 43 votes to 5, with 10 abstentions.

The four paragraphs of the preamble of draft resolution "A", were adopted, respectively, by 59, 59, 55 and 56 votes to none. The first operative paragraphs, as amended by the seven Powers, was adopted by 43 votes to 5, with 11 abstentions, and the second by 56 votes to none, with 1 abstention. The resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 43 votes to 5, with 10 abstentions, as resolution 711 A (VII).

The USSR also submitted an amendment (A/L.156) to draft resolution "B" dealing with the participation of the USSR in the political conference. It would have deleted reference to the adoption of the above resolution and also the condition that the USSR should attend if the Chinese-North Korean side so desired. These amendments were rejected, respectively, by 39 votes to 5, with 15 abstentions, and 34 votes to 14, with 8 abstentions. Draft resolution "B" was adopted by 55 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, as resolution 711 B (VII).

The USSR submitted an amendment (A/L.156) to draft resolution "C" concerning India's participation. The amendment would have deleted reference to the adoption of resolution 711 A (VII). Since the draft resolution was withdrawn no vote was taken on the amendment.

Draft resolution "D" concerning the communication of the documentation to Peiping and Pyongyang was adopted by 54 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, as resolution 711 C (VII).

Resolution 711(VII) read:

A

IMPLEMENTATION OF PARAGRAPH 60 OF THE KOREAN ARMISTICE AGREEMENT

"The General Assembly:

"1. Notes with approval the Armistice Agreement concluded in Korea on 27 July 1953, the fact that the fighting has ceased, and that a major step has thus been taken towards the full restoration of international peace and security in the area;

"2. Reaffirms that the objectives of the United Nations remain the achievement by peaceful means of a unified, independent and democratic Korea under a representative form of government and the full restoration of international peace and security in the area;

"3. Notes the recommendation contained in the Armistice Agreement that "In order to ensure the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, the military Commanders of both sides hereby recommend to the governments of the countries concerned on both sides that, within three (3) months after the Armistice Agreement is signed and becomes effective, a political conference of a higher level of both sides be held by representatives appointed respectively to settle through negotiation the questions of the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea, the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, etc.";

"4. Welcomes the holding of such a conference;

"5. Recommends that:

"(a) The side contributing armed forces under the Unified Command in Korea shall have as participants in the conference those among the Member States contributing armed forces pursuant to the call of the United Nations which desire to be represented, together with the Republic of Korea. The participating governments shall act independently at the conference with full freedom of action and shall be bound only by decisions or agreements to which they adhere;

"(b) The United States Government, after consultation with the other participating countries referred to in sub-paragraph (a) above, shall arrange with the other side for the political conference to be held as soon as possible, but not later than 28 October 1953, at a place and on a date satisfactory to both sides;

"(c) The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall, if this is agreeable to both sides, provide the political conference with such services and facilities as may be feasible;

"(d) The Member States participating pursuant to sub-paragraph (a) above shall inform the United Nations when agreement is reached at the conference and keep the United Nations informed at other appropriate times;

"6. Reaffirms its intention to carry out its programme for relief and rehabilitation in Korea, and appeals to the governments of all Member States to contribute to this task."

B

"The General Assembly,

"Having adopted the resolution entitled "Implementation of paragraph 60 of the Korean Armistice Agreement",

"Recommends that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics participate in the Korean political conference provided the other side desires it."

C

"The General Assembly,

"Requests the Secretary-General to communicate the proposals on the Korean question submitted to the resumed meetings of the seventh session and recommended by the Assembly, together with the records of the relevant proceedings of the General Assembly, to the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and to the Government of the People's Democratic Republic of Korea and to report as appropriate."

At the 431st plenary meeting on 28 August, the General Assembly considered the second fifteen-Power draft resolution (A/L.154/Rev.1), submitted by Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Philippines, Thailand, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States.

This draft resolution was adopted with one amendment (see below).

An amendment to this draft resolution was submitted by Chile, Ecuador, El Salvador, Honduras and Mexico (A/L.160) to replace the words "under the auspices of" in the last paragraph, by the words "pursuant to the call". This amendment was adopted by 54 votes to 5. The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 53 votes to 5, as resolution 712(VII).

Resolution 712 (VII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the resolutions of the Security Council of 25 June, 27 June and 7 July 1950 and the resolutions of the General Assembly of 7 October 1950, 1 December 1950, 1 February 1951, 18 May 1951 and 3 December 1952,

"Having received the report of the Unified Command dated 7 August 1953,

"Noting with profound satisfaction that fighting has now ceased in Korea on the basis of an honourable armistice,

"1. Salutes the heroic soldiers of the Republic of Korea and of all those countries which sent armed forces to its assistance;

"2. Pays tribute to all those who died in resisting aggression and thus in upholding the cause of freedom and peace;

"3. Expresses its satisfaction that the first efforts pursuant to the call of the United Nations to repel armed aggression by collective military measures have been successful, and expresses its firm conviction that this proof of the effectiveness of collective security under the United Nations Charter will contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security."

4. Report of UNCURK to the Eighth Session of the General Assembly

a. THE COMMISSION'S REPORT

The United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea submitted a report (A/2441) to the eighth session of the General Assembly, covering the period from 28 August 1952 to 14 August 1953.

Outlining the attitude of the Government of the Republic of Korea towards the Armistice Agreement, signed in Korea on 27 July, the report stated that during the period preceding the signing, the President and the Government had expressed basically the view that an armistice that left Korea divided and Chinese Communist armies in North Korea would constitute a death sentence to the Republic of Korea. In an endeavour to win the support of the Government of the Republic of Korea to an armistice, the President of the United States had sent a special envoy to Korea for conversations with President Rhee. At the conclusion of the discussions, which had lasted from 26 June to 11 July, the President of the Republic of Korea had given assurances that, although he did not agree with the proposed armistice terms, he would not take any action to obstruct the conclusion of an armistice or its implementation. Immediately following the signing of the Armistice Agreement, he had stated, inter alia, that his Government would not disturb an armistice while a political conference, provided for in the Agreement, undertook within a limited time to solve peacefully the problems of the liberation and re-unification of Korea. The Government's opposition to an armistice without unification had been fully supported by the National Assembly. After the signing of the armistice, the National Assembly, on 3 August, had unanimously adopted a resolution in which it had, inter alia, expressed its opposition to any plan for the unification of Korea which would contravene the sovereignty of the Republic. All political and social organizations which had expressed views had also joined in opposing an armistice without unification.

In a chapter dealing with the development of representative government in the Republic of Korea, the Commission expressed the view that the basic constitutional structure of the Republic of Korea remained representative and democratic, although much remained to be accomplished in establishing a satisfactory relationship between the executive and legislative branches of the government, and in resolving the difficulties which were inherent in an effort to combine the presidential and parliamentary systems in a single constitution.

As the main industrial resources were north of the 38th parallel, the continued division of the country imposed the need to develop power, transport and coal mining as a basis for further industrialization in the South, the report said. Although the conclusion of an armistice should provide greater opportunities, the problem of reconstruction was so immense that a period of stability and security was essential. As long as the Republic was obliged to maintain between sixteen and 20 divisions under arms, budgetary problems and inflationary pressures would continue. It would appear most unlikely that the Republic could develop a self-supporting economy, even given the high level of economic assistance currently expected, if it must bear the present burden for its security in a divided peninsula.

Unification of Korea was, therefore, not only an important political objective, but also a highly desirable goal as a means of re-uniting the complementary economies of the South and the North, and as a means of promoting security and stability. In the meantime, while unification was being sought and conditions of peace established, the burden of security must be collectively borne, if the Republic was to have a real opportunity to develop towards a self-sustaining economy.

In conclusion, the Commission stressed that the signing of the armistice had successfully concluded the military phase of the first effort to enforce the principle of collective security through a world-wide international organization. The Republic of Korea had gradually increased the strength of its armed forces until, at the time of the armistice, they were holding the greater portion of the battle field; consideration of its contribution to collective security should help to create a better understanding of the Republic. Close co-operation and mutual understanding between the United Nations and the Republic of Korea must be maintained. There was now the opportunity of seeking to achieve by peaceful means the common objective of the Republic of Korea and of the United Nations—a unified, independent and democratic Korea in accordance with the free expression of the will of the Korean people.

The Commission remained agreed on the analysis and general conclusions set out in its previous reports (A/1881 & A/2187). In particular, it believed that the cessation of hostilities in no way reduced the need for representation of the United Nations in Korea.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The report of UNCURK was considered at the Assembly's eighth session at the 680th to 682nd meetings of the First Committee, from 5 to 7 December 1953.

The Committee had before it two draft resolutions, one by India (A/C.1/L.94/Rev.1) and one by Brazil (A/C.1/L.95).

The Indian draft resolution as revised (A/C.1/L.94/Rev.1), provided that the General Assembly should resolve to stand recessed on or after 8 December 1953 to 9 February 1954, it being provided that the President might, for good and sound reasons, convene the Assembly on an earlier or later date for the further consideration of the Korean question.

The representative of India, stressing the responsibility of his Government, in view of the presence of the Indian custodial forces in Korea and Indian chairmanship of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, explained that his draft resolution was a substantive proposal recommending to the Assembly that at the normal time for the termination of its proceedings, it should take into account the importance of the Korean problem and the necessity for its further consideration and fix a date for such consideration in the coming year. His Government wished to be able to present to the Assembly the problems which might arise with regard to India's responsibilities.

The Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.1/L.95), provided, inter alia, that the General Assembly should: (1) decide to defer consideration of the Korean question; and (2) request the President of the Assembly to reconvene the session whenever, in the opinion of a majority of Members, developments with regard to any aspect of this question required consideration.

The representative of Brazil considered that, by not undertaking a consideration of the Korean question at the present juncture, the Committee would facilitate the negotiations for the convening of a political conference. By not prescribing a date for the reconsideration of the Korean question, his draft resolution would afford an opportunity to the negotiators to agree on the preliminary issues regarding the conference.

On 7 December, Brazil and India replaced their separate draft resolutions by a joint draft resolution (A/C.1/L.96), providing that the General Assembly should:

- (1) resolve that the eighth session stand recessed; and
- (2) request the President of the Assembly to reconvene that session, with the concurrence of the majority of Member States, if (a) in her opinion developments in respect of the Korean question warranted such reconvening, or, (b) one or more Member States made a request to the President for such reconvening by reason of developments in respect of the Korean question.

In a statement outlining the situation with regard to the repatriation agreement and its relations to the Armistice Agreement, the representative of India stated that he had agreed to co-sponsor the joint draft resolution, which did not mention any date for reconvening the Assembly, because he felt that it was more important to obtain an agreement that the Assembly should adjourn and reconvene later.

To the joint draft, Poland submitted an amendment (A/C.1/L.97) to delete the words "with the concurrence of the majority of Member States".

The representative of the USSR disagreed with the view that discussion in the Committee might hamper the success of the negotiations for a political conference. Speaking in favour of the Polish amendment, he considered that the mandatory nature of the clause of the joint draft resolution requiring the concurrence of the majority would complicate a reconvening of the session because the majority might not endorse the views of the President.

The representative of the United States said that the principle of majority rule was found throughout the United Nations. He considered it a basic principle which could not be abandoned.

Statements in support of the joint draft resolution (A/C.1/L.96) were made by the representatives of Colombia, El Salvador, France, Iran, Peru, the United Kingdom and the United States who expressed the view that the Assembly should postpone discussion of the question pending the outcome of the negotiations for a political conference.

The representative of Poland considered that those who wished to discuss the Korean question at their own convenience opposed his amendment because the joint draft resolution would facilitate their tactics of postponement.

At the 682nd meeting on 7 December, the Polish amendment was rejected by 50 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions.

The draft resolution of Brazil and India was adopted by 55 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

At its 470th plenary meeting, on 8 December, the General Assembly voted without discussion on the draft resolution recommended by the Committee (A/2621) and on an amendment (A/L.173) submitted by Poland, identical with the amendment (A/C.1/L.97) submitted in the Committee.

The Polish amendment (A/L.173) was rejected by 48 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions. The draft resolution recommended by the First Committee was adopted by 55 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 716(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"1. Resolves that the eighth session of the General Assembly stand recessed;

"2. Requests the President of the General Assembly to reconvene the eighth session, with the concurrence of the majority of Member States, if (a) in the President's opinion developments in respect of the Korean question warrant such reconvening, or (b) one or more Member States make a request to the President for such reconvening by reason of developments in respect of the Korean question."

5. Negotiations Relating to the Convening of a Political Conference Under Paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement

Following exchanges of communications between the United States, on the one hand, and the People's Republic of China and the People's Republic of Korea, on the other, representatives of both sides, on 26 October 1953 at Panmunjom, entered into negotiations relating to the convening of a political conference under paragraph 60 of the Armistice Agreement. On 13 December, these negotiations were interrupted by the representative of the United States, following allegations by the Chinese-North Korean side that the United Nations Command had acted in connivance with the Government of the Republic of Korea in the release of approximately 27,000 prisoners of war from United Nations prisoners-of-war compounds during the month of June.²⁶ The representative of the United States declared that he was ready to resume the negotiations if and when the allegations were withdrawn. At that stage, the negotiators had before them differing proposals regarding the convening, composition and functioning of the conference, submitted, respectively, by the Chinese-North Korean side, on 30 November (A/2616, annex I), and by the representative of the United States on 8 December (A/2628). With regard to the composition and place of the conference, the main points of the two proposals were as follows.

The Chinese-North Korean proposal stated:

(1) that the nations concerned on the two sides participating in the conference would be the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the People's Republic of China, on the one hand, and the seventeen nations contributing armed forces to the United Nations Command, on the other;

(2) all decisions would be made by unanimous agreement among the nations concerned from both sides to the Armistice Agreement and would be binding upon each signatory nation;

(3) the conference would invite five neutral nations concerned, the USSR, India, Indonesia, Pakistan and Burma, to participate so as to facilitate agreement but not on either of the two sides, and without the right to vote.

The United States proposal stated:

(1) that the conference should have as voting participants the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the People's Republic of China, the seventeen nations contributing armed forces to the United Nations Command, and the USSR;

(2) all decisions would be deemed to have been reached by agreement among the voting participants on the two sides referred to in the Armistice Agreement and the USSR only if a decision had received the affirmative vote of both sides and the USSR;

(3) all decisions would be binding upon each signatory Government;

(4) each side would determine its own procedure as to the manner in which it would signify concurrence or non-concurrence in decisions;

(5) each voting participant would be bound only by the specific agreements to which it had adhered;

(6) in consideration of their responsibilities in connexion with the stabilization of the armistice and consequent concern in a peaceful settlement in Korea, some or all of the governments whose nationals were then actually working there or who had current experience in Korea and were currently familiar with its problems should be invited by both sides to attend and to take part in the conference without vote on either of the two sides.

The Chinese-North Korean side proposed that the conference be held at New Delhi on 28 December 1953, while the United States proposal called for a conference at Geneva, Switzerland.

6. Relief and Rehabilitation of Korea²⁷

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

At its fifteenth session, the Council, when considering its provisional agenda at its 673rd plenary meeting on 31 March 1953, decided to postpone the question of relief and rehabilitation of Korea until its sixteenth session.

This question was again before the Council at its sixteenth session and was discussed at the 750th plenary meeting on 5 August 1953. The Council had before it the reports of the Agent General of the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (A/2222 & Add.1 & 2 and E/2334 & Add.1-3). In view of the circumstances created by the signature of the Armistice Agreement in Korea in July 1953, the Council agreed to defer the consideration of the question of the relief and rehabilitation of Korea to a subsequent session.

b. REPORT OF THE AGENT GENERAL TO THE EIGHTH SESSION OF
THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The Agent General of UNKRA submitted an annual report (A/2543) to the eighth session of the General Assembly, covering the period from 15 September 1952 to 30 September 1953. He stated that, following the armistice in Korea, an expanded programme for the year 1954 had been launched with the participation of the Government of the Republic of Korea, the Unified Command and UNKRA. To co-ordinate UNKRA's programme with the programmes of the United States Government channelled through the United Nations Command, a civilian Economic Co-ordinator was appointed to the staff of the United Nations Commander-in-Chief. Also, a subordinate military organization of the United Nations Command, the Korea Civil Assistance Command (KCAC) replacing the United Nations Civil Assistance Command, was designated the operating organization in Korea for the total aid to be received from the United States Government.

The report stated that areas of responsibility for relief and rehabilitation work were reserved to UNKRA and the KCAC. UNKRA was charged primarily with long-range rehabilitation, e.g., power rehabilitation, mining and manufacturing reconstruction, irrigation, flood control and land reclamation as well as forestries, fisheries, housing and education. KCAC was assigned responsibility for health, welfare, public works, transportation, communication, the stimulation of agricultural production and the provision of food and other essential civilian requirements. UNKRA was also to co-operate with KCAC in reconstruction in the health, sanitation and welfare fields.

On 26 August, the Advisory Committee to the Agent General approved a plan of expenditure totalling $130 million for UNKRA's part of the programme for the financial year 1954. This figure, however, had to be cut by the Agent General to $85 million, due to lack of funds. The programme, it was stated, was basically to continue and expand many of the projects begun under the $70 million programme approved for the year ending June 1953, the implementation of which was still in progress. With the addition to the $85 million of the carry-over from the financial year 1953, $100 million would be available for obligation during 1954, the report said.

The report noted that substantial assistance had been provided in the field of food and agriculture. Imports of grain to the value of $11 million and fertilizers to the value of $9 million had helped in the increase of food production. Projects were undertaken to aid the Republic of Korea's programme of expanding irrigation facilities, to import materials for the rehabilitation of the farm tool industry, to vaccinate hogs against cholera, and to increase the knowledge of modern farming techniques. In addition, UNKRA developed some 155 community development projects in rural areas and assisted in building up cottage and village handicraft industries. Projects were also developed to assist in reafforestation and in the rehabilitation of fisheries.

A major portion of UNKRA's programme, the report stated, concerned industrial rehabilitation. Under the 1953 programme, UNKRA did the groundwork for the restoration and expansion of the mining, textile, cement, briquetting flat glass, wire and paper industries. A dollar loan fund and a fund of hwan was established to aid small, privately-owned businesses.

Rehabilitation and expansion of power generating facilities and transmission and distribution lines were undertaken by UNKRA jointly with the United Nations Command. UNKRA made available $3,600,000, with which some 550 miles of transmission and distribution lines, as well as boilers, turbines and generators for existing power plants, were to be repaired and installed. Included in this category were plans to expand the power system on Cheju-do. To improve transportation facilities—a major bottleneck in Korea—trucks and cross and bridge ties for the railroads were imported. A harbour dredge was shipped to Korea to aid in improving the port facilities of a west coast city. The procurement of marine aids to navigation was begun.

Programmes were carried out for developing natural resources and for housing and education. Exploitation of the coal mines, drilling surveys for gold and silver placer deposits and the provision of an assay and ore-dressing laboratory were among the projects designed to develop natural resources. UNKRA also helped to improve mining techniques and provided training facilities for mine workers. In the field of housing UNKRA imported earth block machines for the construction of some 5,500 additional houses and worked with officials of the Government of the Republic of Korea on a housing programme. Educational projects were designed to emphasize the restoration of instructional materials and educational facilities damaged or destroyed during the war. To improve medical education facilities, UNKRA aided in the rehabilitation of the Taegu Medical College and Hospital, provided mobile clinics, helped to establish a centre for rehabilitating amputees and provided translations of textbooks for nursing education.

During 1953, UNKRA gave assistance to the voluntary agencies in the form of ocean freight to the value of $360,000 for the shipment of supplies worth $2,650,000 for voluntary agencies with installations in Korea. In addition, UNKRA gave these organizations direct programme grants totalling $240,000.

Under the programme of emergency aid, it was reported that, by 30 September, nineteen requests for assistance had been made by the Unified Command and transmitted by the Agency to governmental and non-governmental and specialized agencies. By the same date, a total of 31 Member States and seven non-member States had responded to these appeals. Responses from governments, other than the United States Government, together with contributions from non-governmental and specialized agencies, totalled $48,765,178. In addition, $395,792,783 was provided for relief assistance by the United States through KCAC.

The Agent General gave an account of the work of the teams from the World Health Organization (WHO), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in developing recommendations on the scope of long-range programmes in their respective fields. He stated that the final report of the joint UNESCO/UNKRA Educational Planning Mission was received in February 1953 and of the joint WHO/UNKRA Health Planning Mission on 26 November 1952. The preliminary report of the FAO/UNKRA Agricultural Planning Mission, dated March 1953, while not yet released for public distribution, had set forth valuable plans for agricultural rehabilitation and technical assistance. UNESCO, in co-operation with UNKRA, had extended its gift coupon programme, enabling individuals and voluntary agencies to aid Korean schools through purchase of books and periodicals and the financing of grants to selected Korean educators and specialists abroad. In connexion with the implementation of health projects under the $70 million programme, WHO had prepared specifications, jointly with the Swedish Red Cross and a panel of medical experts, and had recommended sources of supply for equipment, supplies and textbooks for the Taegu Medical College and Teaching Hospital.

Dealing with non-governmental organizations and international and national voluntary agencies, the report stated that by 30 September, the total value of contributions amounted to $26,115,219.

In addition to these contributions to the Unified Command, relief supplies to the value of approximately $8 million had been shipped to Korea since November 1952 by voluntary agencies in support of their own programmes and in conformity with regulations of the Unified Command and the Government of the Republic of Korea.

The Agent General reported continuing general improvement in economic conditions since early 1953. However, he noted, despite this recovery, rates of production and consumption at mid-1953 were for the most part still below the 1949-50 levels.

He proposed that for the period from 1 July 1954 to 30 June 1955 UNKRA would make further commitments in the amount of $110 million, making the total commitment, from the inception of UNKRA to 30 June 1955, $266 million. He submitted a tentative plan of expenditure covering this amount.

The initial target figure established by the Negotiating Committee set up under General Assembly resolution 410 B (V) of 1 December 1950, the Agent-General pointed out, amounted to $250 million for the first year of UNKRA's full-scale operations. In order to authorize the total expenditure of $266 million by June 1955, he therefore requested the General Assembly to endorse at its eighth session an additional budgetary target of $16 million. He also asked the Assembly to urge governments to contribute to the programme in order that the proposed plan of expenditure might be executed, and to invite the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds to initiate negotiations with Member and non-member States with a view to obtaining pledges and contributions toward the revised target.

The report noted that, at the expiration of the term of office of the Agent General, J. Donald Kingsley, the Secretary-General, in consultation with UNCURK and the UNKRA Advisory Committee, appointed Lt. General John B. Coulter, USA (Ret.), as Agent General effective 16 May 1953.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The Agent General's report was considered by the Second Committee at its 283rd and 284th meetings on 2 December 1953.

In addition to this report, the Committee had before it the comments of UNCURK (A/2586) on the report. The Commission emphasized that the Republic of Korea was a long way from establishing a viable economy even at a per capita level of consumption approximately equal to that of 1949-50. It noted the need for external assistance to combat inflation in order to promote financial stability. It reiterated its recommendation that UNKRA's programme should aim in particular at an early increase in Korean domestic production. The Commission noted that, in order to ensure continuity in planning and programme, the Agent General had prepared a proposed programme for the financial year 1955.

The Committee also had before it a joint draft resolution by Argentina, Canada, France, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/C.2/L.218), according to which the General Assembly would:

- (1) commend the Agent General for his work;
- (2) approve, subject to consultation between the Agent General and the Advisory Committee, the programmes for 1 July 1953 to 1 July 1954 and 1 July 1954 to 1 July 1955 set forth in the Agent General's report to the eighth session;
- (3) note with concern that sufficient funds were not available to implement such programmes, urge all governments to give immediate consideration to the prompt payment of pledges already made or to the making of contributions within their financial possibilities if they had not already taken such action, and recommend that specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations should furnish all possible assistance to UNKRA; and
- (4) request the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds, appointed pursuant to the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on 5 October 1953,²⁸ to undertake, in addition to assigned tasks, negotiations with governments regarding their pledges to UNKRA.

In a statement outlining UNKRA's plans for the financial year 1953-54, the Agent General explained that, unfortunately, the outlay for the prospective programme had to be reduced from $130 million to $85 million so that many of the very important projects under way could not be implemented during the year.

He stated that UNKRA was seeking governmental contributions of $250 million, against estimates of Korea's needs which amounted to about $1,000 million. In his report, he had requested that the authorization be increased to $266 million to June 1955. Of the $207 million pledged to UNKRA, the Agency had received only $88,600,000, and unfulfilled pledges of $119 million must be collected. The total of uncollected and additional pledges required was $177 million; of the total, the collection of $67 million was required to meet 1954 plans and $110 million to meet 1955 plans.

He urged the Committee to adopt the proposals in his report and appealed to Member States to translate their pledges into funds.

Opening the debate, the representative of Canada, as Chairman of the Advisory Committee to the Agent General, introduced the joint draft resolution, expressing the hope that it would receive unanimous support and thus reaffirm the intention stated by the General Assembly in resolution 410(V). He urged governments and agencies to contribute to the programme. While Canada had pledged and paid $7,250,000 Canadian dollars towards the original target of $250 million set by the Negotiating Committee in 1950, his Government must consider what new financial commitments it could make to meet UNKRA's new requirements. He agreed with that part of the Agent General's report in which it was noted that it would be inadvisable to present in detail any plan covering the coming four or five years.

The representative of the United States urged widespread support for the draft resolution. The cease-fire, he said, offered Member States a new opportunity to demonstrate by deeds their belief in co-operative action. The United States was definitely committed to this concept, as demonstrated by its contributions to Korean relief and reconstruction. His Government believed that substantial aid should be given by as many United Nations countries as possible. The new phase in the efforts of UNKRA after the cease-fire had been closely followed by his Government. The progress registered had been impressive and the sponsors of the joint draft resolution had on that account congratulated UNKRA on its substantial achievements. A co-ordinated programme for 1953-54 had emerged, in which duplication of effort had been reduced to a minimum. As its contribution to UNKRA, the United States, to date, had given $65,750,000 out of the total received to implement the programme; this amounted to about 75 per cent of the funds advanced. The United States representative added that the rate at which his country's future contributions would actually be made available depended on the rate of payments of other countries.

He emphasized the need for substantial external assistance to enable Korea to produce sufficient goods and services to meet minimum consumption requirements and stated his belief that in time the Republic of Korea could achieve economic stability. The trend in industrial production was upward, the United States representative concluded, and improvements had been noted in the fishing industry, in power production and in the country's financial situation.

The representatives of Argentina, Australia, France, India and Mexico supported the joint draft resolution and the work of UNKRA, but stated that this support should not be taken as an indication that their Governments were prepared to make a contribution additional to that already pledged. The representative of the United Kingdom commended the Agent General and his staff for having dealt very successfully with a difficult problem. He suggested that, because of the political uncertainty in Korea, it might perhaps be wise for the Agency to concentrate now on programmes that could be completed by 30 June 1955, and, at the same time, to consider the advisability of transferring responsibility for the long-term projects to the Unified Command or to the Republic of Korea. He proposed that the General Assembly might then, under the terms of the programme proposed in the report, examine the situation at its ninth session. He urged governments to contribute to the UNKRA programme, and stated that the United Kingdom would have paid by April 1955 the equivalent of $20 million for Korean rehabilitation.

The representative of the USSR, opposing the draft resolution and its approval of the work of the Agent General, contended that UNKRA was under the control of the United States military authorities. The Agent General, he said, had directed his efforts towards co-operating with the United Nations Command in its strategic concerns, and had used funds to build bridges and roads, rather than for industrial and agricultural reconstruction.

He drew attention to the assistance to North Korea granted by the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China. Under an agreement with the Democratic People's Republic of North Korea, he said, his Government had opened a credit of 10 thousand million rubles to be used for the construction of electric power stations and factories to replace destroyed plants. With that money, North Korea would be able to rehabilitate the indispensable branches of the economy and supply the population with essential consumer goods. It would be able to undertake the construction of iron and cement works, restore communications, develop fisheries and stock-raising and build hospitals and schools. Gratifying results had already been obtained in the reconditioning of hydro-electric plants, in the working of non-ferrous ores, in the textile industry and in the production of preserved foods. In addition, under an agreement concluded at Peking between the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and North Korea, the Central People's Government had renounced the right to repayment of the sums due to it in respect of the economic aid already furnished to North Korea. The People's Republic of China had also undertaken to provide Korea with cotton, cereals, capital goods, ships, railway rolling stock and the raw materials needed for industrial reconstruction.

The representative of Czechoslovakia supported the view expressed by the USSR representative that UNKRA was under the control of the United States authorities.

The representative of China stated that any aid, in money or kind, granted by the People's Republic of China to North Korea could only come from the forced labour of those imprisoned in concentration camps and from an exorbitant demand upon the very limited resources of the agricultural population. The Chinese delegation would vote for the draft resolution and would inform the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds of the Chinese Government's position with regard to the further contributions requested.

The Agent General stated that the Agency was not subordinate to any other body in Korea but operated in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 410(V). Its activities were supervised by an Advisory Committee of five nations: Canada, India, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay.

The representative of the United States recalled that the Agent General had specifically advised the Economic Co-ordinator that UNKRA's participation in a co-ordinated programme must be fully consistent with UNKRA's responsibilities to the United Nations.

At the request of the representative of the Byelorussian SSR, the draft resolution (A/C.2/L.218) was voted upon in parts and adopted in votes ranging from 33 to 5 to 32 to none, with 6 abstentions. It was adopted, as a whole, by 33 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

At its 468th plenary meeting on 7 December 1953, the General Assembly adopted, without discussion, the draft resolution recommended by the Second Committee (A/2603), by 52 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 725 (VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 410(V) of 1 December 1950,

"Taking note of the report of the Agent General on the work of the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency for the period 15 September 1952 to 30 September 1953,

"Noting that the work undertaken by the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency is bringing substantial benefits to the distressed people of Korea,

"Noting with satisfaction that the programmes of the Agency are implemented in close co-operation with the Government of the Republic of Korea and the United Nations Command and in consultation with the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea,

"1. Commends the Agent General of the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency for his work;

"2. Approves, subject to consultation between the Agent General and the Advisory Committee, the programmes for the periods 1 July 1953 to 1 July 1954 and 1 July 1954 to 1 July 1955 set forth in paragraphs 122, 123 and 124 of the Agent General's report to the General Assembly at its eighth session;

"3. Notes with concern that sufficient funds are not available to implement such programmes, urges all governments to give immediate consideration to the prompt payment of pledges already made or to the making of contributions within their financial possibilities if they have not already taken such action; and recommends that specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations furnish all possible assistance to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency;

"4. Requests the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds, appointed pursuant to General Assembly resolution 759(VIII) of 5 October 1953, to undertake, in addition to already assigned tasks, negotiations with governments regarding their pledges to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency."

ANNEX I. ARMISTICE AGREEMENT OF 27 JULY 1953

Agreement between the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, on the one hand, and the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers, on the other hand, concerning a military armistice in Korea.

PREAMBLE

The undersigned, the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, on the one hand, and the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers, on the other hand, in the interest of stopping the Korean conflict, with its great toll of suffering and bloodshed on both sides, and with the objective of establishing an armistice which will insure a complete cessation of hostilities and of all acts of armed force in Korea until a final peaceful settlement is achieved, do individually, collectively, and mutually agree to accept and to be bound and governed by the conditions and terms of armistice set forth in the following Articles and Paragraphs, which said conditions and terms are intended to be purely military in character and to pertain solely to the belligerents in Korea.

ARTICLE I

MILITARY DEMARCATION LINE AND DEMILITARIZED ZONE

1. A Military Demarcation Line shall be fixed and both sides shall withdraw two (2) kilometers from this line so as to establish a Demilitarized Zone between the opposing forces. A Demilitarized Zone shall be established as a buffer zone to prevent the occurrence of incidents which might lead to a resumption of hostilities.

2. The Military Demarcation Line is located as indicated on the attached map (Map 1).²⁹

3. The Demilitarized Zone is defined by a northern and a southern boundary as indicated on the attached map (Map 1).

4. The Military Demarcation Line shall be plainly marked as directed by the Military Armistice Commission hereinafter established. The Commanders of the opposing sides shall have suitable markers erected along the boundary between the Demilitarized Zone and their respective areas. The Military Armistice Commission shall supervise the erection of all markers placed along the Military Demarcation Line and along the boundaries of the Demilitarized Zone.

5. The waters of the Han River Estuary shall be open to civil shipping of both sides wherever one bank is controlled by one side and the other bank is controlled by the other side. The Military Armistice Commission shall prescribe rules for the shipping in that part of the Han River Estuary indicated on the attached map (Map 2). Civil shipping of each side shall have unrestricted access to the land under the military control of that side.

6. Neither side shall execute any hostile act within, from, or against the Demilitarized Zone.

7. No person, military or civilian, shall be permitted to cross the Military Demarcation Line unless specifically authorized to do so by the Military Armistice Commission.

8. No person, military or civilian, in the Demilitarized Zone shall be permitted to enter the territory under the military control of either side unless specifically authorized to do so by the Commander into whose territory entry is sought.

9. No person, military or civilian, shall be permitted to enter the Demilitarized Zone except persons concerned with the conduct of civil administration and relief and persons specifically authorized to enter by the Military Armistice Commission.

10. Civil administration and relief in that part of the Demilitarized Zone which is south of the Military Demarcation Line shall be the responsibility of the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command; and civil administration and relief in that part of the Demilitarized Zone which is north of the Military Demarcation Line shall be the joint responsibility of the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers. The number of persons, military and civilian, from each side who are permitted to enter the Demilitarized Zone for the conduct of civil administration and relief shall be as determined by the respective Commanders, but in no case shall the total number authorized by either side exceed one thousand (1,000) persons at any one time. The number of civil police and the arms to be carried by them shall be as prescribed by the Military Armistice Commission. Other personnel shall not carry arms unless specifically authorized to do so by the Military Armistice Commission.

11. Nothing contained in this Article shall be construed to prevent the complete freedom of movement to, from, and within the Demilitarized Zone by the Military Armistice Commission, its assistants, its Joint Observer Teams with their assistants, the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission hereinafter established, its assistants, its Neutral Nations Inspection Teams with their assistants, and of any other persons, materials, and equipment specifically authorized to enter the Demilitarized Zone by the Military Armistice Commission. Convenience of movement shall be permitted through the territory under the military control of either side over any route necessary to move between points within the Demilitarized Zone where such points are not connected by roads lying completely within the Demilitarized Zone.

ARTICLE II

CONCRETE ARRANGEMENTS FOR CEASE-FIRE AND ARMISTICE

A. General

12. The Commanders of the opposing sides shall order and enforce a complete cessation of all hostilities in Korea by all armed forces under their control, including all units and personnel of the ground, naval, and air forces, effective twelve (12) hours after this Armistice Agreement is signed. (See Paragraph 63 hereof for effective date and hour of the remaining provisions of this Armistice Agreement.)

13. In order to insure the stability of the Military Armistice so as to facilitate the attainment of a peaceful settlement through the holding by both sides of a political conference of a higher level, the Commanders of the opposing sides shall:

(a) Within seventy-two (72) hours after this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, withdraw all of their military forces, supplies, and equipment from the Demilitarized Zone except as otherwise provided herein. All demolitions, minefields, wire entanglements, and other hazards to the safe movement of personnel of the Military Armistice Commission or its Joint Observer Teams, known to exist within the Demilitarized Zone after the withdrawal of military forces therefrom, together with lanes known to be free of all such hazards, shall be reported to the Military Armistice Commission by the Commander of the side whose forces emplaced such hazards. Subsequently, additional safe lanes shall be cleared; and eventually, within forty-five (45) days after the termination of the seventy-two (72) hour period, all such hazards shall be removed from the Demilitarized Zone as directed by and under the supervision of the Military Armistice Commission. At the termination of the seventy-two (72) hour period, except for unarmed troops authorized a forty-five (45) day period to complete salvage operations under Military Armistice Commission supervision, such units of a police nature as may be specifically requested by the Military Armistice Commission and agreed to by the Commanders of the opposing sides, and personnel authorized under Paragraphs 10 and 11 hereof, no personnel of either side shall be permitted to enter the Demilitarized Zone.

(b) Within ten (10) days after this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, withdraw all of their military forces, supplies, and equipment from the rear and the coastal islands and waters of Korea of the other side. If such military forces are not withdrawn within the stated time limit, and there is no mutually agreed and valid reason for the delay, the other side shall have the right to take any action which it deems necessary for the maintenance of security and order. The term "coastal islands", as used above, refers to those islands which, though occupied by one side at the time when this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, were controlled by the other side on 24 June 1950; provided, however, that all the islands lying to the north and west of the provincial boundary line between HWANGHAE-DO and KYONGGI-DO shall be under the military control of the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers, except the island groups of PAENG-YONG-DO (37°58'N, 124°40'E), TAECHONG-DO (37°50'N, 124°42'E), SOCHONG-DO (37°46'N, 124°46'E), YONPYONG-DO (37°38'N, 125°40'E), and U-DO (37°36'N, 125°58'E), which shall remain under the military control of the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command. All the islands on the west coast of Korea lying south of the above-mentioned boundary line shall remain under the military control of the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command. (See Map 3.)

(c) Cease the introduction into Korea of reinforcing military personnel; provided, however, that the rotation of units and personnel, the arrival in Korea of personnel on a temporary duty basis, and the return to Korea of personnel after short periods of leave or temporary duty outside of Korea shall be permitted within the scope prescribed below. "Rotation" is defined as the replacement of units or personnel by other units or personnel who are commencing a tour of duty in Korea. Rotation personnel shall be introduced into and evacuated from Korea only through the ports of entry enumerated in Paragraph 43 hereof. Rotation shall be conducted on a man-for-man basis; provided, however, that no more than thirty-five thousand (35,000) persons in the military service shall be admitted into Korea by either side in any calendar month under the rotation policy. No military personnel of either side shall be introduced into Korea if the introduction of such personnel will cause the aggregate of the military personnel of that side admitted into Korea since the effective date of this Armistice Agreement to exceed the cumulative total of the military personnel of that side who have departed from Korea since that date. Reports concerning arrivals in and departures from Korea of military personnel shall be made daily to the Military Armistice Commission and the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission; such reports shall include places of arrival and departure and the number of persons arriving at or departing from each such place. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, through its Neutral Nations Inspection Teams, shall conduct supervision and inspection of the rotation of units and personnel authorized above, at the ports of entry enumerated in Paragraph 43 hereof.

(d) Cease the introduction into Korea of reinforcing combat aircraft, armored vehicles, weapons, and ammunition; provided, however, that combat aircraft, armored vehicles, weapons, and ammunition which are destroyed, damaged, worn out, or used up during the period of the armistice may be replaced on the basis of piece-for-piece of the same effectiveness and the same type. Such combat aircraft, armored vehicles, weapons, and ammunition shall be introduced into Korea only through the ports of entry enumerated in Paragraph 43 hereof. In order to justify the requirement for combat aircraft, armored vehicles, weapons, and ammunition to be introduced into Korea for replacement purposes, reports concerning every incoming shipment of these items shall be made to the Military Armistice Commission and the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission; such reports shall include statements regarding the disposition of the items being replaced. Items to be replaced which are removed from Korea shall be removed only through the ports of entry enumerated in Paragraph 43 hereof. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, through its Neutral Nations Inspection Teams, shall conduct supervision and inspection of the replacement of combat aircraft, armored vehicles, weapons, and ammunition authorized above, at the ports of entry enumerated in Paragraph 43 hereof.

(e) Insure that personnel of their respective commands who violate any of the provisions of this Armistice Agreement are adequately punished.

(f) In those cases where places of burial are a matter of record and graves are actually found to exist, permit graves registration personnel of the other side to enter, within a definite time limit after this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, the territory of Korea under their military control, for the purpose of proceeding to such graves to recover and evacuate the bodies of the deceased military personnel of that side, including deceased prisoners of war. The specific procedures and the time limit for the performance of the above task shall be determined by the Military Armistice Commission. The Commanders of the opposing sides shall furnish to the other side all available information pertaining to the places of burial of the deceased military personnel of the other side.

(g) Afford full protection and all possible assistance and co-operation to the Military Armistice Commission, its Joint Observer Teams, the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, and its Neutral Nations Inspection Teams, in the carrying out of their functions and responsibilities hereinafter assigned; and accord to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, and to its Neutral Nations Inspection Teams, full convenience of movement between the headquarters of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission and the ports of entry enumerated in Paragraph 43 hereof over main lines of communication agreed upon by both sides (See Map 4), and between the headquarters of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission and the places where violations of this Armistice Agreement have been reported to have occurred. In order to prevent unnecessary delays, the use of alternate routes and means of transportation will be permitted whenever the main lines of communication are closed or impassable.

(b) Provide such logistic support, including communications and transportation facilities, as may be required by the Military Armistice Commission and the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission and their Teams.

(i) Each construct, operate, and maintain a suitable airfield in their respective part of the Demilitarized Zone in the vicinity of the headquarters of the Military Armistice Commission, for such uses as the Commission may determine.

(j) Insure that all members and other personnel of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission and of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission hereinafter established shall enjoy the freedom and facilities necessary for the proper exercise of their functions, including privileges, treatment, and immunities equivalent to those ordinarily enjoyed by accredited diplomatic personnel under international usage.

14. This Armistice Agreement shall apply to all opposing ground forces under the military control of either side, which ground forces shall respect the Demilitarized Zone and the area of Korea under the military control of the opposing side.

15. This Armistice Agreement shall apply to all opposing naval forces, which naval forces shall respect the waters contiguous to the Demilitarized Zone and to the land area of Korea under the military control of the opposing side, and shall not engage in blockade of any kind of Korea.

16. This Armistice Agreement shall apply to all opposing air forces, which air forces shall respect the air space over the Demilitarized Zone and over the area of Korea under the military control of the opposing side, and over the waters contiguous to both.

17. Responsibility for compliance with and enforcement of the terms and provisions of this Armistice Agreement is that of the signatories hereto and their successors in command. The Commanders of the opposing sides shall establish within their respective commands all measures and procedures necessary to insure complete compliance with all of the provisions hereof by all elements of their commands. They shall actively co-operate with one another and with the Military Armistice Commission and the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission in requiring observance of both the letter and the spirit of all of the provisions of this Armistice Agreement.

18. The costs of the operations of the Military Armistice Commission and of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission and of their Teams shall be shared equally by the two opposing sides.

B. Military Armistice Commission

1. Composition

19. A Military Armistice Commission is hereby established.

20. The Military Armistice Commission shall be composed of ten (10) senior officers, five (5) of whom shall be appointed by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, and five (5) of whom shall be appointed jointly by the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers. Of the ten members, three (3) from each side shall be of general or flag rank. The two (2) remaining members on each side may be major generals, brigadier generals, colonels, or their equivalents.

21. Members of the Military Armistice Commission shall be permitted to use staff assistants as required.

22. The Military Armistice Commission shall be provided with the necessary administrative personnel to establish a Secretariat charged with assisting the Commission by performing record-keeping, secretarial, interpreting, and such other functions as the Commission may assign to it. Each side shall appoint to the Secretariat a Secretary and an Assistant Secretary and such clerical and specialized personnel as required by the Secretariat. Records shall be kept in English, Korean, and Chinese, all of which shall be equally authentic.

23. (a) The Military Armistice Commission shall be initially provided with and assisted by ten (10) Joint Observer Teams, which number may be reduced by agreement of the senior members of both sides on the Military Armistice Commission.

(b) Each Joint Observer Team shall be composed of not less than four (4) nor more than six (6) officers of field grade, half of whom shall be appointed by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, and half of whom shall be appointed jointly by the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers. Additional personnel such as drivers, clerks, and interpreters shall be furnished by each side as required for the functioning of the Joint Observer Teams.

2. Functions and Authority

24. The general mission of the Military Armistice Commission shall be to supervise the implementation of this Armistice Agreement and to settle through negotiations any violations of this Armistice Agreement.

25. The Military Armistice Commission shall:

(a) Locate its headquarters in the vicinity of PANMUNJOM (37°57'29"N, 126°40'00"E). The Military Armistice Commission may re-locate its headquarters at another point within the Demilitarized Zone by agreement of the senior members of both sides on the Commission.

(b) Operate as a joint organization without a chairman.

(c) Adopt such rules of procedure as it may, from time to time, deem necessary.

(d) Supervise the carrying out of the provisions of this Armistice Agreement pertaining to the Demilitarized Zone and to the Han River Estuary.

(e) Direct the operations of the Joint Observer Teams.

(f) Settle through negotiations any violations of this Armistice Agreement.

(g) Transmit immediately to the Commanders of the opposing sides all reports of investigations of violations of this Armistice Agreement and all other reports and records of proceedings received from the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission.

(h) Give general supervision and direction to the activities of the Committee for Repatriation of Prisoners of War and the Committee for Assisting the Return of Displaced Civilians, hereinafter established.

(i) Act as an intermediary in transmitting communications between the Commanders of the opposing sides; provided, however, that the foregoing shall not be construed to preclude the Commanders of both sides from communication with each other by any other means which they may desire to employ.

(j) Provide credentials and distinctive insignia for its staff and its Joint Observer Teams, and a distinctive marking for all vehicles, aircraft, and vessels, used in the performance of its mission.

26. The mission of the Joint Observer Teams shall be to assist the Military Armistice Commission in supervising the carrying out of the provisions of this Armistice Agreement pertaining to the Demilitarized Zone and to the Han River Estuary.

27. The Military Armistice Commission, or the senior member of either side thereof, is authorized to dispatch Joint Observer Teams to investigate violations of this Armistice Agreement reported to have occurred in the Demilitarized Zone or in the Han River Estuary; provided, however, that not more than one half of the Joint Observer Teams which have not been dispatched by the Military Armistice Commission may be dispatched at any one time by the senior member of either side on the Commission.

28. The Military Armistice Commission, or the senior member of either side thereof, is authorized to request the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission to conduct special observations and inspections at places outside the Demilitarized Zone where violations of this Armistice Agreement have been reported to have occurred.

29. When the Military Armistice Commission determines that a violation of this Armistice Agreement has occurred, it shall immediately report such violation to the Commanders of the opposing sides.

30. When the Military Armistice Commission determines that a violation of this Armistice Agreement has been corrected to its satisfaction, it shall so report to the Commanders of the opposing sides.

3. General

31. The Military Armistice Commission shall meet daily. Recesses of not to exceed seven (7) days may be agreed upon by the senior members of both sides; provided, that such recesses may be terminated on twenty-four (24) hour notice by the senior member of either side.

32. Copies of the record of the proceedings of all meetings of the Military Armistice Commission shall be forwarded to the Commanders of the opposing sides as soon as possible after each meeting.

33. The Joint Observer Teams shall make periodic reports to the Military Armistice Commission as required by the Commission and, in addition, shall make such special report as may be deemed necessary by them, or as may be required by the Commission.

34. The Military Armistice Commission shall maintain duplicate files of the reports and records of proceedings required by this Armistice Agreement. The Commission is authorized to maintain duplicate files of such other reports, records, etc., as may be necessary in the conduct of its business. Upon eventual dissolution of the Commission, one set of the above files shall be turned over to each side.

35. The Military Armistice Commission may make recommendations to the Commanders of the opposing sides with respect to amendments or additions to this Armistice Agreement. Such recommended changes should generally be those designed to insure a more effective armistice.

C. Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission

1. Composition

36. A Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission is hereby established.

37. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission shall be composed of four (4) senior officers, two (2) of whom shall be appointed by neutral nations nominated by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, namely, SWEDEN and SWITZERLAND, and two (2) of whom shall be appointed by neutral nations nominated jointly by the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers, namely, POLAND and CZECHOSLOVAKIA. The term "neutral nations" as herein used is defined as those nations whose combatant forces have not participated in the hostilities in Korea. Members appointed to the Commission may be from the armed forces of the appointing nations. Each member shall designate an alternate member to attend those meetings which for any reason the principal member is unable to attend. Such alternate members shall be of the same nationality as their principals. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission may take action whenever the number of members present from the neutral nations nominated by one side is equal to the number of members present from the neutral nations nominated by the other side.

38. Members of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission shall be permitted to use staff assistants furnished by the neutral nations as required. These staff assistants may be appointed as alternate members of the Commission.

39. The neutral nations shall be requested to furnish the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission with the necessary administrative personnel to establish a Secretariat charged with assisting the Commission by performing necessary record-keeping, secretarial, interpreting, and such other functions as the Commission may assign to it.

40. (a) The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission shall be initially provided with, and assisted by, twenty (20) Neutral Nations Inspection Teams, which number may be reduced by agreement of the senior members of both sides on the Military Armistice Commission. The Neutral Nations Inspection Teams shall be responsible to, shall report to, and shall be subject to the direction of, the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission only.

(b) Each Neutral Nations Inspection Team shall be composed of not less than four (4) officers, preferably of field grade, half of whom shall be from the neutral nations nominated by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, and half of whom shall be from the neutral nations nominated jointly by the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army, and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers. Members appointed to the Neutral Nations Inspection Teams may be from the armed forces of the appointing nations. In order to facilitate the functioning of the Teams, sub-teams composed of not less than two (2) members, one of whom shall be from a neutral nation nominated by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, and one of whom shall be from a neutral nation nominated jointly by the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers, may be formed as circumstances require. Additional personnel such as drivers, clerks, interpreters, and communications personnel, and such equipment as may be required by the Teams to perform their missions, shall be furnished by the Commander of each side, as required, in the Demilitarized Zone and in the territory under his military control. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission may provide itself and the Neutral Nations Inspection Teams with such of the above personnel and equipment of its own as it may desire; provided, however, that such personnel shall be personnel of the same neutral nations of which the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission is composed.

2. Functions and Authority

41. The mission of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission shall be to carry out the functions of supervision, observation, inspection, and investigation, as stipulated in Sub-paragraphs 13c and 13d and Paragraph 28 hereof, and to report the results of such supervision, observation, inspection, and investigation to the Military Armistice Commission.

42. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission shall:

(a) Locate its headquarters in proximity to the headquarters of the Military Armistice Commission.

(b) Adopt such rules of procedure as it may, from time to time, deem necessary.

(c) Conduct, through its members and its Neutral Nations Inspection Teams, the supervision and inspection provided for in Sub-paragraphs 13c and 13d of this Armistice Agreement at the ports of entry enumerated in Paragraph 43 hereof, and the special observations and inspections provided for in Paragraph 28 hereof at those places where violations of this Armistice Agreement have been reported to have occurred. The inspection of combat aircraft, armored vehicles, weapons, and ammunition by the Neutral Nations Inspections Teams shall be such as to enable them to properly insure that reinforcing combat aircraft, armored vehicles, weapons, and ammunition are not being introduced into Korea; but this shall not be construed as authorizing inspections or examinations of any secret designs or characteristics of any combat aircraft, armored vehicle, weapon, or ammunition.

(d) Direct and supervise the operations of the Neutral Nations Inspection Teams.

(f) Subject to the provisions of the preceding Sub-paragraph, conduct without delay investigations of reported violations of this Armistice Agreement, including such investigations of reported violations of this Armistice Agreement as may be requested by the Military Armistice Commission or by the senior member of either side on the Commission.

(g) Provide credentials and distinctive insignia for its staff and its Neutral Nations Inspection Teams, and a distinctive marking for all vehicles, aircraft,.

and vessels, used in the performance of its mission.

43. Neutral Nations Inspection Teams shall be stationed at the following ports of entry:

	Territory under the military control of the United Nations Command
INCHON	(37°28'N, 126°38'E)
TAEGU	(35°52'N, 128°36'E)
PUSAN	(35°06'N, 129°02'E)
KANGNUNG	(37°45'N, 128°54'E)
KUNSAN	(35°59'N, 126°43'E)

	Territory under the military control of the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers
SINUJU	(40°06'N, 124°24'E)
CHONGJIN	(41°46'N, 129°49'E)
HUNGNAM	(39°50'N, 127°37'E)
MANPO	(41°09'N, 126°18'E)
SINANJU	(39°36'N, 125°36'E)

These Neutral Nations Inspection Teams shall be accorded full convenience of movement within the areas and over the routes of communication set forth on the attached map (Map 5).

3. General

44. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission shall meet daily. Recesses of not to exceed seven (7) days may be agreed upon by the members of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission; provided, that such recesses may be terminated on twenty-four (24) hour notice by any member.

45. Copies of the record of the proceedings of all meetings of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission shall be forwarded to the Military Armistice Commission as soon as possible after each meeting. Records shall be kept in English, Korean, and Chinese.

46. The Neutral Nations Inspection Teams shall make periodic reports concerning the results of their supervision, observations, inspections, and investigations to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission as required by the Commission and, in addition, shall make such special reports as may be deemed necessary by them, or as may be required by the Commission. Reports shall be submitted by a Team as a whole, but may also be submitted by one or more individual members thereof; provided, that the reports submitted by one or more individual members thereof shall be considered as informational only.

47. Copies of the reports made by the Neutral Nations Inspection Teams shall be forwarded to the Military Armistice Commission by the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission without delay and in the language in which received. They shall not be delayed by the process of translation or evaluation. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission shall evaluate such reports at the earliest practicable time and shall forward their findings to the Military Armistice Commission as a matter of priority. The Military Armistice Commission shall not take final action with regard to any such report until the evaluation thereof has been received from the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission. Members of the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission and of its Teams shall be subject to appearance before the Military Armistice Commission, at the request of the senior member of either side on the Military Armistice Commission, for clarification of any report submitted.

48. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission shall maintain duplicate files of the reports and records of proceedings required by this Armistice Agreement. The Commission is authorized to maintain duplicate files of such reports, records, etc., as may be necessary in the conduct of its business. Upon eventual dissolution of the Commission, one set of the above files shall be turned over to each side.

49. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission may make recommendations to the Military Armistice Commission with respect to amendments or additions to this Armistice Agreement. Such recommended changes should generally be those designed to insure a more effective armistice.

50. The Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission, or any member thereof, shall be authorized to communicate with any member of the Military Armistice Commission.

ARTICLE III

ARRANGEMENTS RELATING TO PRISONERS OF WAR

51. The release and repatriation of all prisoners of war held in custody of each side at the time this Armistice Agreement becomes effective shall be effected in conformity with the following provisions agreed upon by both sides prior to the signing of this Armistice Agreement.

(a) Within sixty (60) days after this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, each side shall, without offering any hindrance, directly repatriate and hand over in groups all those prisoners of war in its custody who insist on repatriation to the side to which they belonged at the time of capture. Repatriation shall be accomplished in accordance with the related provisions of this Article. In order to expedite the repatriation process of such personnel, each side shall, prior to the signing of the Armistice Agreement, exchange the total numbers, by nationalities, of personnel to be directly repatriated. Each group of prisoners of war delivered to the other side shall be accompanied by rosters, prepared by nationality, to include name, rank (if any) and internment or military serial number.

(b) Each side shall release all those remaining prisoners of war, who are not directly repatriated, from its military control and from its custody and hand them over to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission for disposition in accordance with the provisions in the Annex hereto: "Terms of Reference for Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission."

(c) So that there may be no misunderstanding owing to the equal use of three languages, the act of delivery of a prisoner of war by one side to the other side shall, for the purpose of this Armistice Agreement, be called "repatriation" in English () (SONG HWAN) in Korean, and () (CHIEN FAN) in Chinese, notwithstanding the nationality or place of residence of such prisoner of war.

52. Each side insures that it will not employ in acts of war in the Korean conflict any prisoner of war released and repatriated incident to the coming into effect of this Armistice Agreement.

53. All the sick and injured prisoners of war who insist upon repatriation shall be repatriated with priority. Insofar as possible, there shall be captured medical personnel repatriated concurrently with the sick and injured prisoners of war, so as to provide medical care and attendance en route.

54. The repatriation of all of the prisoners of war required by Sub-paragraph 51a hereof shall be completed within a time limit of sixty (60) days after this Armistice Agreement becomes effective. Within this time limit each side undertakes to complete the repatriation of the above-mentioned prisoners of war in its custody at the earliest practicable time.

55. PANMUNJOM is designated as the place where prisoners of war will be delivered and received by both sides. Additional place(s) of delivery and reception of prisoners of war in the Demilitarized Zone may be designated, if necessary, by the Committee for Repatriation of Prisoners of War.

56. (a) A Committee for Repatriation of Prisoners of War is hereby established. It shall be composed of six (6) officers of field grade, three (3) of whom shall be appointed by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, and three (3) of whom shall be appointed jointly by the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers. This Committee shall, under the general supervision and direction of the Military Armistice Commission, be responsible for coordinating the specific plans of both sides for the repatriation of prisoners of war and for supervising the execution by both sides of all of the provisions of this Armistice Agreement relating to the repatriation of prisoners of war. It shall be the duty of this Committee to coordinate the timing of the arrival of prisoners of war at the place(s) of delivery and reception of prisoners of war from the prisoner of war camps of both sides; to make, when necessary, such special arrangements as may be required with regard to the transportation and welfare of sick and injured prisoners of war; to coordinate the work of the joint Red Cross teams, established in Paragraph 57 hereof, in assisting in the repatriation of prisoners of war; to supervise the implementation of the arrangements for the actual repatriation of prisoners of war stipulated in Paragraphs 53 and 54 hereof; to select, when necessary, additional place(s) of delivery and reception of prisoners of war; to arrange for security at the place(s) of delivery and reception of prisoners of war; and to carry out such other related functions as are required for the repatriation of prisoners of war.

(b) When unable to reach agreement on any matter relating to its responsibilities, the Committee for Repatriation of Prisoners of War shall immediately refer such matter to the Military Armistice Commission for decision. The Committee for Repatriation of Prisoners of War shall maintain its headquarters in proximity to the headquarters of the Military Armistice Commission.

(c) The Committee for Repatriation of Prisoners of War shall be dissolved by the Military Armistice Commission upon completion of the program of repatriation of prisoners of war.

57. (a) Immediately after this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, joint Red Cross teams composed of representatives of the national Red Cross Societies of the countries contributing forces to the United Nations Command on the one hand, and representatives of the Red Cross Society of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and representatives of the Red Cross Society of the People's Republic of China on the other hand, shall be established. The joint Red Cross teams shall assist in the execution by both sides of those provisions of this Armistice Agreement relating to the repatriation of all the prisoners of war specified in Sub-paragraph 51a hereof, who insist upon repatriation, by the performance of such humanitarian services as are necessary and desirable for the welfare of the prisoners of war. To accomplish this task, the joint Red Cross teams shall provide assistance in the delivering and receiving of prisoners of war by both sides at the place(s) of delivery and reception of prisoners of war, and shall visit the prisoner of war camps of both sides to comfort the prisoners of war and to bring in and distribute gift articles for the comfort and welfare of the prisoners of war. The joint Red Cross teams may provide services to prisoners of war while en route from prisoner of war camps to the place(s) of delivery and reception of prisoners of war.

(1) One team shall be composed of twenty (20) members, namely, ten (10) representatives from the national Red Cross Societies of each side, to assist in the delivering and receiving of prisoners of war by both sides at the place(s) of delivery and reception of prisoners of war. The chairmanship of this team shall alternate daily between representatives from the Red Cross Societies of the two sides. The work and services of this team shall be coordinated by the Committee for Repatriation of Prisoners of War.

(2) One team shall be composed of sixty (60) members, namely, thirty (30) representatives from the national Red Cross Societies of each side, to visit the prisoner of war camps under the administration of the Korean People's Army and the Chinese People's Volunteers. This team may provide services to prisoners of war while en route from the prisoner of war camps to the place(s) of delivery and reception of prisoners of war. A representative of the Red Cross Society of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea or of the Red Cross Society of the People's Republic of China shall serve as chairman of this team.

(3) One team shall be composed of sixty (60) members, namely, thirty (30) representatives from the national Red Cross Societies of each side, to visit the prisoner of war camps under the administration of the United Nations Command. This team may provide services to prisoners of war while en route from the prisoner of war camps to the place(s) of delivery and reception of prisoners of war. A representative of a Red Cross Society of a nation contributing forces to the United Nations Command shall serve as chairman of this team.

(4) In order to facilitate the functioning of each joint Red Cross team, sub-teams composed of not less than two (2) members from this team, with an equal number of representatives from each side, may be formed as circumstances require.

(5) Additional personnel such as drivers, clerks, and interpreters, and such equipment as may be required by the joint Red Cross teams to perform their missions, shall be furnished by the Commander of each side to the team operating in the territory under his military control.

(6) Whenever jointly agreed upon by the representatives of both sides on any joint Red Cross team, the size of such team may be increased or decreased, subject to confirmation by the Committee for Repatriation of Prisoners of War.

- (c) The Commander of each side shall cooperate fully with the joint Red Cross teams in the performance of their functions, and undertakes to insure the security of the personnel of the joint Red Cross team in the area under his military control. The Commander of each side shall provide such logistic, administrative, and communications facilities as may be required by the team operating in the territory under his military control.
- (d) The joint Red Cross teams shall be dissolved upon completion of the program of repatriation of all of the prisoners of war specified in Sub-paragraph 51a hereof, who insist upon repatriation.
58. (a) The Commander of each side shall furnish to the Commander of the other side as soon as practicable, but not later than ten (10) days after this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, the following information concerning prisoners of war:
- (1) Complete data pertaining to the prisoners of war who escaped since the effective date of the data last exchanged.
 - (2) Insofar as practicable, information regarding name, nationality, rank, and other identification data, date and cause of death, and place of burial, of those prisoners of war who died while in his custody.
- (b) If any prisoners of war escape or die after the effective date of the supplementary information specified above, the detaining side shall furnish to the other side, through the Committee for Repatriation of Prisoners of War, the data pertaining thereto in accordance with the provisions of Sub-paragraph 58a hereof. Such data shall be furnished at ten-day intervals until the completion of the program of delivery and reception of prisoners of war.
- (c) Any escaped prisoner of war who returns to the custody of the detaining side after the completion of the program of delivery and reception of prisoners of war shall be delivered to the Military Armistice Commission for disposition.
59. (a) All civilians who, at the time this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, are in territory under the military control of the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, and who, on 24 June 1950, resided north of the Military Demarcation Line established in this Armistice Agreement shall, if they desire to return home, be permitted and assisted by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, to return to the area north of the Military Demarcation Line; and all civilians who, at the time this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, are in territory under the military control of the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers, and who, on 24 June 1950, resided south of the Military Demarcation Line established in this Armistice Agreement shall, if they desire to return home, be permitted and assisted by the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers to return to the area south of the Military Demarcation Line. The Commander of each side shall be responsible for publicizing widely throughout territory under his military control the contents of the provisions of this Sub-paragraph, and for calling upon the appropriate civil authorities to give necessary guidance and assistance to all such civilians who desire to return home.

- (b) All civilians of foreign nationality who, at the time this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, are in territory under the military control of the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers shall, if they desire to proceed to territory under the military control of the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, be permitted and assisted to do so; all civilians of foreign nationality who, at the time this Armistice Agreement becomes effective, are in territory under the military control of the Commander-in-Chief United Nations Command, shall, if they desire to proceed to territory under the military control of the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers, be permitted and assisted to do so. The Commander of each side shall be responsible for publicizing widely throughout the territory under his military control the contents of the provisions of this Sub-paragraph, and for calling upon the appropriate civil authorities to give necessary guidance and assistance to all such civilians of foreign nationality who desire to proceed to territory under the military control of the Commander of the other side.
- (c) Measures to assist in the return of civilians provided for in Sub-paragraph 59a hereof and the movement of civilians provided for in Sub-paragraph 59b hereof shall be commenced by both sides as soon as possible after this Armistice Agreement becomes effective.
- (d) (1) A Committee for Assisting the Return of Displaced Civilians is hereby established. It shall be composed of four (4) officers of field grade, two (2) of whom shall be appointed by the Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, and two (2) of whom shall be appointed jointly by the Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and the Commander of the Chinese People's Volunteers. This Committee shall, under the general supervision and direction of the Military Armistice Commission, be responsible for coordinating the specific plans of both sides for assistance to the return of the above-mentioned civilians, and for supervising the execution by both sides of all of the provisions of this Armistice Agreement relating to the return of the above-mentioned civilians. It shall be the duty of this Committee to make necessary arrangements, including those of transportation, for expediting and coordinating the movement of the above-mentioned civilians; to select the crossing point(s) through which the above-mentioned civilians will cross the Military Demarcation Line; to arrange for security at the crossing point(s); and to carry out such other functions as are required to accomplish the return of the above-mentioned civilians.
- (2) When unable to reach agreement on any matter relating to its responsibilities, the Committee for Assisting the Return of Displaced Civilians shall immediately refer such matter to the Military Armistice Commission for decision. The Committee for Assisting the Return of Displaced Civilians shall maintain its headquarters in proximity to the headquarters of the Military Armistice Commission.

(3) The Committee for Assisting the Return of Displaced Civilians shall be dissolved by the Military Armistice Commission upon fulfillment of its mission.

ARTICLE IV

RECOMMENDATIONS TO THE GOVERNMENTS CONCERNED ON BOTH SIDES

60. In order to insure the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, the military Commanders of both sides hereby recommend to the governments of the countries concerned on both sides that, within three (3) months after the Armistice Agreement is signed and becomes effective, a political conference of a higher level of both sides be held by representatives appointed respectively to settle through negotiation the questions

ANNEX

TERMS OF REFERENCE FOR NEUTRAL NATIONS REPATRIATION COMMISSION (See Sub-paragraph 51b)

1. In order to ensure that all prisoners of war have the opportunity to exercise their right to be repatriated following an armistice, Sweden, Switzerland, Poland, Czechoslovakia and India shall each be requested by both sides to appoint a member to a Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission which shall be established to take custody in Korea of those prisoners of war who, while in the custody of the detaining powers, have not exercised their right to be repatriated. The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall establish its headquarters within the Demilitarized Zone in the vicinity of Panmunjon, and shall station subordinate bodies of the same composition as the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission at those locations at which the Repatriation Commission assumes custody of prisoners of war. Representatives of both sides shall be permitted to observe the operations of the Repatriation Commission and its subordinate bodies to include explanations and interviews.

2. Sufficient armed forces and any other operating personnel required to assist the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission in carrying out its functions and responsibilities shall be provided exclusively by India, whose representative shall be the umpire in accordance with the provisions of Article 132 of the Geneva Convention, and shall also be chairman and executive agent of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. Representatives of each of the other four powers shall be allowed staff assistants in equal number not to exceed fifty (50) each. When any of the representatives of the neutral nations is absent for some reason, that representative shall designate an alternate representative of his own nationality to exercise his functions and authority. The arms of all personnel provided for in this Paragraph shall be limited to military police type small arms.

ARTICLE V

MISCELLANEOUS

61. Amendments and additions to this Armistice Agreement must be mutually agreed to by the Commanders of the opposing sides.

62. The Articles and Paragraphs of this Armistice Agreement shall remain in effect until expressly superseded either by mutually acceptable amendments and additions or by provision in an appropriate agreement for a peaceful settlement at a political level between both sides.

63. All of the provisions of this Armistice Agreement other than Paragraph 12, shall become effective at 2200 hours on 27 July 1953.

3. No force or threat of force shall be used against the prisoners of war specified in Paragraph 1 above to prevent or effect their repatriation, and no violence to their persons or affront to their dignity or self-respect shall be permitted in any manner for any purpose whatsoever (but see Paragraph 7 below). This duty is enjoined on and entrusted to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. This Commission shall ensure that prisoners of war shall at all times be treated humanely in accordance with the specific provisions of the Geneva Convention, and with the general spirit of that Convention.

II

CUSTODY OF PRISONERS OF WAR

4. All prisoners of war who have not exercised their right of repatriation following the effective date of the Armistice Agreement shall be released from the military control and from the custody of the detaining side as soon as practicable, and, in all cases, within sixty (60) days subsequent to the effective date of the Armistice Agreement to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission at locations in Korea to be designated by the detaining side.

5. At the time the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission assumes control of the prisoner of war installations, the military forces of the detaining side shall be withdrawn therefrom, so that the locations specified in the preceding Paragraph shall be taken over completely by the armed forces of India.

6. Notwithstanding the provisions of Paragraph 5 above, the detaining side shall have the responsibility for maintaining and ensuring security and order in the areas around the locations where the prisoners of war are in custody and for preventing and restraining any armed forces (including irregular armed forces) in the area under its control from any acts of disturbance and intrusion against the locations where the prisoners of war are in custody.

7. Notwithstanding the provisions of Paragraph 3 above, nothing in this agreement shall be construed as derogating from the authority of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission to exercise its legitimate functions and responsibilities for the control of the prisoners of war under its temporary jurisdiction.

HI

EXPLANATION

8. The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, after having received and taken into custody all those prisoners of war who have not exercised their right to be repatriated, shall immediately make arrangements so that within ninety (90) days after the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission takes over the custody, the nations to which the prisoners of war belong shall have freedom and facilities to send representatives to the locations where such prisoners of war are in custody to explain to all the prisoners of war depending upon these nations their rights and to inform them of any matters relating to their return to their homelands, particularly of their full freedom to return home to lead a peaceful life, under the following provisions:

(a) The number of such explaining representatives shall not exceed seven (7) per thousand prisoners of war held in custody by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission; and the minimum authorized shall not be less than a total of five (5);

(b) The hours during which the explaining representatives shall have access to the prisoners shall be as determined by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, and generally in accord with Article 53 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War;

(c) All explanations and interviews shall be conducted in the presence of a representative of each member nation of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission and a representative from the detaining side;

(d) Additional provisions governing the explanation work shall be prescribed by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, and will be designed to employ the principles enumerated in Paragraph 3 above and in this Paragraph;

(e) The explaining representatives, while engaging in their work, shall be allowed to bring with them necessary facilities and personnel for wireless communications. The number of communications personnel shall be limited to one team per location at which explaining representatives are in residence, except in the event all prisoners of war are concentrated in one location, in which case, two (2) teams shall be permitted. Each team shall consist of not more than six (6) communications personnel.

9. Prisoners of war in its custody shall have freedom and facilities to make representations and communications to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission and to representatives and subordinate bodies of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission and to inform them of their desires on any matter concerning the prisoners of war themselves, in accordance with arrangements made for the purpose by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission.

IV

DISPOSITION OF PRISONERS OF WAR

10. Any prisoner of war who, while in the custody of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, decides to exercise the right of repatriation, shall make an application requesting repatriation to a body consisting of a representative of each member nation of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. Once such an application is made, it shall be considered immediately by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission or one of its subordinate bodies so as to determine immediately by majority vote the validity of such application. Once such an application is made to and validated by the Commission or one of its subordinate bodies, the prisoner of war concerned shall immediately be transferred to and accommodated in the tents set up for those who are ready to be repatriated. Thereafter, he shall, while in the custody of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, be delivered forthwith to the prisoner of war exchange point at Panmunjon for repatriation under the procedure prescribed in the Armistice Agreement.

11. At the expiration of ninety (90) days after the transfer of custody of the prisoners of war to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, access of representatives to captured personnel as provided for in Paragraph 8 above, shall terminate, and the question of disposition of the prisoners of war who have not exercised their right to be repatriated shall be submitted to the Political Conference recommended to be convened in Paragraph 60, Draft Armistice Agreement, which shall endeavor to settle this question within thirty (30) days, during which period the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall continue to retain custody of those prisoners of war. The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall declare the relief from the prisoner of war status to civilian status of any prisoners of war who have not exercised their right to be repatriated and for whom no other disposition has been agreed to by the Political Conference within one hundred and twenty (120) days after the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission has assumed their custody. Thereafter, according to the application of each individual, those who choose to go to neutral nations shall be assisted by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission and the Red Cross Society of India. This operation shall be completed within thirty (30) days, and upon its completion, the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall immediately cease its functions and declare its dissolution. After the dissolution of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, whenever and wherever any of those above-mentioned civilians who have been relieved from the prisoner of war status desire to return to their fatherlands, the authorities of the localities where they are shall be responsible for assisting them in returning to their fatherlands.

RED CROSS VISITATION

12. Essential Red Cross service for prisoners of war in custody of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall be provided by India in accordance with regulations issued by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission.

VI

PRESS COVERAGE

13. The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall insure freedom of the press and other news media in observing the entire operation as enumerated herein, in accordance with procedures to be established by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission.

VII

LOGISTICAL SUPPORT FOR PRISONERS OF WAR

14. Each side shall provide logistical support for the prisoners of war in the area under its military control, delivering required support to the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission at an agreed delivery point in the vicinity of each prisoner of war installation.

15. The cost of repatriating prisoners of war to the exchange point at Panmunjon shall be borne by the detaining side and the cost from the exchange point by the side on which said prisoners depend, in accordance with Article 118 of the Geneva Convention.

16. The Red Cross Society of India shall be responsible for providing such general service personnel in the prisoner of war installations as required by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission.

17. The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall provide medical support for the prisoners of war as may be practicable. The detaining side shall provide medical support as practicable upon the request of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission and specifically for those cases requiring extensive treatment or hospitalization. The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall maintain custody of prisoners of war during such hospitalization. The detaining side shall facilitate such custody. Upon completion of treatment, prisoners of war shall be returned to a prisoner of war installation as specified in Paragraph 4 above.

18. The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission is entitled to obtain from both sides such legitimate assistance as it may require in carrying out its duties and tasks, but both sides shall not under any name and in any form interfere or exert influence.

VIII

LOGISTICAL SUPPORT FOR THE NEUTRAL NATIONS REPATRIATION COMMISSION

19. Each side shall be responsible for providing logistical support for the personnel of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission stationed in the area under its military control, and both sides shall contribute on an equal basis to such support within the Demilitarized Zone. The precise arrangements shall be subject to determination between the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission and the detaining side in each case.

20. Each of the detaining sides shall be responsible for protecting the explaining representatives from the other side while in transit over lines of communication within its area, as set forth in Paragraph 23 for the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, to a place of residence and while in residence in the vicinity of but not within each of the locations where the prisoners of war are in custody. The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall be responsible for the security of such representatives within the actual limits of the locations where the prisoners of war are in custody.

21. Each of the detaining sides shall provide transportation, housing, communication, and other agreed logistical support to the explaining representatives of the other side while they are in the area under its military control. Such services shall be provided on a reimbursable basis.

IX

PUBLICATION

22. After the Armistice Agreement becomes effective, the terms of this agreement shall be made known to all prisoners of war who, while in the custody of the detaining side, have not exercised their right to be repatriated.

MOVEMENT

23. The movement of the personnel of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission and repatriated prisoners of war shall be over lines of communication as determined by the command(s) of the opposing side and the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. A map showing these lines of communication shall be furnished the command of the opposing side and the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. Movement of such personnel, except within locations as designated in Paragraph 4 above, shall be under the control of, and escorted by, personnel of the side in whose area the travel is being undertaken; however, such movement shall not be subject to any obstruction and coercion.

XI

PROCEDURAL MATTERS

24. The interpretation of this agreement shall rest with the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission. The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, and/or any subordinate bodies to which functions are delegated or assigned by the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission, shall operate on the basis of majority vote.

25. The Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission shall submit a weekly report to the opposing Commanders on the status of prisoners of war in its custody, indicating the numbers repatriated and remaining at the end of each week.

26. When this agreement has been acceded to by both sides and by the five powers named herein, it shall become effective upon the date the Armistice becomes effective.

B. THE QUESTION OF ATROCITIES COMMITTED BY THE NORTH KOREAN AND CHINESE COMMUNIST FORCES AGAINST UNITED NATIONS PRISONERS OF WAR IN KOREA

In a letter dated 30 October (A/2531), the Chairman of the United States delegation to the eighth session of the General Assembly requested the inclusion of the following item in the agenda of the session: "Question of atrocities committed by the North Korean and Chinese Communist forces against United Nations prisoners of war in Korea".

In an explanatory memorandum (A/2531/Add.1), it was stated that, in the course of the United Nations action in Korea to repel aggression and restore international peace and security in the area, evidence had been uncovered at various times of atrocities committed by North Korean and Chinese Communist forces. Tens of thousands of United Nations soldiers and Korean civilians, it was stated, had subsequently been killed by beatings, deliberately planned starvation, cold-blooded murder, mutilation and torture. The extent and nature of these atrocities should be brought to the attention of the General Assembly, particularly since these atrocities had been committed against the forces of United Nations Members engaged, under the authority of United Nations resolutions, in a collective action against aggression which had many elements of continuing concern to the General Assembly.

The General Committee, at its 90th meeting on 2 November, considered the United States proposal and, by 12 votes to 2, decided to recommend (A/2536) that the item be included in the Assembly's agenda. It also recommended that the item be considered by the General Assembly without reference to a Committee. The recommendation of the General Committee was adopted by the General Assembly, at its 457th meeting on 11 November, by 53 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

The representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States, speaking in favour of the inclusion of the item in the agenda, stated that evidence that atrocities had been committed by the North Koreans and Chinese Communist forces against Korean civilians and against members of armed forces acting under the United Nations Command and pursuant to a United Nations mandate to repel aggression in Korea and restore peace in that area had begun to appear in the late summer of 1950 and had continued to be collected during the three years of hostilities. In view of the record and the concern of the United Nations for observance of international standards of civilized conduct, they held, the question of atrocities against United Nations forces was properly and necessarily of concern to the General Assembly.

The representatives of Indonesia, Mexico, Syria and Yugoslavia supported the inclusion of the item in the agenda on the ground that if such matters were brought before the Assembly it should discuss them. The representative of Syria stated that his vote in favour of inclusion should not, however, be taken as indicating any view on the substance of the matter, and the other three representatives expressed doubts regarding the timeliness of discussing the question while the talks at Panmunjom were encountering serious obstacles.

The representatives of the USSR and Poland, in both the General Committee and the General Assembly, argued against the inclusion of the item in the agenda. They contended that the item was a calumny based on falsification of the facts and gross lies, and had obviously been brought up for purposes of provocation. Its purpose, they said, was to prevent the peaceful settlement of the Korean question, to foment war hysteria and to prevent that easing of international tension for which most of the countries of the world longed.

Explaining his abstention, the representative of India stated that, on general principles, his delegation had always voted for the inclusion of items for the purpose of discussion. One of the parties concerned, however, was not present in the Assembly. Furthermore, as India was the Chairman of the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission in Korea, it would appear improper for it to take part in the discussion of a matter which might go before the proposed political conference on Korea. India, therefore, would not participate in any of the future proceedings on this item, nor would it participate in any vote on any draft resolution on this question.

The General Assembly considered the item at its 462nd to 467th plenary meetings, from 30 November to 3 December.

In connexion with the item, the representative of the United States transmitted, on 26 November, a compilation of documents (A/2563), obtained largely through investigations of the War Crimes Division of the Judge Advocate Division, Headquarters, Korean Communications Zone,

United States Army, together with copies of a letter dated 23 November from the United States Under Secretary of Defense, transmitting the documents to the United States Under Secretary of State, and of a letter of transmittal, dated 24 November, to the representative of the United States.

The Assembly also had before it a draft resolution by Australia, France, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/L.169), providing that the General Assembly would:

(1) express its grave concern at reports that North Korean and Chinese Communist forces had employed inhuman practices against the soldiers of forces under the United Nations Command in Korea and against the civilian population of Korea; and

(2) condemn such acts as a violation of rules of international law and basic standards of conduct and morality.

Opening the debate, the representative of the United States stated that the Assembly was faced with a series of acts involving citizens of Belgium, Korea, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Geneva covenants, he said, had been broken by the aggressors and the violations involved were, considering the scale of the Korean war, at least as vast as those committed in any war of the present century. He stressed that the cases reported in document A/2563 were only a sample illustrating the character of the atrocities, the nature of the evidence obtained, and the careful manner in which that evidence had been compiled from different sources. Many of the case files on the hundreds of atrocities incidents were still in Korea, where further evidence was being obtained, and all of them were available for inspection.

The examples given in the selected documents, he said, fell into four categories:

(1) the killing of prisoners of war at or near the scene of battle;

(2) the killing of Korean civilians for political reasons;

(3) long marches far behind the battle zone, in which prisoners of war had died from violent abuse, systematic neglect and outright killing; and

(4) the death of prisoners of war from the same causes in temporary or permanent prison camps.

The probable number of victims of battle atrocities had been reckoned by the War Crimes Division at about 11,600. While the cases varied widely, they were held together by one consistent pattern: the killing of prisoners in a battle situation, usually just before retreating, in order to gain a military advantage. The pattern was so widespread, he stated, that it clearly suggested a high-level policy on the part of the enemy. With regard to atrocities against civilians, they accounted for a probable total of some 17,000 victims, all Koreans. Most often the perpetrators had been North Korean Communist political security police, sometimes with help from units of the North Korean Army; these atrocities were, by their very nature, political. A preliminary estimate of the number of victims of the third type of atrocities indicated that 1,940 prisoners had died in the course of a total of about 81 separate death marches behind the battle zone. Of these 1,367 were Americans, 342 were from the Republic of Korea, and 231 were of unknown nationality. In those cases, there was no battle situation involved, no threat that the prisoners would be recaptured, and the Chinese Communists as well as North Korean forces were involved. Out of the 81 separate marches recorded, the Chinese Communists had been exclusively in charge of 50 and jointly responsible for four. The preliminary and tentative estimate regarding fatalities in the prison camps came to over 7,300. About 1,100 of them were of uncertain nationality, while the remainder was about equally divided between Republic of Korea and United States forces. A clear division of responsibility for these deaths between North Korean and Chinese Communists camp custodians was difficult, at best. It was clear that both groups were heavily involved. The North Koreans had been in charge of a total of 53 of the camps where atrocities had been reported. The Chinese Communists had had charge of six camps, and another six had been under the supervision of both groups at one time or another. The Chinese Communists, however, he stated, had played a much larger part than these figures would suggest, since they had had charge of several large camps.

In connexion with his explanation concerning the different categories dealt with above, the United States representative also gave details of a number of the cases submitted in document A/2563. He stated that the tentatively estimated total for all four categories was close to 38,000, of which 19,700 were military victims. Nearly 9,000 of the latter belonged to the Republic of Korea army and about 10,700 to United Nations contingents, principally to those of the United States. The Assembly, said the United States representative, had before it a clear record of the wholesale violation of numerous articles of the 1949 Geneva Convention on prisoners of war, and these violations had occurred on such a scale as to indicate irresistibly that they reflected a conscious policy. While the mass executions of Korean civilians had been carried out by authority of the North Korean political security police, which was a purely political agency, the killing of prisoners of war had been closely connected with the incessant probing and manipulations of the prisoners in the camps. It could not be ignored, he said, that the leading men of the North Korean regime and Army were, for the most part, Soviet citizens and that Soviet officers were at the top of the command structure over the prison camps in North Korea. With regard to battle atrocities, some 27 per cent had been committed by Chinese Communist military units, where military and political training, he said, go hand in hand. In some reported cases the so-called cultural officer of the unit involved had ordered the killing of the prisoners.

He considered that the record now before the Assembly was significant for the following reasons. It told of human actions which offended every civilized conscience. It revealed a vast, systematic and deliberate assault upon basic standards of international conduct and morality—standards which were precious and essential to freedom and civilization. These acts had been taken by an authority having close connexion with the Soviet Union, and were in conformity with actions tragically typical of so many absolutist systems throughout history. They had been committed by forces whose aggression the United Nations had resisted and repelled, and which still stood fully armed facing the United Nations forces. The United Nations, he considered, should speak dearly in defence of the civilized standards of conduct which had found expression in the Geneva Conventions.

The representatives of Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Ecuador, France, Greece, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Peru, the Philippines, Turkey, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and Uruguay spoke in support of the joint draft resolution. They considered that there was no doubt that atrocities against United Nations troops and Korean civilians had been committed, and committed on a large scale. In their view the General Assembly must express in clear terms the grave concern it felt towards such atrocities and it should condemn the commission of those atrocities as a violation of rules of international law and basic standards of conduct and morality and as affronting human rights. They felt that that was the least the General Assembly could do; for the victims of those atrocities were to a considerable extent men from various Member States which the United Nations itself had called upon to uphold the principles of the Charter. They said that if the Assembly should ignore the report on atrocities it would be guilty of a callousness unworthy of the United Nations, and would lower its status in the eyes of world opinion. By adopting the draft resolution, the General Assembly would demonstrate to the world that the United Nations was aware of its duty and responsibility to those who had fought under its flag. The reports of those atrocities had caused revulsion throughout the world, and it was proper that the Chinese and North Korean Governments should be made aware of this fact and reminded of the obligations which they and all governments have towards prisoners of war and towards civilians who have the misfortune to find themselves in a theatre of war.

The representatives of Australia, China and Turkey, while expressing the view that the joint draft resolution was not sufficiently strong to express the full measure of the Assembly's horror, nevertheless considered that its wording would ensure a greater acceptance by the Assembly.

The representative of the USSR stated that the whole subject of so-called atrocities constituted a slanderous falsification and dealt with facts and events which had actually never taken place. The submission of the question was motivated, in his view, by considerations similar to those which, in November 1951, had led to the publication of Colonel Hanley's report on atrocities³² in an attempt to wreck the armistice negotiations which were taking place in Korea at that time. That provocative design had collapsed. The report had been disavowed by General Ridgway's staff on the ground that the accusations were not based on facts and were contrary to reality. According to the New York Times of 29 October 1953, the new move was, like the old one, a manoeuvre of psychological warfare. The material submitted in support of the accusations (A/2563) consisted of nothing but rough drafts which exposed the authors as falsifiers and forgers of documents, as shown by the facts that some material had been destroyed or eliminated from the files, and that a special procedure had been drawn up to obtain the necessary information from the prisoners of war. New efforts, he said, were being made to renew the practice of the fabrication of documents and evidence by means of hand-picked witnesses, specially processed for the purpose.

He stated that the original investigation of all the alleged cases had been carried out by the South Korean police with the use of barbarous and atrocious methods. Under court martial conditions, he said, there were no guarantees of proper investigatory procedure, no limitations had been imposed on the arbitrariness of the interrogators and, moreover, the investigations showed substantial organic defects and abnormal features, such as the absence of registration of graves and the absence of any corpses, which eliminated the possibility of verification and control of the allegations. Any sort of figures had been just invented in accordance with the tastes and fancies of the interrogators, or rather of their commanders who supplied them with instructions. In fact, there had been no such thing as an investigation of events or even any attempt at it. The aim of the whole story was to intensify the cold war and international tensions in general.

Analysing a number of the cases reported in document A/2563, he drew attention to a number of testimonies and statements of facts which, he said, were contradictory or built on hearsay and indicated that the case files had been partly falsified and partly invented, and that, in many cases, the alleged atrocity victims had been killed in the United States air raids.

The whole subject had, in his view, been presented for political purposes, in an attempt by American reactionary circles to bring false accusations against the North Korean armed forces that were defending their fatherland and the Chinese volunteers who had gone to their assistance. The truth, he said, was being sacrificed by those who were interested in increasing the present international tension.

It was the United States which had repeatedly infringed and violated all norms and standards of international law relating to the protection of prisoners of war. There were many well-known facts, he said, concerning the barbarous extermination by American armed forces of the peaceful civilian population of Korea. He also referred to a letter, dated 18 December 1950, addressed to President Syngman Rhee by two representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross, regarding death by starvation of inmates in two jails in Seoul, and two reports by United States press correspondents, in July and December 1950, concerning the killing of political detainees. According to incomplete data, he said, the number of killed, wounded and maimed as a result of the brutalities of United States and Syngman Rhee armed forces amounted to several tens of thousands. Atrocities against prisoners of war, he stated, had been committed by the American armed forces, acting under the order of their Commander. The repeated communications addressed to the Security Council by the Government of the People's Republic of Korea in 1950, insisting that the Council take measures to call a halt to these atrocities, had not induced the United Nations to do anything. Over the next two years, the atrocities of the American and Syngman Rhee armed forces had continued, despite the protests of the Government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and despite the protests and intervention of international organizations and the demands voiced by wide sections of the public and organizations of a democratic character, all of which had appealed for observance of the Hague Conventions. These Conventions, he charged, had been systematically violated by the American armed forces which had turned Korean towns and villages into ruins.

The five-Power draft resolution (A/L.169), he said, did not contain one paragraph which could be supported by any truly peace-loving person. Even where unchallengeable points were made, as was the case in the second and third paragraphs of the preamble, they could not be approved because they were submitted in a context which besmirched the North Korean armed forces, the Chinese People's Volunteers, the North Korean people, the Chinese people and all other peace-loving peoples. The General Assembly could not become a tool of the foreign policy of the United States and of certain other countries. It must repudiate any attempt to wreck the peaceful settlement of the Korean question.

In conclusion, he stated that the examination of the item by the Assembly was only one manifestation of the course of current United States foreign policy designed to prevent any reduction of international tension and to leave the United States free to incite the armaments race and to prepare for a new world war. That was why reactionary circles of the United States stood in need of these charges at a time when the Government of the Soviet Union was doing everything in its power to alleviate international tension and to bring about the settlement of unresolved international questions.

Statements expressing views similar to those of the USSR were made by the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR. The question before the Assembly, they argued, showed the extent to which slander, falsification and fabrication had been resorted to in order to increase the existing international tension and to obstruct the pacific settlement of the most important international problems, especially the Korean question. A close study of the documents submitted, they said, showed that the facts and figures adduced therein were so incredible and unfounded that it was obvious that the whole scheme was intended to mislead, first of all the American people, and then the peoples of the world. The campaign of lies and slander was also designed to divert attention from the preparations for a new world war being made by reactionary circles in the United States. The ruling circles of the United States, they contended, were trying to divest themselves of their responsibility for the bombardments of peaceful towns and villages in Korea and the commission of atrocities against Korean and Chinese prisoners of war in camps on Koje and Pongnam islands and elsewhere.

The representative of Pakistan stressed that his delegation saw no reason to conclude that the evidence adduced in support of the charges had been invented or manufactured. However, there had been no opportunity to hear the other side or even to know whether the other side wished to be heard. This constituted a disquieting tendency in the Assembly to secure ex parte hearings and to record ex parte verdicts. For this reason, his delegation would abstain in the vote on the joint draft resolution if the first operative paragraph was adopted. The representative of Indonesia explained after the voting that his abstention had been motivated by the same consideration.

On 3 December 1953, the joint draft resolution (A/L.169) was adopted by a roll-call vote of 42 to 5, with 10 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Iran, Israel, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Against: Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, Indonesia, Iraq, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

The resolution (804(VIII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the item "Question of atrocities committed by the North Korean and Chinese Communist forces against United Nations prisoners of war in Korea" proposed by the United States of America in documents A/2531 and A/2531/Add. 1 of 30 and 31 October 1953,

"Recalling that basic legal requirements for humane treatment of prisoners of war and civilians in connexion with the conduct of hostilities are established by general international law and find authoritative reaffirmation in the Geneva Conventions of 1929 and 1949 relative to the treatment of prisoners of war and in the Geneva Convention of 1949 relative to the protection of civilian persons in time of war,

"Recalling that these Conventions also embody precise and detailed provisions for giving effect to the basic legal requirements referred to above, and that these provisions, to the extent that they have not become binding as treaty law, have been accorded most general support by the international community,

"Desiring to secure general and full observance of the requirements of international law and of universal standards of human decency,

"1. Expresses its grave concern at reports and information that North Korean and Chinese Communist forces have, in a large number of instances, employed inhuman practices against the heroic soldiers of forces under the United Nations Command in Korea and against the civilian population of Korea,

"2. Condemns the commission by any governments or authorities of murder, mutilation, torture, and other atrocious acts against captured military personnel or civilian populations, as a violation of rules of international law and basic standards of conduct and morality and as affronting human rights and the dignity and worth of the human person."

C. THE QUESTION OF IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATION OF CHARGES OF USE BY UNITED NATIONS FORCES OF BACTERIAL WARFARE

1. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

By a letter, dated 20 October 1952 addressed to the Secretary-General (A/2231), the United States requested that the item "Question of impartial investigation of charges of use by United Nations forces of bacteriological warfare" be placed on the agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly. In an accompanying explanatory memorandum, the United States delegation stated that, since February 1952, the world had been exposed to a false campaign conducted by the USSR and the Soviet bloc States, to the effect that the United Nations forces in Korea had resorted to bacterial warfare. The charges had been categorically denied as false and unfounded by responsible officials of the United States and by the Unified Command. The offer of the International Committee of the Red Cross and the World Health Organization to assist in investigating the charges had been rejected.

In June 1952, it was stated, the United States had brought the matter before the United Nations Security Council and submitted a resolution requesting the International Committee of the Red Cross to investigate the charges and report the results to the Security Council. This resolution received ten affirmative votes in the Security Council, but failed of adoption because of the veto of the Soviet Union.³³ Although the Soviet Union had used its veto to block an impartial investigation, the charges had been repeated again in the General Assembly. These false charges, the persistent refusal of those making them to agree to an impartial investigation, and the propaganda campaign based upon these charges impaired friendly relations and created a situation which should be considered by the General Assembly as an urgent and important matter on which appropriate action should be taken.

The item was considered at the second part of the seventh session between 27 March and 8 April 1953, at the 590th to 593rd meetings of the First Committee.

The following documents relating to the question were circulated to the Committee.

(1) A cablegram dated 24 October 1952 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to the President of the General Assembly (A/C.1/727), in which he reiterated the accusation of the use of bacterial weapons by "the American interventionists" in North Korea, protested against unilateral discussion at the current session of the Assembly without the participation of genuine representatives of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and requested such participation.

(2) A cablegram dated 27 October 1952 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to the President of the General Assembly (A/C.1/728), also requesting participation in the debate.

(3) A letter dated 5 March 1953 from the head of the USSR delegation, forwarding statements of captured United States air force officers (A/C.1/L.28), including the signed statements of Colonel F. H. Schwable and Major Roy H. Bley, admitting and giving a detailed account of the use of bacterial weapons by the United States troops fighting in Korea.

(4) A note dated 27 March 1953 from the representative of the United States, transmitting statements by members of the United States armed forces in Korea (A/C.1/L.37), contradicting the confessions of Colonel Frank H. Schwable and Major Roy H. Bley.

At the 590th meeting of the First Committee, the representative of the USSR submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.35), according to which the representatives of the People's Republic of China and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea would be invited to participate in the discussion of the question in the First Committee.

The representatives of Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR spoke in support of the draft resolution, stating that the two Governments were directly interested in the matter and could furnish the United Nations with full and authentic information. Those Governments, they said, had been the first to alert the United Nations and world public opinion to the fact that the United States was using bacterial weapons in the Korean war, weapons which were banned by international law and, particularly, by the Geneva Protocol of 1925. The two States mentioned were those directly affected by the utilization of bacterial weapons and a truly objective and impartial investigation could not be made without their participation. They recalled that the Security Council, in September 1950, and the First Committee, in November 1950,³⁴ had extended invitations to representatives of the People's Republic of China. There was no reason to deviate from that practice.

The representatives of India, Indonesia and Syria supported the USSR proposal, arguing that since the charges had been made by the Central People's Government of China and the North Korean authorities, they should obviously be in the best position to inform the Committee of the situation. Only after hearing the charges and the replies to them, could the Committee be in a position to arrive at an impartial judgment as to how to proceed in the matter. It could not be decided beforehand that either party would indulge in propaganda, and it should not in all fairness be inferred that the views expressed by either party were insincere, until the truth or falsity of the charges had been proved through an impartial investigation. There were several precedents for inviting the parties involved in the consideration of a question affecting them. For instance, when the question of German elections³⁵ had been discussed by the General Assembly, the parties directly concerned, although representing opposing views, had been invited prior to any consideration of the setting up of an impartial investigating committee.

The representatives of Australia, China, Greece, Peru and the United States spoke against the USSR draft resolution, explaining that the present task of the Committee was to appoint a commission which would be assisted by technical experts.

³⁵ See Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 317-19.

Once that impartial body was set up, the parties could submit to it all the evidence they might deem necessary, but the General Assembly should not attempt to turn itself into an investigating tribunal. The documents already available to the Committee provided a sufficient basis for taking a decision on whether an impartial investigation was needed. Those documents had come directly from the North Korean and Chinese Communist authorities and there was no need, therefore, for the representatives of those regimes to be given the opportunity to come to the United Nations to repeat their charges. Thus, the Chinese Communists and the North Koreans, who were aggressors, had no reason to participate in the meetings of the Committee. The proposed commission of experts would surely function in the territories of China and North Korea if those authorities would agree to receive it, and it would therefore be easy for the representatives of those Governments to lay before the experts all the proofs which they had to present.

The USSR draft resolution (A/C.1/L.35) was rejected by 40 votes to 15, with 5 abstentions.

At the 590th meeting on 27 March 1953, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Philippines, Thailand, Turkey, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.1/L.36), providing that the General Assembly should, inter alia:

(1) establish, after the President of the Assembly had received an indication from all the governments and authorities concerned of their acceptance of the proposed investigation, a commission composed of five States to carry out immediately an investigation of the charges;

(2) call upon the governments and authorities concerned to enable the commission to travel freely throughout such areas of North and South Korea, the Chinese mainland and Japan, as the commission might deem necessary, and otherwise to facilitate its task;

(3) request the President of the Assembly to transmit the resolution immediately to the governments and authorities concerned, requesting them to indicate their acceptance of the proposed investigation;

(4) request the President to report to the Assembly at the earliest practicable date on the results of his efforts;

(5) direct the commission to enlist the aid of scientists of international reputation; and

(6) direct the commission, after acceptance of the proposed investigation, to report to the Members of the Assembly, through the Secretary-General, no later than 1 September 1953.

The representative of the United States declared that his Government's purpose in submitting the item was that the General Assembly should institute and supervise an impartial investigation of the charges of use by the United Nations forces of bacterial warfare. Those charges, he said, were intended to spread hatred and suspicion in the minds of men and to undermine the collective efforts of the United Nations forces in meeting aggression in Korea, and to isolate the friendly world from the United States by attempting to single it out for special condemnation. From March 1952 until the present time, the United States representative continued, offers of an impartial investigation of the charges of bacterial warfare had been repeatedly made by the United Nations, the World Health Organization, the International Committee of the Red Cross, as well as by the United States Government, but there had been no response from the "Soviet bloc". When the Security Council had wished to decide on an investigation, the Soviet Government had vetoed the proposal. One device used by the Communists in building up their campaign was the use of so-called investigations. The first investigating body had been composed of Chinese Communists, and its Chairman had declared that the purpose was to gather "the various criminal facts on bacteriological warfare waged by the American imperialists". The second investigation had been staged by a committee of the Communist front organ called the International Association of Democratic Lawyers. The third investigation commission had been the International Scientific Commission for the investigation of facts concerning bacterial warfare in Korea and China, organized by the Chinese People's Committee for World Peace. The partiality of the composition and aims of the three commissions was obvious. A second device had been to make use of confessions extorted from prisoners of war by various techniques, including physical and psychological torture. Documents circulated to the members of the Committee showed that those so-called confessions were totally false in their general assertions and in their specific allegations.

In view of these facts, his delegation and other States whose forces were engaged in repelling aggression in Korea had presented the joint draft resolution to set up a commission of investigation. This commission, he suggested, should examine all prisoners of war who were alleged to have made confessions. Prior to their examination those prisoners should be taken to a neutral area where they would remain under the responsibility and custody of the United Nations until the conclusion of the hostilities.

With regard to the Geneva Protocol, the representative of the United States said that his Government did not think that it met the need for security against the use of bacterial weapons, for it merely collected promises not to use them first. The Geneva Protocol permitted the manufacturing and stockpiling of bacterial weapons and made no provision for effective, honest, international control. The United States considered that the Disarmament Commission should continue its efforts to evolve comprehensive and coordinated plans for the elimination and prohibition of all weapons of mass destruction, including bacterial ones.

The other sponsors of the draft resolution stated that the question before the Committee involved the prestige of the United Nations as a whole. Although the supporters of aggression in Korea had singled out the United States as the responsible party, every country which had forces in Korea and which had endorsed the principle of fighting aggression was directly concerned in the question. The charges of bacterial warfare brought against the United Nations Command had already been discussed in the Disarmament Commission³⁶ and in the Security Council during the summer of 1952. At that time, the attempt to secure an impartial investigation approved by ten of the eleven members of the Council had been frustrated by the sole opposition of the USSR. The question was now before the Assembly and the only new evidence was contained in the alleged confessions of two United States prisoners of war, which had been circulated in document A/C.1/L.28. Those confessions were false and had been extracted by coercive methods. Several scientific associations, organizations or personalities in the free world had studied and denounced the lack of scientific value of the evidence adduced in support of the allegations of the use of germ warfare by the United Nations forces. The evidence given in the report of the International Scientific Commission which had been organized by the Chinese People's Committee for World Peace (S/2802) was no more acceptable than the rest. It was clear that all the scientists that had produced the report had been selected by the executive committee of the World Peace Council. Hence, the opinion it gave could only be regarded as a partisan statement.

If there had been the slightest grounds for such accusations, all the nations now engaged in United Nations action in Korea would have come to know something about it. It was for this reason that all the nations concerned would welcome an impartial investigation. The joint draft resolution offered another opportunity for such an investigation and if the Communist authorities were not afraid of the truth they would welcome that opportunity. If they again refused an investigation, the world would know the falsity and baselessness of the accusations. If, however, the Soviet Union were not prepared to accept it, that Government should clearly state what kind of body it would like to see carry out an impartial inquiry to the satisfaction of the conscience of the world.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR spoke against the joint draft resolution. They reiterated that they would be prepared to consider the question of investigation which was on the agenda, provided that the representatives of the People's Republic of China and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea were heard in the First Committee. But the General Assembly had rejected that proposal. In those circumstances, how could the First Committee seriously assert that it was dealing with a question of an impartial investigation?

The fact, these representatives stated, was that the United States was engaged in the mass production of bacterial weapons and was using them under the flag of the United Nations. It was well-known that during and after the Second World War the United States had conducted research on bacterial warfare. A report of 3 January 1946, published by the United States War Department mentioned the establishment of research centres in Maryland, Mississippi, Indiana and Utah. The fact was also confirmed by statements of officers of the chemical corps. Further proof of the culpability of the United States was, it was stated, its refusal to accede to the Geneva Protocol and to undertake not to produce or use bacterial weapons. If the United States was really concerned about the problem, the simplest and most expedient way of proving it would be to denounce publicly the use of bacterial weapons and to proceed immediately to ratify the Geneva Protocol of 1925. The reason for the United States refusal to do so was that it feared to lose its profits if bacterial warfare was prohibited. The fact that the United States had used bacterial warfare had been thoroughly established by the report of the members of the Commission of the International Association of Democratic Lawyers, the International Scientific Commission, the Commission of Chinese Scientific Workers and the Women's International Democratic Federation, these representatives said. Not merely ordinary soldiers, but senior officers had admitted the fact, as proved by document A/C.1/L.28. No counter-arguments had been produced and the existing evidence could not be shaken.

The truth was that the United States Government did not want an investigation and did not wish the substance of the question to be considered, as was shown by its refusal to discuss the matter with the parties concerned. The United States idea of an impartial investigation was to entrust the task to the so-called "International" Committee of the Red Cross which, these representatives said, was nothing but a Swiss institution in no way public or international, or to the World Health Organization which, far from carrying out its universal and humanitarian tasks, had engaged in discriminatory practices against certain States, a fact which had forced the Soviet Union, the Byelorussian SSR, Romania and Czechoslovakia to leave it. It was obvious that investigations could be made only by organizations enjoying general confidence. The real aim of the proposal before the Committee was not to initiate an objective investigation but to confuse world public opinion, which had shown its uneasiness at the use of that terrible weapon. That uneasiness, it was said, could not be dispelled by merely charging the Soviet Union, the People's Republic of China and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea with false propaganda.

At the 593rd meeting on 8 April, the sixteen Powers submitted a revision (A/C.1/L.36/Rev.2) of their joint draft resolution, proposing that the commission should be composed of Brazil, Egypt, Pakistan, Sweden and Uruguay.

The revised draft resolution was adopted at the same meeting by 52 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions.

The question was considered by the General Assembly at the 427th and 428th plenary meetings on 18 and 23 April.

The draft resolution recommended by the First Committee (A/2384) was adopted by a roll-call vote of 51 to 5, with 4 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR.

Abstaining: Burma, India, Indonesia, Saudi Arabia.

The resolution (706(VII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting that accusations have been made by certain governments and authorities charging the use of bacteriological warfare by United Nations Forces, and that the Unified Command has repeatedly denied such charges,

"Recalling that when the charges were first made the Unified Command had requested that an impartial investigation be made of them,

"Noting that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China and the North Korean authorities have so far refused to accept an offer by the International Committee of the Red Cross to carry out an investigation,

"Noting that the draft resolution submitted in the Security Council by the Government of the United States of America proposing an investigation of these charges by the International Committee of the Red Cross failed to carry because of the negative vote of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics,

"Desiring to serve the interests of truth,

"1. Resolves that, after the President of the General Assembly has received an indication from all the governments and authorities concerned of their acceptance of the investigation proposed in the present resolution, a Commission, composed of Brazil, Egypt, Pakistan, Sweden and Uruguay, shall be set up and shall carry out immediately an investigation of the charges that have been made;

"2. Calls upon the governments and authorities concerned to enable the Commission to travel freely throughout such areas of North and South Korea, the Chinese mainland and Japan as the Commission may deem necessary in the performance of its task and to allow the Commission freedom of access to such persons, places and relevant documents as it considers necessary for the fulfilment of its task and to allow it to examine any witness, including prisoners of war, under such safeguards and conditions as the Commission shall determine: all prisoners of war who are alleged to have made confessions regarding the use of bacteriological warfare shall, prior to examination by the Commission, be taken to a neutral area and remain under the responsibility and custody of the Commission until the end of the Korean hostilities;

"3. Requests the President of the General Assembly to transmit the present resolution immediately to the governments and authorities concerned, requesting them to indicate their acceptance of the investigation proposed in the present resolution;

"4. Requests the President of the General Assembly to report to the General Assembly at the earliest practicable date on the results of his efforts;

"5. Directs the Commission, when set up, to enlist the aid of such scientists of international reputation, especially epidemiologists, and such other experts as it may select;

"6. Directs the Commission, after acceptance of the investigation proposed in the present resolution by all the governments and authorities concerned, to report to the Members of the General Assembly through the Secretary-General as soon as possible and no later than 1 September 1953;

"7. Requests the Secretary-General to furnish the Commission with the necessary staff and facilities."

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

On 28 July 1953, the President of the General Assembly reported (A/2426) that Assembly resolution 706(VII) had been duly communicated to the Governments of the United States, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the People's Republic of China, the Republic of Korea and Japan. The United States, the Republic of Korea and Japan had accepted the proposed investigation but no other replies had been received.

At its 435th meeting on 17 September 1953, the General Assembly decided to include in its agenda the item proposed by the United States: "Question of impartial investigation of charges of use by United Nations forces of bacterial warfare". The item was considered by the First Committee at its 648th to 653rd meetings, from 26 to 31 October 1953.

By a letter dated 26 October (A/C.1/L.66), the representative of the United States transmitted copies of ten sworn statements by members of the United States armed forces, made following their release as prisoners of war, concerning the charges of the use of bacterial warfare in Korea. This document contained, inter alia, photostatic copies of sworn statements of Colonel Frank H. Schwable and Major Roy H. Bley, First Lieutenants John S. Quinn, Paul R. Kniss, Floyd B. O'Neal, and Kenneth Enoch, which stated categorically that the confessions had been extorted from them during their captivity and were false.

On 26 October, the USSR submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.67), to have the Assembly call upon all States which had not acceded to or ratified the Geneva Protocol of 17 June 1925 for the prohibition of the use of bacterial weapons to accede to the Protocol or ratify it.

On 28 October, the United Kingdom, Canada, Colombia, France and New Zealand submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.68), providing that the General Assembly should:

(1) refer to the Disarmament Commission the USSR draft resolution (A/C.1/L.67) for such consideration as deemed appropriate under its plan of work and pursuant to the terms of reference of that Commission as set forth in General Assembly resolutions 502(VI) of 11 January 1952³⁷ and 704(VII) of 8 April 1953³⁸; and

(2) transmit to the Disarmament Commission for its information the records of the First Committee in which this item was discussed.

During the discussion, the representative of the United States recalled the previous consideration by the Security Council and the General Assembly (see above) of the charges of use by United Nations forces of bacterial warfare. He referred to the report by the President (A/2426), stating that the absence of a reply from the Chinese Communists and the North Korean Communists showed clearly that they feared the presence of impartial investigators because they knew that their charges were false.

Dealing with the statements his delegation had presented from United States fliers (A/C.1/L.66), he said that it should be recalled that the "confessions" of some of those fliers that they had waged bacterial warfare in Korea had perhaps been the most important and publicized feature of the Communist accusations. The USSR had built its case in the United Nations especially on six individual cases of so-called confessions. On 1 October 1952, the USSR delegation had transmitted to the United Nations the document entitled "Report of the International Scientific Commission for the investigation of facts concerning bacterial warfare in Korea and China" (S/2802). That "Commission", which had been composed mainly of well-known collaborators with Communist organizations, had placed great emphasis upon the statements of four United States air force officers, First Lieutenants John S. Quinn, Paul R. Kniss, Floyd B. O'Neal, and Kenneth Enoch. Later, on 12 March 1953, the USSR representative had circulated two additional so-called "confessions" from Colonel Schwable and Major Bley (A/C.1/L.28). The document that the United States delegation was now submitting to the Committee (A/C.1/L.66) contained sworn statements by the six officers concerned, who had all stated categorically that they had never waged bacterial warfare and that the so-called confessions had been false and had been extorted by the coercive Communist methods which were well-known to the world. The entire germ warfare propaganda drive had been developed to give expression to a broad Communist policy governing the conduct of the Korean aggression which was aimed at discrediting the United States in the eyes of the free world and thus helping to isolate it from its allies. The only individuals marked for "confessions" had been United States prisoners.

In reply to the assertions of the representatives of the USSR, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR, the representative of the United States said that the impartiality of the investigation proposed under General Assembly resolution 706(VII), which was to be conducted by a commission composed of Brazil, Egypt, Pakistan, Sweden and Uruguay, could not be questioned, while, on the contrary, the composition of the International Scientific Commission could be legitimately taxed as partisan. The USSR representative had maintained that the statements in which the captured airmen had repudiated their alleged confessions had been obtained by the worst methods of pressure. He had even asserted that the United States Secretary of Defense had published veritable threats for that purpose. However, the statement in question by Mr. Wilson had been published on 16 October, i.e. long after the repatriated airmen had repudiated their so-called confessions and the United States Press had reported the change on their return to freedom, as could be seen from articles published in the New York Times of 6 September and in the U.S. News & World Report of 18 September. The history of bacterial warfare propaganda was now known. The record was conclusive and showed clearly that the charges were false and that the most brutal coercion had been used to extract confessions.

Turning to the USSR draft resolution (A/C.1/L.67), the representative of the United States said that it was in substance the same as that submitted to the Security Council in June 1952 and to the General Assembly at its seventh session and which was now before the Disarmament Commission at the request of the USSR. Although the USSR proposal was not connected with the item under discussion, it should be remembered that the Geneva Protocol had been the expression of an effort made by nations of good will in an era of good feeling to give further effect to their hope that armaments could be limited. Since then, the political structure of the world had undergone a radical change. The Soviet Union was responsible for this and had shown that its word was not to be trusted. As far as bacterial weapons were concerned, the USSR had only ratified the Geneva Protocol with reservations, one of which had said that the Protocol would cease to be binding in regard to all enemy States whose armed forces did not respect the restrictions which were the object of the Protocol. By foisting on the world the charge that bacterial weapons had been used, the Soviet Union had served notice that it would not hesitate to evade its obligations under the Geneva Protocol. The United States Government had nothing but praise for those who had drafted, signed and ratified the Protocol, in that era long past. But States could not embark upon the momentous task of disarmament without iron-clad guarantees of performance by all parties. The history of the disarmament efforts in the United Nations in the past seven years illustrated that truth. No people hoped more fervently than the people of the United States for the day when the basic conditions for genuine peace could be established. The United States delegation felt therefore that the Soviet draft proposal should be referred to the Disarmament Commission and would support the five-Power draft resolution (A/C.1/L.68) calling for this reference.

The representative of the USSR said that, from the outset, the United States had opposed any objective and comprehensive consideration of the issue. When the Soviet Union had insisted that representatives of the Chinese People's Republic and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea should participate in the discussion, its proposal had been rejected in violation of the principles of the Charter and, particularly, of Article 32.³⁹ By discriminating against the Chinese and Korean People's Republics, with the aid of the votes of its supporters, the United States had chosen to have the question considered unilaterally. At the same time, it had demanded that those two Governments admit to their territories persons hand-picked by the United States to carry out so-called inquiries. In those circumstances, there could be no question of any objective investigation and it was not surprising that no results had followed.

At present, the United States was trying to dispute the testimony of the American fliers, particularly Colonel Schwable and Major Bley, as to the use of bacterial weapons by the United States armed forces. In this connexion, the United States had been forced to use the statements of four unknown airmen, whose names appeared in document A/C.1/L.66 and who claimed to have been tortured while in captivity and to have refused to give testimony. It was obviously not difficult for the American military authorities to find soldiers and officers who, after due indoctrination, would be ready to sign any deposition useful to their commanding officers. Attention should be drawn to the fact that, while Colonel Schwable and Major Bley were prisoners, the United States had rejected any objective consideration of the matter in the United Nations and had demanded that those two officers and other prisoners be interrogated on neutral territory by a neutral commission. That demand had been forgotten as soon as those officers had been released and brought to the United States, where the officers had been interrogated by military authorities with no external control nor observers. Thus, the United States had extorted the repudiations which it was now trying to present as genuine testimony. It was false to state that the Governments of North Korea and China had opposed any impartial study of the matter; they had in fact been prevented from taking part in such an impartial study. It was also wrong to state that the Soviet Union had criticized the composition of the commission appointed for the so-called impartial investigation. The USSR had merely objected that such an examination was contrary to the Charter in the absence of the Chinese and North Korean representatives.

The task of the General Assembly was not to inquire into those matters, but to invite those States which had not signed and ratified the Geneva Protocol of 1925 to do so as soon as possible. The Geneva Protocol, with its provisions prohibiting chemical and bacterial weapons, was an important part of international law. On the instructions of its Government, the USSR delegation proposed that the General Assembly should address itself to all States which had not ratified the Geneva Protocol and appeal to them to do so as soon as possible. The United States representative had attempted to justify the refusal of his Government to ratify the Geneva Protocol on the ground that the Soviet Union had made certain reservations in ratifying that instrument. But seventeen other signatories had made the same reservations and that in no way detracted from the importance of the Geneva Protocol and the moral, political and legal obligations it involved. If the United States ratified the Protocol with the same reservations as the Soviet Union, it would still be valid. The USSR delegation, both in the Disarmament Commission and in the Security Council had, he said, already refuted the United States argument concerning the difference between the situation in 1925 and in 1953. The United States representative had also tried to link the question of the Geneva Protocol with that of disarmament. But that was only a pretext by which the United States had continually sought to oppose the examination of the question of bacterial warfare by any commission whatsoever. The USSR representative recalled that in the Disarmament Commission his delegation had asked that bacterial warfare should be prohibited. But its proposal had been rejected by those who now proposed that the new USSR resolution should be transmitted to the Disarmament Commission. The five-Power draft resolution (A/C.1/L.68) was obviously an attempt to shelve the USSR draft resolution permanently. The USSR representative urged all Member States to adopt his draft resolution (A/C.1/L.67). The accession to and ratification of the Geneva Protocol by all States would be a great contribution to international peace and security, he said.

Sharing the view expressed by the representative of the USSR, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR said that the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and the Chinese People's Republic had made every effort to have the use of bacterial weapons investigated in their countries by a truly impartial international body. A large number of legal and scientific experts from the International Association of Democratic Lawyers and the International Scientific Commission had carried out an inquiry on the spot. Those two commissions had found that there was evidence supporting the accusations. The Chinese and North Korean Governments had not subsequently raised any objections to a fresh investigation of the question by a truly impartial international body, but had rightly opposed a unilateral investigation such as that proposed in Assembly resolution 706(VII), adopted under United States pressure.

The statements made by the United States representative were, these representatives said, nothing but slanderous propaganda and reflected no willingness to discuss the facts and evidence. The United States had launched a campaign to prove mistreatment of prisoners of war by the Chinese and North Koreans, but many statements from returned prisoners of war and many Press reports, particularly in the Australian Press, had commented favourably on the good physical and moral state of the repatriated prisoners. At the present session, the United States had sought to deceive public opinion by using statements by released prisoners repudiating their previous testimony. It should be noted that many of those statements showed that the prisoners had not been subject to coercion during their captivity and the repudiation of their previous confessions was due to their fear of punishment for having revealed the United States methods of warfare, especially as the United States Secretary of Defense, Mr. Wilson, had stated that soldiers making statements while prisoners of war would be subject to the provisions of military law.

These representatives recalled that the USSR had always voted for the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction. After ratifying the Geneva Protocol, it had proposed, in 1929, to the Preparatory Commission for the Disarmament Conference, that the Protocol should be supplemented by articles for the outlawing of all substances capable of being used for bacterial or chemical warfare. At that time, the Soviet Union had proposed that an appeal should be made to States which had not already ratified the Protocol to do so and had repeated its request in 1932. In 1949 and in 1952 the Soviet Union had again taken similar steps both at Geneva and in the United Nations Disarmament Commission and the Security Council. But the United States Government had always thwarted those efforts. The argument that the Geneva Protocol had lost some of its significance failed to recognize the facts. During the Second World War, even the Fascist States had not dared to violate the Protocol.

There was no objection in principle to referring the USSR draft resolution to the Disarmament Commission, these representatives said, but the wisest plan would be to adopt the proposal, since it would strengthen the work of the Disarmament Commission and at the same time would confirm the decision taken in 1946 concerning the absolute necessity of prohibiting weapons of mass destruction. The adoption of the USSR proposal would not prevent the Disarmament Commission from dealing further with the matter within the general framework of the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction, but, in view of the difficulties which had arisen in drawing up new conventions for such prohibition, it was surely better in those conditions to strengthen an existing instrument which had proved useful during the last 20 years.

A majority of representatives, including those of Australia, Canada, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, France, Greece, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Philippines, Turkey and the United Kingdom, spoke against the USSR draft resolution (A/C.1/L.67) and in favour of the five-Power draft (A/C.1/L.68). They regretted that the charges of bacterial warfare against the United Nations troops in Korea had again been brought before the Assembly. Since the General Assembly had considered it its duty to adopt resolution 706(VII) by an overwhelming majority, important new aspects had emerged: (1) an armistice had been signed in Korea, which might be said to give a rather academic tone to the discussion of the charges; (2) the repatriated American airmen had repudiated their alleged confessions which had been extorted from them under pressure; and (3) while the United States, the Republic of Korea and Japan had agreed to an impartial investigation in accordance with the Assembly's wish, the Chinese and North Korean Communists had sent no reply.

It was recalled that the Assembly's offer was to send a commission composed of competent scientists from countries not involved in the Korean fighting. The USSR representative's contention that the proposed commission could only have presented conclusions dictated by the United States must have overlooked the fact that the countries represented on the commission would be Brazil, Egypt, Pakistan, Sweden and Uruguay. The question was what kind of body the Soviet Union would be prepared to regard as impartial. The International Committee of the Red Cross and the World Health Organization had been denied the capacity to investigate the germ warfare charge. Who then could have been given the task of interrogating the prisoners of war returning from Korea? Under the Charter, the USSR had undertaken to develop friendly relations among nations. If it brought charges without allowing an impartial investigation, it could hardly be said to be fulfilling its obligations.

The USSR draft resolution (A/C.1/L.67), these representatives considered, appeared to be a diversionary move designed to confuse the issue; it dealt primarily with matters that came within the competence of the Disarmament Commission, and was designed to distract the Committee's attention from the USSR refusal to submit the charge of bacterial warfare to an impartial investigation.

The value of the 1925 Geneva Protocol obviously depended on the good faith of the signatories. Many governments which had ratified the Protocol had made certain reservations. One could not help fearing that the USSR, which had falsely accused the United States of the use of bacterial weapons, had declared that its opponents were using them in order to release itself from its obligations under the Protocol. It would therefore seem apparent that only limited security could be provided by the Protocol. Considering that weapons of mass destruction came within the competence of the Disarmament Commission, the Assembly should refer to that Commission the Soviet draft resolution and should support the five-Power draft resolution (A/C.1/L.68), which contained such a provision.

The representative of China felt that the General Assembly should: (1) declare that the Communist charges were false; (2) instruct the United Nations representatives at the political conference in Korea to demand that the Communists should punish those responsible for the torture of the prisoners of war and for the extraction of false confessions and to demand the return of prisoners of war still in Communist hands; and (3) condemn the "Soviet bloc," and the USSR in particular, for having deliberately falsified the truth, in violation of the principles of the Charter and for purposes of hate propaganda.

The representative of Peru pointed out that the statements obtained from the prisoners of war during their detention by the Chinese and North Korean authorities had been discussed in the Committee as though they were admissible. He recalled that prisoners of war must be protected against all acts of violence and intimidation. Under the Geneva Convention, a prisoner of war might be interrogated only as to his surname, first name, rank, date of birth, and regimental, personnel or serial number. The very fact of interrogation of prisoners of war could not be accepted as permissible.

The representatives of Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and Yugoslavia declared that they would abstain from voting on the two draft resolutions.

The representative of Yugoslavia stated that, as a signatory of the Geneva Protocol, his Government would have been willing to ask all States to ratify it. However, the USSR draft resolution had been submitted in a context which would imply condemnation of a country without investigation and proof. On the other hand, the five-Power draft would prejudice the Disarmament Commission's decisions and even the decision the Assembly might take on that body's future.

The representative of Egypt said that, in the interest of an impartial investigation, his country had accepted membership of the commission which he had expected would have come to conclusions conducive to peace and understanding. However, the course which the debate had taken in the Committee had made him feel that it was better to abstain on both draft resolutions.

The representative of Saudi Arabia stated that those who had accused the United Nations of atrocities had damaged their own cause by refusing an impartial inquiry. However, to refer the USSR proposal to the Disarmament Commission would, he considered, hold up that body's work.

At the 653rd meeting on 31 October, the representative of the United Kingdom moved that the five-Power draft resolution (A/C.1/L.68) should be put to the vote first. This motion, which was opposed by the representative of the USSR, was adopted by 44 votes to 5, with 11 abstentions. The Committee then adopted, by 47 votes to none, with 13 abstentions, the five-Power draft resolution.

At the same meeting, the Committee decided, by 38 votes to 5, with 15 abstentions, that, in view of the adoption of the five-Power draft resolution, it would not vote on the USSR draft resolution (A/C.1/L.67).

The report of the First Committee (A/2535) containing the draft resolution recommended by it was considered by the General Assembly at its 456th plenary meeting on 3 November 1953. The representative of the USSR submitted the same draft resolution (A/L.165) which he had presented to the First Committee. The President first put to the vote the draft resolution submitted by the First Committee, which was adopted by 47 votes to none, with 12 abstentions.

The representative of the United Kingdom then moved that, in accordance with rule 91 of the rules of procedure, the General Assembly should not vote upon the USSR draft resolution. The United Kingdom motion was adopted by 39 votes to 5, with 15 abstentions.

The resolution (714(VIII)) adopted by the General Assembly read:

"The General Assembly

"1. Refers to the Disarmament Commission the draft resolution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics contained in document A/C.1/L.67 for such consideration as deemed appropriate under its plan of work and pursuant to the terms of reference of that Commission as set forth in General Assembly resolutions 502 (VI) of 11 January 1952 and 704 (VII) of 8 April 1953;

"2. Decides also to transmit to the Disarmament Commission for its information the records of the meetings of the First Committee at which this item was discussed."

D. COMPLAINT BY THE UNION OF BURMA REGARDING AGGRESSION AGAINST IT BY THE GOVERNMENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA

1. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

On 25 March 1953, Burma proposed (A/-2375) that the item "Complaint by the Union of Burma regarding an aggression against her by the Kuomintang Government of Formosa" be included in the agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly. On 31 March, the General Assembly decided to include the item under the amended title "Complaint by the Union of Burma regarding aggression against it by the Government of the Republic of China".

In an explanatory memorandum, the Foreign Minister of Burma stated that, in 1949, some Kuomintang troops had retreated south west and crossed into Indochina, where they had been disarmed and interned, and that, early in 1950, some 1,700 Kuomintang troops had crossed the border into the Kengtung State of Burma, preyed upon the countryside and caused great hardship to local inhabitants by their demands for food, transport and services. Units of the Burmese army had contacted these troops and demanded that they should either leave Burmese territory forthwith or submit to disarmament and internment in accordance with international law. On the refusal of the Kuomintang troops to comply with either of these alternatives, units of the Burmese army had taken offensive action to enforce compliance with their demand. After several engagements in the latter half of 1950, the Kuomintang troops were dislodged from the area in which they had established themselves. It was subsequently found that they had withdrawn westward and had established a new headquarters at Mong Hsat near the Burma-Thailand frontier, where they constructed a regular airfield to facilitate the receipt of supplies from sources outside Burma. New recruits had been obtained from the Burma-Yunnan border area; the number of the troops was currently estimated at about 12,000. The commanding general of these forces, General Li Mi, had been moving between Mong Hsat and Formosa (Taiwan) and there was other evidence of a direct link with the Kuomintang Government. At the end of 1952, the troops which had so far been operating in areas east of the Salween River, had extended their activities to areas west of the river in conjunction with elements in active rebellion against the Government of Burma.

The memorandum further stated that Burma, since the middle of 1950, had enlisted the good offices of some friendly governments, particularly the United States, which had been requested to make repeated demarches to the Government of Formosa, since Burma had severed diplomatic relations with that Government. Attempts to find a solution through diplomatic channels had so far proved unsuccessful. The refusal of the Kuomintang forces to submit to disarmament and internment in accordance with international law, their hostile acts against Burmese troops and their depredations against the civilian population amounted to aggression, the explanatory memorandum stated. In the opinion of the Burmese Government, the Kuomintang troops were being directed and supported in their illegal activities by the Government of Formosa.

a. DISCUSSIONS IN THE FIRST COMMITTEE

The item was considered by the First Committee at its 605th to 612th meetings, from 17 to 22 April 1953.

Together with its explanatory memorandum, Burma submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.42), by which the General Assembly would:

(1) note that "the armed troops of the Kuomintang Government of Formosa have committed acts of infringement against the territorial integrity of the Union of Burma and acts of violation of its frontiers"; and

(2) recommend to the Security Council to "condemn the Kuomintang Government of Formosa for the said acts of aggression" and to "take all necessary steps to ensure immediate cessation" of such acts.

The Assembly would further call upon all States "to respect the territorial integrity and the political independence of the Union of Burma and to be guided by the principles of the Charter in their relations with the Union of Burma".

The representative of Burma stated that his Government recognized the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China as the only legitimate Government of China; he would thus use the word "Kuomintang" to designate the authorities of Formosa, for the sake of clarity and not in any derogatory sense.

He stated that the Kuomintang troops now in Burma called themselves the Anti-Communist Nationalist Salvation Army. General Li Mi was their over-all commander, while General Liu Kuo Chwan appeared to be the actual commandant. The area in which they operated was divided into three zones: zone No. 1 was the area east of the Salween River, containing some 4,000 men; zone No. 2, in the north-eastern sector, contained about 3,000 men; zone No. 3 comprised the Mong Hsat and Mong Pan area, with some 4,000 men.

The representative of Burma then gave a geographical description of the general area around Mong Hsat, explaining that the open spaces in the immediate vicinity of Mong Hsat provided excellent air drop zones and training grounds. The Kuomintang forces had set about improving and enlarging the air strip which had been built by the Allied forces during the war as an emergency landing strip at Mong Hsat. Photographs taken of the airfield at Mong Hsat, together with photographs of Kuomintang troops undergoing training at Mong Nyen training camp, gave evidence of these facts.

Emphasizing the rapid expansion of the Kuomintang troops in Eastern Burma at the beginning of 1952, the representative of Burma stated that, as early as January 1952, contact had been established between those troops and the Karen insurgents in the Mawchi area, and early in 1952 Kuomintang troops had been sent to join with the insurgents in their fight against Burmese forces. By the middle of 1952, about 1,000 Kuomintang troops had been fighting side by side with the insurgents in the area in which the Karen rebellion had been still active. At the same time, small groups of Kuomintang troops had made their way westward and northward across the Salween River and by December 1952 the Kuomintang concentrations in the Mong Hsu and the Mong Pan areas had become so great that they had been able to take forcible possession of those States in the following months. The significant fact about all the activities was that they had occurred in widely separated parts of the Union of Burma at approximately the same time. That fact, the representative of Burma stated, indicated the existence of a concerted attempt on the part of the Kuomintang High Command to gain control of areas within the Union of Burma extending from the extreme northern limits of the Shan State to the sea coasts at Moulmein and as far westward as Loi Kaw, in the Kayah State. The Burmese Government, he said, had conclusive evidence that the linking of the Kuomintang troops with the Karen insurgents was no mere accident but part of a deliberate policy of the Kuomintang High Command to undermine the authority of the Government of the Union of Burma.

The Kuomintang forces had also interfered in the internal affairs of Burma, it was stated, and had everywhere engaged in subversive propaganda against the Government. For example, when they had occupied the Mong Hsu area, they had deposed the ruling chief and replaced him with one of their own, to whom they had given a Chinese bride. They also had issued leaflets in Burmese and Shan inciting the citizens of the Union of Burma to rebel. Their objective was obviously to set the minority groups inhabiting the eastern portions of the Union of Burma against the lawfully established government. It was obvious therefore that those self-styled anti-Communist crusaders were not fighting the troops of the People's Republic of China but were undermining the authority of the Burmese Government in the hope that they would eventually succeed in replacing it with a government more amenable to their desires. There could be no clearer case of aggression than that.

Referring to some of the depredations carried out by the Kuomintang troops against the civilian population, the representative of Burma said that the most common crime had been forcible demands for supplies or services. Since the eastern portion of the Shan State was comparatively poor, whole villages had been abandoned, owing to inability to meet the demands of the troops. In other instances, the villages had been ransacked or burnt down. The Kuomintang troops had demanded, in addition to food, building material and labour. The Mong Hsat airfield had been enlarged and improved by forced labour. The local population had also been subjected to taxation and tolls of various kinds. There had been instances where villagers had been seized and held for ransom. Some had been killed even though the ransom had been paid. In other cases, villagers had been seized and put to death on suspicion of being spies of the Government or otherwise unfriendly to the Kuomintang troops. Civilian officials of the Government had been killed as part of a deliberate policy of disrupting the administration. Women had not been spared. Furthermore, the Kuomintang troops had engaged in large-scale smuggling of opium and in organized gambling.

The representative of Burma then explained why his Government held that the activities of the Kuomintang troops in Burma were directed and supported by the Taipei Government. General Li Mi, he said, was the recognized leader of these forces. After the withdrawal of his forces to Mong Hsat towards the end of 1951, the General, according to newspaper dispatches, had returned to Formosa. A Hong Kong newspaper had reported on 14 January 1952 that General Li Mi had returned to Formosa to confer with the chiefs of staff on guerrilla warfare. According to that account, the most important request made by General Li Mi had been for more financial aid and for skilled personnel. Documents seized in 1952 also showed that officers and men of his forces had, around the same time, been dispatched to Formosa for training. There was reason to believe that General Li Mi had been back and forth between Formosa and Mong Hsat since that time and that the last visit to Formosa had been early in March 1953.

The representative of Burma referred to documents circulated to the Committee which had been seized in the course of military operations and which, he said, lent strong support to the charge that General Li Mi's troops were under the direction of the Taipei Government. He also referred to Press reports in support of this charge. A Reuters report from Taipei of 23 January 1953 said that a Chinese Nationalist spokesman, although denying that Kuomintang troops had joined Karen rebels, stated that the Kuomintang troops fought only Chinese Communists. In a statement attributed by the Times of London to Patrick Soong, Chargé d'affaires of the Kuomintang Embassy at Bangkok, it was admitted that the Kuomintang troops, which numbered 12,500, were under the direct command of military headquarters in Formosa and that the operations were an extension of the struggle against Communism in Korea, Indonesia and Malaya. This clear admission of Mr. Soong, the Burmese representative said, constituted absolute proof.

Additional and substantial evidence of Taipei's complicity, he continued, was also provided by the phenomenal improvement in the armaments carried by the Kuomintang forces in Burma. In contrast to their light equipment in 1950, they were now armed almost exclusively with infantry and heavier weapons of United States manufacture. Burma air force planes, in recent sorties, had even encountered light anti-aircraft fire. Obviously, the growth of the force from 1,500 comparatively light-armed men to 12,000 well-armed men in less than three years could not happen in the hinterland of Burma unless some outside Power were furnishing the leadership, direction and equipment. Even without other evidence, the process of elimination would have led to the conclusion that that Power was Formosa. It was probably true, as had been said, that some of the 12,000 men who at present constituted the army of General Li Mi had been locally recruited, but those recruits had been trained and equipped with outside help, which constituted intervention. If the Government of Formosa wished or intended to respect Burmese sovereignty, why had not Chiang Kai-shek openly ordered the withdrawal of those troops from Burma and dissociated himself from the campaign conducted by General Li Mi?

The representative of Burma said that his Government had tried hard to settle the question outside the United Nations. As soon as the Kuomintang forces had entered Burma, there had been an unsuccessful attempt to settle the matter at the military level. His Government had then been informed through the United States Embassy, which was friendly both with Formosa and Burma, that orders had been issued by Formosa for the forces to withdraw. The forces had, however, moved to the Mong Hsat area where they had proceeded to entrench themselves. Efforts at settlement had continued through the United States Embassy but, despite the encouragement and hope given to his Government, the size and equipment of the Kuomintang forces had increased. Further diplomatic efforts had been made in 1952, but his Government had reached the end of its endurance and had come to the conclusion that it had no alternative but to lay the full facts before the United Nations in order that suitable action might be taken to ensure that the Kuomintang forces should submit to disarming and internment or leave the country.

Turning to the Burmese draft resolution (A/C.1/L.42), the representative of Burma said that some representatives had privately expressed the view that its wording was too strong; but this was justified because foreign troops had forced their way into his country, embarrassed the Government and harmed its citizens. His Government's contention was that those troops were part of the Kuomintang army and were maintained by Formosa and, if that were so, the action of the Kuomintang Government certainly called for condemnation. His Government did not demand any particular form of action but asked only that the Security Council should be requested to take appropriate action.

During the debate, the Burmese delegation circulated to the members of the First Committee a folder containing a number of photostats and seized documents from invading Chinese troops.

The representative of China declared that the charge of aggression made by the Government of Burma was a serious one; but the idea of aggression against Burma had never entered the mind of the Chinese Government. He recalled the traditional friendship between Burma and China, stating that in the Second World War the Chinese Government had sent its forces into Burma to fight Japanese aggression. The Chinese delegation in the United Nations had sponsored the resolution in the Security Council recommending the admission of Burma to the United Nations.

The charge related to an army called the Anti-Communist Nationalist Salvation Army, which was led and commanded by General Li Mi, who had been born in a village on the border between Burma and China. The men under his command had banded together to fight Communism and for the liberation of their country, and because their homes and families had been ruined by the Communist regime. Those men were regarded as heroes by all free Chinese all over the world, from whom they received financial aid. The representative of China said he wished to make it clear that he was speaking as the representative of his Government and not as the representative of the Anti-Communist Nationalist Salvation Army nor as an apologist for General Li Mi's forces; he wanted only to show the popularity of General Li Mi and his followers in China and among Chinese everywhere.

The forces, which had originally numbered about 1,700 men, had started with a core of the Chinese army, but had developed and grown into an army which was not part of the regular army of the Republic of China nor under the physical control of its Government. If these forces now numbered 12,000 men it was as a result of recruiting on the spot; the Government of China had not sent a single soldier to reinforce that army. While it was true that the Chinese Government had some influence over General Li Mi and some of the officers, that influence varied from time to time, as did General Li Mi's influence over his scattered forces.

In so far as the Government of China had influence over General Li Mi, it had used it to further the wishes of the Government of Burma. From the beginning, his Government had warned General Li Mi not to enter Burma. The representative of China noted that the boundary between China and Burma was long and complicated and even in the demarcated section it was difficult to tell where one country began and the other ended. It was even more difficult in the undemarcated area. It might be expected that his Government should pronounce a moral condemnation regarding the collection of funds by the representatives of those forces among the free Chinese, but it was psychologically impossible for his Government to do so.

The representative of Burma had furnished the Committee with a number of documents which showed quite clearly the nature of the Anti-Communist Nationalist Salvation Army. For example, the reference in one of the documents to discussions and decisions taken in a battalion "sub-committee" indicated unmistakably that the army was not centrally controlled or supplied. The Burmese representative's evidence concerning appeals for supplies and money was also hardly characteristic of a regular army. In support of his thesis that the forces in Burma were not part of the Chinese regular army, the representative of China also referred to certain errors that representatives of those forces had committed and which were shown by the documents produced by the representative of Burma. One of the documents, for example, showed that one unit had demanded the release of certain Chinese merchants in Burma. The representative of China argued that the protection of citizens abroad was one of the functions of a diplomatic service and a regular army would not have taken upon itself to demand such release. Another document emanating from the forces in Burma referred to diplomatic relations between the Republic of China and Burma. Since no diplomatic relations existed between the two countries, the document which contained that error could not have emanated from an agency of the Chinese Government.

In response to the appeal of the United States Ambassador at Taipei the Chinese Government had given assurances that, despite the difficulties involved, it would try to stop the collection of funds by the agents of that army. That was a big effort on the part of his Government to meet the wishes of the Government of Burma. His Government had also given assurances that it would not give clearance to any aircraft taking off from any airfield on Taiwan (Formosa) flying to that border region. He explained that his Government had never allowed any of its aircraft to be used to take supplies to that army; any supplies had been taken in chartered and private aircraft, to which his Government would now refuse clearance for such purposes. In view of the state of mind of the Chinese people, that was not an easy step to take; it indicated the extent to which the Chinese Government wished to co-operate with and assist the Government of Burma.

The representative of China said that the actions of the Burmese Government had made it more difficult for the Government of China to exercise its moral influence over General Li Mi. Burma had not only brought the question and the monstrous charge of aggression before the United Nations, but also, in dealing with the situation by force, had chosen to use some Burmese Communist units against the Anti-Communist Salvation Army, an action which made the problem still more acute.

The Chinese Government, its representative said, remained ready to use the good offices offered by the United States Embassy at Taipei. It did not wish to resort to paper promises or official documents which might not solve the problem. The question required careful study and his Government could not commit itself to something which it could not carry out within the appointed time. If the Government of Burma wished to use force, that was its business, but if it wanted the Government of China to use its moral influence in the matter, it should not put further difficulties in the way of a solution. The Burmese draft resolution was neither helpful nor just and was not acceptable.

In conclusion, the representative of China said that he appreciated the constructive intentions of other proposals which had been submitted to the Committee, whose aim was to find a settlement in accordance with the principles of the Charter. His Government would give the United Nations the utmost co-operation in achieving its objective in that matter.

During the discussion, a number of representatives, including those of Afghanistan, India, Indonesia, Iran, Israel, Yemen and Yugoslavia, declared their support of the Burmese draft resolution. They particularly deplored that aggression had been taking place for three years and they considered that the United Nations should put an end to that situation. All available evidence, they stated, confirmed the charges made by Burma. No responsible Government could tolerate a situation such as that depicted, nor could the United Nations conceal its concern.

The Chinese representative had declared that his Government had never had any intention of committing aggression against Burma and that in entering Burma the Chinese armed forces had acted contrary to its orders. Yet the responsibility of the Chinese Government was manifest, for there was regular liaison between the Chinese troops in Burma and in Formosa and there were links between those troops and the Chinese Government. The Chinese representative had even said that his Government was prepared to call on them to stop fighting. Besides, the supplies and the modern equipment for those armed forces could obviously come only from Formosa. General Li Mi himself had declared repeatedly that the purpose of his visits to Taiwan was to submit reports to Chiang Kai-shek and, as the official commander of his armed forces, he maintained a constant liaison with the authorities in Taiwan about his military operations. The Chinese representative also claimed that General Li Mi and his men were fighting for their country under the banner of anti-Communism. But for the past three years, General Li Mi had been fighting, not against Communism, but against Burma.

These representatives said that those bands would have been eliminated by the armed forces of Burma, but for the assistance and direct support given to them in their aggressive activities. The situation was serious, the more so as the aggression had been committed in a particularly sensitive area of the globe, where an incident was likely to start a chain reaction. It was particularly unjustifiable as it had been committed against an under-developed country. These representatives concluded by stating that the best proof of the Chinese Government's professed friendship towards Burma would be for it to issue a clear order to General Li Mi to surrender his army to the Burmese Government to be disarmed or interned. The Chinese Government was urged to agree to such action.

The representative of the USSR, supported by the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR, emphasized that the aim of the Kuomintang bands in Burma was not only to extend the occupation of Burma by Chinese Nationalist forces but to carry out aggressive operations against the People's Republic of China. They had already tried to attack China in 1951 but had been hurled back. That invasion was designed to undermine the peaceful and constructive work of the liberated people of China. It was obvious that the tremendous task of rehabilitation and reconstruction which was being successfully carried out in China had aroused hatred and rage among the Kuomintang group. Thus, the presence and activities of the Kuomintang bands in Burma and their links with Taiwan were contributing to international tension. The United Nations should therefore consider the problem, not only because of its importance to Burma, but because of its vital bearing on the international situation in general and on South East Asia in particular. These representatives expressed their sympathy with the Burmese and their support for the Burmese draft resolution.

The representatives of Australia, Canada, Egypt, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Sweden and the United Kingdom, among others, while agreeing that the Burmese complaint was well-founded, felt that they could not unreservedly support the Burmese draft resolution. The Burmese complaint, made under Article 51 of the Charter and requesting that the Chinese troops on Burmese territory should comply with the principles of international law, was certainly legitimate. No government could tolerate on its territory foreign troops which lived off the land, engaged in depredations on the civilian population and became involved in hostilities with the official forces of that State.

It was another matter, however, for the Assembly to declare that the Government of the Republic of China was wholly responsible for the activities of General Li Mi's forces. The question was who really controlled those troops.

Without adequate proof, it could not be assumed that they were acting on the orders of the Government of the Republic of China. Captured documents and press cuttings, it was argued, were not convincing evidence.

The representative of China had indicated his Government's willingness to use its influence to seek the withdrawal of Chinese troops in Burma. It thus seemed that Burma and the Republic of China were following similar aims. The United Nations was entitled to expect the co-operation of the Government in Taipei either for internment or for evacuation. It seemed that a reasonable approach to the question would be to urge a practical solution on the following points: prevention by all governments of the passage of supplies of any kind to the irregular Chinese troops; continued negotiations and the use of good offices of friendly States by the parties; full co-operation by the Government of the Republic of China and, in particular, the use of all that Government's influence with the command of the irregular forces; an injunction to those forces to submit to internment; and the co-operation of neighbouring governments.

These representatives suggested that a more appropriate draft resolution would be one, which, recognizing the established facts of the case and the principles of international law, would place the main emphasis upon the paramount hope of reaching a practical solution by negotiations between the parties directly concerned, with such assistance as might be rendered by third parties.

The representative of Thailand said that the complaint of the Burmese Government was a delicate question as far as his country was concerned, since the dispute was between two States with which it maintained friendly relations. Although there was no justification for their presence and activities in Burma, he did not think that the Chinese troops had been introduced into Burma with aggressive intent. Their presence there had been brought about by the vicissitudes of the war in China. Nevertheless, they should lay down their arms and surrender to the Burmese authorities. Thailand had already taken measures to reinforce control of traffic across the Thailand-Burma frontier, thus giving Burma practical co-operation. Nevertheless, since the frontier between the two countries was an undeveloped tropical area, it could not be completely sealed. The cause of the dispute between Burma and the Republic of China could be eliminated by the disarming and internment or by the evacuation of the Chinese armed forces in Burma. If it should be decided to evacuate the Chinese troops after they had been disarmed in Burma, his Government was prepared to assist in the evacuation of those troops through Thailand.

The representative of the United States said that, as the Governments of Burma and of the Republic of China did not maintain diplomatic relations with each other, the United States, at Burma's request, had acted as an intermediary and had vigorously sought to bring the parties to an agreed method of meeting the situation. The Chinese Government should first agree in principle to co-operate to the best of its ability to effect a withdrawal of General Li Mi's troops. The hostile activities should cease and feasible methods for withdrawing the troops should be discussed, followed by disarming and evacuation of the troops from Burma. That was the type of solution the United States Government sought to achieve. It remained to be seen, however, whether all those irregular troops would agree to leave Burma. Nevertheless, it was to be hoped that, if the negotiations were successful, a substantial number of the men would leave Burma and that would reduce the problem to manageable proportions for the Burmese Government.

At the 610th meeting on 21 April, Mexico submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.44/Rev.2), which was adopted by the Committee with certain amendments (for text, as amended, see below) at its 612th meeting on 22 April. At that meeting the Committee adopted an Iranian proposal to give priority in voting to the Mexican draft resolution.

It adopted, by 53 votes to none, with 7 abstentions, an amendment to the Mexican draft resolution submitted jointly by Argentina and Chile, which, as later revised (A/C.1/L.45/Rev.1), provided for the insertion of a new paragraph to the effect that the Assembly would recommend that the negotiations then in progress through the good offices of certain Member States should be pursued, in order to put an end to the existing serious situation by means of the immediate disarmament and withdrawal of the said forces from the territory of Burma or by means of their disarmament and internment.

On presentation of the joint amendment, the representative of Argentina withdrew a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.43), which he had introduced on 21 April, proposing that the Government of Burma, the Government of China and other parties directly concerned should enter into negotiations with a view to bringing about the immediate withdrawal of the troops from Burma. The Committee also adopted certain clarifying amendments proposed by Lebanon (A/C.1/L.46):

(1) To specify in the third paragraph of the preamble that in addition to any assistance which enabled the foreign forces to continue their hostile acts, any assistance enabling them to "remain in the territory of Burma" was also contrary to the Charter. (Adopted by 22 votes to 11, with 27 abstentions.)

(2) To redraft the fourth paragraph of the preamble to have the Assembly state that the refusal of those forces to submit to disarmament or internment was contrary to international law and practice (instead of, as in the Mexican draft, note that the Burmese Government had reported that those forces refused to submit to disarmament or internment in accordance with international law and practice). (Adopted by 26 votes to 10, with 24 abstentions.)

(3) To amend the first operative paragraph to state that the Assembly deplored the situation and condemned the "presence" of those forces, as well as their hostile acts. (Adopted by 25 votes to 2, with 32 abstentions.)

(4) To add in the final paragraph the provision that States would refrain from giving assistance to those forces which would enable them to "remain in the territory of Burma", as well as assistance enabling them to continue their hostile acts. (Adopted by 27 votes to 2, with 31 abstentions.)

The Mexican draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 58 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The Committee did not vote on the Burmese draft resolution.

b. RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The draft resolution recommended by the First Committee (A/2391) was adopted by the General Assembly at its 428th plenary meeting on 23 April by 59 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

During the explanation of votes, the representative of Burma stated that he had voted for the resolution although Burma would have preferred its own resolution, which sought condemnation of the Kuomintang Government for the acts of aggression, but it had been impressed by the sympathetic and helpful attitude of the Member States and had therefore identified itself with the resolution which had the approval of all the Member States except China. The representative of China declared that he agreed with the resolution insofar as it only stated that aggression had been committed by certain "foreign forces". However, it was the first time judgment had been passed on grave charges without careful examination, including investigation on the spot. His delegation had therefore abstained from voting.

The resolution (707(VII)) adopted by the Assembly read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having examined the complaint by the delegation of the Union of Burma regarding the presence, hostile activities and depredations of foreign forces in the territory of the Union of Burma,

"Considering that these facts constitute a violation of the territory and sovereignty of the Union of Burma,

"Affirming that any assistance given to these forces which enables them to remain in the territory of the Union of Burma or to continue their hostile acts against a Member State is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations,

"Considering that the refusal of these forces to submit to disarmament or internment is contrary to international law and usage,

"1. Deplores this situation and condemns the presence of these forces in Burma and their hostile acts against that country;

"2. Declares that these foreign forces must be disarmed and either agree to internment or leave the territory of the Union of Burma forthwith;

"3. Requests all States to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of the Union of Burma in accordance with the principles of the Charter;

"4. Recommends that the negotiations now in progress through the good offices of certain Member States should be pursued, in order to put an end to this serious situation by means of the immediate disarmament and withdrawal of the said forces from the territory of the Union of Burma or by means of their disarmament and internment;

"5. Urges all States:

"(a) To afford the Government of the Union of Burma on its request all the assistance in their power to facilitate by peaceful means the evacuation of these forces from Burma; and

"(b) To refrain from furnishing any assistance to these forces which may enable them to remain in the territory of the Union of Burma or to continue their hostile acts against that country;

"6. Invites the Government of the Union of Burma to report on the situation to the General Assembly at its eighth session."

2. Report by the Government of Burma to the General Assembly's Eighth Session and Statements by the Chinese Foreign Minister and by the Joint Military Committee

a. REPORT BY THE GOVERNMENT OF BURMA

By a letter dated 29 June 1953 (A/2423), the delegation of Burma submitted copies of the documents used in support of its complaint regarding aggression by the Government of the Republic of China and requested that they be issued as United Nations documents.

On 10 September 1953, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 707(VII), the permanent representative of Burma submitted to the Assembly his Government's report (A/2468) on the presence of foreign forces in its territories. The report stated that, to facilitate the evacuation of foreign forces from Burma, approaches had been made to the United States Embassy at Rangoon. Due to the efforts of the Ambassador and of the American envoys in Bangkok and Taipei, a four-nation committee (later referred to as the Joint Military Committee) composed of representatives of the United States, Thailand, Burma and the Republic of China, had been formed to discuss the means and procedures for evacuating these troops.

At the first meeting of this Committee on 20 May 1953, the Chinese delegate had taken the position that his Government could only use its influence to persuade General Li Mi's troops to go to Taiwan. The repatriation, he had said, could only be on a voluntary basis. This stand had disappointed the Burmese Government, the report said, especially as it followed in the wake of General Li Mi's Press interview with a correspondent of Time, reported in the issue of 18 May 1953, in which he had stated falsely that Burmese action was inspired by the People's Republic of China. He had also stated falsely that the Burmese Foreign Minister had visited China. General Li Mi was quoted as having said that "rather than evacuate, we could still turn into bandits and plunder to stay alive."

On 23 May the delegation of Burma had submitted a plan for a cease-fire in the Mong Hsat area and along the corridor leading from Mong Hsat to the Thailand border, together with alternative plans of evacuation by road, by air and by road and air from Burma to Thailand. On 25 May these plans were conveyed to the Chinese representative who maintained the position that, since the Chinese Government maintained no control over these forces, it could not be held legally responsible for any possible failure to carry out in full the United Nations resolution. A draft agreement later presented by the Chairman and accepted by the Thai and Burmese representatives was not acceptable to the Chinese representative, who said that he would have to go to Taipei for instructions.

On 14 June, the Chinese representative, who was expected to come back fully authorized to make decisions, stated that Formosa was willing to accept only those troops who wanted to go there. With regard to the proposed visit of the Committee to Mong Hsat to work out details of this evacuation, he said that he could not guarantee the safety of the Burmese members. He had then made the demand that all Chinese (civilians and military personnel alike), kept under detention for collaboration with General Li Mi's troops, should be released forthwith. However, at further meetings, and by 17 June, the Chinese representative had accepted the draft agreement in principle, except that he continued to insist upon the inclusion in the agreement of the release of Chinese collaborators. At that point, there were no great divergencies of views and if the matter had been left to the decision of the Government of Burma, a satisfactory solution would most probably have been evolved. The question of the expenses of evacuation was also discussed and, by the end of June, the prospects of an agreement among the four nations appeared to be bright.

At this stage, one of Li Mi's generals, Lt. General Lee Yu-foo, who with other officers had been invited to come to Bangkok to satisfy themselves concerning the proposed scheme of evacuation, had made a provoking statement, in which he had said that General Li Mi's troops were not going to withdraw from Burma because, as they were not represented during the discussion leading to its adoption, they considered the United Nations resolution as unlawful. Stating that his troops were protecting all main routes which would have to be used in a Chinese Communist invasion of South East Asia, General Lee said that those troops could be of immeasurable assistance to the Chinese Nationalist Government when Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek gave the order for invasion of the Chinese mainland. On 15 July, General Li Mi made another statement that he could not issue orders to his troops to withdraw. Representations were made to Taipei and a deputy of General Li Mi was despatched from Formosa to meet the Committee. However no results followed his arrival.

The Burmese Government regretted that the evasive and delaying action of the Chinese rep-representatives on the Committee and the conduct of the authorities in Formosa led to the conclusion that General Li Mi's troops would continue to stay in the territories of Burma on the false excuse that they were combating Communism. No authoritative person in Formosa had, at any moment, expressed the least sympathy for the Burmese or had deplored publicly the presence of foreign troops in Burma. General Li Mi was residing in Formosa as an honoured hero. During all this time, financial assistance continued to flow from Formosa and planes continued to land at Mong Hsat.

On 10 August, the report continued, the United States Ambassador at Rangoon had informed the Burmese Government that Shao Yu-lin, formerly Chinese Ambassador in South Korea, was at Bangkok and on his way to Mong Hsat as a personal representative of President Chiang to explain the position to the officers and men.

While the Government of Burma placed on record its thanks to the United States and Thailand Governments, it felt that the talks in Bangkok would not lead to any great results. Even at this stage, the Chinese representative, although agreeing to the evacuation of these troops in principle, made the reservation that only those willing to be repatriated would be taken to Formosa.

By a letter dated 28 October 1953 (A/C.1/L.70), the Burmese delegation transmitted, for the Assembly's information, various documents relating to the question.

b. STATEMENT BY THE CHINESE FOREIGN MINISTER

By a letter dated 26 October (A/C.1/L.69), the representative of China transmitted a copy of a statement issued by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of China on 8 October 1953 on the question of evacuation of the Chinese irregulars under General Li Mi's command in Burma. This document stated that since the adoption of the General Assembly resolution of 22 April 1953, the Chinese Government had exercised its utmost persuasive influence in trying to get as many of them evacuated to Taiwan from Burma as possible. The majority of those forces however, consisted of local inhabitants from the different Yunnan-Burma border regions who, as victims of Communist oppression, had gathered under General Li Mi's banner to fight against their common oppressors. It was beyond the power of the Chinese Government to force these people to leave their native places and to accept evacuation, together with their families, to Taipei.

During the past few months, the Chinese Government had fully co-operated with the four-Power Joint Military Committee in Bangkok in devising a feasible plan for the withdrawal of those irregulars who would agree to evacuation. Despite great difficulties, the Chinese Government had now succeeded in persuading some two thousand irregulars, together with a few hundred of their dependants, to evacuate to Taiwan.

Immediately before the conclusion of the evacuation plan, the Burmese representative, on 16 September, had submitted a demand for the evacuation of all Chinese irregulars from Burma and after the Chinese representatives had said that that was definitely beyond the powers of his Government, the Burmese representative had withdrawn from the conference. The Chinese Government had, however, continued its efforts towards an evacuation of those men who had pledged to leave Burmese territory and had requested that the Committee remain in session to finalize the plan, which had been agreed to by the Governments of Thailand and the United States.

The statement charged that the Burmese air force had made incessant raids on several places where the Chinese irregulars who had pledged to leave Burma had been assembled. The bombing had seriously affected the operation and the Chinese Government was as yet unable to assess how far such attacks had obstructed the evacuation plans. It was still prepared to sign the evacuation plan as agreed upon by the Governments of Thailand, the United States and China, although results would depend entirely upon the course of action to be taken by the Burmese Government.

c. STATEMENT OF THE JOINT MILITARY COMMITTEE

By a letter dated 29 October 1953 (A/C.1/L.71), addressed to the President of the General Assembly, the United States transmitted a statement issued by the Joint Military Committee in Bangkok on 29 October 1953. This stated that the Government of the Republic of China had assured Thailand and the United States that about two thousand foreign forces together with their dependants would be evacuated from Burma, that all foreign forces refusing to leave Burma were disavowed by the Chinese Republic and that it would not help those remaining there with any supplies.

3. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

At its 435th plenary meeting on 17 September 1953, the General Assembly decided to include in its agenda the item entitled "Complaint by the Union of Burma regarding aggression against it by the Government of the Republic of China: Report of the Government of the Union of Burma" and referred it to the First Committee.

The First Committee considered the item during two series of meetings: the 653rd to 657th meetings, from 31 October to 5 November, and the 677th to 679th meetings, from 27 November to 4 December 1953.

a. DISCUSSIONS IN THE FIRST COMMITTEE FROM 31 OCTOBER TO 5 NOVEMBER

At the 653rd to 657th meetings of the First Committee, from 31 October to 5 November, the following statements were made.

The representative of Burma stated that, despite the optimism of Mr. Shao Yu-lin, personal representative of Chiang Kai-shek, who had made a tour of the Mong Hsat area, no progress had been made in the evacuation of Chinese forces in Burma.

In order to obtain definite pledges, the Burmese representative on the Joint Military Committee had asked for the evacuation of 5,000 men in three months, a very reasonable request involving the evacuation of only 200 men daily. However, the representative of the Republic of China had rejected that figure and had made no counter-proposal, with the result that the negotiations had collapsed. The Kuomintang had later decided to accept an evacuation scheme, details of which had been worked out by the Committee in the absence of the representative of Burma. The figure proposed was 2,000 men. Although the United States Embassy at Rangoon had informed Burma that the Formosan Government was serious in its efforts to evacuate the troops, General Li Mi still refused to give the order for evacuation. Meanwhile, the Kuomintang marauders were continuing their depredations and penetrating deeply into Burma. They were also continuing their traffic in opium and wolfram. Burma, after having stayed its hands at the request of its friends, had resorted to the bombing of hideouts and strongholds. That action had led to strong protests from the Taipei authorities and had been made much of the Chinese statement (A/C.1/L.69). Those raids, however, had been carried out before any preparations for evacuation had been made, if indeed any such preparations had been made at all. On hearing that there was a chance of withdrawal, the Burmese Government had stopped the raids. The only places bombed after 1 October had been areas north and south of Mong Hsat, where, Burma had been informed, there were bandit forces not under the control of General Li Mi, and there had been no bombing operations since 14 October. On 6 October it was learned that between 1,500 and 2,000 men could be evacuated. That meant that 10,000 men would still be left to embarrass the Burmese Government in its domestic and international relations. They would have to be fought in difficult terrain. Nevertheless, the Burmese Government had replied, on 14 October, that it would not interfere with the departure of the 2,000 men, against whom operations would cease until 15 November, but it had emphasized that the Government of the Republic of China, which had brought the original force and expanded it, should be held responsible for the removal of the entire body from Burma.

Referring to the communique of 29 October of the Joint Military Committee (A/C.1/L.71), the Burmese representative said that it remained to be seen whether the 2,000 men would really be withdrawn by 15 November. The communique also mentioned that the Republic of China would give no assistance to those remaining in Burma, which, incidentally, he said, proved once more that the Chinese forces in Burma were maintained by Formosa. The disavowal of the Chinese remaining behind in Burma was a matter of concern to the Burmese Government, for it was not in compliance with Assembly resolution 707(VII), which called for the withdrawal of the entire Chinese force. There was reason to fear that Taipei's disavowal of those unwilling to leave Burma was part of a strategy to make a token removal at the time of the Assembly. The representative of Burma then read to the Committee certain documents which purported to show that there was an army, 3,000 men strong, in the vicinity of Bhamo, far north of Mong Hsat, which would not be prepared to evacuate from Burma if ordered to do so. Li Mi's new plan was merely to shift his headquarters. If the Formosa Government moved out a token force, it would naturally be from the base which it intended to abandon. As for the troops in the Bhamo area, north of Mong Hsat, and the Mawchi area, south of Mong Hsat, the Chinese representative in the Joint Military Committee had said that it was unnecessary to make any evacuation plans for them, because General Li Mi did not control them.

The Burmese representative said that his Government would consider the evacuation of 2,000 men as merely the shadow of a solution. Moreover, the withdrawal of the troops which had entered Burma could not be made conditional on the signing of an agreement which Burma could not be blamed for not wanting to sign. The fact was that the Chinese would like to get out of the venture without loss by merely evacuating 2,000 men. But Chiang Kai-shek and Li Mi were under a moral obligation to remove their entire force and to disarm the local recruits who did not wish to go to Formosa. The Burmese delegation, while refraining from submitting any new draft resolution, reiterated that the activities of the Kuomintang army in Burma were fostered by the authorities in Formosa and that they should be branded as aggressors. Burma was deeply grateful for the efforts of the United States to settle the question, but it could not agree with the view expressed by the United States representative that the evacuation of 2,000 men would be a substantial implementation of the Assembly's resolution. In dealing with the authorities in Formosa, moral pressure was perhaps not enough. General Chiang Kai-shek should be persuaded to repudiate, at the presidential level, the troops involved. If the Formosa authorities were threatened with a suspension of foreign aid or with ouster from their seat in the United Nations, the Kuomintang bands would disappear within a month, the Burmese representative declared. It was hard to believe that Formosa would be allowed to continue to flout the authority of the United Nations.

The representative of China stated that there were a number of contradictions in some of the documents submitted to the Committee and, particularly, in document A/C.1/L.70. He referred to the results of the negotiations undertaken by the Joint Military Committee, which had met at Bangkok in accordance with the Assembly's recommendations at the seventh session. The statement issued by the Committee on 29 October 1953 (A/C.1/L.71) represented positive results. The figure of 2,000 men to be evacuated was approximate, for it did not include the families of those persons. But it was in no sense restricted; the Chinese Government had never placed any limit on the number of irregular troops to be evacuated and was prepared to welcome all those who could be induced to return. The figure of 2,000 was merely the one which had been given to the Chinese Government by the leaders of the forces. Furthermore, the Chinese Government had completely and unreservedly disavowed all those who refused to leave Burmese soil.

The representative of China then referred to the difficulties involved in such an operation. In the first place, it was difficult to estimate the exact number of the forces to be evacuated. It was also difficult to ascertain the composition of those forces, which comprised not only Chinese, but also Karens, Kachins, Chins, Shans and Burmese. They had a fanatic faith in their anti-Communist mission, which they envisaged in their own peculiar way. The Chinese Government had done its best to conform to General Assembly resolution 707(VII). United Nations documents on the subject had been transmitted to Formosa and distributed to General Li Mi and his supporters. Mr. Tsiang himself had gone to Formosa to explain the matter to the legislature and describe the position of the United Nations. He had actually had an interview with General Li Mi, whom he had attempted to convince. But he had encountered a fanatic who thought he was responsible for the campaign against Communism in South East Asia. The Chinese representative then referred to the mission of Ambassador Shao Yu-lin who had been sent by the Chinese Government into the Burmese jungle with promises of welcome for those who returned and severe warnings to those who stayed in Burma against the wishes of the Chinese Government. Partly as a result of those efforts, the leaders of the Anti-Communist Nationalist Salvation Army had agreed to evacuate the six places specified by the representative of Burma in the Joint Military Committee, and to try to persuade as many as possible to agree to leave Burma. In mid-September, the leaders had informed Taipei that they had induced 2,000 soldiers to return to Formosa with their families. The Chinese Government would have preferred to start evacuation in August without defining the number to be evacuated. It had hoped that once evacuation had started the early evacuees would help to promote further evacuation.

As to the suggestion made by the representative of Burma that the President of the Chinese Government should repudiate General Li Mi, the representative of China said that his Government had not repudiated General Li Mi because it was using his influence to induce 2,000 men to leave. It hoped that he would openly proclaim the dissolution of the whole force. Once Li Mi's influence was exhausted, the question of repudiation might arise, but before that stage was reached, repudiation would not be helpful. The fact that the Chinese Government had undertaken not to supply the irregulars had been misinterpreted. What it had undertaken, and would take stronger and firmer steps to do, was to prevent further supplies from being smuggled out of Formosa. Difficulties still existed which could be overcome with the assistance of all the Member States, including China and Burma. One way in which the Burmese Government could help would be in implementing the assurances which it had given with regard to the abstention from military action against people assembled for evacuation. If the evacuees were to suffer heavy casualties, the Chinese Government could not fulfil its undertakings to the leaders of the irregular forces and the evacuation plans might be upset.

During the discussion, the representatives of India, Indonesia, Israel, Liberia, Pakistan and Yugoslavia, among others, expressed the view that the continued presence of foreign forces in Burma and the refusal of the Taiwan authorities to order the generals to submit to disarming and internment constituted a clear case of aggression. They maintained that the Taiwan authorities had continued to give those forces moral and material support in disregard of Assembly resolution 707 (VII). Their responsibility was evident, it was stated, from the manner in which General Li Mi maintained close liaison with them and from their knowledge of the exact situation in Burma. The evacuation of a token force of 2,000, it was stated, was entirely inadequate. These representatives further considered that the mere disavowal of the remaining 10,000 would pose graver problems for Burma. The disavowal of the remaining forces by Formosa, it was stated, instead of helping to remedy the situation, would lead to the intensification by those forces of their marauding activities. These representatives deplored the lack of an appeal by the Chinese Foreign Minister to the leaders of the forces in Burma to lay down their arms. They also emphasized the need for an order from Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek for the troops to surrender to disarming and internment.

The USSR representative and the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR stated that the aggressive activities of the Kuomintang bands in Burma were a constant threat to peace and security in the Far East. Their task was to maintain a trouble spot in South East Asia in the hope of provoking a flare-up by an aggression against the People's Republic of China. The Chiang Kai-shek regime had been making preparations for such an aggression for a number of years with the knowledge and support of the Government of the United States. The continued toleration of the Chiang Kai-shek regime by certain countries had aroused legitimate and world-wide criticism and had served to aggravate the situation in the Far East. Cessation of assistance and of the delivery of arms and equipment to the Kuomintang would make it impossible for them to keep up their aggressive attitude, to maintain themselves in Burmese territory, or to continue their hostile acts directed against a Member State. The situation had been made possible only by the United States support of the Kuomintang; the United States had every means of bringing the activities of the Kuomintang bands in Burma to an immediate end if it threatened to suspend its assistance to Taiwan. The Government of Thailand, it was stated further, was playing an unedifying role in the whole affair in allowing passage through its territory of armaments and equipment for the Kuomintang bands in Burma.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada, Egypt, France, New Zealand, Sweden and the United Kingdom expressed their appreciation for the agreement which had been reached to evacuate 2,000 men from Burma and paid tribute to those who had contributed to that achievement, which constituted a first step towards the implementation of Assembly resolution 707(VII). It was said, however, that the figure of 2,000 men was obviously not very large and that it was understandable that the Burmese representative should consider that that measure would not solve the problem. Nevertheless, there was hope that a larger number might agree to be evacuated later and that the rest would disperse of their own accord. The Chinese Government had declared that it would disavow those who remained, a measure which might strengthen the position of the Burmese Government and lead to further steps in solving the over-all problem.

There certainly was a limit to what could be achieved by international action, but the United Nations could not claim that the problem was solved until the whole force had been permanently dispersed. The Assembly should therefore not give the impression that it regarded the matter as closed. It should keep in touch with events in order to see whether appropriate action followed from its debates. The complete liberation of Burma from foreign troops should be realized gradually under international control, but without constraint. Because of the limited scope of international action, the solution of the problem lay, on the one hand, with the Burmese Government and, on the other side, with the Chinese Nationalist Government.

The representative of the United States surveyed the work of the Joint Military Committee, stating that after Burma had left that Committee, the United States had acted as an intermediary to ensure the execution of the evacuation plan. On 27 October, the representative of the Chinese Government at Bangkok had stated that the first group of evacuees would reach the Burma-Thailand border by 5 November; hence the communiqué of the Joint Military Committee which was now before the First Committee (A/C.1/L.71). It had then been possible to make practical arrangements for the evacuation: an air lift from Thailand to Formosa; the dispatch of Burmese observers; the reception of the evacuees at the border and their transit through the territory of Thailand; the furnishing of food, shelter and care; and the provision of security troops. All those services were being furnished by Thailand, without whose co-operation and hospitality the operation could not have been carried out. The Chinese Government had clearly stated that it intended to remove as many irregulars as possible, but it was clear that that Government exercised a very limited influence over those troops.

In reply to accusations made during the debate, the United States representative stated categorically that his Government was in no way involved in the activities of the foreign forces on Burmese soil; it deplored their continued presence in Burma and it was a monstrous charge to suggest that the United States would even for one moment consider giving them aid or support. The role of the United States in dealing with this problem had consistently been to extend its good offices in a sincere effort to arrive at a solution. He believed the agreement reached to be a substantial implementation of Assembly resolution 707(VII), but considered that it was not in the power of other governments to secure the complete evacuation of all those troops by peaceful means.

In response to the question as to whether the announced plan would actually be carried out, he reported that on 28 October 1953 officials of the United States Embassy at Bangkok had entered into a contract for the air lift to Taipei of the troops evacuated from North Burma. The contract provided for the non-stop flight of those foreign troops to Taipei at a rate of approximately 200 a day. The cost of the evacuation would be defrayed by the United States, China and Thailand. The first of those evacuees would be expected to arrive on the Thailand border on 7 November. The Burmese Government had accepted the evacuation plan in principle and had given assurances of full co-operation. His Government's interest in the problem, he said, would not cease with the present evacuation of troops and their dependants. After that evacuation it hoped to be able again to consult with the interested parties regarding further action and, as long as the countries directly concerned found its efforts helpful, it would be ready to render what service it could.

The representative of Thailand emphasized his Government's concern over the question and recalled the Thai representative's suggestion at the seventh session of the Assembly to the effect that a body might be designated to assist the parties in finding a solution. Thailand had also offered facilities for the evacuation of forces through its territory. The difficulties encountered during the negotiations had been caused not so much by the preparation of the evacuation plan or the details of its implementation as by the necessity of securing the concurrence of the parties in a plan which would attain the objective of the United Nations and be capable of practical application within the means at the disposal of the Joint Military Committee. It could be expected that the programme of evacuating 2,000 men and a number of their dependants would be carried out successfully and that its scope might later be enlarged. If the solution did not cover the whole problem, the United Nations was nevertheless on the right path.

In reply to certain references to his country's role in the matter, he said that the representatives of Thailand had worked without stint on the Joint Military Committee and outside it to ensure the implementation of the General Assembly's resolution. They had offered to spend about 160,000 dollars to effect the evacuation. They were making available transportation, food, lodging and medical care for the thousands of evacuees who would cross Thailand's territory. Those endeavours were made without ulterior motives.

It was, in fact, Thailand's overriding interest to help quell the political unrest in South East Asia and hence to achieve the best solution of this problem. In view of the unfounded charges which had been made, his Government might be compelled to conclude that it would be improper for it to assume any longer the responsibility for the ungrateful task of permitting its territory to be used for evacuation purposes.

On 5 November, Australia, Brazil, Canada, India, Mexico, New Zealand and the United Kingdom submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.73), providing that the First Committee, having considered the report of the Government of Burma (A/2468), the letter dated 26 October from the representative of China (A/C.1/L.69) and the letter dated 29 October 1953 from the United States delegation (A/C.1/L.71), should decide to adjourn further consideration of this question to a date not earlier than 23 November 1953. At its 657th meeting, on 5 November, the Committee adopted the seven-Power draft resolution by 50 votes to 3, with 6 abstentions.

b. DISCUSSIONS IN THE FIRST COMMITTEE FROM 27 NOVEMBER TO 4 DECEMBER

By letters dated 26 and 27 November and 2 December 1953 (A/C.1/L.89, A/C.1/L.91 and A/C.1/L.93), the representative of the United States transmitted messages received by his Government from the Joint Military Committee in Bangkok, reporting on the progress achieved in the evacuation of foreign forces from the territory of the Union of Burma. These reports stated that a total of 770 persons had been evacuated by 21 November and that a further 143 had been evacuated by 30 November 1953.

The First Committee resumed its meetings on the Burmese question on 27 November 1953. On that date, Australia, Canada, India, Indonesia, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden and the United Kingdom submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.90), providing that the General Assembly, having considered the report dated 31 August 1953 (A/2468) of the Government of the Union of Burma on the situation relating to the presence of foreign forces in its territory, would:

- (1) note that limited evacuation of personnel of these foreign forces had begun as from 7 November 1953;
- (2) express concern that few arms had been surrendered by them;
- (3) appreciate the efforts of the United States and Thailand in striving for the evacuation of these forces;
- (4) urge that efforts be continued for the evacuation or internment of these foreign forces and the surrender of all arms;
- (5) reaffirm General Assembly resolution 707 (VII) of 23 April 1953;
- (6) urge upon all States to refrain from furnishing any assistance to these forces which might enable them to remain in the territory of Burma or to continue their hostile acts against that country; and
- (7) invite the Government of Burma to report on the situation to the General Assembly as appropriate.

On 1 December, Thailand and the United States submitted amendments (A/C.1/L.92) to the eight-Power draft resolution:

- (1) to insert in the preamble, a reference to the reports of the Joint Military Committee in Bangkok;
- (2) to state in the fourth operative paragraph that efforts should be continued by "those concerned" for the evacuation of the troops and the surrender of arms; and
- (3) to insert in the last paragraph a provision whereby both the Joint Military Committee and the Government of Burma would report to the General Assembly.

On 4 December, Australia, Canada, India, Indonesia, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden and the United Kingdom, together with Uruguay as an additional co-sponsor, submitted a revision (A/C.1/L.90/Rev.1) of their draft resolution.

The revised draft included in the first paragraph of the preamble, in addition to the reference to the report of the Burmese Government (A/2468) a reference to all other information on the subject laid before the Assembly. It revised the fourth operative paragraph in accordance with the joint amendments and inserted a new operative paragraph to invite the governments concerned to inform the Assembly of any action that they had taken to implement the present resolution, and to revise the last operative paragraph to request rather than invite Burma to report on the situation to the Assembly as appropriate.

The amendments (A/C.1/L.92) of Thailand and the United States were thereupon withdrawn.

On the same date, the representative of the USSR proposed an oral amendment to delete the third operative paragraph of the revised nine-Power draft resolution expressing appreciation of the efforts of Thailand and the United States.

The representative of Burma made a statement concerning the situation prevailing in his country. On 29 October the Joint Military Committee at Bangkok had decided that the troops to be evacuated would bring their arms with them and that such arms would be destroyed. On 7 November the evacuation had begun and the first group of evacuees had crossed the border. At the time, Burmese observers had not been able to proceed to the border and that first hitch had aroused his Government's apprehension. On that day, 150 men had crossed the borders without bringing their arms, on the pretext that they had wanted to avoid a dash with Burmese troops during the evacuation. The evacuees had been flown to Taipei in General Chennault's plane. That group had brought either no weapons at all or obsolete light arms sometimes unserviceable and always in small quantities. Drawing the Committee's attention to the report by the Joint Military Committee (A/C.1/L.89), the Burmese representative pointed out that, on 8 November, there had been among the evacuees 38 Shans who could not speak Chinese and had been recruited only one week before. Moreover, there had been among the evacuees, not only a number of sick or wounded, but even old men, women and children. It was obvious that the Burmese Government could not be satisfied with such an evacuation.

The withdrawal of 2,000 persons and the surrender of 40 worthless weapons meant little in relation to the forces remaining in Burma. The Chinese Government, which had left the troops in question behind in 1950, still refused to give them official orders to withdraw. So long as such an order was not forthcoming from Formosa, the men would remain in the jungle. The Burmese Government had shown great patience since the adoption of the Assembly's resolution of 23 April 1953. The time limit for the cease-fire had been extended twice. If the evacuation became more serious and tangible progress was made, the Burmese Government would continue to co-operate.

Answering the representative of Thailand's assertion that the efforts of the Joint Military Committee had not been fully appreciated, he expressed his Government's gratitude towards that Committee for the good will it had displayed but, he said, it had to be remembered that the Joint Military Committee was not an organ of the United Nations. For that reason, his delegation thought that there was no reason to use the term Joint Military Committee in the draft resolution.

The Burmese delegation was not entirely satisfied with the draft resolution, believing that aggressors should be labelled as such; it wished to re-emphasize that what was happening in Burma was a clear act of aggression, a word which some representatives disliked. However, the representative of Burma indicated, he would support the draft resolution in the hope that it would be adopted unanimously.

The representative of China stated that the information contained in the message of the Joint Military Committee (A/C.1/L.89) was in accordance with that at the disposal of his Government. The first evacuations had not proceeded as satisfactorily as the Chinese Government had hoped. The first difficulty had arisen on 8 November, when 38 persons had been refused evacuation allegedly because they were Burmese and not Chinese nationals. He explained that in that part of Asia, some tribes were distributed over parts of China, Burma, Thailand and Laos. The complexity of the ethnical situation in that area was great and made a sound identification of the evacuees a difficult matter.

Another difficulty that had arisen related to the small number of weapons brought out by the evacuees; but one must recall that the forces in question were poorly equipped. The leaders had also explained that the likelihood of conflict and misunderstanding would be lessened if they came out of the jungle without arms. It was the intention of the leaders to collect the weapons and to deliver them en bloc to the receiving committee at the border.

The representative of China again expressed his surprise that the term "aggression" was used.

It was especially peculiar to speak of aggression when the evacuation was progressing daily. In actual fact, since the resolution had been adopted, practical steps had been taken to implement it and substantial progress had been achieved. The Chinese delegation deeply appreciated the efforts of the United States, Thailand and the Joint Military Committee, but it felt that the co-operation given to the latter body by its Government had not always been appreciated; the difficult conditions in which the evacuation was taking place were often overlooked. The Committee should realize that the situation was changing from hour to hour. Information had come that weapons had just been shipped from Mong Hsat and would soon be surrendered to the Joint Military Committee. Consequently, the expediency of another resolution seemed open to doubt. The Chinese delegation understood the intentions of the sponsors of the draft resolution; however, in view of the fluid situation prevailing, it would abstain from the vote.

The representative of the United States recalled that the debate on the question had been adjourned on 5 November in order that the matter might be considered further in the light of what had meanwhile been accomplished with regard to the evacuation of some 2,000 members of the Chinese Nationalist forces. He stated that 1,278 persons had been evacuated to date to Taiwan by air; on 29 November, 150 persons were expected; and an additional group of 150 persons were expected on 2, 4, 6 and 8 December 1953. Only 2 per cent of the evacuees had been medical cases, 60 per cent had been between the ages of 20 and 40 and 12 per cent between fifteen and nineteen. There was a high percentage of officers. There had been some unavoidable delays due to various factors: bad weather, doubts concerning the national origin of some individuals and the late arrival of the Burmese observer liaison group which was due to a misunderstanding of some formalities by the observers.

In an operation of such a scope, difficulties were unavoidable. For example, the question of turning over the arms remained to be solved. The Joint Military Committee was dealing with the matter. Arms were being collected at Mong Hsat and it was to be hoped that they soon would be turned over to the Joint Military Committee. The United States Government felt that most of the difficulties had now been overcome and that, in the end, the number of evacuees would even exceed the original estimated figure of 2,000.

The revised eight-Power draft resolution, he considered, fulfilled the aims sought by the United States and Thailand in their amendments. The United States delegation would vote for that resolution.

The representative of Thailand also referred to the difficulties which had arisen but pointed out that the Burmese Government had agreed to an extension of the cease-fire time limit until 15 December. He regretted that the joint draft resolution chose to ignore the Joint Military Committee, which was the organ responsible for the evacuation of foreign troops from Burma. The resolution also appeared to place undue emphasis on the efforts to be made by the United States and Thailand. His country had done its best and it should be left to it to determine what further efforts it would make. His delegation felt that insufficient emphasis was placed in the joint proposal on the role played by the parties concerned, namely Burma and China. The General Assembly should never lose sight of the fact that the interested parties should bear, if not all the expense, at least a very large part of the responsibility. It therefore seemed desirable that Burma should participate not only in the process of evacuation but also in the work of the Joint Military Committee, as long as that body was in existence. Another defect which seemed apparent in the joint draft resolution was that it excluded all assistance other than that of the two parties and the two countries assisting them. In view of the interest and concern shown during the debate on the question, it might be expected that, in addition to the good offices offered, there might also be offers of services. For those reasons, his delegation had joined with the United States in presenting certain amendments to the eight-Power draft resolution. However, since the co-sponsors had agreed to take account of the main objections which he had voiced, he would not press for a vote on the amendments.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR criticized the draft resolution, and especially the third paragraph which would express appreciation of the efforts of the United States. They charged that the United States bore joint responsibility with the Kuomintang for the aggression in Burma, maintaining that the United States had assisted and equipped the Kuomintang detachments and its planes had ensured liaison between those detachments and Taiwan. The ruling circles of the United States, they said, were interested in maintaining and developing centres of war in Asia and in the Far East. The United States delegation had clearly shown that it only sought to strengthen the Kuomintang position and that it was not concerned with helping Burma to defend itself against aggression. The question of Burma was not an isolated one, but was part of a chain of aggressive acts on the part of the Kuomintang.

The representatives of Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Pakistan, Peru, the United Kingdom, Uruguay, and Yugoslavia spoke in favour of the joint draft resolution.

The representatives of Indonesia and India, however, expressed misgivings as to the effectiveness of the evacuation and the fear that, after the evacuation of the 2,000 men, the remaining 10,000 irregular forces would continue their plundering and depredations and would augment their strength with new recruits. The efficacy of the limited evacuation thus remained extremely doubtful. They wondered whether the authorities of Formosa were not really capable of effecting a complete evacuation of the foreign forces in Burma if they really wanted to do so. It might be feared that the remaining 10,000 or more forces remaining would not treat very seriously the disavowal of a Government which kept their leader in high esteem. The latest report from the Joint Committee stated that the evacuees had brought only small quantities of arms. The General Assembly should ensure that all foreign forces were disarmed and that they either left the country or were interned; unless all the forces were removed, the Assembly would have made only a futile gesture. Their delegations were co-sponsoring the joint draft resolution in the hope that a second expression of the Assembly's will might yet induce the desirable results.

The representative of the United Kingdom said that the accomplishments of the evacuation plan were only satisfactory as a beginning. It was disturbing that neither the quantity nor the quality of the arms handed over was of a high order. Continued efforts were required to achieve the evacuation or internment of the foreign forces in Burma and for the surrender of their arms.

At the 679th meeting on 4 December, the Committee rejected the USSR amendment to the revised nine-Power draft resolution by 49 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions, and adopted the revised nine-Power draft resolution by 51 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

c. RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The First Committee's report (A/2607) was considered by the General Assembly at its 470th plenary meeting on 8 December. The representative of Burma emphasized that nobody could deny that aggression had been committed against his country, and he would have preferred a resolution which would have clearly recognized that fact. However, the Burmese delegation would give its support to the draft resolution proposed by the Committee in the interests of unanimity. He expressed the hope that world public opinion would make the authorities on Formosa recall the troops.

The representative of China informed the Assembly that the number of troops to be evacuated from Burma would far exceed the 2,000 which had been agreed upon so far. There was reason to hope that the final number might even exceed 5,000. He expressed the hope that the Government of Burma would see fit to continue the present cease-fire agreement beyond 15 December 1953 so that further troops might be evacuated. The Chinese delegation considered the resolution before the Assembly as superfluous and would not participate in the vote.

The representatives of the USSR and Poland said that, in view of the fact that the most interested party in this case, Burma, attached certain hopes to the eight-Power draft resolution, they were prepared to vote for it, although the third paragraph was unacceptable to them.

The draft resolution was adopted by 46 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

It read (resolution 717(VIII)):

The General Assembly,

"Having considered the report dated 31 August 1953 of the Government of the Union of Burma on the situation relating to the presence of foreign forces in its territory, and all other information on the subject laid before the Assembly,

"1. Notes that limited evacuation of personnel of these foreign forces has begun as from 7 November 1953;

"2. Expresses concern that few arms have been surrendered by them;

"3. Appreciate the efforts of the United States of America and Thailand in striving for the evacuation of these forces;

"4. Urges that efforts be continued on the part of those concerned for the evacuation or internment of these foreign forces and the surrender of all arms;

"5. Reaffirms General Assembly resolution 707 (VII) of 23 April 1953, and in particular;

"6. Urges upon all States to refrain from furnishing any assistance to these forces which may enable them to remain in the territory of the Union of Burma or to continue their hostile acts against that country;

"7. Invites the governments concerned to inform the General Assembly of any action that they have taken to implement the present resolution;

"8. Requests the Government of the Union of Burma to report on the situation to the General Assembly as appropriate."

E. THE INDIA-PAKISTAN QUESTION

At its 611th meeting on 23 December 1952, the Security Council adopted a resolution (S/2883),⁴⁰ which, among other things, urged the Governments of India and Pakistan to enter into immediate negotiations under the auspices of the United Nations Representative in order to reach agreement on the specific number of forces to remain on each side of the cease-fire line at the end of the period of demilitarization. That number was to be between 3,000 and 6,000 armed forces on the Pakistan side and between 12,000 and 18,000 on the Indian side, such specific numbers to be arrived at bearing in mind the principles or criteria contained in paragraph 7 of the United Nations Representative's proposal of 4 September 1952 (S/2783, Annex 8). The United Nations Representative was requested to continue to make his services available to the two Governments, which in turn were requested to report to the Council not later than 30 days from the date of adoption of the resolution. The Council also requested the United Nations Representative to keep it informed of any progress.

On 23 January 1953, the United Nations Representative informed (S/2910) the Security Council that the Governments of India and Pakistan had agreed that a meeting of representatives of the two Governments at ministerial level should be held under his auspices in Geneva, beginning 4 February 1953. The negotiations were to be continued on the basis of the United Nations Commission for India and Pakistan (UNCIP) resolutions of 13 August 1948 (S/995) and 5 January 1949 (S/1196),⁴¹ bearing in mind the assurances, clarifications and elucidations given to the Governments of India and Pakistan by UNCIP. That basis was to be without prejudice to a further consideration, if necessary, of the twelve proposals of the United Nations Representative.

By a letter dated 27 March 1953 (S/2967), the United Nations Representative transmitted his fifth report to the Security Council. In the report, the Representative set forth the views of the parties on the implementation of part II, A (1) and (2) (relating to the withdrawal of tribesmen and of Pakistan troops and Pakistan nationals not normally resident in the State) and B (1) and (2) (relating to the withdrawal of the bulk of Indian forces and the maintenance of Indian forces to assist local authorities in maintaining law and order pending a final settlement of the situation) of the UNCIP resolution of 13 August 1948. The results of the meetings and conversations on that question, the United Nations Representative reported, had led him to the conclusion that agreement was not possible at that time between the two Governments on a truce agreement based solely on part II of the 13 August 1948 resolution, and it had appeared to him that the same difficulties which had existed as early as 1949 were still the main obstacles in the way of carrying out the commitments embodied in part II. He had not felt that he could continue that approach because the figures proposed by each side were not negotiable with the other side. In accordance with the terms of reference agreed upon between the two Governments for the conference, further consideration of the Representative's twelve proposals had ensued.

Having met separately with the representatives of the two Governments, on 14 February, the United Nations Representative had presented to them for discussion revised proposals, the text of paragraph 7 providing, inter alia, that, at the end of the period of demilitarization, there would remain on the Pakistan side of the cease-fire line an armed force of 6,000 separated from the administrative and operational command of the Pakistan High Command and without armour or artillery. At the end of that period an Indian armed force of 21,000, including State armed forces, was to remain on the Indian side of the cease-fire line. That force was also to be without armour or artillery.

Among the comments of the parties on paragraph 7 of the revised proposals were the following. The Government of India was unable to agree to retention of any military forces in the so-called Azad Kashmir territory. It held that the function of preventing violations of the cease-fire line on the Azad Kashmir side could be effectively performed by a civil armed force consisting of 2,000 armed and 2,000 unarmed men. The Government of India was willing to agree to some increase in the number of that proposed civil armed force.

The Government of Pakistan held that paragraph 7 contravened the Security Council resolution (S/2883) of 23 December 1952. The arbitrary raising of the figure of the numbers on the Indian side to 21,000, as against 6,000 Azad Kashmir forces, would put the security of the Azad Kashmir area in serious jeopardy and would destroy the safeguard that the demilitarization should be carried out in such a way as to involve no threat to the cease-fire agreement either during or after the period of demilitarization. The figures proposed, the Government of Pakistan maintained, amounted to a clear indication to the Government of India that its sustained attitude of intransigence would ultimately procure the formulation of a truce agreement on its own terms.

After thorough consideration and further conversations with the parties, the United Nations Representative had felt that there was no ground left at that stage on which to continue the conference and therefore, in agreement with the two representatives, he had decided to end it.

Dealing with the issue covered in paragraph 7 of his proposals, namely the number and character of forces to remain on each side of the cease-fire line, the United Nations Representative said that he held no brief for the lower figures of 3,000 to 12,000 or the higher figures of 6,000 to 21,000. As a mediator whose responsibility had been to keep striving for a settlement, he had hoped that a basis for the negotiation of an agreement might be found. It appeared obvious that the Government of India, under the two UNCIP resolutions, had some larger responsibilities on its side of the cease-fire line than had the local authorities in the evacuated territory on the other side. Without recognition of the Azad Kashmir Government and without prejudice to the sovereignty of the State of Jammu and Kashmir, it also appeared obvious that there should be in the evacuated territory effective local authorities and effective armed forces. In the Azad Kashmir territory, it was proposed, those armed forces would be organized out of the remainder of the Azad Kashmir forces without armour or artillery, and thereafter would be commanded by local officers under the local authorities, under the surveillance of the United Nations. The United Nations Representative observed that the difference over definite numbers, important as it was, was not as great as the difference between inducting and not inducting the Plebiscite Administrator into office. The transformation in the situation which would come from the simple fact of induction into office of the Administrator was most important for the great objective of the self-determination of the people of the State.

The Security Council did not discuss this report during 1953.

F. TREATMENT OF PEOPLE OF INDIAN ORIGIN IN THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

The question of the treatment of people of Indian origin in the Union of South Africa was considered by the General Assembly at its first, second, third, fifth, sixth and seventh sessions. At the seventh session, the Assembly, in resolution 615(VII) of 5 December 1952,⁴² established a United Nations Good Offices Commission with a view to arranging and assisting in negotiations between the Government of the Union of South Africa and the Governments of India and Pakistan, so that the question might be solved satisfactorily in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Commission was asked to report to the Assembly's eighth session. Cuba, Syria and Yugoslavia were appointed to serve on the Commission.

1. Report of the United Nations Good Offices Commission

The Good Offices Commission submitted its report (A/2473) on 14 September 1953 to the General Assembly. In that report, the Commission stated that on 20 March 1953 it had decided to send a letter to the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of India, Pakistan and the Union of South Africa, informing them that the Commission was at their disposal and that it would appreciate any suggestions concerning the manner in which it could render assistance, as well as any information or views which might contribute to the accomplishment of its task. On 20 May, the Secretary-General forwarded to the members of the Commission a copy of a letter addressed to him on 13 May by the permanent representative of the Union of South Africa, stating that the Union Government regarded General Assembly resolution 615 (VII) as unconstitutional and could grant no recognition to the Commission appointed under that resolution. The Good Offices Commission informed the General Assembly that, in view of the response of the Government of South Africa, it had been unable to carry out its task to arrange and assist in negotiations between the Governments concerned. Among documents annexed to the report was a communication dated 9 March 1953 from the permanent representative of India addressed to the Secretary-General, drawing attention to the intended early proclamation, by the Government of the Union, of Group Areas in implementation of the Group Areas Act, in deliberate disregard of the General Assembly's resolutions of 1950, 1951 and 1952 on the matter. Also annexed to the report was a letter dated 9 July 1953 from the Minister for External Affairs of India to the Good Offices Commission, in which the Government of India welcomed the appointment of the members of the Commission and deplored the refusal of the Government of South Africa to recognize that organ. Recalling that the Union Government had on the plea of domestic jurisdiction rejected all the United Nations resolutions on that question since 1946, the Minister for External Affairs recapitulated the events which had taken place since that date. He concluded that, instead of correcting its policies in accordance with international opinion, South Africa was building up a social and political structure based on the doctrine of apartheid which, in practice, meant the segregation of non-Europeans and the denial of their rights of citizenship and other human rights.

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

Pursuant to resolution 615(VII), the question was placed on the provisional agenda of the General Assembly's eighth session.

In the General Committee and at the Assembly's 435th plenary meeting on 17 September, the representative of South Africa protested against the inclusion in the agenda of that item, reiterating the view put forward by his Government at previous Assembly sessions that Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter prohibited the Organization from intervening in the domestic affairs of Member States.

The General Assembly decided to place the item on the agenda by 45 votes to 1, with 11 abstentions. The item was thereupon referred to the Ad Hoc Political Committee, which considered it at its 13th to 22nd meetings, from 16 to 29 October.

a. DISCUSSIONS IN THE Ad Hoc POLITICAL COMMITTEE

The Committee had before it a seventeen-Power joint draft resolution (A/AC.72/L.10) by Afghanistan, Bolivia, Burma, Egypt, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen. Under that draft resolution, as subsequently revised by its sponsors (A/AC.72/L.10/Rev.1), the General Assembly would:

(1) recall that it had given consideration to the subject at six earlier sessions;

(2) recall its previous resolutions on the subject;

(3) recall that resolutions 395(V), 511(VI) and 615(VII) had successively called on the Government of the Union of South Africa to refrain from implementing or enforcing the Group Areas Act;

(4) take note of the report of the Good Offices Commission, and in particular the Commission's conclusion that, in view of the response of the Government of the Union of South Africa, it had been unable to carry out its task to arrange and assist in negotiations between the Governments concerned;

(5) express its regret that the South African Government: (a) had refused to make use of the Commission's good offices or to utilize any of the alternative procedures for the settlement of the problem recommended by the four previous Assembly resolutions; (b) had continued to implement the Group Areas Act in contravention of three previous resolutions; and (c) was proceeding with further legislation contrary to the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights including the Immigrants Regulation Amendment Bill which sought to prohibit the entry into South Africa of wives and children of South African nationals of Indian origin;

(6) consider that those actions of the Union Government were not in keeping with its obligations and responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations;

(7) decide to continue the Good Offices Commission and urge the Government of the Union of South Africa to co-operate with that Commission;

(8) request the Commission to report to the next session the extent of progress achieved, together with its own views on the problem and any proposals which, in its opinion, might lead to peaceful settlement of it;

(9) again call upon the Union Government to refrain from implementing the provisions of the Group Areas Act; and

(10) decide to include the item in the provisional agenda of its ninth regular session.

On behalf of the sponsors, the representative of India accepted an oral amendment by Costa Rica to substitute the words "in spite of" for the words "in contravention of" in paragraph 5(b) of the draft resolution.

During the discussion in the Committee, the representative of India traced the history of the question from the year 1885 when, he said, discriminatory legislation against the Indians in South Africa was first enacted, inflicting severe hardships on the Indian population. From 1906 to 1913, when the first Gandhi-Smuts agreement was signed, India had shown willingness to negotiate. Subsequently, the question had been discussed at the imperial conferences of 1917, 1921, 1924 and 1926. Thus, the Indian representative said, it could not be claimed that the question was an exclusively South African concern—nor could it be argued that India had taken unfair advantage of the existence of the United Nations to bring the question before the world public opinion. India, its representative said, had made great concessions, such as giving its agreement to measures of voluntary repatriation. The Cape Town Agreement of 1927 and the second round table agreement of 1932 between the Indian community and India, on the one hand, and South Africa, on the other, had provided that no changes in the status of the Indian community would be introduced without further negotiations and consent. However, those provisions had been infringed and India had been forced to apply trade sanctions against South Africa, after due warning, as late as 1946.

The representative of India referred to the Immigrants Regulation Amendment Bill which was being currently debated in the South African parliament and which, it was stated, proposed severe restrictions on the entry into South Africa of the wives and children of South African nationals of Indian origin. The regulation, it was contended, violated the Gandhi-Smuts Agreement of 1914, the Cape Town Agreement of 1927 and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. He also referred to the Group Areas Act which, he said, involved a series of measures aimed at uprooting many thousand members of the Indian and Pakistan communities and the eventual economic strangulation of these communities. The representative of India cited plans of the Nationalist Party and other groups for the segregation of these communities in four principal South African cities, plans which, he said, would affect half the Indo-Pakistan population of South Africa.

The Indian representative then dealt with the question of the Assembly's competence in the matter. This, he said, had been denied by the South African delegation on the basis of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter which forbids intervention in matters "essentially" within the domestic jurisdiction of any State. In the first place, he said, all recommendation was not "intervention" and secondly the question of whether a matter could be considered to be "essentially" within the domestic jurisdiction of a State could be determined only by its origins, the sequence of events and their consequences. The origins of the case at issue, he argued, did not concern one nation but several, the sequence of events was also a matter involving a number of nations and the consequences of those events could not be said to be matters of purely national concern. Moreover, the argument that the Assembly lacked competence was futile because the Assembly had affirmed its competence in the matter by giving it consideration at several previous sessions.

The representative of India then invoked Article 10 of the Charter which, he said, gave the Assembly the right to consider any matter within the scope of the Charter. He also drew the Committee's attention to the particular relevance of Article 13, paragraph b, which provides that the General Assembly shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of assisting in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion. In addition, he stated, Articles 14, 55, 56, 62 and 76 all enjoin on Member States the observance of human rights, whatever saving clause there might be in Article 2, paragraph 7.

Referring to a proposal made during the debate (see below) that the question of competence might be referred to the International Court of Justice, the Indian representative drew attention to the fact that the Court's Opinion on South West Africa had already been rejected by the South African Government. Moreover, he said, by referring the matter to the Court the Assembly would invalidate its own resolution 395(V), adopted by a large majority in 1950. It would also create a precedent for referring every disputed issue to the Court.

The representative of India said that between 1926 and 1946 the Indian Government had repeatedly endeavoured to arrive at a settlement round a conference table, but had found the South African Government unwilling to do so. In 1946, the General Assembly had adopted resolution 44(I) urging the parties to confer on the points at issue between them. On that occasion, the Union Government had stated that the conference could not be held unless the Indian Government sent back its High Commissioner, which had been unacceptable to the Indian Government. In 1950, the parties had agreed to meet in South Africa to draw up a preliminary agreement about the holding of a conference. A formula had eventually been agreed on by the two sides, but immediately afterwards the Group Areas Act had been enacted by the Union Government, thus making it clear that the necessary conditions for a settlement did not exist. Consequently the joint draft resolution (A/AC.72/L.10/Rev.1) called on the South African Government to refrain from implementing the provisions of the Group Areas Act. As for the condition imposed by the Union Government that the negotiations must be conducted outside the United Nations, it was tantamount to suggesting that the provisions of the Charter were such as to militate against the chances of a settlement.

Turning to the joint draft resolution, the representative of India said that there was nothing in it to which the Committee could object. It merely recalled past actions and requested the continuance of the Good Offices Commission; even if the matter were said to be within the domestic jurisdiction of the South African Government, the exercise of good offices was not ruled out, he concluded.

Explaining his Government's position, the representative of the Union of South Africa said that Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter precluded the United Nations from considering the question. For that reason, the Union Government could not legally be required to submit the matter for settlement under the Charter. It had therefore been unable to recognize the Good Offices Commission, set up under the unconstitutional General Assembly resolution 615(VII) of 5 December 1952. In reply to the points raised by the Indian representative, the representative of the Union of South Africa said that the plans quoted by the Indian representative regarding the implementation of the Group Areas Act had no official status but were applications made to the Government by certain groups. No official decisions had yet been taken, and those representations, with others made by various interested sections, would be considered when the time came for final decision.

As regards the entry of families of Indians domiciled in South Africa, the representative of the Union Government said that it was true that, in 1913 and 1914, the South African parliament had passed two acts authorizing the families of Indians domiciled in the Union to enter South Africa under a special concession. But that was a privilege conferred upon the Indians not shared by nationals of any other country and was due to the fact that, at that time, the proportion of men to women among the domiciled Indians was 67 to 37 persons. Now that the number of Indians of both sexes was approximately equal, the Union Government considered itself fully justified in withdrawing that concession. The Indian assertion that the concession had been perpetuated in subsequent agreements was incorrect since during the entire existence of the League of Nations India had never sought to register any such agreements.

The Indian representative had repeated that the South African Government was not protected by Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter. Nevertheless, said the representative of South Africa, the word "intervene" in that paragraph could not have the meaning attributed to it by the Indian representative since only the Security Council, not the General Assembly, had the power of "intervening" in a dictatorial sense. Nor could South Africa accept the Indian interpretation of the word "essentially", which widened, rather than narrowed, the scope of domestic jurisdiction. It had been said that other Articles, such as Articles 10, 13, paragraph 1 b, 14, 55, 56, 62 and 76 were not affected by Article 2, paragraph 7. But the South African interpretation was in accordance with the intentions expressed by the founders of the United Nations, and there could be no doubt that the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, excluded everything in the Charter except the provisions for enforcement measures. Dealing with suggestions for an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice, the representative of South Africa stated that no State was obliged to accept such an advisory opinion. He recalled, however, that his delegation had vainly suggested in 1946 that an advisory opinion should be requested on the present item.

In 1950, he recalled, the South African Government had agreed on a formula which would permit a round table conference with the Governments of India and Pakistan. It was still prepared to accept such a solution, on the understanding that the matter would be settled outside the United Nations. By rejecting the solution proposed by South Africa and bringing the problem before the United Nations, India was trying to persuade the whole world that it was championing the oppressed.

The South African Government, he said, could not agree to suspend properly enacted legislation as a prior condition for a conference, as had been requested by the Indian representative. The Cape Town formula which the Indian representative had quoted contained no condition, and envisaged a full and free discussion without prejudice to the legal stand of the parties. While stating that it could not negotiate while hostile actions continued, India maintained the strict application of the trade embargo under the Reciprocity Act. South Africa had not requested the repeal of that Act, but had merely suggested a round table conference according to the Cape Town formula.

Dealing with the joint draft resolution, the representative of the Union said that the first five paragraphs enumerated provisions which infringed upon South Africa's domestic jurisdiction. In the fifth paragraph, South Africa was censured for not accepting the Commission's good offices.

But the Union Government saw no valid reason for the creation of that Commission since it had told the other parties that the door was open for negotiations. The draft resolution also expressed regret that the Group Areas Act had been implemented, thus interfering in domestic legislation. The other passages in the draft resolution were equally improper and objectionable. Since the Union was free to accept recommendations or not, there could be no "contravention" of them. The passage about Indian wives and children was based on false premises. Lastly, it was unnecessary to provide for automatic inclusion of the item in next year's agenda. To do so might prejudice the negotiations desired by the Committee, the representative of the Union of South Africa concluded.

The representative of Pakistan said that the representative of the Union of South Africa, in his speech, had appeared to imply that the Pakistan Government was prepared to join a round table conference outside the United Nations. That, he said, was not Pakistan's stand. His Government believed that the United Nations was fully competent to deal with the question, which was one of international importance and could not be shelved on technical grounds. The whole history of the problem showed that it had always been regarded as one for negotiation between India and South Africa. The indentured labour system had been the subject of negotiations between India and Natal, and the Governments of both had recognized their joint responsibility in the matter, the Indian Government on behalf of the immigrants and the Natal Government, and hence its successor the South African Government, as trustee. It was therefore too late to say that the matter was one of purely domestic jurisdiction. His Government, however, he said, did not look at the juridical issues involved in a "pettifogging" way. Despite its belief that the United Nations had been quite within its rights in adopting its resolutions, his Government would not press the technical point of jurisdiction, should the Union Government choose to deny it. Pakistan would be willing to participate in any conference under any auspices as long as it was held in the spirit of the Charter. By that phrase he meant, he explained, that the round table conference should be held in full consciousness of the fact that it had been convened because millions of people in the world realized that something was seriously wrong with certain laws enacted by the Union Government. The conference must recognize that fact and discuss the remedies.

A logical prerequisite of that conference would be that the Union Government should postpone the implementation of the Group Areas Act. It should not proceed with the delimitation of areas into which Asians were to be herded and deprived of equal rights. Such action, he said, depended entirely on the executive branch of the government and a recommendation concerning it could not be said to be an interference in the legislation of a State.

The representative of Pakistan then asked whether, in the event of a conference being held, the South African Government would be prepared to accept decisions taken by the conference, whatever their nature, and whether, if the case should arise, it would be prepared to abrogate or render inoperative the discriminatory laws. The conference would be in danger of failing if, as had happened in 1949, the Union Government was merely prepared to discuss the return of a part of the Indian and Pakistan community to their country of origin. That, he said, was not a humanitarian solution and would raise serious problems for India and Pakistan.

The representatives of Afghanistan, Bolivia, Burma, Egypt, Guatemala, Haiti, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen, co-sponsors with India and Pakistan of the draft resolution, regretted that the treatment of people of Indian origin in South Africa needed once again to be considered by the Assembly and that the efforts of the Good Offices Commission had failed. The text of the Charter had established the obvious competence of the General Assembly, these representatives maintained; moreover, the fact that for seven years the General Assembly had been dealing with that problem had not left any doubt on the matter. The fundamental rights in which the people of the United Nations had proclaimed their faith were at stake. Even if the joint draft resolution would not have more practical effect than the earlier resolutions adopted by the General Assembly, at least it would give expression to the Assembly's continuing interest in the problem. While, therefore, they would heartily welcome a conference between the three nations concerned, they asked the Committee to support the joint draft resolution in case that conference should not take place. The draft resolution in no way infringed the national sovereignty of the Union, they said. It merely expressed the hope of its authors that the Union Government would see its way clear to alleviating the distress of the population concerned.

Fully supporting the stand taken by the representatives of India and Pakistan and the joint draft resolution submitted by the seventeen Powers, the representatives of Czechoslovakia and the USSR maintained that South Africa had violated the agreements of 1927 and 1931 with India, under which the Union had undertaken to guarantee normal living conditions for the Indian community within its borders. As the matter was dealt with in bilateral agreements, the argument that it was exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of South Africa was unfounded. Racial discrimination, they held, continued to be practised against people of Indian origin in South Africa and the Union Government was ignoring Assembly resolutions and enforcing fresh discriminatory measures. Such a violation of the Purposes and Principles of the Charter fully justified the General Assembly's concern, they concluded.

Speaking in support of the joint draft resolution, the representatives of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Mexico, Uruguay and Yugoslavia affirmed the competence of the United Nations, stating that the violation of the Principles of the Charter and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in the Union of South Africa constituted a threat to peace and security and was, therefore, of international concern. The General Assembly, they agreed, could not impose a solution but it could invite South Africa to co-operate in finding an amicable solution through the machinery provided by the United Nations or, eventually, by direct negotiation. Not only should the Good Offices Commission continue its efforts until the policy of racial discrimination was ended, but it should also express its own views on the problem and offer its good offices, these representatives said.

The representative of Brazil, while agreeing with these representatives, expressed regret that the Assembly had not asked the International Court for an advisory opinion so that the plea of domestic jurisdiction should be finally settled. He suggested that it would be wise to ask the Court, before putting the proposal to the vote, whether the draft resolution was consistent with the Charter.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Greece, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Peru, Turkey and the United Kingdom opposed the joint draft resolution, expressing grave doubts of the Assembly's competence in the matter. They also expressed their concern about the efficacy of the draft resolution which, they held, as drafted, was in the nature of a reproof to South Africa. They emphasized that the best chance of reaching a settlement of the question lay in the opportunity of direct negotiations held either under or outside the auspices of the United Nations. Even if direct negotiations had failed so far, the result might have been different if the United Nations had decided from the very beginning that that was the only means of settling the problem and if it had refrained from intervening in matters which fell within the domestic jurisdiction of the parties concerned. The negative results of past efforts were ample proof that the Assembly was pursuing a wrong course.

While stating that they would vote in favour of the draft resolution as a whole, the representatives of China, Ecuador and the United States opposed some of its provisions. The representative of China declared that he would abstain from voting on the sixth paragraph, which expressed the view that the actions of the Union Government were inconsistent with the Charter, because he wished to avoid anything that might hamper the work of the Good Offices Commission. The representative of Ecuador announced that he would abstain from voting on the third paragraph, on sections (b) and (c) of the fifth paragraph and on the ninth paragraph, which concerned the passing and enforcement of national legislation that lay entirely, he said, within the jurisdiction of the South African Government.

The United States representative said that in this problem the Committee was not concerned with isolated instances of racial discrimination, but with a whole trend of governmental policy. That was why the general obligations undertaken by the signatories of the Charter were relevant to the present issue. However, the question before the Committee was essentially the outcome of local conditions and an attempt made from the outside to modify the complex relationship involved might not only be ignored but might cause further intolerance. There were, therefore, practical limitations to the possibility of the United Nations being able to improve the situation. Under the Charter, the General Assembly could only make recommendations and they could be given effect only if accepted by the nations concerned. Since 1946, all the Assembly's efforts on this question had been unsuccessful. It must be noted, however, that the South African Government, which denied the competence of the Assembly in the matter, had declared itself willing to negotiate outside the United Nations. That was a hope not to be neglected.

The history of the question appeared to indicate that it would be useless to set up further mediating bodies, the United States representative considered. Actually, the Assembly's basic task was to bring about direct discussions between the parties and it should make no further recommendations until the Governments concerned had made further efforts in that direction.

The United States delegation, he added, was not in favour of the matter being automatically placed on the agenda of the ninth session, since that might prejudice negotiations. Nor was a recommendation addressed only to South Africa advisable. The United States also considered it harmful and inappropriate to include, in any draft resolution on the question, expressions of regret over past actions, taken by one or another of the parties, or references to any particular domestic legislation.

The representatives of Argentina and Denmark considered that the Assembly was competent to deal with that matter. They would vote in favour of the continuance of the Good Offices Commission in the hope that the South African Government would reconsider its position. They felt, however, that the provisions of the draft resolution passing condemnation of the South African policy would only complicate the work of the Good Offices Commission and could be deleted. The representative of Denmark suggested also the deletion of the last part of the eighth paragraph providing for the submission of proposals by the Commission to the Assembly. By definition, he said, the task of the Good Offices Commission was confined to assisting the parties to reconcile their views; it should not, on its own initiative, put forward its own views. He would further propose that the authors of the draft resolution modify the text insofar as it expressed regret and criticisms about the South African Government's continued implementation of the Group Areas Act and its intention to enact further legislation.

At its 21st meeting on 28 October, the Ad Hoc Political Committee adopted the joint draft resolution, as amended by Costa Rica, paragraph by paragraph, by votes ranging from 48 to 1, with 7 abstentions, on paragraph 1, to 32 to 15, with 11 abstentions, on paragraph 5 c (for text, see below). The second part of paragraph 8, concerning the extent of the role of the Good Offices Commission, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 37 to 13, with 9 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 38 to 2, with 19 abstentions.

At the next meeting, the representatives of Honduras, Argentina, Ecuador, Brazil, Sweden, China, Iceland and Cuba explained their votes. Most of them recorded their reservations on certain paragraphs, mainly on paragraphs 3, 5 b and c, and 9. The representative of Sweden said that his delegation continued to feel that the United Nations was competent to discuss the item; he had, however, abstained, due to the uncertainty of the extent of that competence.

The representative of Cuba declared that, as a member of the Good Offices Commission, Cuba had refrained from taking part in the general debate. He had voted, he said, for the joint draft resolution in the hope that the three parties could be persuaded to enter into negotiations.

b. RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

At its 457th plenary meeting on 11 November 1953, the General Assembly adopted the draft resolution proposed in the report of the Ad Hoc Political Committee (A/2352) by a roll-call vote of 42 to 1, with 17 abstentions. The vote was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United States, Uruguay, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Union of South Africa.

Abstaining: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, Venezuela.

The resolution (719(VIII)) read:

"The General Assembly

"1. Recalls that at its first, second, third, fifth, sixth and seventh sessions it has given consideration to the question of the treatment of people of Indian origin in the Union of South Africa;

"2. Further recalls:

"(a) That resolution 44 (I) of 8 December 1946 expressed the opinion that the treatment of Indians in the Union of South Africa should be in conformity with the international obligations under the agreements concluded between the Governments of India and the Union of South Africa and the relevant provisions of the Charter and requested the two Governments to report to the General Assembly on the measures adopted to this effect;

"(b) That resolution 265 (HI) of 14 May 1949 invited the Governments of India, Pakistan and the Union of South Africa to enter into discussion at a round table conference, taking into consideration the Purposes and Principles of the Charter and the Declaration of Human Rights;

"(c) That resolution 395 (V) of 2 December 1950 held that a policy of 'racial segregation' (apartheid) was necessarily based on doctrines of racial discrimination; repeated its recommendation that a round table conference be held; and further recommended that, in the event of failure to hold a conference or reach agreement thereat, a commission of three members be set up to assist the parties in carrying through appropriate negotiations;

"(d) That resolution 511(VI) of 12 January 1952 reaffirmed the recommendation of resolution 395 (V) that a three-member commission be established and further requested the Secretary-General, in the event of failure to establish such a commission, to lend his assistance to the Governments concerned and if necessary to appoint an individual who would render any additional assistance deemed advisable;

"(e) That resolution 615 (VII) of 5 December 1952 established a three-member United Nations Good Offices Commission to arrange and assist in negotiations between the Governments concerned in order that a satisfactory solution in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights might be achieved;

"3. Also recalls that resolutions 395(V), 511(VI) and 615(VII) successively called on the Government of the Union of South Africa to refrain from implementing or enforcing the provisions of the Group Areas Act;

"4. Takes note of the report of the United Nations Good Offices Commission, and in particular its conclusion that 'in view of the response of the Government of the Union of South Africa, it has been unable to carry out its task to arrange and assist in negotiations between the Governments concerned';

"5. Expresses its regret that the Government of the Union of South Africa:

"(a) Has refused to make use of the Commission's good offices or to utilize any of the alternative procedures for the settlement of the problem recommended by the four previous resolutions of the General Assembly;

"(b) Has continued to implement the provisions of the Group Areas Act in spite of the provisions of three previous resolutions;

"(c) Is proceeding with further legislation contrary to the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, including the Immigrants Regulation Amendment Bill which seeks to prohibit the entry into South Africa of wives and children of South African nationals of Indian origin;

"6. Considers that these actions of the Government of the Union of South Africa are not in keeping with its obligations and responsibilities under the Charter of the United Nations;

"7. Decides to continue the United Nations Good Offices Commission and urges the Government of the Union of South Africa to co-operate with that Commission;

"8. Requests the Commission to report to the General Assembly at its next regular session the extent of progress achieved, together with its own views on the problem and any proposals which, in its opinion, may lead to a peaceful settlement of it;

"9. Again calls upon the Government of the Union of South Africa to refrain from implementing the provisions of the Group Areas Act;

"10. Decides to include this item in the provisional agenda of the ninth session of the General Assembly."

G. THE QUESTION OF RACE CONFLICT IN SOUTH AFRICA RESULTING FROM THE POLICIES OF APARTHEID OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

The question of race conflict in South Africa was first discussed by the General Assembly at its seventh session. On 5 December 1952, the Assembly adopted resolution 616 A (VII), establishing a Commission, consisting of three members, to study the racial situation in the Union of South Africa in the light of the purposes and principles of the Charter, with due regard to the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, as well as the provisions of Article 1, paragraphs 2 and 3, Article 13, paragraph 1b, Article 55c and Article 56 of the Charter, and the resolutions of the United Nations on racial persecution and discrimination, and to report its conclusions to the General Assembly at its eighth session.⁴³

On 30 March 1953, the General Assembly decided at the suggestion of the President, that the Commission should consist of Dames Bellegarde, Henri Laugier and Hernán Santa Cruz, who were designated in their personal capacities.

1. Report of the Commission

On 3 October 1953, the United Nations Commission on the Racial Situation in the Union of South Africa submitted its report (A/2505 & Add. 1) to the Assembly's eighth session.

The Commission stated that one of the reasons why its report was not as complete as the Assembly was entitled to expect was the lack of co-operation from the Government of the Union. The Commission had sought that co-operation, in accordance with resolution 616 A (VII). In response, the Union Government's Secretary for External Affairs had replied, on 26 June 1953, that the Secretary-General of the United Nations had already been advised of the Union Government's attitude towards the Commission. It had been pointed out that since the Union Government had consistently regarded the question of its racial policy as a domestic matter, it regarded resolution 616 A (VII) as unconstitutional and could not therefore recognize the Commission established under it. Consequently, the Commission stated, its report had been based essentially on an analysis of the legislative and administrative provisions in force in the Union, on the study of books, documents and statements by witnesses, and on information communicated by certain Member States.

The Commission had assumed that, in inviting it to have regard to various Articles of the Charter in carrying out its terms of reference, the Assembly wished it to study the extent to which those Articles might determine, condition or restrict the competence of the United Nations. After thorough study, the Commission concluded that the Assembly, assisted by the commissions which it authorized, was permitted by the Charter to undertake any studies and make any recommendations which it might deem necessary in connexion with the implementation of the principles to which the Member States had subscribed by signing the Charter. That right, it said, was absolutely incontestable with regard to general questions concerning human rights and particularly those rights of protection against discrimination for reasons of race, sex, language or religion. The exercise of such functions did not constitute an intervention within the domestic jurisdiction of States prohibited by Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter.

After giving a geographic, historic, political and demographic sketch of the Union of South Africa, the report observed that the racial problem in the Union resulted from a policy of segregation, which had existed almost from the beginning of the European colonization. That segregation had been established either spontaneously as the result of the historical circumstances attending the contact between European and non-White groups and strengthened by the religious and racial prejudices peculiar to the era or by legislation originating in vestiges of concepts associated with the colonial periods of the nation's life.

The Nationalist Party, which had held power since 1948, had, it was said, initiated and developed the doctrine of apartheid, which it intended to apply to its full extent. That doctrine laid down the principle that full and complete segregation was a desirable end, likely to promote the parallel development of the various ethnic groups, and that it constituted the best method for the subsequent achievement of equal opportunity and, possibly, an equal standard of living for those groups, in a diversity which was deemed advisable by the authors of the doctrine but which was fundamentally irreconcilable with humane thinking. The doctrine was based on the theory that the White race was in duty bound to maintain inviolate and to perpetuate its position in Western Christian civilization, and must at any cost, although in numerical minority, maintain its dominating position over the Coloured race. It denied the principle of civic equality and therefore could not grant the Natives or Bantus, or any other non-White groups, such as the Coloured persons and Indians, the political rights which it conferred on the White population in the management of public affairs. The doctrine also encouraged ethnic groups to safeguard the purity of their racial characteristics.

The report reviewed the principal acts and orders providing for differences in the treatment of the various groups in the Union of South Africa which the Nationalist Party had been applying in accordance with its apartheid doctrine. It then described the effects of that legislation on the various groups of the population and reviewed it in the light of the provisions of the Charter relating to human rights and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

In view of the differences observed between certain groups or specific geographic areas, those legislative and administrative measures affected, it was stated, to a greater or lesser degree, nearly all aspects of the domestic, social, political and economic life of the non-White population, which made up 79 per cent of the total population. They affected its most fundamental rights and freedoms: political rights, freedom of movement and residence, property rights, freedom to work and to practise occupations, freedom of marriage and other family rights. They established obvious inequality before the law in relation to the rights, freedoms and opportunities enjoyed by the remaining 20 per cent of the population. These facts constituted obvious racial discrimination. Four fifths of the population were thereby reduced to a humiliating level of inferiority which was injurious to human dignity and made the full development of personality impossible or very difficult.

The report stated that the apartheid policy had given rise to serious internal conflicts and maintained a condition of latent and ever-increasing tension in the country. The Commission, it was stated, had given special attention to the campaign of so-called "Defiance of Unjust Laws" conducted in 1952 by the two main Bantu and Indian organizations in connexion with their efforts to secure the repeal of legislation regarded as discriminatory. The campaign, in which volunteers committed "technical" offences such as contraventions of the apartheid regulations governing the use of seats in public conveyances, had resulted in the imprisonment of 8,065 persons by the end of 1952. The Government's legislative counter-measures against the civil disobedience movement were described in the report.

The report noted that the non-White population was increasing more rapidly than the so-called European population and that studies showed that the economic needs of the country would compel the increasing use of non-European manpower in industry, contrary to the purposes of apartheid. Aspirations towards the enjoyment of all the opportunities open to persons free from discrimination could not fail to grow, it was stated, as a result of the aggressive information which modern technical civilization distributes, of the increasing contacts between the discriminators and the manpower subject to discrimination, and of the daily growing need of the former for the latter.

Among the population subjected to discrimination were 365,000 persons of Indian origin. Their countries of origin, India and Pakistan, were watching with increasing anxiety the development of that policy. The Commission noted the profound alarm which was spreading in Africa, the Middle East and wherever the spirit of solidarity among Coloured persons had resented the attack made upon it. The Commission was convinced that the pursuit of that policy could not fail immediately and seriously to increase the anti-White sentiment in Africa resulting from nationalist movements, the force of which must not be underestimated. There could be no doubt that the position in the Union of South Africa was, to say the least, "likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among the nations", in the sense of Article 14 of the Charter.

The Commission considered that the doctrine of racial superiority on which the apartheid policy was based was scientifically false and extremely dangerous to internal peace and international relations.

All the discriminatory measures described conflicted with the declaration in the Preamble of the Charter in which the signatories stated their determination to "reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person....." Those measures were also contrary to the purposes of international economic and social co-operation laid down in Article 55 of the Charter and therefore constituted a failure by the Union Government to observe its obligations under Article 56.⁴⁴ Instead of pursuing a policy for the progressive elimination of discriminatory measures, that Government had adopted new measures likely to aggravate the situation.

The Commission's study of previous General Assembly resolutions on racial persecution and discrimination showed that the Union Government's policy was also contrary to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, resolution 377 E (V) of 3 November 1950 entitled "Uniting for peace", and resolutions 103 (I) of 19 November 1946 and 616 B (VII) of 5 December 1952.⁴⁵

The members of the Commission had reached, it was declared, the following conclusions. It was highly unlikely that the policy of apartheid would ever be willingly accepted by the masses subjected to discrimination. They could not be convinced that the policy was based on justice and a wish to promote their material and moral interests, and not on a pride of race and a will to domination. As the apartheid policy developed, the situation was constantly being aggravated and daily becoming less open to settlement by conciliation, information or education, daily more explosive and menacing to international peace and to the foreign relations of the Union of South Africa. Soon, any solution would be precluded and the only way out would be through violence. There was a danger that the forces of agitation and subversion, which the Government was resisting by strong legislative measures, would find an increasingly favourable soil.

The report concluded with certain suggestions which the Commission stated that it felt it was in duty bound to make, at the risk of reproach for an unduly wide interpretation of its terms of reference, concerning the assistance which the United Nations could and should give to help a Member, the Union of South Africa, to solve those problems at a difficult moment in its history. The United Nations might, for instance, express the hope that the Union Government would reconsider its policy towards various ethnic groups and itself suggest ways and means in which the Union might draw up a new policy. The racial problems, nevertheless, could not be solved by the mere wish of a Government to change its policy. The effects of the historical, religious, social and economic factors from which the problem had arisen and which the apartheid policy had co-ordinated could, even in the most favourable circumstances, disappear only gradually. The economic development of the whole country, the actual diminution of the social inequality and the opening of real opportunities for individual and collective progress, together with the sincere wish of the Government and of the European population progressively to eliminate discrimination, had to be combined if the situation was to be appreciably improved.

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

In accordance with resolution 616 A (VII), the question of race conflict in South Africa was placed on the provisional agenda of the eighth session. At its 87th meeting on 16 September, the General Committee, after hearing the representative of the Union of South Africa record his Government's protest against inclusion of the item, decided to recommend that it be included. The Assembly considered the recommendation at its 435th plenary meeting, on 17 September.⁴⁶

The representative of the Union of South Africa contested the inclusion of the item in the Assembly's agenda. Recalling the salient features of his argument at the seventh session, he argued that the Assembly was barred from considering the question by Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter which forbade interference in the domestic affairs of States. This prohibition, he said, applied also in regard to the promotion of human rights. After citing the records of the San Francisco Conference on that subject, he argued that if the United Nations were to be permitted to intervene under Article 55c of the Charter, concerning human rights, then it would be equally permitted to intervene in regard to economic and social matters, set out in Article 55a and b. No State, he said, would tolerate that. Articles 55 and 56, read with Article 13 of the Charter, indicated how the pledge contained in Article 56 of the Charter was to be carried out, e.g., through the Economic and Social Council, the establishment of the specialized agencies, the Commission on Human Rights, etc. Neither the Charter nor any other internationally binding instrument, he noted, contained any definition of fundamental human rights.

⁴⁴ Under Article 55c, the United Nations is to promote universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without discrimination. Under Article 56, all Members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the Organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55.

⁴⁵ For texts of these resolutions, see Y.U.N., 1950, pp. 193-95, Y.U.N., 1946-47, p. 178 and Y.U.N., 1952, p. 306.

Had they done so, there would have been no need for the current drafting of covenants on human rights with internationally binding force in respect of all signatory States.

Referring to the explanatory memorandum (A/2183)⁴⁷ of the States which had placed the item on the Assembly's agenda, he said that none of the charges listed against South Africa involved any matter affecting the legitimate rights of another State. Those matters were: the regulation of the occupation of land and premises in South Africa by South African nationals; public service facilities; the means employed in South Africa to repress Communism; the composition of South Africa's armed forces; voting rights and educational and housing facilities for non-European citizens. Those were domestic matters which fell within the exclusive domestic jurisdiction of any sovereign State. If those matters did not fall within Article 2, paragraph 7, that provision, without which few, if any, of the small States would have found it possible to sign or ratify the Charter, became purposeless.

For the same reason his Government denied the constitutionality of the Commission established by the General Assembly to study South Africa's racial policies. The report of that Commission, he said, would not render the General Assembly competent to intervene in the domestic affairs of the Union because such intervention was forbidden by the Charter. He therefore requested the General Assembly not to include the item in its agenda.

The representative of the United Kingdom also opposed inclusion of the item. The representatives of Greece and India spoke in favour of including the item in the agenda.

The Assembly decided, by 46 votes to 7, with 7 abstentions, to include this item and referred it to the Ad Hoc Political Committee, which considered it at its 31st to 43rd meetings from 20 November to 5 December 1953.

a. DRAFT RESOLUTIONS CONSIDERED BY THE Ad Hoc POLITICAL COMMITTEE

The Committee had before it the following draft resolutions:

(1) A draft resolution by the Union of South Africa (A/AC.72/L.13), submitted under rule 120 of the rules of procedure, by which the Committee would:

(a) note that the matters to which the item under consideration related and which were referred to in the explanatory memorandum (A/2183) of the Powers which had placed it on the agenda and in the report of the United Nations Commission on the Racial Situation in South Africa (A/2505), "such as the policies and legislation of a Member State in regard to land tenure, conditions of employment in public services, regulation of transport, suppression of communism, combat service in the armed forces, nationality, the franchise, movement of population, residence, immigration, the work and practice of the professions, social security, education, public health, criminal law, taxation, housing, regulation of the liquor traffic, regulation of labour and wages, marriage, food subsidies, local government, pensions, workmen's compensation", were "among matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a Member State";

(b) would note also "that by Article 2(7) of the Charter nothing contained in the Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State"; and

(c) would decide that the Committee had no competence to intervene in the matters listed above to which the said item related.

(2) A draft resolution by Afghanistan, Bolivia, Burma, Egypt, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Yemen (A/AC.72/L.14), under which the General Assembly, after noting certain conclusions of the United Nations Commission, would, in the operative part:

(1) express appreciation of the work of the Commission;

(2) request the Commission (a) to continue its study of the development of the racial situation in the Union of South Africa: (i) with reference to the various implications of that situation on the populations affected; and (ii) in relation to the provisions of the Charter and in particular to Article 14;⁴⁸ and (b) to suggest measures which would help to alleviate the situation and promote a peaceful settlement;

(3) invite the Union Government to extend its full co-operation to the Commission; and

(4) request the Commission to report to the General Assembly at its ninth session.

The following amendments to the joint seventeen-Power draft were proposed:

(1) A Chilean amendment (A/AC.72/L.15) to add a new paragraph reaffirming Assembly resolutions 103(I) of 9 November 1946, 377 A (V), Section E, of 3 November 1950 and 616 B (VII) of 5 December 1953.

(2) A joint amendment by Chile and Uruguay (submitted orally) to add a new paragraph deciding that members of the Commission unable to continue their membership should, if the Assembly were not sitting, be replaced by the President of the General Assembly in consultation with the Secretary-General.

This amendment was withdrawn subsequently, since the representatives sponsoring it felt that the problem could be dealt with when the General Assembly took up the Committee's report.

⁴⁷ See Y.U.N., 1952, p. 297.

⁴⁸ This Article provides that the Assembly may recommend measures for the peaceful settlement of disputes regardless of origin which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations, including violations of the Charter provisions concerning the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations.

b. DISCUSSIONS IN THE Ad Hoc POLITICAL COMMITTEE

On 20 November the Chairman-Rapporteur of the United Nations Commission on the Racial Situation in the Union of South Africa, with the consent of the Committee, was invited to take a seat at the Committee table. In this connexion, the representative of the Union of South Africa stated that, if the Commission were represented at the discussions of the Committee, the presence of his delegation must not be construed as recognition by the Union Government of the Commission, which it continued to regard as unconstitutional. At that meeting, the Chairman-Rapporteur made a statement introducing the Commission's report; at subsequent meetings he gave certain clarifications of the report and replied to criticisms made by various members of the Committee, including, in particular, the representative of the Union of South Africa.

The representative of the Union declared that his Government's viewpoint had not changed since his statement before the Ad Hoc Political Committee at the seventh session.⁴⁹ Participation in the discussion was without prejudice to his Government's legal position that the United Nations was not competent to consider the question. The argument that the United Nations had dealt with the matter in the past did not render it competent and could not justify intervention of the General Assembly in the question of racial conflict in South Africa, unless (1) the Charter provisions authorized the Assembly to intervene in matters of essentially domestic concern, or (2) the item in question did not relate to matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of South Africa.

Regarding the first question, he stated that all Member States had safeguarded themselves at San Francisco through the introduction of Article 2, paragraph 7, which imposed an obligation on the United Nations not to intervene in the internal affairs of Member States, and stated the right of those States to maintain absolute sovereignty in that field. He reviewed his delegation's interpretation of Article 2, paragraph 7,⁵⁰ as follows:

First, the word "nothing" in the initial phrase had an over-riding effect regardless of any other provision of the Charter, except enforcement measures with which the General Assembly was not competent to deal. Secondly, the word "intervene" had its ordinary dictionary meaning and included interference; it could not mean dictatorial interference, as had been alleged, since only the Security Council could so interfere in a question of enforcement measures under Chapter VII. Thirdly, the word "essentially" had been used in order to widen, and not narrow, the scope of domestic jurisdiction. The words "domestic jurisdiction", according to international law, concerned the relationship between a State and its nationals, which was universally recognized as a matter of allowing of no interference by another State or by any external organization, subject only to treaty obligations.

With regard to the second question, the representative of the Union Government argued that all those matters to which the racial conflict in South Africa related, such as movement of population, residence, marriage, etc. were without any doubt essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the Union of South Africa; they covered the whole field of domestic administration. To accept the thesis that the United Nations was entitled to intervene in such matters was tantamount to denying the principle of national sovereignty and to repudiating Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Charter which affirms the sovereign equality of all Member States.

As for the contention that the matters in question were outside domestic jurisdiction because they involved human rights, the fact that the United Nations had deemed it necessary to draft an international covenant defining human rights demonstrated that they had not yet been defined and that there was as yet no international instrument imposing specific obligations on Member States with respect to them.

The preposterous allegations that the racial policy of his Government constituted a threat to international peace or was likely to impair friendly relations among nations, thus calling for action under Article 14 of the Charter, reflected a desire to exploit the basic purpose of the United Nations for tendentious purposes. Domestic legislation designed solely for the welfare of the people of South Africa in no way affected other peoples and could hardly be charged to constitute a threat, direct or indirect, to the territorial integrity or political independence of a State.

Turning to the Commission's report, the South African representative pointed out that his Gov-

⁴⁹ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 298-99.

eminent had not recognized the Commission because it considered it illegally constituted and he declared that the report contained a biased analysis of the internal affairs of South Africa. As for its conclusions, the Commission had gone beyond its terms of reference and had set forth a series of obiter dicta which constituted an incredible attack upon the national sovereignty of the Union; for those conclusions implied the exercise over a sovereign State of a supervision comparable to that exercised by a guardian over a ward and recognition of the United Nations as the arbiter of the destiny of the Union of South Africa.

The statement by the Chairman of the Commission, in introducing the report, that the situation in South Africa was daily becoming less amenable to treatment by conciliation and was leading to a deadlock which could only be broken by resort to force was completely unwarranted, irresponsible, and little short of an incitement to revolt. Such statements would make the Committee more easily realize why the Union Government had not co-operated with the Commission and would never be able to co-operate with such commissions in the future.

At the following meeting, the Chairman-Rapporteur of the Commission replied to the South African representative's charges of partiality and lack of objectivity on the part of the Commission, and reviewed the methods of work which the Commission had been compelled to follow owing to the absence of co-operation on the part of the South African Government.

The representative of India considered that the Commission had compiled an impressive report. He had hoped that the South African representative would submit definite observations about the facts of racial discrimination established in the report. Public opinion could not be blamed for drawing its own conclusions regarding South Africa's deliberate refusal to co-operate with a duly established commission.

Endorsing the Commission's conclusions regarding the competence of the General Assembly, he stated that those who persisted in denying such competence appeared to be claiming for the Union the unchallengeable right to disturb the peace of Africa, to impair the development of friendly relations among nations and to violate without compunction the principles of the Charter.

Racial conflict in South Africa, the representative of India said, was the consequence of a systematically developed basic policy of apartheid. Enlightened opinion unreservedly accepted the view that the problems of multi-racial communities could only be solved by the full equality and co-operative development of all their elements. Member States had accepted those principles in signing the Charter. The South African Government's racial policy was not based upon the principles of Western civilization nor on the precepts of the Christian religion, but on the idea that the interests of the White minority in South Africa could only be protected by a policy of racial domination. Such a solution was contrary to the Charter and was not supported by the experience of history. A solution based on force and domination could only generate hatred and eventually make change by violence inevitable. Further, he stated, the economic effect of segregation was not, as had been alleged, to ensure the equal, though separate, economic development of all races; he quoted figures to show that the policy was directed primarily towards maintaining non-Europeans in a position of permanent inferiority, denying them access to skilled occupation and reducing them to economic serfdom.

While measures of racial and social discrimination existed in other Member States, he continued, discrimination was a diminishing and condemned social practice everywhere except in South Africa where it was a norm of social behaviour, enjoying the Government's full support. The policy of apartheid made the application of the Charter illegal in the Union. The struggle against discrimination had not ceased although the campaign of passive resistance mentioned in the Commission's report had been suspended. The Coloured people, comprising two thirds of the world's population, viewed the struggle of the non-European population of South Africa for its fundamental rights as the symbol of the struggle for human dignity and would judge the United Nations by the results obtained.

The Indian representative endorsed the Commission's conclusions and urged that the United Nations should take action in accordance with its findings.

During the course of the discussion, statements in support of the seventeen-Power draft resolution and in reply to its opponents were also made by other sponsors of the joint draft resolution. The representative of Pakistan stated that, under Article 10 of the Charter, the Assembly could discuss any matter within the scope of the Charter and, under Article 13, it should initiate studies to assist in the realization of human rights. Neither Article, he said, made any reservation in respect of the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7. The initiation of a study by the General Assembly did not constitute intervention in the internal affairs of a Member State. How, he asked, could the Committee ignore previous Assembly decisions and decide that it was not competent, although no new element had supervened?

The representative of Syria said that the Union Government's policy of discrimination was based on the myth of the supremacy of European civilization; it was directed towards frustrating the natural rights of the indigenous majority, who were the true masters of the country. Not only was it a form of racism stemming from a premise which history had shown to be false; it was in fact an insult, an affront to true European humanism. The degradation caused by South Africa's racial policies could not be defended in the name of European civilization.

The representative of Indonesia said that there remained in certain countries which had suffered from Western colonialism a feeling of hostility towards Westerners sometimes described as "anti-White" sentiment. His delegation regretted that the Western Powers invoked legalistic arguments in order to side with the Union of South Africa, thereby preventing the United Nations from dealing with a question that affected fundamental relations of peoples of the world.

In addition to the sponsors of the joint draft resolution, a majority of representatives, including those of Brazil, Chile, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Israel, Mexico, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, affirmed the competence of the General Assembly, opposed the South African draft resolution and strongly supported the joint draft resolution. They congratulated the Commission on its report and stressed the need for United Nations action in connexion with the policy of racial discrimination in the Union of South Africa. The view was generally shared that there was no intention of intervening in the internal affairs of the Union and there was no animosity towards that country. However, it was felt, respect for human rights was a matter of international concern, for it was an integral element in the principles of the Charter that all Member States had solemnly pledged to defend. Accordingly, to inquire into violations of those rights, to ascertain whether such violations had been committed and to make appropriate recommendations in no way constituted intervention in domestic affairs. It was also stated that the practices of the Union Government constituted a threat to the peace since, in the present world, the way in which the people of one area lived affected all other peoples of the world. It was true that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was not legally binding in the sense that the Charter was; but respect for human rights was a universally accepted principle and required no legal force to be binding on all.

In expressing their opposition to the South African draft resolution and their strong support for the seventeen-Power draft resolution, the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR emphasized the connexion between the policy of apartheid and colonialism.

They said that the policy of racial discrimination applied against the non-European population of the Union of South Africa was an insult to all the non-White peoples of Asia, Africa and South America, who constituted more than half of the population of the world. It created dangerous tension between the States concerned. They maintained that the position taken by the colonial Powers and members of the "North Atlantic bloc" completely destroyed the myth that the Western world was a "free world". A society which oppressed millions of human beings because of the colour of their skin could obviously not claim to be "free". It was stated that certain States, in particular the Union of South Africa, were not respecting the obligations incurred under the Charter. In the Union of South Africa, these representatives held, exploiters thirsting for gain were holding down the indigenous and non-European population in a state of slavery. But the oppressed peoples were growing more and more vocal and movements toward national liberation were assuming unprecedented dimensions.

While recording the opposition of their Governments to any policy of racial discrimination, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, France, Greece, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United Kingdom supported, in general, the position taken by South Africa on the question of competence and the unconstitutionality of the United Nations Commission and its report. All opposed the seventeen-Power joint draft resolution and, with the exception of the representatives of Canada, the Netherlands and New Zealand, who abstained, supported the South African draft resolution.

The representative of Belgium declared that the prohibition in Article 2, paragraph 7, against intervention in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a State was a general one, affecting all the United Nations organs and all provisions of the Charter. It made no distinction between provisions imposing international obligations on States, such as those concerning respect for human rights, and those which did not do so. That prohibition, therefore, could not be evaded by invoking the existence of international obligations resulting from the provisions of the Charter.

The view that, so long as there was no dictatorial interference, the General Assembly could undertake any discussions or studies whatsoever and even formulate recommendations misconstrued the nature of the General Assembly's powers, he said. Since the Assembly had only powers of recommendation, it was constitutionally incapable of dictatorial interference. After reviewing the proceedings of the San Francisco Conference, the Belgian representative concluded that Member States had assumed certain obligations under the Charter affecting essentially domestic questions and had recognized their imperative character, but they had not intended to make it possible for the machinery of the Charter to be used against them in such matters. The aim of Article 2, paragraph 7, was to place the reserved sphere outside the ordinary law of the Charter; and it was in that sense that the word "intervene" must be interpreted. The discussions at San Francisco, he added, also proved that United Nations organs, including the General Assembly, could not decide on their own competence when a State invoked that Article.

There was no incompatibility, it was argued, between Article 2, paragraph 7, and Articles 10 and 14 of the Charter. These Articles allowed the Assembly broad powers of recommendation in matters within domestic jurisdiction, either in the form of general provisions or else, with the consent of the State concerned, in particular cases.

The representative of the United Kingdom held that questions relating to human rights did not by virtue of Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter cease to be domestic problems and acquire an international character. Under such an interpretation, the United Nations would acquire the right to intervene in all the internal affairs of its Member States, including economic and social problems. The argument would be valid only if Article 56 created specific international obligations with respect to particular rights. Article 56 however merely pledged co-operation for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55. Noting that the Commission in its report had referred to a statement by the representative of France affirming the Assembly's competence on the question of observance of human rights in Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania which was discussed at the Assembly's fourth session, the representative of France stated that in that question the United Nations had invoked a wholly exceptional competence. Similarly, on the question of forced labour the United Nations resolution had referred to a general inquiry involving all States. The two cases were quite different from the problem before the Committee.

The representative of Colombia maintained that there could be no question of making the United Nations a forum for political minorities, yet the Commission had studied every aspect of South African rights. Supporters of the seventeen-Power joint draft resolution seemed to have forgotten that while the Union of South Africa was now being indicted by a group of countries, another nation might later find itself in the same situation. It had been said that such a development was impossible because opposition groups would have to find spokesmen in the United Nations where only Member States had the right to make such charges. But certain governments might have affinities with opposition groups in other countries and might be induced to press for discussion of questions within the domestic jurisdiction of countries other than their own. Until the Charter should be amended, the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, remained in force.

Canada, said its representative, was not convinced that the Assembly had absolute powers to deal with questions of human rights. That argument might create a dangerous tendency to attempt to impose the will of groups of nations on others and to encroach upon individual sovereignty. His delegation believed that a practical approach was possible. It was to be hoped that the current discussion regarding South Africa's racial policy, which many regarded as being in conflict with the Charter, would have some effect in bringing public opinion to bear on Member States. That was not intervention in the form prohibited by the Charter. It was questionable, however, whether the Assembly should go beyond discussion and the expression of concern and take the further steps suggested in the joint draft resolution. The Commission had not achieved an improvement in the racial situation and a further investigation did not seem likely to bring results. If continuance of the Commission were to cause a stiffening of attitudes instead of greater co-operation tending to better observance of human rights, it would be bad policy to extend the Commission's mandate. The Assembly must avoid rash and harmful action and work for a solution of human rights problems in a spirit of co-operation.

A number of representatives, including those of Argentina, China, Denmark, Norway, Peru, Sweden, Turkey, the United States and Venezuela, either abstained on or opposed the South African draft resolution, but all abstained on the seventeen-Power draft resolution. These representatives generally agreed that discussion of the question of apartheid did not constitute intervention. They believed in the Assembly's right to make general recommendations in the matter but questioned whether it could adopt specific recommendations. However, they emphasized that the right to discuss the problem should be exercised with self-restraint and tolerance. The representative of Norway felt that the joint draft resolution should be amended so as to refer to racial discrimination in general, not to the policy of a particular country.

The representative of the United States noted that the question of race conflict in South Africa brought before the Assembly the entire programme of a Member State's legislation concerning the treatment of its nationals on the basis of their racial origin. While her Government did not share the extreme view that the item could not even be discussed in view of the reservations made in Article 2, paragraph 7, the United States had observed with increasing concern the tendency of the General Assembly to place on its agenda subjects the international character of which was doubtful. Action in advancing human rights in accordance with the Charter must be taken with the greatest circumspection and the highest degree of responsibility. The United States from its own experience recognized the difficulty of the problems confronting South Africa, and appreciated how acute the problems of racial relations could be rendered by shifts of population, consequent upon economic development and industrialization, and by the state of development of different groups within a population. Her delegation was convinced that resolution 616 B (VII) was the best way in which the Assembly could discharge its responsibilities. That resolution maintained the framework of solidarity of all Members of the United Nations and set forth a standard of conduct by which each one of them must judge its own policies.

During the debate, a large number of supporters of the seventeen-Power draft resolution expressed agreement with the views of the representatives of India and Pakistan that the South African draft resolution was misleading on the question of competence. Even if the matters enumerated in its preamble were essentially matters of domestic jurisdiction, the agenda item was not primarily or solely concerned with them but with the question of race conflict, which was clearly within the competence of the United Nations and which was affecting the daily life of the non-White population in South Africa. Many representatives declared that their votes against the South African draft resolution should not be construed as an expression of the view that the matters enumerated were not within the domestic jurisdiction of the Union of South Africa.

To dear up misunderstanding of his delegation's draft resolution, the representative of the Union of South Africa stated that the contention that the General Assembly and its Committees, having once rejected a South African draft resolution on competence, could not re-open the question was not supported by the rules of procedure or by the established practice. Criticism had been levelled at the wording of the resolution. The item before the Committee constituted a charge against his country that an alleged situation had developed in consequence of its policies. The substance of the item could not be discussed without touching upon the matters listed in the original explanatory memorandum (A/2183) and the Commission's report. The South African draft resolution did no more than state that the matters constituting the item were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a State. Those who contended that the draft resolution should have been differently worded were seeking to escape from the implications for their own countries of the possible rejection of that draft resolution.

In a final statement, the representative of the Union Government stated that his delegation's position remained unchanged. Its silence on the substance of the question was not due to its inability to refute the charges made against the Union of South Africa, but arose from the legal position that the discussion was unconstitutional. His Government would give any information required on the racial situation in South Africa, provided that such information were given outside the United Nations.

Arguments against the South African position could, he said, be summarized as follows: first, that the question of racial conflict in the Union of South Africa involved human rights and could not therefore be regarded as essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the Union of South Africa; secondly, that because the policy of apartheid of the South African Government was a threat to international peace it fell within the competence of the United Nations; and, thirdly, that the General Assembly was the master of its own competence.

With regard to the first contention, his delegation had shown that neither the Charter nor the Universal Declaration of Human Rights imposed legal obligations on Member States. The second allegation was unfounded. The third allegation amounted to declaring in effect that the General Assembly had unlimited powers, when, in fact, its functions were explicitly defined in the Charter. The Assembly could not exceed those powers.

The South African delegation, he continued, remained convinced that the Commission had displayed partiality in compiling its report and this admittedly incomplete report had been used by certain speakers to present a distorted picture of the facts. The Commission, he declared, had endorsed virtually all the charges made against the Union by India, which, since 1946, had been conducting a veritable propaganda campaign of hostility against the Union. For reasons unconnected with the principles which the Union's accusers were allegedly championing, Members had been given a completely false picture of the situation in the Union of South Africa.

In concluding remarks, the representative of India observed that the most salient point of the debate had been the complete absence of any attempt to defend the South African Government's racial policies. The debate on competence had followed much the same lines as the previous sessions; the chief purpose of the South African draft resolution was to convince delegations that if the Assembly's competence in the particular case before it were once admitted, every aspect of their own governments' domestic policy would be subject to review by the United Nations. The legislation of a Member State, he argued, was relevant in so far as it indicated the existence of discriminatory practices; the question of human rights and non-discrimination had been taken out of the sphere of what was essentially domestic, so that discussion of violation of those rights did not represent intervention within the meaning of Article 2, paragraph 7, which had certainly never been intended to deprive the United Nations of the power to demand that the principles of the Charter be respected. In each instance, the extent of the limitations imposed by that provision should be determined by the whole body of the United Nations and not by the States directly concerned. It was evident, he said, that intervention would not be arbitrary so long as a two-thirds majority was required. Moreover, those denying the competence of the United Nations should consider the effects of such a denial. Were human rights to be systematically denied without remedy? Were the basic provisions of the Charter to be violated with impunity?

The only point in the Commission's findings which had been challenged was the statement that the policy of apartheid represented a threat to international peace. In that connexion, he pointed out, the preamble to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights made it clear that friendly international relations depended on the protection of human rights, whereas, he said, in South Africa the law not only did not protect them but provided for their systematic violation.

The South African representative had suggested that a connexion existed between the non-White civil resistance movement and the Indian Government, but it was fantastic to imagine that the movement was due to any cause except spontaneous resentment against unjust laws.

A general resolution such as some delegations had suggested, affirming the Assembly's belief in the human rights provisions in the Charter, would evade the implications of the specific report with which the Committee was concerned and which dealt with racial discrimination in a particular country. The position in South Africa was unique. Discrimination certainly existed in other countries, but the distinctive feature about its application in South Africa was that it was the dominant element in the Government's philosophy and legislation.

Regarding doubts expressed about the usefulness of continuing the Commission, he said that it had not completed its task and could now proceed to formulate constructive suggestions.

In conclusion he pointed to the gravity of the effects of the situation in South Africa on the non-White populations of the world.

At its 43rd meeting on 5 December 1953, the Ad Hoc Political Committee voted on the two draft resolutions and the amendment to the seventeen-Power draft.

The representative of Bolivia proposed that the South African draft resolution (A/AC.72/L.13) be voted on paragraph by paragraph, but the representative of the Union of South Africa objected that the draft was a complete unit bearing on the question of competence and the Bolivian motion was rejected by 20 votes to 15, with 16 abstentions. The South African draft resolution was rejected by a roll-call vote of 42 to 7, with 7 abstentions.

The Chilean amendment (A/AC.72/L.15) to the seventeen-Power draft resolution (A/AC.72/L.14) was adopted by 41 votes to 4, with 7 abstentions, and the joint draft resolution was adopted in paragraph-by-paragraph votes, ranging from 41 to 7, with 7 abstentions, to 29 to 14, with 13 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 37 to 10, with 9 abstentions.

c. RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY
THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The report of the Ad Hoc Political Committee (A/2610) was considered by the General Assembly at its 469th plenary meeting on 8 December 1953.

The representative of the Union of South Africa introduced a draft resolution (A/L.172), by which the Assembly, having regard to Article 2, paragraph 7, would decide that it had no competence to adopt the draft resolution proposed by the Committee. The South African draft resolution was rejected by a roll-call vote of 42 to 8, with 10 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Australia, Belgium, Colombia, France, Greece, Luxembourg, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom.

Against: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Argentina, Canada, Dominican Republic, Netherlands, New Zealand, Panama, Peru, Turkey, United States, Venezuela.

Chile and Uruguay orally reintroduced the proposal, previously placed before the Ad Hoc Political Committee, to add a new paragraph to the draft resolution proposed by the Committee under which the Assembly would decide that any members of the Commission unable to continue their membership should, if the Assembly were not sitting, be replaced by persons appointed by the current President of the General Assembly in consultation with the Secretary-General. The joint amendment was adopted by 36 votes to 8, with 15 abstentions.

The Assembly then adopted the draft resolution proposed by the Committee in paragraph-by-paragraph votes; the paragraphs of the preamble were adopted by votes ranging from 40 to 10, with 7 abstentions, to 34 to 12, with 9 abstentions, and the paragraphs in the operative part by votes ranging from 44 to 3, with 9 abstentions, to 32 to 15, with 7 abstentions. The operative paragraph requesting the Commission to continue its study of the racial situation in the Union of South Africa was voted on by roll call and adopted by 38 votes to 15, with 7 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, China, Colombia, Denmark, France, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Panama, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom.

Abstaining: Argentina, Dominican Republic, Norway, Peru, Turkey, United States, Venezuela.

The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 38 to 11, with 11 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, France, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom.

Abstaining: Argentina, China, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Norway, Panama, Peru, Sweden, Turkey, United States, Venezuela.

The resolution adopted by the Assembly (721 (VIII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the report of the United Nations Commission on the Racial Situation in the Union of South Africa established by resolution 616 A (VII) of 5 December 1952,

"Noting with concern that the Commission, in its study of the racial policies of the Government of the Union of South Africa, has concluded that these policies and their consequences are contrary to the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

"Noting that the Commission had also concluded that:

"(a) 'It is highly unlikely, and indeed improbable, that the policy of apartheid will ever be willingly accepted by the masses subjected to discrimination', and

"(b) That the continuance of this policy would make peaceful solutions increasingly difficult and endanger friendly relations among nations,

"Noting further that the Commission considers it desirable that the United Nations should request the Government of the Union of South Africa to reconsider the components of its policy towards various ethnic groups,

"Considering that, in the Commission's own opinion, the time available was too short for a thorough study of all the aspects of the problems assigned to it,

"Considering also the Commission's view that one of the difficulties encountered by it was the lack of co-operation from the Government of the Union of South Africa and, in particular, its refusal to permit the Commission to enter its territory,

"1. Reaffirms its resolutions 103 (I) of 19 November 1946, 377 A (V), section E, of 3 November 1950 and 616 B (VII) of 5 December 1952, particularly the passages in those resolutions which state respectively that 'it is in the higher interests of humanity to put an immediate end to religious and so-called racial persecution and discrimination'; that 'enduring peace will not be secured solely by collective security arrangements against breaches of international peace and acts of aggression, but that a genuine and lasting peace depends also upon the observance of all the Principles and Purposes established in the Charter of the United Nations, upon the implementation of the resolutions of the Security Council, the General Assembly and other principal organs of the United Nations intended to achieve the maintenance of international peace and security, and especially upon respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all and on the establishment and maintenance of conditions of economic and social well-being in all countries'; and that 'in a multi-racial society harmony and respect for human rights and freedoms and the peaceful development of a unified community are best assured when patterns of legislation and practice are directed towards ensuring the equality before the law of all persons regardless of race, creed or colour, and when economic, social, cultural and political participation of all racial groups is on a basis of equality';

"2. Expresses appreciation of the work of the United Nations Commission on the Racial Situation in the Union of South Africa;

"3. Decides that should any of the members of the Commission be unable to continue their membership, the member or members concerned shall, if the General Assembly is not sitting, be replaced by a person or persons appointed by the present President of the General Assembly in consultation with the Secretary-General;

"4. Requests the Commission:

"(a) To continue its study of the development of the racial situation in the Union of South Africa:

"(i) With reference to the various implications of the situation for the populations affected;

"(ii) In relation to the provisions of the Charter and, in particular, to Article 14;

"(b) To suggest measures which would help to alleviate the situation and promote a peaceful settlement;

"5. Invites the Government of the Union of South Africa to extend its full co-operation to the Commission;

"6. Requests the Commission to report to the General Assembly at its ninth session."

H. THE MOROCCAN QUESTION

On 19 December 1952, the General Assembly adopted resolution 612(VII), inter alia:

(1) expressing its confidence that, in pursuance of its proclaimed policies, the Government of France would endeavour to further the fundamental liberties of the people of Morocco, in conformity with the Purposes and Principles of the Charter;

(2) expressing the hope that the parties would continue negotiations on an urgent basis towards developing the free political institutions of the people of Morocco, with due regard to legitimate rights and interests under the established norms and practices of the law of nations; and

(3) appealing to the parties to conduct their relations in an atmosphere of good will, mutual confidence and respect and to settle their disputes in accordance with the spirit of the Charter, thus refraining from any acts or measures likely to aggravate the tension.

By a letter dated 9 July 1953 (A/2406), the representatives of Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand and Yemen requested that the Moroccan question be included in the provisional agenda of the eighth regular session of the General Assembly. They stated, in an explanatory memorandum (A/2406/Add.1) that, despite the Assembly's recommendation, the policies pursued by France had aggravated the situation. Approaches made to the French Government to urge it to take liberal measures had been ignored. Mass arrests, deportations, extorted "confessions" had been carried out under the cover of the martial law which had been declared in Morocco in 1914 and had been in operation ever since. The information contained in a letter and enclosures addressed to the Secretary-General (communication dated 29 May 1953, SCA 264/23/02) had, it was stated, given an idea of the conditions prevailing in Morocco. The situation had been further aggravated by continuous threats and attempts to depose the Sultan. Those attempts, which had started in February 1951, had taken a very alarming aspect since May 1953. Such a serious situation, if allowed to continue, would imperil international peace and security. The United Nations could not afford to ignore it and the General Assembly, at its eighth session, should again consider the question of Morocco with a view to recommending to the French Government the action necessary to remedy the situation and to bring about peace in that part of the world.

1. Consideration by the Security Council

By a letter dated 21 August 1953 (S/3085), the representatives of Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand and Yemen requested the President of the Security Council, under Article 35, paragraph 1, of the Charter, to call an urgent meeting to investigate the international friction and the danger to international peace and security which had arisen from the unlawful intervention of France in Morocco and the overthrow of its legitimate sovereign and to take appropriate action under the Charter.

These representatives, except those of Lebanon and Pakistan, which were members of the Council, requested (S/3088) that they be allowed to participate in the discussion of the item in accordance with the rules of procedure.

The Security Council at its 619th to 624th meetings from 26 August to 3 September considered the question of including the item in the agenda.

The representative of France stated that his Government had always refused on legal grounds, as explained in detail to the General Assembly by the French Foreign Minister⁵¹, to allow the United Nations to interfere in its relations with the Protected States of Tunisia and Morocco.

Reviewing recent events in Morocco which had led to the dethronement of the Sultan, the representative of France said that dissatisfaction against the Sultan had been mounting, due to accusations by religious and political leaders of Morocco that the Sultan, instead of being impartial and above factions, had been favouring one religious faction to the prejudice of others and jeopardizing the Moslem faith. The French authorities had been repeatedly petitioned by Moroccan caids and pashas to remove the Sultan and public demonstrations had been made against him. France, acting as mediator, had urged the Sultan to grant the reforms demanded by the people. On 15 August, the Sultan and the French Resident-General had announced the forthcoming reforms but, meanwhile, over 4,000 chiefs and notables opposing the Sultan had gathered round the Pasha of Marrakech, El Glaoui, and, despite the efforts of French authorities to mediate, had proclaimed Sidi Mohamed Ben Moulay Arafa as religious leader. This had been a purely religious decision and the French Government was not entitled to take sides, the French representative said.

If in the larger cities the Sultan's supporters had staged some minor demonstrations in his favour, in the rural areas and among the tribes the Moroccans and their leaders had rallied almost unanimously within the next few days around the new religious leader. Under the present theocratic regime, such a separation of the spiritual and the temporal powers could not be endured, and throughout the Empire an irresistible movement was being launched to deprive the Sultan of a power which Moslems considered to be illegal because irreligious. On an appeal by the Sultan, the French Government had given the Resident General instructions to try to save the Sultan by every peaceful means, but his proposals had been rejected absolutely by the Pasha. In the meantime, Rabat, the capital, had been virtually beleaguered by all the tribes which had converged to depose the Sovereign and it became apparent that the Sultan could be saved only at the price of a bloody conflict. The only remaining duty of the French authorities was to ensure the personal security of the Sultan and the continuation of the Alaouite dynasty. At the request of the Resident General, the Sultan, unprotesting, had taken a plane to Corsica. The same evening, the entire Sherifian Government had proclaimed Sidi Mohamed Ben Moulay Arafa, from the Alaouite dynasty, as the only legitimate Sovereign of the Sherifian Empire. The next day, the ceremonies of allegiance to the new Sovereign had been held throughout the territory without any disturbance of the public order. Thus, France had fulfilled the three-fold obligation provided in article 3 of the 1912 Treaty of Fez. It had preserved the personal safety of the Sultan, safeguarded the continuity of the throne and of the Alaouite dynasty, and saved the peace of the Sherifian Empire from an armed internecine conflict.

France denied the competence of the United Nations in the matter. Though Morocco had remained a sovereign State, it had, by the Treaty of Fez, transferred to France the exercise of its external sovereignty. By the terms of that Treaty, Morocco had agreed that no dispute between France and itself could be referred by it to the judgment either of an international judicial organ or of an international political organ. Any matter covered by the Treaty of Protectorate fell in essence within the national jurisdiction of France, its representative declared. It was actually internal in a two-fold sense: before falling essentially within France's national competence by virtue of the Treaty of Fez, it fell within the national competence of Morocco. An intervention from the United Nations in such matters would therefore be a double violation of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter.

There was no basis for the request to inscribe the question in the agenda; there was no dispute between the French and the Sherifian Governments, and obviously there was no threat to international security.

⁵¹ See Y.U.N., 1952, p. 279.

Besides, the representative of France argued, if the Council decided to grant the request, it would be difficult for it to propose any action. It could not condemn Morocco for deposing its Sovereign and rallying peacefully around his successor, nor could it condemn France for not changing its mediation into compulsion and not maintaining by force of arms a Sovereign rejected by his people. It could not initiate collective measures to restore the Sultan to power, imposing him at the same time on Morocco as Sultan and on the Protecting Power as protégé. The Council should not cast doubts on the position of the new Sovereign by reopening discussions and engaging in recriminations.

The Security Council, therefore, could do nothing other than reject the request, the representative of France concluded.

The representatives of Lebanon and Pakistan, in the course of various statements, insisted that the purpose of the request for the inclusion of the question in the agenda was only to allow the Council to decide whether the subject matter constituted a situation the continuance of which endangered the maintenance of international security. The Security Council could not refuse to be informed about a situation which had alarmed at least fifteen Member States. It should include the item in the agenda and, in any case, give the thirteen countries which were co-sponsors of the request the opportunity of participating in the discussion.

As to the legal aspects of the case, these representatives contended that the matter did not lie within domestic jurisdiction and Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter did not therefore apply. Morocco was not a part of France and it had been determined by the International Court of Justice in a judgment dated 27 August 1952 that France did not have jurisdiction to legislate in respect of Morocco.⁵² Consequently, it could not be claimed that the internal affairs of Morocco were "essentially" within the domestic jurisdiction of France. Moreover, under the Act of Algeciras of 1906, Morocco was a sovereign State and the question therefore was of an international character. Further, the fact that this Act had been signed by twelve States meant that such a fundamental change as the deposition of the Sultan had international implications. It was true that, on account of the 1912 Treaty, Morocco could not submit the dispute between itself and France directly to the Security Council but, it was contended, this Treaty itself was in question and its very existence removed the matter from domestic jurisdiction. Moreover, the consideration of this matter during the seventh session of the General Assembly had already established that the question was not within the domestic jurisdiction of France under Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter. The situation was undoubtedly an international one.

By resolution 612(VII), the General Assembly had enjoined France to take the path of negotiation and conciliation. Disregarding that resolution, France had used every effort to stage a revolt against the Sultan it had itself installed on the throne 26 years ago. In fact, the trend of events in Morocco could only be interpreted as instigated by France to sabotage the Moroccan national movement.

The Sultan, since the adoption of the resolution, had addressed three memoranda to the President and the Government of the French Republic for a resumption of negotiations. France had answered by deposing the Sultan and converting Morocco into a colony.

The representative of Lebanon contended that the French Press, in France as well as in Morocco, had repeatedly expressed the opinion that the events in Morocco had been created by the French authorities because the Sultan had not yielded to French demands. He quoted various Press articles and declarations made by French authorities to that effect.

In 1951, he recalled, when the Sultan had refused to disavow the Istiqlal Nationalist Party, the French Resident-General had threatened him with deposition. But the Sultan had not surrendered and a so-called congress had been held in Fez, attended by El Glaoui, Pasha of Marrakech, together with some French officials, to condemn publicly the Istiqlal Party. Later, a so-called petition had been signed by 270 caids and assistants demanding the dethronement of the Sultan. Of those signatories, the name of El Glaoui had been the only one published. The Assembly of Ulama, the only body entitled to invest or dethrone the Sultan, had immediately addressed a telegram of protest to the French Government. Besides a popular Moroccan reaction, several French organizations had emphasized the repercussions that the violation of the religious traditions of Morocco could not fail to bring about. However, when the Sultan had refused to sign some decrees, the authorities, in pursuance of their policy, had ordered a certain "High Council of 12 Caids and Pashas", under the chairmanship of El Glaoui, to choose a new Sultan. Then the series of events had followed which had led to the exile of the Sultan.

The situation, it was stated, was so tense that peace and security were at stake. Not only might there be conflict between France and Morocco, but international complications might arise from the fact that the Sultan had jurisdiction over the whole Moroccan territory; his removal involved Spain, the Protecting Power of Spanish Morocco, and the international territory of Tangier. Such complications could come also from the strategic interests of the United States in Morocco and from the close cultural and political ties existing between the people of Morocco and the Arab Moslem and Eastern peoples in general. The Council could not refuse to consider a situation which could produce resonant reverberation of such an evidently international character.

The representatives of Colombia, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the inclusion of the item in the agenda.

Emphasizing that the present discussions were limited to the procedural point of the inclusion of the item in the agenda, the United States representative said that, despite the fact that his country favoured increasing self-government in Morocco and elsewhere, it considered that the situation in Morocco did not in fact endanger international peace and security. For the Security Council to depart from its primary function of maintaining peace to deal with other questions under the guise of international security was the surest way for it to undermine its position.

The representative of the United Kingdom recalled that in April 1952 the Security Council had been faced with a very similar situation in regard to Tunisia.⁵³ The Council had then decided not to include the Tunisian item in its agenda. The United Kingdom delegation had expressed its opinion on the matter at that time and again when the Moroccan question had been discussed in the General Assembly.⁵⁴ The consideration of the question would have involved interference in the domestic affairs of a Member State, in violation of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter. Under the Franco-Moroccan Protectorate Treaty, which had been recognized by the Permanent Court of International Justice and the International Court of Justice, the entire conduct of the external affairs of Morocco was vested in France, and therefore the relations between the two States fell within French domestic jurisdiction.

The proper function of the Council was to deal with threats to international peace. Not only did such threats not exist in Morocco, but experience had shown that the United Nations debates on both Tunisia and Morocco were usually accompanied by immediate outbreaks of violence in those countries. Interference by the United Nations, therefore, might well provoke the very international friction which it was intended to

As for the request by the thirteen countries (S/3088) to participate in the Council's consideration of the question, it would be unusual to invite countries which were not members of the Council to take a seat at the table before the Council had decided the preliminary question of the adoption of the agenda. If the representatives of those thirteen countries were invited to make statements, the debate would be inevitably extended far beyond the immediate question of the adoption of the agenda.

The representative of Colombia stated that under the Protectorate system, the protected State retained its full internal sovereignty while ceding to its protector the right to exercise its sovereignty in foreign affairs. Actually, the judgment of the International Court, to which reference had been made, had dealt exclusively with fiscal and jurisdictional matters which had always been within the domestic sovereignty of States. The Court did not and could not state that Moroccan sovereignty in those matters had proved that Morocco had recovered the right to exercise its sovereignty in external affairs.

General Assembly resolution 612(VII) had merely expressed the hope that France would continue to fulfil its obligations under Articles 73 and 74 of the Charter; it could not be interpreted to mean that Morocco had resumed the right to exercise sovereignty in external matters which it had ceded to France by the Treaty of Fez.

On the other hand, Morocco had retained its sovereignty in internal matters. The Council could not pass judgment on the way in which the Moroccan people had acquired a new government without intervening in Morocco's domestic affairs.

It had been asserted that France had violated the provision of the Treaty of Fez under which it undertook to protect the Sovereign against any danger to his person or his throne. But to interpret the provision as meaning that that protection should be confined to one particular Sovereign would imply an obligation to intervene in the domestic affairs of Morocco in support of that Sovereign against his own people. In any case, if the signatories of the Treaty of Fez thought that it had been violated and if they were parties to the Statute of the International Court of Justice, the proper course would have been for them to refer the matter to the Court, in accordance with its Statute.

The representative of Greece stated that he would abstain from voting on the inclusion of the item in the agenda. In the opinion of his Government, the United Nations should be willing to consider any problem within the purview of its purposes and activities, provided such consideration did not run counter to the relevant articles of the Charter. In the present case, however, the views expressed had been so diametrically opposed that there was little hope of achieving any positive solution. Any substantive discussion of the Moroccan case would, he felt, unavoidably result in recriminations and a decision on the matter would ultimately be blocked by a veto. Such treatment could not benefit the situation. He also drew the attention of those countries proposing the item to Article 12 of the Charter, according to which, if the item were on the agenda of the Security Council, the General Assembly, which would meet a few weeks later, could not make any recommendations on the matter.

The representatives of Chile, China and the USSR, on the other hand, considered that the item should be included in the Council's agenda. The representatives of Chile and the USSR also stated that they would support the request of thirteen States to participate in the Council's discussions.

The representative of the USSR stated that, despite what had been said by the colonial Powers, the situation which had arisen in Morocco undoubtedly called for the attention of the Security Council. The Treaty of Fez establishing the French Protectorate over Morocco limited Moroccan sovereignty only as regards foreign affairs. It did not follow, however, that no quarrel between France and Morocco could fall outside the framework of that Protectorate. Furthermore, the 1906 Act of Algeiras, which enshrined in its preamble the principle of Moroccan sovereignty, had been signed by ten other countries in addition to France, Spain and Morocco. This multilateral international agreement recognized Moroccan sovereignty and, consequently, the United Nations was competent to consider the present situation.

Morocco, he said, was one of the Non-Self-Governing Territories falling within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter. The United Nations was thus entitled to take an interest in the situation there. When the responsible Power had violated its obligations and thus endangered international security, it became an urgent duty for the United Nations to deal with the question.

The USSR representative considered that the thirteen States which had requested participation in the Council debates should be invited to take part during the discussion on the inclusion of the item in the agenda because before a decision on that question was reached the Council should acquaint itself with all the relevant facts.

The representative of Chile said that the state of tension now prevailing in Morocco had seriously affected friendly relations between France and that country and also between France and Spain, and therefore constituted a serious threat to peace. The problem had moreover caused deep concern to fifteen Members of the United Nations. There could therefore be no doubt that those events were endangering international peace and security, the maintenance of which was the chief purpose of the Security Council.

The representative of China favoured the inclusion of the item in the agenda, but without prejudice to the question of the Council's competence. The broad fact remained, he said, that there were troubles in Morocco concerning the relations between France and that country. The Security Council should decide on its competence only after more detailed consideration. The representative of France had contended that the recent events in Morocco were doubly domestic in the sense that they were largely the work of different groups of the Moroccan people. It would be most extraordinary, however, if the Sultan could have been deposed and a successor installed against the wishes of the French Government. It had been said that the events in Morocco did not in the least threaten peace and security, but, actually, where deep nationalistic aspirations were not satisfied, momentary quiet could not be construed as peace. There was a further contention that the Security Council could not do anything about Morocco. Last year, some members of the Council had taken the same view about Tunisia. If question after question was dismissed on the ground that the Council could not do anything about them, the world might get the impression that the Security Council and the entire United Nations could do nothing for the promotion of peace.

The representative of China stated that he would vote against the request that representatives of thirteen States be given a hearing on the adoption of the agenda. The Chinese delegation considered that rule 37, under which the request had been made, could not be interpreted to mean participation in a procedural debate such as the present one.

The representatives of Lebanon and Pakistan added that, even if the foreign affairs of Morocco must, under the Treaty of Fez, be dealt with by France, the French Government was only a vehicle for the expression of the foreign policy of the Government of Morocco and had no discretion in the matter, beyond conveying to foreign governments the desires of the Moroccan Government. They asserted that, before being forcibly deposed, the Sultan had handed over to the French Resident General a written request to the Security Council to investigate the grave situation under Article 35 of the Charter. It might therefore be argued that the Security Council had been approached through the proper channels with a request to consider the matter.

The representative of France strongly denied that any appeal to the United Nations or to the Security Council had been transmitted to the French Resident General by the Sultan before his departure from Morocco, either directly or indirectly.

At the Council's 624th meeting, a motion by Pakistan that the thirteen delegations which were co-sponsors of the request and not members of the Security Council be invited to appear before the Council to explain their case (S/3088) was rejected by 5 votes (Colombia, Denmark, France, United Kingdom, United States) to 4 (Chile, Lebanon, Pakistan, USSR), with 2 abstentions (China, Greece). Another motion, presented by Lebanon, according to which the Security Council would agree to listen to two representatives of that group, was rejected by 5 votes in favour (Chile, Greece, Lebanon, Pakistan, USSR) to 5 against (Colombia, Denmark, France, United Kingdom, United States), with 1 abstention (China.)

The provisional agenda was then voted on but was not adopted, receiving 5 votes in favour (Chile, China, Lebanon, Pakistan, USSR), 5 against (Colombia, Denmark, France, United Kingdom, United States), and 1 abstention (Greece).

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

At its 435th plenary meeting on 17 September, the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the General Committee, decided to include the question in its agenda and referred it to the First Committee for consideration and report.

In a letter dated 7 October (A/C.1/L.58), the representative of France informed the Chairman of the First Committee that the French delegation would abstain, as it had in the previous session, from participating in the Committee's debate on the Moroccan question. The French Government considered that such discussion represented outright intervention by the United Nations in matters which fell essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of France, and thus contravened the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter.

a. DISCUSSIONS IN THE FIRST COMMITTEE

The First Committee considered the question at its 629th to 640th meetings from 7 to 19 October. In the first of these meetings, Pakistan submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.59) providing that the Chairman of the First Committee, on behalf of the members of the Committee, should request the Government of France to reconsider its decision to abstain from the debate on the Moroccan question in the Committee and, by its presence, assist the Committee to come to an equitable solution. At the next meeting on 8 October, the representative of Pakistan withdrew his draft resolution since it appeared, he said, that it would not obtain the unanimous support of the members of the Committee.

(1) Thirteen-Power Draft Resolution

On 9 October, Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.1/L.60), which provided, inter alia, that the General Assembly should:

(1) recommend that the existing state of martial law and all other exceptional measures in Morocco should be terminated, that political prisoners should be released and that all public liberties should be restored;

(2) recommend that democratic representative institutions for the people of Morocco through free elections on the basis of universal suffrage should be established;

(3) recommend that all necessary steps should be taken to ensure within five years the complete realization by the people of Morocco of their rights to full sovereignty and independence; and

(4) request the Secretary-General to communicate with the French Government with a view to the implementation of the resolution and to report to the General Assembly at its ninth session.

In the course of the discussion, many of the speakers referred to the statements they had made on the Moroccan question at the previous session of the General Assembly⁵⁵ and at the Security Council's meetings the previous month (see above).

The representatives of Afghanistan, Burma, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, the USSR, Yemen and Yugoslavia spoke in support of the thirteen-Power draft resolution. They pointed out that, far from justifying the confidence expressed in resolution 612(VII), the French Government had replied by deposing the Sultan who advocated Moroccan independence and the re-establishment of a democratic form of government, and by declaring the Istiqlal party illegal. The sole purpose of the action had been to eliminate all opposition to the so-called reforms prepared at the request of the French settlers. Those reforms, which degraded the Protectorate to the status of a colony, had been enacted only two weeks after the banishment of the Sultan. Under the new regime, the votes of the various Councils were assured by the fact that the French residents had 50 per cent of the seats while the remainder went mainly to their followers. The Councils were consultative in nature and were controlled as to the subject of their discussions. Legislative and executive powers had been vested in a special authority composed of two Councils, the members of which were appointed by and were subservient to the Resident General. Under such a regime, which conferred upon French nationals unjustified political rights, contrary to the Act of Algeciras and the Treaty of Fez and to the principles of the Charter and the rules of international law, neither the Moroccan throne and the Moroccan people nor France exercised any authority; the authority was in fact in the hands of the French residents in Morocco, who enjoyed considerable influence on the Paris Government. Their practical programme had been carried out almost completely by the machinery of military occupation. Thus, they had obtained the deposition of the Sultan, the removal of his heir, the increase in the powers of the Resident General and then the implementation of the French plan of reforms.

The General Assembly's responsibility in this matter had become all the more serious since the Security Council had just refused to discuss the matter, and had not even allowed thirteen out of the fifteen Member States which had drawn the Council's attention to the situation to participate in a simple procedural debate which preceded the decision.

The absence of the French delegation was most regrettable. Such a negative attitude certainly did not justify the confidence in France demonstrated by the General Assembly at the seventh session. It was a challenge to the powers of the Assembly itself as defined in Article 10 of the Charter.

The Sultan, after the adoption of resolution 612(VII), had sent to the President and the Government of the French Republic three memoranda, in which he endeavoured to fulfil the hopes expressed by the General Assembly by asking the French Government to enter forthwith into negotiations with a view to developing the free political institutions of the Moroccan people with due regard to the legitimate rights and interests of France and the French settlers in accordance with established principles. In reply, the French Government had brought increasing pressure to bear on the Sovereign to compel him to accept the so-called plan of reforms which he had repeatedly rejected since 1947.

Despite the French representative's statement that the question of Morocco fell essentially within France's domestic jurisdiction, the General Assembly, in deciding the previous year and again in the present year to discuss the question, and by adopting its resolution 612(VII), had confirmed its competence in the matter. Moreover, the General Assembly's competence was based on several factors, such as the violation by the French Government of the Act of Algeciras and the Treaty of Fez, the infringement of the obligations of the French Government under Chapter XI of the Charter, dealing with Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the violation of human rights and of the rules of international law. The General Act of Algeciras signed by thirteen States in 1906 was a kind of international Charter of modern Morocco. It formally recognized the Sultan's sovereignty and independence, the integrity of his domains and the economic liberty of Morocco on an equal footing with all States trading with that country. It was a multilateral international treaty which continued to be operative and to govern the present situation.

As for the Treaty of Fez of 1912, a close scrutiny of it revealed that:

- (1) the Treaty had been imposed by force;
- (2) assuming that it was valid, it did not extinguish Morocco as a sovereign State;
- (3) the rights conferred upon France in Morocco derived from an international treaty, thereby negating the principle of French domestic jurisdiction in the case; and
- (4) the Treaty of Fez was only a link in the chain of international treaties related to the question.

The intervention of the United Nations was essential in order to bring about an orderly evolution through the process of real negotiations between Morocco and France. It was all the more necessary since the Act of Algeciras and the Treaty of Fez had no fixed time-limit. The Treaty of Fez could not be eternal and should not be kept in force if its objectives were attained, nor if France pursued a policy directly opposed to those objectives. In the latter case, the very actions of France would constitute a reason for terminating the Treaty.

Actually, France was undertaking actions and practising policies in Morocco in contravention of the spirit and letter of its treaty obligations. The first important step in French policy was a policy of occupation and direct rule. The French forces were not intended to provide collective security, but merely to help protect French interests against the Moroccans. Another example of that policy was the over-burdening of the Moroccan budget by the cost of a double administration: a Moroccan one, which was only for show, and the real French one. French policy was also leading to the disruption of Moroccan unity and the undermining of its existence as a nation, and of its Arab culture. It was clear that, within the last four decades, France had resorted to a policy which to-day proved to be wrong, inexpedient and impracticable. Thus, the French had arbitrarily divided Morocco into so-called Arab and Berber regions in order to encourage local tendencies as opposed to the common life of the nation. Another attempt to divide the country had been made by the creation of three types of region, namely civil, military, and forbidden regions, thereby restricting the free circulation of the Moroccan people. A further effort at breaking the unity of Morocco had been made by encouraging and subsidizing fraternities in schismatic activities.

Since the end of the Second World War, a policy of French settlement had been officially instituted. The colonists were favoured by the tax policy and were assured of legal, administrative and financial facilities for the expropriation of land and for subsoil concessions. They had the benefit of family allowances, social security and trade union rights. They enjoyed advantages in education and health expenditures. Disregarding the fundamental rights of the Moroccan people, the French settlers ruled the whole territory exclusively in their own interests.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Haiti, Israel, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, South Africa, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay stated that they would vote against the thirteen-Power draft resolution. Some of them based their opposition on the doubts which had already been expressed concerning the competence of the United Nations in the matter. The Treaty of Fez, which had been expressly accepted by all the signatories to the Act of Algeciras, provided that the conduct of Morocco's external affairs was the sole responsibility of France. France could not conduct a dispute with itself and it followed that, if there were any dispute between France and Morocco, it must necessarily be an internal and not an international dispute. The fact that the Assembly accepted information regarding Morocco transmitted by France in accordance with Article 73e of the Charter supported the case. It could not be maintained both that Morocco was a Non-Self-Governing Territory, about which information had to be transmitted, and also that it possessed those attributes of sovereignty which would make a dispute between it and France an international question.

The question of Morocco might have been considered an international one had there been other States signatories to the Treaty of Fez. But that was not the case. Consequently, there was no other party which had the right to pronounce upon the interpretation of the Treaty. It had been claimed that the situation in Morocco had led or was likely to lead to a threat to international peace and security; but there certainly was no other State which feared invasion from France and Morocco. The most that had been suggested, rightly or wrongly, was that peace and security were in danger within Moroccan territory itself, and that would raise an internal and not an international problem. Nor could the clauses in the Charter concerning human rights be invoked, even if such issues were in fact involved, because they were not matters of precise international obligation. Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter was categorical. The sole exception which it permitted related to the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII. No such exception had been made with regard to the application of the clauses in the Charter concerning human rights, nor to the authority of the General Assembly under Articles 10 and 11, nor to that of the Security Council under Article 34.

The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that any matter which was within the domestic jurisdiction of any State was, by virtue of Article 2, paragraph 7, automatically removed from the scope of the Charter as mentioned in Article 10. That Article, he said, referred equally to discussion and to the making of recommendations and gave no grounds for the view that discussion, as distinct from recommendations, did not amount to intervention under the terms of Article 2, paragraph 7,

Furthermore, some of those speakers expressed their fears that, far from having a useful effect, the discussion would lead to a stiffening of attitude, inflame feelings and prevent the parties concerned from progressing towards agreement. Experience had shown, they said, that discussion of subjects of that kind in the United Nations had not best served the interests of the people concerned. The result had too often been disturbances, bloodshed and the suspension of all negotiations on the spot, at any rate for the duration of the debate. This opinion was shared by some representatives who, although they considered the Organization was competent, would not support the draft resolution.

The representatives of Bolivia, China, Greece, Mexico, Sweden and Thailand declared that they would abstain from voting on the draft resolution in its present form.

Some of them underlined that, as the final objective of French policy was to grant self-government of Morocco, the quarrel was not concerned with an issue of principle, but with the question of how soon that objective would be attained. It must be realized, they said, that the pace of evolution was slow in such a matter. It would therefore be unwise for the United Nations to impose a solution or set a time-limit. The whole question was one of creating an atmosphere conducive to the success of negotiations between the French and the Moroccans. Those representatives were ready to support any resolution which would achieve that result. They did not feel, however, that the thirteen-Power proposal, in its present form, could be of any help in the matter.

At its 640th meeting on 19 October, the Committee rejected the thirteen-Power draft resolution (A/C.1/L.60) by a roll-call vote of 28 to 22, with 9 abstentions.

(2) Bolivian Draft Resolution

Meanwhile, at the 638th meeting on 16 October, the representative of Bolivia stated that outright rejection of the thirteen-Power draft resolution might be interpreted in two ways: (1) as giving France a free hand to take such action as it deemed fit with regard to the Moroccan people and as justifying all its actions and possible mistakes of policy; and (2) as a tacit condemnation of resolution 612(VII).

Bolivia therefore submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.61) which provided, inter alia, that the General Assembly, considering that "the purposes and objectives" of its resolution of 19 December 1952 continued to have the merit of "expressing a general desire" for the development of free political institutions of the Moroccan people, and considering also that the inclusion of the present item in the agenda indicated that "that desire" had not been fulfilled, would renew its appeal for the reduction of tension in relation to the question of Morocco and again express its confidence and hope that the free political institutions of the people of Morocco would be developed in conformity with the spirit of the Charter. (For text of resolution as adopted by the Committee, see below).

Several representatives, including those of Brazil, China, Cuba, Uruguay and Venezuela, who had opposed the thirteen-Power draft resolution considered that the Bolivian draft resolution was in fact a re-statement of General Assembly resolution 612(VII) and announced their intention of supporting it. Others, including the representatives of the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Peru and the United Kingdom, said they could not vote for it, either because they formally contested the competence of the Assembly to deal with the matter or because they felt that the draft resolution, in its fourth paragraph, improperly passed judgment on French policy.

At the 640th meeting on 19 October, India, Indonesia and Burma jointly submitted four amendments (A/C.1/L.62, see below) to the Bolivian draft resolution. In introducing the amendments, the representative of India said that they did not change the fundamental objectives of the Bolivian draft resolution but merely sought to give those objectives greater precision and solidity. Without those changes, the Bolivian draft resolution could not contribute effectively to the peaceful realization of the Moroccan people's right to self-determination. The most it could be said to do was to express the confidence that that right would be implemented in due course. Recent events in Morocco had done nothing to justify the confidence reposed in France by the General Assembly the previous year, and to reaffirm that sentiment in the face of events would be both ineffective and unreal. For those reasons, if the amendments proposed to the Bolivian draft resolution were not adopted, India would be unable to support it.

At the 640th meeting the Committee adopted the four joint amendments and the amended draft resolution in paragraph-by-paragraph votes.

The first amendment proposed to refer in the preamble to the "motives and objectives", instead of to the "purposes and objectives", of Assembly resolution 612(VII) and to state that that resolution had the merit of "recognizing the necessity", instead of "expressing a general desire", for the development of Moroccan free political institutions. It was adopted by 33 votes to 15, with 10 abstentions, and the third paragraph, as thus amended, was adopted by 34 votes to 17, with 5 abstentions.

The second amendment proposed to state in the fourth paragraph that it was indicated that "those objectives" instead of "that desire" had not been fulfilled. It was adopted by 30 votes to 18, with 9 abstentions, and the fourth paragraph, as thus amended, was adopted by 31 votes to 21, with 7 abstentions.

The third amendment, to add a fifth paragraph to the preamble recognizing the Moroccan people's right to self-determination, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 36 to 13, with 9 abstentions.

The fourth amendment, to substitute a new text (see below; for the operative paragraph of the Bolivian draft resolution, was adopted by 30 votes to 18, with 9 abstentions.

The first two paragraphs of the Bolivian draft resolution were adopted, with some drafting changes, by 40 votes to 9, with 9 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 31 to 18, with 9 abstentions.

The First Committee therefore recommended (A/2526) to the General Assembly the adoption of the following resolution:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the question of Morocco proposed by fifteen Member States in document A/2406,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 612(VII) of 19 December 1952,

"Considering that the motives and objectives of that resolution had and continue to have the merit of recognizing the necessity of the development of the free political institutions of the people of Morocco,

"Considering that the fact that this item has been included in the agenda of the General Assembly at its eighth session indicates that those objectives have not yet been fulfilled,

"Recognizing the right of the people of Morocco to complete self-determination in conformity with the Charter,

"Renews its appeal for the reduction of tension in Morocco and urges that the right of the people of Morocco to free democratic political institutions be ensured."

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

At its 455th plenary meeting on 3 November 1953, the General Assembly considered the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee. The representatives of Australia, Brazil, Colombia, India, Indonesia and Pakistan made statements along the lines of those they had made in the First Committee.

The representatives of India, Indonesia and Pakistan stated that they would support the draft resolution submitted to the General Assembly. They deplored the fact that the thirteen-Power draft resolution had been rejected in the First Committee. There was nothing revolutionary in that proposal, which undoubtedly was within the competence of the Assembly. However, a majority of the members of the Committee considered they could not support it. These representatives noted that thirteen Members of the United Nations had opposed the fifth paragraph of that draft resolution, thus refusing to recognize the right of the people of Morocco and, implicitly, of any other dependent peoples to self-determination in conformity with the Charter. Instead of that thirteen-Power proposal, the Committee had adopted the amended Bolivian draft resolution, in which there was nothing to which anyone in the General Assembly could possibly take exception. It was full of good intentions. There was not a word in it of condemnation or reproach. It would be most unfortunate and would increase the sense of frustration of the Moroccan people if the General Assembly were to fail to adopt any resolution at all and they therefore appealed for its adoption.

The representatives of Australia, Brazil and Colombia opposed the draft resolution proposed by the First Committee. The representative of Brazil stated that, far from promoting the attainment of the legitimate aspirations shared by all the freedom-loving peoples, such a proposal would only hinder a process of development which had reached a delicate juncture. Only political sagacity, tact, moderation, patience and the necessary time could lead safely to the desired goal.

The representatives of Australia and Colombia protested against the interpretation given to the negative vote cast by certain Member States on the fifth paragraph of the draft resolution. For those who considered that the Assembly was not competent to deal with such matters, the only course open was to vote against each paragraph, since if they abstained, the draft resolution might be adopted. They opposed the text, not on the grounds that it was good or bad, but because they thought the Assembly should not adopt any resolution.

The draft resolution was voted on paragraph-by-paragraph by roll call.

The first paragraph was adopted by 41 votes to 9, with 9 abstentions; the second paragraph by 36 votes to 8, with 15 abstentions; the third paragraph by 35 votes to 14, with 10 abstentions; and the fifth paragraph by 37 votes to 13, with 9 abstentions. The fourth paragraph obtained 31 votes in favour, 23 against and 5 abstentions, and was rejected, having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority. The sixth paragraph, containing the operative part of the draft resolution, obtained 32 votes in favour, 22 against and 5 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, China, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Haiti, Honduras, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Canada, El Salvador, Greece, Israel, Venezuela.

The operative part of the draft resolution having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority, the draft resolution (A/2526) recommended by the First Committee was rejected.

I. THE TUNISIAN QUESTION

In resolution 611(VII) of 17 December 1952,⁵⁶ the General Assembly, inter alia:

(1) expressed its confidence that, in pursuance of its proclaimed policies, the Government of France would endeavour to further the effective development of the free institutions of the Tunisian people, in conformity with the Purposes and Principles of the Charter;

(2) expressed the hope that the parties would continue negotiations on an urgent basis with a view to bringing about self-government for Tunisians in the light of the relevant provisions of the Charter; and

(3) appealed to the parties concerned to conduct their relations and settle their disputes in accordance with the spirit of the Charter and to refrain from any acts or measures likely to aggravate the existing tension.

In a letter dated 16 March 1953 (A/2371), addressed to the President of the General Assembly, the representatives of Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen drew attention to the dangerous situation still existing in Tunisia and the repressive measures which, they believed, continued to be taken by the French Government. They stated that the French Government was insisting that negotiations proceed only on the formula of its own choice and only with a so-called Tunisian Government of its own making. It had, they said, extended and intensified its policy of repression both through its armed forces and through the machinery of the military tribunals in Tunisia. It had taken no effective measures to curb the campaign of terrorism directed by underground organizations against nationalist leaders. That policy of the French Government was contrary both to the spirit of the Charter and to the appeal to both parties in resolution 611(VII) to refrain from any acts or measures likely to aggravate the existing tension.

On 9 July 1953, the permanent representatives of the same fourteen Members and of Thailand requested (A/2405) the inclusion of the Tunisian question in the provisional agenda of the Assembly's eighth session. In an explanatory memorandum (A/2405/Add.1), those representatives stated that the French Government had taken no effective measures to implement the Assembly's recommendations. On the contrary, it had imposed so-called reforms which were incompatible with the aspirations of the Tunisian people. The French Government had created, and continued to maintain permanently unsettled conditions which, if allowed to continue, might dangerously threaten international peace and security. In view of those circumstances, they stated, the Tunisian question was again brought to the attention of the Assembly, so that it might consider the steps necessary to prevent a further deterioration of the situation, and make recommendations for its peaceful settlement.

The question was referred by the Assembly to the First Committee. In a letter dated 7 October 1953 (A/C.1/L.58), the representative of France informed the Chairman of the First Committee that the French delegation would abstain, as it had at the previous session, from participating in the Committee's discussions on the Tunisian question. The French Government considered that the General Assembly could not, without contravening Article 2(7) of the Charter, interfere in the relations between France and its two North African protectorates, and, in those circumstances, the French delegation was unable to associate itself with discussions which, in its opinion, represented outright intervention by the United Nations in matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of France.

The First Committee considered the Tunisian question at its 641st to 647th meetings from 21 to 26 October.

⁵⁶ See Y.U.N., 1952, p. 278.

On 22 October, the representatives of Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen submitted the following joint draft resolution (A/C.1/L.64):

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the question of Tunisia, as proposed by fifteen Member States in document A/2405,

"Recalling its resolution 611(VII) of 17 December 1952,

"Noting that the objectives of this resolution have not yet been achieved,

"Desirous of creating the necessary conditions for the restoration between France and Tunisia of normal relations based on the principle of equality of rights of nations large and small,

"Convinced that full effect should be given to the sovereignty of the people of Tunisia by the exercise, as early as possible, of their legitimate rights to self-determination and self-government in conformity with the Charter,

"1. Recommends:

(a) That all necessary steps be taken to ensure the realization by the people of Tunisia of their right to full sovereignty and independence; and especially

(b) That the existing state of martial law and all other exceptional measures in operation in Tunisia be terminated, that political prisoners be released and that all civil liberties be established;

(c) That negotiations be undertaken without delay with representatives of a Tunisian Government established through free elections held on the basis of universal suffrage and enjoying the necessary guarantees of freedom, with a view to enabling the Tunisian people to exercise all the powers arising from their legitimate rights to full sovereignty;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit this resolution together with the record of the proceedings to the French Government and to report to the General Assembly at its ninth session."

During the discussion, the representatives of Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, the USSR and Yemen who, among others, fully supported the draft resolution, dealt with the history⁵⁷ of the struggle of the Tunisian people for independence. They stated that, by the Treaty of Bardo of 1881 and the La Marsa Convention of 1883 which governed the relations between France and Tunisia, the Bey had entrusted the exercise of only some of his rights to France. Both instruments, it was claimed, had formally recognized his sovereignty. However, the French had taken the position that subsequent actions of the Bey had modified the initial character of the protectorate and established a co-sovereignty—a position which was never accepted by the Tunisians. It was maintained that the policy of the French Residents had been to create a de facto colony and to hope that the legal status would follow. In order to affirm their sovereignty all the Beys had resisted the French representatives, and the nationalism of the Tunisian people had become more ardent with each French violation of the treaties. In 1950, after prolonged resistance to French domination, a new Tunisian Government had been formed, acceptable to the Bey and to the French Government. The new Cabinet was to negotiate such institutional changes as might lead to self-government. In 1951, due to the pressure of French colonists in Tunisia, that policy was reversed and in August 1952 draft reforms were presented which were not acceptable to the Tunisian people.

On 9 September 1952, the Bey had informed the French authorities that he could not approve the draft reforms which had been submitted to him, since study by a group representing all sections of Tunisian opinion had made it clear that they would impair Tunisian sovereignty, legalize direct administration and in no way represent progress towards the internal autonomy which the French Government had promised. On 16 December, referring to the resolution adopted by the First Committee on 12 December, the Bey had informed the French Government that a resumption of negotiations was desirable. The French Government had refused that offer and had preferred to present the Bey with the alternative of consenting to the reforms or being deposed. A general atmosphere of terror and repression was then created throughout Tunisia. The members of the former Government, from whom the Bey had not withdrawn his confidence, were closely watched by the French authorities. The nationalist leader, Mr. Bourguiba, as well as the other qualified representatives of the Tunisian people, were put under arrest. More recently, Farhat Hached, the trade union leader and trusted counsellor of the Bey, had been assassinated. The Bey's palace was isolated by French troops, while military operations and summary executions were carried out. In those circumstances, these representatives said, the Bey had been compelled, on 20 December 1952, to affix his seal to the so-called reforms. The General Assembly resolution of 17 December (611(VII)) had thus been violated by the French Government the day after its adoption. The so-called reforms had in no way affected the basic problem and had made no change in French control over Tunisia. They had continued the principle of co-sovereignty and had vitiated the principle of democratic representation by permitting a grossly disproportionate position to the French colonists. The rural and municipal elections during April and May 1953 had been accompanied by severe repressive measures, martial law and Press censorship. Candidates had been forced upon the electors and they were forced to go to the polls, with threats of reprisals if they did not vote. Despite these measures, candidates could not be found for several towns and the majority of the people had boycotted the elections. Serious disturbances had broken out throughout the country, resulting in a large number of casualties. It was emphasized that the situation constituted a threat to international peace and security, calling for a decision by the United Nations.

If France desired useful negotiations, they would have to be conducted with the true representatives of the Tunisian people, many of whom were imprisoned, and not with the new Prime Minister, Mr. E. Baccouche and his ministers, these representatives said. Only complete independence and sovereignty, it was maintained, would put Tunisia in a position to recognize the work done by France under the protectorate.

Turning to the economic aspects of the question, these representatives stated that the development of Tunisia had been for the benefit and profit of the colonists and French investors. In this connexion, the representatives of Poland and the USSR analysed the economic and social conditions prevailing in Tunisia where, they stated, the average arable area of land per French settler was 200 hectares as against two hectares held by Tunisian farmers. One third of the arable land was held by five or six thousand settlers, it was stated. The Tunisian workers, they maintained, were paid starvation wages, and in February 1953 there had been 500,000 unemployed receiving no unemployment benefits. Foreign trade had maintained its colonial structure, characterized by export of mineral and agricultural products and import of manufactured goods. Under the colonial regime, the lot of the Tunisians had been high taxes, low wages, malnutrition, lack of sanitation, disease, illiteracy and famine.

The representative of the USSR also stated that the United States had already established a network of military bases in Tunisia. He considered that the freedom and independence of the Tunisian people were being sacrificed to the plans of aggressive American circles.

Dealing with the question of the Assembly's competence, representatives supporting the draft resolution argued that France and Tunisia were sovereign States bound by treaties, and no part of the affairs of a sovereign nation could fall within the domestic jurisdiction of another. Accordingly, Article 2(7) of the Charter was not applicable. Even if the Treaty of Bardo and the Convention of La Marsa, under which France was made responsible for Tunisia's external relations, were valid, Tunisia, it was contended, could appeal to the United Nations, because the questions under consideration did not relate to its external affairs but were internal administrative problems within Tunisia's competence.

In reply to an argument advanced by Robert Schuman in Paris that France's obligations in respect to Tunisia were regulated by Article 73⁵⁸ of the Charter, it was argued that Article 73b imposed upon France the obligation to develop self-government in Tunisia. That Article, read with Article 103,⁵⁹ had precedence over any inconsistent obligation, and prevailed over any other obligation or right that might be established by any other treaty. Moreover, it was said, the Assembly was competent to discuss the question under Article 10 which enabled it to discuss any question within the scope of the Charter.

Reference was also made to the precedents established by the General Assembly's action in discussing the observance in Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The representative of Guatemala stated that he would vote for the thirteen-Power draft resolution as it was in line with his delegation's attitude regarding the principle of self-determination of peoples. A similar statement was made by the representative of Yugoslavia. The representative of Mexico declared similar support for the draft resolution except for paragraph 1(c) which, he considered, was not justified since it prescribed the manner in which the Tunisian Government should be elected. He would therefore abstain on that paragraph, he said. The representative of China said that, while concurring with the spirit of the draft resolution, he would abstain on paragraph 1(b) which should have emphasized the bilateral nature of the negotiations and on paragraph 1(c) which, he stated, unjustifiably prescribed the manner of the election.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and the United ⁵⁹ Article 103 provides that in the event of a conflict between the obligations of Members under the Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the Charter shall prevail.

Kingdom considered that the General Assembly was not competent to discuss the question. The Assembly, it was stated, was a diplomatic gathering of representatives of governments, and not a court of justice or a world parliament. Its competence was limited by Article 2, paragraph 7, which forbade intervention in matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State. The treaties between France and Tunisia, it was emphasized, were organic in character and established the general political conditions to which the reciprocal relations of the contracting States were subject. They directly affected the constitutional structure of States and the normal operation of their organs of government. It could not be denied that those matters were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction, within the meaning of Article 2, paragraph 7. In reply to the argument that the question was no longer within the domestic jurisdiction of a State, since it had been covered by an international treaty, it was maintained that the Charter of the United Nations and the Covenant of the League of Nations had been based on totally different principles. Article 15 of the Covenant had established the criterion of exclusive competence, in accordance with which a question ceased to be within the province of domestic jurisdiction once it had been covered by a convention. However, the San Francisco Conference had deliberately rejected that criterion and had adopted the new criterion of essentially domestic jurisdiction. It had also been argued that the General Assembly was competent to discuss any question under Article 10 of the Charter, since that Article would be meaningless if domestic jurisdiction could be invoked to oppose the discussion of any question. That argument concluded that there was a conflict between Article 10 and Article 2, paragraph 7, and that the former must prevail. However, it was necessary to draw a distinction between a general discussion of questions within the framework of the Charter, such as human rights or full employment, for example, and the discussion of particular domestic measures adopted by States within their own domain. If that distinction were kept in mind, it would be realized that Article 10 and Article 2, paragraph 7, were compatible.

The representatives of the Dominican Republic, Haiti, Israel and the Netherlands, opposing the joint draft resolution, argued that the proceedings in the United Nations might serve to inflame passions instead of promoting a just and realistic solution in North Africa. The debate had shown that there were great differences of opinion concerning the Assembly's competence and the extent of that competence. If the United Nations were to overstep its rights, some important States might be estranged by such action. The solution of the Tunisian question would not be facilitated by polemics, or by unjustified pressure or intervention.

There could be no doubt, it was stated, that the situation in North Africa was causing concern. Those who were competent, directly engaged and responsible should handle the situation with tact and wisdom, in order to avoid jeopardizing the healthy development of self-government in those regions and adversely affecting their security. It was argued that the possibilities of negotiation between France and Tunisia had not yet been exhausted. Thus, in his first audience with the Bey on 26 September 1953, the new Resident General, Mr. Voisard, had stated that France intended to continue with the friendly development of Tunisian institutions within the framework of Tunisian sovereignty. The Bey had replied that the uselessness of violence had been recognized and that, as reason had triumphed, mutual understanding and confidence would be restored. The Bey had noted Mr. Voisard's statement and had asserted that by undertaking—by full agreement between both parties—to fulfill legitimate Tunisian aspirations, France would have further reason to deserve the gratitude of his country. It was felt that this propitious atmosphere would not be encouraged by the adoption of the joint draft resolution.

At the 647th meeting on 26 October, the Committee voted on the draft resolution, paragraph by paragraph (for text, see above), by roll-call vote. The paragraphs of the preamble were adopted by votes ranging from 38 to 11, with 5 abstentions, to 29 to 16, with 11 abstentions. Of the first operative paragraph, sub-paragraph (a) was adopted by 32 votes to 19, with 5 abstentions; sub-paragraph (b) was rejected by 26 votes to 23, with 7 abstentions; and sub-paragraph (c) was rejected by 26 votes to 22, with 8 abstentions. The second operative paragraph was adopted by 26 votes to 25, with 5 abstentions. The draft resolution as a whole, as amended, (i.e., with the exception of operative paragraph 1(b) and (c)) was adopted by 29 votes to 22, with 5 abstentions.

In explanation of his vote, the representative of the United States said that he had voted against the draft resolution because it would not serve the cause of Tunisian independence; he had voted against the fifth paragraph of the preamble because it might give rise to serious controversy in regard to the sovereignty of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and their progress towards independence.

The representative of Brazil stated that he considered it discourteous, as proposed in the second operative paragraph of the draft resolution, to communicate to a Member State a resolution which it considered irregular. Furthermore, this paragraph would prejudice the course of future events and place the question automatically on the agenda of the next session. He had therefore voted against the draft resolution.

At its 455th and 457th plenary meetings on 3 and 11 November, the General Assembly considered the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee (A/2530).

The representative of Iceland submitted amendments (A/L.166) to the draft resolution to:

- (1) delete the third paragraph of the preamble;
- (2) substitute for the first operative paragraph a new text recommending that negotiations between France and Tunisia be undertaken to ensure the realization by the people of Tunisia of their right to self-determination; and
- (3) delete the second operative paragraph.

The representative of Iceland said that he had proposed the deletion of provisions which had been regarded as controversial in the First Committee. The amendments, he said, were presented in a spirit of conciliation and in an attempt to show appropriate regard for both parties. He expressed the fear that repeated frustrations in the United Nations, such as those which had recently been seen in the case of Morocco, would unavoidably cause many people throughout the world to lose their faith in the Organization.

In explanation of their votes, the representatives of China, Egypt, Indonesia, Lebanon and Pakistan made statements similar to those they had made in the First Committee in support of the draft resolution. The representatives of Israel, the Union of South Africa and the United States reiterated the stand they had taken in the Committee opposing the adoption of the draft resolution and the amendments thereto.

The representative of Argentina, while affirming the competence of the Assembly to discuss and make recommendations on the question, stated that his delegation preferred conciliatory action as opposed to unilateral expressions of opinion. His vote had also been influenced, he said, by the position taken by the Assembly in "refusing to take a decision in respect of the similar problem of Morocco".⁶⁰

The representative of Colombia stated that the new paragraph proposed by the representative of Iceland would go beyond the provisions of resolution 611(VII), in which the Assembly had confined itself to appealing to the parties to conduct their relations and settle their disputes in accordance with the Charter. Moreover, he considered, the General Assembly was precluded by Article 2, paragraph 7, from making recommendations on the question. He would therefore vote against both the draft resolution and the amendments proposed by Iceland.

The representative of Cuba said that he would vote against the draft resolution and the amendments because he considered that resolution 611 (VII) was still in force and he hoped that the French Government would continue negotiations to bring about an agreement.

The first amendment was adopted by 39 votes to 4, with 10 abstentions.

The second amendment was voted on by roll call and was adopted by 32 votes to 16, with 11 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, China, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Haiti, Honduras, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom.

Abstaining: Brazil, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Greece, New Zealand, Peru, Turkey, United States and Venezuela.

The draft resolution proposed by the First Committee, as amended, was then put to the vote by roll call. It received 31 votes in favour and 18 against, with 10 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, China, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Haiti, Honduras, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Argentina, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Greece, New Zealand, Peru, Venezuela.

The resolution was not adopted, having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority.

J. THE PALESTINE QUESTION

1. Communications and Reports Received by the Security Council

a. COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were received by the Council:

(1) A letter dated 28 February 1953 from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Syria (S/2456), communicating to the Secretary-General his Government's comments upon that section of the report of the Chief of Staff (S/2833) dealing with the work of the Israel-Syrian Mixed Armistice Commission.

(2) A letter dated 9 September 1953 from the acting representative of Israel (S/3093), to the President of the Council, protesting the alleged detention on 2 September by the Egyptian Authorities at Port Said of the S.S. Parnon, a Greek merchant vessel carrying cargo from Haifa en route, via the Suez Canal, to Elath in Israel, and thence to Mombasa.

(3) A letter dated 2 October 1953 from the permanent representative of Egypt (S/3101), alleging that on 28 September Israel armed forces had advanced beyond the demarcation line of the demilitarized zone of Al-Auja and had occupied a position in that area.

(4) A letter dated 15 October 1953 from the permanent representative of Syria (S/3107), alleging that Israel police had recently expelled eleven Palestinian Arabs from the Safad district and had placed them at the Syrian frontier.

(5) A letter dated 29 October 1953 from the permanent representative of Israel (S/3129), enclosing a copy of a letter addressed by the managing director of the Palestine Electric Corporation to the Chief of Staff of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization on 9 October 1953 on the concessionary rights of the corporation, in the Banat Ya'Qub canal project.

(6) A letter dated 18 December 1953 from the permanent representative of Israel (S/3153), alleging that on 14 December the Egyptian Authorities at Port Said had intercepted an Italian vessel, the S.S. Franca Maria, bound from Massawa in Eritrea to Haifa in Israel.

(7) A letter dated 28 December 1953 from the permanent representatives of Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Syria (S/3151), alleging that, on Friday 18 December, Captain Mansur Mouawad, a Lebanese physician in the service of the Army of the Jordan, had been murdered in the most brutal and barbaric manner by an Israel armed group.

b. REPORTS

The Council received the following reports from the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization:

(1) A report dated 8 May 1953 (S/3007) on a recent serious violation in Jerusalem and on the action which had been taken in that connexion.

(2) A report dated 14 May 1953 (S/3015) on the results of the inspection held in the demilitarized zone of Mount Scopus.

(3) A report dated 8 June 1953 (S/3030), informing the Council that conversations between Israel and Jordan delegates to the Mixed Armistice Commission had resulted in the conclusion, on the same date, of an Israel-Jordan Local Commanders' Agreement with a view to suppressing illegal crossings of the demarcation line. The full text of that Agreement was included in the report.

(4) A report dated 19 June 1953 (S/3040), transmitting, for the Council's information, the text of a letter addressed to the Chief of Staff by the Acting Director of the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs concerning the demilitarized area of Mount Scopus.

(5) A report dated 30 June 1953 (S/3047), informing the Council of an agreement made at a meeting on 29 June between the Senior Military Commanders of Israel and Jordan that both parties would take certain measures to curb infiltration.

2. Report of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine

On 4 January 1954, the Conciliation Commission for Palestine submitted its thirteenth progress report (A/2629), covering the period from 28 November 1952 to 31 December 1953. In that report, the Commission stated that, since the General Assembly at its seventh session had not taken any new decisions bearing upon the Commission's work, the Commission considered that it was still guided by resolution 512(VI) adopted by the Assembly on 26 January 1952.⁶¹ The Commission stated that, having failed to obtain results by the procedures at its disposal, and in view of the unchanged attitude of the parties, it had decided to continue for the present meeting at United Nations Headquarters where it would pursue its efforts to solve the questions of compensation for the Palestine refugees and the release of Arab refugee bank accounts blocked in Israel.

The Commission recalled that, under the agreement reached between it and the Government of Israel for the complete release of Arab accounts blocked in Israel banks, the scheme for payment of the first instalment to Arab refugees had come into effect at the beginning of March 1953. The total number of applications filed before the deadline date of 31 August 1953 had reached approximately 3,200, of which some 1,590 had been approved for payment. It was estimated that, when all the applications had been processed, the total value of the payments approved would amount to approximately £750,000. The Commission considered that progress to date on the release of the blocked accounts had been reasonable. It was convinced that the final settlement of that question would remove a constant irritant in the relations between Israel and the Arab States. Consequently, it had decided to pursue with the Government of Israel the question of obtaining the total release of all blocked accounts regardless of amounts.

With regard to the identification and evaluation of Arab property, the report stated that an office established for that purpose was examining microfilms of the Palestine Land Registers and extracting information regarding ownership, area, description and value of the hundreds of thousands of parcels of land involved. The Commission felt that the work could not be completed exclusively on the basis of the microfilmed documents available in New York and that a sub-office must be set up in the area. It had therefore decided to establish such an office in Jerusalem.

The Commission stated that on 23 March 1953 it had received a memorandum from the permanent representatives to the United Nations of the Governments of Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen, alleging that the Government of Israel had recently undertaken the disposal of property in Israel belonging to Palestinian Arab refugees and that the proceeds from the transactions were being used to finance the settlement of new immigrants to Israel. On receipt of that memorandum, the Commission had sought and obtained from the Israel delegation the following information:

(1) the disposal of property had been authorized by the Government of Israel and effected in accordance with the provisions of the Absentees' Property Law 5710-1950;

(2) under the above law, that property had become vested in the Custodian of Absentees' Property and had been transferred to the Development Authority set up under the terms of the Development Authority Law, 5710-1950;

(3) funds realized in consideration for the property had been treated in accordance with the provisions of section 4 (d) of the Absentees' Property Law and the countervalue had been credited to the property for which it had been received; and

(4) the policy of the Government of Israel had been to ensure the integration of those refugees who had been legally authorized to enter Israel.

The report stated that, on 16 July 1953, the Secretary-General had received and transmitted to the Commission identical letters from the permanent representatives of Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen, protesting against the decisions of Israel to transfer its Ministry for Foreign Affairs to Jerusalem. In its reply to the Secretary-General, dated 2 September, the Commission recalled that in March 1949 it had addressed a letter to the Prime Minister of Israel, pointing out that the transfer of Ministries of the Israel Government to Jerusalem would be incompatible with paragraph 8 of Assembly resolution 194(III) stating the Assembly's intention that Jerusalem should be placed under an international regime. The Commission still adhered to that position, it stated.

Finally, the report stated that the Commission had decided to send a liaison representative to Jerusalem early in January 1954. His task would be to carry out the Commission's instructions with regard to the questions of compensation and blocked accounts and to keep the Truce Supervision Organization and the Commission mutually informed with regard to those activities which each might consider of interest to the other.

3. The Incident of Qibya

a. COMPLAINT BEFORE THE SECURITY COUNCIL

By a letter of 16 October 1953 (S/3113), the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Jordan to the United States informed the President of the Security Council that on 14 October 1953 at 9:30 p.m. a battalion scale attack had been launched by Israel troops on the village of Qibya in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. The Israelis had entered the village and systematically murdered all occupants of houses, using automatic weapons, grenades and incendiaries. On 14 October, the bodies of 42 Arab civilians had been recovered; several more bodies had been still under the wreckage. Forty houses, the village school and a reservoir had been destroyed. Quantities of unused explosives, bearing Israel army markings in Hebrew, had been found in the village. At about 3 a.m., to cover their withdrawal, Israel support troops had begun shelling the neighbouring villages of Budrus and Shuqba from positions in Israel. The letter added that at an emergency meeting on 15 October, the Mixed Armistice Commission had condemned Israel, by a majority vote, for the attack by Israel's regular army on Qibya and Shuqba and for the shelling of Budrus by a supporting unit of the Israel attacking forces. The Commission had passed a resolution calling upon the Israel Government to take immediate and most urgent steps to prevent the recurrence of such aggressions. Finally, the letter stated, the Jordan Government had taken appropriate measures to meet the emergency. However, it felt that the criminal Israel aggression was so serious that it might start a war in Palestine. In conclusion, it called for immediate and effective action by the United Nations and especially by those nations party to the Tripartite Declaration of 25 May 1950.

In identical letters dated 17 October 1953, the representatives of France (S/3109), the United Kingdom (S/3110) and the United States (S/3111) requested the President of the Security Council to call an urgent meeting of the Council to consider, under "the Palestine question" the tension between Israel and the neighbouring Arab States, with particular reference to recent acts of violence and to compliance with and the enforcement of the General Armistice Agreements. These representatives considered that, in order to prevent a threat to the security of the area, the Security Council must give urgent consideration to the question and, in that connexion, hear the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization in Palestine.

b. ADOPTION OF THE AGENDA

At its 626th meeting on 19 October 1953, the Security Council had before it a provisional agenda (S/Agenda/626) containing two items:

- (1) adoption of the agenda; and
- (2) the Palestine question (a) letter dated 17 October 1953 from the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/3109, S/3111, S/3111).

Opposing the provisional agenda as it stood, the representative of Lebanon contended that the Council could not treat the text of a letter as an agenda item but that it should adopt a particular topic. He recalled that the Palestine question had been on the agenda of the Council for almost two years in an inactive status and requested the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States to explain to the Council the causes that had led them to reopen the question. Furthermore, he stated, the text of the three identical letters had referred to recent acts of violence and he was at a loss to understand why the representatives of the three Powers would not indicate their reasons for requesting an urgent meeting of the Council by referring particularly to recent acts of violence committed by the Israel army against Jordan. For his part, he formally proposed (S/Agenda/627/Rev.1/Add.1) that paragraph 2 of the provisional agenda should read "recent acts of violence committed by Israeli armed forces against Jordan".

At the 627th meeting on 20 October 1953, the Council, after further discussion, unanimously adopted, with minor changes, the wording proposed by Greece, as follows:

"The Palestine question: compliance with and enforcement of the General Armistice Agreements, with special reference to recent acts of violence, and in particular to the incident at Qibya on 14-15 October: Report by the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization".

C. DISCUSSION IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL

The Security Council discussed the question at its 629th to 643rd meetings, from 19 October to 25 November. Following the adoption of the agenda, the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States expressed the concern of their Governments at the reports of the various incidents which had occurred along the demarcation line between Israel and the neighbouring Arab States, culminating in the Qibya incident. Such incidents represented a grave threat to the peace and security of the area, and the situation should be considered by the Council, which should, however, first obtain accurate information concerning the facts from its representative, the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization, Major General Vagn Bennike. The proposal that the Chief of Staff be invited to report to the Council was supported by the representative of Lebanon.

At the 630th meeting on 27 October, the Council invited Major General Bennike as well as the representative of Israel to take their places at the Council's table. At its 635th meeting on 9 November, a similar invitation was extended to the representative of Jordan.

- (1) Report by the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization

Before introducing the Chief of Staff to the Council at the 630th meeting, the Secretary-General expressed his special concern regarding the outbreaks of violence and the recent incidents which had taken place in Palestine, thereby creating new tensions in the Middle East. Those incidents constituted serious violations of the General Armistice Agreements of 1949. He recalled that those Agreements had included firm pledges against any acts of hostility between the parties. He also expressed the hope that the parties concerned would give full consideration to their obligations under the Armistice Agreements and that they would refrain from any action contrary to those Agreements and prejudicing the attainment of permanent peace in Palestine. He concluded by making a strong appeal to the parties to refrain from spreading rumours and from provocative acts, and especially to avoid any premature actions which would jeopardize the Council's present endeavours.

The Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization read a report concerning the activities and decisions of the Mixed Armistice Commissions giving a detailed description of the situation along the armistice demarcation line between Israel and Jordan. However, before talking about the Qibya incident, he made extensive reference to previous incidents which, he believed, had also constituted grave violations of the cease-fire between Jordan and Israel.

Regarding the Qibya incident, he stated that, following the receipt of a Jordan complaint that a raid on the village of Qibya had been carried out by Israel military forces during the night of 14-15 October between 9:30 p.m. and 4:30 a.m., a United Nations investigation team had departed from Jerusalem for Qibya in the early morning of 15 October. On reaching the village, the Acting Chairman of the Mixed Armistice Commission had found that between 30 and 40 buildings had been completely demolished. By the time the Acting Chairman left Qibya, 27 bodies had been dug from the rubble. Witnesses had been uniform in describing their experience as a night of horror, during which Israel soldiers had moved about in their village blowing up buildings, firing into doorways and windows with automatic weapons and throwing hand grenades. A number of unexploded hand grenades, marked with Hebrew letters indicating recent Israel manufacture, and three bags of TNT had been found in and about the village. An emergency meeting of the Mixed Armistice Commission had been held in the afternoon of 15 October and a resolution condemning the regular Israel army for its attack on Qibya, as a breach of article III, paragraph 2,⁶² of the Israel-Jordan General Armistice Agreement, had been adopted by a majority vote. The Chief of Staff stated that he had discussed with the Acting Chairman of the Mixed Armistice Commission the reasons why he had supported the resolution condemning the Israel army for having carried out the attack, and that, after listening to his explanations, he had asked him to state them in writing; the technical arguments given by Commander Hutchison in his memorandum appeared to the Chief of Staff to be convincing.

The Chief of Staff then reviewed the history of the local commanders' agreement and its implementation. He observed that since 22 January 1953, when the agreement on measures to curb infiltration had been considered, the number of complaints reaching the Mixed Armistice Commission had steadily increased. Efforts, however, had been made to persuade the parties to revive local commanders' meetings which, from a practical viewpoint, had been more useful than formal meetings of the Mixed Armistice Commission. Despite the useful work done in local commanders' meetings, tension had not subsided; the situation was still dangerous and should be watched closely.

In commenting upon the Qibya incident, the Chief of Staff said that that incident, as well as others to which he had referred, could not be considered as isolated incidents, but as culminating points or high fever marks. They indicated that tension had increased to breaking point, either locally or generally between the two countries. He also said that a review of the incidents he had mentioned showed that each of them had been preceded by a period of growing tension.

The Chief of Staff then described the problems facing the other three Mixed Armistice Commissions. The main difficulties faced by the Egyptian-Israeli Mixed Armistice Commission had, he said, arisen along the demarcation line of the "Gaza strip" and in connexion with the El-Auja demilitarized zone, and concerned, for the most part, infiltration into Israel for the theft of materials, cattle and crops from the Negeb settlements. The Egyptian authorities had taken measures to cope with this problem, but their task had been rendered particularly difficult by the presence of 200,000 Palestine refugees in the area.

The application of the Israel-Lebanese General Armistice Agreement, the Chief of Staff said, had given rise to relatively few and minor difficulties, due largely to the fact that the demarcation line coincided with the Lebanese-Palestinian international frontier. Cases of infiltration, almost all from Lebanon into Israel, were normally settled by the Sub-Committee on Border Incidents.

As regards the implementation of the General Armistice Agreement between Israel and Syria, the difficulties which had arisen were connected with the application of provisions relating to the demilitarized zone. Apart from the most recent difficulty, concerning the Israel canal project within the demilitarized zone, the other difficulties were those reported upon by the Chief of Staff during the past two years, namely, the economic situation of the Arabs in the demilitarized zone, the encroachments on Arab lands, the control exercised by the Israel police over the greater part of the zone, and Israel opposition to the fulfilment by the Chairman and United Nations Observers of their responsibility for ensuring the implementation of article V⁶³ of the General Armistice Agreement. Difficulties along the international border between Syria and Palestine, which existed primarily in connexion with the demilitarized zone, could, he considered, be largely solved if the provisions of article V of the General Armistice Agreement were applied in the light of the Acting Mediator's comment, accepted by both parties in 1949, regarding the restrictions imposed upon civilian activities and the total exclusion of military activities within the demilitarized zone.

The Chief of Staff declared that the current situation on the Israel-Jordan demarcation line was, to a large extent, due to the problem of infiltration. That problem was particularly difficult because that line was about 620 kilometres long and because it divided the former Mandated Territory of Palestine haphazardly, separating, for instance, many Arab villages from their lands. To solve that problem there were two methods available to the parties. The first was for both parties to take measures against infiltration and to co-operate with each other by transmitting information. This could be done through the procedure of local commanders' meetings; its results might not be spectacular but it was effective to the extent actually possible. The second method was the resort to force. It reflected impatience with the slow results of peaceful means and a preference, instinctive or deliberate, for retaliation.

In conclusion, the Chief of Staff said that he was aware of the existence of problems other than those he had dealt with which increased the tension. There was in Israel an impatience with the General Armistice Agreements, due to the fact that they had not yet been replaced by final settlements. That impatience extended to the personnel of the Truce Supervision Organization, especially when it tried to exercise supervisory powers in the demilitarized zone. On the Arab side, the usual criticism was that the General Armistice Agreements had not given the Arabs security and that the Truce Supervision Organization was too weak to prevent what they considered to be Israel breaches of the Armistice Agreements. However, those opposite criticisms should not lead to the conclusion that the General Armistice Agreements should be discarded before they could be replaced by peace settlements. Those Agreements had lasted too long not to have lost part of their effectiveness. They still constituted, however, a barrier to breaches of the peace in the Middle East. The Chief of Staff concluded by stating that he had annexed to his report statistics which were based on the records of the Israel-Jordan Mixed Armistice Commission. At his suggestion, these were included as an annex to the verbatim record of the 630th meeting.

At the 632nd meeting held on 29 October 1953, the representatives of the United Kingdom, France, the United States, Greece, Lebanon and Israel asked the Chief of Staff certain questions concerning general conditions, implementation of the Armistice Agreements, the functioning and improvement of the supervision machinery operation and the efficacy of the local commanders' agreement, and the causes and effects of the tension along the demarcation line. They also asked for clarification of certain points in General Bennike's report. The answers of General Bennike were given at the 635th meeting on 9 November, and the Council decided to annex them to its official records. The majority of the questions had been submitted with a view to clarifying mainly the responsibility for the latest outbreak of violence in Palestine. The following is a summary of the main conclusions of the Chief of Staff.

In answer to a question by the representative of the United Kingdom about the alleged murder of a woman and her two children in the village Yahude, as a possible cause for the retaliatory raid on Qibya, the Chief of Staff replied that there had been no evidence to indicate who had committed the crime and that Jordan had given full co-operation in trying to trace those responsible for the attack.

Replying to another question, General Bennike expressed the belief that improved contacts between the police on either sides of the frontier would improve conditions along the border. Police officers were familiar with the local situation and could cooperate professionally with success. The Jordan authorities had for several years advocated that the settlement of day-to-day incidents along the demarcation line should be decentralized to local police officers all along the border. They also felt that when would-be criminals saw the police forces of the two countries acting in close co-operation they were constrained greatly to reduce their activities.

In reply to further questions concerning the operations of the observer corps, General Bennike replied that he had at present nineteen military Observers on his staff and that some of them were serving as Chairmen of the Mixed Armistice Commissions. He added that only five Observers had been assigned to the Jordan-Israel Mixed Armistice Commission. It was not uncommon for them to be called into quick action to obtain a cease-fire and in this they had been very effective on several occasions. With 620 kilometres of demarcation line between Israel and Jordan to cover, and the fact that 345 complaints had been handled so far that year, it was easy to see that the task of the Observers was not an easy one.

In answer to a question by the representative of France, General Bennike said that the operation of the Mixed Armistice Commissions would be improved if, instead of acting as lawyers defending a case in Court, delegates of the parties acted in conformity with the spirit and the letter of the Armistice Agreements. Another unsatisfactory aspect of the procedure was that voting in the Commissions was on the basis of draft resolutions presented by either side. While in some respects the Chairman's position might be compared to that of a judge, he was at a disadvantage in that he could not formulate the verdict by submitting a draft resolution of his own, since that would be tantamount to announcing his vote in advance. The Chief of Staff offered some suggestions with a view to improving the operation of the Commissions.

In answer to a question by the representative of Greece concerning the advisability of strengthening the Observer corps in such a way as to permit it to play a preventive role, particularly at dangerous points along the frontier, General Bennike stated that the experience of the Truce Supervision Organization in its early years had tended to support the view that the presence of observers at certain points along the cease-fire line was helpful in preventing possible incidents. His intention was to station a small number of observers along both sides of the Israel-Jordan demarcation line and hoped that he could thus assist both parties in preventing incidents. But the extent to which this could be done would depend on the increased effectiveness of the local commanders' meetings and the co-operation extended to them by the authorities of both parties.

In answer to a question by the representative of Lebanon as to whether the life of the Chief of Staff or of any of his group had ever been threatened, General Bennike answered that he and the personnel of the Truce Supervision Organization were in Palestine by virtue of the Council's resolutions and that they must rely upon the governments concerned to take the necessary safety measures. He was satisfied that the governments concerned were aware of their responsibilities in that respect. He added that lately the Israel authorities had insisted that he should be accompanied by a police escort while in their territory and that, shortly afterwards, the Jordan authorities had requested his permission to patrol the grounds of his house at night, because of its proximity to the demarcation line. He said that he had given his concurrence in both cases but that he was not inclined to be influenced, either by rumours of threats or by any precautionary measures which the governments concerned might find it necessary, in their own interests, to take. In a further reply, General Bennike admitted that his organization had sometimes been prevented from performing its functions, citing various obstructions encountered from Israel civilians and over-zealous officers in the demilitarized zones.

In reply to questions by the representative of Israel concerning the types of arms used by raiders on the frontier, General Bennike said that the records of complaints and inquiries of the Israel-Jordan Mixed Armistice Commission since 1949 contained no evidence to show that border villages had ever been furnished with Bangalore torpedoes, 2-inch and 81 mm. mortars and demolition charges. Nor did the history of incidents show the necessity of border villages being furnished with such weapons. Moreover, the records showed that attacks against villages and persons in Israel took the pattern of raids carried out by small armed groups using hit-and-run tactics. For defence against that type of action, he could see the usefulness of machine guns, small automatic weapons and even hand grenades, but certainly not of mortars, Bangalore torpedoes and demolition charges. Furthermore, United Nations observers, who had visited many border villages, had never reported seeing weapons other than machine guns, grenades, rifles, automatic weapons such as Bren-gun, Sten-gun and Thompson sub-machine guns, and side arms. In answer to another question as to whether he had called the attention of the parties concerned to a paragraph in the Armistice Agreement calling for a peace settlement in Palestine, General Bennike said that he had not done so except in so far as any of those principles might have a bearing on the actual implementation of any Armistice Agreement in a concrete case.

Finally, in answer to questions submitted by the representative of Jordan, General Bennike said that, in the light of events since the beginning of the year, attacks by regular forces of Israel on Jordan territory were becoming more frequent and had had more serious results so far as loss of life was concerned.

(2) Statements by Israel and Jordan

At the 637th meeting on 12 November 1953, the representative of Israel reviewed the history of the Armistice Agreements and their operation. He described in detail Israel's security problems, stating that Israel was within easy reach of its hostile neighbours, that the Arabs refused to live at peace with Israel and that they refused to comply with the calls of the Security Council to negotiate final peace settlements. He added that the political hatred on Israel's frontiers was reinforced by a violent economic war.

He then gave a detailed historical background of the tension along the armistice lines, particularly along the Israel-Jordan frontier until the Qibya incident. He expressed his Government's profound and unreserved regret for the loss of innocent life at Qibya, stating that it was an unfortunate explosion of pent-up feeling and a tragic breakdown of restraint. However, he said, the circumstances of the incidents were precisely those outlined in Mr. Ben-Gurion's statement of 19 October 1953. The representative of Israel dealt extensively with the problem of infiltration and marauding and described Israel's efforts to secure a transition from the armistice stage to a permanent peace, offering Israel's ideas as to the prospect of a final solution.

He said, further, that his Government had repeatedly declared its desire to find a solution to the deteriorating security situation along the Israel-Jordan border, and for that purpose had expressed willingness on several occasions to enter into discussions with representatives of the Jordan Government. Existing channels of contact and procedure, he said, had not proved effective or sufficient in the increasingly complex situation. Consequently, his Government proposed that senior political and military representatives of Israel and Jordan should meet at United Nations Headquarters without delay to discuss armistice problems, and especially the prevention of border incidents and the co-operation of the respective authorities in maintaining border security.

In conclusion, he stated that the Council should take the following measures:

(1) The tension should be diagnosed truthfully as a threat to security arising from the absence of peaceful relations between Israel and the Arab States. To that primary cause, the Council should justly ascribe the whole sequence of violence which had come to its notice and should remind the parties of their duty under the Charter to harmonize their efforts for the establishment of peace.

(2) Attention should be drawn to the fact that the main objective of the Armistice Agreements, mainly the transition to permanent peace, had not been achieved and that this had a clear priority and urgency over all other subsidiary provisions of the Agreements, which, however, should still be maintained.

(3) Attention should be drawn to the fact that the Security Council's own past resolutions on peace and security, including especially the resolution on blockade and belligerency, adopted on 1 September 1951,⁶⁴ had not been implemented. The Council should also refer to the absence of any effort to implement article VIII⁶⁵ of the Israel-Jordan General Armistice Agreement, notwithstanding the text of that Agreement itself, and of the Council's injunction of 17 November 1950.⁶⁶

(4) The Council could take note of the only conclusion agreed to by Israel and the Arab countries, and indicated very clearly in General Bemmike's report, that the most specific source of current tension was marauding and infiltration into Israel territory, especially from Jordan. The Council, he urged, should express special concern about infiltration which was the source of the original bloodshed and of reactions which had sometimes gone beyond all proper limits. But it should also urge special attention to article IV (3), requiring the restraint of illegal border crossings.

(5) The Chief of Staff and the Chairmen of the Mixed Armistice Commissions should be asked to pay special attention to those provisions of the Agreements and the Council's decisions which had not yet been implemented, particularly the provisions for a transition to permanent peace.

(6) The signatories of each Armistice Agreement should be called upon to enter into direct negotiations with a view to the replacement of the Armistice Agreements by final peace settlements.

At the 638th meeting on 16 November 1953, the representative of Jordan made a statement commenting briefly on the statement by the representative of Israel. He said that there was a difference between individual Jordanian infiltration and the alleged aggression carried out by Israel organized military forces against Jordan and reviewed briefly the efforts of his Government to prevent infiltration by adopting extraordinary and emergency measures. As for the Israel proposal concerning the meeting at United Nations Headquarters between senior political and military representatives of Israel and Jordan to discuss armistice problems, he explained that his delegation had been empowered to express its Government's views on the Qibya massacre and possessed no credentials to enter into any other discussions. Moreover, it seemed to him that if Israel had some proposals to submit to Jordan, the proper channel would be through the Chief of Staff. In the event of agreement, the most suitable plans for such discussions would likely be Jerusalem because of its proximity and facilities for communications with the two Governments.

⁶⁵ Article VIII of the Agreement set up a special committee of each party for formulating agreed plans and arrangements to deal with such problems as resumption of the normal functioning of the cultural and humanitarian institutions on Mt. Scopus as well as free access to the Holy Places and cultural institutions.

In conclusion, he requested that:

- (1) Israel be condemned for the Qibya massacre in the strongest of terms which should match the atrocity and horror of that action of Israel armed forces;
- (2) Israel be asked to proceed with the trial and punishment of all Israel officials, be they military or civilians, responsible for that horrible crime;
- (3) Israel be asked to prevent the repetition of any kind of aggression by its military forces or other armed forces against Jordan;
- (4) no military aid or financial assistance be granted to Israel without specific guarantees that such help would not contribute to further aggression by Israel; and
- (5) all other possible measures be taken without delay to check Israel aggressive and expansionist policy.

At the 642nd meeting on 24 November 1953, the representative of Israel informed the Council that on 23 November he had addressed a letter to the Secretary-General (S/3140), stating that since his proposal for a meeting between senior political and military Jordan and Israel representatives had not been accepted by the representative of Jordan, he formally invoked article XII of the Jordan-Israel General Armistice Agreement, requesting the Secretary-General to convoke a conference of representatives of the two parties to review that Agreement as envisaged in paragraph 3 of that article. He also noted that article XII made it obligatory for the parties to participate in such a conference. He explained that his Government had taken that action because of its growing concern for the future of peace and security in the area. The representative of Israel also commented on the draft resolution before the Council (see below).

(3) Views Expressed in the Council

At its 640th meeting, France, the United Kingdom and the United States submitted a draft resolution, which, in its final revision (S/3139/-Rev.2), would, among other things, have the Council:

- (1) recall its previous resolutions on the Palestine question, in particular those of 15 July 1948, 11 August 1949 and 18 May 1951 concerning the maintenance of the armistice and the settlement of disputes through the Mixed Armistice Commissions;

- (2) note the reports of 27 October and 9 November of the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization and the statements of Israel and Jordan;

(3) find that the retaliatory action at Qibya taken by Israel armed forces and all such actions violated the Council resolution of 15 July 1948 and were inconsistent with the parties' obligations under the Armistice Agreement and with the Charter;

- (4) express the strongest censure of that action calling upon Israel to prevent future recurrence of such actions;

(5) note that there was substantial evidence of infiltration and request the Government of Jordan to strengthen measures to prevent this;

- (6) call upon the Governments of Jordan and Israel to ensure the effective co-operation of local security forces;

(7) reaffirm that it was essential in order to settle the outstanding issues peacefully for the parties to abide by their obligations under the Armistice Agreement and the resolutions of the Security Council;

- (8) emphasize the obligations of Jordan and Israel to co-operate with the Chief of Staff;

(9) request the Secretary-General to consider with the Chief of Staff ways of strengthening the Truce Supervision Organization and to furnish necessary additional personnel to the Chief of Staff; and

- (10) request the Chief of Staff to report to the Council within three months on compliance with the Armistice Agreements with particular reference to this resolution, and taking into account any agreement reached in pursuance of the request by the Government of Israel for the convocation of a conference under article XII of the General Armistice Agreement between Israel and Jordan.

During the discussion, the representatives of these three countries concurred in the view that the testimony of the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization had proved that responsibility for the incident at Qibya lay on Israel whose military forces had been proved to be implicated in the raid. The action, it was stated, was a flagrant violation of the cease-fire resolution of the Security Council of 15 July 1948 and of the Jordan-Israel General Armistice Agreement. Their Governments, therefore, strongly condemned the action which had threatened the peace and security of the whole area.

Elaborating on the question, the representative of the United Kingdom referred to a statement by the Israel Prime Minister of 19 October, in which he had denied the allegation that 600 Israel troops had taken part in the action and that no unit had been absent from its base on the night of the attack on Qibya. The representative of the United Kingdom felt that the statement did not preclude the conclusion that Israel forces were responsible for the raid. Whether the attack had been made by the militia or by regular forces of Israel was beside the point. The apparent unwillingness of Israel to punish those responsible could only encourage a recurrence of such incidents which would cause further retaliation.

Dealing with the allegation that the Qibya raid had been due to provocation by infiltrators, the representative of the United Kingdom said that no one denied the existence of border infiltrators, nor that they involved the loss of life and property in Israel. Although Israel was justified in taking measures to check infiltration, it must be borne in mind that not all crossings were with criminal intent. A reprisal raid such as the one in Qibya would only cause an increase in the number of persons crossing into Israel to avenge themselves by taking life for life. Thus, more and more incidents would occur, the Armistice Agreements would be torn to shreds and general hostilities would follow.

The only way to control that vicious circle, the United Kingdom representative said, was by local co-operation between the police and defence forces of the two countries. For that reason, the United Kingdom Government had always favoured the existence and operation of local commanders' agreements, and had used its good offices to have them restored whenever they had been broken off. Finally, since the personnel of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization was responsible for the peace of the area, his Government considered it of the highest importance that the parties to the Armistice Agreement should respect the officers of that organization and give them full facilities in the performance of their duties. Combined with the proper observance of the local commanders' agreements, that freedom of investigation might considerably improve the general atmosphere. In conclusion, the representative of the United Kingdom said that if Israel was to preserve the sympathy of its friends throughout the world, then it would certainly be well advised not to try to show that the Qibya incident had been justified and, indeed, the logical conclusion of a chain of events.

Formally introducing the draft resolution, the representative of the United States explained in some detail its various paragraphs. He pointed out that the joint draft recognized that the incident at Qibya was one among many which were prejudicial to the establishment of peace in the area, that it took note of the fact that violence was a common result of failure to maintain the security of the demarcation lines and that it expressed the views of the three sponsoring Governments that it was only by the strictest adherence to the obligations of the parties under the General Armistice Agreement and the resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly that progress towards settlement of the outstanding issues between the parties could be made.

In conclusion, he said that the United States realized that there were grave and difficult problems which even the strictest compliance with the Armistice Agreements might not necessarily solve. His Government was, however, deeply concerned with those problems and sincerely desired to help in solving them. The established machinery for the maintenance of security in the area must be upheld and strengthened if those fundamental problems were to be solved in a spirit of justice and good will. While adherence to the Armistice Agreement alone would not bring peace, it was impossible to achieve it without that adherence. The representatives of France and the United Kingdom concurred in these views.

At the 637th meeting, the representative of Lebanon quoted several excerpts from the answers given by the Chief of Staff to the representative of Israel, to show Jordan's record of co-operation with Israel in the Mixed Armistice Commission. He said that the following findings were fully justified by the facts cited in documents submitted by the agent of the United Nations in Palestine:

- (1) Israel military forces had planned and carried out an attack on Qibya in Jordan, on 14 to 15 October 1953;
- (2) the attack constituted an act of aggression against Jordan;
- (3) that act of aggression was not an isolated incident but the culmination of a planned and calculated policy of violation of the General Armistice Agreements carried out by the Israel armed forces;
- (4) that policy and that act of aggression had disturbed the peace in the Near East;
- (5) unless that policy was curbed and that act of aggression was properly punished, the maintenance of international peace and security in the Near East was likely to be endangered; and
- (6) the recurrence of such an aggression by Israel would certainly lead to a breach of the peace in the Near East.

He suggested that the Council should request Israel to:

- (1) take all the necessary measures to bring to justice the perpetrators of that act;
- (2) make a general request that no military or economic assistance be given to Israel without proper guarantees that it would refrain from such acts; and
- (3) make it dear to Israel that any repetition of such acts would lead the Council to consider the appropriate measures to be taken under Chapter VII of the Charter.

Later, at the 643rd meeting on 25 November, in explaining his vote on the draft resolution, the representative of Lebanon requested that a systematic treatise which he had prepared on "the system of Qibya" be annexed to the proceedings. He said that an honest examination of the fourteen propositions found therein would reveal that the condemnation of Israel by the Council had been very mild and that a much stronger condemnation was fully justifiable. As for the larger question of peace in the Middle East he made six observations:

(1) The representative of Israel had spoken of invoking article XII of the Jordan-Israel Armistice Agreement allegedly to review the relations between the two countries. Such a review would however reveal the fact that the Armistice Agreements had been systematically flouted by Israel.

(2) The representative of Israel had said derisively that the notions that the Arab States had a "sovereign right to maintain the Armistice Agreement in perpetuity" and a sovereign right never to talk to Israel were both false. But the Arabs could not be forced to change the Armistice Agreements nor to talk to Israel.

(3) The representative of Israel had threatened that the adoption of the three-Power resolution would be prejudicial to peace and would affect adversely the entire atmosphere and effort of peace. The truth was the exact opposite.

(4) Israel's demand for a negotiated peace settlement was possible only if: (a) Israel scrupulously respected the Armistice Agreements; (b) implemented the standing decisions of the United Nations regarding boundaries, the internationalization of Jerusalem and the Arab refugees; and (c) the Arabs were strengthened so that they would not feel themselves at the mercy of Israel.

(5) So long as Israel's policy and outlook were marked by ambition and arrogance the situation would be governed by three irreducible facts: (a) the Arabs did not trespass on anybody's territory—the Jews had come and taken away a piece of Arab territory and had driven away the original Arab inhabitants of that territory; (b) Israel needed the Arabs, whereas the Arabs did not need Israel; (c) Israel, because it was now strong, could fume and threaten but the Arabs would not remain eternally weak.

(6) Peace was the fruit of justice, firmness and truth with respect both to Israel and to the Arabs.

The Lebanese representative criticized the resolution for failing to:

(1) request Israel to bring to justice those responsible for the Qibya massacre;

(2) request Israel to pay compensation for the loss of life and damage to property caused by that aggression;

(3) contain a warning to Israel that, if such attacks were repeated in the future, the Council would have to deal with the matter under Chapter VII of the Charter;

(4) refer to compliance with the General Assembly resolutions on Palestine as a condition for the peaceful and lasting settlement of the issues outstanding between the parties; and

(5) emphasize that it was only the Government of Israel which was not co-operating fully with the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization.

On the other hand, the resolution, he said, had the following decided merits:

(1) It condemned the Qibya incident as a violation of the cease-fire provisions of the Council's resolution of 15 July 1948, of the Armistice Agreement and of the Charter.

(2) It called only upon Israel to take effective measures to prevent all such actions in the future, thereby showing that only Israel was able and willing to repeat such an action.

(3) It recognized that the Government of Jordan had already taken measures to prevent the border crossings.

(4) It adopted the thesis of Jordan and General Bennike on the usefulness of the co-operation of local security forces to curb infiltration.

(5) It emphasized that respect for and compliance with the General Armistice Agreement was the only condition towards a lasting peaceful settlement of the issues outstanding between the parties.

(6) It provided for the strengthening of the Truce Supervision Organization.

In view of the merits of the resolution he had not voted against it.

The representative of Israel, speaking at the 642nd meeting, analysed the joint draft resolution, stating that by omitting a direct call for a peace negotiation the sponsors had yielded to the lack of will on the part of the Arab States to hear the concept of peace frankly proclaimed.

He said that there was no radical method of improving the situation in the Middle East except by direct contact and negotiation. He criticized the joint draft resolution as being inaccurate in certain respects, notably in its finding on the Qibya raid, and selective in other respects, notably in the omission of any special reference in its preamble to those resolutions which placed obligations upon the Arab Governments. The draft resolution, he said, dealt disproportionately with the admittedly regrettable incident at Qibya, putting it above other cases, many of which, unlike Qibya, had been of a uniformly aggressive character and had taken a far greater toll of life. Israel most severely objected to what was almost an acceptance and a condonation of existing Jordan policies in respect of infiltrations or incursions which were the source of Israel's current security problems. Finally, his Government believed it a great error for the Council to abandon its invariable policy of calling upon the Governments concerned to negotiate a final settlement of all questions outstanding between them.

The representative of Pakistan made a detailed statement in which he analysed the statement of the representative of Israel. He reviewed briefly the history of the Palestine question, describing the alleged responsibility of those who had been originally responsible for bringing about the current state of affairs in Palestine, as well as the alleged responsibility of both sides concerning the incidents. He then dealt with the Qibya incident, quoting extensively from the reports of the Chief of Staff did not wish to cooperate in the maintenance of the Armistice Agreements and that the raid against Qibya had been carried out by the regular army of Israel. As for the joint draft resolution, he found the paragraph censuring Israel wholly inadequate, since it described the raid on Qibya as a retaliatory act. He asked what had been the cause of such retaliation. Moreover, he found no provision in the joint draft regarding compensation to those who had lost their lives or had been wounded at Qibya.

Later, in explaining his vote, he said that his delegation had voted for the resolution since its first objection had been met by the firm conclusion that the Qibya aggression had been undertaken by the Israel army, presumably in pursuance of general directions based upon policy or a particular direction received from the Government of Israel. His delegation had been confirmed in that conclusion by a complete absence of any explanation by the representative of Israel as to who, as the result of its investigations, had carried out that expedition. His delegation had refrained from presenting any amendments, first, in the interest of expedition, and, secondly, because it had felt that the majority of the Council had not been ready to entertain any amendments.

The representatives of Chile, China, Colombia, Denmark and Greece also made statements at the Council's 643rd meeting on 25 November, explaining their votes in favour of the joint draft resolution.

These representatives deplored the Qibya incident, which, it was stated, was the worst of a series of incidents and, as had been shown by the reports of the Chief of Staff, constituted a gross violation of the Armistice Agreement. The terms of the resolution, these representatives held, were fully justified. The three Powers had tried to be impartial and fair, as was shown, the representative of Greece stated, by their adding to the second revision of their text a paragraph concerning Israel's proposal regarding the implementation of article XII of the Israel-Jordan Armistice Agreement. The representative of Denmark pointed out that the resolution, while referring to Qibya, declared that all such actions constituted a violation of the Council's resolution of 15 July 1948, as well as the General Armistice Agreement. He expressed the hope that the additional personnel to be placed at the disposal of the Chief of Staff would be sufficient to be effective. All these representatives expressed the hope for the earliest possible permanent settlement of the problems dividing Israel and the Arab States.

d. RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE SECURITY COUNCIL

The joint draft resolution of France, the United Kingdom and the United States (S/3139/Rev.2) was adopted by the Council, at its 642nd meeting on 24 November 1953, by 9 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (Lebanon and the USSR). It read as follows:

"The Security Council,

"Recalling its previous resolutions on the Palestine question, particularly those of 15 July 1948, 11 August 1949, and 18 May 1951 concerning methods for maintaining the armistice and resolving disputes through the Mixed Armistice Commissions,

"Noting the reports of 27 October 1953 and 9 November 1953 to the Security Council by the Chief of Staff of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization and the statements to the Security Council by the representatives of Jordan and Israel,

"Finds that the retaliatory action at Qibya taken by armed forces of Israel on 14-15 October 1953 and all such actions constitute a violation of the cease-fire provisions of the Security Council resolution of 15 July 1948 and are inconsistent with the Parties' obligations under the General Armistice Agreement and the Charter;

"Expresses the strongest censure of that action which can only prejudice the chances of that peaceful settlement which both Parties in accordance with the Charter are bound to seek, and calls upon Israel to take effective measures to prevent all such actions in the future;

"Takes note of the fact that there is substantial evidence of crossing of the demarcation line by unauthorized persons often resulting in acts of violence and requests the Government of Jordan to continue and strengthen the measures which they are already taking to prevent such crossings;

"Recalls to the Governments of Israel and Jordan their obligations under Security Council resolutions and the General Armistice Agreement to prevent all acts of violence on either side of the demarcation line;

"Calls upon the Governments of Israel and Jordan to ensure the effective co-operation of local security forces;

"Reaffirms that it is essential in order to achieve progress by peaceful means toward a lasting settlement of the issues outstanding between them that the Parties abide by their obligations under the General Armistice Agreement and the resolutions of the Security Council;

"Emphasizes the obligation of the Governments of Israel and Jordan to co-operate fully with the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization;

"Requests the Secretary-General to consider with the Chief of Staff the best ways of strengthening the Truce Supervision Organization and to furnish such additional personnel and assistance as the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization may require for the performance of his duties;

"Requests the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization to report within three months to the Security Council with such recommendations as he may consider appropriate on compliance with and enforcement of the General Armistice Agreements with particular reference to the provisions of this resolution, and taking into account any agreement reached in pursuance of the request by the Government of Israel for the convocation of a conference under article XII of the General Armistice Agreement between Israel and Jordan."

4. Complaint by Syria against Israel Concerning Work on the West Bank of the River Jordan in the Demilitarized Zone

a. COMMUNICATIONS

In a letter dated 12 October 1953 (S/3106), the permanent representative of Syria to the United Nations informed the Secretary-General that on 2 September 1953 the Israel authorities had started works to change the bed of the river Jordan in the central sector of the demilitarized zone between Syria and Israel in order to make it flow through Israel-controlled territory. Moreover, partial mobilization had been carried out behind the central sector of that zone. The Israel authorities, the letter said, had thus violated the Israel-Syrian General Armistice Agreement, particularly article V of that Agreement under which no military force might be stationed in the zone. That zone, it was stated, was not subject to the authority of either of the parties but was the responsibility of local authorities under the Chairman of the Mixed Armistice Commission. Consequently, the Israel authorities were not entitled to undertake any works in any sectors of the demilitarized zone. It was further alleged that the effect of the works was to deprive the riparian inhabitants along the Jordan of the water they needed to irrigate their land. Article V of the General Armistice Agreement explicitly provided for the exercise of normal activities by the population of the demilitarized zone. The rights of Syrian riparian landowners to the waters of the Jordan, which separated Syria from Palestine, were of long standing and had never been disputed. Furthermore, article II of the General Armistice Agreement provided that neither of the parties should gain any military advantage; by attempting to change the course of the Jordan, the Israel authorities had gained a military advantage in contravention of this article. Thus, the Israel authorities had violated the provisions of the Israel-Syrian General Armistice Agreement by:

(1) infringing the rights of the inhabitants of the demilitarized zone;

(2) preventing the Syrian riparian population from irrigating their land with water from the Jordan; and

(3) militarily occupying a sector of the demilitarized zone.

The letter finally recalled that the Syrian Government had brought the above facts to the attention of General Vagn Bennike, Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization for Palestine. As Chairman of the Israel-Syrian Mixed Armistice Commission, General Bennike had requested the Israel authorities to stop the operations begun in the demilitarized zone. Despite the explicit terms of that request, the Israel authorities had refused to comply with it. Such an attitude was both arbitrary and illegal and constituted a proof that the Israel authorities did not mean to respect the Armistice Agreement which they had signed on 20 July 1949.

In another letter, dated 16 October 1953 (S/3108/Rev.1), the permanent representative of Syria addressed a similar complaint to the President of the Security Council, requesting him to convene a meeting of the Council so that that question might be placed on its agenda and a prompt decision be taken.

On 23 October 1953, the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization submitted a report (S/3122) containing the text of a decision he had taken on 23 September 1953, to the effect that the authority which had started work in the demilitarized zone on 2 September 1953 was instructed to cease working in the zone so long as an agreement was not arranged. The report also contained a letter dated 24 September from the Israel Foreign Minister and the comments made thereupon by the Chief of Staff.

b. SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION OF 27 OCTOBER

In 1953, the Security Council considered the question at its 629th to 654th meetings, between 27 October and 29 December.

At the 629th meeting on 27 October, the representatives of Syria and Israel were invited to the Council's table. At the outset of that meeting, the representative of Pakistan stated that, before the Council proceeded to hear the parties upon the merits of the case, it would be wise to endorse the request made by the Chairman of the Israel-Syrian Mixed Armistice Commission on 23 September 1953 that the works might be suspended pending the consideration of the case by the Security Council. He then submitted a draft resolution (S/3125/Rev.1), by which the Council would, inter alia, request the State of Israel that the authority which had started work in the demilitarized zone on 2 September 1953 be instructed to cease working in the zone pending the consideration of the question by the Security Council.

At the 631st meeting on 27 October, the representative of Israel informed the Council that he was empowered to state that his Government was willing to arrange such a temporary suspension of the works in the demilitarized zone for the purpose of facilitating the Council's consideration of the question, without prejudice to the merits of the case itself.

The representative of France declared that the statement of the representative of Israel appeared to have made the Pakistan draft resolution unnecessary. He felt that the Council should take note, in the form of a resolution, of the undertaking given by the Israel delegation, express its satisfaction with it and also request the Truce Supervision Organization to supervise its implementation during the Council's deliberations. He then submitted his suggestion in the form of a draft resolution (S/3128), which was unanimously adopted, as follows:

"The Security Council,

"Having taken note of the report of the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization dated 23 October 1953 (S/3122), "Desirous of facilitating the consideration of the question, without however prejudicing the rights, claims or position of the parties concerned,

"Deems it desirable to that end that the works started in the Demilitarized Zone on 2 September 1953 should be suspended during the urgent examination of the question by the Security Council,

"Notes with satisfaction the statement made by the Israel representative at the 631st meeting regarding the undertaking given by his Government to suspend the works in question during that examination,

"Requests the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization to inform it regarding the fulfilment of that undertaking."

At the 633rd meeting on 30 October, the President informed the Council of the receipt of a letter from the Chief of Staff, pursuant to the Council's request of 27 October, informing it that the works on the project had stopped on 28 October at midnight. He added that some water was presently leaking into the Canal and that divers were attempting to plug the leaks in the concrete dam.

c. STATEMENTS BEFORE THE COUNCIL

At the 633rd meeting, the representative of Syria made a detailed statement explaining the reasons his Government had requested the inclusion of the item in the agenda. He outlined the history of the development of the dispute, considered the nature of the Armistice Agreement, particularly article V, recalled the history of the demilitarized zone and described the military advantages to Israel accruing from the project. He stated that the object of the works was to divert the Jordan River, which was an essential element of civilian life in the demilitarized zone, into Israel-controlled territory, making it a military factor within Israel's borders. The works were being carried out in defiance of the Armistice Agreement and the decision of General Bennike and they showed a policy by Israel of defying United Nations machinery and disregarding the Armistice Agreements.

He declared that the Security Council should ask Israel to refrain from prejudicing the rights, claims or positions of the other side which had been safeguarded by the Armistice Agreements. He asked that the status quo should be restored in the demilitarized zone. The representative of Syria suggested that, in order to strengthen the machinery for the implementation of the Armistice Agreement, the Council should uphold the local international authority by practical and unambiguous decisions and build up that machinery by providing additional personnel.

The representative of Israel, in a preliminary statement, gave a brief history of the dispute and said that the Security Council had already rejected the notion of a Syrian veto over legitimate development projects of Israel in its decision in the case of the Huleh Marshes in 1951. He also dealt with the alleged military aspect of the dispute and said that the hydro-electric project involving the construction of the Jordan Canal was a legitimate civilian project and of vital economic importance for Israel. The canal, when completed, could easily be integrated either into national or regional water projects conducive to the general welfare of the region. He said that the Jordan waters which were the subject of the present dispute did not pass through Syria at a single point and therefore the Syrian complaint was completely unfounded. As a matter of general equity, Syria, which could not itself use the water, should not be encouraged to deny its use to Israel, for which the Jordan was the only source of water.

Further, the representative of Israel contended, the powers of the Chief of Staff in the matter, defined in General Bennike's letter of 20 October, related to the protection of land and water interests in the demilitarized zone and the fulfilment of the role of the zone under the Armistice Agreement. That letter clearly stated that those were the only issues which would determine whether Israel had the right to continue the project. The representative of Israel said that the project did not affect land or water rights, since the Government of Israel had prohibited land encroachments, however slight, and had taken care that sufficient water was available for all existing irrigation needs. The Government of Israel was prepared to give an undertaking to that effect and to discuss procedures whereby such an undertaking could be statutorily invoked, even in an area where Israel had no legal duty to make such provisions. As regards the question of military advantage, the Government of Israel adhered to the terms of the Armistice Agreement, according to which the consideration of military advantage was relevant only to the truce, which had now been replaced by the armistice. Moreover, the practical effect of the new canal would be to make the aggressive movement of armed forces in either direction through the demilitarized zone more difficult than it was at present, and the maintenance of the exact topography of the zone was not something which either party was entitled to invoke.

At the 636th meeting on 10 November 1953, the Council invited Major General Vagn Bennike, Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization for Palestine, to take part in the Council's deliberations.

At the same meeting, the representative of Syria made a detailed statement in answer to the statement of the representative of Israel. He pointed out the differences between the situation regarding the Huleh marshes and the present case.

He stated that Israel's action to divert the Jordan River from its bed without any prior arrangement based on the consent of both sides to the Armistice Agreement was an unwarranted unilateral action and a fait accompli which had grave military and other consequences and was a breach of the armistice. Israel, instead of interpreting the Armistice Agreement in terms of article 7 or seeking to have it modified under article 8, chose to interpret or modify the Agreement unilaterally whenever it did not suit its purposes. Moreover, the project was not the only one that Israel or others could undertake in order to utilize the Jordan waters. In fact, the execution of that project would thwart other projects such as the TVA-Jordan project. All such projects should be kept as tentative plans until suitable international arrangements could be made with the consent of the authorities legitimately concerned. Syria's opposition was not to projects, as such, but to unilateral actions unjustly affecting all other projects. The representative of Syria urged that the Armistice Agreement must be fully and unhesitatingly implemented so as to close the door to arrogant unilateral actions and faits accomplis and to contribute to confidence in international arrangements and in the authority of international institutions and law. That confidence was an essential prerequisite for dealing with Near Eastern issues. The Council's decisions should be aimed not at changing, but at implementing, the Agreement until other arrangements were arrived at by the mutual and free consent of the two parties to that Agreement.

The representative of Lebanon stated that, from the report of the Chief of Staff as well as from the various statements made to the Council, the following seven facts were established beyond any doubt:

- (1) large scale work had been started unilaterally by one party in the demilitarized zone created by the Israel-Syrian Mixed Armistice Agreement without the agreement of or consultation with the other party;
- (2) the work had been started and continued without a prior authorization from the Chief of Staff, who was responsible for the implementation of article V of the Armistice Agreement relating to the zone;
- (3) although the project affected the water, lands and properties of the inhabitants of the zone, no previous arrangement had been made with the inhabitants regarding their rights and properties;
- (4) the work would bring about substantial modifications in the geophysical features of the zone;
- (5) the work had military consequences which were all, according to the Chief of Staff, who was the only objective and neutral authority on the question, to the advantage of one party to the Agreement;
- (6) the work would result in a definite integration of the zone into the economic and hydro-electric system of one of the two parties, an integration not stipulated in the Armistice Agreement and not permitted by it; and
- (7) the work would produce a total change in the flow of the waters of an international river, the Jordan River.

These facts, the representative of Lebanon argued, constituted a violation of both the letter and the spirit of the Armistice Agreement and, whichever was the party responsible for this violation, it should not be allowed to resume the work until it had reached an understanding with the other party.

The canal project, he said, went beyond the Huleh case, as pointed out by the Chief of Staff, in that it involved not only the supervision of the gradual restoration of normal civilian life in the demilitarized zone, but prejudiced the ultimate settlement, in contravention of the Armistice Agreement. It also raised the problem of the military objective of creating and maintaining the demilitarized zone, thereby amounting to a unilateral alteration of some clauses of the Agreement. Moreover, he added, the Council's decision in the Huleh case had proved ineffective. The decision, which, among other things, had called for the return of Arab civilians removed by Israel from the demilitarized zone and for the withdrawal of Israeli police units from the zone, had not been faithfully implemented by Israel.

Regarding the legal status of the demilitarized zone, the representative of Lebanon stated that, regardless of the Israel or Syrian claims to sovereignty, the interpretation given by United Nations officials and the Security Council was that, until final settlement was reached, no State was sovereign in the zone. The Israel project established a de facto situation which prejudiced the question of sovereignty in its favour to the disadvantage of other States.

As regards the contention that the whole economic life of a State was involved in the Canal project, he stated that the question involved was one of principle, involving the whole status of the demilitarized zone and, even more, the question of respect for international obligations.

The representative of Pakistan requested that the Chief of Staff or Secretariat might answer the following questions:

(1) How the frontier of Israel as visualized in the General Assembly resolution of 1947 ran through the demilitarized zone?

(2) What were the existing and past uses in respect of irrigation or other advantages enjoyed by Syrian nationals within Syrian territory from the disputed stretch of the river?

(3) What was the area of the Buteiha Farm which received irrigation from the Jordan and whether there were other lands that derived advantage from the river?

(4) Would it be possible at a later stage to convert the work into an irrigation project?

(5) If so, what was the maximum quantity of water that might at any time be withdrawn from the river for that use? Would the volume of water or the volume of salinity of Lake Tiberias be affected?

(6) How would the advantages derived by the Kingdom of Jordan be affected?

The President suggested that in view of the technical nature of these questions, General Bennike or experts conducting a study on the spot might answer them. The latter course, he said, might possibly be proposed by a member of the Council. As to the final point, the President believed that it would be up to General Bennike to decide whether to supply additional comments.

At the 645th meeting of the Council on 3 December 1953, the Chief of Staff replied to some of the questions submitted by the representative of Pakistan. He explained that the water from the stretch of the River Jordan which would be affected by the completion of the projected canal was being used for irrigating lands, watering cattle and operating mills within the boundaries of Syria. The lands under irrigation and the water mills in operation—seven altogether—were in the area of Buteiha Farm. He further stated that he had been informed that the area in that farm at present under irrigation was 18,280 dunams, or approximately 4,570 acres; the area under irrigation was only a small part of the total area of Buteiha Farm. He was not in a position to state the extent to which the area not at present irrigated was capable of receiving irrigation. To his knowledge, the irrigated lands of Buteiha Farm were the only lands in Syria which received irrigation from the stretch of the River Jordan in question. With regard to the demilitarized zone, he had been informed that approximately 5,000 dunams of land—2,924 of which belonged to the owners of Buteiha Farm—received irrigation from that stretch of the river. Finally, in answer to the last set of questions, he declared that he was not in a position to give an adequate answer. He added, however, that under the Israel scheme which had been outlined to him, the water of the River Jordan which would be diverted into the projected canal would be returned to Lake Tiberias, so that the completion of the canal would affect only the stretch of the river north of Lake Tiberias. In such circumstances, the problem which arose was that of existing uses based on, and advantages received from, that stretch of the river. Another problem would arise if, following a conversion of the Israel project into an irrigation project, the volume of the waters of Lake Tiberias and of the River Jordan below that lake had been reduced and their salinity consequently increased. In that event, the interests of the State of Jordan would be affected.

At the same meeting, the representative of Pakistan stated that the basic question was not whether the project was beneficial to Israel, but whether the project contravened the Armistice Agreement. According to the United Nations, sovereignty in the demilitarized zone was in abeyance unless there was an agreement to the contrary between the parties. Further, the representative of Pakistan stated, the project would give Israel military advantages by allowing it the alternative control of the river through the use of the canal, or vice versa. The project would also affect adversely the irrigation of Arab lands and the operation of water mills. He concluded by stating that the Israel police was still exercising sovereignty in the demilitarized zone in contravention of the relevant provisions of the Armistice Agreement. Finally, he endorsed the request of General Bennike that the work on the project should be stopped until the parties could come to an agreement.

d. DRAFT RESOLUTIONS SUBMITTED TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Two draft resolutions were submitted to the Council:

(1) A draft resolution submitted jointly by France, the United Kingdom and the United States (S/3151) at the 648th meeting on 16 December. It read as follows:

"The Security Council,

"1. Recalling its previous resolutions on the Palestine question;

"2. Taking into consideration the statements of the Representatives of Syria and Israel and the reports of the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization on the Syrian complaint (S/3108/Rev.1);

"3. Notes that the Chief of Staff requested the Government of Israel on 23 September 1953 to ensure that the authority which started work in the Demilitarized Zone on 2 September 1953 is instructed to cease working in the Zone so long as an agreement is not arranged;

"4. Endorses this action of the Chief of Staff;

"5. Recalls its resolution of 27 October 1953, taking note of the statement by the Representative of the Government of Israel that the work started by Israel in the Demilitarized Zone would be suspended pending urgent examination of the question by the Council;

"6. Declares that, in order to promote the return of permanent peace in Palestine, it is essential that the General Armistice Agreement of 20 July 1949 between Syria and Israel be strictly and faithfully observed by the Parties;

"7. Reminds the Parties that, under article 7, paragraph 8, of the Armistice Agreement, where the interpretation of the meaning of a particular provision of the Agreement other than the preamble and articles 1 and 2 is at issue, the Mixed Armistice Commission's interpretation shall prevail;

"8. Notes that article 5 of the General Armistice Agreement between Syria and Israel gives to the Chief of Staff, as Chairman of the Syrian-Israel Mixed Armistice Commission, responsibility for the general supervision of the Demilitarized Zone;

"9. Calls upon the Chief of Staff to maintain the demilitarized character of the Zone as defined in paragraph 5 of article 5 of the Armistice Agreement;

"10. Calls upon the Parties to comply with all his decisions and requests, in the exercise of his authority under the Armistice Agreement;

"11. Requests and authorizes the Chief of Staff to explore possibilities of reconciling the interests involved in this dispute including rights in the Demilitarized Zone and full satisfaction of existing irrigation rights at all seasons, and to take such steps as he may deem appropriate to effect a reconciliation, having in view the development of the natural resources affected in a just and orderly manner for the general welfare;

"12. Calls upon the Governments of Israel and Syria to co-operate with the Chief of Staff to these ends and to refrain from any unilateral action which would prejudice them;

"13. Requests the Secretary-General to place at the disposal of the Chief of Staff a sufficient number of experts, in particular hydraulic engineers, to supply him on the technical level with the necessary data for a complete appreciation of the project in question and of its effect upon the Demilitarized Zone;

"14. Directs the Chief of Staff to report to the Security Council within 90 days on the measures taken to give effect to this resolution."

At the 651st meeting, the sponsors added the following paragraph to the joint draft resolution (S/3151/Rev.1):

"Affirms that nothing in this resolution shall be deemed to supersede the Armistice Agreement or to change the legal status of the Demilitarized Zone thereunder".

(2) A draft resolution by Lebanon (S/3152) submitted at the 649th meeting as an alternative to the three-Power joint draft resolution. It read:

"The Security Council,

"Recalling its previous resolutions on the Palestine question,

"Taking note of the statements of the Representatives of Syria and Israel and the reports of the Chief of Staff of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization on the Syrian complaint (S/3108),

"Recalling the conclusion of the Chief of Staff in paragraph 8 of his report (S/3122) that both on the basis of the protection of normal civilian life in the area of the Demilitarized Zone and of the value of the Zone to both Parties for the separation of their armed forces, he does not consider that a Party should, in the absence of an agreement, carry out in the Demilitarized Zone work prejudicing the objects of the Demilitarized Zone as stated in article 5, paragraph 2, of the General Armistice Agreement, as well as his request to the Israel Government to ensure that the authority which started work in the Demilitarized Zone on 2 September 1953 is instructed to cease working in the Zone so long as an agreement is not arranged,

"1. Endorses that action of the Chief of Staff of the United Nations Truce Supervision Organization and calls upon the parties to comply with it;

"2. Declares that the non-compliance with this decision and the continuation of the unilateral action of Israel in contravention of the Armistice Agreement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace;

"3. Requests and authorizes the Chief of Staff to endeavour to bring about an agreement between the Parties concerned and calls upon the parties to co-operate in the Mixed Armistice Commission and with the United Nations Chief of Staff in reaching that agreement."

In introducing the joint draft resolution, the representative of the United States said that his delegation had come to the following conclusions. First, strict compliance with the Armistice Agreement between Israel and Syria was of vital importance to the peace of the area. Secondly, the primary responsibility of the Council in the matter was to uphold that Armistice Agreement which it had endorsed in its resolution of 11 August 1949 as superseding the truce and facilitating the transition to permanent peace; the agent of the Council for those purposes was the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization. Thirdly, development projects which were consistent with the undertakings of the parties under the Armistice Agreement and which were in the general interest and did not infringe upon established rights and obligations should be encouraged. He added that the decision of the Chief of Staff regarding the Jordan River diversion project should be subject to those considerations. The Chief of Staff, who was responsible for the general supervision of the demilitarized zone, was the proper authority to determine whether the project met those conditions. Any unilateral action from whatever side, which was not consistent with that authority, threatened the effective operation and the enforcement of the Armistice Agreement, the United States representative said. Similarly, he added, no Government should exercise a veto power over legitimate projects in the demilitarized zone. On the basis of those conclusions, his delegation had joined with France and the United Kingdom in submitting the above draft resolution.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the report of the Chief of Staff, as well as the various statements made to the Council, had clearly established the following basic facts:

(1) that the Palestine Electric Corporation had begun to dig in the demilitarized zone a canal which would take water to a power station on Israel territory;

(2) that, being informed of the work some time after it had started, General Bennike had asked the Government of Israel to ensure that the authority which had started the work should be instructed to suspend working in the zone so long as agreement had not been arranged; and

(3) that, after an exchange of communications with General Bennike, the Government of Israel had not complied with that request.

He considered it unfortunate that Israel should have ignored General Bennike's request. Consequently, the Council was faced, not with the question of whether the canal was in itself a good and useful project, but solely with the question of the failure by one party to the Israel-Syrian Armistice Agreement to comply with a request of the Chairman of the Mixed Armistice Commission—the only authority which stood for some sort of order and which was probably the only barrier against complete chaos. The United Kingdom representative added that it was his Government's view that General Bennike had been fully entitled under the Armistice Agreement to make the request that he had made to the Government of Israel and that the Council was justified in expecting that the Government of Israel would not start work again on the canal without General Bennike's authorization. He had listened, he said, with the greatest attention to the arguments which had endeavoured to show that the work could not proceed without the consent of the Government of Syria, but his delegation had not been convinced by those arguments. It was important, he emphasized, that the Council should endeavour to give General Bennike the best guidance and all the help it could for the further handling of the problem. Though he believed that neither party could carry out projects, however beneficial, which were contrary to the terms of the Armistice Agreement, it seemed to him that a determined effort should be made to reconcile conflicting interests. Indeed, as a general proposition, he believed that the longer the temporary armistice arrangements continued, the more desirable it was that some way be found which would allow constructive projects in the area to be undertaken provided that it could be demonstrated that no interest would suffer thereby. He therefore considered that the joint draft resolution constituted the right approach by providing:

(1) that the Council should call upon the Government of Israel to suspend operations until such time as the United Nations Chief of Staff agreed that they might proceed; and

(2) that General Bennike should be given all possible help in forming a definitive opinion on whether the project would contribute to the orderly development of the natural resources affected, and should be authorized to explore the possibility of reconciling the interests involved in the dispute.

The representative of France said that one of the parties to the Armistice Agreement had brought before the Council a complaint based upon the alleged refusal of the other party to comply with the provisional request of the Chief of Staff. The Council was, therefore, faced with the very obvious duty of confirming the decision of the Chief of Staff. While it had been gratifying that the defendant party should have announced before the Council that it would suspend the work during the discussions, it must be understood that, in the view of the Council, the suspension should not be limited in time: the work should be stopped, not only until the end of the discussion in the Council but until the decision given by the Chief of Staff on 23 September 1953 ceased to have effect. The authority exercised by General Bennike was, in fact, that of the Security Council, and though, under the Armistice Agreement, the Council was the supreme arbiter it could not permit the parties to call the authority of the Chief of Staff in question.

The representative of France maintained that, divested of its political elements, the problem to be resolved by the Chief of Staff was that of the utilization, in the best interest of each of the parties, of one of the rare sources of water in that part of Palestine. It was, of course, necessary that all the rights involved should be respected and those rights were intermingled in a very complex manner. Syria and Israel alike were entitled to have the Armistice Agreement strictly applied; private persons were entitled to respect for their property; riparian owners, particularly the owners of Buteiha Farm, were entitled to use the water for irrigation. Further, he said, the discussions had shown that satisfaction of the rights of one party was not necessarily opposed to satisfaction of the rights of the other. Part of the waters of the Jordan might be diverted, while at the same time the influx of water into the irrigation channels was assured by control. The water catchments might be so arranged as not to prejudice the rights of any owner without his consent. There might also be a solemn undertaking under the guarantee of the Security Council that no authorized installation would create a vested interest in favour of any of the States concerned at the time of a final territorial settlement. His delegation did not even discard the possibility of a partition of those demilitarized zones, the status of which so often caused the difficulties with which the Council was familiar. His Government, he said, viewed such a partition as highly desirable. One of its consequences might be the settlement of that very case of the waters of the Jordan. For all those reasons, it seemed to his delegation that an effort should be made to explore at least the possibilities of a peaceful settlement, having regard to all the interests and rights involved; the Chief of Staff alone was qualified for that task.

In conclusion he stated that, in spite of all the efforts made by the Secretary-General, the staff under General Bennike, though superior in quality was still very limited in number. Even with his extensive technical knowledge, the General was unable to attend to all details himself. His delegation, the representative of France stated, hoped that the experts made available to the Chief of Staff would enjoy the full co-operation of the parties in carrying out their appointed task, which was in the common interest. In selecting the experts, the Secretary-General would surely bear those considerations in mind and would endeavour to enlist the services of technicians whose authority would be accepted by both parties without question. Once their report had been submitted, the final decision would rest with the Chief of Staff. The representative of France also said that if there had been less water in the Jordan river it would have constituted a less serious military obstacle. But, after all, the experience of the last war had shown how easily a trained army could cross water lines very much wider than the Jordan. In his delegation's opinion, it would be unjust and contrary to the spirit of the United Nations if a region's future and economic development were to be decided by theoretical military exercises carried out on maps. Surely Israel, by planning the construction close to its frontier of hydro-electric installations essential to its economy was demonstrating its faith and confidence in the peaceable spirit of its neighbours.

At the 649th meeting on 17 December 1953, the representatives of Israel and Syria reviewed their respective positions concerning the question. They also offered their comments upon the joint draft resolution. Israel gave its qualified consent, whereas Syria indicated its opposition to it.

At the 650th meeting on 18 December 1953, the representative of China analysed the joint draft resolution and expressed his delegation's readiness to uphold the authority of the Chief of Staff. However, he preferred that paragraph 11 of the draft resolution be more definite in meaning and more limited in scope. He believed that the Council should specifically state that it was the duty of the Chief of Staff to seek the agreement of the two parties by way of reconciliation; in case he should fail in obtaining the necessary agreement of the two parties, he should report to the Council for final decision. He also believed that the second part of paragraph 11 dealing with the development of the natural resources might well be put in a separate paragraph, using the words of the representative of the United States to the effect that development projects which were consistent with the undertakings of the parties under the Armistice Agreement and which were in the general interest and did not infringe upon established rights and obligations should be encouraged. He added that the Chief of Staff himself, in making his decision of 23 September, must have thought that the objections of Syria to that development scheme had been reasonable and serious. Therefore, it was only right and proper that the Council's first effort in solving the problem must be to secure the agreement of Syria. He considered that paragraph 11 as it stood was unsatisfactory and said that, unless changed, it would affect the attitude of his delegation towards the whole draft resolution.

The representative of Pakistan said that, according to the instructions of his Government, he was not authorized to support the three-Power draft resolution in its present form. The two main reasons for his delegation's attitude were:

(1) that in the circumstances of the case as presented to the Council by Syria that draft resolution was irrelevant at first glance; and

(2) that, when examined closely, it was full of most dangerous ambiguities.

He analysed the details of the complaint before the Council as well as the joint draft resolution, which he criticized for not stating whether the projected canal was contrary to the Armistice Agreement or not and for concentrating on an economic solution. Moreover, he said, the joint draft resolution seemed to have ignored the contents and meaning of General Bennike's report. Also, it did not take into account the military aspect of the complaint. After analysing the various paragraphs of the joint draft resolution, the representative of Pakistan singled out paragraph 11, characterizing it as a masterpiece of obfuscation. For example, he said, he could not understand the interests referred to in that paragraph: did it mean the interests of the people in the demilitarized zone or those of Syria? The statements made by the sponsors of the joint draft were also, he maintained, useless as a guide for General Bennike; they had ignored not only his advice, but also the military implications of the situation. Instead of helping and guiding General Bennike, said the representative of Pakistan, the Council, in its discussions, was thwarting, misleading and misguiding him. In conclusion, he said that the Council could not pretend, by stressing only the economic problems, that the political difficulties did not exist. Anyone who thought of the prosperity of the region in question and who had the welfare of its people at heart should apply himself to the political difficulties involved.

The representative of Lebanon expressed his inability to support the joint draft resolution in its present form. He believed that at that stage of the deliberations the following three basic objectives should be affirmed:

(1) the inviolability of the Armistice Agreement ought to be stressed to the utmost;

(2) as part of that inviolability, the inviolability of the status of the demilitarized zone must be emphasized, because that zone was part and parcel of the Armistice Agreement;

(3) whatever economic development was contemplated for the area, particularly the exploitation of its water resources, care should be taken so as not to close the door to any possibility of the regional arrangements that might be developed subsequently.

Consequently, he submitted an alternative draft resolution (S/3152, see above).

Defining his delegation's position towards the three-Power draft resolution, the representative of the USSR said that, after careful consideration, it was impossible not to agree with the criticism which had already been levelled against the draft in the Council. Almost half of the preamble consisted of references to other material and, consequently, had no independent significance. The operative part, he said, was unacceptable and he did not see how it could be improved, because the whole drafting from beginning to end was completely unsatisfactory.

Paragraph 11 ignored what, in his delegation's opinion, was an exceedingly important condition for the settlement of any question connected with the aims and purposes of the demilitarized zone, namely, the condition that any particular measures could be carried out only with the agreement of both parties. Nowhere in the draft was any reference made either to Syria or to Israel or to the dispute which had caused the whole question to be considered by the Council. There was not even an allusion to the parties concerned, yet all the time it was primarily the interests of those parties which were involved, since the whole subject was connected with the position in the demilitarized zone and the significance of that zone. Paragraph 11 made a sufficiently clear reference to the need for adopting measures calculated to reconcile "the interests involved in this dispute"; that was a very vague phrase. If the interests were those of Israel and Syria why not say so openly. If any other interests were involved, then again it should be stated precisely what interests were envisaged. That it was not exactly the interests of Israel and Syria which were involved, but the interest of some other States was, the USSR representative stated, emphasized further on in paragraph 11, where reference was made to the necessity of the development of the natural resources for the general welfare. No one, of course, would object to the promotion of the general welfare, but when the Council was concerned with a particular matter, namely, the dispute which had arisen between Israel and Syria, and when, instead of referring to the interests of those two adjacent States, it was found necessary to make use of the wording which spoke of the general welfare, then it was obvious that paragraph 11 completely failed to meet the problem facing the Council, which had undertaken to settle certain outstanding questions which had arisen between Israel and Syria in connexion with the construction of a canal in the demilitarized zone.

His delegation considered that, in view of those serious defects in the three-Power draft resolution, its adoption, in view of the absence of agreement between the two sides on the disputed points, could lead only to a further deterioration in the relations between those States, and that would be contrary to the interests of the maintenance of peace in the area.

The representative of Lebanon made a detailed statement in which he analysed, paragraph by paragraph, the joint draft resolution. After offering his suggestions and comments on the various paragraphs, he analysed in a more detailed manner paragraph 11, which he found unacceptable. He said that he saw no reason why paragraphs 11, 12 and 13 should, at that stage, be included at all in the joint draft. Should, however, the sponsors insist on retaining paragraph 11, he maintained that the paragraph must define exactly what was meant by the words "interests involved" and "natural resources affected". In the circumstances, he completely repudiated any notion that the Chief of Staff, under the joint draft resolution or any resolution pertaining to the Armistice Agreement between Syria and Israel, could extend his investigations or explorations to include any matters appertaining to Lebanon. Moreover, he insisted that the text define the words "general welfare", since the paragraph seemed to him to be so general as to be unacceptable because of its very dangerous implications, of which his delegation was genuinely afraid. Paragraph 13, he said, was also unacceptable, because it did not make the appointment of the proposed experts subject to the consent of the two parties to the dispute. Finally, he declared that if Syria's consent was necessary to change any provisions of the Armistice Agreement, that consent was also necessary for any contemplated change in the demilitarized zone.

At the 652nd meeting on 22 December, the representative of Syria reviewed the entire question and analysed in detail the joint draft resolution which, he stated, was unacceptable. He said that his Government found that the text of the joint draft failed to deal with its complaint, did not satisfy the provisions of the Armistice Agreement and would not even serve as an expedient in dealing with a grave situation. Syria, as a Member of the United Nations, had, he said, in accordance with the Charter, brought a complaint before the Council, a complaint based on the fact that Israel's action had contravened the Armistice Agreement and that Israel's persistence in attempting to exercise sovereignty and public power in the demilitarized zone and beyond the armistice demarcation line had constituted a repudiation by Israel of the Armistice Agreement. Syria's complaint had been substantiated by sufficient proof and justification. The Council could not, without shirking its duties and responsibilities under the Charter, refrain from pronouncing itself on the complaint and giving its verdict. The three-Power draft resolution did not constitute a Council verdict on the matter brought before it; it tended to bypass the Syrian complaint and to shift it into other domains. The draft resolution implicitly invited the Council to refrain from acting on the complaint and thus invited it to deny justice to a Member State.

He added that, under the Charter, the Security Council could try to conciliate a dispute between two or more parties. The question before the Council was undoubtedly a dispute. The joint draft resolution, however, failed to follow the conciliation procedures laid down in the Charter. The effect of the joint draft resolution would be to paralyse the Security Council in respect of matters of security and to draw it into domains wherein the responsibility belonged exclusively to the Economic and Social Council. Finally, under the three-Power draft, General Bennike would have to assume the functions of a judge to ascertain whether certain private rights existed or not. The Chief of Staff was not equipped for such a purpose. He could not administer directly the demilitarized zone under the Agreement and had no authority to pass judgments. He had the authority to supervise the zone, but had no authority to consider hydraulic projects except to the extent that they affected the Armistice Agreement.

At the 653rd meeting on 22 December, the Council decided to release General Bennike from attending the meetings and to return to his headquarters in Palestine.

At the 654th meeting on 29 December, the Council was informed by the representative of Denmark that all efforts at finding an acceptable text had been in vain. The Council then decided to adjourn until early January 1954. In the course of that meeting, the representative of the USSR suggested that the three sponsors withdraw their text altogether and endeavour to submit a new one, dealing with the question under consideration. He explained that his delegation could not support the three-Power draft because it did not relate directly to the problem under discussion, but rather constituted an attempt to substitute for that question the problem of how the United States could obtain mastery over the economy of the Middle and Near East using the opportunity provided by the dispute between Syria and Israel on the building of a canal and a hydro-electric station.

At the end of 1953 the matter was still under consideration by the Council.⁶⁷

5. Assistance to Palestine Refugees

a. REPORT OF UNRWA

The Director of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) submitted a report (A/2470) to the eighth session of the General Assembly covering the period 1 July 1952 to 30 June 1953, stating that, five years after the outbreak of hostilities in Palestine, the number of refugees dependent on international aid was the same—872,000. The natural increase in the refugee population added an estimated 22,000 to 25,000 to the relief rolls every year. However, the failure to reduce the number of relief recipients had not resulted in increased expenditure, which remained at the $23 million set by the General Assembly. This was made possible by a slight reduction in prices and by certain administrative measures. Another favourable development, the Director reported, was the conclusion of four programme agreements with three of the host countries (Jordan, Syria and Egypt) envisaging an expenditure of $111 million. The same countries had been added to the membership of the Advisory Commission, a fact to which the Director attached great importance.

The report further stated that the attitude of the refugees toward resettlement had not changed and constituted a formidable obstacle to their rehabilitation. The Agency alone could not do much to change that situation since it would require the combined efforts of the governments identified with the UNRWA programme. The fact that Jordan, Syria and Egypt were prepared to negotiate agreements with the Agency, the Director stated, indicated that they appreciated that the refugee's acceptance of a house and an opportunity to resume a normal life did not in any way affect his right to repatriation or compensation when the time came. However, the tone of manifestoes submitted on behalf of refugees and of the local press showed that that fundamental principle was either not widely understood or was deliberately ignored.

The number of relief recipients would not have decreased significantly by the time the Agency's mandate came to an end in June 1954, the report said.

The Director suggested that it would be more appropriate for the governments to assume responsibility for administration of the relief programme. However, the timing of such a transfer demanded careful attention, as well as the probable duration of the programme and its cost. In his opinion, it would be six years before an appreciable reduction in relief could take place; unless other measures were taken, many refugees would lack means of self-support for a still longer period. That, the report said, pointed to the need for parallel programmes of economic development to supplement the plan of the Agency.

If financial assistance could be guaranteed by the international community, the host governments would have no grounds for objecting to assumption of administrative responsibility for relief, the report said. Various relief functions and also education should be transferred before the end of June 1954, while the transfer of responsibility for procurement and distribution should be possible by the middle of 1955. If these suggestions were adopted, the Director of the Agency concluded, the future role of the Agency in the relief field would be gradually to transfer the administration for health, camps, welfare, supply and education and to retain only technical assistance and financial auditing functions. In the rehabilitation field, UNRWA's functions would also include the co-ordination of projects financed by the Agency with the over-all development plans of the host governments.

The report stated that the Agency's total income for the fiscal year amounted to some $49.5 million, consisting of $48.8 million in cash contributions, $492,000 in contributions in kind and $446,000 in miscellaneous receipts, less $208,000 for exchange adjustments. Thus, after taking into account $18.8 million in cash held at the beginning of the year, the sum of $68.3 million was available for the Agency's operations during the year. This was far short of the budget of $122.9 million authorized by the General Assembly. Nevertheless, it was stated, the Agency possessed ample resources for its operations, since expenditure on rehabilitation was (as might be expected) far less than the amounts reserved or committed, for which the Agency must secure cash or firm pledges before agreements with the governments might be signed.

The report gave the following major sources of cash contributions: United States $36,000,000; United Kingdom $9,600,000; France $928,571; Near East Governments $501,774; other governments $1,618,409; other contributors $148,022. The total unpaid pledges amounted to $56,577,648. The unpaid pledges of the United States and the United Kingdom, amounting, respectively, to $44,063,250 and $9,800,160, were, the report stated, mainly sums reserved for the rehabilitation programme agreements or projects which had not yet been initiated. The unpaid pledge of France of $2,214,286 was available to the Agency when French francs were needed and was paid when needed by the Agency.

The total expenditure of the Agency was $26,778,934, out of which $23,400,729 was spent on the relief programme and $3,378,205 on the project programme.

The report stated that more than 58 per cent of project expenditures was incurred in projects negotiated with Jordan, mainly on engineering surveys for the Yarmuk Valley scheme and the Ghor Nimrin tent factory, which would shortly be in production. In addition, the Agency contributed another $140,000 to the funds of the Jordan Development Bank, bringing its total investment to $560,000. Expenditure in Syria was mainly for vocational training courses, principally in skilled trades. Over $90,000 was spent on the exploitation of uncultivated lands to determine their suitability for agricultural use. Industrial loans were made to Iraq for the purpose of establishing two factories.

For the next financial year 1953-54, the Director of the Agency recommended an increase in the relief budget over that for the previous year, in order to enable the Agency to provide shelter for refugees who had been living outside camps but whose means were now exhausted, and to distribute additional food to certain categories of refugees—in particular to young children—in order to counter the risk of malnutrition to which the experts from the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) had drawn attention. The sum recommended by the Director was $25.7 million, representing an increase of $2.4 million over the previous year. This recommendation was amended later to $24.8 million for relief.

As regards the rehabilitation of refugees, the report stated that by the end of June 1953, in addition to the four programme agreements with Jordan, Syria and Egypt (referred to above) for projects envisaging schemes to make refugees self-supporting, a general agreement for an unspecified amount had been concluded with the Libyan Government.

The report noted the following progress in the implementation of these programmes:

Jordan—The first agreement with the Jordan Government was signed on 5 August 1952. It reserved a total of $11 million for projects calculated to make 5,000 refugee families self-supporting. The expenditure would be distributed over: research, planning and surveys; agriculture; industry and commerce; urban housing; and vocational training.

Under the heading "research, planning and surveys"; a soils laboratory was set up in Amman and hydrological surveys were carried out in the Wadi Faras, the Ghor land at the southern end of the Dead Sea and the Shera'a region. Investigations were also made at Azrak. None of these regions proved suitable for cultivation and the projects were abandoned.

In the agricultural sector, two small agricultural schemes, begun before the signing of the agreement, at a cost of, respectively, $92,000 and $17,000 had absorbed 32 refugee families in one case and 100 in the other, the report stated. New agricultural schemes undertaken after the signing of the agreement had taken the form of a series of small settlements along the Jordan-Israel frontier.

In the Category of urban housing, the Agency had undertaken with the Jordan Government the building of 50 houses on the outskirts of Amman. The scheme, costing $68,000, had helped to remove 250 names from the Agency's lists. Similar projects were being considered for other towns in Jordan.

In the category of vocational training was the establishment of a technical training school for 600 boys at Kalundia, near Jerusalem, at an estimated cost of $400,000. A similar scheme for girls was under preparation. Other training schemes in progress included courses in midwifery, pharmaceutical training, teaching, laboratory training, nursing, and statistical training.

The report further stated that, at the end of March 1953, a second broad programme agreement with the Jordan Government was concluded concerning the Yarmuk-Jordan Valley scheme for the irrigation of the Jordan Valley. It was estimated that the scheme would benefit some 150,000 refugees.

Syria—Under the programme agreement signed with Syria, the Agency undertook to reserve $30 million for a programme which would improve the living conditions of refugees in Syria, over a period ending 30 June 1954. The programme would include technical training, education, industry and commerce and agriculture. Up to the end of June 1953, the report stated, the amount spent was approximately $500,000.

Some $102,000 had been allotted for courses to university students, teachers, shorthand typists and accountants, dressmakers, medical orderlies, midwives and other medical personnel. An amount of $231,000 was earmarked for education for refugee children in Syria for the past year and had also been debited to the $30 million, the report said. Some $145,000 had been spent on agricultural projects, mainly of a preliminary and experimental nature. Progress in this field had been disappointing, due to the nature of the soil.

Egypt—Under a programme agreement signed with Egypt in December 1952, $300,000 were earmarked for a vocational training scheme in Gaza. A sum of $17,000 had been allotted so far for the construction of a school which would accommodate about 400 students. It would give courses for foundry-workers, blacksmiths, and carpenters and for car maintenance and repairs.

On 30 June 1953, a broad programme agreement was signed between the Agency and the Egyptian Government providing for the co-operation of the two parties in searching for practicable projects in the Sinai Peninsula, as well as in the Gaza district. The Agency undertook to reserve an amount of approximately $30 million for these projects, pending the completion of economic and engineering surveys, for which it would advance a maximum of $50,000. If, as a result of the surveys, it should be decided to proceed with specific schemes, project agreements would be negotiated defining the amount of money to be committed by the Agency and the approximate number of refugees to be rendered self-supporting.

Libya—On 23 November 1952, an agreement was concluded between the Agency and the Government of Libya, by which it was agreed that the Government would admit a number of refugees and would allow them to be established on a self-supporting basis, and would in due course confer on those who applied the rights and privileges enjoyed by citizens of Libya.

Although the number of refugees was not specified in the agreement, an understanding was subsequently reached by an exchange of letters, as a result of which 1,200 families (about 6,000 persons) would be covered by the scheme, of which 1,000 would be agricultural and 200 artisan families. On the evidence at present available, it was expected that some $2 million would be involved in the rehabilitation of this number of refugees in Libya. All that had so far been achieved was the establishment of a few artisan families who were assisted by the Agency to find work. Investigations were being made into the possibilities of large-scale agricultural projects.

In addition to those negotiated with governments, a limited number of projects of a more general nature were being operated as headquarters' schemes. These included research projects, placement activities, projects involving the acquisition of capital equipment (such as drilling rigs) for general use, and training courses run in countries, such as Lebanon, with which no programme agreement had as yet been concluded. A total of $179,000 had been spent on such headquarters projects up to 30 June 1953.

In addition, any rehabilitation activity in Iraq was currently classified as headquarters expenditure. The Iraqi Government had from the beginning taken full responsibility for the 5,000 refugees within the country and the Agency therefore maintained only a small office in Baghdad. A teachers' training course for 60 refugee students from Syria, Jordan, Lebanon and Gaza had already been completed; and two loan agreements had been concluded for establishing respectively a clothing factory and a candy factory to employ refugees from other countries. By the end of the fiscal year, neither of these projects had reached the stage of production and difficulties were being experienced in obtaining entry visas for prospective refugee employees.

Reporting on health conditions, the Director stated that the total cost of the health and camp maintenance programmes for refugees during the period covered by the report was $3,294,000. Of the "treaty diseases" (cholera, yellow fever, smallpox, typhus and louse-borne relapsing fever), only one case of epidemic typhus was recorded. The immunization campaigns against smallpox, enteric fevers and diphtheria succeeded in eliminating smallpox and in reducing greatly the incidence of enteric fevers and diphtheria. The incidence of malaria, it was reported, had generally declined due to anti-malaria campaigns. The report further gave an account of special campaigns carried out to prevent eye diseases, to supervise and advise expectant mothers, to prevent syphilis and to provide nursing services.

As regards education, the Director reported that in September 1952 a total of 52,776 pupils were registered in UNRWA-UNESCO schools. In addition, an estimated number of 57,681 pupils were reported as in attendance in private and government schools. By May 1953, the registration in UNRWA-UNESCO schools had increased by approximately 19,000 pupils, and that in government and private schools by approximately 1,500 pupils. The teaching staff, which had been 955 at the end of the school year 1951-52, had increased to 1,536 in June 1953. For the school year 1953-54, the Agency was making provision for nearly 95,000 children in its own schools. If the number of children in government and private schools remained constant, this would mean that 150,000 children would be receiving primary education.

With regard to secondary education, the report stated that comparatively few refugee children were maintained in secondary classes. However, during the school year 1953-54, it was planned to provide secondary education in government and private secondary schools and, in some cases, in UNRWA classes, for approximately 5,000 pupils.

During the school year 1952-53, grants-in-aid amounting to $12,000 were given to universities in Beirut and partial assistance was extended to nearly 100 students at the University of Syria. A literacy campaign, partly successful, was conducted, during the year, in Gaza.

The report also dealt with: welfare activities, such as social case work and individual care, operation of social welfare centres and training of social welfare workers; sponsorship of arts and crafts activities for girls and women; distribution of donated clothing; co-ordination of work with voluntary agencies; and distribution of milk.

Under the heading "Co-operation with other United Nations organizations", the Director expressed appreciation of the assistance rendered by the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and the specialized agencies of the United Nations. UNICEF, the report said, had contributed $2,125,447 in supplies including currants, fats, milk-powder and sugar.

A joint special report of the Director and the Advisory Commission of the Agency (A/2470/Add.1), dated 26 October 1953, stated, inter alia, that, despite all efforts, including the conclusion of programme agreements with three Middle Eastern Governments, it was practically impossible to bring about the rehabilitation of all Arab refugees in the existing economic and political circumstances. There was, however, a prospect that, by their early employment on projects under consideration by the host governments and UNRWA, many refugees would be able to become self-supporting.

The special report stated further that the sum of $25.7 million recommended by the Director for the relief programme in 1953-54 might be reduced to $24.8 million in view of the delay in the implementation of these recommendations and the purchase of one basic commodity at a greatly reduced price. With regard to the transfer of administration of relief to host governments, as suggested by the Director, the Commission recommended that the Director negotiate on this subject with the individual host governments and report to the General Assembly at its next session. It also recommended that the General Assembly should, among other things:

(1) extend the mandate of UNRWA as an interim measure until 30 June 1955 and review the problem at its ninth session;

(2) authorize the Director to adopt a provisional budget for relief of $18 million for the fiscal year 1954-55, to be subject to review at the Assembly's ninth session;

(3) authorize the Director to undertake a relief programme during 1953-54 at a cost of $24.8 million, and to introduce additional measures outlined in his report;

(4) increase to $293 million the amount of $250 million originally envisaged in the three-year plan adopted by resolution 513(VI),⁶⁸ and invite the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds to initiate negotiations with Member and non-member States with a view to obtaining contributions for the additional funds required.

Among the specialized agencies, the World Health Organization (WHO) made a contribution to the Agency of approximately $43,000 as well as providing a chief of the UNRWA Health Division and two other staff members for the technical supervision of the Agency's health programme.

The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the Director stated, undertook, as in the past, to contribute the sum of $70,000 towards the cost of the education programme for Arab refugees, and to appoint and pay the salaries of two education officers to take charge of the technical execution of the programme. It also made arrangements for donations in the form of gift coupons from Canada, the Netherlands, Portuguese East Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States to the UNRWA-UNESCO schools, amounting to $8,879 for the year under review. The Swedish National Commission of UNESCO sent a special contribution in kind—school equipment—worth $10,000; American teachers sent reference books for the teachers' seminars, which were held during the year to improve the standard of teaching in refugee schools.

Under a special agreement concluded between UNESCO and UNRWA for a programme of technical assistance for training and re-training of children, youths and adults among the Palestine refugees, a UNESCO technical assistance mission to UNRWA commenced operating in 1952-1953. It comprised a fundamental and adult education specialist, a vocational training specialist, a visual aid specialist and a cameraman. UNESCO's contribution towards the cost of the team amounted to $50,000. The mission, reduced to three specialists and with a budget of $35,000, was renewed for 1954.

At the end of March, the Agency was informed that the General Conference of UNESCO, at its seventh session, had authorized the Director-General to continue, in collaboration with UNRWA, to provide assistance for Palestine refugees in the Middle East. The Conference also appropriated the sum of $90,000 for the calendar year 1953 as a contribution towards UNRWA's expenditure on education. As in the past, this sum included the salaries of the two UNESCO field officers in charge of the execution of the programme, so that the actual cash transfer would amount to approximately $70,000 per annum.

Acknowledging the contribution of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the Director stated that basic agreement between ILO and UNRWA for the provision of technical assistance was signed at the end of 1952, as well as a supplementary agreement, under which ILO undertook to provide one vocational training expert for a period of one year to act as adviser to the Principal of the vocational training centre for refugees at Kalundia, and three vocational training experts for a period of one year each to act as workshop supervisor instructors at the same centre. In addition, four fellowships for study abroad for three months in building trades, metal working and electrical trades, vocational education and school administration were to be provided for staff members of the centre.

Between May and August 1952, ILO had lent an expert to undertake studies in the area, with a view to the possible development of handicrafts and cottage industries among the refugee population.

As regards the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the report stated that the senior supervisory officer of the Nutrition Division of FAO, accompanied by the nutrition and home economics officer of the FAO Regional Office for the Near East, visited the Agency in February 1953 in order to advise on nutritional problems. This visit was in the nature of a follow-up visit for nutritional surveys made in conjunction with WHO in 1950 and 1951; and it resulted in the adoption by the Agency of several valuable suggestions on supplementary feeding. FAO has also assisted the Agency over the recruitment of a nutritionist.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

(1) Discussions in the Ad Hoc Political Committee

The Ad Hoc Political Committee considered the question of assistance to Palestine refugees at its 23rd to 30th meetings, between 2 and 12 November 1953. At the invitation of the Chairman, Leslie J. Carver, Acting Director of UNRWA made a statement at the 23rd meeting. He recalled that the three-year plan prepared by the former Director of the Agency had established two separate funds, one, amounting to $50 million, to be spent on relief to refugees, and the other, amounting to $200 million, to be used to assist in making them self-supporting.

He explained that the plan had been based upon two main principles: (1) that acceptance by the refugee of assistance provided by the Agency would in no way prejudice his right to repatriation or compensation; and (2) that expenditure on relief would be reduced progressively as expenditure from the $200 million fund increased. It had been recognized that the plan would not succeed unless it received full support from the Arab Governments and the refugees themselves. Two years had elapsed since the plan had been put into operation, and the $50 million earmarked for relief had been spent. The Agency's mandate would expire on 30 June 1954;

With regard to the main object of the plan, the creation of occupations enabling refugees to become self-supporting, the results had been disappointing. That was because more time than anticipated had been required to decide upon and initiate the projects to be financed and was also due to the attitude of the refugees, who frequently refused to take advantage of the services placed at their disposal by the Agency. It would be impossible to compel them to do so without violating the fundamental principles of the Charter. Mr. Carver stated that he had been much impressed by the virtual unanimity with which the refugees had told him that they would not accept anything but the return to their homes guaranteed them by General Assembly resolution 194(III) of 1948.⁶⁹

The Governments of the Arab countries had shown their willingness to co-operate with the Agency by signing four programme agreements during the period under review. Three of those Governments were serving on the Advisory Commission of the Agency, and a fourth had requested to be represented there also. The representatives of those countries had, in particular, co-operated in the preparation of the joint report by the Director and the Advisory Commission of the Agency.

He recalled that he had indicated in the Agency's annual report to the Assembly that it would be possible, and, indeed, desirable to arrange for the gradual transfer of some of the relief activities to the host governments. The Agency had done its best to facilitate that transfer, foreshadowed in paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 513 (VI), which would eliminate many of the difficulties with which the Agency was currently faced. The members of the Advisory Commission had expressed the opinion that the Agency was performing its work with reasonable efficiency and the transfer would probably cause some dislocation in the progress of operations.

Failing the transfer of administrative responsibility to the host governments, the life of the Agency would have to be prolonged beyond 30 June 1954 in order to allow the General Assembly to review the position at its next session. The joint report, therefore, recommended that the Assembly decide provisionally to extend the Agency's mandate until 30 June 1955, which would enable the Agency to study the problem in all its aspects and to report to the Assembly's next session. In that connexion, Mr. Carver drew attention to the warning sounded in the joint report that the rehabilitation of all the Arab refugees was for practical purposes impossible in existing economic and political circumstances in the Near East. That remark reinforced the statement in the report stressing the urgency of the need for measures to settle the problem.

For the next fiscal year, the joint report recommended the adoption of a relief plan requiring new cash in the amount of $24.8 million, or $1.5 million more than for the year 1952-53. That increase was required to provide 63,000 additional rations during the second half of the year and shelter for 87,000 refugees whose means were exhausted.

For the fiscal year 1954-55, the joint report recommended the adoption of a provisional relief budget of $18 million subject to review at the Assembly's next session. That figure was calculated on the assumption that it would be possible to give employment to approximately 12,000 refugees and that their families would be removed from the ration rolls.

With regard to educational activities, the Agency hoped to enable approximately 150,000 children, or 75 per cent of those of school age, to receive primary education during the next fiscal year. The funds available to the Agency did not allow it to provide secondary or university education for all those wishing to receive it, but it was hoped that the position in that respect could be improved slightly. Meanwhile, the Agency was endeavouring to increase facilities for vocational training.

In the field of health, the results obtained during the past financial year could be described as satisfactory, Mr. Carver stated.

At the 24th meeting on 3 November, France, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States submitted a joint draft resolution (A/AC.72/L.12).

Under part A of this draft, the General Assembly would:

(1) recall its resolutions 194(III)⁷⁰ of 11 December 1948, 302(IV)⁷¹ of 8 December 1949, 393(V)⁷² of 2 December 1950, 513(VI)⁷³ of 26 January 1952 and 614(VII)⁷⁴ of 6 November 1952;

(2) refer to the reports of the Director of UNRWA and the joint report of the Director and the Advisory Commission;

(3) note the conclusion of programme agreements with some Near East Governments and that expectations regarding their execution had not been realized; and ⁶⁹ For text, see Y.U.N., 1948-49, pp. 174-76.

⁷⁰ By this resolution, the General Assembly resolved, inter alia, that refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbours should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date and that compensation should be paid to those not wishing to return.

(4) note also that the situation of the refugees continued to cause concern.

In the operative part, the Assembly would:

(1) decide to extend the mandate of UNRWA until 30 June 1955;

(2) authorize a budget of $24.8 million for the fiscal year ending June 1954 and a provisional budget of $18 million for the fiscal year ending June 1955;

(3) maintain the projects fund at $200 million, urging UNRWA and the governments of the Near Eastern countries concerned to continue to seek acceptable projects; and

(4) request the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds to seek the funds required to meet the current needs of the relief programmes and to invite governments to take into account the additional pledges required to meet the total programme now established at $292 million.

Under part B of the joint draft resolution, the Assembly would:

(1) note the current membership of the Advisory Commission of UNRWA (Egypt, France, Jordan, Syria, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States);

(2) note that it was in the general interest that other contributing countries join the Advisory Commission; and

(3) authorize the Advisory Commission to increase its membership by not more than two additional members.

Explaining the joint draft resolution, the representative of the United States said that the Agency's operations in no way prejudiced the rights of the refugees. With regard to part B of the draft, he stated that, while his delegation gladly supported the proposal authorizing the Advisory Commission to increase its membership by two, he felt that a balance should be maintained between UNRWA and its Advisory Commission. To expedite the daily operations of the Agency, it would be best for the Advisory Commission to concern itself primarily with broad policy in consultation with its Director.

His Government, he said, was increasingly concerned with the magnitude of the refugee problem and the delays in finding means to solve it, in whole or in part. His Government, in the words of one of the United States congressional committees, was not prepared to bear indefinitely so large a share of the burden when Israel and the Arab States showed so little initiative in helping to settle the matter among themselves. There was a very real danger that the longer the United States continued to supply relief money, the less desire there would be on the part of the States in the area to make real efforts on their own to put an end to the problem. Having given continuous support in the past, the United States Government now looked to the countries of the Near East, which were primarily concerned, and which had primary responsibility, for constructive solutions.

The United States also believed that the interests of both the Palestine refugees and of Israel itself made it important for Israel to take further steps with a minimum of delay in discharge of its responsibilities for compensating the Palestine refugees, and that Israel would be well advised to renew consideration of the responsibility for, and the possibilities of, repatriation.

Ready as the sponsors and other nations might be to help with services and funds, the programmes so far proposed could not hope to solve the problem for more than 320,000 refugees who would be rendered self-supporting, as estimated in the Agency's report. No programmes were yet under consideration for the remaining 500,000. It therefore behoved the Arab States and Israel to take bold measures to ensure the success of the programmes now envisaged and others which must be developed.

The United States representative said that no government could speak authoritatively on behalf of the refugees as a whole. They had lost their homes, their possessions and, in most cases, their livelihood, and had been paid no compensation in exchange; few had thus far been permitted to return to their homes. For a variety of reasons they were in most instances unable to find work in the countries which had given them shelter. Many thousands were living in temporary shelters built by UNRWA close to the borders of Israel. Such a situation, he said, might give rise to eternal hatreds and contained the seeds of future wars.

UNRWA could hardly hope to assist hundreds of thousands of those refugees to earn their livelihood unless an immediate effort was made toward the maximum utilization of local resources. As a start, it should be possible to solve the problem of the Jordan waters on an equitable basis, giving a share of the benefits to those refugees who chose to settle in the Jordan watershed. In order to be fully informed about the possibilities of the development of the Jordan, UNRWA had secured the services of outstanding experts, whose report on the unified development of the Jordan deserved the most careful consideration. The suggestions in the report were sound, and it was hoped that other governments directly concerned would take the necessary measures to make the plan work. The problems involved in the use of international rivers were not new and could be solved by co-operation and mutual concession on the part of the countries concerned.

The representative of the United Kingdom noted that the most important advance in 1953 had been the enlargement of the Advisory Commission by the addition of Syria, Jordan and Egypt. That closer association of the host countries in the work of UNRWA was a further sign that they were ready to share the responsibilities of the Agency toward the refugees. Their presence on the Commission had already helped in smoothing over difficulties and would be of great assistance to the Agency in dealing with a number of administrative problems. The United Kingdom would also like Lebanon to be included on the Advisory Commission, in accordance with the wish that country had expressed.

The representative of the United Kingdom supported the suggestion in the annual report of the Director of UNRWA (A/2470) and the special report of the Director and the Advisory Commission (A/2470/Add.1) that administrative responsibility for relief work should be gradually transferred to the host governments.

The United Kingdom Government, its representative said, welcomed the fact that the Agency had signed programme agreements with a number of States in the Near East. That was a hopeful sign and an important development. He noted with regret, however, that delays had occurred in the preparation and execution of major projects, a fact which had necessitated a revision of the Agency's programme. Accordingly, it was proposed in the joint draft resolution that the Agency's mandate should be extended until 30 June 1955, subject, of course, to a review of its programme at the General Assembly's ninth session. It was earnestly hoped that, in the meantime, everything possible would be done by UNRWA and the host governments to find acceptable projects which would assist the rehabilitation of the refugees. Employment on such projects would be of greater value to the refugees than relief and would allow a reduction in relief expenditure.

The representatives of France and Turkey emphasized the necessity of extending the Agency's mandate for another year and paid tribute to the Acting Director for his work. They expressed satisfaction at the conclusion of the four programme agreements.

The representatives of Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Yemen, supported by the representatives of India, Indonesia, Pakistan, Afghanistan and Iran, stated that the presence of 872,000 refugees in the Arab countries presented a very urgent problem. Only a third of the registered refugees lived in Agency camps. The other two thirds, who had hitherto managed to find accommodation elsewhere, appeared to have exhausted their savings and were appealing to the Agency for shelter. Describing the deplorable living conditions in the Agency's camps in the winter, these representatives observed that, even if the Agency succeeded in finding accommodation for 87,000 additional persons in 1953, at least half the refugees would remain outside the camps.

Also, the Agency had never been able to provide for the refugees' clothing needs, which had been partially met only by the collection of clothing abroad.

With regard to paragraph 5 of the annual report, dealing with Arab refugees in Israel, they did not think it correct to call those Arabs refugees since they were still living in their own country, where they had been forcibly displaced by the Israel Government. UNRWA should not have assisted them, since in so doing it had assisted Israel, which had interned them in camps and had confiscated their property; the Agency had been right to rectify the situation by putting a stop to all assistance to these persons.

These representatives maintained that the presence of refugees on the territory of the host countries had imposed great sacrifices on those countries. It had brought about a considerable drop in wages and hence in the standard of living.

Dealing with the assistance rendered by the host countries to the refugees, these representatives recalled that during the fiscal year 1953, the Egyptian Government, for example, had made a contribution of $1,440,228 towards direct relief and had also distributed the equivalent of $245,625 in kind.

Turning to the reintegration programme and the question of the $200 million fund for the implementation of the three-year plan, these representatives observed that the plan had been drawn up because of Israel's refusal to give effect to Assembly resolution 194(III), which dealt with repatriation. The Governments of three Arab countries had concluded with UNRWA four programme agreements, the object of which was to make approximately 300,000 refugees self-supporting. In signing those agreements, the governments concerned had clearly in mind the fact that the measures in question were no more than temporary and that in accepting the projects the refugees would not be renouncing any of their rights to repatriation or to compensation in due course. In that connexion, they stressed that resolution 513(VI) did not aim at providing a final solution to the problem and they stated that neither the funds contemplated in that resolution nor the periods allowed for the achievement of the projects were sufficient. Moreover, the land available in the host countries would not be adequate for complete settlement. Subsequently, they quoted from the Acting Director's annual report and the special report to show that the host countries would not be able to absorb all the refugees now on their territory and that the relief programme and the time-table for its implementation would have to be revised.

As to the health conditions of the refugees, these representatives stated that the expenditure of $3,294,000 mentioned in the report included expenditure on items that had nothing to do with medical care, since it was stated in the report that a large part of the total had been for maintenance and improvement of living conditions in the camps. They dealt at length with the health conditions of the refugees and quoted a report drafted by Dr. Etienne Berthet, the World Health Organization's expert on tuberculosis, on the extent of the danger of tuberculosis among the Syrian refugees.

They also recalled that the report referred to the basic ration—1,500 calories a day—for those refugees who received the full ration. Some received none; others received half rations. Moreover, while 872,000 refugees were on the UNRWA rolls, the number of rations was only 807,000. Several thousand refugees, including all the children between one and seven years of age, did not receive full rations, and the change in their diet had caused serious under-nutrition which threatened their health and future physique. However, as a result of inquiries by two experts from FAO and WHO into the food situation, the number of recipients of supplementary meals had been increased from 3 to 6 per cent of the rationed refugee population. It should be noted, they said, that, although medical examination revealed a serious danger of malnutrition, the medical officer could prescribe supplementary feeding only on condition that the total number of recipients did not exceed 6 per cent of the total refugee population.

Concerning the education of refugee children, these representatives stated that the account given in the report was not very clear, but it probably permitted the conclusion that, in 1953-54, 95,000 children would attend schools jointly organized by the Agency and UNESCO. Adding to that figure the number of children attending government and private schools in the host countries, it would be found that approximately 150,000 children would be receiving elementary education, that was to say, 75 per cent of the 200,000 children estimated by the Agency to be of primary school age. Therefore, the 95,000 entrants into the UNRWA-UNESCO schools during the 1953-54 school year would account for only 47.5 per cent of the total number of children attending school, and approximately two fifths of the 75 per cent would be refugee children attending private and government schools in the host countries.

Furthermore, it was stated, the number of refugees receiving assistance was estimated in the report to be approximately 872,000; that figure, however, did not take into account either the refugees living on the demarcation line between Jordan and Israel or those living on the frontiers between Gaza and Israel. Those Arabs, 250,000 in number, were known by the strange name of "economic refugees", and did not benefit regularly from the assistance described in the report, since they had not been driven from their homes. They had, however, been deprived of their property and should be granted the same assistance as other refugees.

Also, the unfavourable economic conditions obtaining in the host countries created an acute problem for the refugees. For example, 127,000 refugees had been settled in Lebanon, despite the poverty of its natural resources and the density of its population. Lebanon, which had made a particularly significant contribution towards the education of refugee children, had provided assistance amounting now to $9 million. The Committee should, therefore, not lose sight of the fact that the offer to resettle refugees in host countries could only be a temporary remedy.

Regarding the question of the administration of the relief programme, these representatives considered that it was not the responsibility of the host countries to undertake that administration even if they were able to do so. The principle of United Nations responsibility for the refugees was very important. Israel had a very special responsibility in the matter, for not only was that nation the direct cause of the problem but, in addition, it had despoiled the refugees of their property after having driven them out and persecuted them.

The attitude of the Arab States to the refugee problem was determined by the following principles:

(1) however effective relief measures might be, they were only a palliative;

(2) the only possible solution was to repatriate the refugees or to give fair compensation to those who did not wish to return to their homes in accordance with the General Assembly's resolutions, particularly resolution 194(III);

(3) the refugees' right to repatriation was a sacred one, deriving from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and from the Charter, and had been recognized by the United Nations;

(4) the refugees, together with the peoples of the Arab States, rejected any plan for their resettlement which would divert them from their permanent goal—repatriation—or cause them to be absorbed by the Arab countries.

The United States representative, it was said, had appealed to the Arab States and Israel to settle the problem between them. The Arab States were prepared to respond to that appeal if Israel was prepared to give effect to the General Assembly's resolutions. As the United States representative had stated, Israel ought, without delay, to take new measures to discharge the responsibilities it had accepted; it ought to reconsider the possibilities of repatriating the refugees and pay compensation to those who did not wish to return to their homes. Israel should respond to that appeal; so long as it continued to defy the United Nations, which had created it, the problem of the refugees would remain unsolved.

Most puzzling of all were the threats to reduce all aid to the innocent refugees unless Israel and the Arab States co-operated more fully, though there had been no similar statement on grants-in-aid to Israel. Israel would undoubtedly have respected the resolutions on Palestine if there had been firm insistence on right and justice, because Israel itself had wanted and accepted those resolutions after the fighting in Palestine had ended.

As for resettlement, the Acting Director had singled out for mention the agreements concluded with three of the four host countries, and had spoken of the refugees' hostility to the resettlement projects. In concluding, he had laid special emphasis on the possibilities offered by Syria, proposing the investment there of the balance of the $200 million fund, i.e., $89 million. But the material possibilities or economic potential offered by one country or another were not really the crux of the matter. The refugee problem was principally a political problem, the solution of which must be sought in Palestine, and nowhere else. That was the approach adopted by the United Nations and the solution which the refugees demanded. Any organ or government which sought to solve the problem by means other than repatriation would meet with resolute resistance from the refugees and the Arab countries.

The Agency's estimates were based on the assumption that sufficient projects would be found to attract a maximum number of refugees and that the projects would be carried out within the specified period. The past abandonment of projects, hardly begun, however, gave no grounds for optimism.

It was ridiculous and wrong to consider schemes for the settlement of Arab refugees involving the reclamation of deserts, schemes which would be dependent, as experience had proved, on many uncertain factors, which would require five or six years to complete and would constitute a burden on many countries, while land and properties belonging to the refugees were being wrongly enjoyed by others or going to waste.

In conclusion, these representatives emphasized the following points:

(1) More than five years had elapsed since the Arab refugees had been expelled from their lands and homes and their condition had scarcely improved.

(2) The resettlement of those refugees in the host countries was practically impossible; UNRWA could find work for only half their number.

(3) The Palestine problem was the principal cause of the present tension and instability in the Middle East; peace and security could not be restored in that area unless a just and equitable solution were found for that problem.

(4) Such a solution could only be forthcoming if Israel agreed to implement the United Nations resolutions concerning Palestine or if the United Nations itself brought the necessary pressure to bear on Israel to that effect.

Finally, they declared that, for want of any better text, they would vote for the joint draft resolution.

Reviewing the origins of the refugee question, the representative of Israel said that the problem had arisen because of the aggressive attack of the Arab countries on Israel. The flight of the Arab inhabitants from Israel had been a part of the Arab League's plan for the invasion of Palestine. The evacuees had been assured by Arab commanders and political leaders that their evacuation would be of short duration, that they would soon return in the wake of the victorious Arab armies and would regain not only their homes, but much booty in addition.

He asked those representatives who had urged Israel to admit a substantial number of Arab refugees to consider the consequences of such a course. The admission into Israel of thousands of Arabs from bitterly hostile States would endanger Israel's security, since the allegiance of the refugees would lie elsewhere. In 1949 Israel had indeed offered to admit 100,000 Arab refugees, a difficult and dangerous undertaking for a new and struggling State, but its offer had not even been considered by the Arab States. Conditions have since changed, however; hundreds of thousands of Jewish immigrants (including 120,000 from Iraq) had entered Israel and opportunities for absorption of refugees which had formerly existed were no longer available. Furthermore, the less circumspect Arab leaders had made it clear that their main purpose in introducing the Arab refugees into what would now be a strange environment for them was to encompass the destruction of Israel from within.

Turning to the interests of the Arab refugees themselves, he referred to the United Kingdom representative's statement, at the 61st meeting of the Ad Hoc Political Committee on 29 November 1950, that the Arab refugees would have a happier and more stable life if the bulk of them were resettled in Arab countries. That was still true, and if the Arab States rejected that solution it was because they were thinking in terms, not of the fate of the refugees themselves, but of political warfare.

He reminded the Egyptian and Lebanese representatives, who had referred to Israel's failure to comply with the repatriation provisions of resolution 194(III) that that obligation had been specifically conditional on two factors, practicability and peace. He strongly denied that his Government had ever contravened the terms of the resolution, the wording of which clearly showed that it did not give the Arab leaders freedom to introduce refugees as a hostile element into Israel.

The representative of Israel referred to the circumstances which had led to the foundation of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency and the programme which it had set out to accomplish. He also recalled the acceptance by the United Nations in 1950 of the principle of resettlement of the refugees and their integration into the economic life of the Middle East by means of a reintegration fund for the permanent re-establishment of the refugees and their removal from relief. That primary purpose of resolution 393(V) seemed to have been forgotten by Arab representatives who had referred to it.

Referring to the report of the Agency, the representative of Israel said that its most striking feature was the statement that the registered number of refugees was almost exactly the same as it had been at the end of 1951. It was clear that the mandate given to UNRWA to solve the refugee problem within three years could not be fulfilled. The report now proposed a six-year programme, and the Acting Director considered that even at the end of that period nearly 500,000 refugees would still require relief. A number of significant paragraphs in the report showed where the blame lay for the Agency's failure to carry out its programme.

It was clear, in the first place, that, given the funds, there were great possibilities for large-scale settlement and development in certain Arab countries; but the report admitted that little progress had been made on the two schemes described as major ones, the Yarmuk and Sinai irrigation schemes. Only the former had even reached the survey stage. The report pointed out that there were considerable possibilities in Syria for development on the scale required, but it was indicated that the Syrian Government had refused permission for preliminary surveys to be made in the areas in question. The report also stated that investment of the kind contemplated would tend to strengthen the host country's economy and in turn to attract additional capital. The impression which he had received from the Syrian representative's statement was that it was practically an infringement of Syrian sovereignty for the Agency to make any suggestion with regards to the use of Syrian lands for refugee settlement. It was astonishing that after complaints by Syria and other Arab States about the plight of Arab refugees, they were unwilling to do anything constructive to help in solving the problem. Iraq, for example, needed not more territory but more people and could, at a conservative estimate, readily settle 350,000 refugees on two to three million acres of land. But there had been a flat refusal.

There had been comment from Arab delegations on the Israel Government's acceptance of responsibility for all Palestine refugees in Israel originally in UNRWA's care; it had been objected that the persons in question were not in fact refugees. But the report of the Agency showed that, of 45,800 refugees in Israel registered with UNRWA in June 1950, 22,000 had been removed from the Agency's rolls and absorbed in the Israel economy. Since then Israel had accepted responsibility for all the rest. The Agency had defined a refugee as a person normally resident in Palestine who had lost his home and his livelihood as a result of the hostilities, and who was in need. The Arab States must either accept the Agency's definition of a refugee or remove from the Agency's lists a large number of persons outside Israel's borders. Those now registered with the Agency totalled 872,000, yet not more than 600,000 had left Israel territory, whilst the total Arab population, including Bedouin, of what was now the State of Israel was shown by the records of the administration of the Mandatory Power to have been under 800,000. The present Arab population of Israel was about 180,000; consequently some 600,000 Arabs, at most, had fled the country. Part of the discrepancy, say 12 per cent, between the 872,000 Arabs now receiving relief and the 600,000 original refugees could be accounted for by natural increase. In addition, as indicated by UNRWA, destitute Arabs in neighbouring countries had succeeded in being included on the ration lists, whilst attempts to conceal deaths of refugees in order to continue drawing rations for them had been made and appeared to have been aided by some Arab authorities. The balance was accounted for by persons who had always lived outside Israel but who had qualified for relief under the definition.

The plight of many refugees was a direct result of the Arab policy of economic warfare against Israel, which destroyed possibilities of normal economic exchange and livelihood for many living in countries, such as Jordan, whose economies were complementary to that of Israel.

He wished, he said, to reiterate his Government's declared policy of readiness to pay compensation for abandoned Arab lands, although the Arab blockade sought to destroy Israel's ability to pay such compensation. The Conciliation Commission had been informed on 7 October 1953 that preparatory work for the implementation of that policy was under way. His Government's undertaking to allocate urgently needed foreign currency for unblocking the accounts in Israel of Arab refugees was proceeding satisfactorily.

As to the idea that the refugees' one aim was to return to Israel, that country was vastly different from the country they had known. Moreover, ceaseless propaganda by the host countries had led to a paralysis of the refugees' efforts on their own behalf and an inability to envisage any solution other than repatriation to Israel.

In conclusion, he declared that the key to the problem lay with those who had created it, the Arab countries. The United Nations had shown itself ready to do its share, and it was now for the host countries to make the contribution which only they could make to the solution of the problem.

The representatives of Australia, Canada, Greece, the Netherlands and New Zealand declared, among other things, that their delegations were particularly glad to note that Syria, Jordan and Egypt were already taking part in the work of the Advisory Commission and that Lebanon would soon be invited to do likewise. Such an expansion of the Commission would guarantee the Agency the full co-operation of the host countries, without whose support the Agency would be unable to overcome the numerous difficulties to which the Acting Director had drawn attention in his report.

They stated further that the negative attitude of the refugees toward the question of resettlement might be modified if the refugees could be made fully to understand that those projects in no way affected their rights to repatriation or compensation as recognized in General Assembly resolution 194(III).

Furthermore, there were serious obstacles to be overcome if tangible progress were to be achieved in implementing the provisions of the proposed three-year plan. As the special report of the Director and the Advisory Commission showed, rehabilitation of all Arab refugees in existing economic and political circumstances was, for all practical purposes, impossible; the projects contemplated could not be expected to provide for more than a proportion of the refugee population.

Also, certain speakers had stressed the fact that the only real and just solution of the problem was the repatriation of all the refugees and had mentioned the generous aid their countries had given in assisting the refugees. Without abandoning any question of principle as to right of the refugees to repatriation, it was nevertheless fair to urge an even greater measure of co-operation from the host countries in carrying through the implementation of such projects as would enable as large a number of refugees as possible to become self-supporting. An appeal should also be made to Israel to adopt the same humanitarian outlook.

The New Zealand representative considered that it was incumbent upon Israel to contribute to the solution of the refugee problem. That contribution should include the return of a significant number of refugees to Israel and the payment of compensation to those refugees who decided not to return home. He suggested that, while there was no exact analogy, something might be learned from the experience of Greece in dealing with the great flood of refugees 30 years ago. Similarly, he wondered whether the return to Israel of some of the refugees driven from their homes would be as great an embarrassment as the Israel Government claimed. During the discussion which had preceded the adoption of the 1947 resolution, it had been emphasized that the Palestinian Jews were of the same race as the Arab inhabitants of that region and that the two peoples should therefore be able to live in peace in the new State of Israel.

The representative of the Netherlands observed that to attempt to go back to the origin of the conflict in order to determine responsibility for the present situation would be a retrograde step. However bitter the feelings in the Arab world, the fate of the refugees would not be served in any way by apportioning the blame. Though the Assembly's decision concerning the right of the Arab refugees to repatriation and the compensation due for loss of property should not be questioned, it was, however, questionable whether the repatriation of those refugees would genuinely be in their interest. The situation had changed profoundly since the adoption of the Assembly's resolution of 11 December 1948. The return of the refugees to Israel might worsen the economic situation in that country, and their plight might be even sorer than it was at present.

The representatives of Colombia, Liberia, Peru, and the Union of South Africa expressed their general agreement with the terms of the joint draft resolution and declared their readiness to support it.

At the 30th meeting of the Ad Hoc Political Committee on 12 November 1953, the joint draft resolution was adopted by 46 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

(2) Resolution Adopted by the General Assembly

At its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November 1953, the General Assembly, without discussion, adopted the draft resolution proposed by the Ad Hoc Political Committee (A/2558). Part A was adopted by 52 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, and Part B by 51 votes to none, with 6 abstentions. Resolution 720 (VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolutions 194(III) of 11 December 1948, 302(IV) of 8 December 1949, 393(V) of 2 December 1950, 513(VI) of 26 January 1952 and 614(VII) of 6 November 1952,

"Having examined the report of the Director of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East and the special report of the Director and the Advisory Commission of that Agency,

"Noting that programme agreements envisaging the commitment of approximately $120 million have been signed by UNRWA with the governments of several Near Eastern countries, pursuant to the plan endorsed by the General Assembly in resolution 513(VI), but that expectations as regards the execution of the projects programme have not been realized,

"Noting also that the situation of the refugees continues to be a matter of grave concern,

"1. Decides, without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 11 of resolution 194(III), or to the provisions of paragraph 4 of resolution 393(V), that the mandate of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East shall be extended until June 1955, and that its programme shall be again subject to review at the ninth session of the General Assembly;

"2. Authorizes the Agency to adopt a budget for relief amounting to $24.8 million for the fiscal year ending 30 June 1954, subject to such adjustments as may be attributable to refugee employment on projects, or as may be necessary to maintain adequate standards, and to adopt a provisional budget for relief of $18 million for the fiscal year ending 30 June 1955;

"3. Considers that the projects fund previously authorized by the General Assembly in paragraph 2 of resolution 513(VI) should be maintained at $200 million until 30 June 1955, and urges UNRWA and the governments of the Near Eastern countries concerned to continue to seek acceptable projects to enable the fund to be utilized for the purposes for which it is intended;

"4. Requests the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds to seek the funds required to meet the current needs of the relief programmes and to invite governments to take into account the need for the additional pledges which will be required to meet the total programme now established at $292.8 million.

"The General Assembly,

"Having noted that the present membership of the Advisory Commission of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, established pursuant to paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 302(IV) of 8 December 1949, is composed of representatives of Egypt, France, Jordan, Syria, Turkey, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America,

"Noting further that it is in the general interest that other contributing countries join the Advisory Commission,

"Authorizes the Advisory Commission to increase its membership by not more than two additional members."

K. THE GREEK QUESTION

1. Complaint by Greece Concerning the Failure to Repatriate Members of its Armed Forces

By a letter dated 23 September 1952 (A/-2204), the permanent representative of Greece requested the inclusion in the agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly of the item: "Non-compliance of States still detaining members of the Greek armed forces with the provisions of resolution 382 A (V), adopted by the General Assembly on 1 December 1950,"⁷⁵ recommending 'the repatriation of all those among them who express the wish to be repatriated'".

In an explanatory memorandum attached to the letter, the Greek representative recalled the terms of resolution 382 A (V), in which the Assembly, after "having considered the unanimous conclusions of the United Nations Special Committee on the Balkans concerning those members of the Greek armed forces who were captured by the Greek guerrillas and taken into countries north of Greece", had recommended "the repatriation of all those among them who expressed the wish to be repatriated". The Assembly had also called upon the States concerned to take the necessary measures for the speedy implementation of the resolution and had instructed the Secretary-General "to request the International Committee of the Red Cross and the League of Red Cross Societies to ensure liaison with the national Red Cross organizations of the States concerned" with a view to implementing the resolution.

The explanatory memorandum further stated that, with the exception of Yugoslavia, the States detaining members of the Greek armed forces had ignored these recommendations and that over 3,000 Greek military personnel were still being forcibly detained in Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Romania and the USSR.

On 17 February 1953, the Secretary-General circulated a note (A/2365) to Member States containing copies of letters exchanged with the International Committee of the Red Cross, together with a copy of a letter from the Permanent Representative of Greece to the United Nations. It appeared from these letters that in July 1951 the International Committee of the Red Cross had received a list from the Greek Red Cross containing names of 148 members of the Greek armed forces who, according to information in the possession of the Greek Red Cross, were detained in Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Romania, the USSR and Yugoslavia. On 7 August 1951, the International Committee had transmitted the list to the National Red Cross Societies of the countries concerned, with a request for help in returning these persons to their homes. With the exception of the Yugoslav Red Cross, which took the necessary action in each of the cases referred to it, none of the Red Cross Societies in question had answered the communication. In July 1952, the International Committee had renewed its representations to the Red Cross Societies. These further communications had also remained unanswered, as had similar communications submitted in January 1953.

The item proposed by Greece was considered at the Assembly's resumed seventh session by the First Committee, at its 570th to 572nd meetings from 9 to 12 March.

The Committee had before it a joint draft resolution by Denmark, New Zealand and Peru (A/C.1/L.23), which provided, inter alia, that the General Assembly should:

confirm its resolution 382 A (V); note with deep appreciation the continued efforts of the International Committee of the Red Cross; address an earnest appeal to the governments concerned to conform their attitude with the generally acknowledged principles of international law; and request the President of the General Assembly to consult to that end with those governments and to report back to the Assembly before the close of its current session.

The Assembly would, further, invite the Secretary-General to keep "this humanitarian issue" under constant review and notify the Member States of important developments.

The sponsors of the joint draft resolution accepted a Lebanese amendment (A/C.1/L.26) to provide that the governments concerned should be asked to conform their attitude "with General Assembly resolution 382 A (V)" instead of "with the generally acknowledged principles of international law".

The representatives of Denmark, New Zealand and Peru emphasized that their draft resolution was of a strictly humanitarian nature, based solely on testimony and information from the International Committee of the Red Cross; it was objective in character and moderate in terms. A solution of this problem, small in world politics but large for those concerned, might serve as a first step in the direction of settling the bigger political problems facing the world.

The representative of Greece expressed his Government's gratitude to the General Assembly and the International Committee of the Red Cross for their untiring efforts during the past two years on behalf of the Greek prisoners. Unfortunately, not only had those efforts been unavailing, but the rare opportunities afforded certain detained men to correspond with their families and to receive parcels had been abolished.

The question of the detained men dated from the years immediately following the Second World War, the representative of Greece continued. The Communist guerrillas had captured members of the Greek armed forces stationed along the frontier and had forced them across the frontier, particularly at the time the guerrillas were retreating. These members of the Greek armed forces who had been captured on Greek soil and taken away by the guerrillas could not, he said, be considered as prisoners of war of the States detaining them.

He emphasised that resolution 382 A (V) did not request the repatriation of the detained men en masse; it recommended only the repatriation of those expressing a desire to be repatriated. The number of men currently detained was estimated at about 3,000. A list had been drawn up of those men who, on reliable information, had been traced to camps in Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Romania and the USSR.

He instanced the attitudes of Albania and Hungary. The Albanian Broadcasting Station had stated on 24 August 1948 that 224 Greek soldiers captured by guerrillas were in that country. The Albanian Government had said that it was ready to begin negotiations with a view to repatriating the men, but it had later been stated that Albania proposed to link the repatriation of the soldiers with other unconnected questions, such as the fate of the Italian war criminals. In 1951, the Hungarian Red Cross had suggested of its own accord that 616 Greek civilians, who had been forcibly removed from Greece, should be repatriated by the International Committee of the Red Cross. Later, however, the Hungarian Red Cross had turned a deaf ear to appeals that it should give effect to its offer.

The Yugoslav representative stated that the question under discussion, like the failure to repatriate the Greek children, proved a total disregard of elementary humanitarian considerations and a marked disinclination to co-operate with the United Nations and other international agencies, coupled with a cool contempt for the Assembly's recommendations. Yugoslavia had had a similar experience. In numerous instances, he said, Yugoslav nationals in "Soviet bloc" countries had been prevented from returning to their country or even from establishing contact with the diplomatic representatives.

The representative of the United States declared that the behaviour of the countries detaining Greek soldiers constituted not only contemptuous defiance of the will of the Assembly, but also cynical disregard of fundamental humanitarian principles and accepted international practices. In Korea the Communist position was that hostilities had to continue unless prisoners of war, regardless of their wishes, were forcibly repatriated. At the same time they were refusing to repatriate the members of the Greek armed forces and had blocked all steps to determine the true wishes of these Greek soldiers. The representatives of Colombia, El Salvador, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, among others, also expressed surprise that the detaining countries seemed to be the champions of forcible repatriation in one instance and of forcible detention in another. Was the argument of the detaining countries, the representative of New Zealand asked, that none of the Greek servicemen wished to return? If so, how had the Communist authorities ascertained that truly remarkable unanimity?

Several representatives, including those of France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Peru, the United States and Uruguay, emphasized that the detained men were not and could not be considered prisoners of war since the detaining Powers were at no time engaged in direct belligerent action against Greece. However, even if the detained men were prisoners of war, the representatives of Greece, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Peru, among others, held, they had the right to return home if they so wished, although they also had the right to remain in the countries where detained if that was their desire.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR stated that the complaint was based solely on fabrications by the Greek authorities; the representative of Greece had never furnished any evidence whatsoever in support of his charges. The question, the Polish representative said, had been put on the Assembly's agenda in order to divert its attention from other important items concerning war or peace, the armaments race, and the best way to end the Korean war. In 1950, he continued, the United Nations Special Committee on the Balkans had estimated the number of so-called members of the Greek armed forces allegedly detained against their will as 106, while the Greek Government claimed the number came to 1,713, a figure which had miraculously expanded to 3,295 in 1951. The Greek representative was now claiming that the number exceeded 3,000, although the International Committee of the Red Cross in its letter to the Secretary-General (A/2365) gave the figure as 148. Everybody knew, the Polish representative said, that the "Greek police State" would stop at nothing in its misrepresentations and distortions of facts. The request for precise information at the Assembly's fifth session had remained and still remained unanswered. His country would never refuse to co-operate in actions of a truly humanitarian nature, but no one could expect it to co-operate in support of diversionist tactics in the international field.

The representative of the USSR stated that those representatives who had linked the question of the members of the Greek armed forces with that of the Korean prisoners were guilty of "ludicrous inconsistencies". They had themselves pointed out that the persons concerned in the Greek complaint could not be considered as prisoners of war. His delegation considered the complaint devoid of all justification since only the question of political refugees and the right to grant such asylum was involved. The real aim of the complaint was the propagation of slanderous attacks against the peoples' democracies, and the diversion of public attention from the persecution of progressive elements in Greece.

The representative of the United Kingdom thought that it would be simple to find out the exact number of persons captured, if the countries concerned showed any willingness to cooperate. The question of number was immaterial, the representative of Uruguay declared. Even if only one man were in that helpless condition, justice remained justice and inequity remained inequity.

It was true, the representative of Greece declared, that, owing to lack of information from the detaining countries, the Greek authorities could only estimate the number of persons missing. Anyhow, the International Committee of the Red Cross had a list of Greek military personnel identified in each detaining country: 297 in the USSR, 341 in Albania, 187 in Poland, 38 in Hungary, 46 in Romania, 147 in Bulgaria, and 142 in Czechoslovakia, making a total of 1,198. The Greek authorities were continuing their investigations so as to obtain additional information. Even if the members of the Greek armed forces were considered political refugees, he stated, they were still entitled to be asked whether they wanted to continue to take advantage of their asylum. The Greek Government had only asked that an international committee should determine the desires of the men.

At its 572nd meeting on 12 March, the Committee adopted the three-Power draft resolution (A/C.1/L.23), as amended, in paragraph-by-paragraph votes, ranging from 54 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, to 51 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions. It was adopted, as a whole, by 54 votes to 5, with 1 abstention.

The resolution proposed by the Committee (A/2369) was adopted by the General Assembly at its 415th plenary meeting on 17 March, without discussion, by 54 votes to 5, as resolution 702(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Confirming its resolution 382 A (V) of 1 December 1950 recommending the repatriation of all those members of the Greek armed forces detained outside Greece who express the wish to be repatriated,

"Noting with deep appreciation the continued efforts of the International Committee of the Red Cross with a view to implementing the afore-mentioned resolution,

"Recalling the latest communication of the International Committee of the Red Cross to the national Red Cross societies of the governments concerned,

"1. Addresses an earnest appeal to these governments to conform their attitude in this question with General Assembly resolution 382 A (V);

"2. Requests the President of the General Assembly to consult to this end with the governments in question and to report back to the General Assembly before the close of its current session;

"3. Invites the Secretary-General to keep this humanitarian issue under constant review and to notify the Member States of important developments as appropriate."

2. Work of the Balkan Sub-Commission of the Peace Observation Commission

The Sub-Commission on the Balkans, which was established by the Peace Observation Commission on 23 January 1952,⁷⁶ consisting of Colombia, France, Pakistan, Sweden and the United States, continued during 1953 to maintain six Military Observers in Greece. The Observers investigated a number of incidents along the Greek-Bulgarian and Greek-Albanian borders and reported on these in quarterly reports to the Sub-Commission. One Greek soldier was killed during an incident on the Greek-Bulgarian border on 4 April, but none of the other incidents investigated proved of a serious nature.

In a letter dated 6 May 1953 (A/CN.7/SC.1/42), the permanent representative of Greece reiterated his Government's former proposal for the setting up of a mixed Greek-Bulgarian Commission, with or without the participation of the United Nations representatives, for the replacement of the pyramids marking the Greek-Bulgarian frontier. The Secretary-General forwarded this letter to the Bulgarian Government from which he, on 22 June, received a communication (A/CN.7/SC.1/47) stating that the Bulgarian Government accepted the Greek proposal to set up a mixed commission composed of the representatives of the two countries without the participation of United Nations representatives. In a further exchange of letters through the Secretary-General it was arranged that the first meeting of the Greek-Bulgarian Frontier Commission was to take place on 10 July. An agreement was subsequently arrived at and signed at Salonika by representatives of the two Governments on 3 December 1953.

Through a letter of 26 November 1953 from the permanent representative of Greece (A/CN.7/SC.1/52) to the Secretary-General, the Greek Government suggested that the number of Military Observers in Greece might now possibly be limited to three and that the complete discontinuance of the Military Observation Mission in Greece might be possible from 31 July 1954, or perhaps even earlier, in view of the improved relations between Greece and the two neighbouring countries.

At its sixth meeting on 21 December 1953, the Balkan Sub-Commission agreed to reduce the number of Observers to three, besides the Chief Observer made available by the United Kingdom. With regard to the question of discontinuing the whole observer group, the Sub-Commission agreed to review the situation in the light of later developments at another meeting to be held before July 1954.⁷⁷

During 1953 the Balkan Sub-Commission merely took note of the various reports from the Observers and did not find it necessary to report to the Peace Observation Commission.

L. THE QUESTION OF TRIESTE

1. Question of the Appointment of a Governor

In approving, on 10 January 1947, the annexes of the draft Treaty of Peace with Italy relevant to the establishment of the Free Territory of Trieste, the Security Council accepted the responsibility of ensuring the independence and integrity of the Free Territory, including the responsibility for the appointment of its Governor.⁷⁸

The Council first discussed the question of the appointment of a Governor for the Free Territory on 20 June 1947 at the request of the United Kingdom, but was unable, during 1947 and 1948, to agree on a candidate.⁷⁹ It discussed the question anew in 1949, at the request of the USSR, but again reached no agreement.⁸⁰

On 12 October 1953, the representative of the USSR requested (S/3105) that a meeting of the Council be called to discuss the question of the appointment of a Governor for the Free Territory of Trieste. In his request, the USSR representative referred to the statement issued on 8 October by the United States and the United Kingdom Governments concerning their decision to terminate the Allied Military Government of Zone A of the Free Territory, to withdraw their troops and to relinquish the administration of that Zone to the Italian Government. He submitted a draft resolution (S/3105), which read as follows:

"The Security Council,

"Considering that the Treaty of Peace with Italy, which came into force on 15 September 1947, has not yet been implemented in so far as concerns the section relating to the establishment of the Free Territory of Trieste, and that the Trieste region, in violation of the terms of the Treaty of Peace with Italy, has been converted into an illegal foreign military and naval base;

"Noting that the partitioning of the Free Territory of Trieste now being effected by the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom in violation of the Treaty of Peace with Italy is having the effect of increasing friction in relations between States, and primarily between the countries bordering on the Free Territory of Trieste, and is creating a threat to peace and security in this region of Europe;

"Considering that the failure to implement the Treaty of Peace with Italy with respect to the Free Territory of Trieste is preventing the population of that Territory from exercising the democratic rights provided for in the Permanent Statute of the Free Territory;

"Having regard to the provisions of article 11 of Annex VI to the Treaty of Peace with Italy, and to the decision of the Council of Foreign Ministers of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and the USSR of 12 December 1946 concerning the appointment of a Governor for the Free Territory of Trieste;

"Decides

"1. To appoint Colonel Fluckiger as Governor of the Free Territory of Trieste;

"2. To bring the Instrument for the Provisional Regime of the Free Territory of Trieste into effect forthwith;

"3. To establish the Provisional Council of Government of the Free Territory of Trieste, in accordance with the terms of the Treaty of Peace;

"4. To bring the Permanent Statute of the Free Territory of Trieste into effect within the three months following the appointment of the Governor."

The Security Council began consideration of this question at its 625th meeting on 15 October. The representative of the United States declared that the joint decision announced by his Government and that of the United Kingdom on 8 October had been reached after most careful and deliberate thought, and that it represented an honest attempt to increase stability in a very important part of Europe and to lead to a lasting solution of the Trieste problem. On the other hand, the USSR proposal to discuss the matter in the Security Council appeared to him to be merely a propaganda device calculated to create trouble. This offered an interesting contrast, he thought, to the attitude expressed in August by the Premier of the Soviet Union. At that time, Mr. Malenkov had stated that there was no disputable or outstanding issue, including issues in dispute between the United States and the Soviet Union, that could not be settled in a peaceful way on the basis of mutual agreement, and that the Soviet Union continued to stand for a peaceful co-existence of the two systems. The United States representative stated that, in the hope that the remarks of the USSR representative would steadily draw near to the sentiments expressed by Mr. Malenkov, he would not oppose the inclusion of the item on the agenda of the Security Council.

The representative of the USSR recalled that the question of the Free Territory of Trieste and of the appointment of its Governor were items already on the Council's agenda, so that the question of including the Trieste problem in the agenda did not arise. He said he could interpret the remarks of the United States representative only as an indication that he did not object to the Council's discussion of the question. (As there were no objections to the adoption of the agenda, it was considered as adopted.)

The representative of the USSR went on to state that the attempt to characterize his proposal as a propagandistic manoeuvre was the result of a completely unfounded and distorted conception of recent events and of the obligations assumed under the Treaty of Peace with Italy. He cited the recent outbreaks of violence in Yugoslavia and the cleavage in relations between Yugoslavia and Italy as proof that the measures announced by the Western Powers on 8 October were not intended to relieve the tension in the area or to contribute to a peaceful settlement of the Trieste issue. The whole policy of the United States, the United Kingdom and France since the entry into force of the Treaty of Peace with Italy in 1947 had clearly, he said, not been one designed to establish peace and tranquillity. He accused those Powers of converting Trieste into a foreign military and naval base in the interests of the aggressive North Atlantic Treaty Organization and of exploiting the Trieste problem as an instrument of pressure on the Italian Government to ensure ratification of the European Defence Community Agreement, and declared that there could be no question of a Free Territory of Trieste if human rights and fundamental freedoms were not ensured in Trieste and if it were not demilitarized and democratized.

The Treaty of Peace with Italy set forth the only effective and legitimate means of achieving a lasting solution of the problem of Trieste, he said. The Government of the USSR had repeatedly urged that the measures contained in the Treaty be put into effect and, in particular, its provisions relating to the appointment of a Governor. This policy was in line with the desire of the Soviet Union, as stated on many occasions by its Premier, Mr. Malenkov, to live peaceably together with other States and to eliminate all obstacles to such co-existence. There were, therefore, no grounds whatever for the attempts made by the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom in their statement of 8 October to represent their actions relating to the Free Territory of Trieste as being due to the impossibility of reaching an agreement with other signatories of the Treaty of Peace with Italy on the creation of a permanent regime for the Free Territory of Trieste. The Western Powers themselves, he continued, appeared to be intent on preventing the implementation of the Treaty of Peace with Italy, for the statement of 8 October represented an agreement, made behind the backs of other Governments, in violation of the Treaty, not to appoint a Governor, not to establish a Council of Government (neither provisional nor permanent), not to set up a constitution for the Free Territory of Trieste, and not to withdraw troops from there, thus maintaining the naval bases illegally established there by the Governments of the United States and the United Kingdom.

The representative of the USSR noted that the question of Trieste was reported to be on the agenda of the forthcoming conference in London of the Foreign Ministers of France, the United Kingdom and the United States, and declared that the Government of the Soviet Union maintained its inability to accept the revision of any part of the Treaty of Peace with Italy by an exchange of notes or by private agreement. He appealed to the Security Council to fulfil its obligations under the Treaty of Peace by solving the question of Trieste in accordance with the principles set forth in the Treaty. Such a solution would best serve the interests of the bordering States and the population of Trieste and the cause of maintaining and strengthening good-neighbourly relations and international peace and security. He, therefore, introduced the USSR draft resolution (S/3105, see above).

He moved that the Security Council meet on 17 October to continue its consideration of the matter. This motion was rejected, having received 1 vote in favour (USSR) and 10 abstentions. The President scheduled the next meeting on this subject for 20 October.

The Security Council again considered the USSR proposal at its 628th, 634th, 641st and 647th meetings, on 20 October, 2 and 23 November and 14 December. At each of these meetings, it decided to postpone consideration of the matter.

At the 628th meeting on 20 October, the representative of Colombia drew the Council's attention to the statement, issued on 18 October by the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of France, the United Kingdom and the United States, to the effect that they had examined the problem of Trieste and had agreed to persevere in their joint efforts to bring about a lasting settlement in that area. He therefore considered that discussion of the item in the Council would be inopportune for the time being and proposed that it be postponed until 4 November. He was supported by the representatives of France, Greece, the United Kingdom and the United States. The representative of Colombia accepted a suggestion by the representative of Greece that the adjournment be until 2 November.

The representative of the USSR, opposing postponement, said that it was the Security Council's duty to discuss the matter immediately and to seek a solution of the Trieste problem in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Treaty of Peace with Italy, and the appointment of a Governor was the first step. The problem, he said, could have been settled without difficulty if the relevant Treaty provisions had been implemented at the proper time. Unfortunately, an impasse now existed which was aggravating the very conflicts which the Treaty of Peace had been designed to remove.

He reiterated his charge that the measures announced by the Western Powers on 8 October had only served to accentuate international tension. Further, the reported diplomatic negotiations between the United States, the United Kingdom and France were, he charged, designed to enable those Powers to evade still further their obligations under the Treaty. He denied the legality or validity of any agreement which might result from the private negotiations of those Powers with Yugoslavia and Italy, and stated that the Security Council should prevent such a violation of a treaty.

The motion to postpone discussion until 2 November was approved by 9 votes to 1 (USSR), with 1 abstention (Lebanon).

At the 634th meeting on 2 November, the representative of Greece noted that the interested parties were currently conducting consultations, but had not yet brought to full fruition their efforts to work out a solution of the Trieste problem through diplomatic channels. He considered that more time should be allowed for the negotiations and expressed fear lest discussion of the USSR proposal should take the form of an East-West conflict, which would most adversely affect the chances of a peaceful settlement of the Trieste question. He therefore moved that discussion be postponed to 23 November.

The motion for postponement was vigorously opposed by the USSR representative, who again emphasized that the question of Trieste was one for discussion within the United Nations, in accordance with the Italian Peace Treaty. If it were to maintain its independence, the Security Council must not defer to the convenience of any State or group of States. Moreover, the course of events in the Trieste area, he stated, only confirmed that the consultations among the five Governments were not intended to secure a peaceful settlement of the Trieste problem; they were designed to discard the Treaty of Peace with Italy, to release its signatories from their obligations, and to transform the Trieste region into a military and naval base in the orbit of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization for the purpose of aggressive attack on the Soviet Union and the peoples' democracies. He warned against the possible dangerous consequences to world peace and security if there were any further delay in the Security Council's giving consideration to the question of the appointment of a Governor for the Free Territory of Trieste.

The motion for postponement was adopted by 9 votes to 1 (USSR), with 1 abstention (Lebanon).

At the Council's 641st meeting on 23 November, the representative of the United States announced that consultations relating to Trieste were continuing and that arrangements leading towards a solution might be concluded in the near future. He accordingly moved that the Security Council postpone consideration of the question until the week of 8 to 15 December. This motion was supported by the representative of Colombia, who recalled that the Treaty of Peace with Italy required that the four Great Powers, as well as Italy and Yugoslavia, be in agreement on the question of the Governorship of Trieste prior to possible action by the Security Council. It seemed logical to him, therefore, that the Council postpone discussion of the matter pending the outcome of current efforts to bring about the requisite agreement between Italy and Yugoslavia.

The representative of the USSR declared that his firm objection to any postponement of discussion was unaltered by the fact that the consultations referred to might produce definite results, because it remained his view that the agreement being sought privately, in violation of the Treaty of Peace with Italy, did not relate to the appointment of a Governor for the Free Territory of Trieste or to a peaceful solution of the problem of Trieste, but rather to the best means of effecting the partition of the Territory and its conversion into an illegal military and naval base. He accused the Western Powers of promoting conflict rather than good will in the Trieste area. If the Council wished to strengthen rather than to undermine international peace and security, it should take immediate measures to implement the treaty provisions relating to Trieste and, as a first step, appoint a Governor for the Free Territory. Until the Council had decided on a candidate there could not, in his view, be a basis for any consultations on the matter with the Governments of Italy and Yugoslavia.

The motion for postponement was adopted by 9 votes to 1 (USSR), with 1 abstention (Lebanon).

At the 647th meeting on 14 December, the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States expressed satisfaction at the decrease in tension in the Trieste area, of which the recently initiated troop withdrawal by Yugoslavia and Italy was, they said, a notable example. As the peaceful settlement of the Trieste problem was still being sought in diplomatic discussions, they saw no advantage, for the time being, in holding a discussion of the matter in the Security Council. The United States representative moved that further consideration be postponed pending the outcome of the current efforts to find a solution.

The representative of the USSR protested that this motion sought, in effect, the indefinite postponement of discussion. He viewed the repeated postponements, in deference to certain secret diplomatic negotiations with aims which he considered directly contrary to the plan for Trieste contained in the Treaty of Peace with Italy, as a failure to respect the United Nations and as a violation by the Security Council of its rights and duties, as well as a violation of international law and of the interests of all peace-loving peoples.

He considered that discussion in the Council, despite past disagreement on the appointment of a Governor, might yet lead to agreement and could in no way hinder negotiations in which a peaceful settlement of the Trieste problem was truly being sought. He insisted that the Security Council fulfil its obligations, in accordance with the Treaty of Peace with Italy, and proceed to a discussion of the question of the appointment of a Governor.

The motion for postponement was adopted by 8 votes to 1 (USSR), with 1 abstention (Lebanon). One member of the Council was absent (Pakistan).

2. Report on the British-United States Zone of the Free Territory of Trieste

By a letter dated 23 December 1953 (S/3156), the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States transmitted to the Security Council the twelfth report, covering the year 1952, on the administration of the British-United States Zone of the Free Territory of Trieste.

During the latter half of the year, pursuant to the Memorandum of Understanding signed at London in May, the Zone Commander appointed to the Allied Military Government a number of senior Italian officials who were responsible to him, under a Senior Director of Administration, for much of the internal administration of the Zone. Administrative elections were held in May in all communes of the Zone.

In general, the economic recovery of the Zone continued, with a further increase in industrial production. In the Zaule Industrial Area, 26 plants were operating or in course of completion, an increase of ten over 1951, and 1,133 apartment buildings were completed or nearly completed. Owing to the completion of the ship-building programme initiated in 1950, the total tonnage of new shipping constructed was slightly lower than in 1951. Commercial traffic through the Port of Trieste also showed a slight decline. In both these fields, measures were being taken to prevent further deterioration. The employment situation showed little change.

At the end of June, the Mutual Security Agency Mission in Trieste was closed and the Zone included in the sphere of the Agency's Mission to Italy. During 1952, more than $900,000 in lire counterpart funds from former European Recovery Programme aid were utilized. A total of $11.1 million was provided by the Italian Government. The over-all improvement in the financial situation continued, with a further slight reduction in the budgetary deficit.

M. COMPLAINT OF UNITED STATES INTERFERENCE IN THE INTERNAL AFFAIRS OF OTHER STATES

By a letter dated 15 October 1952 (A/2224/-Rev.1), the representative of Czechoslovakia requested that the following question should be included in the agenda of the General Assembly's seventh session: "Interference of the United States of America in the internal affairs of other States as manifested by the organization on the part of the Government of the United States of America of subversive and espionage activities against the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the People's Republic of China, the Czechoslovak Republic and other peoples' democracies."

In an explanatory note, the Czechoslovak representative stated that, in 1952, the Congress of the United States had, in application of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, again appropriated large sums for the organization of subversive and espionage activities against the USSR, the People's Republic of China, the Czechoslovak Republic and other peoples' democracies. The purpose and intent of this Act, it was stated, were to undermine, by acts of espionage, diversion and terrorism, the regimes of other countries, regimes freely elected by their peoples. Such activities on the part of the United States were in flagrant contradiction to the aims and principles of the United Nations Charter, undermined peaceful international collaboration and constituted a danger to international peace and security.

The First Committee considered the item at its 582nd to 589th meetings, from 23 to 26 March.

Czechoslovakia submitted a draft resolution (A/C.1/L.34), providing that the General Assembly should:

(1) condemn as acts of aggression and as interference in the internal affairs of other States, in contravention of the United Nations Charter and of international law, the subversive activities organized by the United States Government against a number of States in application of the Mutual Security Act of 10 October 1951, providing for the appropriation of $100 million to finance armed detachments and individuals to engage in espionage and subversive activities and to commit acts of terrorism and other criminal acts against the USSR, the People's Republic of China, Czechoslovakia and other peoples' democracies, and of the Act of 20 June 1952, developing and supplementing the Mutual Security Act; and

(2) recommend that the United States Government repeal the parts of those Acts relating to the appropriation of funds for the organization of subversive activities and espionage, and put an end to such activities against other countries by its agencies.

During the debate, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR, and the USSR spoke in support of the Czechoslovak draft resolution.

They recalled that section 101 (a) of the Mutual Security Act provided a sum of $100 million to finance military activities against a group of countries, not merely outside their frontiers but on their territory. This was not only a violation of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter, but was the first time in the history of international relations that a government of a civilized country had so spelled out the most flagrant violation of the basic principle of international relations and peaceful co-existence of States and had made that a part of its official foreign policy. Since the General Assembly's sixth session, when it had, unfortunately, not felt able to recommend the repeal of the Mutual Security Act, as the USSR had requested, the United States Government had intensified and constantly strengthened its espionage, diversionist and other hostile and inimical acts against the peoples' democracies. Those acts were a violation of the principles and goals of the Charter and went a long way towards increasing international tension. A public and realistic discussion of the whole problem might result in the removing of one of the most serious causes of the prevailing international insecurity. It was up to the United States Government alone to see whether or not that would be the case.

There was no doubt that the purpose of the Mutual Security Act was to give the United States Government a legal basis for activities which were already going on. Section 101 (a) of the Act (known as the Kersten amendment) which, under Public Law 165, appropriated $100 million, consisted of two parts: one providing for the establishment under the High Command of the Atlantic Army of military units containing persons who had escaped from the USSR, China, Poland and other peoples' democracies and who were to be given special assignments because of their particular knowledge of the countries against which the aggression was to be directed; and the second providing for financial aid to carefully selected persons living in the territories of the USSR, China, Czechoslovakia and Poland and other Eastern European countries to support resistance to the Governments of these countries.

Thus, the very terms of the law showed that it constituted interference in the domestic affairs of other States and was an act of aggression directed by the United States Government against States with which it maintained diplomatic relations.

Such a foreign policy could only be based on the wilful disregard of legal and moral principles, and constituted a danger even for those who were now co-operating with the United States. American intervention was continuously spreading.

The events that followed the adoption of the Mutual Security Act had fully confirmed its aggressive nature. The United States Defense and State Departments and the Central Intelligence Agency were directing and co-ordinating all such subversive and diversionist activities. In particular, the task of the Central Intelligence Agency was to facilitate aggression and reduce the defensive potential of the peoples' democracies by weakening their economy, by trying to spread chaos, by indulging in sabotage, by instigating terror and by spreading lies and slander. Even religious tolerance was exploited to achieve espionage purposes. The Voice of America and Radio Free Europe were being used to incite espionage, diversionist activities, murders and other criminal activities.

In Poland, it was stated, the United States Embassy in Warsaw had become a centre of underground activities co-operating with the enemies of the Polish people, and members of the Embassy staff had been involved in murder cases. In Czechoslovakia, a number of spies and terrorists captured by the Czechoslovak security forces had shown how widespread were the American activities. The many trials conducted against United States agents in Romania, Bulgaria and Albania clearly indicated that the Mutual Security Act was being implemented with a view to subverting the existing regimes in the peoples' democracies. Similar trials had also been held in Poland and Czechoslovakia. All those trials clearly demonstrated how the United States was training agents for subversive work in the peoples' democracies. Another espionage centre had been created in Greece; its activities had been revealed at a trial in Bulgaria in January 1952, where it was shown how United States agents had infiltrated into Bulgaria with the help of Turkish frontier police. Similarly, the trials of three agents in Albania had shown that they had been in the service of the United States, Italian and Yugoslav Intelligence Services.

The United States was also using reactionary organizations, such as the National Committee for a Free Europe, the American Committee for the Liberation of the People of Russia, the League of Americans of Hungarian Origin, the East European Fund, the Tolstoi Foundation, and the Romanian National Committee, as well as the so-called free association of Hungarian fighters in Western Germany.

The conspirators, who, with the help of the United States Intelligence Service, had been engaged in active sabotage against their own people and were now, when their schemes had failed, seeking refuge abroad, were by no means people escaping tyranny in pursuit of freedom, but merely traitors and conspirators in their own countries. These countries were determined to maintain their independent sovereign existence. Their peoples wished to unmask before world public opinion the diversionist activities of those organizations which, with the assistance of the United States, were working hard for the return of bourgeois regimes in their countries.

Within the United Nations, the United States had repeatedly assured world public opinion of its peaceful intentions. But elsewhere, those in public life, as well as the Press under their control, did not even try to hide that one of the basic elements of the United States policy was the desire to change the political regimes in peace-loving countries which were wholly compatible with the free will of the people.

These representatives referred to Senator Taft's book A Foreign Policy for Americans, a statement by Representative Kersten on 20 October 1951, an article by John Foster Dulles in Life in May 1952, the U.S. News and World Report and the New York Times of 11 January 1953 to show that it was the aim of United States policy to attack the peoples' democracies through its government agencies by the organization of subversive and diversionist activities within the countries and by using counter-revolutionary units and organizations hostile to those countries.

An attempt had been made to justify the Mutual Security Act as being intended to give humanitarian assistance to refugees and to finance economic and technical aid. The Act had, in fact, met with opposition from all peace-loving peoples and the United States representatives had therefore tried to conceal its real purposes, but such claims were not relevant when charges of subversive activities were being considered.

The representative of the USSR recalled that, following the adoption of the Mutual Security Act on 10 October 1951, the Government of the USSR had addressed a note to the United States Government on 21 November 1951, drawing attention to the fact that the purpose of the Act was to finance groups of individuals living in the USSR or the peoples' republics, or of individuals who had escaped from those countries, and to organize them as armed units in the service of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). It had stated that the adoption of the Act was without precedent in the history of international law and constituted gross intervention by the United States in the internal affairs of other States and, further, that it was a breach of the United States obligations towards the USSR under the terms of the exchange of notes between President Roosevelt and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the USSR, Mr. Litvinov, in 1953, on the establishment of normal diplomatic relations between the two countries. On 22 November 1951, the State Department had replied that the Soviet Union was not justified in bringing any charges against the United States in connexion with the adoption of the Mutual Security Act. Accordingly, on 9 December 1951, the USSR Government had informed the United States Government that it found its reply unsatisfactory and had requested the repeal of the Act.

During the sixth session of the Assembly, he continued, the USSR delegation had clearly demonstrated the criminal nature of the Act. Since that time, the United States had taken no steps for its repeal but had, on the contrary, carried it into effect and supplemented it by the new Act of 20 June 1952, providing for possible additional appropriations.

Those who had drafted the laws and who pursued aggressive purposes were mistaken if they thought that the diversionist activities could impede the economic and cultural development of the USSR and the peoples' democracies. The two Acts had been motivated by the disapproval of certain circles in the United States of the regimes of those countries. It should, however, be realized that the United States had to live with the Soviet Union and the other countries with new societies and that their co-existence served the cause of peace. That co-existence demanded the non-intervention of one group in the domestic affairs of the other group. If the United States would not recognize the co-existence of the new societies, it meant that its statements about the maintenance of peace and the negotiation of the settlement of outstanding problems with the Soviet Union were mere double-talk. The USSR representative recalled the statement on 15 March by Prime Minister Malenkov to the effect that there was no problem or unsettled issue, including those concerning relations with the United States, which could not be settled by peaceful means on the basis of mutual agreement. That peaceful policy was in accordance, not only with the interests of the Soviet Union people, but with the interests of all peoples.

Speaking against the Czechoslovak draft resolution, the representative of the United States said that no valid indictment against the United States could be based on newspaper clippings or on the remarks of individual legislators. An analysis of the persons whose statements had been quoted proved that none of them had been qualified at the time to speak for the United States Government. United States Government policies were stated only by officials of the Executive branch of the government on the basis of their authority. It had been charged that in 1951 and in 1952 the United States had appropriated $100 million for the purposes of espionage, terrorism and the recruitment of refugees in order to subvert the Soviet Union and the "peoples' democracies." The facts were that, in 1951, $100 million had been authorized under the Mutual Security Act, section 101, and no additional funds had been voted in 1952; of that total $95,700,000 was going for regular military and economic assistance, a part of the larger sums the United States was spending under the Mutual Security Act and had previously spent under the Marshall Plan to help free nations to stay free. Before subversion of the free State of Czechoslovakia, it, too, had wanted to obtain that aid, but the Kremlin had ordered Czechoslovakia to refuse, because it knew that that assistance was designed to strengthen collective security against aggression. The remaining $4,300,000 was to help escapees from behind the Iron Curtain. It had to be noted, he stated, that no escapees were going into the Iron Curtain countries; all of them were coming out. The escapees were those who had come from the Soviet-dominated world in the past five years and, unlike the refugees from Eastern Germany, they were entirely without citizenship rights. Those stateless persons had left their possessions and often their families and had braved the difficulties of increasingly heavily-guarded borders in order to get through the Iron Curtain so that they might find the freedom which had been denied them.

The representative of the United States said that escapees were crossing the Iron Curtain at the rate of several hundred a month to seek refuge in Western Germany, Austria, Italy, Trieste, Greece and Turkey, and he gave a number of examples. All of them were not young men; there were wives, small children, unmarried girls and elderly people. When they arrived they were destitute and their very presence added to the great Burdens of the countries of free Europe. To help those people and to keep hope in the hearts of others, the United States had authorized the sum of $4,300,000 to be used to set up an escapee programme in March 1952. That sum was little enough to help the host countries provide reception and living quarters, food, clothing, medical care, help in the search for visas, vocational training and employment and emigration advice. As of 1 March 1953, 2,483 escapees had been settled in 21 non-European countries and over a thousand others had been accepted by other nations. As the news penetrated the Iron Curtain, more escapees came and even high officials might be expected to choose freedom rather than tyranny. The courage of those people deserved commendation and help.

Referring to the Roosevelt-Litvinov agreement of 1933, the United States representative said that, for all practical purposes, the Soviet Union had made a dead letter of that agreement shortly after it was signed. Shortly after the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries, President Roosevelt had directed the United States Ambassador to protest against Soviet Union violation of that agreement. In 1935, the Comintern, assembled in Moscow, had instructed the United States Communist Party to use "Trojan horse" tactics against the United States Government. President Roosevelt had then again sent a strong protest to the USSR Government. Since the establishment of the Communist Government in 1917, the USSR had persistently followed a policy of aggressive intervention in the domestic affairs of other nations, the United States representative said, and had forcibly imposed the Communist dictatorship system on the very countries listed in the complaint before the Committee.

The representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Costa Rica, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Greece, Iceland, Israel, the Netherlands, Paraguay, Turkey, the United Kingdom, Uruguay and Yugoslavia also opposed the Czechoslovak draft resolution. They were of the opinion that it raised the same points which had been put forward by the USSR at the Assembly's sixth session, when a USSR draft resolution (A/2031) calling on the Assembly to condemn the Mutual Security Act of 1951 had been rejected, at the 358th plenary meeting on 11 January 1952, by 42 votes to 5, with 11 abstentions. The purpose of the "Soviet bloc" in again introducing the item under discussion, it was stated by these representatives, was not to help settle some of the outstanding issues or to create a more propitious atmosphere for their settlement, but to try, by means of an oblique manoeuvre, to win a propaganda battle in the cold war, to divert attention from actual Soviet policy and to shift the blame for the continuation of the current international crisis. The incongruity of the whole situation became more apparent, however, when the very States which only a year previously, on the basis of the irrefutable evidence produced by the Yugoslav delegation, had been shown before the Assembly to be guilty of the most flagrant acts of intervention in the domestic affairs of a country, now posed as innocent victims of interference in their own internal affairs and as ardent champions of non-intervention.

For many years, it was stated, the Soviet Union had been promoting subversive activities in free countries. Sometimes, the aggression took the form of carefully planned pressures and infiltration, open or disguised; sometimes, it exploited what was called the revolutionary situation, supporting insurgents whenever and wherever it was possible to find them by arms or by the threat of arms. In every country there was a Communist party which was a Soviet fifth column. It was indeed ironic that representatives of the Communist countries were using phrases like subversion, espionage, interference in the domestic affairs of other States, and transgression of international law, when the bitter experience of many countries had been to suffer from Communist activities in that direction. Moreover, the Czechoslovak delegation was not qualified to accuse another country of subversive activities against the established order and security of another State, when it represented a Government which owed its existence to foreign intervention. In Czechoslovakia, the interference from abroad had not been restricted to overthrowing the Government and replacing it by another; it had involved the submission of the whole people to the domination of a minority controlled and instructed from abroad with police techniques and terroristic methods. That had taken place in a country which, during the 20 years of its free existence, had been a model of democracy in action and an example of international co-operation.

The fact about which the Czechoslovak Government and its political friends were really complaining was that citizens of the Communist countries behind the Iron Curtain, in ever-growing numbers, preferred the freedom of the democratic Western world to the absolute and totalitarian system of the so-called "monolithic Communist bloc". Because they preferred liberty to serfdom, they chose to risk their lives in escaping across heavily guarded borders, leaving behind their belongings, their friends and, sometimes, their relatives. The free world received them as political refugees and endeavoured to give them a new lease on life. But the Communist world would not recognize the right of political refugees to prefer freedom to bondage. They were considered as traitors, spies or Fascists and those who received them, helped and treated them as human beings were condemned as aggressors and subversionists. Rendering aid to destitute political refugees was no crime.

The real purpose of the Kersten amendment, it was stated, could be understood only if it were considered in the general context of the aims and purposes of the Mutual Security Act, which was similar to the contents of Article 1 of the United Nations Charter. The Mutual Security Act aimed at building a healthy international community through economic development and collective security, and the purpose of the Kersten amendment was to give financial assistance to political refugees. That act of generosity had been necessitated by the unusual situation created as a result of pressures by Eastern European governments against their people; if those governments would soften their policy against dissident groups, it would reduce the flow of refugees, and thereby decrease the need for aid. Further, the policy of giving financial and other assistance to the refugees could by no means be considered as interference in the internal affairs of "Soviet bloc" countries. The right to grant asylum to political refugees was, in fact, internationally recognized. Such assistance had often been given; for instance, the USSR had given refuge to many escapees from Spain. On the contrary, the Mutual Security Act of 1951 should be considered as an example of co-operation among right-minded and freedom-loving countries in the slow but effective process towards economic reconstruction.

A number of representatives, including those of China, Cuba, Iceland and Turkey, described the economic assistance which had been given to their own countries under the Mutual Security Act. They said that the assistance had strengthened their economic structure as well as their national defence and had served the cause of international peace and security.

It thus appeared that the wholesale condemnation of the Act was illogical, because the special funds were only a small part of the credits which the Act intended for a series of purposes, such as economic assistance to Western Europe, to Korea and to the Palestine refugees. Those funds would be used by the President of the United States to assist political refugees to take part, if they so desired, in the defence of the North Atlantic Treaty community, on the understanding that a decision whether these refugees should form part of the NATO forces depended on the members of that organization. There was no reason to prevent those who so desired from serving in the armed forces of NATO which was an organization of defence against aggression. If the "Soviet bloc" felt anxiety about NATO, it had only itself to blame, because it was its own imperialistic policy which had called that organization into being. The Mutual Security Act was one of the foundations of NATO and, for millions of free men, the Act was tangible proof that a powerful nation wished to join with others in building up a system of legitimate collective defence in accordance with Article 51 of the United Nations Charter.

At the Committee's 589th meeting on 26 March, the Czechoslovak draft resolution was rejected by a roll-call vote of 41 to 5, with 14 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Israel, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Argentina, Burma, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Yemen.

Consequently, the First Committee did not recommend any resolution to the General Assembly on the item.

The representative of Iran said that if Czechoslovakia had confined itself to condemning all intervention, he would have supported the draft resolution; however, serious charges against a Member State had been made. These charges had been rejected and counter-charges had been made. Since his delegation was in no position to take a stand in regard to these assertions, he said, he had abstained. The representatives of Saudi Arabia and Syria supported this view. The latter, as well as the representatives of Egypt, Iraq and Lebanon, also abstained, they said, because the question of subversive Zionist activities had been raised. The Guatemalan representative said that he had abstained to emphasize that his delegation supported the principle of non-interference in the domestic affairs of States, and that this did not mean that he supported the accusations made by the "Soviet bloc" for which no convincing proof had been offered.

When the report of the First Committee (A/2377) came before the General Assembly at its 425th plenary meeting on 8 April, the representative of Czechoslovakia re-introduced his draft resolution (A/L.148) which was rejected by 40 votes to 5, with 14 abstentions.

The representatives of the USSR, the United States, Poland and Guatemala explained their positions, as indicated in the First Committee. The representative of Argentina, explaining his abstention, stated that his delegation could not support any proposal that was calculated to cause still further division, contrary to the aims which should be pursued by the United Nations.

N. DISARMAMENT

In accordance with the provisions of Assembly resolution 502(VI) of 11 January 1952,⁸¹ the item "Regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments: report of the Disarmament Commission"⁸² was placed on the agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly. The item was referred to the First Committee but consideration was deferred to the second part of the session.

1. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

a. DISCUSSIONS IN THE FIRST COMMITTEE

The First Committee considered the item at its 577th to 581st meetings, from 18 to 21 March 1953. It had before it two draft resolutions: a draft resolution submitted by Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Denmark, France, Greece, Lebanon, the Netherlands, Pakistan, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/C.1/L.30) and a draft resolution submitted by the USSR (A/C.1/L.31).

Under the fourteen-Power joint draft resolution, the General Assembly would:

(1) take note of the report of the Disarmament Commission, commend the Commission for its efforts to carry out the instructions laid down by the Assembly at its sixth session and commend the initiative of those members of the Commission who had submitted constructive proposals;

(2) reaffirm General Assembly resolution 502(VI) and request the Disarmament Commission to continue its work for the development by the United Nations of comprehensive and co-ordinated plans providing for: (a) the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments; (b) the elimination and prohibition of all major weapons, including bacterial, adaptable to mass destruction; and (c) the effective international control of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only—the whole programme to be carried out under effective international control and in such a way that no State would have cause to fear that its security was endangered; and

(3) request the Commission to report to the General Assembly and to the Security Council not later than 1 September 1953.

Under the USSR draft resolution, the General Assembly would find that the Disarmament Commission, especially in the persons of the representatives of the United States, France and the United Kingdom, had repeatedly attempted to substitute for the question of the reduction of armaments that of illegally obtaining intelligence reports on the armaments of individual States, disregarding the fact that, upon the adoption of the resolution concerning the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of atomic weapons, all States would be required to communicate complete information concerning their armaments to the United Nations.

Further, the Assembly would decide:

(1) to require the Disarmament Commission to proceed without delay to study practical measures for achieving armaments reduction, having primarily in view the reduction of the armaments of the Great Powers—the United States, the USSR, the United Kingdom, France and China—and to decide the questions of the unconditional prohibition of atomic weapons, bacterial weapons and other types of weapons of mass destruction and of the establishment of strict international control over compliance with those decisions; and

(2) to require the Commission to report to the Security Council and to the General Assembly not later than 1 July 1953 on the action taken to give effect to the resolution.

In presenting the fourteen-Power draft resolution, the representative of the United States referred to the recent changes in the USSR Government and asked, first, whether the USSR was ready for a constructive discussion of the disarmament question and, secondly, whether the USSR representative was prepared to negotiate in the United Nations to give tangible form to the policy of peace claimed by his Government.

He felt that, although the free world was being compelled to devote large resources to rearmament, considerable progress towards disarmament could be made if agreement could be reached on basic factors. Some of those factors had been approved by the General Assembly in its resolution 502(VI). However, he said, there were additional principles which were basic to any programme and they had been introduced into the Disarmament Commission on 24 April 1952.⁸³ The United States delegation had pointed out that the goal of disarmament was not merely to regulate armaments but to prevent war. To that end, all nations had to co-operate to establish an open and substantially disarmed world in which no State could prepare secretly for war.

International agreements to achieve disarmament should avoid at any stage an unequal balance of strength which would jeopardize peace. The United States insisted that any programme had to be fair to all countries and its proposals called for a drastic reduction of national armaments and the total elimination of all instruments of mass destruction. In contrast, the USSR was insisting on a programme which would upset the balance and leave the free world helpless to resist Soviet aggression while the programme was being carried out.

Thus, the United States representative continued, the General Assembly resolution had instructed the Disarmament Commission to consider from the outset plans for progressive and continuing disclosure and verification of all armed forces and armaments. On 5 April 1952, the United States had submitted specific proposals⁸⁴ on that matter which provided for progress from the less secret to the more secret areas but at the same time suggested a very sizeable disclosure at the first stage so that governments would be able to have a clear indication of the existing strength of all States in atomic and other armaments and armed forces. Completion of that stage would inspire international confidence and contribute to international peace and security.

In May 1952, the United States, together with the United Kingdom and France, had submitted proposals for the fixing of numerical ceilings on all armed forces,⁸⁵ which would have set equal ceilings for the United States, the Soviet Union and China between 1,000,000 and 1,500,000 and for the United Kingdom and France between 700,000 and 800,000. In practice, it would mean a more drastic reduction of the armed forces of the United States and the Soviet Union than that proposed in the USSR plan, which provided for an arbitrary reduction of one third from unknown levels.

With regard to the control of atomic energy, in the light of resolution 502(VI) the United States had continued to support the United Nations plan, while reaffirming its readiness to examine seriously any other proposals which might be submitted. And the United States had introduced a new element in its proposals for disclosure and verification, which expressly provided for disclosure of atomic armaments.

The United States had presented proposals concerning the elimination of bacterial weapons from national armaments which would bring that matter within the context of the broader problem of disarmament.

In conclusion, the United States representative said that, in fact, his Government had covered, by its own proposals or jointly with France and the United Kingdom, all topics essential to a disarmament programme. Other members of the Commission had recognized the effort to break the deadlock. But the Soviet Union had rejected the efforts to secure international co-operation towards disarmament and had impeded the work of the Commission. It had invented false charges of bacterial warfare in Korea. It had presented a virtual ultimatum for the adoption of the USSR proposals in the guise of a plan of work for the Commission. It had refused to clarify its own proposals despite attempts to elicit the details.

Believing that the efforts had to be continued, the United States had joined in submitting the draft resolution recommending the continuation of the work of the Disarmament Commission.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the USSR position had not changed materially since 1948 with respect to either atomic energy or conventional armaments. The USSR intention seemed to be to deprive the West of the atomic weapons which were, at the moment, its main safeguard against USSR preponderance in armed forces and conventional armaments.

The two so-called concessions made by the USSR at the sixth session of the General Assembly⁸⁶ had been examined in the Disarmament Commission. The proposal that the prohibition of atomic weapons and the institution of international control should take effect simultaneously obviously was incompatible with the USSR demand for an immediate declaration prohibiting the atomic weapon. The second "concession", that the international agency should undertake inspection on a continuing basis but without the right to interfere in the domestic affairs of States, had never been explained. In fact, it amounted to a demand for the abandonment of the United Nations plan for atomic energy control, since the USSR representative had said he would only explain his proposal when that plan had been renounced.

The working paper submitted by France, the United Kingdom and the United States containing proposals for the numerical limitation of all armed forces had been based on the idea that the number of men in the armed forces was a vital element in any plan for disarmament. The USSR representative had complained that the paper did not deal with atomic weapons; but it had not been intended to do so. He had then objected that the paper did not make it clear that naval and air as well as land forces would be covered by the proposals. When that matter had been clarified by the three Powers, the USSR representative had asserted that the proposals did not call for a reduction of existing forces, although the reduction would have been larger than the one third proposed by the USSR. It was time for the USSR to pass from slogans to action by co-operating in the work of the Disarmament Commission, the United Kingdom representative concluded.

The representative of France recalled that in the Commission his delegation had submitted proposals for a compromise solution on 24 June 1952⁸⁷ in connexion with the scheduling of prohibitions, limitations, disclosures and other parts of the programme. Such proposals had been presented as starting points, to be examined in good faith. However, no results had been obtained, due to Soviet insistence on proposals already rejected in the United Nations. There was no immediate prospect of agreement but the situation allowed hope of conciliation, he concluded.

Other sponsors of the fourteen-Power draft resolution, in reviewing the work of the Disarmament Commission, endorsed in general the positions outlined by the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States. They supported, as bases for negotiation, the several proposals put forward in the Disarmament Commission and criticized the attitude of the USSR delegation as negative and unco-operative. Their broad view was that little purpose would be served by an extended discussion in the First Committee of the various substantive proposals, but that the Disarmament Commission should be requested to continue its endeavours.

Recalling the various proposals for the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of atomic weapons which his country had made since 1946, the representative of the USSR stated that the lack of progress in the work of the Disarmament Commission was due to the three Western Powers' efforts to divert the Commission from its terms of reference. The questions presented by the United States representative were, therefore, merely a trick, since the USSR proposals had already been submitted and examined in the United Nations. Despite the opposition they had encountered, the USSR would continue to seek a solution in the United Nations, its representative said.

With regard to the work of the Disarmament Commission, he recalled that two methods of work had been advocated. The USSR had called for a decision on the unconditional prohibition of atomic and other weapons of mass destruction, the establishment of strict international control and the one-third reduction within one year of the armaments and armed forces of the five major Powers.

The three Western Powers had, however, opposed a detailed study of the USSR proposals at the sixth session, insisting on their transmission to the Disarmament Commission and putting forward a plan for collecting information on armaments. The second report of the Commission revealed that the three Powers had acted to have the Commission concentrate on the question of disclosure and verification and to divert it from its true task of devising a plan for the prohibition of atomic weapons and the reduction of armaments. That had been the objective of the plan of work proposed by the United States. The USSR had then submitted a working plan providing for concrete action. But the three Powers had forced the adoption of the diversionary United States plan, disguised as a French proposal.

The USSR representative denied that his Government had not elaborated its proposals regarding the international control of the prohibition of atomic weapons. As early as June 1947, the USSR had submitted a very detailed plan.⁸⁸ Then, at the sixth session, the USSR had further proposed that the prohibition of atomic weapons and the establishment of control should take effect simultaneously and that the control organ should have the right of inspection on a continuing basis, without interfering in the domestic affairs of States.

After adopting its plan of work, the Commission had made no effort to study practical proposals of any sort. It had preferred futile discussion of general issues or of disclosure and verification. The United States proposals for disclosure by stages were framed so as to obtain information on the armaments of certain countries while withholding data on atomic weapons. The United States had also submitted a proposal on essential principles for a disarmament programme which, the USSR representative held, apart from repeating principles contained in resolution 41(I),⁸⁹ revived the idea of a system which would conceal the firm intention of taking no action. The United States had sought to substitute vague declarations without binding force for the practical decisions required by the Commission's terms of reference.

⁸⁷ For a summary of the French proposals, see Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 319-20.

⁸⁹ The resolution declared that an international system should be established within the framework of the Security Council for: the regulation and reduction of armaments and armed forces; the prohibition of the use of atomic energy for military purposes; the elimination of atomic and other weapons of mass destruction; and the control of atomic energy to ensure its use for peaceful purposes only.

The three-Power proposal for fixing numerical limitations on all armed forces, the USSR representative said, had been designed to enable the United States, the United Kingdom and France to maintain their forces, particularly their naval and air forces, at the current level or even to increase them.

The United States, he concluded, had even opposed the discussion of the prohibition of bacterial warfare. Thus, the United States policy had been to prevent the Commission from making any progress and to proceed with the armament race.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR, supporting the USSR draft resolution, attributed the failure of the United Nations in the field of disarmament basically to the re-armament policies of the Western Powers, and in particular of the United States. In the field of atomic energy, these Powers had opposed the prohibition of atomic weapons, they said. The United States, these representatives said, had even refused to accede to an existing agreement on the prohibition of bacterial weapons. The basic objectives of the Disarmament Commission, which were the prohibition of the atomic weapon and the reduction of armaments, had thus been side-tracked in favour of the secondary questions of the disclosure and verification of information on conventional armaments.

On the other hand, the USSR for seven years had consistently striven to strengthen peace and to promote measures for the reduction of armed forces and armaments and the prohibition of atomic weapons, beginning with the submission of its proposals at the first session of the General Assembly which had led to the adoption of resolution 41(I). The proposals contained in the USSR draft resolution were a suitable basis for renewed negotiation and, if implemented in good faith, could bring about the solution of the whole problem of disarmament.

The representative of India said that the small Powers, instead of supporting either side, should try to act as catalytic agents and assist in bringing about a conciliatory spirit and opening a compromise route to agreement. Expressing a similar point of view, the representatives of Egypt and Syria stated that they had submitted jointly with Iraq and Yemen an amendment which, they considered, would facilitate co-operation among the major Powers by removing commendation of individual members of the Commission.

The four-Power amendment (A/C.1/L.52) would delete the commendation of the initiative of certain members of the Disarmament Commission and add an expression of hope for constructive co-operation in the Commission. The amendment was accepted by the sponsors of the joint draft resolution.

At the Committee's 581st meeting on 21 March, the fourteen-Power joint draft resolution was put to the vote in paragraphs, which were adopted by votes ranging from 59 votes to none, with 1 abstention, to 49 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 50 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions.

The USSR draft resolution (A/C.1/L.31) was rejected by 41 votes to 5, with 13 abstentions.

b. RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The General Assembly considered the First Committee's report (A/2373) at its 424th plenary meeting on 8 April 1953.

The representative of the USSR proposed that the Committee's draft resolution should be amended so as to delete: (1) from the first operative paragraph the clause commending the Commission for its efforts; and (2) from the second paragraph the clause reaffirming resolution 502 (VI). In order to reach an agreement, he said, he would not press for discussion of the USSR draft resolution and if the amendments were accepted his delegation would vote for the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee. He urged an attitude of conciliation and mutual concessions in order to reach agreement.

Sponsors and supporters of the fourteen-Power draft resolution expressed their readiness to accept the first USSR amendment. They were unwilling to agree to the deletion of the reaffirmation of resolution 502(VI), on the ground that such action would be open to the interpretation that to some extent the principles of that resolution were being impaired or abandoned.

Several representatives, expressing their desire for a spirit of conciliatory co-operation in the Disarmament Commission which they believed would be furthered by a unanimous resolution, stated that they would vote for, or abstain upon, the second USSR amendment.

The first USSR amendment was adopted without a vote. The second USSR amendment was rejected by 33 votes to 10, with 13 abstentions. In the voting on the several parts of the draft resolution, the only negative votes were cast in connexion with the clause reaffirming resolution 502(VI), which was adopted by 38 votes to 6, with 16 abstentions. The General Assembly then adopted the draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, by 52 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 704(VII).

It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recognizing that:

"Under the Charter of the United Nations all States are bound to settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations,

"The aim of a system of world-wide disarmament is to prevent war and release the world's human and economic resources for the purposes of peace,

"1. Takes note of the report of the Disarmament Commission;

"2. Reaffirms General Assembly resolution 502(VI) of 11 January 1952 and requests the Disarmament Commission to continue its work for the development by the United Nations of comprehensive and co-ordinated plans providing for:

"(a) The regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments;

"(b) The elimination and prohibition of all major weapons, including bacteriological, adaptable to mass destruction;

"(c) The effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only; The whole programme to be carried out under effective international control in such a way that no State would have cause to fear that its security was endangered;

"3. Requests the Commission to report to the General Assembly and to the Security Council no later than 1 September 1953, and hopes that all the members of the Commission will co-operate in efforts to produce constructive proposals likely to facilitate its task."

2. Third Report of the Disarmament Commission

Between the seventh and eighth sessions of the General Assembly, the Commission held one meeting, its 31st, on 20 August 1953. It unanimously adopted the draft text of its third report (DC/-32). It expressed the hope that recent international events would create a more favourable atmosphere for the reconsideration of the disarmament question, whose capital importance in conjunction with other questions affecting the maintenance of peace was recognized by all. It indicated that the Commission expected to continue its work and suggested that it present a report to the ninth session of the General Assembly and to the Security Council.

3. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

a. DISCUSSIONS IN THE FIRST COMMITTEE

The First Committee considered the item "Regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments: report of the Disarmament Commission" at its 658th to 669th meetings, from 6 to 18 November 1953.

The Committee had before it a joint draft resolution (A/C.1/L.72) by fourteen Powers, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Denmark, France, Greece, Lebanon, New Zealand, Pakistan, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Amendments⁹⁰ to this joint draft resolution were proposed by, among others, India (A/C.1/L.74/Rev.4), the USSR (A/C.1/L.75/Rev.3), Australia (A/C.1/L.76), Egypt (A/C.1/L.78), and two joint amendments by France, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/C.1/L.83 & A/C.1/L.84).

During the course of the debate, the fourteen-Power draft resolution was revised (A/C.1/L.72/-Rev.3) by the sponsors in the light of these amendments⁹¹ and the discussion.

Under the joint draft resolution, as finally revised (A/C.1/L.72/Rev.3), the General Assembly would, among other things:

(1) reaffirm the responsibility of the United Nations for considering the problem of disarmament and affirm the need of providing for: (a) the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments; (b) the elimination and prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other weapons of mass destruction; (c) the effective international control of atomic energy to insure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only;⁹²

(2) express the belief that the continued development of weapons of mass destruction such as atomic and hydrogen bombs had given additional urgency to efforts directed towards disarmament;⁹³

(3) state that settlement of present international disputes and the resulting confidence are vital to the attainment of peace and that efforts for disarmament should be made concurrently with progress in the settlement of disputes;

(4) express the belief that progress in either field would contribute to progress in the other;

⁹⁰ A number of drafting amendments were also submitted by some delegations which were later withdrawn. They are not dealt with here.

⁹¹ Phrases have been italicized and footnotes added to indicate changes incorporated from the amendments of various delegations.

⁹² Incorporating first joint amendment by France, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/C.1/L.83).

⁹³ Incorporating Australian amendment (A/C.1/L.76).

(5) express the realization that competition in the development of armaments and armed forces beyond what is necessary for the individual or collective security of Member States is not only economically unsound but also a danger to peace;⁹⁴

(6) recognize the general wish and affirm its earnest desire to reach agreement as early as possible on a comprehensive and co-ordinated plan under international control for the regulation, limitation and reduction of all armed forces and armaments, for the elimination and prohibition of atomic, hydrogen, bacterial, chemical and all such other weapons of war and mass destruction, and for the attainment of these ends through effective measures;⁹⁵

(7) take note of the third report of the Disarmament Commission;

(8) request the Commission to continue its efforts to reach agreement on the problems with which it was concerned, taking into consideration proposals made at the eighth session of the General Assembly, and to report again to the General Assembly and to the Security Council not later than 1 September 1954;⁹⁶

(9) call on all Member States and particularly the major Powers to intensify their efforts to assist the Disarmament Commission in its tasks and to submit to the Commission any proposals which they might have to make in the field of disarmament; and

(10) suggest that the Disarmament Commission should study the desirability of establishing a sub-committee consisting of representatives of the Powers⁹⁷ principally involved, which would seek in private an acceptable solution and report to the Disarmament Commission as soon as possible in order that the Commission might study and report on such a solution to the General Assembly and to the Security Council not later than 1 September 1954.

An amendment to the fourteen-Power joint draft resolution was submitted by the USSR which, as finally revised (A/C.1/L.75/Rev.3), would:

(1) replace the third paragraph of the preamble of the joint draft resolution (see above) by a new paragraph recognizing that, for the purpose of strengthening the peace and security of the nations and successfully settling controversial international problems, the primary task was to secure the immediate settlement of the question of the reduction of armaments, the prohibition of atomic and hydrogen weapons and the establishment of strict international control over the observance of that prohibition;

(2) amend the fourth paragraph of the preamble to express the belief that progress in the above-mentioned field would also contribute to progress in the settlement of other controversial international problems;

(3) replace the first operative paragraph (see (6) above) by a new paragraph according to which the Assembly would recognize that the use of atomic and hydrogen weapons as weapons of aggression and mass destruction was contrary to the conscience and honour of the peoples and incompatible with membership in the United Nations and declare that the government which was the first to use the atomic, hydrogen or any other instrument of mass destruction against any other country would commit a crime against humanity and would be deemed a war criminal; and

(4) replace the third operative paragraph (see (8) above) by a new paragraph providing that the Disarmament Commission would be requested to submit to the Security Council not later than 1 March 1954 proposals providing in the first place for a substantial reduction in the armaments of the five Powers—the United States, the United Kingdom, France, the People's Republic of China and the USSR—and also for the prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other types of weapons of mass destruction together with the simultaneous establishment of strict international control over the observance of that prohibition.

There were also before the Committee other amendments, parts of amendments submitted to the original fourteen-Power draft resolution and amendments to amendments⁹⁸ as follows:

(1) Part of an Indian amendment (A/C.1/L.74/Rev.4) to the revised fourteen-Power draft resolution. It would add a new operative paragraph by which the Assembly would suggest to the Disarmament Commission that, in order to facilitate the progress of its work, it should arrange for the Sub-Committee, when established, (see paragraph 10 of summary above), to hold its private meetings as appropriate in the different countries most concerned with the problem.

(2) An Indian amendment (A/C.1/L.85) to the USSR amendments to have the Assembly: (a) mention specifically that the reduction and regulation of armaments would include "problems of prohibition and elimination of atomic, hydrogen, chemical, bacterial and all such other types of weapons of mass destruction under international control and effective measures for the enforcement of such prohibition and elimination"; and (b) state in the preamble that progress in the settlement of disarmament questions would contribute to progress in the settlement of other controversial international problems and that progress in either field would contribute to progress in the other.

(3) A joint amendment to the USSR amendments submitted by the fourteen States sponsors of the joint draft resolution (A/C.1/L.87). It would state that, whatever the weapons used, aggression was contrary to the conscience and honour of the peoples and incompatible with membership in the United Nations and was the gravest of all crimes against peace and security throughout the world.

From time to time, members of the Committee also referred to the USSR draft resolution (A/2485/Rev.1) on "Measures to avert the threat of a new world war and to reduce tension in international relations".⁹⁹

⁹⁵ Incorporating part of the Indian amendment (A/C.1/L.74/Rev.4).

⁹⁶ Incorporating the second joint amendment by France, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/C.1/L.84).

⁹⁷ Incorporating an amendment by Egypt (A/C.1/L.78) and part of the Indian amendment (A/C.1/L.74/Rev.4).

⁹⁸ Certain of these amendments were withdrawn; for voting by the Committee on the remainder, see p. 267.

⁹⁹ For discussion of this item, see pp. 272-76.

Introducing the fourteen-Power joint draft resolution, the representative of the United Kingdom said that the Commission had not succeeded in carrying out any part of the tasks assigned in resolution 502(VI), despite repeated meetings in 1952. The United Kingdom, France and the United States had presented a series of proposals of a preliminary nature, subject to modification, but the Soviet Union would neither discuss them nor elucidate its own general proposals. However, he observed, it was to be hoped that some progress could be made before the next report of the Commission. There had already been some indications of lessened international tension and there was a possibility of negotiating settlements in various fields, including disarmament.

If the difficulties were to be overcome, certain propositions had to be understood. First, he considered, a continuing and increasing armaments race not only was an economic burden and contrary to the general desire to reduce armaments and armed forces and eliminate all weapons of mass destruction, but also was itself a danger to peace. Secondly, governments could only dispense with the protection of such weapons when they felt secure, partly because of a relaxation of tension and partly through international machinery which would assure that agreements were being observed. Thirdly, security could only come from a system of inspection and control with the necessary safeguards.

However, he observed, the Soviet Union demanded a decision banning all weapons of mass destruction and would only later take steps to reach agreement on ensuring observance of the ban. It proposed a one-third cut within one year of the armed forces of the five Great Powers, but made no mention of verification or control—quite apart from the fact that such percentage cuts would only accentuate the existing disequilibrium and not contribute to peace. The Soviet Union proposed an international conference but on a vague basis and without preparatory work; the United Kingdom believed that there should be concrete proposals to discuss, and supported the formula in resolution 502(VI), under which the Disarmament Commission would present a concrete basis for a conference.

There was no alternative to co-operative preparatory work in the Commission. The United Kingdom had therefore joined in sponsoring the draft resolution, which drew attention to the economic possibilities and called for a new start on the task of working out practical arrangements for disarmament.

The representative of the United States drew attention to statements by the United States President and Secretary of State and the resolutions passed by the United States Congress concerning the need for disarmament. He said that they affirmed the aim of the United States to seek agreements for enforceable limitation of armaments concurrently with efforts to secure settlements on specific political issues. At the seventh session of the Assembly, the United States representative continued, the USSR representative had not presented his Government's often-rejected proposals and had even voted for most parts of resolution 704(VII),¹⁰⁰ although it described the objectives of the Disarmament Commission in terms which had not previously been supported by the USSR. However, the USSR had submitted to the current session the old concepts concerning prohibitions by declaration and proportional reductions, along with complaints about military bases and what it called war propaganda.

The USSR scheme was to create a moral obligation to prohibit atomic weapons without a possibility of ensuring that the obligations would be honoured. But the prohibition of atomic weapons required more than USSR promises; it could be put into effect only if there were safeguards to protect against a violation.

The position of the United States on disarmament was quite clear, its representative said. The amassing of Soviet power had compelled the free nations to arm and to develop weapons capable of inflicting instant punishment on any aggressor. The free nations had no aggressive purpose and the United States would make every effort to achieve a disarmament agreement if the USSR showed a desire to negotiate honestly.

The representative of the USSR, supported by the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR, said that the causes of the Disarmament Commission's failure should be analysed in order to ensure a more productive future. Resolution 502(VI), he said, had had an important role in the Commission's failure because of the wrong directives it contained. At the seventh session, the USSR had attempted to secure the removal of the reference to that resolution in resolution 704(VII) in order to be able to press for a change of course which might have led to better results. The four-Power sub-committee at Paris had accomplished something because it had had freedom of action.¹⁰¹ Its results were of secondary importance, however, and important problems remained to be solved. Acting under the influence of resolution 502(VI), the Commission had concentrated on the secondary question of disclosure and verification of conventional armaments.

Any recommendation of the General Assembly which was not backed up by armed force could be called a "paper declaration", the USSR representative said. However, the prohibition of the production of atomic weapons would have the authority of the United Nations behind it and was the indispensable condition for effective control. If plans for control were drawn up they could not bring about or "ensure" prohibition if the production of atomic weapons had not been declared illegal. Control and prohibition should come into force simultaneously. But a control organ could not be set up to verify the non-production of atomic weapons when there was no prohibition.

The representative of the USSR stated that any self-respecting State which subscribed to a unanimous decision for the prohibition of the atomic weapon would be morally and politically bound to comply with such a decision. The USSR would strictly observe any such provision. A General Assembly decision on prohibition would not be only a piece of paper but a serious political act, binding on all those who voted in favour of it. Such a decision would have the effect of reducing international tension.

Instead of dealing with measures to reduce armaments and armed forces and to prohibit atomic weapons, the Commission had dealt with plans for gradual disclosure and verification of armaments and armed forces. Such measures, the USSR representative considered, would neither ensure reduction nor create the situation of confidence which had been advanced as a preliminary condition for reduction. But prohibition and reduction would themselves foster confidence and reduce tensions. The United States Secretary of State had said that merely working out a system would reduce tensions, but unfortunately the Commission had adopted a plan based on disclosure and verification without a hint about reducing armaments and armed forces.

The USSR proposal was that, once there was a declaration of the unconditional prohibition of the atomic weapon, it should not enter into force legally until a system of control had been instituted. If such a resolution were adopted, the USSR representative was prepared to announce that no atomic weapons would be produced in his country. However, if other representatives suggested that their countries might continue production, that would be an obstacle to the adoption of such a resolution.

In the United States plan for disclosure there were five stages, beginning with less important matters and moving forward only at the end to atomic weapons. The USSR opposed that system of stages.

The representative of the USSR criticized the United States policy which, he said, was based entirely on force. This was shown by the intensification of the race for armaments, by the reliance on weapons of mass destruction, by the building of military bases around the Soviet Union, even in Spain which had no connexion with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and by efforts to rearm Germany. The representative of the Soviet Union concluded by stating that advantage should be taken of the armistice in Korea to relax further the existing tension by abandoning the armaments race, which was closely linked with the question of European security, and by settling the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations.

The Disarmament Commission, he said, should elaborate practical proposals in line with the fundamental task of fostering international security. The Commission should be given a strict injunction to reach agreement designed to reduce armaments and armed forces, to prohibit unconditionally the atomic weapon and to institute an international control organ.

The representative of France said that the longer the establishment of atomic control was delayed, the less chance would it have of being effective. Although ascertaining the current production of a plant would be relatively easy, determining its previous production would be more difficult. The possibility of concealing previously produced stocks would weaken public confidence in verification. Accordingly, the French delegation believed that a control, though theoretically less perfect than another but acceptable to everyone and therefore quickly achieved, was better than another system which, whatever its excellence, had to be postponed to the detriment of its ultimate effectiveness. A short-term compromise was preferable to postponed perfection.

The difference as to the moment when prohibition would be declared and as to its nature was serious, stated the French representative. The USSR maintained that the decision should be immediate and unconditional, but should only take effect simultaneously with control. Others wished prohibition to be promulgated only after disclosure and verification of the military resources of each State and the signature of a control agreement. That difference entailed two others. First, the USSR did not agree that disclosure and verification should be completed before there were any measures to limit conventional weapons or prohibit weapons of mass destruction. Secondly, the idea of international ownership and control through management was opposed to the idea of control through continuing inspection without any right to management.

The representative of France referred to suggestions his delegation had made in the Commission on 24 June 1952 to reconcile the differences. The French delegation, he said, was prepared to present its compromise solution in a working document. It would be logical for the various decisions as to limitation and prohibition to appear at the head of the draft treaty so as to define the objectives clearly at the outset. The entry into force of those decisions would be made conditional, first, upon the successful completion and verification of preceding operations in a pre-arranged order and, secondly, upon the establishment in working order of the international control organ. But as soon as the control organ had confirmed the execution of the precedent operation, the next step would be automatically initiated and could not be postponed except by a decision that one of the two conditions had not been fulfilled.

A fresh effort at conciliation should be made with regard to the order in which the general programme of operations, set forth at the head of the treaty, should be put into effect, the representative of France continued. Operations might be divided into three groups: all operations relating to disclosure and verification; all those relating to the limitation of conventional armed forces and armaments; and all those relating to the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction. The French suggestion was that operations selected from these three groups should be executed simultaneously according to a prescribed order. The principles underlying such a solution were: that every advance in disarmament must be accompanied by an increase in the security of all parties; that every act of disarmament must be verified by the international organ; and that there should be automatic progress from one completed act to the next.

The general programme could then be envisaged in three stages. At the end of the first stage, total armed forces and military expenditure would have been disclosed and verified, limitation of both at existing levels would take effect and the use of bacterial and chemical weapons would be prohibited. At the end of the second stage, the main categories of conventional armaments and the numbers and sites of atomic plants would have been disclosed, further expansion of conventional armaments, quantitatively or qualitatively, would be prohibited and the manufacture of atomic and hydrogen bombs and of fissile materials in dangerous quantities would be suspended. At the end of the third stage, total armed forces and conventional armaments would be reduced from the levels laid down at the end of the first stage to those specified in the treaty, stocks of atomic and hydrogen bombs would be destroyed or made over for peaceful purposes, and the prohibition of the use of such weapons would come into force automatically while the plants could resume, under permanent and strict supervision, their production for peaceful purposes only. Control would then remain in operation to prevent any clandestine rearmament, while armed forces and conventional armaments would again be reduced from the levels of the third stage to those strictly necessary for each State to discharge its domestic and international responsibilities.

The representative of France said that his delegation was not committed to any particular detail in its general scheme. It would, however, submit proposals at the proper time on the detail of the matters to be included in the treaty and its annexes. In the search for agreement on disarmament, the Commission might assume provisionally that the international situation had improved while making final approval of the draft treaty conditional upon an improvement in the situation. And it might be useful for the Commission, in the spirit of the fourteen-Power draft resolution, to appoint a small sub-committee to explore the French and any other proposals. The sub-committee should meet in the principal capitals concerned and adjourn its sessions to a new meeting place whenever the governments needed time to take stock and prepare for fresh progress.

During the debate, a number of representatives, including those of Bolivia, Ecuador, the Netherlands, Norway, Peru, Sweden, the Union of South Africa, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, in addition to the sponsors, expressed themselves generally in favour of the fourteen-Power draft resolution. Several of them at the same time deplored the fact that the situation was such that it was not possible to envisage the adoption of a resolution which would do more to contribute to progress towards disarmament. The representatives of Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador and Egypt, among others, were critical of a paragraph in the preamble of the original draft which they interpreted as conditioning the provision of funds for development of economically backward areas upon success in disarmament. (The relevant paragraph would have expressed the confidence that once a disarmament programme had been agreed upon and put into effect, all States would stand ready to ask their peoples to devote a portion of the savings thereby achieved to an international fund to assist development and reconstruction in underdeveloped areas of the world. This paragraph was deleted during the course of revision.)

At its 669th meeting on 18 November, the First Committee voted on the revised fourteen-Power draft resolution (A/C.1/L.72/Rev.3, see above) and on the amendments and sub-amendments submitted, with the following results:

The first Indian amendment (A/C.1/L.85) to the Soviet amendment was rejected by 33 votes to 14, with 12 abstentions, and the second was withdrawn.

All the paragraphs of the USSR amendment (A/C.1/L.75/Rev.3) were rejected in votes ranging from 37 to 5, with 17 abstentions, to 33 to 14, with 12 abstentions.

By 36 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions, the Committee decided not to vote on the USSR amendment to the first operative paragraph of the joint draft resolution. By this amendment, the General Assembly would have recognized that the use of atomic and hydrogen weapons as weapons of aggression was contrary to the conscience and honour of peoples. The fourteen-Power amendment (A/C.1/L.87) to this amendment, by which the Assembly would have recognized that aggression whatever the weapons used was contrary to the conscience and honour of peoples, was adopted by 53 votes to none, with 6 abstentions. However, the paragraph thus amended was not put to the vote.

The Indian amendment (A/C.1/L.74/Rev.4), to add a paragraph suggesting that the sub-committee of the Commission envisaged under the draft resolution hold its meetings in the different countries concerned, was adopted by 45 votes to none, with 13 abstentions.

The various paragraphs of the joint draft resolution were adopted by votes ranging from 59 to none to 52 to none, with 5 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted, as amended, by a roll-call vote of 54 to none, with 5 abstentions.

b. RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The General Assembly considered the First Committee's report (A/2562) at its 460th meeting on 28 November. The USSR representative introduced amendments (A/L.167) to the draft resolution recommended by the First Committee which were the same as the final revision of the amendments he had proposed to the fourteen-Power draft resolution. The amendments were rejected by votes ranging from 36 to 8, with 14 abstentions, to 39 to 5, with 11 abstentions.

In the paragraph-by-paragraph voting on the draft resolution, the only negative votes cast were against the third paragraph of the preamble (see below). That paragraph was adopted by 50 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions.

The resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 54 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 715(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Reaffirming the responsibility of the United Nations for considering the problem of disarmament and affirming the need of providing for:

"(a) The regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments,

"(b) The elimination and prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other types of weapons of mass destruction,

"(c) The effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only, the whole programme to be carried out under effective international control and in such a way that no State would have cause to fear that its security was endangered,

"Believing that the continued development of weapons of mass destruction such as atomic and hydrogen bombs has given additional urgency to efforts to bring about effectively controlled disarmament throughout the world, as the existence of civilization itself may be at stake,

"Mindful that progress in the settlement of existing international disputes and the resulting re-establishment of confidence are vital to the attainment of peace and disarmament and that efforts to reach agreement on a comprehensive and co-ordinated disarmament programme with adequate safeguards should be made concurrently with progress in the settlement of international disputes,

"Believing that progress in either field would contribute to progress in the other,

"Realizing that competition in the development of armaments and armed forces beyond what is necessary for the individual or collective security of Member States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations is not only economically unsound but is in itself a grave danger to peace,

"Conscious of the continuing desire of all nations, by lightening the burden of armaments, to release more of the world's human and economic resources for peace,

"Having received the third report of the Disarmament Commission of 20 August 1953, submitted in accordance with General Assembly resolution 704(VII) of 8 April 1953,

"Endorsing the Commission's hope that recent international events will create a more propitious atmosphere for reconsideration of the disarmament question, the capital importance of which, in conjunction with other questions affecting the maintenance of peace, is recognized by all,

"1. Recognizes the general wish and affirms its earnest desire to reach agreement as early as possible on a comprehensive and co-ordinated plan, under international control, for the regulation, limitation and reduction of all armed forces and all armaments, for the elimination and prohibition of atomic, hydrogen, bacterial, chemical and all such other weapons of war and mass destruction, and for the attainment of these ends through effective measures;

"2. Recognizes that, whatever the weapons used, aggression is contrary to the conscience and honour of the peoples and incompatible with membership in the United Nations and is the gravest of all crimes against peace and security throughout the world;

"3. Takes note of the third report of the Disarmament Commission;

"4. Requests the Commission to continue its efforts to reach agreement on the problems with which it is concerned, taking into consideration proposals made at the eighth session of the General Assembly, and to report again to the General Assembly and to the Security Council not later than 1 September 1954;

"5. Calls on all Member States, and particularly the major Powers, to intensify their efforts to assist the Disarmament Commission in its tasks and to submit to the Commission any proposals which they have to make in the field of disarmament;

"6. Suggests that the Disarmament Commission study the desirability of establishing a sub-committee consisting of representatives of the Powers principally involved, which should seek in private an acceptable solution and report to the Disarmament Commission as soon as possible, in order that the Commission may study and report on such a solution to the General Assembly and to the Security Council not later than 1 September 1954;

"7. Further suggests to the Disarmament Commission, in order to facilitate the progress of its work, to arrange for the sub-committee, when established, to hold its private meetings as appropriate in the different countries most concerned with the problem."

c. STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

At the 470th plenary meeting of the General Assembly on 8 December the President of the United States made a statement on the nature of the dangers of atomic warfare and emphasized the urgent need to solve the problems involved by negotiation. The United States, he said, was prepared to follow the suggestion made by the General Assembly in resolution 715(VIII) for private conversations, in a sub-committee of the Disarmament Commission, of the Powers principally involved to seek an acceptable solution. In those conversations, the United States would work for the transfer of atomic energy from military to peaceful purposes. He concluded his statement with the following proposals:

"The governments principally involved, to the extent permitted by elementary prudence, should begin now and continue to make joint contributions from their stockpiles of normal uranium and fissionable materials to an international atomic energy agency. We would expect that such an agency would be set up under the aegis of the United Nations. The ratios of contributions, the procedures and other details would properly be within the scope of the 'private conversations' I referred to earlier.

"The United States is prepared to undertake these explorations in good faith. Any partner of the United States acting in the same good faith will find the United States a not unreasonable or ungenerous associate.

"Undoubtedly, initial and early contributions to this plan would be small in quantity. However, the proposal has the great virtue that it can be undertaken without the irritations and mutual suspicions incident to any attempt to set up a completely acceptable system of world-wide inspection and control.

"The atomic energy agency could be made responsible for the impounding, storage and protection of the contributed fissionable and other materials. The ingenuity of our scientists will provide special safe conditions under which such a bank of fissionable material can be made essentially immune to surprise seizure.

"The more important responsibility of this atomic energy agency would be to devise methods whereby this fissionable material would be allocated to serve the peaceful pursuits of mankind. Experts would be mobilized to apply atomic energy to the needs of agriculture, medicine, and other peaceful activities. A special purpose would be to provide abundant electrical energy in the power-starved areas of the world.

"Thus the contributing Powers would be dedicating some of their strength to serve the needs rather than the fears of mankind.

"The United States would be more than willing—it would be proud to take up with others 'principally involved' the development of plans whereby such peaceful use of atomic energy could be expedited.

"Of those 'principally involved' the Soviet Union must, of course, be one.

"I would be prepared to submit to the Congress of the United States, and with every expectation of approval, any such plan that would, first, encourage world-wide investigation into the most effective peacetime uses of fissionable material, and with the certainty that the investigators had all the material needed for the conducting of all experiments that were appropriate; second, begin to diminish the potential destructive power of the world's atomic stockpiles; third, allow all peoples of all nations to see that, in this enlightened age, the great Powers of the earth, both of the East and of the West, are interested in human aspirations first rather than in building up the armaments of war; fourth, open up a new channel for peaceful discussions and initiate at least a new approach to the many difficult problems that must be solved in both private and public conversations if the world is to shake off the inertia imposed by fear and is to make positive progress towards peace."

O. QUESTION OF MEASURES TO STRENGTHEN PEACE

1. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

In a letter dated 18 October 1952 (A/2229), the representative of Poland requested the inclusion in the agenda of the Assembly's seventh session of the item "Measures to avert the threat of a new world war and to strengthen peace and friendship among the nations".

At the same time Poland submitted a draft resolution, according to which the General Assembly would recommend:

with regard to Korea:¹⁰² (1) the immediate cessation by the parties of military operations on land, at sea and in the air; (2) the return of all prisoners of war to their home countries, in accordance with international standards; (3) the withdrawal from Korea of foreign troops, including the Chinese volunteer units, within a period of from two to three months, and the peaceful settlement of the Korean question on the basis of the principle of unification of Korea, the unification to be achieved by the Koreans themselves under the supervision of a commission, with the participation of the parties immediately interested and of other States, including the States which had not taken part in the war in Korea.

The Assembly, desiring to avert the threat of a new world war, would further recommend: (1) to the Governments of the United States, the USSR, the United Kingdom, France and China—the permanent members of the Security Council—that they reduce by one third within one year their armed forces, including air, naval and auxiliary forces, and submit full data on their armaments; and (2) to the Security Council that it call as soon as possible an international conference for the carrying out by all States of the reduction of armed forces.

The Assembly would also call for the adoption without delay of a decision for the unconditional prohibition of atomic weapons and other weapons of mass destruction and for the establishment of strict international control over the observance of that decision by all States. It would further call on all States which had not acceded to or ratified the Geneva Protocol of 17 June 1923 on the prohibition of the use of bacterial weapons to accede to or ratify that instrument.

Finally, in terms of the draft resolution, the Assembly would: (1) declare participation in the aggressive North Atlantic bloc, which had brought about an ever-growing armaments race and had aggravated international tension, incompatible with membership in the United Nations; (2) call upon the United States, the USSR, the United Kingdom, France and China, to conclude a peace pact designed to bring about the reduction of the armaments of the Great Powers and the strengthening of peace among the nations; and (3) call upon all other States to adhere to the peace pact.

The First Committee considered the item at its 594th to 604th meetings, from 9 to 16 April 1953.

At the 594th meeting, Poland submitted a revision (A/C.1/L.39) of its draft resolution, to alter that part dealing with Korea and relating to the repatriation of prisoners of war to provide that the General Assembly should recommend to the parties engaged in the war in Korea the immediate resumption of truce negotiations, it being understood that in the course of such negotiations the parties would exert every effort to reach agreement both on the question of the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war and on the question of prisoners of war as a whole, endeavouring thereby to remove the obstacles preventing the termination of the war in Korea.

The Polish representative stated that the group of measures contained in the Polish proposal constituted a coherent and logical whole. If adopted and carried into effect, they would make it possible to avert the threat of war and to improve the international situation. It was obvious that there could be no slackening of international tension without the cessation of hostilities in Korea. It was also obvious that the effective co-operation of the five Powers, which must find expression in the conclusion of a peace pact among them, was essential in order to maintain world peace and forestall further acts of aggression. It was, lastly, obvious that the maintenance of peace was incompatible with the armaments race and the production of weapons of mass destruction. Millions of men throughout the world were awaiting the cessation of the war in Korea, peaceful co-operation among the five Powers, the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction.

The Polish proposal was strongly supported by the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR. They stated that there could be no tranquillity in the world as long as the Korean war had not been settled. The United Nations should aid directly in the negotiations in Panmunjom and not take a passive stand, as had been advocated by some speakers in order, it was stated, to hamper chances of ending the Korean war by linking its cessation with other questions, such as the conclusion of an armistice and an agreement on prisoners of war. These representatives expressed support for Premier Chou En-lai's recent proposal¹⁰³ that the prisoner issue be settled by turning over to a neutral custody any captive refusing immediate repatriation. An appeal had been made for an end to hostilities, a settlement of the prisoner-of-war issue, the conclusion of an armistice and the restoration of peace. That appeal was in line with the desire for peace of all peoples and would contribute to the strengthening of peace and friendship among the peoples of the Far East, they said.

With regard to the reduction of armaments and armed forces, they recalled that speakers in the Disarmament Commission¹⁰⁴ had argued that such a reduction was impossible without first creating "a favourable atmosphere". But it was perfectly clear that measures for such a reduction would in themselves help to lessen international tension, eliminate suspicion and create that favourable atmosphere. The United Nations should not simply wait for the atmosphere to improve. It was false to argue that a proportionate reduction, as proposed in the Polish draft resolution, would leave the USSR in a preponderant position. It had already been shown that the forces of France, the United Kingdom and the United States were constantly increasing and were twice as numerous as those of the USSR. According to President Truman's message to Congress in 1952, the armed forces of the United States had been increased by over a million in 1951, and the increase had continued since then. In any case, percentages of reduction were of little importance if they did not apply to the air and naval forces as well as land forces. It was well known that the United States air force had more than doubled since 1950 and would be tripled in 1953. The same applied to that country's naval forces. That was why the three Western Powers had ignored the reduction of air and naval forces in their proposal to the Disarmament Commission.

The representative of the USSR also argued that the starting point for disarmament should be a decision to prohibit the atomic weapon unconditionally. In the Disarmament Commission, however, the Western Powers had confined themselves to stating that, if their proposal was adopted, it would constitute a declaration in favour of the prohibition of such weapons. Although that proposal provided for a control system it did not provide for prohibition of atomic weapons. That was tantamount to saying they would continue to be made.

Criticizing the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the programme for the defence of the European community, the USSR representative said that NATO was a violation of the United Nations Charter and participation in that organization was incompatible with membership in the United Nations. NATO's purposes were aggressive; it was a "closed group" operating in the exclusive interests of its members and not promoting the general interest. Moreover, it was set up without provision for any relationship with the Security Council.

It had been claimed that the USSR had also concluded agreements similar to the Atlantic Treaty, but those agreements were of a completely different character; they were defensive agreements against possible aggression by Japan or its allies, or by Germany or its allies. NATO, on the other hand, aimed at including Western Germany with its 25 divisions and at reviving Nazi militarism, the USSR representative stated.

It was incorrect to argue that a peace pact between the Great Powers was superfluous in view of the existence of the United Nations Charter. It was strange that those who argued this way represented States which were members of regional pacts or unions, such as the Inter-American pact, all of which existed side by side with the Charter.

A majority of representatives, including those of Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Greece, Israel, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Peru, Thailand, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay, maintained that the Polish proposals concerned questions which had already been dealt with by the Security Council, the General Assembly and the Disarmament Commission.

As regards that part of the Polish draft resolution concerning Korea, these representatives found it unacceptable, stating that most of its provisions had already been examined and rejected by the General Assembly. Moreover, it was pointed out, the Polish draft resolution had been conceived in October 1952 and failed, even as revised, to take into account the resolutions passed by the General Assembly in the last six months such as resolution 610(VII)¹⁰⁵, containing the principles for the repatriation of prisoners of war which had been rejected by the Chinese-North Korean side. It also failed to take into account the changed atmosphere on the question of the repatriation of prisoners of war. Thus, on 11 April, an agreement had been reached between the United Nations Command and the other side in Korea on the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war.

On 30 March, Premier Chou En-lai of the Chinese People's Republic had made new proposals for settling the entire question of the repatriation of prisoners of war. Immediately after the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners, negotiations at Panmunjom would be resumed and there was reason to believe that the new Chinese-North Korean proposals would lead to the removal of the last obstacles to an armistice. Therefore, it was maintained, there was no point in debating parts of the Polish proposals dealing with Korea. Indeed, such a discussion might jeopardize the negotiations in Korea.

Referring to the pan of the Polish proposals dealing with disarmament, these representatives said that they were equally pointless and even harmful. They also ran counter to the decision taken by the General Assembly in resolution 704(VII) of 8 April 1953¹⁰⁶, by which it decided to continue the Disarmament Commission. The proposal concerning a one-third reduction of armaments by the Great Powers had been submitted each year since 1948 and had been rejected each time by the General Assembly. During the seventh session, however, the USSR had not demanded a flat percentage cut of armed forces, but had merely proposed (A/C.1/L.31) the study of practical measures for achieving reduction of armaments and armed forces of all States, particularly those of the Great Powers. That change of attitude had, it was stated, given grounds for hope that the USSR was prepared to negotiate seriously on arms reduction. In those circumstances, it was argued, the Polish proposal represented a step backwards to the rigid formula which had blocked progress in the past.

As regards the proposal calling for the immediate, unconditional prohibition of atomic weapons, that had also been consistently rejected by the General Assembly as inadequate. It was obvious that the exclusive peaceful use of atomic energy could be achieved only if an effective system of international control was first instituted and an agreement reached on the details of the safeguards necessary for the prohibition of atomic weapons.

The question of the Geneva Protocol of 1925, these representatives said, had also been dealt with. The United Nations had already proposed¹⁰⁷ that an impartial inquiry should be carried out regarding the false USSR charges that the United Nations forces had used germ warfare in Korea, but there had been no response from the USSR and its followers. Moreover, since the question was also before the Disarmament Commission, it did not seem either desirable or necessary to take any action on the matter.

The sections of the Polish draft resolution dealing with NATO and a five-Power peace pact, these representatives held, were also unacceptable. All the pacts in the world would remain mere words unless they were accompanied by a sincere desire to give them practical content. If, it was said, agreement could be reached on such questions as Korea, Austria, the repatriation of German, Italian and Japanese war prisoners, or on the issue of Greek soldiers and children, it would certainly be an augury of peace and hope. Moreover, the United Nations Charter was itself a solemn peace pact. Hence, there was no need for a new pact; all that was required was faithful adherence to the terms of the Charter.

These representatives contended that NATO was a defensive alliance created in accordance with Article 51 of the Charter in pursuance of the right of collective defence acknowledged in that Article. More than 40 States were members of one or more such defensive systems. All the governments participating in NATO were governments of free and democratic peoples and it was unthinkable that they should choose war as an instrument of international policy. The danger would come from those governments which were not based in the free will of the people. These representatives stated that NATO was an open organization and its projects were known to all. However, the military agreements concluded by the USSR were closed, secret and exclusive. The strength of the USSR and its satellites was not known and caused apprehension among the free nations.

During the debate, references were also made to the alleged revival, in certain countries, of anti-semitism, to the dangers of Zionism and to the existence of colonialism, particularly in North Africa.

At the 600th meeting on 14 April, Brazil submitted a draft resolution, which, after two revisions incorporating drafting amendments, provided (A/C.1/L.40/Rev.2) that the General Assembly should, inter alia:

¹⁰⁶ See under Disarmament.

¹⁰⁷ See pp. 156-57.

(1) note with deep satisfaction that an agreement had been signed in Korea on the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war;

(2) express the hope that the exchange would be promptly effected and that further negotiations would result in an early armistice consistent with United Nations principles and objectives; and

(3) decide to recess the seventh session upon completion of the current agenda items, and request the President to reconvene the seventh session to resume consideration of the Korean question (a) upon notification by the Unified Command to the Security Council of the signing of an armistice agreement in Korea, or (b) when, in the view of a majority of Members, other developments in Korea required consideration of this question.

Introducing the draft resolution, the Brazilian representative stated that, at the current stage, the Committee should neither indulge in an attitude of unwarranted optimism nor despair of progress, ignoring the signs of hope which constituted current political facts. In its draft resolution, Brazil had, therefore, tried to formulate certain points and principles which had found unanimous support in the Committee.

Notwithstanding the diverse points of view, "a minimum area of agreement" had been established in the Committee and his delegation felt that those points of agreement should be stressed.

Several representatives welcomed the Brazilian proposal, which, it was generally agreed, could do nothing to impede progress in the preliminary stages toward a general settlement in Korea.

At the final meeting of the Committee's debate on 16 April, the representative of Poland announced that he would not press for a vote on the Korean provisions in the Polish draft resolution, in view of the new initiative by the Chinese and the North Koreans on the prisoner-repatriation issue, and also in view of the introduction of Brazil's proposal. He added that he would not insist either on a vote on the two other sections of his delegation's draft since the Committee's debate had shown that the problems raised therein called for further consideration than the limited time allowed. Poland, however, reserved its right to raise the problems at the next session.

In accordance with this statement, the Polish draft resolution was not put to the vote, while the Brazilian draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

At the 427th plenary meeting on 18 April 1953, the General Assembly unanimously adopted the draft resolution proposed by the First Committee (A/2386).

Several speakers hailed "this unique unanimity" as an auspicious sign. The representative of Poland stressed that the Polish decision not to ask for a vote on its own proposal but to support the Brazilian resolution was not an "opportunistic move or mere gesture" but reflected the unchanged policy of the Polish Government to support any genuine peace proposal. At the end of the meeting, the President of the Assembly expressed the good wishes and hopes of all Member States for an early and successful conclusion of the important task being undertaken at Panmunjom.

The resolution (705(VII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Reaffirming its unswerving determination to spare no efforts likely to create conditions favourable to the attainment of the purposes of peace and conciliation embodied in the Charter of the United Nations,

"Noting, following the United Nations Command initiative for the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war, the communication by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China dated 31 March 1953 to the President of the General Assembly, and the exchange of communications between the United Nations Command and the Commanders of the Chinese People's Volunteers and the Korean People's Army in regard thereto,

"Confident that a just and honourable armistice in Korea will powerfully contribute to alleviate the present international tension,

"1. Notes with deep satisfaction that an agreement has been signed in Korea on the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war;

"2. Expresses the hope that the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war will be speedily completed and that the further negotiations at Panmunjom will result in achieving an early armistice in Korea, consistent with the United Nations principles and objectives;

"3. Decides to recess the present session upon completion of the current agenda items, and requests the President of the General Assembly to reconvene the present session to resume consideration of the Korean question (a) upon notification by the Unified Command to the Security Council of the signing of an armistice agreement in Korea; or (b) when, in the view of a majority of Members, other developments in Korea require consideration of this question."

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

By a letter dated 21 September 1953 (A/2485/Rev.1), the USSR requested the inclusion in the agenda of the General Assembly's eighth session of the following item: "Measures to avert the threat of a new world war and to reduce tension in international relations". It submitted the following draft resolution:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting that the cessation of hostilities in Korea is an important contribution to the reduction of tension in international relations, and that it has created more favourable conditions for further action to avert the threat of a new world war,

"Noting, at the same time, that in a number of countries the armaments race, far from abating, is being continued on an even greater scale, and that weapons of mass destruction, as a result of the latest advances in the application of atomic energy for this purpose, are becoming ever more destructive and dangerous for many millions of people,

"With the object of averting the threat of a new world war and strengthening the peace and security of nations,

"1. Declares atomic, hydrogen and other types of weapons of mass destruction to be unconditionally prohibited, and instructs the Security Council to take immediate steps to prepare and implement an international agreement which will ensure the establishment of strict international control over the observance of this prohibition;

"2. Recommends to the five permanent members of the Security Council, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, France and China, which bear the chief responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, that they reduce their armed forces by one-third within one year; and with a view to the alleviation of the burden of military expenditure recommends to the Security Council that it call as soon as possible an international conference for the carrying out by all States of the reduction of armaments;

"3. Recognizes that the establishment of military, air and naval bases in the territories of other States increases the threat of a new world war and operates to undermine the national sovereignty and independence of States;

"The General Assembly,

"Recommends to the Security Council that it take steps to ensure the elimination of military bases in the territories of other States, considering this a matter of vital importance for the establishment of a stable peace and of international security;

"4. Condemns the propaganda which is being conducted in a number of countries with the aim of inciting enmity and hatred among nations and preparing a new world war, and calls upon all governments to take measures to put a stop to such propaganda, which is incompatible with the fundamental purposes and principles of the United Nations."

The First Committee considered the item at its 670th to 677th meetings, from 19 to 27 November 1953. No amendment was submitted to the USSR draft resolution, nor was any other draft resolution presented.

The representative of the USSR, in introducing the resolution, declared that the present item was the most important question in the Assembly's agenda. Great tension existed in international relations and it was necessary to take effective measures to reduce this in order that the peoples of the world could build their lives as they deemed fit. Some parts of the question had been discussed during the examination of the report of the Disarmament Commission, but it was necessary to consider the whole question in this broader framework. The Soviet Government regarded the problem as of major importance and had repeatedly taken the initiative, both on the diplomatic level and in the United Nations, in trying to solve it. When the USSR had proposed a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the United States, the United Kingdom, France, the USSR and the People's Republic of China, it had had in mind not only the examination of the German problem and questions concerning the security of Europe, but also the consideration of other measures for reducing international tension. Settlement of the Korean and German questions, for instance, would serve that goal, as would agreement on participation of the Chinese People's Republic in the meeting of the Great Powers, for one could not speak seriously of settling international problems without discussing relations between the United States and the Chinese People's Republic. If agreement concerning such a conference were reached, a concrete step would have been taken towards reducing international tension.

The USSR draft resolution outlined measures which, if adopted and implemented, would have such an effect, he stated. However, influential circles in the West were not interested in reducing tension, because they considered the cold war as a preparatory stage in unleashing a new world war for world domination and because they were extracting vast profits from the cold war and the militarization of their industry, with the attendant armaments race, organization of new military bases, conclusion of new military alliances and stockpiling of atomic bombs, he said.

The strategy of the cold war had had sinister effects on the economic conditions of many countries, particularly those which were economically under-developed. Further, the economy of the United States was rushing headlong into a crisis of over-production, and, as in the past, American monopolies were trying to avoid this crisis by increasing military production and fostering the armaments race. However, those measures could not avert a crisis. On the contrary, the concentration on military production aggravated still further the disproportion prevailing in the capitalist economy, which widened the cleavage of trade between East and West and led to further intensification of international tension. Conversely, the strengthening of economic ties between the East and West would aid in the reduction of such tension.

The USSR representative denied the statements by the three Western Powers that the reduction of international tension was dependent on the Soviet Union. The latter's proposal for a Big-Five conference had been met with the convening of the Bermuda Conference, which, because of its separate character and goals, could only intensify the tension. On the other hand, the USSR proposal to invite the Chinese People's Republic to participate in a conference of the Five Powers would reduce the differences between the East and West. A similar aim was evinced in the USSR proposal for the halting of the armaments race and a substantial reduction of armaments as well as an unconditional prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other types of weapons of mass destruction and the establishment of strict international control over that prohibition. If there were no prohibition of atomic arms and no strict international control, there would be no progress in solving the problems involved.

The American Baruch-Lilienthal Plan was considered inadequate in many quarters in the United States, but official spokesmen still supported it. Under the guise of a plan to prohibit atomic weapons and establish international control, what was actually contemplated was the establishment of an organ which would not prevent the production of atomic weapons. The USSR representative said that a committee of American scientists had prepared a report which admitted that the Baruch Plan would not require the United States to discontinue production of atomic weapons after the adoption of the plan and the coming into operation of the control organ. Furthermore, considering the eventual composition of the control organ, it was obvious that the rationing, contemplated by the Baruch Plan, of the raw materials necessary to the production of atomic energy would be carried out in such a manner as to frustrate the production of atomic energy for peaceful ends. Thus, the Baruch Plan would kill the application of atomic energy for peaceful purposes but would in no way constitute an obstacle to the utilization of that energy in certain countries for warlike ends.

The United States and other parties to the "North Atlantic bloc", he stated, already possessed more numerous armed forces than the Soviet Union, which had demobilized 33 classes since the war. Therefore, the objections raised to proportional reduction were invalid. The proposals of the three Western Powers for establishing ceilings¹⁰⁸ for the armed forces of the USSR, the United States and China did not take account of the facts. The borders of the Soviet Union could hardly be compared with the land frontiers of the United States. Furthermore, those States having fewer effectives but possessing tremendous naval and air armadas, as well as strings of military bases in foreign territories in the immediate vicinity of the territories of other States, were much more dangerous than those other States which had their armies situated inside their country.

To reduce international tension, it was also important that efforts should be made to eliminate propaganda designed to foment hatred and enmity against nations. Such propaganda, the USSR representative said, was inimical to peace and international co-operation. He charged that the United States Congress was participating in hate campaigns and that one of its committees on foreign relations had issued literature which was full of such propaganda.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR supported the USSR draft resolution and endorsed the views expressed by the USSR representative. They dwelt, among other things, on the necessity, in order to solve international problems, of according the People's Republic of China its rightful place in the United Nations, of removing the threat to the USSR and the peoples' democracies presented by the existence of United States military bases all over the world and of abandoning the policy of rearmament followed by the Western Powers.

In reply, the representative of the United States said that the draft resolution was purely a propaganda move designed to slander the United States.

He recalled that his country and other nations which wanted a reduction of international tension had put forward proposals which might lead to a programme of balanced and effectively controlled reduction of armaments. The Soviet Union, on the other hand, he said, was making no practical attempt to reduce tensions, either in the United Nations or elsewhere.

Various resolutions of the Assembly in past years had put the question of propaganda in its proper perspective and the United States had supported all of them and every recommendation contained in them. They were still operative, and nothing further was needed in the way of resolutions along that line. What was needed was a desire to live up to the spirit of those resolutions.

The United States representative declared that the American Press was free and that the best means of bringing about a change in its attitude would be for the Soviet Union to change its policy. However, anyone in the United States who did not approve of his local newspaper's attitude to the USSR could buy The Daily Worker which was a faithful translation of Pravda. He could also listen to Radio Moscow and read the Soviet Union representative's speeches, which were printed in all American papers. In the United States, everyone was free to learn the views of every other country in the world. The United States representative then gave a description of anti-American plays and films in Moscow and articles and cartoons in the Russian Press, and finally declared that there was nothing in the Soviet Union to counteract that type of hate propaganda. There were no free newspapers or radio stations. The USSR Government had devoted considerable efforts to ensuring that the only picture of the United States available to its public was the one turned out by the party propaganda machine.

The United Kingdom representative pointed out that part of the USSR proposal had already been referred for study to the Disarmament Commission, where real progress might perhaps be made if the USSR would permit examination of the problems with which the Commission was concerned.

So far, he declared, the eighth session of the Assembly had not made any real progress. But, while the situation had not improved, it did not appear to have become worse. Experience had shown that there was no simple solution of the problems facing the world. Hope must not lie in the adoption of high-sounding resolutions, but in painstaking and persevering work aimed at solving problems one by one and at courageously seeking new formulas, undaunted by failures and disappointment.

As to the question of disarmament, the United Kingdom representative said the USSR seemed always to direct its propaganda against the type or armaments in which it was weaker or against facilities of which it had no need. That applied to the issue of military bases and also the dissociation of atomic from conventional weapons. The great land mass of the Soviet Union enabled it to move its forces in all directions for offensive as well as defensive purposes. The situation of the United Kingdom, with its small area, was entirely different; its security depended upon its having defensive facilities far from its own shores. The banning of bases in foreign countries would not harm the Soviet Union, but it would gravely impair the collective security of the free world.

The representative of France stated that the Polish delegation had withdrawn a proposal similar to the present USSR proposal in order to reach unanimity on the question of Korea.¹⁰⁹ He suggested that if the USSR withdrew its proposals similar unanimity would be achieved on the draft resolution adopted by the First Committee regarding the conversations to be held on the question of disarmament.¹¹⁰ The five abstentions on that draft resolution might then be converted into affirmative votes in the plenary meeting and the proposed conversations might yield results. He considered that the USSR proposal pursued propaganda aims and lacked real goodwill. That, he said, was proved by the Soviet attitude towards certain problems, such as the question of the Austrian Peace Treaty.

Supporting the views expressed by the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States, the representatives of several other countries, including those of Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, the Dominican Republic, Greece, the Netherlands, Peru, the Philippines and Uruguay, maintained that the USSR draft resolution was basically the same as those submitted in the previous years and consistently rejected by the General Assembly. The USSR, they urged, should co-operate with the overwhelming majority of Members of the United Nations on such questions as those of disarmament and the unification of Germany, and on problems affecting Asia.

In his second intervention, the representative of the USSR replied to, among others, the representative of the United Kingdom. The latter, he said, had claimed that the USSR was trying to isolate the prohibition of atomic weapons, which would be in its interest, from the reduction of conventional armaments, which would not be to its advantage. This idea, according to the representative of the USSR, was based on the illusion that certain countries still had a monopoly of atomic weapons. This monopoly, however, had ended, since the USSR now had atomic and hydrogen bombs. Nevertheless, the USSR persisted in its proposal for the prohibition of those weapons.

At the 676th meeting on 26 November, the Committee voted on the USSR draft resolution (A/2485/Rev.1) paragraph by paragraph. The first paragraph of the preamble was adopted, by 21 votes to none, with 30 abstentions. The rest of the draft resolution was rejected in votes ranging from 29 to 12, with 9 abstentions, to 32 to 5, with 14 abstentions.

¹⁰⁹ See under section 1 of this chapter.

¹¹⁰ See pp. 262-67.

When the First Committee's report (A/2579) was considered by the General Assembly at its 461st plenary meeting on 30 November, the USSR again introduced its draft resolution (A/L.168). A number of representatives explained their votes in accordance with the position they had taken in the First Committee.

The USSR draft resolution was voted on by paragraphs, the first paragraph of the preamble being adopted by 19 votes to 4, with 28 abstentions, and the second and third paragraphs being rejected by 29 votes to 7, with 17 abstentions, and 32 votes to 6, with 13 abstentions, respectively. The first operative paragraph was rejected by 34 votes to 5, with 12 abstentions, and the second operative paragraph by 39 votes to 5, with 12 abstentions. Since both operative paragraphs had been rejected, the resolution as a whole was not put to the vote. The Assembly, therefore, adopted no resolution on this agenda item.

P. METHODS TO MAINTAIN AND STRENGTHEN INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY

By resolution 503 A (VI) of 12 January 1952, the General Assembly directed the Collective Measures Committee to continue its studies for another year and to report to the Security Council and the General Assembly before its seventh session. The Committee duly submitted its report (A/2215) to the seventh session.¹¹¹

The report was included in the Assembly's agenda under the title: "Methods which might be used to maintain and strengthen international peace and security in accordance with the Purposes and Principles of the Charter: report of the Collective Measures Committee".

The question was considered by the First Committee at its 573rd to 576th meetings, from 12 to 16 March 1953.

The Committee had before it a joint draft resolution by Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, France, the Philippines, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States, Venezuela and Yugoslavia (A/C.1/L.27), providing that the Assembly should, inter alia, take note of the second report of the Collective Measures Committee and express appreciation of its constructive work, instruct it to continue its work until the ninth session and to report to the Security Council and the General Assembly not later than that session, and in particular direct it to:

(1) pursue studies to strengthen the capability of the United Nations to maintain peace, taking account of the "Uniting for peace" resolution (377 A (V)),¹¹² Assembly resolution 503(VI)¹¹³ and the proposed resolution;

(2) continue to examine information received from States pursuant to the three resolutions; and

(3) suggest to the Security Council and to the General Assembly specific ways and means to encourage further preparatory action by States.

In accordance with the draft resolution, Member States would be recommended and non-member States invited to give careful consideration to the Committee's reports, to continue and intensify their efforts to carry out the recommendations of the three Assembly resolutions and to keep the Committee informed of their progress in this respect. (For text of resolution as adopted, see below.)

As on earlier occasions, a considerable part of the discussion in the First Committee centred on the question of the legality of the Collective Measures Committee.

The majority of speakers expressed support for the work of the Collective Measures Committee. The sponsors of the joint draft resolution, as well as the representatives of Peru and the Netherlands, emphasized that the task of the Committee was not inconsistent with the powers of the Security Council under the Charter. In this connexion, it was pointed out that the Committee's report had not been presented solely to the General Assembly, but also to the Security Council. The measures recommended in the report were primarily available to the Council and should be employed by the Assembly only if the Council failed to act. But while the Council had primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, it did not have sole or exclusive responsibility, the representatives of Canada and the Netherlands stated. It was absurd, the representative of the Netherlands continued, to argue that the Security Council alone could act in cases of a breach of the peace, because that would imply that a single Member State could compel 55 other Member States to remain passive in the face of aggression or could prevent them from exercising their right of collective self-defence.

The collective measures, the representatives of Australia, the Philippines, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia stressed, were not designed for use against any particular State or group of States. It had been very properly understood, the Yugoslav representative stated, that any attempt to turn the United Nations into a military alliance or an ideological front would be infinitely dangerous.

The representative of the United States declared that the increased capacity of the United Nations Members to combine their strength in case of need would act as an incentive to pacific settlement, since aggressors were tempted to commit aggression only when they thought they could get away with it. The "Uniting for peace" resolution was directed solely against aggression, not against any specific nation or nations. It was a tragedy, he said, that the USSR should see, or claim to see, enmity against itself in the adoption of that and subsequent resolutions in defence of peace. In the electronic age, hours, minutes and even seconds might be decisive. The need for quick action to resist sudden attacks put a premium on advance planning. The Canadian representative likewise stressed that the United Nations should be organized to act quickly.

The representative of Poland, on the other hand, stated that the purpose of the Collective Measures Committee had been to prepare the ground for an illegal transfer of the powers of the Security Council to the General Assembly. Member States, he asserted, did not favour the proposed collective measures. Eighteen States had sent in positive replies to the Committee's requests for information in 1951, while only fourteen had done so in 1952. The representative of Czechoslovakia declared that the item under discussion was designed to deceive public opinion. The activities of the Collective Measures Committee had, he contended, completely confirmed the fact that the so-called system of collective security was an integral part of the aggressive plans and preparations carried out in the interests of the United States monopolists by the United States Government and its associates in the aggressive "Atlantic bloc". Thus, it was not surprising for the United States delegation and its friends in the Committee to express warm appreciation of the work. Hypocritical and untrue assertions could deceive no one and could not conceal the reality that collective measures were a tool of American imperialism directed against the Soviet Union, the peoples' democracies and international peace and security, he said.

The representative of the USSR, in explaining his vote against the resolution, stated that it was clear from the second report of the Collective Measures Committee that one of the objectives was to organize an economic blockade of the USSR, the People's Republic of China and the peoples' democracies. Moreover, the study of such questions as the equitable sharing of expenses, the question of mobilizing the specialized agencies, the question of a voluntary reserve and the question of the establishment of a group of military experts, he said, demonstrated the fact that the Committee had violated the basic provisions of the Charter in dealing with questions which normally fell within the jurisdiction of the Security Council and its Military Staff Committee. It was not, he said, the rule of unanimity which had prevented the Security Council from functioning, but the constant attempts of the United States and its supporters to circumvent the Council and to carry out their military plans under the flag of the United Nations.

The representatives of Australia, Canada, Saudi Arabia, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States pointed out that the measures proposed in the Committee's report implied no prior commitments on the part of Member States.

The representative of Sweden recalled that his delegation had formerly pointed out that a Security Council decision in pursuance of Article 41 or 42 of the Charter constituted an obligation on Member States. On the other hand, even if the General Assembly approved a recommendation by a two-thirds majority, Member States were not bound by such a recommendation but each State had the right to decide for itself whether it would take part in compulsory measures.

The representatives of Brazil, Egypt, Guatemala, Peru, Mexico and Venezuela emphasized that only the government concerned was in a position to judge the extent of its own ability to contribute to collective measures. The representative of Mexico stated that his Government gave absolute priority to regional commitments. Consequently, Mexico did not feel that there could be an automatic contribution to a United Nations collective action. The Organization of American States had to be guided in that matter, not merely by the United Nations Charter, but also by the principles of the Charter of the Organization of American States and the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance.

The representatives of Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen stated that they would support the draft resolution, with the reservations that their votes would not be construed as limiting the Arab Defence Pact and that nothing would be done under the terms of the resolution, such as occupying a territory of a participating State, without the consent of the State concerned.

Several speakers, among others the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, New Zealand, the Philippines and the United States, stressed the importance of the question of sharing equally the burdens resulting from the application of collective measures. The States which made the initial contribution to collective measures would be entitled, the representative of New Zealand stated, referring to the memorandum submitted by his Government to the Collective Measures Committee, to expect that their fellow Members should make haste to supply their own quota of forces. If that was not possible, then the other Members should at least give financial assistance towards the operation or might also be able to participate in collective measures by offering bases or other facilities. This suggestion was supported by the representative of Venezuela. The representative of the Philippines, on the other hand, pointed out that there was a danger in such suggestions, because they might encourage the Member States to make their contributions in other than military forces. He, as well as the representatives of El Salvador and Venezuela, agreed that the question of equitable sharing of the burden should be studied more thoroughly.

While some representatives, including those of Australia and China, felt that the Collective Measures Committee should be made a standing body, other speakers expressed the view that the Committee should only be continued for a limited time to finish up certain points; among other things, to study the Secretary-General's proposal to establish a United Nations volunteer reserve. The representative of New Zealand even doubted that the amount of work to be done justified the continuance of the Committee in its present form. The United Nations should be on its guard to avoid undue complications in international organizations and the continuance of bodies which had completed their work or were too elaborate for the purpose on hand. His delegation nevertheless supported the draft resolution in the hope that further studies would be helpful in rounding out the work already achieved.

The representative of Indonesia explained that he would abstain from voting on the draft resolution, since he felt that the employment of the Collective Measures Committee would only tend to increase international tension and that its terms of reference emphasized coercive measures, disregarding procedures for conciliation. The Indian representative supported this view and he, as well as the representative of Mexico, further expressed the view that the United Nations should devote itself to a study of measures for the peaceful settlement and conciliation of disputes.

At its 576th meeting on 16 March, the Committee adopted (A/2370) the joint draft resolution by 52 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

It was adopted by the General Assembly at its 415th plenary meeting on 17 March 1953, without discussion, as resolution 703(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having received the second report of the Collective Measures Committee,

"Affirming the need for strengthening further the system of collective security under the authority of the United Nations,

"Finding that to this end further steps could be taken by States and by the United Nations in accordance with the Charter and in conformity with the "Uniting for peace" resolution (377 A (V)) and with resolution 503(VI),

"1. Takes note of the second report of the Collective Measures Committee and expresses appreciation of the constructive work done by the Committee during the past year, particularly in the economic field, including the preparation of lists of arms, ammunition and implements of war and of strategic items for consideration by the Security Council or the General Assembly in the application of a selective embargo;

"2. Requests the Collective Measures Committee to continue its work until the ninth session of the General Assembly, as directed in paragraph 4 below, for the maintenance and strengthening of the United Nations collective security system;

"3. Recommends to States Members, and invites States not Members of the United Nations:

"(a) To give careful consideration to the reports of the Collective Measures Committee;

"(b) To continue and intensify their efforts to carry out the recommendations of the "Uniting for peace" resolution and of resolution 503(VI);

"(c) To keep the Collective Measures Committee currently informed of the progress they are making in this respect;

"4. Directs the Collective Measures Committee:

"(a) To pursue such studies as it may deem desirable to strengthen the capability of the United Nations to maintain peace, taking account of the "Uniting for peace" resolution, resolution 503(VI) and the present resolution;

"(b) To continue the examination of information received from States pursuant to the "Uniting for peace" resolution, resolution 503(VI) and the present resolution;

"(c) In the light of its studies, to suggest to the Security Council and to the General Assembly such specific ways and means as it may deem appropriate to encourage further preparatory action by States;

"(d) To report to the Security Council and to the General Assembly not later than the ninth session of the Assembly."

Q. ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

1. Report of the Special Committee on the Admission of New Members

General Assembly resolution 620 A (VII) of 21 December 1952¹⁴⁴ established a Special Committee to make a detailed study of the question of the admission of States to membership in the United Nations, examining the proposals and suggestions which had been made in the Assembly and its Committees or which might be submitted to the Special Committee by any Members of the United Nations. The study was to be conducted in the light of the relevant provisions of the Charter, the discussions in the Assembly and its Committees and in the Security Council, the advisory opinions of the International Court of Justice, the other antecedents of the question and the principles of international law.

The Special Committee¹⁴⁵ held eleven meetings, from 31 March to 15 June 1953. After a general debate, it agreed, at its fifth meeting on 22 May, that for convenience of discussion the various proposals and suggestions referred to it by the Assembly or made in the Committee itself should be separated into two groups.

The first group consisted of:

(1) The draft resolution submitted by Peru (A/AC.61/L.30)¹⁴⁶ in the Ad Hoc Political Committee during the seventh session, which, among other things, would have the General Assembly: (a) resolve to note that the opinions, votes and proposals laid before the Security Council concerning the admission of new Members signified that the States whose applications had failed to obtain the recommendation of the Council by reason of the "veto" of a permanent member of the Council were unanimously recognized as fulfilling the conditions required for membership under Article 4, and (b) resolve to consider each of the applications of those States in the light of the purposes and principles of the Charter and of various circumstances set forth in the preamble to the draft resolution.

(2) The joint draft resolution submitted by Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua (A/AC.61/L.31)¹⁴⁷ in the Ad Hoc Political Committee during the seventh session, which would have the Assembly, inter alia: (a) deduce, from the San Francisco Statement of the Sponsoring Powers on 7 June 1945 on voting procedure in the Security Council, that the admission of new Members was not subject to the veto but was to be dealt with by procedural vote of any seven members of the Council; and (b) decide to consider separately each pending application and in each case to decide in favour of or against admission in accordance with the merits of the case and the results of a vote taken in the Security Council in conformity with Article 27, paragraph 2, of the Charter.

(3) An Argentine amendment (A/AC.61/L.36)¹⁴⁸ to that joint draft resolution, also submitted in the Ad Hoc Political Committee, which provided for a reference to the interpretation of the Advisory Committee of Jurists, approved at the San Francisco Conference, recognizing the powers of the Assembly to reject a recommendation to the effect that a given State should not be admitted to the United Nations and accordingly to decide favourably on its admission to membership. The amendment would also have the Assembly resolve to consider each application on its merits and decide on it accordingly.

(4) An explanatory memorandum submitted to the Special Committee by Cuba (A/2400, Annex 5), expressing the view that the question of admission of new Members should be governed by a procedural vote in accordance with the Statement by the four Sponsoring Powers at San Francisco on 7 June 1945. The Security Council, according to the memorandum, had to decide the previous question of whether or not the question of admission of new Members was subject to a procedural vote. The practice of the Security Council had not been consistent in regard to that subject. On one occasion, the Council had concluded that the previous question should be decided by a procedural vote on the basis of a presidential ruling under rule 30 of the provisional rules of procedure. Following that precedent, the Council could thus take a decision in respect of admission of new Members by an affirmative vote of any seven of the members of the Security Council, the memorandum stated.

The second group consisted of the following proposals and suggestions:

(1) An Argentine proposal, submitted to the Special Committee as a working document (A/2400, Annex 6) by which the Assembly would: (a) refer to the general feeling in favour of the universality of the United Nations; (b) state that in admitting new Members the particular circumstances of each applicant State should be considered; and (c) recommend that the Security Council re-examine the applications for admission submitted by Albania, the People's Republic of Mongolia, Bulgaria, Romania, Hungary, Finland, Italy, Portugal, Ireland, Jordan, Austria, Ceylon, Nepal and Libya and make recommendations on each of them to the General Assembly.

(2) An explanatory memorandum submitted to the Special Committee by Egypt and the Philippines (A/2400, Annex 7), which stated the belief that the Special Committee should consider proposals aimed at resolving the political impasse which had prevented the admission of new Members. It was not possible, the memorandum said, to circumvent the rule of unanimity which had been observed in the Council in respect to voting procedure on membership questions. In the circumstances the only possibility of effecting the admission of a number of qualified States was offered by the so-called "package proposal", under which the Security Council would reconsider the simultaneous admission of fourteen applicant States: Albania, the People's Republic of Mongolia, Bulgaria, Romania, Hungary, Finland, Italy, Portugal, Ireland, Jordan, Austria, Ceylon, Nepal and Libya. These States would have to fulfil the requirements of Article 4 of the Charter, and in the General Assembly any Member could oppose the inclusion of certain States in the package and present concrete evidence that they did not fulfil those requirements. The admission of two or more States at the same time was not forbidden by any provisions of the Charter, provided they were all deemed to be qualified.

In the conclusion to its report (A/2400), the Special Committee observed that, generally speaking, the proposals and suggestions in the first group envisaged a solution of the problem along the lines of interpretation of the Charter based on the views that the voting procedure of Article 27, paragraph 3, of the Charter did not apply to the admission of new Members and that under Article 4, paragraph 2, it was for the Council to make recommendations but for the General Assembly to decide. Discussion of the first group of proposals and suggestions had made it apparent, however, that such an approach was not generally acceptable, principally on the grounds that the unanimity rule in the Security Council applied to the admission of new Members and that the provisions of Article 4 did not allow the Assembly to admit new Members in the absence of a favourable recommendation by the Council.

The proposals and suggestions in the second group, the report continued, aimed mainly at a political solution of the question, starting from the view that the largest possible number of applicants qualifying under Article 4 should be admitted. However, although the importance of the political aspects of the problem had been recognized, the specific methods suggested had not secured general acceptance. It had been felt that the courses proposed either would not be in strict accordance with Article 4, or, if they were, were not more likely to lead to practical results than earlier recommendations for reconsideration by the Security Council.

The Special Committee, in accordance with the view of many representatives, had agreed that no vote would be taken on the various proposals and suggestions, that no specific recommendation would be submitted to the General Assembly and that the report should be limited to a comprehensive account of the Special Committee's deliberations.

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

At the Assembly's eighth session, the item "Admission of New Members" was considered by the Ad Hoc Political Committee at its third to twelfth meetings, from 2 to 15 October.

a. VIEWS EXPRESSED IN THE Ad Hoc POLITICAL COMMITTEE

During the discussions in the Committee, most representatives welcomed the fact that the Special Committee had judged it wiser not to submit any specific recommendations to the Assembly and that it had not committed itself to any one of the various proposals before it.

A number of representatives, including those of Afghanistan, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Canada, China, Egypt, France, Greece, India, Indonesia, Israel, Lebanon, New Zealand, Pakistan, Syria, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia, opposed a solution of the question by means of an interpretation of the Charter by the General Assembly, as had been suggested in the first group of proposals listed by the Special Committee. Several of these representatives regarded the various proposed solutions as involving a departure from the clear meaning of the relevant Charter provisions. They held that it was clear that the rule of the unanimity of the permanent members of the Security Council was applicable to recommendations for the admission of new Members and that, accordingly, such a recommendation could not be adopted by a procedural vote in the Council. In that connexion, reference was made to the fact that Articles 5 and 6 of the Charter, which deal with suspension and expulsion of Members, use language analogous to that of Article 4. The subject matter of those Articles could scarcely be regarded as of a procedural or unimportant nature. It was also pointed out that Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter specifically states that the question of admission of new Members is an important matter on which the General Assembly's decisions must be taken by a two-thirds majority of Members present and voting. That being so, it could not be an unimportant or procedural matter for the Security Council. The argument that the wording of Article 4, paragraph 2, meant that the Assembly was the principal organ which finally determined the question of admission had been rejected in the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of 3 March 1950, in which the Court had pointed out that the Council and the Assembly were both principal organs of the United Nations, neither being in a subordinate position. However regrettable it might be, the rule of unanimity of the permanent members of the Security Council would be applicable to the admission of a new Member as long as the permanent members wished to exercise it.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR also supported the conclusion of the Special Committee's report which stated that a solution along the lines of interpretation of the Charter was not generally acceptable. The Special Committee's conclusion, they held, was correct and in conformity with the Charter. The USSR representative considered that the report and conclusions of the Special Committee showed that the advocates of the policy of favouritism towards certain States and discrimination towards others had suffered a setback. Some members of the Special Committee, he said, had refused to acquiesce in any interpretation of the Charter which was illegal and infringed the principle of unanimity of the permanent members of the Security Council. He considered that the statements of the Egyptian and Philippine representatives in the Special Committee had revealed that the true cause of the deadlock on the question was the policy of discrimination practised by certain Members rather than the so-called obstructiveness of the USSR.

It was also significant, said the USSR representative, that the Special Committee had refrained from supporting the arguments of the opponents of the simultaneous admission of the fourteen States which had submitted applications. The Special Committee had not formulated a definite opinion on the subject, but several representatives had clearly stated that no provision in the Charter prevented the Council from considering simultaneously several applications for admission and from submitting a recommendation favouring the collective admission of those States. He, as well as the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR supported the so-called "package proposal" and contended that the prevailing deadlock was due to the attitude of certain States which made a distinction between "acceptable" and "unacceptable" applicants, whereas neither the Charter nor any other United Nations document contained any stipulation that the United Nations should be an organization of States all having the same political system.

A number of representatives, however, including those of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Costa Rica, Greece, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, opposed the admission of new Members en bloc on the ground that this was not in accordance with Article 4 of the Charter. This Article, it was emphasized, restricted the right of membership to peace-loving States, able and willing to carry out the obligations laid down in the Charter. It implied, they held, that admission should be considered individually and this view, they pointed out, had been confirmed by the International Court of Justice. Some representatives, including those of Argentina, France, Greece and Pakistan, considered, however, that applicants might be admitted simultaneously but that each should be considered on its own merits.

Fourteen of the nineteen pending applications, the United States representative said, had come from countries which the great majority of Member States judged to be qualified for admission, and which represented a large segment of the world and had differing governmental structures and cultural backgrounds. Those States, however, had been unable to enter the Organization because the USSR veto in the Security Council had closed the door. Nevertheless, the USSR intended to trade its vote in the Security Council in support of nine of those States for admission of the five States sponsored by the USSR, which would mean the United Nations would have to abandon the principles and provisions of Article 4. The United States Government, he said, would not accept a deal made in disregard of principles because, if the "package" proposal were accepted, it would imply that the five States sponsored by the USSR were "peace-loving" which his Government was unable to admit. Although it was anxious that the fourteen States fulfilling all the requirements should enter the United Nations, his delegation considered it more important for the Organization to maintain its integrity as an organ for the preservation of peace.

The representatives of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United Kingdom supported the views expressed by the United States representative, emphasizing that the deadlock was due to the indiscriminate use of the veto by the USSR.

However, some representatives, in particular the representative of Burma, considered that applicants were being kept from membership not because they lacked qualifications, but because they were "candidates of the other side". It was true, said the Burmese representative, that the USSR had been using the veto, but it should be remembered that since 1951 the USSR had been one among eleven. The other Great Powers had had sufficient support from like-minded Members to prevent a Soviet-sponsored applicant from receiving the necessary majority, thus avoiding the individual use of the veto, which any Great Power might use defensively if it found itself similarly isolated.

The representatives of Argentina, Costa Rica, Cuba, El Salvador, Honduras and Peru favoured solution of the problem by interpretation of the Charter and repeated the arguments put forward in support of the various proposals sponsored by their delegations in the Ad Hoc Political Committee at the previous session of the General Assembly and in the Special Committee. Similar views were expressed by the representatives of Chile, the Dominican Republic and Turkey, among others. The sponsors of the proposals in question, however, indicated that they would not insist on a vote on those proposals for the time being, pending completion of the work of the Committee of Good Offices, as proposed by Peru (see below).

A number of representatives, including those of Afghanistan, Bolivia, Burma, Colombia, Denmark, Egypt, Guatemala, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Liberia, Mexico, Norway, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sweden, Syria, and Yugoslavia, laid particular stress upon the principle of the universality of the Organization. The United Nations, it was stated, could not be the monopoly of the privileged nations at the expense and to the detriment of other nations. The Charter was based on the principle of the peaceful coexistence of all political, economic and social systems of the world.

b. DRAFT RESOLUTIONS BEFORE THE Ad Hoc POLITICAL COMMITTEE

The Committee had before it three draft resolutions, one submitted by Peru (A/AC.72/L.1) which was revised twice (A/AC.72/L.1/Rev.1 & 2) to incorporate certain amendments proposed during the discussion (see below), and two draft resolutions by the USSR (A/AC.72/L.2 & A/AC.72/L.5).

The Peruvian draft resolution, in its original form, provided that the General Assembly:

(1) having examined the report of the Special Committee on Admission of New Members;

(2) considering that the aims of the Charter of the United Nations would be furthered through the co-operation of all peace-loving States;

(3) considering that efforts of the General Assembly to facilitate the admission of new Members had not met with success;

(4) believing that a new effort to find a solution to the problem of admission of new Members should be without prejudice to the juridical positions maintained by individual Member States and to any further consideration of the subject by the Assembly;

(5) would decide to establish a Committee of Good Offices, consisting of representatives of three Member States, empowered to consult with members of the Security Council with the object of exploring the possibilities of reaching an understanding which would facilitate the admission of qualified new Members, in accordance with Article 4 of the Charter.

The Committee would report to the General Assembly as appropriate.

Argentina submitted an amendment (A/AC.72/L.3) to this draft at the third meeting on 2 October, to delete the first and third paragraphs of the preamble, to reword the beginning of the fourth paragraph and to provide that the proposed Committee of Good Offices should report to the General Assembly on the results of its consultation within four weeks after the approval of the resolution.

The amendment was withdrawn at the sixth meeting of the Committee on 7 October, as a result of statements by various representatives who held that such a time limit should not be set upon the proposed Committee. The representative of Peru, however, accepted the suggestion of the representative of Argentina that the third paragraph of the preamble of the Peruvian text should be deleted. A revised version of the Peruvian draft resolution (A/AC.72/L.1/Rev.1) omitted that paragraph.

The following amendments were submitted to the revised Peruvian draft resolution:

(1) A Cuban amendment (A/AC.72/L.6), to substitute for the provision that the proposed Good Offices Committee would report to the Assembly as appropriate a provision that the Committee would submit a report on its work to the Assembly not later than the ninth session.

(2) A USSR amendment (A/AC.72/L.7) to the Cuban amendment, to provide that the proposed Good Offices Committee should be requested to report to the eighth session of the General Assembly.

(3) A Lebanese amendment (A/AC.72/L.8) to the revised Peruvian text, providing that the proposed Committee should submit a report to the eighth, or, at the latest, to the ninth session of the General Assembly.

(4) A joint amendment by France and Mexico (A/AC.72/L.4), to insert a new paragraph to the effect that the General Assembly consider that universality of membership in the United Nations was subject only to the provisions of the Charter.

At the twelfth meeting on 15 October, the representative of Peru submitted a second revision of his draft resolution (A/AC.72/L.1/Rev.2), incorporating the amendments of Cuba (A/AC.72/L.6) and of France and Mexico (A/AC.72/L.4). He also accepted an earlier suggestion made by the representatives of Indonesia and Pakistan to delete the word "qualified" from the first operative paragraph.

During the discussion, most representatives expressed support for the Peruvian draft resolution either in its original form or as revised. No speakers expressed opposition to the draft resolution. A number of representatives, including those of the United States and the United Kingdom, declared that they interpreted the revised draft resolution as precluding any political understanding not strictly in accordance with the provisions of the Charter, and that they considered that the proposed Committee would have no authority to negotiate the "package" proposal for admission.

At its twelfth meeting on 15 October, the Committee voted on the revised draft resolution and the amendments. The preamble and the first operative paragraph of the resolution were each adopted by 57 votes to none. Prior to the vote on the preamble, the USSR representative requested that his abstention be recorded on the second paragraph, which had originally been the French-Mexican amendment. The Committee, by 56 votes to none, with 1 abstention, adopted a Brazilian oral proposal that the Committee of Good Offices should consist of representatives of Egypt, the Netherlands and Peru. It rejected, by 30 votes to 5, with 20 abstentions, the USSR amendment (which had become an amendment to the revised Peruvian draft resolution following the inclusion in that draft of the Cuban amendment) and adopted the Lebanese amendment by 23 votes to 11, with 23 abstentions.

The revised draft resolution, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

The first USSR draft resolution (A/AC.72/L.2) provided that the Assembly should request the Security Council to reconsider the applications of Albania, the People's Republic of Mongolia, Bulgaria, Romania, Hungary, Finland, Italy, Portugal, Ireland, Jordan, Austria, Ceylon, Nepal and Libya, with a view to making a recommendation for the simultaneous admission of these States to membership in the United Nations.

The draft resolution was opposed by, among others, the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, Costa Rica, El Salvador, France, Greece, Honduras, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom, and the United States, on the ground that it ran counter to the provisions of Article 4 of the Charter and to the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of 28 May 1948, which had held that a Member State was not juridically entitled to make its consent to the admission of a State dependent on conditions not expressly laid down in Article 4, paragraph 1, and that it could not subject its affirmative vote to the additional condition that other States be admitted at the same time.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, on the other hand, held that the USSR proposal was the only possible and fair solution of the deadlock which had resulted from the discriminatory policy followed by certain Member States. Other representatives, including those of Argentina, Burma, Denmark, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Lebanon, Mexico, Norway, Pakistan, Sweden and Syria, supported the proposal on the ground that it constituted a serious attempt to arrive at a compromise or at least showed the direction in which a solution could be found. Some of these representatives, including those of Argentina, Burma and Pakistan, however, regretted the exclusion of certain applicant States from the list in the USSR draft resolution.

In view of the discussion, the USSR representative indicated at the tenth meeting on 13 October that he would not insist on this draft resolution being put to the vote.

Meanwhile, at the ninth meeting on 12 October, he submitted a second draft resolution (A/AC.72/L.5) by which the Assembly:

(1) considering that the Treaties of Peace with Bulgaria, Hungary, Romania, Finland and Italy specially provided that the Allied and Associated Powers would support the applications of those States for membership in the United Nations;

(2) considering that those States had applied for admission in 1947;

(3) would request the Security Council, as a first step towards settling the question of the admission of new Members, to re-examine the applications of those States with a view to adopting a recommendation for the simultaneous admission of all of them to membership in the Organization.

The representative of the USSR stressed the obligation undertaken in the Treaties of Peace by the Allied and Associated Powers and expressed the hope that some of the Governments that had not fulfilled that international political obligation would be prepared to support the applications of these five States as a first step towards breaking the deadlock on admission and easing political tensions.

The majority, however, found this proposal less acceptable than the USSR proposal for the simultaneous admission of the fourteen States. Among those who had supported the first USSR proposal, some representatives, including those of Argentina, Denmark, Lebanon, Pakistan and Syria, regarded the second draft resolution as a move in the wrong direction, since it restricted, rather than increased, the number of applicants to be admitted. The representatives of the Union of South Africa, Greece and New Zealand, among others, pointed out that the clause of the Peace Treaties to which reference was made in the draft resolution, was merely an "enabling clause" and involved no automatic commitment on the part of the Allied and Associated Powers to support those applications. Moreover, the New Zealand representative said, Article 103 of the Charter made it clear that obligations under a treaty were secondary to obligations under the Charter.

Following the adoption of the Peruvian draft resolution, the representative of the USSR stated that, pending completion of the work of the Committee of Good Offices, he would not insist on a vote on the second USSR draft resolution (A/AC.72/L.5).

c. RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY
THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The draft resolution recommended by the Ad Hoc Political Committee (A/2520) was unanimously adopted by the General Assembly at its 453rd plenary meeting on 23 October 1953, as resolution 718(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having examined the report of the Special Committee on Admission of New Members,

"Considering that universality of membership in the United Nations is subject only to the provisions of the Charter,

"Considering that the aims of the Charter of the United Nations would be furthered through the co-operation of all peace-loving States,

"Believing that a new effort to find a solution to this problem should be without prejudice to the juridical positions maintained by individual Members of the United Nations and to any further consideration of the subject by the General Assembly,

"1. Decides to establish a Committee of Good Offices, consisting of the representatives of Egypt, the Netherlands and Peru, empowered to consult with members of the Security Council with the object of exploring the possibilities of reaching an understanding which would facilitate the admission of new Members in accordance with Article 4 of the Charter;

"2. Requests the Committee of Good Offices to submit a report on its work to the General Assembly at its eighth or, at the latest, at its ninth session."

R. MATTERS BROUGHT TO THE ATTENTION OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL BUT NOT DISCUSSED

1. Reports on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands

By letter to the Secretary-General dated 2 April 1953 (S/2978), the representative of the United States notified the Security Council that, effective 2 April 1953, Bikini Atoll in the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands was closed for security reasons, pursuant to the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement, in order that the United States Government might conduct necessary atomic experiments. Entrance into the closed area would be in accordance with such regulations as the United States Government might prescribe.

On 17 April 1953, the Secretary-General transmitted to the Security Council the annual report of the United States Government on its administration of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (S/2989)¹¹⁹ for the period from 1 July 1951 to 30 June 1952. The Security Council did not discuss the report during 1953.

2. Communication from the Permanent Representative of Guatemala to the United Nations

By letter dated 1 April 1953, addressed to the Secretary-General, the permanent representative of Guatemala described a series of developments since the Guatemalan revolution of 1944 amounting, he stated, to open hostility and a threat of intervention in the internal affairs of the Republic of Guatemala.

By letter dated 15 April 1953 (S/2988), he requested that this communication be placed before the Security Council at its next meeting so that high authority might take note of the facts described therein and the declaration made by the Guatemalan Government.

¹¹⁹ For the report of the Trusteeship Council on this Trust Territory, see p. 589ff.

III. Economic and Social Questions

A. WORLD ECONOMIC SITUATION

At its fifteenth session, held at United Nations Headquarters from 31 March to 28 April, the Economic and Social Council made its annual review of the world economic situation, in accordance with the recommendation of the General Assembly in resolution 118(II).

1. Reports before the Economic and Social Council at its Fifteenth Session

The Council's discussion was based primarily on the Secretary-General's report on world economic conditions, entitled World Economic Report 1951-52 (E/2353/Rev.1),¹ supplemented by a Review of Economic Conditions in the Middle East 1951-52 (E/2353/Add.1 & Corr.1).² Also before the Council were: (1) a report entitled Aspects of Economic Development in Africa (E/2377 & Corr.1); and (2) the Review of International Commodity Problems, 1952 (E/2354).³

World production, as calculated from official government data, rose to a new high level in 1952, stated the World Economic Report. But the rate of expansion, particularly of industrial production—which had been rapid since 1949—slowed down considerably.

From 1950-51 to 1951-52, production of food rose only 1 per cent, thus barely keeping pace with the population growth. International trade, measured at constant prices, was slightly lower in the first three quarters of 1952 than in the corresponding period of 1951. However, there appeared to have been an upturn in both trade and industrial production in a number of countries towards the end of 1952.

In the economically developed private enterprise economies, production rose, on the average, by some 2 per cent from 1951 to 1952. The decline in the rate of increase in production was due chiefly to a marked fall in the rate of accumulation of inventories. While the demand for capital goods was sustained at or near the level of the growing productive capacity, the demand for articles of consumption other than food, especially textiles, from mid-1951 to mid-1952, was less than that required to keep the industries producing them working at capacity. Despite the substantial increase in resources devoted to arms production, there was a general rise in civilian supplies—and hence real consumption and real wages.

The centrally planned economies continued to devote a high proportion of national income to capital formation, in accordance with their policy of rapid industrial expansion, simultaneously with their heavy military expenditures. High percentage increases in industrial production were reported; agricultural output, however, developed rather slowly. In some countries, increases in the supply of consumer goods were sufficient to permit a rise in real wages, but in others the food supply position deteriorated.

Generally speaking, industrial production in under-developed countries increased during 1951 and 1952. The high rate of expansion of inventories of imported manufactures characteristic of 1950-51 was reduced in 1951-52. The fall in external demand for exportable raw materials, however, was reflected in a piling up of many raw material inventories. In most cases, the major factor in determining the trend in consumption was the level of food supply. In some countries the inadequacy of food supplies tended to generate or sustain upward spirals of wages and prices. In a number of countries in Asia, however, food supplies were adequate to enable consumption to be maintained or increased.

Towards the end of 1950 and early in 1951, international trade expanded sharply under the impact of a general rise in economic activity and, in particular, of an accumulation of inventories in both industrialized and under-developed economies. In 1952, on the other hand, the levelling off in economic activity and the decline in the rate of accumulation of inventories was associated in many cases with a fall in the demand for imports. Moreover, a number of countries which had encountered balance-of-payments difficulties in 1951 were compelled in 1952 to reduce their imports either through the use of disinflationary fiscal and credit policies or import restrictions, or both.

Those developments were accompanied by significant fluctuations, not only in the quantum but also in the terms of trade. Both factors were involved in the fluctuations in the balance of payments between industrialized and primary producing countries from 1950 to 1952. Changes in balances among the industrialized countries, however, were associated primarily with differences in the timing of the expansion and subsequent contraction of their imports.

The World Economic Report further stated that while trade between the centrally planned economies and the rest of the world had declined since pre-war years, the quantum of trade within both groups of countries had expanded substantially owing to an intensification of trade among the countries of each group.

Significant economic progress had been made since the early post-war years, the Report recorded. But there were still three areas of continuing economic difficulty: the maintenance of economic stability, the persistent disequilibrium in international payments and the relatively slow development of the under-developed countries. As to stability, the Report stated that by the beginning of 1953 inflationary pressures had subsided in most countries. Although the possibility of deflationary developments could not be excluded from consideration, there were many elements in the current situation in support of demand. Experience from 1950 to 1952, however, illustrated the sensitivity of balances of international payments to even moderate fluctuations in internal demand. The elaboration of measures to mitigate the international impact of domestic instability continued, therefore, to call for international discussion.

As to international economic disequilibrium, the Report noted a reduction in dollar deficits in the course of 1952, but the improvement was precarious. Further adjustments in the pattern of international trade would be required for dollar accounts to be balanced without economic aid.

Fluctuations in the prices of many primary commodities, such as had occurred in recent years, the Report also stated, led to abnormal fluctuations in real income in under-developed countries, tended to subject their economies to periodic distortion and made it extremely difficult for them to budget for an orderly programme of economic growth. Attempts to diversify the productive capacities of these countries had encountered great obstacles, of which the lack of elasticity in the supply of food was among the most important. The tempo of economic development could be substantially accelerated with the aid of resources borrowed from industrialized countries. An expanded flow of capital to under-developed countries could, in fact, advance progress towards the solution of all three types of basic problems confronting the world.

The Review of Economic Conditions in the Middle East 1951-52 pointed out that development made only slow progress in the region as a whole during 1951 and 1952, but with wide differences in this respect among the various countries. While the region's terms of trade had previously improved, following the rise in prices of raw materials in international markets, the reversal of this trend towards the end of 1951 and the beginning of 1952 tended to remove the stimulus to economic activity provided by higher export prices. In some countries internal factors tended to intensify the effects of these international trends while in others such factors exerted an offsetting influence. The region's production of crude petroleum rose by 10 per cent in 1951 and 8 per cent in 1952, while the production of refined products dropped by approximately 17.5 per cent in 1951 because of the cessation of oil exports from Iran. The benefits derived by the major oil-producing countries in the Middle East showed a considerable increase; several new profit-sharing agreements were concluded between oil companies and individual governments.

The first part of the report entitled Aspects of Economic Development in Africa dealt with the expansion of the exchange economy in tropical Africa and analysed the relationship between subsistence production and cash earning activities. From the point of view of economic development, it noted, the most characteristic feature of virtually the whole of tropical Africa was the fact that the indigenous inhabitants were in process of transition from almost complete dependence on subsistence activities to participation in various forms of cash earning. Although cash income had become for most indigenous inhabitants of tropical Africa a necessary support to established standards of living, their basic means of livelihood was supplied, as a rule, by subsistence agriculture.

Major developments in African trade and production were summarized in the second part of this report, which also described official economic plans in the Belgian Congo and the British and French territories. During 1951, it observed, expenditures on development plans in the dependent territories were generally at a higher level than in 1950, partly as a result of higher prices and partly because of the increasing number of projects under way.

The Review of International Commodity Problems, 1952, prepared by the Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements, noted the change during the previous five years in opinion about the purpose of commodity agreements. Increased attention was being given currently to the general problem of avoiding instability in the prices of primary commodities and less to the particular problem of dealing with burdensome surpluses. The Review also drew attention to the consideration of commodity problems at the fourteenth session of the Council on the basis of the report entitled Measures for International Economic Stability (E/2156). This debate, according to the Committee, was the first major international discussion of general commodity problems since the drafting of the Havana Charter for an International Trade Organization.

2. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Fifteenth Session

The Economic and Social Council discussed the world economic situation specifically at its 688th to 694th and 697th to 698th plenary meetings, from 16 to 21 and on 23 April 1953.

In discussing the world economic situation in the light of developments in their own countries, many representatives stressed that concerted world-wide action was required to solve the major economic problems, since the world economy constituted an indivisible whole.

The economic period under review was described by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, the United Kingdom and the United States, among others, as one of reaction to the 1950-51 boom, with inflationary pressures generally in check.

There was general agreement with the observation of the French representative that rearmament had not had as adverse an effect on the economic situation as originally expected, since countries carrying the major burden of rearmament had been able to increase the supply of consumer goods and the output of capital equipment for export to less developed countries. Though the boom had not been followed by a depression, the situation did, however, call for concerted action for maintaining world demand, the Swedish representative, for instance, stressed. The representatives of some countries, including Australia and Belgium, stated that consumer goods industries had already felt the decline in demand, but that production during 1952 had been high in industries benefiting directly or indirectly from rearmament, and that, in general, unemployment had remained low. The United States representative, however, reported that the period had been one of balanced growth in all branches of the economy in his country.

The slower rate of increase in industrial production was not regarded by the United Kingdom and United States representatives as a cause for alarm, provided it proved to be only a temporary adjustment from the 1950-51 boom. But representatives of developed countries—the United Kingdom, for example—believed it to be a major task of governments to watch the trend of demand so that measures could be taken if there appeared to be a serious danger of the growth of unemployment. In this connexion, the Swedish representative made mention of the study requested by the Council at its fourteenth session on the means of promoting and maintaining full employment while avoiding inflation.⁴

Some representatives of the developed countries, including the representatives of France, Sweden and the United Kingdom, emphasized that the maintenance of economic stability in the United States and other creditor countries was indispensable, as even moderate fluctuations in their domestic economic activity might well have profound repercussions on the world economy.

The Swedish representative was concerned because world income was currently more unevenly distributed than in the pre-war period and the gap between the industrialized and the underdeveloped countries was growing wider as world income increased. The representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States were among those who pointed out that food production was a cause for anxiety because it continued to lag behind the growth in industrial production and had not kept pace with the increase in the world's population. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the primary producing countries, which had at first benefited from the increased demand for primary commodities, were now suffering from the instability in prices of these goods which had adversely affected their capacity to import. Steps should be taken to avoid excessive fluctuations in the supply of and demand for primary products, he said, reaffirming his Government's support of international commodity agreements. Representatives of developed countries, including those of Australia, Belgium, Sweden, the United Kingdom, and the United States, continued to uphold the need for expediting the development of the under-developed countries. While some progress had been made in encouraging the flow of capital to those countries, their progressive industrialization required further efforts. The point, however, was also made — by the United States representative — that responsibility rested with the under-developed countries themselves to establish a climate favourable to foreign investment.

The economic period under review, it was also noted by the Belgian and United Kingdom representatives, had been marked by a continuing disequilibrium in international trade and payments. Since these difficulties persisted in spite of the growth in production and world trade and of the subsiding inflationary pressures, the Belgian, French and Swedish representatives felt, problems of the structure of economies were involved. In this connexion, the Belgian and French representatives stressed the need for a triangular system of international trade in which, among other things, Western Europe would gain a larger share in the markets of under-developed countries, while the latter countries would receive dollar surpluses both from their exports of merchandise to the dollar area and from an inflow of dollar capital. The Yugoslav representative, however, considered that the problem of international balance could not be solved by an effort to dictate a reorganization or reorientation of trade. It could only be solved through a fundamental change in the sphere of production, involving a more rapid economic development of under-developed countries.

The United Kingdom representative considered that gold and dollar reserves were inadequate to absorb the effects of the violent swings in balances of payments which had recently been experienced, so that many countries had had to resort to import restrictions. Full co-operation in achieving equilibrium in world trade was urged by the representatives of Belgium, France, Sweden and the United Kingdom, among others. Points which they stressed in this regard included the following: a high level of domestic activity should be encouraged; domestic inflation should be avoided; and international trade in goods and services should not be impeded by excessive tariffs or protectionist practices, especially in leading creditor countries.

The unfavourable effects of recent economic trends on the development of under-developed economies were described by the representatives of Cuba, Egypt, the Philippines and Venezuela, among others. The prices of most primary commodities exported from under-developed countries had fallen sharply, they observed, while prices of manufactured imports had remained relatively high, or else levelled off more slowly. As a result, the terms of trade of such countries had deteriorated sharply, and their external deficits had grown. It was pointed out by the representatives of Argentina, Cuba, the Philippines and Venezuela that fluctuations in external demand and in terms of trade caused very considerable economic difficulties in those under-developed countries which depended on the production and export of a few raw materials.

The under-developed countries were very much at the mercy of the forces governing international trade; during the period of sharp increases in external demand and prices for raw materials in 1950 and the first half of 1951, intense inflationary pressures had been encountered. Subsequently, primary products had been the first to be hit when demand had begun to waver and prices had fallen in mid-1951. Within a few months some countries had passed from relative prosperity to a situation of great difficulty. Many of these countries had had to tighten import restrictions and reduce internal demand, so that standards of living had declined.

The representatives of India and Venezuela felt that the problem of world food production deserved the most urgent attention and that the Council should recognize the need for studying it closely in the future. The Argentine representative pointed out, however, that those under-developed countries which were also food-producing countries should not be expected to specialize in that activity to the extent of neglecting their integrated economic development.

The need for diversifying and industrializing the economies of under-developed countries was also stressed by the representatives of Argentina, Cuba, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yugoslavia. But they also emphasized, as did the representatives of the Philippines and Turkey, that, without aid from abroad, national efforts would not suffice to narrow the gap in living standards between developed and under-developed countries. A continuing problem, in their view and in the view of the Egyptian, Indian, Philippine and Turkish representatives, was that of maintaining a substantial flow of capital from developed countries for financing economic development in under-developed countries. The Cuban representative pointed out that private investors in the industrialized countries still tended to place their capital principally in extractive industries, while public investment, though rising, remained inadequate for general development needs. The Philippine representative was among those who expressed the hope that, if the world political situation continued to improve, the Council, at its sixteenth session, might consider recommendations for setting up a special fund for grants-in-aid and low-interest, long-term loans to help speed the economic development of under-developed countries.⁵

The Indian and Uruguayan representatives maintained that better opportunities to enable under-developed countries to market their products and to increase their exports were a prerequisite to the economic development of these countries. There was a great need for more flexible import regulations and general trade policies on the part of the great importing countries and for the development of a truly multilateral system of trade. For some under-developed countries the lack of convertibility of currencies remained a problem, and the Uruguayan representative pointed out that the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA) was considering the possibility of the participation of Latin American countries in a payments union.

The representative of Egypt made the further point that inflationary pressures associated with rearmament in the developed countries had had disturbing effects on under-developed economies. The latter, said the Philippine representative, could best develop in an atmosphere of lasting peace.

Hopes for a possible expansion of East-West trade were voiced by the representatives of India, France and Sweden, who also hoped for a greater flow of consumer and capital goods towards the under-developed countries.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR, which have centrally planned economies, contended that large-scale rearmament in North America and Western Europe had aggravated the economic situation in those regions, raising the cost of living and increasing taxes without a matching rise in wages, thus reducing the real per capita income and lowering the standards of living of the working classes, while at the same time large corporations and industrial monopolies made enormous profits. They stated that lowered production for the civilian market in developed countries was directly attributable to the drive for production of armaments, with a resulting rise in unemployment and fall in consumption, an increased imbalance in international trade and a contraction of markets. Western Europe was being forced out of its traditional markets, competition on the capitalist market had been intensified by the economic expansion of Western Germany and Japan, and there had also been an increase in the disequilibrium of trade between the developed and under-developed countries. The lag in food production was attributed by these representatives to the economic and social conditions in capitalist countries, especially those which were rearming. The conditions underlying the present economic situation could not properly be regarded as transitory but were due to the economic preponderance of the United States, whose protectionist policy, they said, added to the difficulties of countries wishing to export their goods to that country.

In their own countries, stated these representatives, production of both capital and consumer goods had increased. Per capita purchasing power and consumption had also increased considerably and great progress had been made in raising cultural standards. There was no unemployment. The economies of these countries were immune to depressions and ensured a steadily rising standard of living for the people.

International trade, in the opinion of the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR, was passing through a critical period, a situation made worse by the disruption of trade between the capitalist world and the centrally planned economies. The intensified commercial links among the centrally planned economies did not mean that these countries were unwilling to maintain commercial relationships with the capitalist countries. It was necessary to develop international co-operation in the economic field based on respect for equal rights and national sovereignty, regardless of the economic system.

The representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) noted that, in spite of rearmament, real consumption and real wages had risen in free enterprise countries as a whole, but recommended that governments give close consideration to the problem of reconversion to the production of consumer goods and services in order to avoid a recession. The representative also urged governments to resist the temptation to fight inflationary pressures by unduly restrictive measures which would have serious adverse effects on living standards. ICFTU recommended consideration of a special fund for the development of economically under-developed countries, and maintained that under-developed countries should be assured of steady markets and steady foreign exchange earnings. ICFTU also supported the European Coal and Steel Community and international commodity agreements.

According to the representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), the most serious problem for the worker was unemployment. This, he said, had increased in the capitalist world while food production and consumption lagged and the cost of living had risen, thus causing a decline in the standard of living. These difficulties were the result of the rearmament drive. This representative also noted a slackening in industrial production in the capitalist countries, in marked contrast to trends in the centrally planned economies. However, WFTU was glad to note evidence of growing trade between some capitalist and socialist countries during this period.

The representative of the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU) asked the Council to consider steps to equalize the distribution of national income, and expressed the hope that some of the recommendations of the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) for increasing production of foodstuffs might be put into practice on a large scale without delay. IFCTU commended technical assistance and the steps taken toward economic integration in various parts of the world and expressed the hope that the Council's work would lead to positive measures to avert an economic recession.

At the conclusion of the debate, the Council had before it two draft resolutions proposed by Uruguay. In the first (E/L.497), Uruguay proposed that the Council, bearing in mind the incidence of fluctuations of marine and war freight and insurance rates on the ceiling prices of primary commodities purchased by the industrial countries, should recommend that ceiling prices, when established, be based on values f.o.b. port of shipment. Uruguay withdrew this proposal after the Council had agreed to request the Secretary-General to refer the draft resolution together with the records of the discussion to the Group of Experts established under General Assembly resolution 623(VII).

The second Uruguayan draft (E/L.496), resubmitted as a joint proposal by Argentina, Uruguay and Venezuela (E/L.499), was adopted by the Council by 9 votes to none, with 9 abstentions, at the 698th plenary meeting on 23 April.

In this resolution (460(XV)), the Council, taking into account the World Economic Report 1951-52, and considering that it was desirable and necessary to make comparative studies of the economies of the various areas involved, asked the Secretary-General "to include in future economic and statistical reports index numbers relating to the absolute value, quantum and unit value of marine freight rates, Conference and non-Conference, distinguishing between traffic from industrial countries to primary producing countries and vice versa."

3. Annual Report of the International Monetary Fund

The Council during its fifteenth session, at its 682nd and 683rd plenary meetings on 13 April, considered the annual report of the International Monetary Fund for the fiscal year ending 30 April 1952, together with a supplement covering the period from 1 May 1952 to 20 February 1953 (E/2351 & Add.1).

In a statement to the Council, the Managing Director of the Fund declared that, in a "normal" world, the Fund's role would be to relieve temporary pressures on the balance of payments of countries which found themselves in difficulties. When the Fund was established in 1946, many had assumed that the most serious risk against which insurance was needed was that of a worldwide depression, but the chief problem of the post-war period had, in fact, been inflation. While the Fund would not forget the risks of a recession, the fight against inflation remained its immediate concern.

During the period of extraordinary aid supplied to certain governments by the United States, it had been the policy that Member Governments participating in the aid programme should request the purchase of United States dollars from the Fund only in exceptional and unforeseen circumstances. As the period of extraordinary aid drew near its close, the Fund had been engaged in developing procedures designed to facilitate a more extensive use of its resources by its Members as a secondary line of reserves. Under the procedure developed, a Member country expecting to run into temporary balance-of-payments difficulties might, upon request, have an account established on a standby basis upon which it might draw in case of need.

Noting that proposals had at times been made for a revision of some of the Fund's Articles of Agreement, the Managing Director stated that interpretations of the Articles had been found possible which would permit a reasonable degree of flexibility in practice. The activities of the Fund were therefore not being hampered by the terms of its Articles of Agreement.

Commenting on the Fund's activities during the past year, the Managing Director pointed out that its transactions had begun to show an increase. Consultations on the retention of exchange controls had been initiated, and technical advice had been given by Fund representatives to several Members. He also referred to the Fund's reports and publications.

The adequacy of the existing resources of the Fund, the Managing Director stated, depended in part on the view taken of the adequacy of the other resources of its Members and on the measures which Members themselves took to restore balance in their economies. He emphasized that the Fund's efforts would be frustrated if Members failed to adopt and maintain domestic policies which diminished the risk of serious disturbances in their international economic relations. Inflation, he said, was not the only problem standing in the way of the emergence of a properly balanced pattern of world trade. The development of the productive capacity of under-developed countries would imply radical shifts in the customary flow of trade. An increased willingness on the part of the major importing countries to liberalize their commercial policies was also an essential condition of adjustment, as were policies to promote a more adequate flow of international capital. The Fund stood ready to co-operate as far as possible in solving the whole of the world's payments problem.

In the subsequent debate in the Council, emphasis was placed on the role of the Fund in relation to the prevailing international disequilibrium. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that it might prove necessary in the coming years to re-examine the validity of the assumptions which had guided the negotiations at Bretton Woods and to consider whether the regulation of international payments could remain divorced from the rules governing international trade which the payments reflected.

Several representatives, including those of Sweden and the United Kingdom, drew attention to the recent tendency for inflationary pressure to become weaker and less general and to the appearance of deflationary trends. While accepting the importance of combating inflation, they emphasized the necessity of dealing with factors of a structural nature which appeared to be at the root of international payments difficulties. In this connexion, the United Kingdom representative stressed the need for creditor nations to open their domestic markets to foreign imports and for debtor nations to avoid inflation and develop competitive production.

The representatives of Egypt, India and the United Kingdom, among others, commended the Fund for its adoption of more flexible policies concerning the use of its resources. Hope was also expressed that, pending the elimination of the long-range structural causes of international disequilibrium, the Fund would continue to develop such policies.

Some representatives, in particular, those of France and Sweden, while maintaining that the solution of the international payments problem must aim at general convertibility, expressed the view that existing conditions required that this goal be approached by a partial and gradually extended transferability of currencies. In this connexion, the Fund was urged to contribute to the support of regional efforts toward convertibility, as exemplified by the European Payments Union. The representative of Yugoslavia, on the other hand, felt that free convertibility was impracticable for a country in process of development; Yugoslavia, he said, could not for the time being participate in the movement for the liberalization of exchange undertaken under the Fund's auspices.

The representative of India declared that the claims of prudence as advocated by the Fund had to be weighed against the need for rapid economic development in the countries of Asia and in other under-developed regions. These countries, lacking domestic resources, required foreign capital as a means of neutralizing inflationary tendencies. He urged an adequate flow of international investment as essential for domestic as well as international equilibrium. Other representatives, however, including those of Belgium and Sweden, pointed out that long-term action designed to change the flow of capital went beyond the Fund's competence.

The representatives of India and the United States, among others, praised the Fund for the consultations on exchange restrictions conducted by it in 1952. The representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia also commended the Fund's activities in rendering technical assistance to its Members.

The Council at its 683rd plenary meeting, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, adopted resolution 467(XV) taking note of the report of the Fund.

B. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF UNDER-DEVELOPED AREAS

1. Financing of Economic Development⁶

The fundamental position of the United Nations with respect to the financing of economic development of under-developed countries was set forth in resolution 400(V) of the General Assembly. In this resolution the Assembly had recognized that, although the economic development of under-developed countries depended primarily upon the efforts of the people of those countries, the necessary acceleration of that development, on the basis of their own plans and programmes, required not only technical but also financial assistance from abroad, and particularly from the more developed countries. The General Assembly had also considered that the domestic financial resources of the under-developed countries, together with the international flow of capital for investment, had not been sufficient to assure the desired rate of economic development, and that the accelerated economic development of under-developed countries required a more effective and sustained mobilization of domestic savings and an expanded and more stable flow of foreign capital investment. The General Assembly had further expressed the conviction that the volume of private capital currently flowing into under-developed countries could not meet the financial needs of the economic development of under-developed countries, and that those needs could not be met without an increased flow of international public funds.

Since the fifth session of the General Assembly, and on the basis of the principles set forth above, the Assembly and the Council⁷ have considered a number of studies of methods whereby an enlarged and more stable flow of international finance for the economic development of under-developed countries might best be secured.

a. SPECIAL UNITED NATIONS FUND FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT (SUNFED)

- (1) Report of the Committee on a Special United Nations Fund

As provided by Council resolution 416 A (XIV),⁸ the Secretary-General appointed a committee of nine members to prepare a detailed plan for a special fund in accordance with the terms of Assembly resolution 520 A (VI). The Committee, which held a seven-week session beginning 21 January 1953, prepared, in accordance with its terms of reference, a detailed plan for the establishment (when circumstances permit), operation, management and control of a special fund for grants-in-aid and low-interest, long-term loans to under-developed countries for the acceleration of their economic development. The Committee's report, entitled Report on a Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development (E/2381),⁹ presented the unanimous recommendations of its authors, who acted in their personal capacities and put forward their recommendations on their own responsibility.

The detailed plan drawn up by the Committee dealt, in turn, with the income, the operations and the disbursements of the special fund. It also contained recommendations on the structure—control and management—and concluded with a short account of how the special fund might work. The Committee did not advise on whether or not a fund should be established nor did it express any views as to when circumstances might permit the fund to be set up. It considered that these matters were not within its competence.

Concerning income, the Committee recommended that the fund should depend on voluntary contributions paid regularly in the currencies of the contributors, the amounts to be assessed by governments themselves according to their economic strength and resources. While not estimating the ultimate size of the fund, it recommended that it should not be established until the equivalent of $250 million had been pledged by at least 30 governments. The Committee also advocated the advance pledging of contributions covering a period of at least one further year.

Under "Operations", the Committee dealt with the principles and policies which it considered should govern the fund's relations with its member countries. These, it emphasized, "will largely turn upon the creation and maintenance of mutual confidence and a sense of partnership directed towards the promotion of the assisted countries economic development". The Committee also recommended that governments receiving assistance should, within the framework of their general economic policies, develop fiscal and monetary policies adequate for their needs and should endeavour to keep inflationary pressures under control; governments should seek the maximum mobilization of their domestic resources since the fund's assistance should be supplementary; governments should, as a matter of economic policy, move towards the formulation of integrated economic development policies. Finally, assistance from the fund should be directed to the welfare of the population as a whole.

On the other hand, it was stressed, the fund should observe certain fundamental principles in its dealings with the under-developed countries. One such principle was that the fund must be concerned with the insufficiency of the total resources at the disposal of countries requesting assistance. Thus, while non-self-liquidating projects might constitute a significant part of the fund's total operations, the fund should not be limited to that type of financing only. Although assistance from the fund would be given to governments only, the Committee felt that this should not restrict applications to projects in the public sector. The fund, as a United Nations institution, should not serve as a means of foreign economic and political interference in the internal affairs of assisted countries.

The implementation of these principles would require a framework of formal relations between the fund and governments requesting assistance. These relations were formulated by the Committee in terms of the policies affecting governments and those regulating the operations of the fund. In presenting these policies the Committee stressed the great importance of ensuring the prudent and effective use of the assistance granted and recommended safeguards which it judged were essential to protect the interests of all members of the fund.

With regard to disbursement of resources from the fund, the Committee decided against both the method of predetermined country allocations and the case-by-case approach of dealing with individual country applications on their merits. It recommended a method combining some of the advantages of both systems, and set forth guiding considerations for the allocation of resources in the early phase of the fund's operations.

Basically, the Committee concluded, in a further recommendation regarding distribution of resources, that loans by the special fund were "acts of assistance" to under-developed countries and were distinguishable from grants-in-aid only in that it might be found possible and convenient to recover wholly or in part the sums involved. It recommended that the fund should not attempt to recover principal or ask for interest, where this would jeopardize the applicant country's economic development. However, each case should be determined individually and administrative flexibility should be left to the fund in deciding both on the distribution of its resources between loans and grants and on the terms of loans granted.

With regard to membership of the fund, the Committee recommended that it should be open to any government which: (1) is prepared to subscribe to the fund's principles and policies; (2) is a Member of the United Nations or any specialized agency; and (3) is willing to pledge a contribution to the operational budget, and pay its share of the administrative budget. Any other government which is not a Member of the United Nations or any specialized agency might also join, provided that the "General Council of the Fund" accepted its membership and that the government was prepared to subscribe to the conditions of membership.

The Committee recommended that members should meet annually to pledge their contributions, to lay down all major policy matters, to approve the fund's administrative budget and to receive reports on the fund's activities. This annual meeting would be known as the "General Council of the Fund". To provide immediate control, it recommended the election by the General Council of an Executive Board of eight to twelve members.

While recognizing that there would be many practical advantages if the fund were integrated with an existing United Nations institution, the Committee nevertheless felt obliged to recommend the establishment of a new institution. The Committee also made specific recommendations concerning liaison and co-ordination between the fund and other financial agencies of the United Nations and the agencies participating in the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance.

(2) Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Sixteenth Session

The Council considered the report during its discussion of the agenda item "Economic development of under-developed countries" at the 138th to 140th meetings of its Economic Committee, on 21 and 31 July and 3 August, and at its 725th to 731st and 749th plenary meetings, on 15 to 18 July and 4 August 1953.

There was a substantial measure of agreement in the Council on the need both for increased financial assistance to accelerate economic development and for an international fund to make grants to under-developed countries. Almost all representatives expressed their high regard for the Committee's constructive report.

The representatives of the more-developed countries stated that it was the settled policy of their governments and their peoples to aid the efforts of the peoples of under-developed areas to develop their resources and improve their working conditions. Several of these representatives, among them those of Australia, France and the United Kingdom, reviewed the substantial programmes of international aid that their governments were currently undertaking. The United States representative referred to the increasing scale of such aid, in spite of the fact that his country had been compelled to join other free nations in repelling aggression, and pointed out that the citizens of his country, both as private individuals and through the government, were making large investments to this end. He regretted that circumstances, over which his country had no control, had limited the scale of the assistance provided.

The representatives of under-developed countries warmly commended the Committee's findings. The representatives of Egypt, the Philippines and Turkey instanced, in particular, the following features of the report as commendable:

(1) that the Committee had recognized that the economic development of under-developed countries must primarily be the concern of such countries themselves;

(2) that it had taken as a "fundamental premise" the need for non-commercial capital in the form of grants-in-aid or long-term, low-interest loans;

(3) that it had viewed realistically the strain on the economies of developed countries in suggesting the modest initial requirement of $250,000,000;

(4) that in suggesting the minimum of 30 contributors it had endorsed the view that the fund's strength would reside, initially, not in its absolute size but in its widespread support by the United Nations; and

(5) that the Committee had appreciated the current situation in recommending that contributions, apart from those to the administrative budget, might be made in local currency and that governments might reserve the right to restrict the export of goods regarded as essential to their domestic economies.

The USSR representative stated that the proposals made by the Committee had envisaged a fund designed to stimulate the flow of foreign capital to the under-developed countries. But experience had shown that foreign investments were usually made in the under-developed countries on such terms that they served to worsen the already bad economic situation of those countries and resulted, contrary to United Nations principles, in interference in their domestic affairs. It was therefore impossible, he said, to accept the view that foreign capital should constitute the principal method of promoting the economic development of the under-developed countries. It could play some part in that development (though only an auxiliary part) provided it was made available on conditions which were not detrimental to the national interests of the under-developed countries and without interference in their domestic affairs. The representative of Poland, supporting this statement, expressed the view that the establishment of a special fund (or international finance corporation) would not be beneficial in the current political situation.

The representatives of India and Uruguay felt that it was incumbent on the Council, in the light of General Assembly resolution 520 A (VI) which had requested the Council to submit a detailed plan, to study the report and to express views on the merits of the Committee's proposals. However, among others, the representatives of China, France, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States felt that to debate the precise organization of the proposed fund and even the broader issues raised in the report would be premature since the circumstances which would prevail at the time the fund was established were still unknown. At the Assembly's sixth session it had been recognized that the time was not yet ripe for the establishment of the proposed fund and circumstances had not changed since then.

The Swedish representative suggested that it might be more desirable to expand existing institutions. The representative of Yugoslavia held that the ultimate decision was up to the Assembly, not the Council. He therefore proposed (E/L.522 & Corr.1) that the Council transmit the Special Committee's report to the Assembly, recommending that the fund be established as soon as possible on the basis of the report.

The representative of Chile, however, speaking as an observer, referred to the threatened worsening of the world situation which made the need for such a fund more urgent and he argued that in advising a small initial minimum contribution and in assuming the absence of free convertibility of currencies in the fund, the Committee had, by implication, advised that the fund should be set up sooner rather than later.

Further discussion in the Council tended away from detailed examination of the Committee's recommendations. Discussion was mainly concerned with the questions of the adequacy of the resources presently available for economic development and a proposal that savings from disarmament be devoted to economic development through an international fund.

The insufficiency of the resources available for more rapid economic development was stressed by representatives of under-developed countries. While fully accepting the position that the more energetic mobilization and utilization of domestic resources must be the basis for accelerated economic development, they felt that renewed emphasis on this proposition, which was self-evident and generally agreed, was out of place, and they considered that it would be more useful to stress the severely limited extent to which investment could, in practice, be financed from domestic resources.

The representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) emphasized the need for self-help in the under-developed countries and supported the proposal for the establishment of a special fund.

Several representatives, among them those of Belgium, Sweden and Venezuela, referred to the substantial part which had been, and must continue to be, played by the import of private capital by under-developed countries. Some, including the Yugoslav representative, emphasized the serious limitations of this form of finance as an instrument of economic development. They feared that the growing burden of interest and amortization, which in periods when the rate of new investment fell off could easily exceed new investment and result in a net export of capital from the under-developed countries, might place such a heavy burden on these economies as to jeopardize their development. A further limitation on the usefulness of private external capital was that, since it moved in response to the profit motive, its flow was reduced in times of depression and it was therefore a destabilizing factor. Furthermore, it was naturally invested in the most profitable forms of investment from the point of view of the investor, such as the production of primary commodities for export, which were not necessarily forms of investment which contributed most to the economic development of the territories in question. The Argentine representative stressed that private capital should not be the main driving force behind economic progress. The representatives of Poland and the USSR considered that the colonial or semi-colonial character of the economies of under-developed countries was reflected in their excessive dependence on the export of raw materials and their lack of industry as opposed to agriculture and mining; this distortion, they said, was attributable to the behaviour of private international investment.

The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) stated that foreign investment had not benefited the under-developed countries since it had led to their excessive dependence on the export of primary commodities and on the decisions of foreign monopolies.

The representative of the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC) pleaded for a restoration of a favourable atmosphere for a resumption of a freer flow of international investment which would make it possible gradually to restore multilateral world trade. He stated that it was the view of his organization that public capital could not replace private capital which brought with it valuable "know-how". Care should be taken not to make public loans at artificially low rates of interest in such a way as to encourage waste.

The representative of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) emphasized the tremendous gap between the funds required and those available for investment. FAO had offered its help to governments in the preparation of applications to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for schemes of agricultural development, in the light of the difficulty experienced by the Bank as a result of the lack of specific and well-documented loan applications.

A number of representatives pointed out that exports of primary commodities by under-developed countries constituted a more important source of foreign exchange than foreign investment. In this connexion, the representatives of Egypt, Poland and Venezuela stressed the difficulties for under-developed countries resulting from the fact that the markets for the primary commodities which such countries export are subject to very considerable instability. Representatives of the under-developed countries emphasized the importance of achieving stability in commodity prices as a condition of economic development. The Argentine representative, in addition, considered that commodity price stabilization would succeed only if it were undertaken on a comprehensive basis. An equitable level of prices for primary commodities in relation to those of manufactured goods was required. The representative of Indonesia, speaking as an observer, stated that the provision of foreign finance as a supplement to domestic savings would afford only limited support to the development plans of under-developed countries unless the markets for their exports were stabilized.

The USSR representative felt that the most effective method of assisting the under-developed countries would be the elimination of the abnormal restrictions on trade with other countries imposed by certain major Powers. Such restrictions contributed to the deterioration in terms of trade of the under-developed countries, as a result of which foreign monopolies bought raw materials and foodstuffs cheaply and sold their own goods at high prices. The development of normal trade relations would create conditions in which foreign capital would be attracted to the under-developed countries on terms compatible both with the interests of those countries and with the commercial interests of foreign capital itself. Under the current policy of trade restrictions, foreign capital was given an opportunity of imposing conditions disadvantageous to the under-developed countries.

Others, including the representatives of the Philippines and Yugoslavia, urged that obstacles to multilateral trade, such as import restrictions, exchange control and inconvertibility of currencies, were preventing the expansion of world production. There was an obvious interdependence between the constantly diminishing volume of international private investment and the existence of such obstacles to trade. Nevertheless, increasingly severe restrictions were currently being placed by many countries on the flow of trade and this was a major impediment to economic development.

The representative of the World Federation of United Nations Associations (WFUNA) urged the need for finding some financial means of speeding up economic and social development, over and above the technical assistance programme, and urged that, if a special fund were established, Territories under United Nations Trusteeship should benefit fully from its operations.

While the majority were in agreement concerning the need to expand the volume of international assistance for the economic development of under-developed countries at the earliest possible date, representatives of the more developed countries which would be the major potential contributors to the proposed fund stated that their countries were unable to assume, at present, any additional financial burdens.

However, in the course of the discussion the United States representative reminded the Council that the President of the United States had recently declared, after outlining the ways in which international tension could be relieved and the burden of armaments reduced, that his Government was ready to ask the American people to join with all nations in devoting a substantial percentage of the savings which would be achieved by such disarmament to a fund for world aid and reconstruction. The representative of the United States repeated that pledge on behalf of his Government.

The fund envisaged by the President of the United States would, he said, be an international fund with a broad membership, designed to facilitate the fulfilment of the United Nations mission of building a better world. The precise form which such a fund might take could not at present be foreseen. It might serve as an instrument for making loans and grants, or it might be largely concerned with technical assistance. It might be used to promote social as well as economic progress, and might even develop novel procedures for associating private and public initiative. The representative of the United States expressed the hope that all countries would find it possible to join in making a pledge such as that proposed by President Eisenhower, and his delegation had accordingly included in Part A of its draft resolution on the economic development of under-developed countries (E/L.536 & Corr.1) an equivalent declaration in which Members of the United Nations pledged themselves to ask their peoples, when genuine progress had been made towards internationally supervised world-wide disarmament, to devote a portion of the savings, achieved through such disarmament, to an international fund for development and reconstruction.

Part B of the United States draft resolution would have the Council express the opinion that further refinement of a scheme, such as proposed by the Special Committee, would be premature, and would transmit the report to the Assembly for its information.

Many representatives warmly welcomed the initiative taken by the United States representative in placing such a draft declaration before the Council, and associated themselves with the general purposes of that declaration. Council members recognized the pledge made by the President of the United States as marking an important step forward in the approach of the major industrially advanced countries to the problem of financial aid to the under-developed countries.

The representative of Belgium stressed that such a fund could not be a substitute for either loans or trade, and presented an amendment (E/L.540/Rev.1) to alter the proposed declaration to that effect.

A number of representatives, including those of Argentina, Egypt, India and Yugoslavia, considered that the expansion of financial aid to the under-developed countries should not be entirely contingent upon disarmament, even though it might well be recognized that many countries might not be in a position to make a maximum contribution to such an expansion until the burden of armaments expenditures had been somewhat eased. It was pointed out by the Philippine representative that the Assembly, in its resolution 520(VI), had requested the Council to prepare its recommendations in this field "keeping in mind the desirability of universal participation and the utilization of any savings that may accrue from any programme of disarmament, as one of the sources of contributions". The Assembly had thus envisaged disarmament as providing an additional source of funds, but had not implied that the establishment of an international fund depended upon disarmament.

At the 138th meeting of the Economic Committee on 21 July, the representatives of Argentina, Egypt, India, the Philippines, Uruguay and Yugoslavia presented a joint amendment (E/AC.6/L.75)¹⁰ to the United States draft resolution (E/L.536). In presenting it, the Indian representative explained, inter alia, that its purpose was to:

(1) provide that the proposed fund be supplied by independent contributions and not exclusively from savings resulting from disarmament and that it be within the framework of the United Nations;

(2) emphasize that the Council had considered, not merely received, the Special Committee's report and recommend it as a basis for the Assembly's consideration of further preparatory steps for the establishment of a special United Nations fund; and

(3) provide that the fund be for the exclusive benefit of under-developed countries.

Following informal discussions, a joint draft resolution (E/AC.6/L.76), superseding all other draft resolutions and amendments, was presented by Australia, Cuba, Egypt, India, the Philippines, the United States and Yugoslavia at the Economic Committee's 139th meeting on 31 July.

It was adopted, without further discussion, by the Committee (E/2505 I) by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and by the Council at its 749th plenary meeting on 4 August, by the same vote, as resolution 482 A (XVI). It read:

METHODS OF FINANCING ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

I

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Having taken into consideration the document entitled Report on a Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development, prepared by a committee appointed by the Secretary-General pursuant to Council resolution 416 A (XIV),

"Having in mind General Assembly resolutions 520 A (VI) and 622 A (VII) requesting the Council to submit to the General Assembly a detailed plan for establishing, as soon as circumstances permit, a United Nations fund for the financing of the economic development of under-developed countries,

"1. Expresses its great appreciation to the Committee for its work;

"2. Transmits the report of the Committee to the General Assembly, together with the pertinent records of the sixteenth session of the Council;

"3. Recommends that the General Assembly consider, in the light of the report of the Committee and the records of the sixteenth session of the Council, what other preparatory steps might usefully be taken towards the establishment, when circumstances permit, of an international fund designed to assist development and reconstruction of the under-developed countries."

II

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Desirous of strengthening the United Nations in its mission of guarding the peace and security of all peoples and of making the United Nations a more effective institution for the promotion of higher standards of living and of conditions of economic and social progress and development in under-developed countries,

"Looking forward to the time when sufficient progress in internationally supervised world-wide disarmament will make it propitious to devote additional resources to assist development and reconstruction, particularly in the under-developed countries,

"Recommends that governments consider joining, at the eighth session of the General Assembly, in the following draft declaration:

"We, the governments of the States Members of the United Nations, in order to promote higher standards of living and conditions of economic and social progress and development, stand ready to ask our peoples, when sufficient progress has been made in internationally supervised worldwide disarmament, to devote a portion of the savings achieved through such disarmament to an international fund, within the framework of the United Nations, to assist development and reconstruction in under-developed countries."

(3) Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

The General Assembly considered the question of establishing a special fund for grants-in-aid and for low-interest, long-term loans, during its discussion of the question of economic development of under-developed areas at the 257th to 282nd meetings of its Second Committee, from 12 October to 1 December, and at its 468th plenary meeting on 7 December 1953. The Committee had before it, inter alia, the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430) and a memorandum by the Secretary-General (A/2447 & Corr.1) providing a summary of the background material on questions relating to economic development.

During the extensive debate, the views expressed were primarily those put forward in the discussions in the Council. The representatives of the more developed, capital-exporting countries, while recognizing the need to accelerate economic development, emphasized that their governments were not in a position at this time to make additional contributions to an international development fund, primarily because of rearmament expenses. It would be both unwise and a sham, in their opinion, to create such a fund without sufficient funds for its effective operation. Current efforts should concentrate on making more effective use of existing programmes and sources of financing, they considered.

Among the views expressed by the less-developed countries was that the creation of such a fund should not depend on disarmament and that savings from disarmament should only be viewed as an additional source of finance. In their opinion, the speeding up of economic development—which would be accomplished by such a fund—would help secure world peace and put an end to the internal threats and political unrest which endangered that peace. The acceleration of economic development, they stressed, must not be postponed indefinitely nor put off pending world-wide disarmament.

Other representatives, including those of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, emphasized that the fundamental factor in economic development was industrialization and considered that the best way to help under-developed countries obtain funds was to develop non-discriminatory international trade relations. Foreign financial aid should only be used to supplement domestic resources and earnings from foreign trade. They doubted that much would be achieved by the establishment of the special fund, although they would not oppose its creation. However, they considered that it must not be linked to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development which, they alleged, was under the influence of United States capitalist monopolies.

The representative of Canada pointed out that the debate showed that the differences in views related more to matters of time and method than to objectives and that it should be possible to work out a solution acceptable to all.

The Second Committee had before it three draft resolutions on the establishment of a special fund.

(1) A draft resolution by the United States (A/C.2/L.204), by which the Assembly would adopt the "declaration" recommended by the Economic and Social Council, on the proposal of the United States representative.

Egypt submitted an amendment (A/C.2/L.208) to this draft to specify that the additional resources resulting from disarmament be devoted to a special fund rather than merely to assist development and reconstruction. He later withdrew that amendment on the assurance that the adoption of the resolution would not preclude the possibility of establishing a special fund before world disarmament under international control was effected.

(2) A draft resolution by Greece, Haiti and Pakistan (A/C.2/L.205), by which the Assembly would refer to the Expert's Report on a Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development, state its opinion that the establishment of the fund need not be dependent only on internationally supervised world-wide disarmament and express its confidence that favourable conditions necessary for the establishment of the fund would be created in the near future. It would:

(a) request the Secretary-General to transmit the Expert's Report to Member Governments for their detailed comments on the creation of the fund and on the extent to which they were in a position to contribute to its establishment;

(b) request the Council to study these comments and submit to the Assembly's ninth session recommendations concerning the practical steps that could be taken to set up the fund as soon as circumstances permitted; and

(c) recommend, meanwhile, that all countries should give special consideration to the views expressed by the Assembly with a view to the creation of the fund as soon as circumstances permitted.

(3) A draft resolution by Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Venezuela, Yemen and Yugoslavia (A/C.2/L.206/Rev.1). The operative part of the draft resolution, as revised would have the Assembly, inter alia, invite comments from governments and specialized agencies on the Expert's Report and on the degree of moral and material support and adherence which might be expected from them. It would also provide for the appointment of a small contact group of persons of high standing to consider the comments and to consult with governments, if necessary by personal visits, and to report to the Assembly's ninth session.

As revised, this draft resolution took into account a Netherlands amendment (A/C.2/L.207) the purpose of which, the Netherlands representative stated, was to stress that economic and social advancement of the under-developed countries could also contribute towards the maintenance of international peace and security and that the establishment of the fund should be seen in that context. The Netherlands representative expressed the view that, while it was generally accepted that development was closely tied to disarmament, the creation of SUNFED might be considered as an exception since the sum required to start it was insignificant in comparison with the amount spent on disarmament.

The Committee, at its 270th meeting on 2 November, agreed to establish a working group which would have as a primary reference the three-Power draft resolution (A/C.2/L.205), the 20-Power revised draft resolution (A/C.2/L.206/Rev.1) and the Netherlands amendments (A/C.2/L.207) to the original text, with the understanding that if, in the course of its work, the group should find it had to deal also with the United States draft resolution (A/C.2/L.204) and the Egyptian amendment thereto (A/C.2/L.208), it should do so.

The working group held ten meetings between 3 and 19 November and submitted a compromise draft resolution (A/C.2/L.212 & Corr.1). As a result, the 20-Power draft resolution (A/C.2/L.206/Rev.1), the amendments by the Netherlands (A/C.2/L.207) and the three-Power draft resolution (A/C.2/L.205) were withdrawn by their sponsors.

The Committee discussed the compromise draft resolution and the United States draft resolution at its 275th to 277th meetings, from 23 to 25 November. The majority supported both resolutions in general. The representatives of Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia and Guatemala, among others, regretted that the working group had not been able to recommend more positive steps, but agreed that the compromise draft was a step forward and, at least, kept the idea of a fund alive. A number of representatives, including those of Colombia, Egypt, Honduras, Iraq and Venezuela, indicated their support of the United States proposal, on the understanding that the establishment of a fund was not made conditional on worldwide disarmament.

The Egyptian amendment having been withdrawn, the draft resolution proposed by the United States (A/C.2/L.204) was adopted by the Committee (A/2590 A) at its 277th meeting on 25 November by 41 votes to none, with 13 abstentions.

It was adopted by the General Assembly at its 468th plenary meeting on 7 December, without discussion, by 44 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 724 A (VIII). (For text, see below.)

During the discussion of the draft resolution (A/C.2/L.212 & Corr.1) recommended by the working group, considerable debate arose over paragraph 4 of the preamble which would have the Assembly express confidence that an expanded flow of capital to under-developed countries would contribute to the solution of the basic economic problems of our time, both for under-developed and developed countries. The representative of Czechoslovakia stated that he could not support the draft resolution unless it were explicitly stated in that paragraph that foreign investments should not be made conditional on any demands for economic, political or military privileges; he submitted an amendment (A/C.2/L.214) to this effect.

The amendment was supported by the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Guatemala, Honduras, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR. The majority, however, while agreeing with the question of principle involved, opposed the amendment on the grounds that it was out of place in this particular resolution and served no useful purpose. The resolution, they held, was concerned with the establishment of a fund within the framework of the United Nations and therefore there could be no question of such an institution's seeking to exploit the countries to which it granted financial aid.

Several compromises were suggested. The representative of Cuba proposed the addition of a new paragraph stating the principle involved. The representatives of Saudi Arabia and India suggested deleting the paragraph altogether. The representative of France proposed (A/C.2/L.215) that the problem might be solved by adding before the words "would contribute" the words "in conformity with the principles and purposes of the United Nations Charter".

Following a meeting of the working group, the Committee, at its 277th meeting on 25 November, rejected the following amendments, the others having been withdrawn:

(1) By 28 votes to 4, with 23 abstentions, a proposal to delete paragraph 4, originally withdrawn by India and Saudi Arabia and now verbally resubmitted by Pakistan.

(2) By a roll-call vote of 26 to 7, with 22 abstentions, the Czechoslovak amendment (A/C.2/L.214).

Paragraph 4 was subsequently adopted by 46 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

The Committee adopted the draft resolution in paragraph-by-paragraph votes, ranging from a unanimous vote to 46 votes to none, with 7 abstentions. It adopted (A/2590 B) the resolution, as a whole, by 50 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. The Committee's draft resolution was adopted by the General Assembly at its 468th plenary meeting on 7 December, without discussion, by 46 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 724 B (VIII).

Resolution 724 A & B (VIII) read:

A

"The General Assembly,

"Having noted Economic and Social Council resolution 482 A (XVI) of 4 August 1953,

"Desirous of strengthening the United Nations in its mission of guarding the peace and security of all peoples and of promoting higher standards of living and conditions of economic and social progress and development in under-developed countries,

"Looking forward to the time when sufficient progress in internationally supervised world-wide disarmament will make it propitious to devote additional resources to assist development and reconstruction, particularly in the under-developed countries,

"Adopts the following declaration:

"We, the governments of the States Members of the United Nations, in order to promote higher standards of living and conditions of economic and social progress and development, stand ready to ask our peoples, when sufficient progress has been made in internationally supervised world-wide disarmament, to devote a portion of the savings achieved through such disarmament to an international fund, within the framework of the United Nations, to assist development and reconstruction in under-developed countries."

B

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the Report on a Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development prepared by the Committee of Nine appointed by the Secretary-General, and submitted in pursuance of Economic and Social Council resolution 416 A (XIV) of 23 June 1952 and General Assembly resolution 622 A (VII) of 21 December 1952,

"Mindful of the aim expressed in the preamble of the Charter "to employ international machinery for the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples" and of Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter,

"Believing that, especially in the present state of world tension, the social and economic advancement of the under-developed countries can contribute towards the achievement of international peace and security,

"Confident that an expanded flow of capital to under-developed countries would contribute to the solution of the basic economic problems of our time, both for under-developed and developed countries,

"Considering that the use of international machinery for financially assisting the acceleration of the economic development of the under-developed countries contributes to the achievement of an expanding and stable world economy,

"Noting that the efforts made and the activities undertaken so far by and under the United Nations for the economic development of the under-developed countries have proved beneficial and represent a marked advance in economic co-operation among nations,

"Bearing in mind the recommendations contained in Economic and Social Council resolution 482 A (XVI) of 4 August 1953 relating to a special United Nations fund,

"Considering that the General Assembly should keep under review the question of the establishment of a special fund and, in particular, be attentive to any changes either in world conditions or in the attitudes of the governments of Member States, which might be propitious to the establishment of such a fund in the near future,

"Hopeful that conditions favourable to the establishment of an international fund will be created in the near future and that savings from internationally supervised world-wide disarmament will provide additional means for financing the economic development of under-developed countries, and will further the aims and objectives of such a fund,

"1. Expresses its great appreciation of the work of the Committee of Nine;

"2. Invites governments of States Members of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies in the economic and social field to transmit to the Secretary-General their detailed comments both on the recommendations contained in the report of the Committee of Nine and on the degree of moral and material support which may be expected from them for such a fund;

"3. Decides to appoint the present President of the Economic and Social Council, Mr. Raymond Scheyven, to examine, with the assistance of the Secretary-General, the comments of governments submitted in response to the invitation contained in the preceding paragraph; to collate and where he judges necessary to request elaboration of such comments, if desirable by direct consultation with governments; and to submit to the Economic and Social Council at its eighteenth session an interim report on his work, and, in any event to submit to the General Assembly at its ninth session, a final report together with his comments, with a view to assisting it to make such recommendations as it would find possible which could facilitate the establishment of such a fund as soon as circumstances permit;

"4. Requests the Secretary-General to:

"(a) Provide Mr. Scheyven with all necessary assistance and facilities;

"(b) Transmit to the governments specified in paragraph 2 above the report of the Committee of Nine, together with the records of the discussion on the subject at the eighth session of the General Assembly;

"(c) Circulate as soon as possible to the governments specified in paragraph 2 above (i) the comments submitted in response to that paragraph, and (ii) the final report of Mr. Scheyven; and submit a summary of the comments of governments to the General Assembly at its ninth session;

"(d) Prepare a working paper, for submission to the Economic and Social Council, on the extent and methods of co-ordination which may be desirable or necessary between the activities of such a fund, of the Technical Assistance Board and of such of the specialized agencies as may be engaged in tasks relating to the economic development of under-developed countries;

"5. Requests the Economic and Social Council to study at its eighteenth session the working paper referred to in paragraph 4 (d) above and to transmit it, together with its views, to the General Assembly at its ninth session;

"6. Decides to include in the provisional agenda of the ninth session of the General Assembly a separate item for the consideration of the results of the steps provided for above."

b. PROPOSAL FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN INTERNATIONAL FINANCE CORPORATION

(1) Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Sixteenth Session

In accordance with resolution 416 C (XIV),¹¹ the Council had before it a report by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (E/2441) on the results of its further examination of the proposal to establish an international finance corporation designed to promote the flow of private capital to under-developed countries.

The Bank reported that informal discussions between Bank officers and Member Governments on the desirability of setting up such a corporation indicated that, almost without exception, representatives of the less-developed countries had supported the proposal and, in addition, two of the more highly-developed countries had indicated that their governments supported the proposal. Spokesmen for most of the highly-developed countries, however, while expressing sympathetic interest, had reserved judgment on the merits of the proposal, and several had stated that their governments were not at present in a position to contribute to a corporation of that kind.

The report of the Bank stated that "... while maintaining their interest in the proposal, countries on whom the corporation would necessarily have to depend for the greater part of its funds have not as yet indicated that they are ready to commit themselves to subscribe to its capital. Because of this, the management of the Bank does not believe that any point would be served by greater formalization of the project at this time. The management intends, however, to continue to explore the matter with the Bank's Member Governments and, if and when there appears to be a reasonable prospect that sufficient financial participation will be forthcoming, will be prepared to present concrete proposals to them for consideration. The Bank will be glad to inform the Council promptly of further developments in connexion with the project."

The Council discussed the report during its discussion of the agenda item "Economic development of under-developed countries" at the 138th to 140th meetings of its Economic Committee, on 21 and 31 July and 3 August and at its 725th to 731st and 749th plenary meetings, on 15 to 18 July and 4 August 1953.

In the course of a supplementary statement, the representative of the Bank stated that the Bank was still of the opinion that the international finance corporation would give a modest but worthwhile stimulus to the growth of private enterprise and thus further the development of the Bank's Member countries. For the time being, however, the unwillingness of the more important Member countries to subscribe to the corporation's capital made it doubtful whether any useful purpose would be served by taking the project a step further at the present time.

During the discussion, a variety of views were expressed, ranging from those of the Yugoslav representative, who held that since private capital would seek foreign investment opportunities to the extent that these were more attractive to it and that since an international finance corporation could not make such opportunities more attractive the corporation could serve little purpose, to the view of the Argentine representative that the corporation should be set up without further delay. The representatives of China, Egypt and Sweden, among others, held that in the light of the Bank's advice, and particularly in the light of the unwillingness of potential contributors to commit any funds to this purpose, little more could be done at this stage than to keep the question under review and invite the Bank to continue its studies with a view to preparing a more detailed plan for establishing a corporation when circumstances permitted. The representative of the United Kingdom, while endorsing the case for equity investment, and considering that there was scope for guaranteed lending, questioned whether an international organ or, indeed, any institution of universal scope was the best means of providing this service.

The representative of ICFTU regretted that the prospects of establishing an international finance corporation had changed for the worse during the past year, but welcomed the willingness of the International Bank to make further soundings and thought that time might be saved if the Bank were to proceed with working out a draft agreement.

The representative of India thought that the corporation should be established as soon as circumstances permitted and proposed (E/L.534) that the Bank draw up a more detailed plan. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, the United Kingdom and the United States considered it both premature and undesirable to ask the Bank to undertake to draw up a detailed plan at this time, particularly when there were many important issues needing further exploration. They therefore proposed an amendment (E/AC.6/L.73) providing instead that the studies should be directed to the clarification and analysis of the basic questions still outstanding.

Following informal discussions by the representative of India with those representatives sponsoring the amendment, a revised joint draft resolution (E/AC.6/L.77) was presented, sponsored by the five delegations, at the Economic Committee's 140th meeting on 3 August. It was adopted by the Committee (E/2505 II) by 11 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, and by the Council, without discussion, at its 749th plenary meeting on 4 August by 14 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 482 B (XVI).

By this resolution, the Council noted that the Bank intended to continue to explore the question of an international finance corporation with its Member Governments, and commended the Bank for the useful contribution it had made to the study of the question. It invited the Bank to present, as soon as possible, the results of a further study with a view to clarifying and analysing the questions which had been raised and the different points of view that had been expressed, continuing at the same time further exploration of the matter with its Member Governments, and in so doing to take into account the comments on the Bank's further report during the sixteenth session of the Council. The Council further invited the Bank to report on the progress made in these respects to the Council at its seventeenth session.

(2) Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

The General Assembly considered the proposal for the establishment of an international finance corporation during its discussion of the question of economic development of under-developed areas at the 257th to 282nd meetings of its Second Committee, from 12 October to 1 December, and at its 468th plenary meeting on 7 December 1953. It had before it, inter alia, the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430) and a memorandum by the Secretary-General (A/2447 & Corr.1) providing a summary of the background material on questions relating to economic development.

Representatives of the under-developed countries, generally speaking, stressed the importance of increasing the flow of private foreign capital, emphasizing that, though domestic capital was important, it needed to be supplemented. The flow of private foreign capital, although considerable, was insufficient and had, moreover, decreased since the Second World War. The representative of Colombia stated that in his country, for example, a favourable climate for private investment existed, but the flow of private capital still did not meet the demands. The representatives of Canada and India thought that many of the fears of under-developed countries with regard to private financing were not justified in all cases and were based on unfortunate incidents. The representatives of Belgium and Cuba agreed that private capital would feel more secure with an international finance corporation and that fears of both private creditors and the under-developed countries might thus be allayed. The representative of Saudi Arabia suggested drafting an international code to govern relations between government borrowers and their private creditors. The Chinese and United States representatives supported this idea.

The Cuban representative thought that the Council ought to be asked to draw up detailed plans forthwith for the establishment of the international finance corporation. Among those who spoke in support of the establishment of such a corporation were the representatives of Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Egypt, Haiti, Indonesia, Liberia, Pakistan and Panama. The representative of Costa Rica suggested that the Bank prepare a draft statute for the corporation. The representative of Turkey, among others, felt that the Bank ought to continue to explore the question further with governments.

The Committee had before it a draft resolution by Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Indonesia, Iraq, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia (A/C.2/L.209) on the status of the proposal to establish an international finance corporation.

According to section I of this draft resolution, the General Assembly would: (1) commend the International Bank for its efforts and express its appreciation of the Bank's reports on the proposed international finance corporation; (2) emphasize the beneficial effects the proposed corporation would have on the mobilization of financial resources in developed and under-developed countries in order to ensure additional resources for financing economic development in the under-developed countries; (3) look forward to the establishment, as soon as circumstances permitted, of an international finance corporation; (4) request the Bank to intensify its activities to seek the participation of public and private financial resources in furnishing the capital for a corporation as envisaged in the Bank's reports, and, with that end in view: (a) to analyse in detail the views expressed by governments and private financing circles concerning the methods of furnishing the capital for an international finance corporation, its function and operation; (b) to conduct its consultations for the establishment of an international finance corporation and for securing its initial capital in a more intensive manner, and to report to the Economic and Social Council at its eighteenth session; and (5) request the Council to review at that session the Bank's reports on the proposed international finance corporation with a view to recommending the drafting of its statute and to report thereon to the Assembly during its ninth session.

In section II of the draft resolution, the Assembly would request that the study, which was being prepared by the Secretary-General pursuant to Assembly resolution 622 C (VII), on the general role of private external capital be examined by the Council during its seventeenth session with a view to recommending effective means through which external private capital would be made more readily available to under-developed countries.

In section III, the Assembly would urge Member States to create favourable conditions conducive to the development of more liberal trade relations among them, and to adjust as much as was practicable any existing disequilibrium in the terms of trade and payments between the highly developed and under-developed countries, in order to create circumstances in which sources of additional capital would be more adequately available to under-developed countries.

The representative of Belgium supported the draft resolution, but thought that it might give the impression that the Bank had expressed an opinion regarding the establishment of a corporation which was capable of being constituted immediately and the aims, working methods and financing of which were known, whereas the Bank's report clearly showed that it was still only a question of a proposal. The draft resolution, he considered, also seemed to prejudge the results of the studies being made and drew conclusions which were perhaps premature in emphasizing the beneficial effects the proposed corporation would have on the mobilization of financial resources. With regard to section III of the draft resolution, he did not think it advisable in a resolution dealing specifically with a financial investment corporation to take up the question of the establishment of fair and equitable international prices for primary commodities. Therefore the Belgian representative, jointly with the representatives of Denmark, Norway, Sweden and the United States, submitted an amendment (A/C.2/L.211) to effect these changes.

The representative of Czechoslovakia, referring to section II of the draft resolution, stated that the Council could not recommend means through which external private capital would be made more readily available to under-developed countries until it had considered the question as a whole and had determined whether such capital would benefit the economy of the countries concerned. He therefore proposed (A/C.2/L.210) deleting that part of the paragraph which called on the Council to examine the study on the general role of private capital "with a view to recommending effective means through which external private capital would be made more readily available to under-developed countries."

The representative of France seriously objected to section III of the draft resolution which he considered not only obscure but contradictory. On the one hand, he stated, it asked Member States to develop more liberal trade relations, while, on the other hand, it called on them to adjust as much as was practicable the disequilibrium in the terms of trade and payments between the highly developed and the under-developed countries.

In an attempt to take into account these views, among others, the authors of the joint draft resolution submitted a revised text (A/C.2/L.209/Rev.1) at the Committee's 274th meeting on 16 November.

As revised, the resolution would have the Assembly in section I: (1) express its appreciation of the useful contribution the Bank had made to the study of the question; (2) emphasize the beneficial effects the proposed corporation could have on the mobilization of additional domestic resources in the under-developed countries and on the flow of external capital into these countries in order to augment the financial resources for their economic development; (3) look forward to the establishment, as soon as circumstances permitted, of an international finance corporation; (4) request the Bank to: (a) analyse in detail the questions raised and the views expressed by governments and non-governmental institutions concerning the methods of furnishing the capital for an international finance corporation, its functions and operation, (b) conduct its consultations on the question of the creation of an international finance corporation and securing its initial capital in a more intensive manner, (c) report to the Council at its eighteenth session on the subjects referred to in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) above; and (5) request the Council to review at its eighteenth session the Bank's reports on the question of creating an international finance corporation and to report thereon to the General Assembly during its ninth session.

In section II, the Assembly would request that the study being prepared by the Secretary-General on the general role of private external capital be examined by the Council during its seventeenth session with a view to ensuring the steady flow into under-developed countries of private capital in adequate amounts, so that it might effectively contribute to the harmonious and adequate integration of the economies of those countries and to their economic and social development.

In section III, the Assembly would request the Council to consider at its seventeenth session the report to be prepared by the group of experts appointed pursuant to Assembly resolution 623(VII) and, if possible, to propose recommendations for consideration by the Assembly at its ninth session.

The French representative expressed satisfaction with the revision of section III. However, the representative of Czechoslovakia did not think that section II, as revised, had altered the meaning and he therefore retained his original amendment (A/C.2/L.210). The United States representative considered that the resolution still implied acceptance in principle of the proposal to establish an international finance corporation and that the only question was when it should be established. The United States Government, he stated, still had the proposal under consideration and thus could not support that point. Secondly, the draft resolution still prejudged the question whether the proposed corporation would in fact have beneficial effects on the mobilization of additional resources for investment in under-developed countries. The joint amendment (A/C.2/L.211) was, therefore, also retained.

A working group was established, which, after two meetings on 19 and 20 November, presented a draft resolution (A/C.2/L.213) at the Committee's 275th meeting on 23 November. The eight-Power joint draft resolution (A/C.2/L.209/Rev.1) and the amendments thereto (A/C.2/L.210 & L.211) were then withdrawn by their respective sponsors. Following the acceptance of a drafting amendment by Indonesia, the Committee at its 279th meeting on 27 November adopted (A/2590 C) the draft resolution in paragraph-by-paragraph votes, ranging from a unanimous vote to 43 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. The resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 46 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

The General Assembly at its 468th plenary meeting on 7 December adopted the preamble of the draft resolution by 50 votes to none, with 5 abstentions; Part I by 51 votes to none, with 5 abstentions; Part II by 49 votes to none, with 5 abstentions; and Part III unanimously. The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 51 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 724 C (VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Bearing in mind that the general problem of economic development of the under-developed countries concerns both the under-developed and the more developed countries,

"Mindful that the economic development of the under-developed countries depends primarily on their own efforts and resources,

"Recognizing, however, that financial resources at present available in the under-developed countries are inadequate to finance the desired rate of economic development,

"Believing that additional external resources, both private and public, made available, as appropriate, within or without the framework of the United Nations, would greatly aid the under-developed countries in financing their development programmes,

I

"bearing in mind General Assembly resolution 622 B (VII) of 21 December 1952 and Economic and Social Council resolutions 416 C (XIV) and 482 B (XVI) of 23 June 1952 and 4 August 1953 respectively,

"Having considered the reports of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development on the question of creating an international finance corporation,

"Bearing in mind that the consultations and study requested below might indicate the practicability of establishing such a finance corporation in the near future,

"1. Expresses its appreciation of the useful contribution the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development has made to the study of the question;

"2. Emphasizes the beneficial effects the proposed corporation could have in so far as it would promote the mobilization of additional domestic resources in the under-developed countries and the flow of external capital into these countries, in order to augment the financial resources for their economic development;

"3. Urges governments which have not done so to give early consideration to the merits of establishing an international finance corporation, and to make known to the International Bank their views on the possibility of supporting such a corporation in time for the Bank to take them into consideration when preparing its report for the eighteenth session of the Economic and Social Council, as foreseen in paragraph 4 below;

"4. Requests the International Bank to:

"(a) Analyse in detail the questions raised and the views expressed by governments and non-governmental institutions concerning the methods of furnishing the capital for an international finance corporation, its functions and operations;

"(b) Conduct its consultations in a more intensive manner on the question of the creation of an international finance corporation and on the prospects of financial support for it;

"(c) Report to the Economic and Social Council at its eighteenth session on the subjects referred to it in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) above;

"5. Requests the Economic and Social Council to review at its eighteenth session the reports of the International Bank on the question of creating an international finance corporation and to report thereon to the General Assembly during its ninth session;

II

"Recognizing the importance of finding means to stimulate the flow of external private capital to the under-developed countries in order to accelerate their development,

"Mindful of General Assembly resolution 622 C (VII) of 21 December 1952,

"Requests that the study which is being prepared by the Secretary-General, pursuant to General Assembly resolution 622 C (VII), on the general role of private external capital be examined by the Economic and Social Council during its seventeenth session, with a view to ascertaining under what conditions the flow into under-developed countries of private capital can effectively contribute to the harmonious and adequate integration of the economies of those countries and to their economic and social development;

"Recognizing the importance of fluctuations in the terms of trade and the effect of these fluctuations on the financing of the economic development of the under-developed countries,

"Requests the Economic and Social Council to consider at its seventeenth session the report prepared by the group of experts appointed pursuant to General Assembly resolution 623(VII) of 21 December 1952 and to make such recommendations as it may find desirable for consideration by the General Assembly at its ninth session."

c. ANNUAL REPORT OF THE INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The Council, at its 684th and 685th plenary meetings on 14 April 1953, considered the annual report of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (E/2360) together with a supplement covering the period from 1 July 1952 to 28 February 1953 (E/2360/Add.1).

The President of the Bank, in a supplementary statement to the Council, stated that, during the year ending 30 June 1952, the Bank had loaned approximately $300 million and, during the subsequent nine months, a further $175 million. He stated that total disbursements by the Bank thus far were $1,050 million and during the past twelve months had been larger than in any comparable period since the end of the Bank's lending for European reconstruction. Disbursements outside the United States of funds raised in that country were increasing, and the Bank's lending in non-dollar currencies had reached a significant level. The Bank was continuing to urge Members other than the United States to release for lending additional funds from their subscribed capital and was meeting with considerable success. Since June 1952, the Bank, despite the fact that the cost of borrowed funds continued to rise, had successfully floated a $60 million issue in the United States and a 50 million Swiss franc issue in Switzerland.

The President of the Bank stated that the Bank was devoting more attention to problems of administrative and financial management in connexion with the execution of projects it was financing and that it was assisting the borrowers in working out effective solutions. In some cases, such factors as inflationary monetary and fiscal policies had hampered effective Bank action, but the Bank had been very active in undertaking investigations into the feasibility of providing new loans or reducing current difficulties of Members. During the past nine months, more than 40 Member countries and dependencies had been visited by Bank missions, including general survey missions. Advice had been given to stimulate the mobilization of local capital through the organization of development banks and the marketing of domestic securities.

He noted that in some respects the world economic situation had almost reversed since the beginning of 1951. The accumulated demand for goods in industrialized countries had largely been met, critical shortages had been overcome to a great extent, inflation had somewhat subsided and a period of adjustment appeared to be setting in. Whatever the turn of events might be, he did not anticipate any slackening in either the demand for or the urgency of economic development.

During the debate, several representatives, among them those of Argentina, Australia, France, India, the Philippines, Sweden, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay, expressed their satisfaction with the progress of the Bank's lending activities and its technical assistance programme, including its survey missions. The representatives of Egypt, India and the Philippines thought that, although the Bank was now giving greater attention to under-developed countries than in the past, certain geographical areas had, as yet, received an unduly small proportion of loans. The United States representative expressed approval of the flexibility of the Bank's operations, which had included for the first time a large direct loan to a privately owned manufacturing enterprise in India, and an increasing amount of loans in non-dollar currencies. The need for balanced distribution of assistance to development schemes in the under-developed areas in the industrial as well as the agricultural spheres was emphasized by the Indian representative. He and the United Kingdom representative pointed out that, in addition to its loans, the Bank had contributed to the revival of a somewhat better climate for international investment, which was of particular importance at a time when public capital and particularly private risk capital was increasingly scarce.

Other representatives, including those of Belgium and France, noted that economic development continued to be hampered by the fact that a true multilateral system of payments had not been re-established. The former expressed the opinion that the Bank did not seem to have paid sufficient attention in its lending operations to the objective of currency convertibility, in particular through fostering the expansion of triangular trade. This, he urged, would have special importance for the export of capital goods by European countries. Even though the Bank had to plan its operations on the assumption that for the time being certain currencies would remain inconvertible, it would be desirable to make its lending operations more multilateral. He also suggested that the Bank might free a country that had been granted a dollar loan from the obligation of repayment in dollars provided that a non-dollar country where the proceeds of the loan had been spent assumed the obligation of converting the equivalent amount back into dollars when the payments became due.

The representatives of Argentina and India expressed concern as to the ability of the Bank to operate effectively without a sharp drop in its rate of investment in under-developed countries in the event of a depression, because of its limited resources and of its credit system, and hoped that the Bank would work out policies for such an eventuality. The Australian representative pointed out that the Bank, which was restricted in the amount and nature of the assistance it could offer, could not alone provide the international capital required for economic development. However, it was only one of several instruments capable of promoting a greater international flow of public and private capital. The creation of a special fund for economic development, in the view of some representatives, including those of Turkey and Yugoslavia, was an urgent necessity; such a fund and the Bank would then together be able to play an important role in the sphere of world finance. The view was expressed by the Australian representative that more importance should be attached to the argument that the foreign financing of a country's productive development might be a powerful factor in solving the economic and financial problems that gave rise to difficulties in its international relations.

The representative of WFUNA pointed out that thus far the Bank had sold its bonds to exchange agents and brokers who resold them to such agencies as insurance companies and banks. He suggested that the Bank make arrangements for offering its bonds to individual small savers as well—a method which he felt was economically feasible and which would also have an important psychological effect.

Following the debate, the Council, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, adopted resolution 466(XV) taking note of the report of the Bank.

2. Technical Assistance for Economic Development

The Technical Assistance Administration (TAA)¹² set up on 31 July 1950 is responsible for the operational activities under General Assembly resolutions 200(III) on technical assistance for economic development, 418(V) on advisory social welfare services, for the operational and substantive aspects of 246(III) on training in public administration, and for the United Nations operational activities under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries, established by the Economic and Social Council under resolution 222 A (IX).¹³ The first three programmes are financed by the regular United Nations budget; the Expanded Programme is financed by voluntary contributions from governments to a Special Account. However, with the exception of the origin of the funds, the United Nations makes no administrative distinction between the technical assistance which it gives under resolutions 200 (III) and 246(III) and that which it gives with Expanded Programme funds. This is also true of those social welfare services provided under resolution 418(V) that pertain directly to economic development, for example, those in the fields of housing and town and country planning, migration and population.

The United Nations and the specialized agencies participate jointly in the Expanded Programme. The Technical Assistance Board (TAB) co-ordinates, integrates and reviews the activities carried out by these organizations under this Programme. The Technical Assistance Committee (TAC), a standing committee of the Council makes a critical examination of activities undertaken and results achieved and reports to the Council concerning the reports it receives from TAB.

a. EXPANDED PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

(1) Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Fifteenth Session

The Council's Technical Assistance Committee (TAC) met (29th to 37th meetings) from 23 March to 2 April 1953 and presented two reports to the Council, at its 687th plenary meeting on 15 April 1953. The first (E/2394) was primarily a report to precede the discussions (see below) to be held at the following session of TAC and at the Council's sixteenth session. It dealt briefly with preparatory work to be done before TAC's next session: (1) on proposals for improving the procedures for developing co-ordinated technical assistance programmes at the country level, and (2) on the preparation of a statement of the responsibilities of Resident Representatives and the corresponding responsibilities of the field representatives of the participating agencies. It also referred to the plans for a study of future financing of the Programme and to the need for working out estimates on a basis longer than a one-year period.

The second report (E/2395 & Corr.1) dealt in detail with the question of local costs to be borne by governments. In this connexion, TAC had had before it a report (E/TAC/R.59) by TAB on the question of the payment by recipient governments of local costs of technical assistance projects. TAC had also had before it reports of its working party (E/TAC/4 & Corr.1 & 2) as well as a resolution of the Executive Board of WHO (E/TAC/5) on the subject. The Committee had accepted, with slight changes, the proposals of its working party and, in an annex, set forth the financial implications of these proposals, which it recommended to the Council.

There was general agreement in the Council that the solutions recommended by TAC were in the nature of a compromise and the representative of the Philippines praised the remarkable co-operative effort of the delegations concerned. The French representative expressed the hope that recipient countries would themselves participate in the local costs of projects to a greater extent than that which was strictly required by the terms of the TAC decision. The Australian representative pointed out that the obligations assumed by recipient governments were not confined to the living costs of experts and that, when a government decided to carry out a development plan, it was fundamentally responsible for the administration and financing of the plan.

On the basis of TAC's report, the Council, at its 687th plenary meeting on 15 April, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, adopted the resolution (E/2395 B) proposed by TAC.

By this resolution (470(XV)), the Council decided that the new method of obtaining payment toward the living costs of experts, recommended by TAC in its resolution of 27 March 1953 (see below) should be substituted for the methods contained in paragraph 2¹⁴ of the operative part of the resolution of TAC of 17 July 1952 and put into effect not later than 1 January 1954. It recommended that payments made by governments towards living costs should be accounted for and administered in the same manner as voluntary contributions under resolution 222 (IX), provided that reports on the financial status of the Programme shall distinguish between voluntary contributions and payments made by governments toward the living costs of experts. The Council also requested the Assembly to authorize the Secretary-General to account for and administer payments made by governments towards the living costs of experts in accordance with the above-mentioned recommendations of the Council.

The resolution adopted by TAC was annexed to this resolution. It read as follows:

"The Technical Assistance Committee,

"Having reaffirmed the principle that governments should make a substantial contribution to the cost of technical assistance in local currency or in kind,

"Noting that the present method of determining the level of payments by governments towards the living costs of experts has tended to create disparities in the rates paid by different recipient governments in respect to such costs; that it has tended to bring about a progressive deterioration of the position in respect to the aggregate amount of government payments towards such costs, and that the present methods of payment of experts' living costs have created certain difficulties,

"Having considered the proposals on local costs to be borne by governments under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, contained in annex I of the report of the Committee,

"1. Adopts the policies and procedures set forth therein;

"2. Decides that, at a date not later than 1 January 1954, and without affecting the arrangements for meeting other types of local costs, the existing methods of assessing and paying local living costs of experts shall be modified to accord with those policies and procedures, to the end that,

"(a) All cash entitlements due to experts will be paid directly either by the employing organization or by an agent of the Technical Assistance Board, out of Programme funds;

"(b) The amount due from each recipient government in respect of each expert man-day provided to the government under the Programme will be assessed at a standard rate in local currency;

"(c) For purposes of calculation of amounts due for expert services, the standard rate will be 50 per cent of the TAB subsistence rate for the country concerned;

"(d) The amount calculated as due in respect of the total expert man-days to be provided in the year will be paid in accordance with financial arrangements to be negotiated between the government, the Executive Chairman and the participating organizations concerned;

¹⁴ Paragraph 2 provided that "requesting governments should not be required to provide the cost of lodging or travel per diem for experts in respect of such projects and programmes for the implementation of which extensive staff and other facilities are provided by the requesting governments; in all cases requesting governments should undertake to secure suitable accommodations for the experts".

"(e) The financial arrangements thus negotiated will take into account the option to be exercised by the recipient government which would elect whether (i) to make its payments towards these costs programme by programme, or alternatively, (ii) to make such payments in respect to all experts employed under all programmes in that country as a lump sum;

"3. Decides that, in cases of extreme hardship, general waivers may be granted by the Executive Chairman in consultation with the Technical Assistance Board to cover all programmes in the recipient country for limited periods; waivers may also be granted in exceptional circumstances to cover certain specific projects;

"4. Requests governments recipients of technical assistance to take all actions necessary to enable them to make payments in local currency on the above basis;

"5. Requests the Executive Chairman of the Technical Assistance Board, in consultation with the participating organizations, to carry out the necessary negotiations with the governments concerned and to establish the necessary administrative procedures, so that the new arrangements herein approved may be in effect at a date not later than 1 January 1954, in accordance with the provisions for implementing them set forth in the report of the Working Party of the Technical Assistance Committee."

(2) Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Sixteenth Session

TAC met (38th to 53rd meetings) from 22 July to 5 August and submitted its report (E/2497) to the Council at its 751st plenary meeting on 5 August 1953. The report was based on the fifth report of TAB (E/2433), which gave an account of the Programme's development in 1952, reviewed its financial aspects and summarized activities approved for 1953 and proposed for 1954. At the request of TAC, the Executive Chairman of TAB had also submitted proposals regarding the future financing of the Programme (E/TAC/10), the establishment of programmes of technical assistance at the country level (E/TAC/12) and the role of Resident Representatives (E/TAC/13). The Council also had before it a special report by the Advisory Committee on Co-ordination (E/2450) on policy issues involved in the operation of the technical assistance Programme under the Council's resolutions.

During the debate in TAC, general support was expressed for the concept of developing at the country level a programme aimed at ensuring that the projects carried out were closely integrated with the recipient governments' own efforts and plans of development. In discussing the role of Resident Technical Assistance Representatives, the Executive Chairman of TAB stressed that inter-agency co-operation had been strengthened by the appointment of these Representatives in a number of countries. The Polish and USSR representatives doubted the advisability of such appointments and thought expenses could be cut considerably by eliminating these posts. It was generally agreed, however, that these Representatives should continue to advise governments at their request on the formulation and implementation of requests for technical assistance in their countries of residence. In addition to the regular duties of Resident Representatives, it was considered that they might take on specific duties as might be agreed upon between the government concerned and TAB. These functions would to a large extent be determined in the light of the existence of an effective planning and co-ordinating machinery in the country concerned, subject to the overriding concept envisaged in the development of programmes at the country level.

The Executive Chairman and the Board were asked to make a close examination of the position in countries where Resident Representatives had been appointed, particularly in those where representatives of specialized agencies were functioning simultaneously, with a view to achieving economy and maximum efficiency. In this connexion, consideration should be given to the possibility of broadening the assignments of Resident Representatives to include more than one country.

The Committee adopted a new system of reports, as proposed by the Executive Chairman, and stressed that more attention should be given to programme evaluation and appraisal of the results.

TAC held a detailed discussion on the financial situation with which the Programme was faced, its future financing and the administrative and financial procedures under which it was operated.

While all recognized the need for administrative economies, they noted the particular problems arising from the complexity of the organizational arrangements for the Expanded Programme. The majority felt that TAB should closely examine the question of concentration of activities with a view to ensuring that contributions were used as effectively as possible. Noting that TAB had set up a working group to consider improved methods of classifying indirect operation costs, the Committee expressed the hope that TAB would carefully scrutinize such costs, as well as administrative costs, with a view to achieving economies.

The Committee stressed the importance of governments paying promptly their pledged contributions, and welcomed the decision of the USSR and Poland to contribute financially to the Expanded Programme. The desirability of long-term financing of the Programme was also recognized. The Committee further came to the conclusion that a review of the current financial procedures should be undertaken immediately and appointed a working party to conduct such a review. As a matter of urgency, TAC also requested TAB to review thoroughly the current financial procedures of the Expanded Programme, including the system of commitment and obligation and the size of the Special Reserve Fund and to report to the working party.

The Committee also suggested that the Assembly might wish to request the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to review the administrative procedures of TAB and those of the participating organizations, and their administrative expenditures financed from the Special Account. Such advice, it stated, would be welcomed by TAC in considering the policies of the Programme.

Following a brief discussion at the Council's 751st plenary meeting on 5 August, at which the need for a reduction in administrative expenses was again stressed, the two draft resolutions proposed by TAC (E/2497) were adopted by the Council.

By 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, the Council (492 C I (XVI)) took note of the memorandum of the Executive Chairman of TAB outlining the measures adopted by the Board for improving the procedures whereby co-ordinated country technical assistance programmes might be developed at the country level. It also requested TAB to report to TAC on the results obtained by putting these proposals into effect. It recalled, in that connexion, General Assembly resolution 519(VI) which requests the recipient governments to strengthen their internal machinery with a view to rendering more effective the activities of the participating organizations and to facilitate the co-ordination work of TAB and of its Resident Representatives.

The draft resolution concerning financial arrangements for 1954 and future financing of the Expanded Programme was adopted in parts: Part B was adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions; and the preamble and Parts A, C, and D unanimously. The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted unanimously. This resolution (492 C. II (XVI)) read as follows:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Having considered the report of the Technical Assistance Committee on the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, together with the fifth report of the Technical Assistance Board, the documents presented by the Technical Assistance Board, and the special report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination,

"Reaffirming its conviction that the Programme as a positive force in the economic development of under-developed countries and as a moral force for building the foundations of a peaceful world merits continuation and expansion,

"1. Emphasizes the pressing need that governments pay their pledged contributions promptly, including those already announced;

"2. Urges States participating in the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance to continue to give it their full support, financial and other, so as to ensure its essential and natural development and help it to meet the growing needs of the under-developed countries;

"3. Urges that, in order to permit the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance to progress, governments contribute for the year 1954 so as to meet to the maximum extent possible the programme needs for 1954, and in any case so that the funds available shall be no less than the amount earmarked by the Technical Assistance Board for the approved 1953 programme;

"4. Requests that, in order to enable the participating organizations to plan their programmes for 1954 in advance of the beginning of that year, the United Nations Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds meet as soon as possible after the close of the sixteenth session of the Council, and that the fourth Technical Assistance Conference be held as early as possible during the eighth regular session of the General Assembly;

"5. Recommends to the General Assembly to approve at an early date in its eighth regular session the following financial arrangements for the year 1954:

"(a) Seventy-five per cent of total funds available, excluding carry-over, shall be available for allocation to the participating organizations after approval of country programmes by the Technical Assistance Board, in accordance with the percentages set forth in paragraph 8 (c) of Council resolution 222(IX) as amended and modified pursuant to paragraph 19 of the report of the Technical Assistance Committee to the thirteenth session of the Council;

"(b) The balance of funds available, including carry-over, shall be retained in the Special Account: (i) to cover the necessary minimum expenses of TAB and the resident representatives, and (ii) for further allocation to the participating organizations, as provided in Council resolution 433(XIV);

"(c) In establishing the level of the necessary administrative expense in the whole programme, the need for economy, in view of the present level of operational expenditure, shall be fully taken into account;

C

"6. Takes note of the decision of the Technical Assistance Committee to appoint a working party:

"(a) To review the financial procedures under which the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance operates;

"(b) To consider in due course the system of allocation of funds to be applied as from 1955, taking into account the resolutions of TAC concerning the development of technical assistance programmes at the country level;

"7. Requests the Technical Assistance Committee to submit any recommendations it may wish to make in connexion with sub-paragraph (a) in the preceding paragraph to the resumed session of the Council, to be held during or shortly after the eighth regular session of the General Assembly;

"8. Having considered the feasibility of working out estimates for the Programme on a basis longer than a one-year period, according to the desire expressed by the General Assembly in its resolution 621(VII),

"9. Expresses the view that, for the orderly development of programmes, it would be useful to have assured financial support for a period longer than a year, even if the establishment of accurate long-term estimates of the requirements of the Programme is not feasible;

"10. Invites, therefore, such participating countries as may be in a position to do so, to take steps, within their constitutional limitations, to ensure the financial support of the Programme on a long-term basis."

(3) Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

The General Assembly considered the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance at the 249th to 257th meetings of its Second Committee, from 28 September to 12 October, and at its 454th plenary meeting on 23 October. It had before it the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430) and a memorandum by the Secretary-General providing a summary of the background material on questions relating to economic development.

The Executive Chairman of the Technical Assistance Board (TAB), in an opening statement to the Committee, pointed out that the crucial question was whether or not the Programme would be provided with the financial resources to proceed, to expand gradually and to fulfil its promise. Although the rate of cash payments had been better in 1953 than in 1952, considerable doubt had arisen concerning the probable payment of some contributions. He regretted that the tremendous momentum gained by the Expanded Programme had not been maintained in 1953. Financial limitations and uncertainties had made it necessary to abandon plans for expansion, many requests had been refused, and the hopes of many governments had been disappointed. In sharp contrast to the earlier years, 1953 had been marked by consolidation, disengagement and retrenchment. It was hoped that the forthcoming pledging conference would remedy the situation, but as no significant carry-over funds from 1953 to 1954 could be expected, governments would have to pledge a total of not less than 20 per cent in excess of the previous pledged total if the Programme were to be implemented in 1954 on the scale originally planned for 1953.

During the debate, the value of the Programme was stressed by all speakers. The mutual advantages deriving from a world-wide exchange of skills were stressed, as was also the contribution of the Programme to world peace by helping peoples to overcome conditions which breed unrest, tyranny and war. The Programme had shown that, despite political differences, the countries of the world could unite through the United Nations in a common endeavour for the general good of all. It was a practical activity by which many people would judge the Organization. Its actual achievements to date warranted the continued support of United Nations Members.

As in the Council, many representatives, in discussing the operation of the Programme, held that administrative costs were too high. Some representatives, among them those of Guatemala, India, Saudi Arabia and Venezuela, thought the salaries of experts appeared excessive. The representative of India held that the use of Resident Technical Assistance Representatives often imposed a heavy financial burden and suggested that there be fewer Representatives and that they be appointed on a regional basis rather than for a single country. In this connexion, the Indonesian representative agreed that the possibility of some readjustment of jurisdiction assigned to Resident Representatives might be explored in the interests of better co-ordination.

A number of representatives announced their governments' continuing support for the Programme and their intentions—subject to parliamentary approval—to increase their pledges for the coming year. The representative of Czechoslovakia had also earlier announced, at the 444th plenary meeting on 24 September, that his country was ready to contribute to the Programme.

There was some discussion as to the possibilities of governments pledging funds for a period of more than one year, but it was generally recognized that, for constitutional and administrative reasons, it would be impossible for most governments to make such pledges. However, in this connexion, the Indonesian representative announced that his Government would make a pledge for a period of three years. The representative of Saudi Arabia suggested that an annual quota system be set up similar to that used in maintaining the regular United Nations budget. The representative of Argentina also favoured some system of permanent contributions.

As a means of raising additional funds, the Haitian representative suggested the sale of a special Technical Assistance postage stamp in Member States. The representative of Peru supported the examination of this proposal and suggested also the possibility of obtaining funds from private institutions or donors.

The need for greater co-ordination of the Programme was stressed during the debate. The representatives of Argentina, Belgium and the USSR supported the idea that programmes conducted by individual agencies in the countries should be integrated into wider national programmes and that the specialized agencies should be induced to give up part of their independence in order to promote the flexible and regular operation of the Expanded Programme. The representative of France suggested that governments be more closely associated with the approval of programmes and the allocation of funds for technical aid projects, somewhat along the lines of the procedures followed in other United Nations operations financed from voluntary contributions by governments, like the United Nations Children's Fund or the programmes for Korea and Palestine refugees. He also favoured abolishing the current system, whereby a certain proportion of the funds for the Expanded Programme were automatically allocated between the participating organizations in accordance with an established formula. Several members, including the representatives of Argentina, Belgium, Egypt, Israel, Iraq and the Netherlands, thought these suggestions deserved further study. The representative of the Netherlands, however, cautioned that the scheme for more direct association of governments in the execution of the Programme would not fully come up to expectations if it involved the creation of some sort of advisory inter-governmental body of very restricted membership.

The Assembly had before it a joint draft resolution (A/C.2/L.197) by Belgium, Bolivia, Canada, the Dominican Republic, Iraq, the Netherlands, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, the United States and the United Kingdom embodying the substance of the recommendations by the Council.

The representatives of Israel and Norway proposed (A/C.2/L.198) the insertion of a new paragraph which would request "the participating governments and agencies to intensify their efforts to secure wide publicity for the Programme". Among others, the representatives of Egypt, India, Iran and Lebanon objected to this amendment primarily on the grounds that it was inconsistent with the needs and recommendations for economy. The sponsors of the amendment agreed to add (A/C.2/L.198/Rev.1) the words "by existing means at their disposal" since, they stated, they had not intended that additional money be required.

The representative of Greece submitted a proposal (A/C.2/L.199/Rev.1) which, following the acceptance of a drafting amendment by Iraq, would invite TAC and TAB, in working out their recommendations on the administration, financial procedures and system of allocation of funds, to take into consideration the relevant views expressed in the Assembly's debates.

The representative of the USSR thought that the paragraph in the draft concerning unfulfilled pledges should specify that the governments which had not fulfilled such pledges had made them at conferences of participants, and suggested an amendment (A/C.2/L.200) to clarify this point. He accepted a suggestion by Pakistan to refer to "obligations assumed" rather than "pledges", in view of the fact that in the legal sense the majority of governments did not assume a binding engagement since decisions had to be ratified by their legislatures.

The representative of Egypt thought that the resolution ought to conform more closely to Council resolution 492 C (XVI). The Council, he stated, had reaffirmed that the Programme must be dynamic and continually expanding. The Assembly should take the same approach rather than condemning the Programme to stagnation by expressions of satisfaction with the current status. He therefore submitted amendments (A/C.2/L.201) to this effect.

At the Committee's 257th meeting on 8 October, a draft resolution was submitted (A/C.2/L.202) by a working group set up at the previous meeting. The working group had substituted a new text for the joint amendment submitted by Israel and Norway and this was subsequently adopted by 41 votes to 1, with 10 abstentions (see below, paragraph 1).

The USSR representative considered that the point of his amendment had not been met. However, he agreed to a text submitted verbally by the French representative; this text was adopted by 45 votes to none, with 7 abstentions (see below, paragraph 3). The Committee also agreed, as proposed by Poland and the United Kingdom, respectively, to refer in paragraph 4 specifically to Council resolution 492 C. I & II (XVI), paragraphs 6 and 7 (see above).

On the request of the representative of the USSR, paragraph 6 was voted on separately; it was adopted by a vote of 45 to none, with 7 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted unanimously by the Committee (A/2519 I), and by the General Assembly at its 454th plenary meeting on 23 October 1953. Resolution 722(VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Believing that the results so far achieved by the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance demonstrate the important contribution which the Programme has made and is capable of making in the economic development of under-developed countries,

"Desirous that the Expanded Programme shall continue to play an increasingly effective role in the achievement of higher standards of living for the people of the under-developed areas,

"1. Recommends that governments and participating agencies pay due regard to making the aims and operations of the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance more widely known;

"2. Urges that, in order to permit the Expanded Programme to progress, governments contribute for the year 1954 so as to meet to the maximum extent possible the Programme needs for 1954 and, in any case, so that the funds available shall be no less than the amount earmarked by the Technical Assistance Board for the approved 1953 programme;

"3. Emphasizes the pressing need that governments pay promptly their contributions pledged at conferences, with special regard to previous financial periods;

"4. Notes with satisfaction the actions taken by the Economic and Social Council in paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of section I and in paragraphs 6 and 7 of section II of resolution 492 C (XVI) of 5 August 1953 designed to strengthen the organization and administration of the Expanded Programme, so as to assure the most effective use of the contributions made available, and invites the Technical Assistance Committee and the Technical Assistance Board, in working out their recommendations on the administration, the financial procedures and the system of allocation of funds of the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, to take into consideration the relevant views expressed in the debates during the eighth session of the General Assembly;

"5. Requests the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to review as soon as possible the administrative procedures of the Technical Assistance Board and those of the participating organizations as well as their administrative expenditures so far as those are financed from the Special Account;

"6. Approves the financial arrangements set forth in the annex hereto as recommended by the Economic and Social Council in paragraph 5 of section II of resolution 492 C (XVI);

"7. Requests the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds, appointed pursuant to General Assembly resolution 759(VIII) of 5 October 1953, to undertake, in addition to already assigned tasks and as soon as convenient after the closing of the eighteenth session of the Economic and Social Council, negotiations with governments regarding their pledges to the Special Account for the year 1955 towards the goal to be suggested by the Council at the same session;

"8. Notes that the Economic and Social Council, in response to the desire expressed by the General Assembly in resolution 621(VII) of 21 December 1952, has expressed the view that, for the orderly development of programmes, it would be useful to have assured financial support for a period longer than a year, and invites those participating countries which may be in a position to do so to take steps within their constitutional limitations, to ensure the financial support of the Expanded Programme on a long-term basis."

ANNEX FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

(Recommended by the Economic and Social Council in paragraph 5, section II, of resolution 492 C (XVI))

(a) Seventy-five per cent of total funds available, excluding carry-over, shall be available for allocation to the participating organizations after approval of country programmes by the Technical Assistance Board, in accordance with the percentages set forth in paragraph 8 (c)¹⁵ of Council resolution 222 A (IX) as amended and modified pursuant to paragraph 19 of the report of the Technical Assistance Committee to the thirteenth session of the Council;

(b) The balance of funds available, including carry-over, shall be retained in the Special Account (i) to cover the necessary minimum expenses of TAB and the resident representatives; and (ii) for further allocation to the participating organizations, as provided in Council resolution 433(XIV);

(c) In establishing the level of the necessary administrative expense in the whole Programme, the need for economy, in view of the present level of operational expenditure, shall be fully taken into account.

(4) Activities during 1953¹⁶

During the year, a total of 86 countries and territories received technical assistance under the Expanded Programme. The total direct project costs incurred by all the participating organizations on their projects in these countries and territories during 1953 amounted to the equivalent of US $17.8 million. Of the total, projects implemented in Africa accounted for $1.7 million, Asia and the Far East for $5.5 million, Europe for $1.5 million, Latin America for $4.6 million and the Middle East for $3.2 million. A sum of $1.3 million was obligated on inter-regional projects which benefited jointly countries in more than one region.

¹⁵ Formerly paragraph 9 (c).

To provide for some unforeseen but urgent requests from governments, to meet the shortage of financial resources and to utilize more fully some of the non-convertible currencies, various adjustments had to be made in the Programme during 1953. As a result, 269 projects were completed during the year and, at the end of 1953, a total of 502 were in operation in 68 countries and territories.

During 1953, as in previous years, the main forms of assistance continued to be: (1) the provision of the services of experts in various specialized fields; (2) the award of fellowships and study or training grants to nationals of the under-developed countries for observation, study or training abroad in the various fields related to economic or social development; and (3) the provision of limited amounts of supplies and equipment not locally available in the countries assisted and needed for purposes of training and demonstration in connexion with particular technical assistance projects. The relative importance of these three forms of assistance in the Programme as implemented in 1953 can be seen from the fact that, of the total amounts obligated for projects during the year, experts accounted for $13,585,310 (76 per cent), fellowships for $2,531,582 (14 per cent) and supplies and equipment for $1,701,255 (10 per cent).

A total of 1,757 experts of 64 nationalities were sent to 65 countries and territories during 1953, as against 1,626 experts of 64 nationalities sent in 1952 to 62 countries and territories. An important feature of the 1953 operations was the sharp fall in the number of fellowships and scholarships awarded as a result of the acute financial stringency. Thus, a total of 1,195 scholarships and fellowships were awarded to nationals of 85 countries and territories, compared with the 2,127 awards made in 1952 to nationals of 92 countries and territories, and 67, as compared with 76, countries or territories acted as hosts to fellows.

(5) Contributions to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance

As a result of the Third Technical Assistance Conference in February 1953, 69 governments, by 31 December, had pledged $22,395,687 for the year 1953, as follows:

 Pledge announced at the sixteenth session of the Economic and Social Council.

 Pledge announced at the sixteenth session of the Economic and Social Council, but subject to confirmation.

As a result of the Fourth Technical Assistance Conference, in November, 69 governments and the Holy See, by the end of the year, had pledged $24,204,529 for 1954.

b. UNITED NATIONS PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE¹⁷

(1) Progress Report of the Secretary-General

The Council, at its 747th plenary meeting on 3 August 1953, had before it a report submitted by the Secretary-General (E/2414) describing technical assistance rendered to governments by the United Nations during 1952 and, more briefly, important developments in this field during the first three months of 1953.¹⁸ The report covered activities under the Expanded Programme of technical assistance as well as under the three related programmes concerning economic development, public administration, and advisory social welfare services established by General Assembly resolutions 200(III), 246(III) and 418(V), respectively. The report contained a description, by country and project, of action taken to meet requests from 77 governments and territories, as well as some 45 regional and other projects, many of which had been planned or carried out in cooperation with the secretariats of the regional economic commissions and with other agencies.

The Secretary-General in his report drew the Council's attention to the striking increase in the volume of assistance rendered to governments. The number of experts had, for example, risen from 165 in 1951 to 451 in 1952; and whereas, in 1951, 451 fellows and scholars had taken up awards, the comparable figure in 1952 had been 729. He reminded the Council, however, that this encouraging development was offset by the fact that, at the very moment when the technical assistance programme was getting into its stride, its further growth had been at any rate temporarily curtailed by the shortage of funds.

He reported a growing tendency on the part of countries in the process of development to play an active part as givers of technical assistance, either by furnishing host facilities for fellows and scholars or by making available experts to give technical advice or to conduct training or demonstration projects. Particularly in the case of the fellowship programme, periods of study and observation, in the Secretary-General's view, could often be more fruitful to the individual concerned if spent in countries where the level of economic development did not diverge too sharply from that in his own country and where a similar social and cultural pattern obtained. The Secretary-General further stated that careful attention had been paid, in accordance with views frequently expressed in the Council, to the selection of projects in the social field to be financed under the Expanded Programme. Only those projects directly related to economic development would be so financed.

On the subject of reporting, the Secretary-General informed the Council that he proposed to continue his current practice of submitting one annual report to the Council on the activities of TAA as a whole. He further suggested that, in order to meet the requirements of General Assembly resolution 200(III) on technical assistance for economic development, which asks for the submission of a report to each session of the Council on measures taken in compliance with that resolution, a brief information paper on activities under the resolution might be circulated at other sessions of the Council during a given year. Such a paper had in fact been circulated during the Council's fifteenth session (E/2375).

During the discussion, the representatives of France and the United States declared that they were generally satisfied with the progress recorded and considered that the programme had been well directed and conducted during 1952. The representative of the USSR thought that much good had been achieved and, although there were shortcomings, they did not detract from the significance of the programme. The United States representative also expressed the view that the growing part played in the implementation of the programme by countries in the process of development was an encouraging sign. He and the French representative expressed particular satisfaction with the increasingly effective collaboration with the secretariats of the regional economic commissions and with the development of regional activities in general. However, the representative of France felt that the expenses entailed by the large number of seminars and working groups might be considered excessive. Satisfaction was also expressed at evidence of smoother co-ordination with other technical assistance programmes and within the United Nations Secretariat itself. The USSR representative warned that attempts to achieve co-ordination with bilateral programmes might implicate the United Nations programme in matters alien to the nature and aims of international technical assistance.

The representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States placed particular emphasis on the importance of the follow-up of technical assistance by recipient governments, both as regards the implementation of experts' recommendations and as regards the use to which returning fellows and scholars were able to put the training they had received abroad. It was essential, they held, that the Council should receive information on, and an evaluation of, the results of technical assistance, and future reports by the Secretary-General should cover this question as fully as possible. On the general subject of reports, it was agreed that one annual report on the previous year's activities would meet the Council's needs, and that, in addition, the brief information paper to be circulated at other sessions would serve a useful purpose.

A French draft resolution (E/L.656) was adopted by the Council by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. The Polish representative, explaining his abstention, expressed the view that the Council should use a uniform phrase in acknowledging reports and not "take note" of them in some instances and "express satisfaction" in others. This view was shared by the USSR representative. In resolution 492 A (XVI), the Council noted with satisfaction the Secretary-General's report concerning the Regular United Nations Programme of Technical Assistance.

(2) Technical Assistance in Public Administration(a) CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS SIXTEENTH SESSION

The Council at its 747th and 748th plenary meetings, on 3 and 4 August, had before it a report by the Secretary-General on "Technical Assistance in Public Administration" (E/2415). The report outlined the history of the programme, pointing out that the emphasis had gradually shifted from the conception, embodied in General Assembly resolution 246(III), of an international training centre to the provision of opportunities for national and regional training, and that, at the request of governments, direct expert assistance in public administration was being furnished on an increasing scale. The Secretary-General described the elements of the programme as currently carried out and suggested that the Council might wish to give its official sanction to these activities, which were wider in scope than those originally conceived by the Council and the General Assembly at the inception of the programme.

The discussion of the report revealed that the Council was in substantial agreement that the need existed for a new and more realistic definition of the terms of reference, aims and methods of the programme of technical assistance in public administration and that it endorsed, in general, the trends and developments noted by the Secretary-General in his report. The principle that economic development could only be securely founded in countries possessing sound administrative structures was reaffirmed, and it was pointed out, by the Argentine representative, that the countries most in need of United Nations assistance in public administration were those in the process of development. Several representatives, among them those of Australia, Egypt, France, the USSR and the United States, agreed that the shift in emphasis towards regional and national training was wise, since there was a special need in the field of public administration for technical assistance designed and adapted to meet the needs of a particular country. In this connexion, the Egyptian representative urged that emphasis should be placed on national, rather than on regional, training centres. It was also generally agreed that future reports on the programme should include an assessment of practical results achieved.

A number of representatives, among them those of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom, noted with satisfaction the collaboration described in the Secretary-General's report between the United Nations and the International Institute of Administrative Sciences, and urged that the maximum use be made of the expertise of this and similar institutions, in the interests of both efficiency and economy. The representative of the USSR held the view, however, that such co-operation should not entail any allocation of United Nations funds to these institutions.

While it was generally considered that the collection and dissemination of technical information was an important aspect of the programme, the United Kingdom representative stressed that the major effort of the Public Administration Division of TAA should be directed towards tangible assistance to governments and that the collection of technical information should be left to expert bodies. The USSR representative thought that the type of information received was often superfluous and that the United Nations should concentrate on information submitted by governments which would have a direct bearing on the problems of technical assistance in public administration.

The Council had before it a joint draft resolution (E/L.562) by Argentina, Cuba, Egypt, the Philippines, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States redefining the functions and aims of the programme of technical assistance in public administration along the broad lines suggested in the Secretary-General's report.

The Council noted an oral statement by the Director-General of TAA to the effect that the adoption of the draft resolution would not authorize the initiation of any new activity and would neither increase nor decrease the financial commitment of the United Nations. By 15 votes to 2, with 1 abstention, it rejected an oral proposal by the USSR representative to include in the draft resolution a specific directive that the financial estimates for the programme should be put forward within the limits of the previous year's appropriation. It was agreed, however, that, while the Council should not impose such an unprecedented limitation on the Secretary-General's powers to suggest increases or decreases in the United Nations budgetary estimates, his attention should be drawn to the need for ensuring that the programme was administered with the utmost economy.

The sponsors of the draft resolution accepted a French amendment (E/L.566), which would provide for collaboration with the International Institute of Administrative Sciences not only with regard to exchange of information but also with regard to collection and analysis of technical information in the field of public administration. As suggested by the representative of Cuba, the words "where appropriate" were inserted. In a separate vote on this part of the paragraph, it was adopted by 16 votes to 2, and the remainder of the draft resolution was adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by the Council at its 748th meeting on 4 August 1953, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

By resolution 492 B (XVI), the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report on the programme of technical assistance in public administration and of the organizational measures which he had taken in that connexion, and recommended that the Assembly adopt a resolution approving a revised United Nations programme in public administration. (For text as adopted without change by the Assembly, see below.)

(b) CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The General Assembly considered the item "Technical assistance in public administration" at the same time as it discussed questions concerning the Expanded Programme of technical assistance for economic development at the 249th to 257th meetings of its Second Committee, from 28 September to 12 October, and at its 454th plenary meeting on 23 October.

During the general debate, a number of representatives, including those of Belgium, Brazil, Cuba, Iran, the Netherlands and Turkey, stressed the importance of the public administration programme. Without an efficient public administration, the representative of Belgium pointed out, the economic and social standard of living could not be raised. Since public administration was a very large subject, experts, he stressed, should give their advice on specific points and these recommendations should be practical and adapted to local conditions. The representative of Iran stated that he would endorse any means to improve public administration in under-developed countries by methods more closely adapted to the individual requirements of such countries and by more direct assistance.

The draft resolution, as proposed by the Council (492 B (XVI)), was adopted unanimously by the Second Committee (A/2519 II) at its 256th meeting on 9 October, and by the Assembly at its 454th plenary meeting on 23 October 1953. Resolution 723 (VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting that the programme of activities and the organizational arrangements developed by the Secretary-General in consultation with the Economic and Social Council in response to General Assembly resolution 246(III) of 4 December 1948, and placed on a continuing basis in accordance with General Assembly resolution 518(VI) of 12 January 1952, are no longer adequately covered by the terms of resolution 246(III),

"Noting further that the aforementioned activities now form an integral part of a wider programme of assistance to governments in the field of public administration, including aspects other than training,

"Recognizing the increasingly important role of governmental administration in programmes for the promotion of economic development and social welfare,

"1. Approves a revised United Nations programme in public administration comprising:

"(a) The provision, at the request of governments, of technical assistance related to public administration, including training for public service, through:

- (i) The advisory services of experts;
- (ii) Fellowships and scholarships;
- (iii) Training institutes, seminars, conferences, working groups and other means;
- (iv) The provision of technical publications;

"(b) The collection, analysis and exchange of technical information in the field of public administration, in collaboration, where appropriate, with the International Institute of Administrative Sciences and other appropriate institutions, and assistance to governments to promote, by all suitable means, sound public administration, in relation to economic and social development;

"2. Authorizes the Secretary-General to continue to include in the budgetary estimates of the United Nations the funds necessary for carrying out an effective operational programme based on the provision of the above services and, in addition, to finance such activities from funds made available from the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, provided that, in the latter case, such assistance is related to the economic development of under-developed countries;

"3. Reaffirms the principle by which each requesting government shall continue to be expected to assume responsibility, as far as possible, for all or part of the expenses connected with the services furnished to it;

"4. Requests the Secretary-General to report regularly to the Economic and Social Council on activities carried on under this programme."

(3) Activities during 1953

In 1953, under the United Nations programme of technical assistance, 495 experts, recruited from 50 countries, gave advice in the fields of social welfare, economic development, and public administration in response to requests from 55 governments. The experts were specialists in transport and communications, industrial development, applied economics, statistics, water and mineral resources, monetary and fiscal policy, cottage industries, electrification, housing and town planning, rehabilitation, population, rural welfare, training of civil servants and social workers, personnel selection and central and local administration.

Work has been diversified and has varied from geological surveys of almost unmapped territories to the revision of statutes of central banks. Experts have assisted in finding new water supplies for drought-threatened cities and have aided finance ministers in devising new investment programmes. New ports have been developed, new techniques in industry and in building applied, and new equipment installed.

In addition to providing expert advice, the United Nations, in 1953, arranged to send abroad 627 fellows and scholars; of these, 273 observed and studied in the field of economic development, 100 in the field of public administration, and 254 in that of social welfare.

Technical assistance is also supplied by means of group activities. During 1953, for example, a group of technicians from Asia and the Far East visited Australia to study the prospecting, mining, and utilization of lignite. Demonstrations have been held in Israel on the use of stabilized earth as a building material and preparations were made for the opening in Pakistan of a regional training centre in railway operations.

In Santiago, Chile, an Economic Development Training Programme has continued the work begun in a previous year. A seminar on the transport problems of five Central American countries has been part of a larger programme of the economic integration of their national systems. In Egypt, a Demonstration Centre for the Rehabilitation Service of the Blind has been opened under the guidance of a Canadian expert; the Centre combines a school, home training facilities and a Braille printing press.

Training schools in Public Administration have been established in Brazil, Turkey and Libya, and plans were well advanced by the end of the year for a school in Central America. Seminars on public administration and budget management were organized in Istanbul and Mexico City.

Two regional seminars in social welfare were held in Latin America. One, on rural welfare, dealt with the problems associated with migration from the countryside to the towns; the other was concerned with the prevention of crime and treatment of offenders. In Europe, Exchange Plan Seminars in social welfare were organized on similar lines to those of previous years.

c. ASSISTANCE TO LIBYA

The General Assembly on 1 February 1952 (515(VI))¹⁹ requested the Economic and Social Council to study, in consultation with the Government of the United Kingdom of Libya, ways and means by which the United Nations, with the co-operation of all governments and the competent specialized agencies, and upon the request of the Government of Libya, could furnish additional assistance to that country with a view to financing its fundamental and urgent programmes of economic and social development, and to report thereon to the Assembly. At the request of the Libyan Government (E/2282), the Council at its fourteenth session in 1952 postponed consideration of the question until 1953, at which time that Government had indicated it expected to be in a position to furnish the requisite factual information on Libya's economic and social development programmes and on the functioning of the related operative organs only just established.

(1) Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Sixteenth Session

The Council at its 746th and 747th plenary meetings, on 3 August 1953, had before it a memorandum (E/2469 & Corr.1) from the Acting Prime Minister of Libya setting forth a five-year capital development programme, defining the financial assistance needed for projects to be carried out with the aid of technical assistance experts as well as for building up an agricultural credits fund and a stabilization reserve for emergency expenditures in drought years. In introducing this memorandum to the Council, the observer for the Government of Libya further explained his country's vital need for assistance in its development, expressed the gratitude of the Libyan people for the help received to that end under the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance and under bilateral arrangements for the same purpose, and emphasized that his Government would welcome additional contributions, compatible with the country's independence and sovereignty, from States which wished to accord economic and financial assistance to Libya.

The Council also had before it a joint draft resolution (E/L.563) by Egypt and Turkey on assistance to Libya, which was subsequently adopted (see below). During the discussion, the majority agreed that Libya greatly needed assistance in developing its resources and in improving the welfare of the people. They supported the draft resolution, recognizing that the United Nations had a special responsibility towards the State it had helped to create, and commended the development programme drawn up by the Libyan Government. It was clear, they agreed, from the memorandum submitted by that Government that substantial financial assistance would have to be provided if Libya were to overcome the grave and urgent problems with which it was faced.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that it was incumbent on all governments to consider, in the light of their existing resources and commitments, whether they could make an increased or fresh contribution. The representative of France thought that the extent of the financial aid and technical help that could be given at the present time should not be overestimated, but hoped that the adoption of the draft resolution would pave the way for more effective help to Libya in the future. The Yugoslav representative, while also supporting the draft resolution, felt that more should be done by the United Nations to help strengthen the Libyan economy and develop the country as an independent State. He believed that certain questions barely touched upon in the text as drafted would have to be taken up for consideration when the resolution came before the General Assembly.

The representatives of India and the USSR, sharing the view that more explicit provision for additional assistance to Libya through the United Nations ought to have been made in the draft resolution, expressed misgivings regarding the "other channels" of assistance referred to therein, a reference which might be construed as implying approval by the Council of such bilateral agreements as that just concluded for a period of 20 years between the United Kingdom and the Libyan Governments. While no objection, in principle, could be voiced against bilateral arrangements for assistance in economic development, the Indian representative stated, such assistance, where the bargaining strength of the contracting parties was very unequal, might in the long run endanger Libya's economic freedom and not be altogether in its interests. The representative of the USSR, though recognizing that the Government of Libya was free if it so chose to enter into such an arrangement, stated that the terms of the treaty were not compatible with United Nations principles as defined in the Charter. On these grounds he also felt unable to support the draft resolution but would also not oppose it, wishing Libya to receive any appropriate help in its development.

The Council, at its 747th plenary meeting on 3 August, adopted the joint draft resolution by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 493(XVI).

By this resolution, the Council recalled the part played by the United Nations in the creation of the independent State of the United Kingdom of Libya in accordance with General Assembly resolution 289(IV); noted that consultations had been undertaken with the Libyan Government in accordance with General Assembly resolution 515 (VI); and considered that it was open to governments to assist Libya through any appropriate mechanisms within the United Nations that might be available for receiving voluntary contributions or through other channels acceptable to the Libyan Government.

The Council, therefore, recommended that the General Assembly: (1) invite all governments which were in a position to do so to provide, in the spirit of the United Nations Charter and within their possibilities, financial and technical assistance to Libya in order to assist in Libya's economic development; (2) recommend that, if and when further means became available for assisting in the financing of the development of under-developed areas, due consideration should be given to the specific development needs of Libya; and (3) request the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies concerned to continue to waive local costs and to give all possible favourable consideration to the requests of Libya for technical assistance, taking into account the special needs of Libya and the principles of the technical assistance programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

(2) Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

The question was before the General Assembly at the 285th to 287th meetings of its Second Committee, on 3 and 4 December, and at its 469th plenary meeting on 8 December 1953. The Second Committee had before it, inter alia, a joint draft resolution (A/C.2/L.221/Rev.1) by Egypt, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Turkey and Yemen, based on the previous resolutions adopted by the Council and the Assembly concerning aid to Libya.

As in the Council, it was agreed that, if Libya were to overcome the grave and urgent problems with which it was faced, it must have substantial financial and technical assistance, and that the United Nations, having played a part in bringing about its independence, should consider what could be done to help provide such assistance. Among those speaking in support of the draft resolution were the representatives of Afghanistan, Argentina, Chile, Cuba, India, Peru, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States. The representatives of Afghanistan, Chile, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Liberia, Mexico and Uruguay supported the draft resolution, but stated that their Governments were not in a position at this time to make funds available to Libya. The representatives of Cuba and Peru stated that they did not regard support of the resolution as a definite commitment to contribute to the financing of the fundamental programmes for the development of Libya. The representative of the Philippines thought it should be understood that assistance to Libya would not continue indefinitely and that the waiving of local costs was intended as an interim measure.

As in the Council, the USSR representative criticized the bilateral agreement between the United Kingdom and Libya as containing provisions infringing upon Libya's sovereign rights. He stated that he could not support those parts of the draft resolution which would make such a policy possible, although other parts of the draft resolution were acceptable. His delegation would therefore abstain.

At its 287th meeting, following paragraph-by-paragraph votes, ranging from a unanimous vote to 44 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, the Committee adopted the draft resolution, as a whole, by 45 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as proposed by the Committee (A/2612), was adopted at the Assembly's 469th plenary meeting on 8 December by 41 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 726(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the part played by the United Nations in the creation of the independent State of the United Kingdom of Libya, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 289 A (IV) of 21 November 1949 recommending that Libya, comprising Cyrenaica, Tripolitania and the Fezzan should be constituted as an independent and sovereign State, and that this independence was achieved on 24 December 1951, in accordance with that resolution,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 515(VI) of 1 February 1952 by which the Assembly requested the Economic and Social Council to study, in consultation with the Government of the United Kingdom of Libya, ways and means by which the United Nations, with the co-operation of all governments and the competent specialized agencies, and upon the request of the Government of Libya, could furnish additional assistance to the United Kingdom of Libya with a view to financing its fundamental and urgent programmes of economic and social development, giving consideration to the possibility of opening a special account of voluntary contributions to that end, and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its seventh session,

"Recalling further its resolution 529(VI) of 29 January 1952 on the problem of war damages in Libya,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 398(V) of 17 November 1950 which recognizes the special responsibility assumed by the United Nations for the future of Libya,

"Bearing in mind the recommendations submitted by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 493 (XVI) of 3 August 1953,

"Having heard the statement made by the representative of the United Kingdom of Libya concerning the needs of Libya for economic and financial assistance,

"1. Invites all governments willing and in a position to do so to provide financial assistance to the United Kingdom of Libya through the appropriate mechanisms within the United Nations Organization available for receiving voluntary contributions, in order to assist Libya in the financing of its fundamental and urgent programmes of reconstruction and of economic and social development;

"2. Recommends that, if and when further means become available for assisting in the financing of the development of under-developed areas, due consideration be given by the United Nations and the specialized agencies to the specific development needs of Libya;

"3. Requests the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies concerned to continue to waive local costs and to give all possible favourable consideration to the requests of Libya for technical assistance, taking into account the special needs of Libya and the principles of the technical assistance programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies enumerated in Economic and Social Council resolution 222(IX) of 15 August 1949;

"4. Requests the Secretary-General to bring the present resolution to the attention of the governments of Members and to take the necessary measures to facilitate the implementation of paragraph 1 above;

"5. Requests the Secretary-General to make a special report on the question of United Nations assistance to Libya in time to be placed on the agenda of the tenth session of the General Assembly."

3. Methods to Increase World Productivity

In resolution 416 E (XIV) of 10 July 1952, the Council requested the Secretary-General, after consultation with the specialized agencies concerned, to arrange for the continuation of studies concerning the problem of raising productivity in under-developed countries, particularly in such fields as agriculture, manufacture, mining, transport, the construction industries and the distributive trades, and for the preparation of working papers on the problem of raising productivity in relation to programmes for the expansion of production in these fields and on the role of labour in any programme for increasing productivity.

Accordingly, at its sixteenth session, the Council had before it two working papers by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) and by the International Labour Office.

The working paper prepared by FAO (E/2435) briefly discussed the problems of productivity, for which FAO has international responsibility in agriculture, fisheries and forestry. Special emphasis was placed on the important differences which distinguish problems of productivity in these fields from those in industry, mining, transport and other forms of secondary or tertiary economic activities. The report, inter alia, listed six principal means of raising productivity in agriculture:

- (1) transformation of the natural resources of land and water in such a way that they can contribute in full to plant growth;
- (2) improving the capacity for growth and production of the plant and animals domesticated by man;
- (3) better nutrition for plants and animals;
- (4) improvements in technical equipment;
- (5) prevention of losses in growing crops and livestock through pests and diseases and losses from products in storage and in transit; and
- (6) raising skill and understanding in the conservation and use of resources and the care of plants and animals and the utilization of technical equipment.

The working paper prepared by the International Labour Office (E/2440) concerned the role of labour in programmes for increasing productivity. It dealt with measures to enlist the co-operation and safeguard the interests of workers in programmes for raising productivity, namely: education and vocational training; measures to stabilize the labour force in particular undertakings; growth of a trade-union movement; explanations and joint consultation; equitable distribution of the benefits of higher productivity; security against unemployment; and working conditions.

During the discussion of the agenda item "Economic development of under-developed countries" at the Economic Committee's 138th to 140th meetings, on 21 and 31 July and 3 August, and at the Council's 725th to 731st and 749th plenary meetings, on 15 to 18 July and 4 August, the International Labour Office and FAO were complimented on the clarity of their working papers.

There was general agreement among Council members on the need for greater productivity to raise living standards, particularly in view of the conspicuous fact that food production was lagging behind population growth. Immense natural resources were not being fully utilized owing to shortage of money and technical skills. The importance of carrying out land reforms was also stressed.

The representative of FAO emphasized that the distinctive feature of any attempt to increase productivity in agriculture as opposed to industry was the need to ensure that renewable resources were improved and not decreased or wasted. He referred to the importance, over and above the six principal methods of raising productivity in agriculture set out in the FAO report, of incentives, of adequate and supervised agricultural credit systems and of adequate and stable prices for primary commodities.

The representative of Egypt suggested that, in view of the particular importance of the problem of developing arid land, the United Nations should set up a special body to co-ordinate the work. He also felt that attempts to improve productivity in agriculture on the lines suggested by FAO would prove ineffective unless accompanied by comprehensive land reform and the organization of co-operatives, agricultural credits and an international system for the commercial distribution of agricultural produce.

The French representative referred to, among other things, the intimate relationships between productivity and other problems, such as those of employment, restrictive business practices, international trade, integrated economies, non-self-liquidating investment, means of economizing in raw materials, and differences in the taxation and social legislation systems of various countries. These relationships made it doubtful that the Council should continue to deal with these matters independently of one another.

The representative of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) stated that production in under-developed countries depended on millions of illiterate workers and he referred to the contributions of UNESCO in the field of science and education towards economic development.

The representative of ICFTU expressed the concern of his organization to protect workers against any undue demand being made on them as the result of excessive speeding up of work and to secure for the workers their proper share of any increases in productivity.

At the 749th plenary meeting on 4 August, the President, on behalf of the Council, thanked the representatives of FAO and the International Labour Office for the working papers they had submitted.

4. Integrated Economic Development

The Council, at its fourteenth session, requested (416 F (XIV))²⁰ the Secretary-General to prepare a working paper regarding the concrete proposals referred to in General Assembly resolution

²⁰ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 391-92.

521(VI)²¹ and relating to a programme of rapid industrialization of under-developed countries.

Accordingly, the Council, at its fifteenth session, had before it a working paper submitted by the Secretary-General (E/2384) on certain aspects of this question. This paper contained a brief review of the various resolutions by the several United Nations organs and the programme of studies in progress or completed by the United Nations on subjects such as financing of economic development, national income, international price relations, availability of development goods, land reform, productivity and resource utilization—all of which were based on the recognition not only of the importance of the principle of "integrated economic development" but also of the fact that to the furtherance of such development the efforts of both developed and under-developed countries were essential. The remainder of the paper dealt with proposals on two specific topics which had not yet been considered by the Council: (1) the problem of initiating economic development in subsistence societies and the part that enterprise at the local level might play in this field; and (2) the development corporation as an instrument for furthering the process of integrated economic development.

During the Council's discussions of the subject at its 694th to 697th plenary meetings, from 21 to 23 April, it had before it a joint draft resolution (E/L.500) by Argentina, Cuba, Egypt, India, the Philippines, Uruguay and Yugoslavia. The operative part proposed that the Secretary-General:

(1) convene a group of experts to prepare a report for the Council's eighteenth session on the process and problems of industrialization of the under-developed countries, in order to provide a basis for a programme of rapid industrialization of the under-developed countries, including the economic, social, fiscal, technical and organizational problems involved, and the role that both the industrially advanced and the under-developed countries have to play in such a programme; and

(2) continue the studies of industrialization as part of the general problem of economic development and submit periodical reports to the Council on the progress of his work.

It was generally agreed that the measures to be adopted with regard to integrated economic development must necessarily vary according to conditions prevailing in each country, but opinion was divided as to the most effective way of dealing with the question through international channels. The representative of the USSR stressed that the development of the economies of under-developed countries in their own national interests was an essential consideration and that the achievement of economic independence by the underdeveloped countries would have a beneficial effect on the world as a whole.

Some representatives, among them those of Sweden and the United Kingdom, pointed out that industrialization was not the only method of advancing economic development. The representatives of Uruguay, Yugoslavia and Venezuela, among others, agreed with this view, but thought that efforts to increase agricultural production should proceed simultaneously with other development schemes and that a combination of methods was needed to advance development. Rapid industrialization, the Australian representative stated, was essentially an internal problem and should be attacked at the national and not at the international level. The representative of Argentina pointed out that it was not a matter of choosing between agriculture and industrial development, but rather of promoting balanced expansion in all sectors of the economy. He and the representative of Uruguay considered that rapid industrialization of under-developed countries was essential in order to establish equilibrium between the economies of those countries and those of the industrialized countries.

In the course of the discussion, statements were made by representatives of the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC), the International Co-operative Alliance (ICA) and the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU). The representative of ICC presented the views of his organization on General Assembly resolution 626 (VII) on "Right to exploit freely natural wealth and resources"; the representative of ICA spoke on the role the co-operative movement could play in assisting under-developed countries in their economic development programmes; and the representative of WFTU spoke of industrialization as a major factor in the economic development of under-developed countries and a means of achieving economic independence.

Several representatives doubted the advisability of establishing a group of experts to undertake a generalized international study of problems of industrialization. The representative of the United Kingdom thought it would have little practical value and that the general principles had been amply debated in the Council at various times. The experts, in his opinion, could hardly draw up a general programme for all countries. The real need, he held, was for technical assistance and an exchange of information on the experience gained by other countries in dealing with similar problems. The representatives of France and the

United States thought that general studies had a limited usefulness, that there was already voluminous documentation on the general aspects of the question and that it would be better to concentrate on well-defined and specific questions which would lead to practical conclusions that could be applied immediately. They proposed (E/L.502), therefore, that the Council, instead of setting up a group of experts, might invite some of its subsidiary bodies, the regional commissions, several functional commissions and appropriate specialized agencies to devote special attention in their work to the United Nations priority programmes concerning "increased production in fields other than food", as listed in section B, paragraph 10, of the annex to resolution 451(XIV).²²

The Australian representative, while agreeing that international studies on the subject should be pursued, expressed doubts as to the advisability of establishing the group of experts. He suggested that it might be more advantageous if the Secretary-General were to continue to expand his studies in the field, paying special attention to the problems which the joint draft resolution would have entrusted to an expert group. The Yugoslav representative suggested that a special study of the results of experience acquired in planned industrialization and in the modernization of agriculture might also be useful.

Taking into account the suggestions and comments made during the discussion, the sponsors of the joint draft resolution presented a revised text (E/L.503) at the Council's 697th plenary meeting on 23 April. The representatives of France and the United States considered that paragraphs 2 and 3 (see below) were still too general and maintained their amendment (E/L.502). It was rejected by 11 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

The revised text was adopted unanimously, as resolution 461(XV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Having examined the Secretary-General's report on the progress of the work undertaken in accordance with Council resolution 416 F (XIV),

"Reaffirming the principles set forth in General Assembly resolution 521(VI) and Council resolution 416 F (XIV) with regard to the need for the rapid industrialization of under-developed countries,

"1. Notes the Secretary-General's first report on the progress of the work undertaken in accordance with resolution 416 F (XIV);

"2. Requests the Secretary-General, in continuing his studies on the question of industrialization as part of the problem of integrated economic development of under-developed countries, to submit, after taking into account the discussions in the fifteenth session of the Council and not later than the eighteenth session of the Council, a study on the processes and problems of industrialization which may assist the under-developed countries in preparing practical programmes of rapid industrialization, the study to deal also with the economic, social, fiscal, technical and organizational problems involved and with the role which the industrially advanced countries can play in order to help further such programmes;

"3. Authorizes the Secretary-General if necessary to consult with experts for the purposes of the above study;

"4. Invites the Secretary-General to prepare for the seventeenth session of the Council:

"(a) A bibliography of the studies undertaken by the organs of the United Nations and the specialized agencies on the subject of industrialization of under-developed countries;

"(b) A similar bibliography of important books and documents otherwise published on the subject;

"5. Requests the Secretary-General, in the light of the above, to prepare and submit a list of subjects relating to the industrialization of under-developed countries which have not so far been dealt with by the United Nations or the specialized agencies, with a view to completing the programme of studies requested in General Assembly resolution 521(VI);

"6. Requests the Secretary-General also to submit further details of the functioning of development corporations in the countries where they exist."

5. Conservation and Utilization of Non-Agricultural Resources

The Council, during its fifteenth session, at its 689th and 690th plenary meetings, on 16 and 17 April, had before it the Secretary-General's third report (E/2367) submitted in accordance with Council resolution 345(XII).

Under this resolution, the Secretary-General furnishes each session of the Council with a statement on specific plans and action taken with respect to a programme designed to promote the systematic survey and inventory of non-agricultural natural resources and on the results of any explorations with respect to the desirability of holding international conferences on particular resources or resource problems. The Council had also requested the Secretary-General to report, not later than at its fifteenth session, on other activities specified in that resolution, namely, those related to requests from governments for technical assistance and to his consideration of any international action designed to promote an integrated approach in this field.

In his report, the Secretary-General informed the Council that the meeting of the Ad hoc Committee of Experts, established to study and prepare recommendations on standard concepts and terminology for use in connexion with surveys and inventories of iron ore resources, had been postponed to mid-1953 for lack of staff (see below). As a result and because budgetary arrangements provided for only one resource meeting a year, it had been necessary also to suspend investigations with respect to coal and lignite resources. Similar activities on water resources under Council resolution 417(XIV)²³ had also to be delayed. The report contained information on the technical assistance furnished to Member States by the United Nations during 1951 and 1952 in connexion with the development of resources, and on the technical conferences and meetings on various resources initiated by the regional economic commissions.

Thirty-three fellowships and scholarships, relevant to the development of non-agricultural resources, had been awarded to nationals of 26 countries. No requests for international conferences on any particular resources had been received from Member Governments. However, a meeting of experts, organized jointly by the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA) and the Technical Assistance Administration (TAA), had been held at Bogota, Colombia, from 13 October to 13 November 1952, to consider basic problems and processes of the iron and steel industry of Latin America.

The importance of international co-operation on questions of water resources was stressed by the majority of speakers, and it was agreed that work in this respect should be undertaken as soon as possible. The Council, at its 690th plenary meeting on 17 April, therefore, unanimously adopted a joint draft resolution (E/L.495/Rev.1) by Argentina, Australia and France.

By this resolution (463(XV)), the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report, and recommended the effective continuation of the action provided for by resolution 345(XII) and that the earliest possible action should be taken under resolution 417(XIV).

The Secretary-General, in accordance with resolution 345(XII), furnished the Council, at its sixteenth session, with a further statement (E/2442) of specific plans and action taken in compliance with the terms of the resolution. He noted that the Ad hoc Committee of Experts, which was established to study and prepare recommendations of standard concepts and terminology for use in connexion with the survey and inventory of iron ore resources, would hold a preliminary session in June 1953 at New York and a second and final session in March 1954 at Geneva. A regional conference on mineral resources development, sponsored by ECAFE with the participation of TAA, had been held in Tokyo from 20 to 30 April 1953. Preparatory work, he reported, had been started by the Bureau of Flood Control and Water Resources Development of ECAFE on the convening of a regional technical conference on water resources and development, which was scheduled for 1954. The Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) was working on the subject of coal classification, and studies were being made of solid fuel utilization and on the substitution possibilities between coal and other forms of energy. ECLA, at its fifth session in April 1953, had extended its activities in the field of non-agricultural resources. In particular, resolutions had been adopted and projects had been included in ECLA's work programme dealing with: iron ore utilization; the compilation of data on estimated reserves of ores of non-ferrous metals and problems in their mining and use; and the development and utilization of energy resources.

C. FULL EMPLOYMENT

The Economic and Social Council at its sixteenth session considered the question of full employment under the following headings: (1) reconversion after the rearmament period; (2) consideration of replies from governments to the annual questionnaire circulated by the Secretary-General concerning full employment objectives, policies and measures; (3) report of the International Monetary Fund concerning the adequacy of monetary reserves; and (4) report of the Secretary-General concerning full employment and inflation.

The question was considered by the Council at its 720th to 724th, 748th and 749th plenary meetings, on 10, 11 and 13 July and 4 August, and at the 133rd to 137th meetings of the Economic Committee, on 14, 16 and 20 July. The Council's discussions opened with a general debate on all four subjects at the 720th to 724th plenary meetings. Its consideration of these subjects is dealt with below, the first two being grouped together.

²³ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 383-84.

1. Reconversion After the Rearmament Period and Replies from Governments to the Questionnaire on Full Employment

a. MEMORANDUM BY ICFTU

Regarding the subject of reconversion, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) had presented to the Council at its fifteenth session a memorandum entitled "Reconversion after the Rearmament Period" (E/2421). In this memorandum, ICFTU argued that any discontinuation of rearmament was bound to have a serious impact on economic and social conditions, and expressed the view that the Council should give a lead to the study of this problem. The Council at the 703rd plenary meeting of its fifteenth session, on 28 April, decided to include the item "Reconversion after the Rearmament Period", proposed by ICFTU, in the provisional agenda for the sixteenth session.

Subsequently, ICFTU submitted a further memorandum on this subject (E/2474), containing recommendations designed to ensure that full advantage was taken by Member Governments of the end or falling-off of rearmament so as to switch resources to production contributing directly to human welfare and to forestall any possible adverse effects of a cessation of arms production on employment and living standards.

The recommendations which ICFTU proposed should be made by the Council to Member Governments included: research into the probable effects of the falling-off of arms production; plans for measures to stimulate private consumption, in particular through a policy of high wages, improved social security schemes and benefits, as well as reductions of taxes on lower incomes; plans for an increased level of public investment, especially in social housing; and increased public and private investment by industrial countries in economically under-developed areas.

Other recommendations were that the Council, in conjunction with the regional economic commissions, should work out plans for an international housing fund; that it should try to speed up the establishment of the proposed international institutions for increased investments in economically under-developed countries and should appeal to Member Governments to contribute to international funds for the development of such countries; and that it should convene further international commodity conferences.

b. REPLIES OF GOVERNMENTS TO QUESTIONNAIRE ON FULL EMPLOYMENT

The Council also had before it the replies of governments²⁴ to the questionnaire on full employment, the balance of payments and economic trends, objectives and policies in 1952 and 1953, which had been prepared and circulated to governments by the Secretary-General in accordance with General Assembly resolution 520 B (VI) and with Council resolutions 221 E (IX), 290 (XI) and 371 B (XIII). Further, it had before it an analysis (E/2445 & Addenda) by the Secretariat of the replies to the questionnaire. Owing to the fact that, at the time of the preparation of the analysis, the replies of governments of under-developed countries had not been received in sufficient number or detail from all regions, it did not prove possible to examine the problems of economic development in under-developed countries, as provided in Council resolution 371 B (XIII). The Secretary-General advised the Council (E/2445) that he had under consideration measures to secure a more adequate response to the questions relating to under-developed countries in the future.

The Secretariat's analysis of the replies to the questionnaire consisted of three parts. The first part (E/2445) reviewed domestic full employment policies; the second (E/2445/Add.1) dealt with balance of payments and related policies; and the third (E/2445/Add.2) provided a tabular comparison of certain economic indicators in the more developed and the less developed countries.

The first part indicated that most governments had had little to add to previous replies concerning their full employment standards, and that the general picture of economic activity in 1952 emerging from the replies did not differ radically from that given in the World Economic Report 1951-52.²⁵ The analysis therefore concentrated on forecasts of the level of economic activity in 1953.

²⁴ By 11 September 1953, complete or partial replies (E/2408 & Add.1-12) had been received from: Australia, Austria, Belgium (including statement for Non-Self-Governing Territories), Cambodia, Canada, Ceylon, Chile, China (Taiwan), Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Finland, France, Honduras, Iceland, India, Israel, Italy (including statement for Trust Territory), Japan, Laos, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand (including statement for Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories), Norway, Pakistan, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Sweden, Switzerland, Thailand, Turkey, the Union of South Africa, the USSR, the United Kingdom (including statement for Dependent Territories), the United States (including statement for Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories) and Vietnam.

²⁵ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 348-49.

The replies of six major industrialized countries—Canada, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States—which had arrived in time for analysis, anticipated an average increase in the national product of over 3 per cent from 1952 to 1953, compared with an actual rise of about 2 per cent from 1951 to 1952. It appeared that average unemployment would be no higher in 1953 than in 1952 in Canada, Norway, and the United States, but that some rise in unemployment was likely in Sweden.

The second part showed that relatively little information was supplied by governments concerning prospects of balance-of-payments trends and policies for 1953.

The United States reply stated that "with favourable climatic conditions abroad and continued favourable business conditions in the United States, foreign countries should be able to raise their gold and dollar assets again in 1953, although probably at a slower rate".

However, structural disequilibrium in international trade and payments persisted, and the problem of rebuilding foreign exchange reserves appeared, in most countries, to be far from solved. A number of countries had introduced fiscal and monetary measures in their programmes for restoring a balance in their external accounts. There was also a widespread desire for a general relaxation of exchange and trade restrictions. Structural changes in production were likely to be required in industrial as well as primary producing countries for the re-establishment of international equilibrium.

The third part listed the following twelve economic series which it stated might reasonably serve as partial indicators of economic development: all agricultural commodities, food, mining, manufacturing, cotton goods, crude steel, cement, building bricks, fertilizers, employment in manufacturing, quantum of exports and ton-kilometres of railway traffic. The more developed countries listed were: Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium and Luxembourg, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany (Fed. Rep. of), Ireland, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the Union of South Africa, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States. The less developed countries listed were: Algeria, Brazil, Ceylon, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Egypt, Greece, India, Israel, Malaya, Mexico, Morocco (French), Pakistan, Peru, the Philippines, Thailand, Tunisia, Turkey and Yugoslavia.

c. VIEWS EXPRESSED IN THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

In the course of the general debate, several representatives, including those of Australia, China, Cuba, Egypt, France and the Philippines, paid tribute to the initiative of ICFTU in bringing the subject of reconversion before the Council. It was observed that the analysis prepared by the Secretariat indicated that most of the leading industrialized countries anticipated higher output in 1953 than in 1952. Nevertheless, an easing of international tensions was likely to be accompanied by some relaxation in the pressure of arms production, and it was necessary for countries to be prepared well in advance to take such measures as might be required to maintain total effective demand in the event of any slackening in economic activity in the armament and related industries.

The representative of Belgium declared that the stabilization of armaments expenditure harboured the seeds of deflation, because all economic activities connected with the expansion of arms production would then lose their point. Stability, he held, was synonymous with depression in a world in which 25 per cent of all economic activity was based on the production of capital goods. That had been clear in 1952 when the prices of raw materials had declined at the mere prospect of such stability.

Certain representatives, in particular those of Belgium, the United Kingdom and the United States, pointed to the need for expanding civilian expenditures to replace any decline in military expenditures. It must not be said, the representative of Belgium emphasized, that armaments were synonymous with economic prosperity and peace with economic depression. The United Kingdom representative agreed with ICFTU that any problem created by falling demand in the defence sector would not be solved almost automatically by the freeing of a great, pent-up civilian demand for both consumer goods and investment, as had been the case in the period immediately following the end of the Second World War. At the same time, he maintained, the problem should not be exaggerated and the extent of reconversion required would be far less than in 1945. He and the representative of the United States pointed out that any reduction in defence spending would provide opportunities for more rapid increases in investment in civilian industry and in standards of living and would free important resources of labour, materials and machinery for civilian needs.

Certain representatives, including those of Argentina, Australia, Belgium and Sweden, stressed the impact on the world economy of developments in the leading industrial countries, notably the United States. It was observed that even a comparatively small change in the economic climate of the United States might have repercussions on the world market many times larger than those felt in the United States itself, particularly since the foreign trade of the United States comprised a far smaller proportion of its general economic activity than was the case in many other countries.

The representative of the United States recognized the concern of other countries regarding future prospects in his country. The United States Government had pledged itself to do everything necessary to maintain a high level of productive employment with rising standards of living in the United States, as a direct contribution to the improvement of living standards throughout the world. There were powerful and sustaining forces for economic expansion in the United States, including, for example, the growth in population. In the task of reconversion, the co-operative efforts of all citizens would be reinforced by the determination of the Government to maintain full employment. At the same time, the United States representative pointed out, the maintenance of an expanding world economy was a collective responsibility which must be shared by all countries.

Several representatives, including those of Argentina, Cuba, Egypt, France, the Philippines, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, emphasized the inter-relationship between problems of full employment and of economic development. The representative of France, for example, declared that the industrialized countries could not enjoy lasting prosperity or solve the problem of full employment until the economic development of the backward countries had been assured. Conversely, he said, without full employment in the industrialized countries there was no solution for the problem of economic development in the under-developed countries.

The representative of Yugoslavia considered that an essential element in any international policy for full employment would be an expansion of financial aid to the under-developed countries, since this would not only contribute to the task of economic development but would also stimulate economic activity.

Under-developed countries, it was stated, were particularly vulnerable to fluctuations in economic activity in the industrially advanced countries. In this connexion, several representatives, including those of Argentina, Cuba, Egypt and the Philippines, stressed the need for stabilizing the demand for and prices of primary products. It was also observed that an equitable relationship should be maintained between the prices of raw materials in relation to those of manufactured goods, and that the prices negotiated in international commodity agreements should be such as to assure a fair wage to the workers engaged in producing the commodities concerned.

Certain representatives, in particular those of Belgium and India, expressed concern at the obstacles and restrictions currently affecting international trade and the difficulties in maintaining full employment experienced by any country whose exports were subject to restrictions of various kinds in external markets. The representative of Belgium contended that many countries called upon their neighbours to pursue a policy of full employment, but refused to accept either labour or goods from those same countries; the only possible basis for a policy of full employment was a wide international exchange of goods, manpower and capital. Normal trading, the representative of India stated, was still far off and, though some relaxation had taken place in exchange control and quota restrictions in Europe, difficulties attributable to those restrictions still persisted.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR contended that policies of trade discrimination against Eastern European countries and the People's Republic of China had been designed to hamper their economic development and were disrupting world trade, impeding full employment and causing strained international relations. There were signs, however, these representatives believed, that attempts at discrimination were failing and that the consolidation of trade links between East and West was progressing. In their view, recent increases in unemployment in a number of Western European countries could be attributed to the armaments race. While a growth in armaments expenditure might absorb additional labour in the armament industries, its deeper effect was to distort the economies of the countries affected and to reduce consumption and hence employment in the civilian sectors of their economies. The reduction of armaments expenditure, these representatives argued, could set free financial and material resources which could be used in order to finance productive investments, public works, housing, social security and an increase in the production of consumer goods. Such a reduction of armaments expenditure would also reduce inflationary pressure and make it possible to decrease taxation and increase the purchasing power of the people. It could also lead to a general increase of international trade, greater stability of raw material prices, and a better supply of capital goods to the under-developed countries, which, in turn, would lead to an increase of employment in industrialized countries.

The representative of the United Kingdom, on the other hand, could not agree to the contention that the rise in unemployment had been due to the rearmament programmes of the countries concerned, since defence demands in recent years had, in his opinion, added to the total pressure of demand on the manpower and other resources of those countries.

The representative of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) said that the Governing Body of ILO had recently expressed the view that governments and employers should try to improve methods of forecasting changes in economic activity and employment in order to be better prepared to anticipate new situations. It would be most important to make a smooth conversion from a high level of armaments expenditure to more normal conditions without causing unemployment or inflation. However, some forms of unemployment were not due to a low level of effective demand and could not therefore be remedied by increased spending. ILO had outlined a comprehensive programme to deal with frictional unemployment, and its Asian Advisory Committee had made suggestions for dealing with problems of unemployment in under-developed countries. Studies had also been made of questions of productivity.

The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) considered that rearmament and the systematic restriction of trade between two parts of the world were reducing employment opportunities in both developed and under-developed countries. WFTU had submitted constructive proposals for full employment to the twelfth session of the Council. The Council should take steps to promote the industrialization of under-developed countries, to raise living standards and purchasing power, to re-establish normal trading relations between all countries and to mitigate the effects of rearmament.

The representative of ICFTU expressed the view that it was the Council's duty to persuade Member Governments to draw up reconversion programmes as soon as possible. Immediate research into the probable consequences of a reduction in armaments production was required, together with a programme of action to deal with such consequences. ICFTU had recommended certain measures to this effect (E/2474, see above).

The representative of the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU) recalled that this Federation had submitted a note to the Council (E/C.2/361) containing its views on the possible extension of technical assistance and the stimulation of social progress through the reduction of expenditure on armaments. The Council should express its desire that the Disarmament Commission reach a positive solution of the problems it was examining and should recommend a study to determine the amount and application of funds that could be released through a reduction in armament expenditure, with special reference to problems of productivity, trade and housing conditions.

d. DRAFT RESOLUTIONS BEFORE THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

Three draft resolutions were placed before the Council: (1) by the USSR (E/L.531); (2) jointly by Belgium, India and Sweden (E/L.533); and (3) jointly by France and the United Kingdom (E/L.535). The last two draft resolutions were subsequently replaced by a new draft submitted jointly by the sponsors of the two former ones, namely, Belgium, France, India, Sweden and the United Kingdom (E/AC.6/L.63).

The USSR draft resolution (E/L.531) would call upon all the Member States of the United Nations, with a view to increasing employment and raising the standard of living of the people, to take the necessary steps to remove obstacles to the development of normal trade between States in conformity with the principle of abolishing the numerous discriminatory practices currently prevailing in international trade, which were doing great harm to the economy of many States and were gravely complicating international relations.

In support of his draft resolution, the USSR representative stressed the need for taking effective measures to reduce unemployment and increase the standard of living by removing obstacles to the development of international trade which were doing harm to the economy of many States. The joint draft resolution submitted by Belgium, France, India, Sweden and the United Kingdom, on the other hand, he argued, had no such practical objectives in view, but merely recommended governments to reduce obstacles to the development of normal and mutually beneficial trade. As most governments had already taken steps to that end, the joint draft resolution, which made no reference to the discriminatory practices which the Soviet Union had in mind, did no more than reflect the existing state of affairs, which it must therefore tend to perpetuate.

The USSR draft was supported by the representative of Poland, who also stated that the discriminatory measures aimed at the Soviet Union and the peoples' democracies had failed and had only created difficulties for countries which had taken part in that useless economic blockade.

The representatives of Egypt and Sweden, in particular, while expressing agreement with some parts of the USSR draft, stated that they could not accept all its implications. The representative of Sweden as well as the representative of Turkey expressed the view that the removal of trade barriers was only one of a number of ways of assisting in the maintenance of full employment and, in any case, not the most important. The representative of Turkey also emphasized that the Soviet draft implied that rearmament was resorted to in order to achieve full employment, whereas, in point of fact, rearmament had always been resorted to by governments under force of circumstance and against their will.

The trade discrimination referred to in the Soviet draft, explained the representative of India, was a consequence of political tension. Both he and the representatives of France and the United States expressed the view that, as long as the international tension lasted, States would refuse, on obvious security grounds, to export strategic materials. The solution of the political tension, said the representative of India, was of a political nature and could not be found by the Economic and Social Council. In the opinion of the representative of France, there was a close connexion between the easing of international political tension and the development of international trade relations, it being evident that the maximum development of trade could come about only when the political atmosphere was free of all tension. In the view of the representative of the United States, the removal of security controls on trade was deliberately confused in the Soviet draft with miscellaneous barriers to peaceful trade.

The Council's Economic Committee, at its 135th meeting on 16 July, rejected the various parts of the Soviet draft in votes ranging from 11 to 3, with 4 abstentions, to 6 to 3, with 9 abstentions.

The joint draft resolution of Belgium, India and Sweden (E/L.533) would have made provision for a committee of experts to study the measures needed to counteract any decline in economic activity to which a decrease in rearmament might give rise, to raise employment rates where they were low, and, generally, to attain and maintain high levels of employment within the framework of external and internal economic equilibrium and of liberalization of trade, and to report to the Council at its eighteenth session.

The joint French-United Kingdom draft resolution (E/L.535), on the other hand, made no provision for a committee of experts, but would have requested the Secretary-General to invite each Member Government to submit statements to the Council: (1) on the measures considered necessary to prevent adverse effects on its own economy or on those of other Members arising from foreseeable reduction in defence expenditures; and (2) on their experience in dealing with inflationary pressures associated with high levels of economic activity.

In the joint five-Power draft resolution (E/AC.6/L.63), replacing these two drafts, section B dealt with reconversion after the rearmament period and section D with full employment measures. (For the other questions dealt with, see below.) According to section B, the Council would, inter alia, request the Secretary-General "to invite each Member Government to indicate, before 1 December 1953, its views on the measures it may consider necessary to prevent adverse effects on its economy or on those of other Members arising from foreseeable reductions in its defence expenditures".

Under section D it would call upon "all governments, with a view to increasing trade, employment and standards of living, to take all practicable steps to reduce obstacles to the development of normal and mutually beneficial trade between countries availing themselves, inter alia, of any opportunities which may arise as a consequence of an easing of international tensions".

The following amendments and sub-amendments were submitted to these sections: a joint amendment by Argentina, Cuba, Uruguay, Yugoslavia and Venezuela (E/AC.6/L.64) and a Swedish sub-amendment (E/AC.6/L.70) to it; a joint amendment by Turkey and the United States (E/AC.6/L.66); an amendment by Egypt (E/AC.6/L.68); and an amendment by the USSR (E/AC.6/L.69) with a Swedish sub-amendment (E/AC.6/L.74) to substitute a new text.

The purpose of the joint five-Power amendment (E/AC.6/L.64), explained the representative of Argentina, was to insert in the preamble to section B of the joint draft resolution a reference to the importance of accelerated economic development in the countries being developed.

The Swedish sub-amendment (E/AC.6/L.70) to the joint five-Power amendment would have the Council recognize that any tendency toward a slackening or a fall in the total effective demand on some sectors of the economy resulting from any significant reduction in the level of expenditure on defence could be counteracted, among other ways, by a more rapid economic development of the less economically-developed countries.

The purpose of the joint Turkish-United States amendment (E/AC.6/L.66), according to its sponsors, would be: as regards section B, to add a statement in the preamble making it clear that the Council considered any significant reduction in arms expenditure to be desirable; and, as regards section D, to introduce a reference in the operative paragraph to some of the other major improvements in world conditions that would enable trade barriers to be reduced. The only specific opportunities of reducing trade barriers referred to in section D of the five-Power draft resolution, it was stated, were those due to an easing of international tensions. As regards section D, the Turkish-United States amendment referred, in addition, to improved balance-of-payments or monetary reserve positions and the maturing of newly-developed industries.

The Egyptian amendment (E/AC.6/L.68) proposed to specify in the preamble to section B that a reduction in expenditure on defence could cause a fall in the level of employment only "in industrial countries" and to add the word "world" before the word "economy" in order to make clear, said the Egyptian representative, that reconversion might cause a slackening in effective demand not only nationally but also internationally.

The amendment further proposed to alter section D of the draft resolution to have the Council state that the removal of obstacles to the "smooth development of international trade" (rather than the "development of normal and mutually beneficial trade between countries") would help to stimulate business activity and employment.

The USSR representative declared that the text of section B of the five-Power draft, as it stood, gave the impression that the Council was concerned at the prospect of a reduction in the level of expenditure on defence, although such a reduction was not in itself a cause for concern. His amendment (E/AC.6/L.69) to this section, he explained, accordingly referred to the need for an expansion in civilian production, a rise in the standard of living, and normal trade relations between States without discrimination. If it were adopted, he declared, the Council would be referring to the positive steps required rather than expressing a misplaced concern at a possible reduction in the level of defence expenditure.

The Swedish sub-amendment (E/AC.6/L.74) to this USSR amendment proposed to replace the reference to the need for an expansion in civilian production, a rise in the standard of living and normal trade relations between States without discrimination, as proposed by the USSR, by a statement recognizing that any tendency toward a slackening or a fall in the total effective demand on some sectors of the economy resulting from any significant reduction in the level of expenditure on defence could be counteracted by "measures designed to increase, generally, the demand for an internal and international trade in products coming from the civilian sector of the economy". This phrase would be in addition to the phrase "by a more rapid economic development of the less economically developed countries", as proposed in the Swedish sub-amendment (E/AC.6/L.70) to the joint five-Power amendment (see above).

The USSR amendment relating to section D (E/AC.6/L.69) would substitute a revised text by which the Council would call upon all governments to take "all practical steps to reduce obstacles" instead of "all steps to remove obstacles", with a view to increasing trade, employment and standards of living.

The sponsors of the joint draft resolution on 17 July submitted a revised text (E/AC.6/L.71) incorporating all the amendments they had accepted. The revised text included all or parts of the Turkish-United States amendment (E/AC.6/L.66), the Egyptian amendment (E/AC.6/L.68) and the Swedish sub-amendment (E/AC.6/L.70) to the joint five-Power amendment. The sponsors of the five-Power amendment agreed to accept the revised text of the joint draft resolution.

The Economic Committee voted on the revised joint draft resolution at its 137th meeting on 20 July. The Swedish sub-amendment (E/AC.6/L.74) to the USSR amendment, with certain textual modifications accepted by the representative of Sweden, was adopted by 16 votes to 2.

The USSR amendment (E/AC.6/L.69) to section B was rejected by 12 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions.

Section B of the revised joint draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (for text, see below).

The USSR amendment to section D of the joint draft resolution was rejected by 12 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions. Section D of the joint draft resolution was adopted by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions (for text, see below).

2. The Adequacy of Monetary Reserves

a. REPORT OF THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

In resolution 427(XIV),²⁶ the Council requested the International Monetary Fund to furnish an analysis of the question of the adequacy of monetary reserves to the Council in 1953. The Fund accordingly submitted a report (E/2454), which formed the basis of the Council's consideration of this question.

The report of the Fund stressed three basic considerations. In the first place, monetary reserves were meant to take care of swings in balances of payments and not to finance a permanent disequilibrium. Secondly, there was a high degree of inter-action between the effect of domestic fiscal and monetary policies on the amount of the monetary reserves of any country, and the effect of the amount of such reserves on the domestic fiscal and monetary policies of that country. Finally, a world-wide distribution of monetary reserves in accordance with the apparent need for them was incompatible with the yet more fundamental considerations of the distribution of the real resources of each country in accordance with the highest priority for their use. It was a corollary of the first consideration that the subject of reserve adequacy could be discussed meaningfully only on the assumption that countries adopted policies adequate to balance their accounts over a normal economic cycle. On this assumption, four standards of reserve adequacy could be distinguished; while almost all countries could qualify for the lowest standard of reserve adequacy specified, few could qualify for the highest standard.

The report pointed out that the resources of the Fund were available for temporary assistance to Member countries which had achieved a fundamental payments balance. In the event of a depression, the maintenance of demand would depend primarily on positive action at the national level, especially in industrial countries, rather than on defensive action such as the supplying of supplementary reserves to countries in difficulty. Nevertheless, the Fund, recognizing the importance of defensive measures, considered that supplementary reserves should be supplied early, on liberal terms, and in adequate amounts. In the event of a severe depression, the Fund would consult with its Members on the desirability of additions to its resources and would consider possible changes in its modes of operations to meet the emergent situation.

In presenting the report to the Council, the representative of the Fund, at the 720th plenary meeting of the Council on 10 July, stated that, although the conditions under which some of the suggestions made in Council resolution 427(XIV) would be applicable had not yet come about, the Fund had applied its rules flexibly and would continue to do so. It was the core of the Fund's business to keep under review the question of Members' monetary reserves and their relationship to the levels of trade and payments and the restrictions which governments felt it necessary to impose in these fields. The report explained that no absolute determination of the adequacy of monetary reserves could be given for any specific country or area, and that reserves were merely one term in the equation which governments were continually trying to solve.

b. VIEWS EXPRESSED IN THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

Several representatives, including those of Cuba, France, India, the United Kingdom and the United States, congratulated the Fund upon the analysis made in its report. The representative of the United Kingdom, in particular, expressed satisfaction that the Fund was disposed to make its resources more readily available to Members. The representatives of France and the United Kingdom, among others, welcomed the Fund's undertaking to keep under review the question of monetary reserves and their relationship to restrictions and trade.

The representatives of China and France noted that existing monetary reserves, even when supplemented by the resources of the Fund, would not be adequate to combat the spread of a severe depression.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that it was his Government's view that current reserves were inadequate to finance a free flow of multilateral trade.

The representative of France observed that during the last two years the countries of Western Europe had so increased their trade that their reserves were now inadequate to finance their international trade. The currency restrictions which those countries were obliged to maintain owing to the burdens on their economy, and the social policy they were obliged to apply in order to maintain as high a level of employment as possible, could certainly be relaxed to some extent if reserves were more adequate for the present volume of Western European trade. He considered that the Bretton Woods Agreement implied that drawing rights, to fulfil the requirements of reserves, should be automatic.

The representative of India suggested that the Fund devote more attention to the particular problems of under-developed countries and the representative of Yugoslavia considered that the resources of the Fund should be increased, and that loans should be granted by the Fund to under-developed countries for the stabilization of their currencies and prices and to ensure full employment.

The representative of France expressed certain doubts as to the reliability of 1938 as the base year in determining whether existing monetary reserves were adequate, and pointed out that in that year exchange reserves were very low.

At the 134th meeting of the Economic Committee on 14 July, the representative of the Fund, expressing his thanks to the Council, said that the Fund had constantly in mind the special problems of the lesser-developed countries, but that the requirement that its resources should be employed in a revolving manner for the benefit of all Members precluded the permanent commitment of those resources for the purpose of economic development in any Member country. That was the responsibility of other international agencies, national governments, private firms and individuals. In the case of under-developed countries, moreover, the Fund, in assessing a country's ability to repurchase its currency, took full account of the normal long-term capital inflow into that country, and in that way endeavoured to support its Members' economic development to the fullest extent compatible with the nature of the Fund's functions and the character of its resources as a common reserve. He agreed that reserves should be adequate, not merely during the continuance of American aid, but in a world of balanced trade, and it was for that reason that, in the Fund's report, reserves had been related to total imports, including those financed by American and other aid. The Fund, he said, would keep the adequacy of monetary reserves under review and, at an appropriate time in 1954, inform the Council on this matter.

c. DRAFT RESOLUTION BEFORE THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

Section C of the joint five-Power draft resolution (E/AC.6/L.63)²⁷ was concerned with the question of the adequacy of monetary reserves. The sponsors of the joint draft resolution incorporated in their revised draft (E/AC.6/L.71) an Egyptian amendment (E/AC.6/L.68) to include "consumption" among the constituents of economic stability influenced by the level of monetary reserves.

Section C of the revised five-Power draft was adopted unanimously by the Economic Committee at its 137th meeting on 20 July.²⁸

3. Full Employment and Inflation

a. REPORTS BY THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

In resolution 426 B (XIV)²⁹ of 9 July 1952, the Council had requested the Secretary-General, after consultation with the appropriate specialized agencies, to prepare, in the light of recent experience in various parts of the world and of pertinent United Nations and other reports and studies already available, a report on national and international measures designed to reconcile the attainment and maintenance of full employment with the avoidance of the harmful effects of inflation, for presentation to the Council in 1953.

In a note presented to the fifteenth session of the Council (E/2404), the Secretary-General stated that preliminary research pertinent to the report requested in resolution 426 B (XIV) had raised certain problems.

In the first place, it was difficult, in analysing past experience, to isolate the influence of a high level of employment from other factors. For example, the periods of inflation accompanied by full utilization of resources during and after the war were characterized by the fact that a much higher proportion of the national product than normal was absorbed in purposes other than the provision of consumer goods. Thus, potent factors not directly related to a high level of employment were involved.

Secondly, an analysis of the sort of chronic inflation which might develop under conditions of full employment appeared to lead to the conclusion that the counter-measures involved decisions in which the political aspect was of paramount importance. Whether, for example, a country would wish to enforce wage controls or price controls or both depended upon the particular institutions and circumstances in that country, and in any case involved political rather than economic judgments.

²⁷ See pp. 328ff.

²⁸ See p. 336.

²⁹ See Y.U.N., 1952, p. 403.

Finally, the problem of preventing inflation in the course of rapid economic development in the under-developed countries was inextricably linked with other aspects of economic development and should, therefore, be made the subject of separate study.

The Council, at its fifteenth session, discussed this note in connexion with the consideration of its provisional agenda for the sixteenth session. The consensus was that, in the first place, the Secretariat should supply a classification of the types of inflation associated with high levels of economic activity and a list of relevant recent studies, especially by international organizations. It was suggested, secondly, that the members of the Council which had had experience in dealing with inflationary pressures associated with high levels of economic activity might arrange to give the Council the benefit of their experience.

With respect to the first of these suggestions, the Secretary-General presented a report to the Council's sixteenth session (E/2449), giving a classification of the types of inflation that might be associated with a high level of economic activity and, in an appendix, a list of recent studies on the subject (with summaries) by international organizations and some private authors. The types of inflation classified were:

(1) inflation arising as a result of investment, government expenditure, or exports being "too high" in relation to available resources, in the sense that these expenditures generate a demand for consumption goods which cannot be satisfied at the normal price-wage relationship; (2) sectional inflation arising even where there is no over-all shortage of consumption goods in relation to demand, when shortages appear in some important sectors; (3) inflation arising in the course of rapid development of under-developed countries; and (4) inflation caused by a rise in wages exceeding that in productivity.

The second of the above suggestions was brought to the attention of members of the Council in a memorandum from the Secretariat dated 26 May 1953. By 23 July 1953, replies had been received from Australia and India which were circulated (E/2488 & Corr.1).

b. VIEWS EXPRESSED IN THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

In the course of the Council's discussion at its sixteenth session, most representatives were agreed on the importance of general policies which would, on the one hand, promote full employment and the economic development of under-developed countries and, on the other, avoid the harmful effects of inflation. It was pointed out by, among others, the representatives of Belgium and China.

that, apart from their undesirable internal effects, inflationary pressures caused strains in balances of payments and gave rise to the imposition of abnormal exchange and trade restrictions. The representative of Sweden declared that inflationary trends hampered the movement of international capital required for the development of under-developed countries. The United States representative expressed the view that inflation was not inevitable during a period of full employment.

Some representatives, in particular those of France and the United Kingdom, considered that economic rigidities were of crucial importance in relation to the problem of inflation. The representative of France observed that, where there was more or less full employment, there was little elasticity of supply and general equilibrium was at the mercy of slight variations in demand. At the same time, he said, some of the factors governing over-all demand could neither be foreseen nor influenced. Consumer expenditure and the demand for private capital equipment were unresponsive to immediate action by the public authorities. Moreover, there was often a discrepancy between supply and demand in respect of the same category of products. Inflation, he said, might easily spring up in agriculture, where production could not be increased overnight.

The representative of the United Kingdom suggested that any measures which could be taken in a free society, either to encourage the movement of labour and other resources into sectors of expanding demand, or to prevent a sudden excessive demand in particular sectors from forcing up the general price-level unduly, would make it possible to maintain a higher level of total demand and employment over the whole economy without price inflation. Another important lesson of the post-war years, he stated, had been that, to maintain full employment without inflation in such a society, wage-earners, farmers and others must play their part by refraining from taking advantage of high levels of demand for their services to try to increase their real incomes faster than the rise in the income of the community as a whole would allow.

The question of wage policy in conditions of full employment was, in the view of the representative of the United States, in many respects the key aspect of the problem of inflation. He suggested that ILO, which had recently had that matter under discussion, should be requested to continue its work thereon and keep the Council advised of its findings.

The representative of ILO stated that his organization was ready and eager to co-operate with the Council in research and operational activities for full employment without inflation.

The representative of Cuba agreed with the Secretary-General's view that it would be contrary to the United Nations Charter to eliminate inflation by increasing the amount of unemployment in the world. He was also opposed to the alternative solutions: wage control, which would link wage increases to increases in productivity; or price controls, accompanied by freely fluctuating wages. Parts of the reserve labour force in under-developed countries, he emphasized, could be used for investment projects without reducing the output of consumer goods, thereby raising total output and real wages without causing inflation.

The representative of Poland opposed the view that full employment might give rise to inflationary tendencies and considered that the attempt to link difficulties in balances of payments with full employment constituted a new sort of escapism in economic theory. The view that wages were increasing faster than productivity could be disproved by the statistical fact that although productivity had risen during post-war years, real wages in the capitalist countries had actually in most cases declined. The real reason for the current inflation in the capitalist countries was the militarization of their economies and the financing of armaments production by additional currency issues, he said. Difficulties in balances of payments were due to the diminishing capitalist market, high tariff barriers in the United States, the obstacles to East-West trade and the resistance of under-developed countries to "colonial" economic relationships.

c. DRAFT RESOLUTION AND AMENDMENTS BEFORE THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

Section A of the joint five-Power draft resolution (E/AC.6/L.63)³⁰ dealt with the question of full employment and inflation. It would request the Secretary-General to invite Members that have had experience in dealing with inflationary pressures associated with high levels of economic activity or with the process of economic development in under-developed countries to submit written statements on this subject by 1 December 1953. The Secretary-General would be asked to prepare an analysis of these statements, and the Council, at its seventeenth session, would consider the advisability of requesting the Secretary-General to appoint a committee of experts for further study of this problem.

Amendments were submitted to this section: jointly by Argentina, Cuba, Uruguay, Yugoslavia and Venezuela (E/AC.6/L.64); by Venezuela (E/AC.6/L.65); by Egypt (E/AC.6/L.68); by the USSR (E/AC.6/L.69). Sub-amendments were also submitted to the joint five-Power amendment by Egypt (E/AC.6/L.67) and by Sweden (E/AC.6/L.70).

The purpose of the joint five-Power amendment (E/AC.6/L.64), explained the representative of Argentina, was to insert in the preamble of the joint draft resolution a reference to the importance of accelerated economic development in the countries being developed.

The Egyptian sub-amendment (E/AC.6/L.67) to this joint amendment would add to this paragraph a reference to lasting economic stability.

The Swedish sub-amendment (E/AC.6/L.70) to the joint amendment would have this paragraph refer in particular to inflation in the industrialized countries, and the urgent problem of reconciling the need for an accelerated economic development of the less economically developed countries with the avoidance of inflation.

The Venezuelan amendment (E/AC.6/L.65) proposed to add a paragraph inviting ILO to continue its review of the wage policies appropriate to different levels of employment, including the question of wage policy in relation to the problem of inflation, and to inform the Council from time to time of the results of its work.

The purpose of the Egyptian amendment (E/AC.6/L.68), the representative of Egypt said, was to mention the two separate problems before the Council, namely, inflation brought about by a policy of full employment, and inflation resulting from a policy of economic development.

The USSR amendment (E/AC.6/L.69) would reword the preamble as follows:

"Considering that, although the problem of how to attain and maintain full employment without inflation needs further consideration, it is nevertheless necessary to take steps to provide fuller employment."

The USSR representative explained that his amendment was intended to make it clear that, although the problem might well require further consideration, it was also still necessary to take positive measures to raise employment levels. The Council, he argued, would become a mere debating society if it contented itself with remarking that every problem required further consideration, and made no reference to practical steps.

The sponsors of the joint five-Power draft resolution on 17 July submitted a revised text ³⁰ See pp. 328ff.

{E/AC.6/L.71) incorporating all the amendments they had accepted. Section A of the revised text included the amendments proposed by Venezuela (E/AC.6/L.65) and Egypt (E/AC.6/L.68), and the sub-amendment by Sweden (E/AC.6/L.70) to the joint five-Power amendment. The sponsors of the joint five-Power amendment accepted the revised joint draft resolution and the USSR representative withdrew his amendment to section A.

A consolidated joint amendment proposed by Argentina, Belgium, France, the Philippines, India, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela (E/AC.6/L.72 & Corr.1) was submitted to the revised joint five-Power draft. It was decided without objection at the 136th meeting of the Economic Committee on 20 July that this consolidated joint amendment would be substituted for the second paragraph of the preamble to section A of the revised joint draft resolution (for text, see resolution as adopted, below).

The revised five-Power joint draft resolution (E/AC.6/L.71) was voted upon by the Economic Committee at its 137th meeting on 20 July. The preamble, the consolidated joint amendment (E/AC.6/L.72 & Corr.1) to section A, and section A, as amended, were all adopted unanimously.

Sections B, C and D were adopted as indicated above, and the revised joint draft resolution, as a whole, and as amended, was adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

4. Resolution Adopted by the Economic and Social Council

The report of the Economic Committee (E/2491) was considered by the Council at its 748th and 749th plenary meetings on 4 August. The Council also had before it a USSR draft resolution (E/L531), previously introduced at the 720th plenary meeting on 10 July and resubmitted at the 748th meeting.

The USSR representative considered that the draft resolution put forward by the Economic Committee failed to suggest concrete measures to combat unemployment and to raise the standard of living of the workers throughout the world. It merely took note of the existing situation and did not propose to change it. If the Council were to adopt this draft resolution, he argued, it would be guilty of a serious dereliction of its important responsibilities in the matter. Further, such action might be construed as tantamount to the approval by the Council of the rearmament drive. The USSR draft resolution, on the contrary, he submitted, took the fullest account of the need for taking specific measures. It laid stress on the need for normalizing trade relations, and invited Member States to take measures which would lead to a rise in the level of employment and to an improvement in international relations. Similar views were expressed by the representative of Poland.

The representatives of France, the United States and Yugoslavia opposed the USSR draft and supported that proposed by the Economic Committee. The latter draft, in their view, was a fair expression of a wide consensus and was the result of an effort to achieve unanimity. The representative of Yugoslavia, while he acknowledged that the Committee's draft could be improved in a theoretical sense, thought that it represented a satisfactory step forward, having regard to the current international situation.

The representative of France regretted that the USSR representative had reopened a wide-ranging discussion at so late a stage. By so doing, he had refused to recognize the genuine effort made by the Economic Committee to reach agreement by including in its text the essentials of the acceptable points in the USSR draft resolution. The representatives of France and the United States maintained that the operative part of the USSR draft was open to the general criticism that it was unrealistic since it purported to be unaware of the fact that obstacles to the development of normal trade between States were due not only to economic difficulties, such as disequilibrium in the balance of payments, but also to security considerations. To remove security restrictions before the relaxation of the tensions that had made the restrictions necessary, would, in the view of the representative of the United States, be the height of folly.

The representative of Egypt observed that in the Economic Committee his delegation had voted in favour of certain parts of the USSR draft. He considered that the discussions in the Economic Committee had justified his delegation's position, since the sponsors of the Committee's draft resolution had endeavoured to improve their text so as to bring it into line with the spirit of the USSR proposal. In general, Egypt thought that the existing tendencies towards a resumption of normal political relations might be encouraged by an endeavour to achieve the maximum possible resumption of normal commercial relations. If the USSR draft did not obtain the necessary majority, however, he would vote in favour of the Economic Committee's draft resolution.

The USSR draft resolution (E/L.531) was rejected, in parts, by votes ranging from 12 to 3, with 3 abstentions, to 8 to 3, with 7 abstentions.

The USSR representative then stated that it was desirable that the Council adopt unanimously a resolution on full employment, and he accordingly proposed amendments to the Economic Committee's draft resolution (E/2491) so as to remove what he considered its defects.

The USSR amendments (E/L.568) were the following:

The preamble to section B (for text, see below) would be reworded to read:

"Recognizing that, in order to maintain a normal demand for products, civilian sectors of industry and normal trade between countries without discrimination must be developed and standards of living raised;"

In the first operative paragraph of section B (for text, see below) the words "to prevent adverse effects... defence expenditures" would be replaced by:

"for developing the civilian sectors of industry and normal trade between countries without discrimination and improving standards of living".

In the second operative paragraph of section D (for text, see below) the words "all practicable steps to reduce obstacles" would be replaced by the words "all steps to remove obstacles."

The USSR amendments were each rejected by 14 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

The Economic Committee's draft resolution was then adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at the 749th plenary meeting, as resolution 483 (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Having considered the documentation placed before it for its discussion on the question of full employment, including, inter alia, the replies of the governments of Member States to the questionnaire on full employment and balance of payments and the analysis of these replies presented by the Secretary-General, the reports presented by the Secretary-General on measures designed to reconcile the attainment and maintenance of full employment with the avoidance of the harmful effects of inflation, and the report of the International Monetary Fund on the adequacy of monetary reserves,

"Having in mind the need for continuing efforts to achieve and maintain high levels of employment,

"Considering that the problems of reconciling the attainment and maintenance of full employment in the industrialized countries, and the acceleration of the economic development of the less economically-developed countries, with the need for avoiding the harmful effects of inflation, deserve further consideration,

"1. Requests the Secretary-General:

"(a) To suggest to Member States that those governments having had experience in dealing with inflationary pressures associated with high levels of economic activity or with the process of economic development in under-developed countries should arrange to give the Council the benefit of their experience and to submit written statements on this subject by 1 December 1953, for circulation to the Council;

"(b) To prepare a summary of these statements and to circulate it to the Council for consideration at its seventeenth session;

"2. Decides to consider at its seventeenth session the advisability of requesting the Secretary-General to appoint a committee of experts for further study of these problems;

"3. Invites the International Labour Organisation to continue its study of wage policies, including the question of wage policy in relation to the problem of inflation, and to inform the Council from time to time, as appropriate, of the results of its work in this connexion;

"Recognizing that any significant reduction in the level of expenditure on defence, which would of itself be most welcome, could at any time cause a slackening or a fall in the total effective demand on some sectors of the world economy,

"Recognizing, in this connexion, that any such tendency could be counteracted, inter alia, by a more rapid economic development of the less economically-developed countries, as well as by an expansion in the demand for, and internal and international trade in, products coming from the civilian sector of the economy,

"1. Requests the Secretary-General to invite each Member State to indicate, before 1 December 1953, its views on the measures it may consider necessary to prevent foreseeable adverse effects on its economy or on those of other Member States arising from reductions in its defence expenditures;

"2. Decides to consider at its seventeenth session the possible need for further action with reference to the above-mentioned problems of reconversion, including the advisability of requesting the Secretary-General to provide for further studies either by the committee of experts mentioned under section A, paragraph 2, above or in some other appropriate manner;

"Recognizing that the level of the monetary reserves available to Member States is an important factor influencing the possibility of maintaining international economic stability at optimum levels of output, consumption, trade and employment,

"Requests the International Monetary Fund to continue to keep under review the adequacy of monetary reserves for the purpose of helping countries to meet temporary disequilibria in their balances of international payments, bearing in mind the objectives referred to in paragraph 6 (a) of Council resolution 427 (XIV), and to inform the Council in 1954 of the results of its work in this connexion;

"Considering that the removal of obstacles to the development of normal and mutually beneficial trade between countries would help to stimulate business activity and employment.

"Calls upon all governments, with a view to increasing trade, employment and standards of living, to take all practicable steps to reduce obstacles to the development of normal and mutually beneficial trade between countries, availing themselves, inter alia, of any opportunities which may arise as a consequence of improved balance of payments or monetary reserve positions, in maturing of newly-developed industries or an easing of international tensions."

D. RESTRICTIVE BUSINESS PRACTICES

1. Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Restrictive Business Practices

The report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Restrictive Business Practices (E/2380), established by the Economic and Social Council in resolution 375(XIII)³¹ of 13 September 1951, was before the Council at its sixteenth session.

In its report, the Committee presented and explained 20 draft articles of a proposed international agreement, which covered both the substantive principles and procedures for an international organization charged with responsibility for the prevention and control of restrictive business practices, and the internal structure and procedures which the Committee considered appropriate to the problems which would be encountered by any international agency having to deal with such practices.

The Committee did not deal with the organization to implement the principles and procedures which it recommended since, under Council resolution 375(XIII), this was the Secretary-General's responsibility. The Secretary-General, had been asked to make a report and recommendations on the matter in the light of views obtained from any appropriate inter-governmental bodies or agencies. He pointed out (E/2443) that such a report could not be made, because one of the most important of these inter-governmental bodies, the Contracting Parties to GATT, had had no regular meeting between the date of the Committee's report (30 March 1953) and the convening of the Council's sixteenth session (30 June 1953).

In accordance with the Council's recommendation that the Committee base its proposals on the principles set forth in chapter V of the Havana Charter for an International Trade Organization, the first draft article of agreement defined restrictive business practices as those which "restrain competition, limit access to markets or foster monopolistic control". The practices falling within the scope of the proposed agreement were listed and provision was made for the possibility of extending the list by a two-thirds majority of the members of the organization present and voting.

The draft articles also defined the conditions under which restrictive business practices might be subject to investigation by the organization, i.e., they must be practices affecting international trade and carried on by one or more private or public commercial enterprises possessing, individually or collectively, effective control of trade among a number of countries, and they must have been the subject of a complaint to the organization.

The obligations of adhering governments were defined as follows: each member shall take appropriate measures and shall co-operate with other members in the organization to prevent, on the part of private or public commercial enterprises, business practices affecting international trade which restrain competition, limit access to markets, or foster monopolistic control, whenever such practices have harmful effects on the expansion of production or trade, in the light of the objectives relating to commercial policy, economic development and related purposes set forth in the preamble to the proposed agreement (see below).

Provision was made for a consultation procedure and an investigation procedure applicable to products, and for a separate procedure applicable to services such as transportation and telecommunications. In addition, the draft articles also authorized the organization to make general studies of restrictive business practices.

The Committee incorporated in its draft articles of agreement a preamble inspired by the objectives of the Havana Charter. This preamble, to the extent that the objectives expressed in it were relevant, would serve to provide guidance for the organization in considering whether or not a restrictive business practice had harmful effects. Furthermore, the draft agreement provided that any restrictive business practice which was "specifically required" by governmental measures in all countries in which the practice exists should be exempted from the investigation procedure. These changes, together with the incorporation of certain provisions relating to co-operation with intergovernmental bodies and agencies, were deemed necessary by the Committee so that the provisions of the Havana Charter relating to restrictive business practices could stand on their own divorced from the much more comprehensive responsibilities of the International Trade Organization contemplated under the Havana Charter.

The Committee also incorporated in its draft agreement relevant parts of the Havana Charter not contained in chapter V, introduced amendments which clarified the language of that chapter and recorded its interpretation of some doubtful points. However, it adopted only one substantive amendment of chapter V, a less restrictive definition of the restrictive business practice involved in the suppression and withholding of technology.

As to the internal structure and procedures of an implementing agency for its proposals, the Committee recommended the creation of a Representative Body, consisting of the representatives of all governments adhering to the agreement, having paramount authority and the final power of decision within the agency. It also envisaged an Executive Board, consisting of a smaller number of governmental representatives, to which important powers would be delegated. Members of the Board would be drawn from countries having different types of economy and different degrees of economic development, from countries in different geographical areas, and from countries of chief economic importance having regard particularly to their shares in international trade. The Committee's proposals envisaged two groups of staff functions, to be performed by officials in an executive secretariat and an advisory staff, respectively. The officials in the executive secretariat would, among other things, examine complaints of restrictive business practices, check the information supplied and request member States to furnish supplementary information, with a view to advising the Representative Body whether the complaints prima facie satisfied the conditions laid down in the draft agreement.

The advisory staff would be responsible for the handling of complaints after a decision had been taken to make an investigation and members had been informed. There would be three main stages in its handling of complaints: (1) examining, analysing and setting forth the information received; (2) deciding whether the practice in question has had, has or is about to have harmful effects within the meaning of the draft agreement; and (3) making recommendations in appropriate cases to member governments as to remedial measures.

The Committee also made proposals concerning the entry into force, amendment and termination of the draft agreement, and withdrawal therefrom, and made suggestions as to how the adherence of the European Coal and Steel Community to the proposed agreement might be facilitated. The report concluded with a statement of the relationship and inter-action between restrictive business practices and other barriers to international trade. Some Committee members held that the proposed agency would commend itself to governments only if it formed part of a wider body with comprehensive responsibilities in the whole field of international trade. Others felt that different types of trade barriers must be dealt with at a different pace and under different organizational arrangements.

An appendix to the draft agreement listed the national share in world trade of individual countries (computed on the basis of import and export figures supplied by the Statistical Office of the United Nations).

2. Analysis of Governmental Measures Relating to Restrictive Business Practices

In compliance with the fifth paragraph of Council resolution 375(XIII), the Ad Hoc Committee transmitted to the Council a report by the Committee's Secretary (E/2379 & Add.1) on analysis of governmental measures relating to restrictive business practices.

In its covering letter of transmittal, the Committee stated that, in accordance with the Council's resolution, it had, on 3 March 1952, addressed a letter to States that were Members of the United Nations or of specialized agencies, asking them for pertinent documents and information concerning restrictive business practices. A similar letter was sent to certain specialized agencies and intergovernmental organizations. Interested non-governmental organizations were also invited to make available to the Committee such information as they deemed relevant, either in oral statements at public meetings of the Committee or in written statements.

Prior to 31 March 1953, seventeen countries³² had forwarded documents to the Committee.

³² Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Denmark, France, Iran, Iraq, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, the Philippines, Sweden, Switzerland, Thailand, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States.

These documents included the texts of laws or proposed laws, judicial decisions, administrative measures and reports.

The Committee decided, in view of the shortage of time and the voluminous material that had been forwarded, to charge its Secretary with the task of preparing a report giving the information received from governments. It expressed the view that information not originally submitted by governments should, wherever possible, be verified subsequently by correspondence with the governments concerned.

After two introductory chapters setting forth the types of restrictive business practices and their extent, the report by the Committee's Secretary dealt with governmental measures relating to such practices. It covered:

- (1) the legal origins of such governmental measures;
- (2) the types of legislation involved, e.g., laws providing for the surveillance, prevention and control, or adoption of restrictive business practices;
- (3) the types of business activities held illegal under national legislation, e.g., price-fixing, limitation of production;
- (4) exemptions from the scope of relevant legislation;
- (5) general provisions for the collection of information;
- (6) registration laws and procedures;
- (7) investigation procedures;
- (8) remedies and penalties; and
- (9) the effectiveness of governmental measures in this field.

One annex to the report contained the texts of the relevant legislation of some 60 countries on restrictive business practices. Another annex consisted of case histories showing how various international restrictive arrangements operated in the past in the following four industries: electric lamps; titanium pigments and related products; aluminium; and heavy nonferrous materials.

3. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Sixteenth Session

The question of restrictive business practices was considered by the Council at its 742nd and 744th plenary meetings, on 30 and 31 July 1953. In addition to the above two reports of the Ad Hoc Committee, the Council had before it a joint draft resolution by Belgium, Egypt, France, Turkey and the United Kingdom (E/L.556), and a joint Swedish-Yugoslav amendment (E/L.557) to the joint draft resolution.

Under the joint draft resolution, the Secretary-General would be requested, inter alia:

to transmit the two reports for examination and comment to Members of the United Nations and of specialized agencies in the economic field, the specialized agencies concerned, and interested intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations. The Council would resume consideration of the matter not later than its nineteenth session.

The amendment proposed the addition of a new paragraph, under which the Secretary-General would be requested:

- (1) to continue to follow, on the basis of information obtained from governments, the principal legislative, judicial, executive and administrative developments in this field;
- (2) to summarize relevant information regarding restrictive business practices in international trade which might be obtained in official government documents; and
- (3) to report thereon to the Council before it resumed its consideration of this problem.

The Council also had before it a statement by the Secretary-General of financial implications (E/L.557/Add.1) to the effect that the tasks arising from the joint draft resolution (E/L.556) could be undertaken within existing resources but that the amendment (E/L.557) would require the assignment of additional personnel, involving a cost of $15,800. It was subsequently explained by the representative of the Secretary-General that the additional expenditure could be absorbed in the budget of the Department of Economic Affairs for 1953, but that it was not possible to prejudge any decision that might be taken on the budget of the Department in respect of 1954.

Most representatives, including those of Australia, Belgium, Egypt, France, India, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay, spoke in support of the joint draft resolution. They stated that the documentation submitted to the Council was substantial and dealt with difficult problems, and they considered that more time was needed for governments to formulate their views on the Ad Hoc Committee's recommendations. The absence of a report by the Secretary-General on the organization to implement the proposals and the lack of an opportunity to consult the Contracting Parties to GATT were further reasons for postponing discussion of the subject. Any delay thereby entailed, they argued, would be rewarded by the ultimate adoption of constructive measures.

Some representatives, in particular those of Sweden and Yugoslavia, on the other hand, favoured action before the tenth session of the Council. In their opinion, efforts should be made to maintain public interest in the abolition of restrictive business practices during the intervening period. Their amendment therefore proposed that the Secretary-General should carry out a series of follow-up studies which would keep the Secretariat's information up to date until such time as the Council resumed consideration of the matter. Such studies, they thought, might also be useful to nations wishing to adopt measures to liberalize trade. The representative of Sweden considered it to be the consensus of modern expert opinion that cartels in many cases adversely influenced productivity by fixing prices at the level of the least efficient member and by obviating the need for rationalization, and that such practices hampered economic development, most of all in the under-developed countries. He also stated that the abolition of restrictive business practices would redound to the advantage of the balance of payments, the balance of trade, world productivity and the maintenance of full employment.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR took the position that restrictive business practices were not as important as other problems in international trade, such as discriminatory trade practices by certain governments. They held that the draft agreement was designed to promote the expansion of United States enterprises abroad and to enable United States firms to establish themselves as dominant influences in cartels and enterprises in which they had hitherto had no part. The documents before the Council were criticized for failing to take account of the harmful effects of monopolistic restrictive practices in colonial areas and in the smaller and under-developed countries.

The United States representative, in reply to these comments, affirmed the continuing devotion of his Government and people to the principles of free and fair competition under which his country had prospered and said that his country had a long record of action against trade restrictions. He stated that the trade restrictions which had been imposed and to which reference had just been made had been taken for security reasons, and not for protectionist and balance of payments purposes and his Government would be glad if conditions would change so that such restrictions could safely be lifted.

While the Committee's report and documentation supported the view that restrictive business practices in many cases had harmful effects, some representatives, in particular the representative of Belgium, cautioned against the view that this was true universally. Cartels and combines, the representative of Belgium argued, could prove to be a useful factor through which the current rigid economic structure could be made more flexible. Agreement between undertakings might make it possible to regulate economic development, which made for stability of employment. It could guide capital into the most productive channels and reduce production costs, and therefore prices, by arranging for specialization, standardization and the pooling of the cost of technical research, advertising and market research. The evil, in his view, lay not in the mere existence of cartels and combines, but in the general economic situation to which their formation represented industry's reaction.

The representatives of Belgium and Sweden, among others, stressed the need for concurrent international action to prevent and control governmental, as well as private, restrictions on trade. The Belgium representative regretted the absence from the Committee's report of provisions relating to restrictive practices with regard to services. The representative of Sweden, drawing attention to specific cases, pointed out that national action against restrictive business practices in international trade frequently encountered difficulties and proved ineffective when it was not supported by international action.

Few comments were made on the procedural aspects of the Committee's report. The representative of Uruguay, however, considered that some of the draft articles of agreement gave too much power to the advisory staff. Certain articles, he thought, would seem to imply that the Representative Body would always have to accept the reports of the advisory staff, and if that were so it would be surrendering its own competence. His second criticism was that it would be inappropriate to establish an executive board with a restricted membership. Although it might have certain virtues, the establishment of such a board would be contrary to the democratic principle that the rights of all the States members of the proposed organization must be respected. He emphasized also that the smaller the membership of the controlling body, the easier it would be for the cartels and trusts to bring pressure to bear on it.

The representative of the International Co-operative Alliance (ICA) proposed that non-governmental organizations in category A be given the right to submit suggestions to the proposed organization. The representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) advanced the view that a bona fide non-governmental organization, appointed for the purpose by the members of the new agency, should also be entitled to submit complaints as a means of protecting the general interests of the community.

The representative of France suggested that a study be made of specific phases of restrictive business practices, such as the failure of some governments to provide for the compulsory licensing of patents as a remedial measure against the restrictive practice of patent suppression, as they were obligated to do by their agreements under the Paris Union of 1883 (as most recently amended in London in 1934). More information, he said, was needed on the effectiveness of legislation purporting to restrain cartel abuse, such as the experience gained under the recent German and Japanese anti-cartel ordinances. He also noted that restrictive arrangements involving agricultural foodstuffs and articles of human consumption, which were more informal and more difficult to cope with than similar arrangements relating to industrial commodities, required further investigation and analysis.

The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) considered that the report of the Ad Hoc Committee was not likely to lead to effective action against restrictive business practices and would not, for example, affect the control he claimed certain monopolies had over the economic and political life of many underdeveloped countries. The representative of the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC) stated that the views of his organization were set out in a brochure entitled Economic Competition and Agreement. Agreements between firms amounted to monopolies only in exceptional cases; the criteria for action should be whether the purpose of an agreement was to restrict production and trade and whether it gave the parties advantages disproportionate to the services they rendered.

At its 744th plenary meeting on 31 July, the Council adopted the amendment (E/L.557)³³ first in parts and then as a whole. The first and third parts were adopted by 12 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, and the second part by 10 votes to 1, with 7 abstentions. The joint draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (resolution 487(XVI)). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Noting the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Restrictive Business Practices and the Secretariat's analysis of governmental measures relating to restrictive business practices prepared in accordance with Council resolution 375(XIII),

"Bearing in mind that restrictive business practices in international trade may have harmful effects on the attainment of the higher standards of living, full employment and conditions of economic and social progress and development envisaged in Article 55 of the Charter of the United Nations,

"Recognizing the necessity of according sufficient time to governments to give thorough study to the proposals of the Ad Hoc Committee, and to the Secretary-General to formulate the report and recommendation called for in paragraph 6 of resolution 375(XIII),

"1. Commends the Ad Hoc Committee and the Secretariat for the thoroughness and dispatch with which the tasks assigned to them have been executed;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General:

"(a) To transmit the Committee's report and the Secretariat's analysis to the States Members of the United Nations and of specialized agencies in the economic field, to the specialized agencies concerned, and to interested intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations, for examination and any comments they may wish to make;

"(b) To circulate to the foregoing such comments as he may receive, together with such analysis as he deems appropriate;

"3. Further requests the Secretary-General to proceed to implement paragraph 6 of resolution 375(XIII) when a sufficient number of governments have commented on the Committee's report to provide some indication of attitudes towards the report, and to continue to follow, on the basis of information obtained from governments, the principal legislative, judicial, executive and administrative developments in this field, to summarize relevant information regarding restrictive business practices in international trade which may be contained in official government documents, and to report thereon to the Council before it resumes consideration of this problem;

"4. Decides to resume consideration of this matter not later than the nineteenth session of the Council."

E. INTERNATIONAL COMMODITY ARRANGEMENTS

At its fifteenth session, the Economic and Social Council discussed the question of convening inter-governmental study groups and commodity conferences, at the 127th to 130th meetings of its Economic Committee, on 10, 17, and 23 April, and at its 702nd plenary meeting on 27 April 1953.

As a basis for this discussion, the Council had before it a report by the Secretary-General regarding procedures for intergovernmental consultation on problems arising in connexion with primary commodities (E/2039) submitted to its thirteenth session and an addendum (E/2039/Add.1) bringing the data included in the original study up to date. It also had before it the Review of International Commodity Problems, 1952³⁴ prepared by the Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements (ICCICA).

In the course of the Council's discussion, the majority of speakers drew attention to difficulties arising from fluctuations in prices of primary products and to the importance of international efforts to reduce such fluctuations. In particular, considerable attention was given to the harmful effects of such fluctuations on the economies of the less developed countries which depend largely on the export of primary commodities.

It was generally agreed that it would be inappropriate at this time to discuss the substance of the question. Although it was recognized that commodity agreements were not the only way of stabilizing prices, the majority considered that the present machinery had proved effective and should be continued. A draft resolution to this effect was presented by Australia (E/AC.6/L.55).

The representatives of Poland and the USSR held that no solution could be found in a procedure based on the principles of the Havana Charter, since it would impose on governments the procedures of that Charter, which some of them had never accepted. In this connexion, the Australian representative pointed out that the draft resolution did not imply acceptance of the provisions of the Havana Charter. It was merely a question of being generally guided by those principles.

The representative of Argentina submitted two amendments (E/AC.6/L.58) to the Australian draft resolution. The first would recall the paramount importance of establishing machinery for intergovernmental consultations on primary commodity agreements, while the second aimed at securing more effective means of reaching such agreements.

The Australian representative stated that he could not accept the first amendment since it was a question of substance. However, he agreed to accept an oral United Kingdom compromise proposal to add to the preamble of the draft resolution a paragraph noting the study requested in paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 623 (VII)³⁵. The second Argentine amendment was adopted at the Economic Committee's 128th meeting on 10 April, by 13 votes to none, with 4 abstentions (see below, para. 5).

The representative of Australia also accepted, with minor drafting changes, an amendment by Uruguay (E/AC.6/L.56), which would increase the membership of the ICCICA to four, and an oral Indian amendment, to give the ICCICA a more active role by adding a provision that the Committee assist in intergovernmental consultation and action in respect of international commodity problems (see below).

The draft resolution, thus amended, was adopted (E/2410A) by 15 votes to 2 at the Committee's 128th meeting, following separate votes on the first three operative paragraphs ranging from 14 votes to 2, with 1 abstention, to 14 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

It was adopted by the Council at its 702nd plenary meeting, on 27 April, by 16 votes to 2, as resolution 462 A (XV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Recognizing the importance to all countries of maintaining adequate machinery to facilitate international consideration of problems of primary commodities,

"Recalling Council resolution 30(IV), 296(XI) and 373(XIII) relating to international commodity arrangements,

"Believing that these resolutions continue to constitute an effective basis for international consultation and action,

"Noting the study requested in paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 623(VII),

"1. Reaffirms Council resolution 296(XI) governing the procedures to be followed by the Secretary-General in convening inter-governmental commodity conferences;

"2. Recommends that Members of the United Nations continue to accept the principles of chapter VI of the Havana Charter for an International Trade Organization as a general guide in inter-governmental consultation or action with respect to commodity problems;

"3. Recommends that the membership of the Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements (ICCICA) should be increased to four, the fourth member to be a person of wide experience in the problems confronting countries undergoing development whose economies are primarily dependent on the production and international marketing of primary commodities, and authorizes the Secretary-General to make this appointment;

"4. Recommends that the ICCICA should continue to review international commodity problems and to assist in inter-governmental consultation and action in respect of such problems;

"5. Recommends that the group of experts appointed under General Assembly resolution 623(VII) should devote attention to the question of the use of study groups and international commodity conferences."

The Economic Committee also had before it a draft resolution by Uruguay (E/AC.6/L.57), calling for a study of steel and its principal by-products.

During the discussion, the representatives of France, Sweden and the United States, among others, stressed that it was for the ICCICA, not the Council, to make recommendations concerning specific commodities. It would therefore, they thought, be sufficient to transmit the summary records of the discussion to the ICCICA. It was also open to the Government of Uruguay, the United States representative said, to communicate directly with the Committee without a formal proposal by the Council. A number of representatives, including those of Australia, China, France and the United States, pointed out that the work being done by the regional economic commissions should also be taken into account before establishing such a study group.

The United States representative proposed (E/AC.7/L.59) that the Council invite governments to consider the usefulness and desirability of convening a study group on steel and request them to transmit their views to the ICCICA. Following a brief discussion, the representative of Uruguay agreed to accept this draft resolution if it were recorded in the summary records that the basic problem was not supply but disparity between the income received by the under-developed countries from the sales of the products they exported and the prices which they had to pay for the commodities they needed.

However, at the following meeting (130th), the United States withdrew the draft resolution and, together with India and Uruguay, submitted a joint text (E/AC.6/L.60), which was adopted by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, both by the Economic Committee (E/2410B), and by the Council at its 702nd plenary meeting on 27 April 1953 as resolution 462 B (XV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council

"1. Requests the Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements (ICCICA) to consult governments on the desirability and usefulness of convening an inter-governmental study group on steel, and to transmit to the governments for their information the official records of the discussion of the question at the fifteenth session of the Council;

"2. Recommends that the governments consulted should transmit their views on the question to the ICCICA not later than 30 September 1953;

"3. Requests the ICCICA to consider the replies received from governments and to report to the Council at its seventeenth session on the action taken in this matter."

In accordance with the Council's resolution, the ICCICA prepared a report (E/2537) on the question of convening a study group on steel for submission to the Council's seventeenth session.

During 1953, there was further discussion about the possibility of using commodity agreements to stabilize the relationship between prices of given primary commodities and of secondary goods which exporting countries need to import. The effect of any such arrangements would be to stabilize the prices of the commodities concerned, not in absolute terms but in relation to the prices of certain other goods. This matter was also considered by the group of experts which prepared the report Commodity Trade and Economic Development.³⁶

The international wheat agreement of 1949 expired during 1953 and, after intergovernmental discussion, was renewed, with certain changes arising from experience in its operation. The basic principles of a multilateral contract were retained in the 1953 agreement.

In accordance with Council resolution 296(XI), the Secretary-General sought the advice of the ICCICA on a request that he had received to convene an international conference to consider the conclusion of an international agreement on sugar. The ICCICA reported that a conference was desirable and the United Nations Sugar Conference was convened in London, from 13 July to 24 August 1953. The meeting was attended by over 200 representatives from 50 countries, of which twelve had observer status. At the end of the Conference, a Final Act was signed, to which was attached the International Sugar Agreement prepared at the Conference.³⁷

The technique adopted in the agreement has many new aspects. Market prices are accepted as a guide to the relation between supply and demand, and provision made to ensure that adjustments to available supplies are made quickly in response to changes in price. The first meeting of the new International Sugar Council was held on 18 December and the general clauses of the Agreement became operative on 1 January 1954.

At its meeting in London in March 1953, the International Tin Study Group considered developments following the adjournment of the United Nations Tin Conference in November 1950. To give further consideration to this matter, ³⁷ The Conference agenda, the list of representatives, the summary records of the plenary meetings, the resolutions of the final plenary meeting, the Final Act of the Conference and the text of the international agreement concluded at the Conference have been published in United Nations Sugar Conference, 1953: Summary of Proceedings. it appointed a working party, which met in Brussels in June 1953. The working party prepared a report on its attempts to reconcile differences of views between producing and consuming countries on various aspects of a proposed agreement. The member governments of the International Tin Study Group were asked to examine this report and to inform the chairman of the United Nations Tin Conference concerning their views as to the usefulness of an early resumption of the conference. To facilitate further discussion regarding the proposed agreement, a drafting committee met in London in August 1953 and prepared a draft, based on the work of the 1950 conference and on subsequent proposals, setting out various suggestions which had been made. The replies from governments were generally favourable to an early resumption of the Conference, and the Secretary-

General, acting on the request of the chairman of the United Nations Tin Conference and in accordance with arrangements made at the time the Conference adjourned, convened the second session of the Conference in Geneva, from 16 November to 9 December 1953. It was attended by representatives from 30 countries; representatives of seven of these countries had observer status. An International Tin Agreement was prepared for submission to governments.

At its meeting held in Geneva in December 1953, the ICCICA reviewed the changes that had taken place during the year in the supply and demand of various primary commodities and prepared a report for the Economic and Social Council reviewing current problems in international trade in these commodities.

F. CO-ORDINATED ACTION FOR INCREASED FOOD PRODUCTION

The Council, at its sixteenth session, devoted considerable attention to problems of food production in connexion with its review of the annual report (E/2432 & Add.1 & 2) of the Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations (FAO).

The report, which contained an assessment of the trend of food requirements on the basis of population estimates worked out with the Population Division of the United Nations, showed that for the period 1948-1951 the rate of population increase for all countries, for which statistics were available, amounted to 1.4 per cent. Assuming that the rate of increase in countries for which statistics were not available to the United Nations was the same, then the annual increase in world population would be about 30 millions—an additional 80,000 new mouths daily to be fed. It was further pointed out that food requirements do not solely depend on the growth of population, since they are also affected by the level of food consumption per capita and by the quality of the diets consumed. In certain countries food production was increasing more rapidly than population, and indeed substantial stocks existed in North America. On the other hand, throughout the greater part of the under-developed countries and particularly in Asia and the Far East, the quantities of food available per capita were still less than in the immediate pre-war period, when malnutrition was the common lot of the greater part of the world's population. FAO, the report pointed out, devotes the greater part of its resources, under both its regular and its technical assistance programmes, to methods of assisting governments to increase their food production and to improve distribution; but the budgetary resources at the disposal of the organization severely limit the amount of such assistance that can be given.

FAO has established a joint agricultural secretariat with each of the regional economic commissions which is responsible both to the Director-General of FAO and to the Executive Secretaries of the economic commissions. Those joint activities undertaken vary somewhat from year to year, but are directed to methods of increasing production, improvement of agricultural statistics, better understanding of agricultural economic problems, and problems of land reform.

Co-operation between FAO and other specialized agencies has been developed progressively, the report stated, in regard to the reform of agrarian structures, and inter-agency meetings have been arranged by FAO in preparation for the report³⁸ which the Secretary-General would make on this subject to the General Assembly in 1954. Close co-operation was continued between FAO and WHO on a number of nutritional problems, special emphasis being placed on questions of methods of overcoming protein deficiencies which have such serious effects on the health of young children in Africa, the Far East and in under-developed countries in general.

³⁸ Progress in Land Reform, U.N.P., Sales No.: 1954. II.B.3.

At the request of governments, the report stated, projects implemented under the United Nations Expanded Programme of technical assistance also contributed to an increase in food production.

The Council considered the report at its sixteenth session, at its 709th and 710th plenary meetings, on 2 and 3 July. The representative of FAO, in presenting the report, said that special emphasis had been placed on the relationship of world food production to world population, which appeared to be growing by approximately 1.4 per cent per annum, equivalent to an aggregate increase of 30 million persons a year. In the light of recent studies, it was now considered that increased production, favoured by good harvests during the past two years, particularly in North America, made it doubtful whether, statistically, world food production was in fact lagging behind world population growth. Indeed, substantial surpluses of foodstuffs were available in North America, but they were not readily available to the world owing to balance-of-payments and transport difficulties, although some surpluses had generously been placed at the disposal of the rest of the world by the United States and Canadian Governments. In less-favoured regions, however—and these comprised the greatest part of the world's population—the per capita consumption of food was still markedly less than before the war, he said.

The FAO representative pointed out that, at least for the time being, the number of food-importing countries had increased. Increased food production, particularly in countries from which exports might be anticipated, was a matter of the greatest importance to food-importing countries. FAO felt that technical assistance represented the most fruitful initiative undertaken by the United Nations. The very success of FAO's technical assistance programme, however, had placed the organization in a difficult position, owing to the increase in the number of requests received.

The Council also had before it a draft resolution by Sweden (E/L.511), which would have the Council take note of the report. During the discussion, members congratulated FAO and its secretariat upon the success of their work, and expressed satisfaction with the valuable services rendered by FAO in the field of technical assistance and with the co-operation achieved with other specialized agencies and with the regional economic commissions.

The majority of representatives expressed serious concern at the situation regarding world food supplies revealed by FAO's studies, and reaffirmed support of FAO's objective, calling for a well-balanced increase in world food production of at least 1 to 2 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of population growth. The representative of France emphasized that all governments should heed the warnings of FAO and try to increase agricultural production. Agricultural and industrial development, however, should go hand in hand, he said. There were too many current examples of disequilibrium between industrial and agricultural development. Governments engaged in industrializing their countries should take care to increase agricultural output proportionately.

The representatives of Argentina, Cuba and Egypt, among others, however, thought there was a lack of balance in the FAO report. It had said that more adequate supplies of food were a prerequisite of all economic development and that the only real solution to the problem of securing such supplies in under-developed countries lay in increasing indigenous production. At a time when surpluses of food were accumulating for lack of markets, while millions in need were unable to gain access to those surpluses for lack of purchasing power—which was in turn due to the lack of economic development in under-developed countries—such statements, they held, suggested an incorrect approach to the problem. FAO should not, of course, deviate from its allotted tasks, but instead of giving priority to food production over economic development FAO should bear in mind the need for integrated and harmonious development.

The representatives of Argentina and Egypt proposed an amendment (E/L.516) to the Swedish draft resolution, by which the Council would request FAO, when dealing with the problem of increase in production of foodstuffs, to bear in mind the more general problems arising out of economic development, improvement in the standard of living, and the flow of international trade.

Replying to the observations made, the representative of FAO stated that his organization had felt it necessary to emphasize the gravity of the world food problem, but its attitude was not one of pessimism. On the contrary, it believed, in contrast to the neo-Malthusians, that the technical problems of food production could be overcome. The most formidable obstacles were political, social and economic, not technical.

With respect to integrated economic development, FAO had never suggested that the importance of industrialization could be minimized. On several occasions, in fact, the FAO Conference and Council had stressed the importance of industrialization as part of economic development. In countries in which there was considerable under-employment in agriculture, industrialization might well prove to be the only way of remedying the situation. What FAO had maintained was rather that industrial and agricultural development should be carried out concurrently. The representatives of Cuba, France and Yugoslavia felt that, in the circumstances, the amendment would be inappropriate.

The amendment proposed by Argentina and Egypt was withdrawn, in view of the assurances given by the representative of FAO and on the understanding that the Council was in agreement in stressing the importance of the general problems arising out of economic development, the improvement of living standards and the flow of international trade.

The representative of Sweden accepted an Australian amendment (E/L.514 & Corr.1) to express appreciation of the report and note with approval emphasis on operational activities. The draft resolution (E/L.511), as thus amended, was adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at the Council's 710th plenary meeting on 3 July.

By this resolution (488(XVI)), the Council took note of FAO's report with appreciation and noted with approval the continued emphasis on the carrying out of operational activities in the field.

G. TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

The Transport and Communications Commission held its sixth session at United Nations Headquarters from 2 to 11 February 1953.

The Commission's report (E/2363) was considered by the Economic and Social Council at its fifteenth session, at the 125th, 126th and 129th meetings of the Economic Committee, on 6, 7 and 17 April 1953, and at the 687th and 689th plenary meetings, on 15 and 16 April 1953.

On the basis of the report of the Economic Committee (E/2402) and a statement by the Secretary-General (E/2363/Add.1) on the financial implications of the report of the Commission, the Council, at its 687th plenary meeting on 15 April, by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, took note of the report of the Commission, in resolution 468 A (XV).

The action taken by the Commission and the Council on transport and communications questions during 1953 are dealt with below.

1. International Road Transport

a. CONVENTION ON ROAD TRAFFIC

The Commission noted that the Convention on Road Traffic,³⁹ opened for signature on 19 September 1949, had come into force on 26 March 1952. The Norwegian and United Kingdom representatives informed the Commission that their Governments had taken steps toward ratification of the Convention and the representatives of Pakistan and China stated that their Governments were considering the ratification of the Convention in the near future.

At its sixteenth session, the Council had before it communications to the Secretary-General from the Governments of Vietnam and the Vatican City (E/2453), requesting that the question of their accession to the Convention on Road Traffic be placed on the Council's agenda. The question was considered by the Council at its 715th plenary meeting on 7 July.

The representative of France pointed out that, under article 27, paragraph 3, of the Convention on Road Traffic, that instrument was open to accession by all States Members of the United Nations, by every State which had been invited to attend the United Nations Conference on Road and Motor Transport held at Geneva in 1949, and also by any "other State which the Economic and Social Council might by resolution declare to be eligible". Some representatives, including those of Belgium, China and Venezuela, felt that, this Convention being of a technical nature, it was essential to ensure its universal implementation. Opposition was voiced by the USSR representative, who did not consider that the application concerning Vietnam emanated from the lawful government of that country.

The Council adopted by 12 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions, and by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, respectively, resolutions 506(XVI) and 507(XVI), resolving to admit the State of Vietnam and the State of Vatican City as Parties to that Convention.

In explaining his abstention, the representative of India stated that the point at issue had not been universality in the application of the Convention, but the eligibility of certain States—e.g., Vietnam—to accede to it.

The representative of Egypt said that his delegation, "for obvious political reasons", had abstained in the vote on the draft resolution concerning Vietnam.

At the end of 1953, the following countries had ratified or acceded to the Convention: Cuba, Czechoslovakia, France, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Monaco, the Netherlands, the Philippines, Sweden, Syria, the Union of South Africa, the United States, the Vatican City State and Vietnam.

b. ROAD SIGNS AND SIGNALS

The Commission, at its sixth session, approved the final report of the Group of Experts on Road Signs and Signals (E/CN.2/119-E/CN.2/CONT.1/12) which had been established in accordance with Council resolution 272(X).⁴⁰ The experts had held three sessions in the period 1950-52 and had completed a draft protocol on a uniform system of road signs and signals.

The Commission considered that this draft might appropriately be placed before governments for adoption on a world-wide basis, and discussed the procedure by which this should be done. It noted that the Group of Experts suggested the convening of a conference of governments for this purpose. However, the Commission was of the opinion that, in view of the thorough preparation of the draft, the holding of such a conference would not be essential and might delay the adoption of the uniform system.

In its consideration of this matter, the Economic Committee of the Council, by 9 votes to none, with 9 abstentions, adopted an oral Australian proposal to delete the provision in the draft protocol which would have made it impossible for governments to make reservations on signing it. A French oral proposal to have the Secretary-General "continue his consultations concerning the contents of the protocol and the date it should be opened for signature, and to report to the Council at its seventeenth session" was adopted by the Economic Committee. As thus amended, a draft resolution on this question was adopted by the Economic Committee (E/2402) at its 125th meeting on 6 April by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions; and by the Council, at its 687th plenary meeting on 15 April, by the same vote, as resolution 468 D (XV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Taking note of the considerations and recommendations of the Transport and Communications Commission in its resolution 3 concerning the final report of the Group of Experts on Road Signs and Signals,

"1. Notes in particular that the Commission considers the recommendation of the Group of Experts, as embodied in the draft convention on a uniform system of road signs and signals, a suitable solution for achieving uniformity on a world-wide basis; and that the draft convention should without delay be opened for signature and ratification by governments;

"2. Considers that a gradual application of a uniform system would be the best method of securing eventual acceptance and thus uniformity on a world-wide scale; and, therefore,

"3. Approves the decision of the Group of Experts to omit from the draft convention indication of a period of time during which the introduction of uniform signs and signals should be accomplished by governments;

"4. Notes that the draft convention, in article 41, provides that it shall terminate and replace in the relations between Contracting States the provisions of the 1931 Convention concerning the Unification of Road Signs and the 1949 Protocol on Road Signs and Signals;

"5. Decides that the draft convention shall be known as the Protocol on a Uniform System of Road Signs and Signals (New York, [year]);

"6. Instructs the Secretary-General:

"(a) To continue his consultations concerning the contents of the protocol and the date it should be opened for signature, and to report thereon to the Council at its seventeenth session;

"(b) To bring to the attention of the governments the information and explanations contained in the final report of the Group of Experts on Road Signs and Signals."

ANNEX

REVISED TEXT OF PARAGRAPH 1 OF ARTICLE 35 OF THE DRAFT CONVENTION ON A UNIFORM SYSTEM OF ROAD SIGNS AND SIGNALS

Article 35

1. This Protocol shall be open until 195 for signature by all States Parties to the Convention on Road Traffic, opened for signature at Geneva on 19 September 1949, and all States Members of the United Nations or of any of the specialized agencies.

c. LICENSING OF MOTOR VEHICLE DRIVERS

The Committee of Experts on Licensing of Motor Vehicle Drivers, established in accordance with Council resolution 379 B (XIII),⁴¹ submitted its report (E/CN.2/133-E/CN.2/-

⁴⁰ See Y.U.N., 1950, p. 489.

⁴¹ See Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 437-38.

CONF.2/3), dealing with the problem of establishing uniform minimum regulations for the licensing of drivers of the various categories of motor vehicles, to the Commission at its sixth session. In accordance with its terms of reference, the report of the Committee contained draft uniform regulations for the licensing of motor vehicle drivers which were recommended for consideration by governments in connexion with their domestic laws and regulations. It also contained draft general provisions applicable to international traffic for consideration as an annex to the Convention on Road Traffic. The Committee furthermore recommended that governments be requested to circulate the report to the driver licensing authorities in their countries. In addition it proposed that the assistance of the World Health Organization (WHO) be invoked with respect to further recommendations relative to requirements of mental and physical fitness of motor vehicle drivers.

The Economic Committee (E/2402) at its 125th meeting on 6 April, by 16 votes to 2, and the Council, at its 687th plenary meeting on 15 April, by the same vote, adopted a resolution on this matter. The USSR representative expressed the view that the licensing of motor vehicle drivers was a matter essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of States, and that a United Nations organ had no authority to impose rules on the subject. The resolution adopted by the Council (468 E (XV)) read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Taking note of the considerations and recommendations of the Transport and Communications Commission in its resolution 4 concerning the report of the Committee of Experts on Licensing of Motor Vehicle Drivers,

"Noting in particular that the Committee of Experts has recommended that the minimum uniform regulations for the licensing of motor vehicle drivers drafted by it should be referred to governments for consideration in connexion with their national laws and regulations,

"Further noting that the Committee has also proposed some general provisions for insertion in a new annex to the Convention on Road Traffic, concluded at Geneva on 19 September 1949, and that the Transport and Communications Commission considers that it would be appropriate to merge the proposed new annex, as revised by the Commission, with annex 8 to the Convention,

"1. Instructs the Secretary-General:

"(a) To circulate the report of the Committee of Experts on Licensing of Motor Vehicle Drivers to all States Members of the United Nations or of any of the specialized agencies:

"(i) Requesting them to consider in connexion with their domestic laws and regulations the minimum uniform regulations recommended by the Committee; and

"(ii) Drawing to their attention the attached amendment to annex 8 to the Convention on Road Traffic proposed by the Committee of Experts and revised by the Commission, and requesting the governments of those States which are Parties to the Convention to notify the Secretary-General if they wish to accept the proposed amendment in accordance with article 31 of the Convention;

"(b) To bring to the attention of the World Health Organization the recommendation of the Committee of Experts that the assistance of that organization be sought with respect to the requirements and methods of determining mental and physical fitness of applicants for driving permits;

"2. Endorses the recommendation of the Commission that the study of this question which is being undertaken on the regional level under the auspices of the Economic Commission for Europe be co-ordinated with the recommendations by the Committee of Experts and with any action taken by the World Health Organization in giving the requested assistance."

CONVENTION ON ROAD TRAFFIC: DRAFT AMENDED ANNEX 8

CONDITIONS TO BE FULFILLED BY DRIVERS OF MOTOR VEHICLES IN INTERNATIONAL TRAFFIC

(Note: Paragraph 1 is the existing text of annex 8.)

1. The minimum age for driving a motor vehicle under the conditions set out in article 24 of the Convention shall be eighteen years.

Any Contracting State or sub-division thereof may, however, recognize the driving permits issued by other Contracting States to drivers of motorcycles and invalid carriages of a lower age than eighteen years.

(Note: Paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 are new and constitute the proposed amendment.)

2. The requirement of "proof of competence" as called for in paragraph 1 of article 24 of the Convention shall be deemed to have been fulfilled if:

(1) The permit was issued to the applicant:

(a) After he had passed satisfactorily an examination of his:

(i) Ability to drive safely under normal traffic conditions a vehicle of the description to which the permit relates,

(ii) Knowledge of traffic laws and regulations, and of correct road behaviour; and

(b) After steps had been taken to ensure that the applicant was in a state of health and physical and mental condition compatible with safe driving; or

(2) The driver held a permit prior to 26 March 1952, the date of entry into force of the Convention, Provisional permits issued to learner-drivers are not driving permits in the meaning of this provision.

3. Driving permits issued to disabled persons shall bear a clause to the effect that they are valid only when the vehicle or the holder or both are equipped with devices designed to take account of the disability. This clause shall include the word "restricted" in the language of the driving permit and the translation in French restreint and the registration number of the vehicle, if specially equipped.

4. Contracting States in introducing the detailed measures to give effect to the provisions of this annex shall give full consideration to the recommendations of the Committee of Experts on Licensing of Motor Vehicle Drivers, established in accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 379 B (XIII) of 11 August 1951.

2. Other Problems of International Inland Transport

a. REGIONAL DEVELOPMENTS IN THE FIELD OF INLAND TRANSPORT

The Commission took note of a report by the Secretary-General concerning developments in the field of inland transport (E/CN.2/121 & Corr.1 & Add.1) which had occurred in the various regions since the fifth session of the Commission, and, in particular, of the activities of the three regional economic commissions. The Commission noted that the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE) had placed emphasis on projects, usually undertaken in conjunction with the Technical Assistance Administration (TAA) or specialized agencies, for providing training facilities for professional and technical personnel in the transport field; it noted the activities of ECE in the co-ordination of inland transport, the integration of European railway systems, the development and improvement of international road transport, the transport of dangerous goods and the simplification of frontier formalities; and that the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA) among a number of transport studies had undertaken a study, in collaboration with TAA, of the development and integration of the transport systems of the six Central American countries.

b. CO-ORDINATION OF INLAND TRANSPORT

The Commission noted the Secretary-General's report on the co-ordination of inland transport (E/CN.2/122 & Add.1), summarizing activities in this field since its fifth session, in particular the activities of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), ECE, ECAFE and of the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC).

Having noted that the Council in its resolution 298 H (XI)⁴² had requested the Secretary-General to continue to examine this problem, the Commission decided that the Secretary-General should continue to make reports to it on developments in this field.

3. Facilitation of International Movement of Persons and Goods

a. TRAVEL, PASSPORTS AND FRONTIER FORMALITIES

The activities during 1951 and 1952 of a number of international bodies concerned with the promotion and facilitation of international travel were noted by the Commission on the basis of a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/123 & Add.1).

The Commission also considered the Secretary-General's report on passports and frontier formalities, setting out developments in 1951-52, in particular with regard to the implementation of the recommendations of the 1947 Meeting of Experts on Passports and Frontier Formalities (E/CN.2/124 & Corr.1 & Add.1).

The Commission requested the Secretary-General to follow progress in this field, and, in his opinion it should be desirable, to address an inquiry to Member Governments, and to report results to the Commission. It was also decided to circulate the standard visa format—recommended by the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), with a view to facilitating the movement of persons by international air transport—to all Member States, requesting their views concerning its application to international travel by all means of transport. With regard to another ICAO proposal that the United Nations publish periodically a booklet setting out visa requirements of States, the Commission decided that it would not be feasible to undertake this.

b. CUSTOMS FORMALITIES FOR TOURING

The Commission had before it, at its sixth session, a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/135 & Corr.1, 2 & Add.1, 2 & 3) containing documents which had been circulated to governments in accordance with Council resolution 379 D (XIII)⁴³ and the comments received.

⁴² See Y.U.N., 1950, pp. 490-91.

⁴³ See Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 439-40.

The documents circulated included the draft International Customs Convention on Touring prepared under the auspices of ECE, together with the proposals submitted jointly by the World Touring and Automobile Organization (OTA) and the International Union of Official Travel Organizations (IUOTO). A draft World Wide Convention on Tourism prepared by the Government of the United Kingdom was circulated separately.

The comments received from governments concerned the desirability of concluding international conventions on customs formalities for: (1) the temporary importation of private vehicles and their equipment; and (2) tourism (i.e., the personal effects of tourists travelling by any means of transport), and on the suitability of the drafts mentioned above as a basis of discussion for concluding such conventions.

The Commission proposed a draft resolution which was adopted with certain changes by the Council. Thus, the Council's Economic Committee, by a vote of 13 to 1, with 3 abstentions, adopted a proposal that the suggested conference on customs formalities should meet in Geneva rather than at United Nations Headquarters. An Egyptian oral proposal to extend invitations to the conference to territories which were not fully responsible for their foreign relations but were self-governing in the field covered by the conference's terms of reference was adopted in the Economic Committee by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, and by the same vote by the Council. The revised draft resolution was adopted in the Economic Committee (E/2402) at its 126th meeting on 7 April by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, and by the Council by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions on 15 April.

The resolution adopted by the Council (468 F (XV)) instructed the Secretary-General to convene as early as possible in 1954, and preferably in Geneva, a conference of governments for the conclusion on a world-wide basis of two conventions relating to customs formalities, namely: for the temporary importation of private road motor vehicles carrying persons and their equipment and for tourism (i.e., personal effects of tourists travelling by any means of transport).

By the same resolution, the Council decided that all States Members of the United Nations or any of the specialized agencies should be invited to participate in the conference, that the specialized agencies, intergovernmental organizations and international organizations in this field, as may be appropriate, be invited to send observers to the conference, and that territories, which are not fully responsible for their foreign relations, but which are self-governing in the fields covered by the terms of reference of the conference, should be invited to attend the conference without the right to vote.

c. BARRIERS TO THE INTERNATIONAL TRANSPORT OF GOODS

The Secretary-General submitted to the Transport and Communications Commission a report (E/CN.2/129) on action on the question of barriers to the international transport of goods taken by the following: the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), ECE, ICAO, WHO and the International Air Transport Association (IATA).

On the basis of the Secretary-General's report, the Commission, at its sixth session, noted with satisfaction the adoption by the Contracting Parties to GATT, at their seventh session in Geneva from 2 October to 10 November 1952, of two codes of standard practices, one relative to documentary requirements for the importation of goods, and the other to consular formalities. The governments were asked to report on the steps taken to bring their own practices into conformity with the two codes of standard practices.

The Commission decided that the question could be removed from its agenda in view of the action taken by GATT. At the same time it noted the action taken on the European regional basis through the adoption at Geneva on 10 January 1952 of the International Convention to Facilitate the Crossing of Frontiers for Goods Carried by Rail, prepared by ECE.

4. Transport of Dangerous Goods

The Commission considered a report (E/CN.2/126 & Corr.1 & Add.1, 2 & 3) prepared by the Secretary-General pursuant to Council resolution 379 E (XIII)⁴⁴ on the various aspects of the problem of the transport of dangerous goods, with a view to determining which of these aspects were appropriate for uniform, or approximately uniform, regulations with respect to the various means of transport.

The Secretary-General's report, among other things, analysed comments by various organizations on this question and made a number of suggestions regarding further action. The Secretary-General suggested that the first two aspects of the problem to receive priority should be:

(1) definition and classification of dangerous goods, determination of those which are to be excluded from (or restricted to certain types of) carriage and methods and extent of listing; and

(2) aspects related to preparation of the consignment for shipment.

The Commission made a recommendation which recognized that the greatest possible uniformity was required in the regulations for the safe transport of dangerous goods and considered that the first step should be to prepare draft regulations to meet certain problems common to all forms of transport and which might be given uniform treatment with the least possible impact on existing practices.

During a discussion of the question in the Economic Committee, the representative of the United Kingdom suggested that the work of the experts—who were proposed to be appointed to study the matter—would be more productive if the differences of opinion between governments could be settled as far as possible before the experts met. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Secretariat would give full consideration to the matter before a meeting of the experts took place.

A draft resolution on the question, prepared by the Commission, was adopted by the Economic Committee at its 126th meeting on 7 April by 16 votes to 2 (E/2402), and by the Council, at its 687th plenary meeting on 15 April, by the same vote.

By this resolution (468 G (XV)), the Secretary-General was requested to appoint a committee of not more than nine qualified experts from countries having a substantial interest in the international transport of dangerous goods, whose principal task would be to make a study and present to the Commission a report which, taking account of existing practices, procedures and usage, would recommend and define groupings or classification of dangerous goods on the basis of the character of risk involved, list and classify the principal dangerous goods, recommend marks or labels to identify the risk graphically and without regard to printed text, and recommend the simplest possible requirements for shipping papers. The Secretary-General was also authorized to invite appropriate international organizations to participate in the work of the Committee in a consultative capacity.

5. Problems in the Field of Shipping

a. SITUATION WITH RESPECT TO RATIFICATION OF THE CONVENTION ON THE INTER-GOVERNMENTAL MARITIME CONSULTATIVE ORGANIZATION (IMCO)

The Commission at its sixth session considered the Secretary-General's report on the situation with respect to ratification of the Convention (E/CN.2/128 & Corr.1). Eleven countries at that time had ratified the Convention, six of which had more than a million gross tons of shipping each, whereas 21 parties to the Convention are required to bring it into force, of which seven must each have not less than a million gross tons of shipping. In response to an inquiry to governments which had not thus far ratified the Convention, the Secretary-General had received information that a number of them had the matter under consideration.

A resolution on the question was prepared by the Commission and adopted by the Economic Committee at its 125th meeting on 6 April by 11 votes to none, with 7 abstentions (E/2402), and by the Council, at its 687th plenary meeting on 15 April, by 13 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

According to the resolution (468 C (XV)), the Secretary-General was instructed to pursue, with those governments that had not yet replied to his previous communication, the inquiry concerning their steps to ratify the Convention and to continue his efforts to secure the entry into force of the Convention. It also invited those States which had accepted the Convention to consider what measures might be taken with a view to hastening the bringing into being of the organization.

On the initiative of the United Kingdom Government, representatives of the fourteen governments which have accepted the Convention met in London on 27 and 28 October 1953. They agreed to recommend that their governments continue to endeavour to obtain further acceptances. They also agreed to request the Secretary-General to send copies of the report of their meeting to all governments eligible to join IMCO and to place this report before the Economic and Social Council. The report drew attention to a number of specific reasons why the establishment of IMCO was considered to be urgently required.

At the end of 1953 fourteen countries had ratified the Convention.⁴⁵

⁴⁵ See Part Two of this Yearbook, under Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization.

b. UNIFICATION OF MARITIME TONNAGE MEASUREMENT

After noting a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/141), reviewing developments on the unification of maritime tonnage measurements, explaining that rules were under study by professional bodies in various countries and describing a meeting of experts held at The Hague in June 1952, the Commission, at its sixth session, refrained from action, pending the coming into being of IMCO.

In his report, the Secretary-General stated that a third meeting of tonnage experts was held at The Hague in June 1952. The aim of this meeting, like that of the earlier ones held at Oslo in April 1948 and Stockholm in June 1950, was to ensure uniform application and interpretation of the "International Regulations for Tonnage Measurement of Ships", drawn up under the auspices of the League of Nations in 1939, and adopted by the above-mentioned Oslo Conference. It was found at the meeting that the Oslo Convention, which contains the above regulations, had been ratified by only three signatories, Iceland, Norway and the Netherlands, and that only the Netherlands had put it into effect. It was decided that the next meeting of experts should be held at Paris in 1954. It was also noted in the report of the Secretary-General that the rules of maritime tonnage measurements were under study by such professional bodies as the International Standards Committee of the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers in New York and the Institution of Naval Architects in the United Kingdom.

c. POLLUTION OF SEA WATER

The Commission, at its sixth session, noted the Secretary-General's report on the pollution of sea water (E/CN.2/134 & Corr.1 & Add. 1 & 2).

The report indicated that 31 governments had so far replied to inquiries by the Secretary-General on the question. The replies contained information on studies undertaken; listed the extent of pollution; indicated the damage caused by pollution (damage to birds; damage to plant life; damage to fisheries, fish and shellfish; damage to beaches; danger to ports (danger of fire)); explained causes of pollution and conditions under which it takes place; listed possible remedies for pollution (separators on ships, facilities on barges or ashore for the discharge of polluted water, possibilities of treating oil sludge by physical or chemical processes and limiting the spread of oil discharged at sea); indicated the need for international regulation; and summarized action that had already been taken at the international or national level.

The Council discussed the question on the basis of a draft resolution proposed by the Commission. In the Economic Committee the representatives of the United Kingdom and Sweden stated that their governments were then studying the question of pollution of sea water. The representative of the United Kingdom expressed the hope that his country would be represented on the committee of experts being planned to study the matter. The representative of Sweden felt that the only way to achieve tangible results would be to convene an international conference on the question. The Swedish representative, with certain reservations, in particular regarding the provision relating to IMCO (see below), and the French representative expressed support for the draft resolution.

That part of the draft resolution concerning expenses to be covered out of the regular budget of the United Nations was adopted by the Economic Committee at its 125th meeting on 6 April, by 13 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions, and by the Council by 16 votes to 2. The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by both the Committee (E/2402) on 6 April and by the Council, at its 687th plenary meeting on 15 April, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

By the resolution (468 B (XV)), the Council authorized the Secretary-General to request Governments of Member States interested in the matter, at their own expense, to make available to him experts in this field, who would correlate the studies and other communications submitted by interested governments and draw such conclusions as might be appropriate for transmittal to IMCO when that organization became active, provided: that at least three governments were prepared to follow this course and that the Secretary-General would be authorized to cover some or all of the expense involved out of the regular budget of the United Nations if he found the expense could be covered under present budgetary appropriations.

Subsequently, the United Kingdom Government, in view of the increasing seriousness of the pollution problem and following consideration of the recommendations in a Report to the British Minister of Transport by the Committee on the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil, dated 2 July 1953, issued invitations to the major maritime Powers to attend an ad hoc diplomatic conference in London opening on 26 April 1954.

The United Nations was invited to send an observer and make available the information on the subject furnished by the various governments.

6. Co-ordination of Activities of the Specialized Agencies in the Field of Transport and Communications

The Commission, at its sixth session, took note of a report prepared by the Secretary-General (E/CN.2/127 & Corr.1, 2), surveying the activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies in the field of transport and communications with particular regard to the co-ordination of such activities.

In summarizing the co-ordination of activities relating to subjects of direct interest to the Transport and Communications Commission the report dealt with: international transport; international communications; application of meteorology; co-ordination of statistical activities concerning transport and communications; and co-ordination of activities in the fields of aviation, shipping, telecommunication and meteorology in regard to safety at sea and in the air. In dealing with co-ordination of activities relating to subjects of indirect interest to the Commission, the Secretary-General briefly described the following:

- (1) The Expanded Programme of technical assistance for economic development of under-developed countries;
- (2) conditions of employment in international transport;
- (3) application of telecommunications—improving international understanding;
- (4) United Nations research laboratories;
- (5) co-ordination of cartographic activities;
- (6) inter-agency service privileges; and
- (7) fiscal matters.

7. Implementation of the Decisions of the Atlantic City Telecommunication Conferences of 1947

The report of the Secretary-General on the implementation of the decisions of the Atlantic City Telecommunication Conferences of 1947 (E/CN.2/130 & Corr.1 & Add.1) informed the Commission that the Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference, held at Geneva from 16 August to 3 December 1951, had concluded an "Agreement for the preparation and adoption of the new international frequency list for the various services in the bands between 14 kc/s and 27,500 kc/s with a view to bringing into force the Atlantic City table of frequency allocations". The International Plenipotentiary Telecommunication Conference, held at Buenos Aires from 3 October to 22 December 1952, confirmed the validity of this agreement. The Commission decided to remove this matter from its agenda.

8. Discrimination in Transport Insurance

The Transport and Communications Commission had before it a report of the Secretary-General on discrimination in transport insurance (E/CN.2/139 & Corr.1) which summarized available information on this question. One section defined discrimination, referred to the extent to which restrictions in transport insurance were being applied, and cited the impact of discriminatory practices on international trade. Another section noted the provisions concerning discrimination in various recent international conventions and agreements dealing with commerce and transportation (Havana Charter for an International Trade Organization (Havana, 1948), Convention on the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (Geneva, 1948), and the Economic Agreement of Bogota (1948)). A third section dealt with action by international organizations including intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations. Another section dealt with a possible approach of the Transport and Communications Commission to this subject. Here, the following various categories of discrimination were examined and various courses of action were suggested:

- (1) laws and regulations which provide for the insurance of goods in international trade to be effected in the domestic insurance market, including provisions to that effect in commercial treaties;
- (2) discriminatory taxation;
- (3) discrimination practised through the control of foreign exchange; and
- (4) practices designed to discourage the admission of foreign insurance companies.

During the discussion of this question in the Economic Committee, the representative of Argentina took exception to that part of the report of the Secretary-General which stated that Argentina applied discriminatory laws in marine insurance. He denied that Argentine laws resulted in higher cost of marine insurance or that these costs were passed to the ultimate consumer and constituted a serious impediment to international trade. He then explained in detail the system existing in Argentina.

The representative of Venezuela, while stating that he would vote for the draft resolution concerning transport insurance proposed by the Commission which was before the Committee, pointed out that in Venezuela aliens enjoyed the same rights as nationals in matters of transport insurance. The insertion in every future commercial treaty of a clause designed to prevent discrimination could be dangerous, he felt, since the term "discrimination" might give rise to confusion.

The representative of the United States declared that his Government was already endeavouring to include in its commercial treaties with other countries a provision designed to prevent the discrimination referred to in the draft resolution.

The draft resolution proposed by the Commission was adopted in parts by varying votes and, as a whole, by 12 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions, by the Economic Committee (E/2402) at its 126th meeting on 7 April.

The USSR representative said that he had voted against the draft because its implementation would require amendments to domestic legislation on transport insurance and therefore constitute an interference in the domestic affairs of States.

The Council considered an Argentine amendment (E/L.492) which had the effect of providing that anti-discrimination clauses regarding transport insurance should only be inserted in future commercial treaties when the economic progress of under-developed countries would not be affected thereby. However, by 12 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions, it adopted a proposal, made orally by the French representative and accepted by Argentina, to delete altogether the provision concerned with commercial treaties.

The amended draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 13 votes to 2, with 1 abstention, at the 689th plenary meeting on 16 April.

By this resolution (468 H (XV)), the Council decided to bring the Secretary-General's study (E/CN.2/139 & Corr.1) to the attention of governments. It also instructed the Secretary-General to bring to the notice of the Contracting Parties to GATT the relevant resolutions of the Council and of the Commission, and the Secretary-General's study for possible action; to bring them to the notice of the International Monetary Fund with a view to examination by that organization of the possibility of achieving relaxation of exchange controls as applied to transport insurance; and to advise the Commission at its next session of the progress made in this matter.

The representative of the Fund said that only after the extent and significance of the restriction referred to in the resolution had been explored would it be possible to determine the degree of priority treatment justified for them. The Fund hoped to be able to report to the Transport and Communications Commission at its next session.

9. Application of Certain Non-Governmental Organizations for Consultative Status

As requested by Council resolution 453 (XIV),⁴⁶ the Commission, at its sixth session, considered the application for consultative status in category B of the International Automotive Institute. The Commission, having noted that this organization had requested postponement of the consideration of its request (E/CN.2/137) and having noted the available information concerning the organization, decided not to recommend the granting of consultative status to this organization.

The Council, in voting on applications and reapplications for consultative status⁴⁷ acted in accordance with the recommendation of the Com-

10. Priority Programme of Work

The Transport and Communications Commission, at its sixth session, recommended a list of projects in the transport and communications field, divided into the three following groups of priority:

(1) continuing projects of high priority (for example, review of developments in the field of international road transport with particular reference to international action required at the world-wide level to supplement the Convention on Road Traffic; and progress in implementation of recommendations of the Meeting of Experts on Passports and Frontier Formalities);

(2) ad hoc projects of first priority (for example, uniform system of road signs and signals; and uniform regulations for the licensing of motor vehicle drivers); and

(3) projects of lower priority which might be deferred (for example, study on co-ordination of inland transport).

This question was considered by the Council's Economic Committee at its 126th meeting on 7 April and by the Council at its 687th plenary meeting on 15 April. In both the Economic Committee and in the Council's plenary meeting, the USSR representative stated that, in the absence of information on the financial implications of the draft resolution concerning the priority programme, he would be obliged to vote against it.

⁴⁶ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 550-51.

⁴⁷ See pp. 503-504.

The draft resolution on this question was adopted by the Economic Committee (E/2402) and by the Council by the same vote—16 votes to 2. The resolution (468 I (XV)) approved the list of priorities included in the report of the Commission (A/2363).

H. FISCAL QUESTIONS

At its fourth session, from 27 April to 8 May 1953, the Fiscal Commission discussed a series of substantive fiscal problems which had been brought before it under the following items of the agenda: (1) international tax problems, especially the problem of fiscal incentives to increase the international flow of private capital for the economic development of under-developed countries, (2) world tax service, (3) taxation of agriculture, (4) government finance and economic development, (5) government financial reporting, (6) public finance information service and (7) problems of municipal finance.

The Commission adopted a report on its session (E/2429) by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. The report, besides reviewing the discussions at the meetings, contained a request for studies to be undertaken by the Secretariat in a certain order of priority, as well as three draft resolutions on international tax problems, government financial reporting and public finance information service.

The Economic and Social Council considered this report during its sixteenth session, at the 131st and 132nd meetings of its Economic Committee, on 6 and 7 July 1953, and at its 710th to 712th and 719th plenary meetings, on 3, 4 and 9 July 1953. The Council on 4 and 7 July adopted resolution 486(XVI) which, in part A, took note of the report of the Commission and, in part B, approved, with certain modifications, the draft resolution of the Commission concerning international tax problems recommended in the report. In parts C and D of the same resolution, the Council adopted without modifications the draft resolutions recommended by the Commission on government financial reporting and public finance information service. In part E, the Council approved the programme of work proposed by the Commission in its report. An account of the principal studies proposed and recommendations made is given below.

1. International Tax Problems

For the consideration of the problem of taxation of foreign investment the Commission had before it the study Taxation in Capital-Exporting and Capital-Importing Countries of Foreign Private Investment in Latin America—United States Income Taxation of Private United States Investment in Latin America,⁴⁸ prepared by the Secretary-General in response to resolution 378 I 2 (b) (XIII)⁴⁹ of the Economic and Social Council, adopted upon the recommendation of the Fiscal Commission at its third session. This was the first in a series of studies designed to inquire into the impact of tax measures, in capital-exporting countries to Latin America and in selected Latin American countries, on the flow of foreign investment.

The Fiscal Commission also had before it a special request embodied in Council resolution 416 D (XIV) requesting the Commission to examine further the proposal that, through bilateral agreements or unilateral measures, income from foreign investments in under-developed countries should be taxed only in these countries, with such income being exempted from taxes in the capital-exporting countries; and to submit the results of such examination to the Council in a special section of its next report. The Fiscal Commission discussed this problem and established a working group on international tax problems to seek a reconciliation of the views expressed by its members. Upon the proposal of the working group, the Commission recommended for adoption by the Council draft resolution B on "Fiscal Incentives to Increase the International Flow of Private Capital for the Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries".

The operative part would have the Council: (1) reaffirm that the country in which income arises has as a general principle an undoubted right to tax that income; and (2) recommend that the highly developed countries, acting unilaterally or through bilateral tax agreements, give sympathetic consideration to the feasibility of taxing income from investments in under-developed countries only or primarily in the country in which the income was produced.

Furthermore, in its resolution on the programme of work of the Secretariat, the Commission requested as an ad hoc project in the first priority category the continuation of the study on the effects of taxation on foreign investment, especially in under-developed countries, in the light of this draft resolution.

⁴⁹ See Y.U.N., 1952, p. 413.

The Council in considering the Fiscal Commission's draft resolution B also had before it a draft resolution by Cuba (E/L.510) which would have the Council:

(1) declare that income from foreign investments in under-developed countries should be taxed only in those countries; and

(2) recommend that highly developed countries, in carrying out their policy of concluding bilateral fiscal agreements with under-developed countries, stipulate that the income of their residents from investments in the other country would be taxed only in the country where such income was produced.

A series of amendments (E/L.515 & Corr.1) to this proposal were presented by Argentina which were designed primarily to broaden the application of the draft resolution.

Representatives of the more highly developed countries, however, expressed their preference for the draft resolution proposed by the Fiscal Commission, which was subsequently adopted. They were not prepared to approve an outright recommendation of complete tax exemption for income from foreign investment in the capital-exporting countries. Among the reasons put forward by these representatives was that the inducements proposed in the Cuban draft resolution might not be effective in view of the other important influences affecting the international movement of capital. Such exemption, moreover, would seriously discriminate against domestic investment, which was also of importance to the highly developed countries, and might thus lead in some of them to the adoption of measures restricting capital exports. The representative of the United States explained that his country was in the process of re-examining its entire tax structure—including consideration of new incentives to foreign investment—pending which it would not be possible to support the Cuban draft resolution.

The representatives of Argentina, Cuba, Uruguay and Venezuela, among others, stressed the importance of providing incentives for private investments in the under-developed countries. One of these incentives, they held, consisted in the relatively lower tax rates prevailing in the under-developed countries, so long as their purpose was not defeated by the imposition of further taxes in the countries from which such investment capital was derived.

The representative of Argentina sought to have this idea included (E/L.517 & Corr.1) in a new text for paragraph V of the preamble to the draft resolution proposed by the Fiscal Commission. However, in the interest of unanimity, he subsequently withdrew the amendment and joined with the representatives of Cuba, Egypt, the Philippines, Uruguay and Venezuela in proposing (E/AC.6/L.62) a minor rewording of the same paragraph. However, the sponsors of the joint amendment later agreed to a United States oral amendment which would include a reference to the comparative study of the taxation of foreign investment in capital-exporting countries and under-developed countries.

The paragraph, as thus reworded, was adopted (for text, see below, para. (c)), at the Economic Committee's 132nd meeting on 7 July, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

It was generally agreed that further study was needed on the influence of taxation on international investment and that the Council should note that the Fiscal Commission planned to continue to study the problem, reporting to the Council after its next meeting. Amendments to this effect were proposed by Argentina (E/L.517 & Corr.1), the United States (E/L.520) and jointly by Argentina, Cuba, Uruguay and Venezuela (E/AC.6/L.61). On the basis of a joint amendment by Argentina, Cuba, Egypt, the Philippines, Uruguay and Venezuela (E/AC.6/L.62), the following action was taken:

(1) An additional paragraph (f) (for text, see below) was adopted by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, following the acceptance of a Swedish oral amendment adding a reference to practical recommendations which might emerge from this continued study and analysis.

(2) The first operative paragraph of draft resolution B (see above) was deleted and a new paragraph adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (for text, see below).

The second operative paragraph proposed by the Fiscal Commission (see above) was redrafted with minor changes on the basis of suggestions by (1) Australia (E/L.518), (2) Argentina, Cuba, Egypt, the Philippines, Uruguay and Venezuela (E/AC.6/L.62) and (3) China (orally), and was adopted by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

Draft resolution B, as proposed by the Fiscal Commission, was adopted, as amended, as a whole, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, by the Economic Committee (E/2478), and by the Council, by the same vote, at its 719th plenary meeting on 9 July 1953. Resolution 486 B (XVI) read:

Fiscal incentives to increase the international flow of private capital for the economic development of under-developed countries

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Recognizing:

"(a) The great importance of finding means to stimulate the flow of private investment from the highly developed to the under-developed countries, in order to accelerate the economic development of the latter,

"(b) That the present flow of capital exported to the under-developed countries is insufficient for their development needs,

"(c) That relatively lower taxation in force in the under-developed countries, as compared with capital exporting countries, is one of the attractions that under-developed countries may be in a position to offer to foreign capital as an incentive to investment,

"(d) That this incentive becomes less effective—although international double taxation is avoided—if the capital-exporting countries apply to the income from investments in under-developed countries any further taxation beyond that already paid in the latter,

"(e) That favourable tax treatment is one of the many factors affecting the flow of foreign capital,

"(f) That further analysis and factual study of the problem referred to in paragraph (J) above is needed, together with such practical recommendations as may emerge from this further study and analysis,

"1. Notes that the Fiscal Commission plans to continue its study of the problem referred to in paragraph (d) above and anticipates a report on the results of its further studies to the Council after the next meeting of the Commission;

"2. Recommends, meanwhile, that the highly developed countries, acting unilaterally or when concluding tax agreements, should give special consideration to the feasibility of taking action to ensure that such income is taxable only or primarily in the country in which the income was produced."

Accordingly, the Secretary-General continued his research on the effects of taxation on foreign investment. A study "Taxation of Foreign Investment in Mexico" (E/CN.8/69/Add.2) was distributed in 1953 in the series "Taxation in Capital-Exporting and Capital-Importing Countries of Foreign Private Investment in Latin America". Similar country studies were initiated or contemplated during the year, in preparation for a study attempting to analyse the potentialities of tax exemption in capital-exporting countries as an incentive to the flow of private investment capital to under-developed countries. Thus, studies on Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Canada and Chile were in preparation; studies on the Netherlands and Switzerland and on Ecuador, Peru and Uruguay were contemplated. Within its programme of co-operation with the United Nations (see below "World Tax Service"), Harvard University undertook studies on Colombia, Cuba, Venezuela, France, Sweden, the United Kingdom, as well as enquiries among United States investment circles.

Further, in the field of international tax problems, the Fiscal Commission discussed the problems of taxation of corporate profits and dividends and the taxation of foreign nationals, residents, income, assets and transactions. For the consideration of these subjects the Commission had before it a progress report on "Corporate Tax Problems" (E/CN.8/66), with a series of country studies (E/CN.8/66/Add.1 to 7; the countries covered were Argentina, Belgium, Canada, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United Kingdom), and the comparative country studies on "Taxation of Foreign Taxpayers and Foreign Income" (E/CN.8/68/Add.1 to 4; the countries covered were Argentina, Canada, Israel and New Zealand).⁵⁰ In its resolution on the programme of work of the Secretariat, the Commission requested the continuation of studies on the taxation of foreign taxpayers and foreign income and the methods of relief from international double taxation, as well as of the study "Corporate Tax Problems." In response to these requests, the Secretary-General undertook to prepare a number of additional country studies in both series. In the former, country studies on Belgium and the United States were undertaken, and additional studies on France, Sweden and the United Kingdom were planned; in the latter, country studies on Egypt, India and the United States were undertaken. On the basis of this material, it is intended to prepare ultimately a comparative examination of the types of provisions in laws and agreements which govern taxation of incomes derived from international business activities.

During 1953, the Secretary-General also continued to publish and distribute the replies received from Member Governments to his questionnaire on the "Taxation of Foreign Nationals, Assets and Transactions" (E/CN.8/W.19) issued on 13 September 1948.

In its resolution on the programme of work of the Secretariat, the Commission gave high priority to the continuation of the series International Tax Agreements. Volume IV in this series was prepared during 1953 for publication in the spring of 1954. This volume contains the texts of international tax agreements signed since 1951 and brings up to date the tables on the present status of tax agreements published in Volume III, World Guide to International Tax Agreements, 1843-1951.⁵¹

2. World Tax Service

The Commission took note of the progress which had been made since its last session in the establishment of a world tax service with the possible co-operation of universities. It was informed that the first university to offer its participation in this project was Harvard University of Cambridge, Massachusetts, U.S.A.⁵² and that a programme of research was being established by Harvard University in co-operation with the Secretary-General. The Commission expressed the hope that other universities might offer their co-operation. In its resolution on the programme of work, it urged the implementation of this project. Under Council resolution 226 B 2 (IX), Harvard University has co-operated with the Secretary-General on the study on taxation, in capital-exporting and capital-importing countries, of foreign private investment in Latin America and on the study of fiscal problems of agriculture. Harvard University has also established a special training programme for tax administrators from under-developed countries under United Nations fellowships and scholarships.

3. Taxation of Agriculture

The Commission discussed the section on taxation policies in the Secretary-General's report on Land Reform⁵³ and was informed of the programme of research established and the work already undertaken jointly by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) and the United Nations on the tax burdens of agriculture, in accordance with Council resolution 378 I 2 (c) (XIII).⁵⁴ The Commission reviewed some of the problems raised by the taxation of agriculture, and requested that further studies include consideration of methods of assessing agricultural income and of the problems of commercial plantations and rural co-operatives.

An international conference of experts on the taxation of agriculture was arranged for early 1954 as part of Harvard University's programme of co-operation with the United Nations. Its purpose would be to examine the present state of knowledge in this field and to develop guide-lines for the direction and methods of further research. The United Nations Secretariat prepared working papers for this conference on the structure and yield of the principal types of taxes levied on agriculture in different countries. Furthermore, within the programme of co-operation with FAO, two papers were prepared on "The Operation of the Land Tax in India and Pakistan" and on "Taxation of Agriculture in Under-Developed Countries."⁵⁵

4. Government Finance and Economic Development

The Commission reviewed the activities of the Secretariat in providing technical assistance to under-developed countries. It was informed that, since its last session, United Nations missions in the fiscal field were operating in Afghanistan, Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Libya and Paraguay. Experts in the field of banking and credit were sent to Haiti and to Pakistan. Over the same period, 116 United Nations fellowships and scholarships were awarded in the field of public finance and money and banking (E/CN.8/72). The Commission also had for its information the "Report on the Technical Assistance Conference on Comparative Fiscal Administration" held in Geneva from 16 to 25 July 1951 (ST/TAA/M/3—E/CN.8/67).⁵⁶

The Commission discussed some of the issues encountered in rendering technical assistance in the field of public finance. Various members emphasized their belief in the great importance of the technical assistance programme. In its resolution on the programme of work and priorities, the Commission gave first priority to technical assistance to Member Governments at their request.

As part of the technical assistance programme, a workshop on budgetary classification and management was held in Mexico City from 3 to 11 September 1953 under the auspices of the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration, the secretariat of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the United Nations Fiscal Division. The purpose of this workshop was to bring together budget officials from the republics of Central America, the Caribbean area, Mexico and the United States, in order to discuss budget management and classification requirements for the conduct of fiscal policy and the formulation and implementation of government economic development programmes. The bases of discussion of the workshop consisted of a preliminary draft of the "Manual for the Classification of Government Accounts", prepared by the Secretariat in response to technical assistance requirements (General Assembly resolution 407(V)), two earlier studies, Budgetary Structure and Classification of Govern-

A revised and expanded version of this report was scheduled to be published early in 1954 as a printed volume entitled "Taxes, Fiscal Policy and Economic Development, a Report on Technical Assistance Experience, with Special Reference to Field Missions and to the Technical Assistance Conference on Comparative Fiscal Administration (16-25 July 1951)".

ment Accounts⁵⁷ and Government Accounting and Budget Execution⁵⁸ and several case studies prepared by the participants illustrating the application of new budget classification methods in their countries. A report on this workshop was scheduled for early in 1954.

5. Government Financial Reporting

The Commission had before it the study Government Accounting and Budget Execution prepared by the Secretary-General in response to Council resolution 378 D (XIII), adopted on the recommendation of the Fiscal Commission at its third session.

The Commission, after considering the study, recommended, in draft resolution C, that the Council take note of the study and commend it as a contribution towards the improvement of government accounting and budget procedures. This draft resolution was adopted by the Council at its 712th plenary meeting on 4 July, by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, without modifications, as resolution 486 C (XVI).

6. Public Finance Information Service

The Fiscal Commission considered the following documents submitted by the Secretary-General under this item of the agenda: the Public Finance Survey of India (ST/ECA/SER.B/2),⁵⁹ the Public Finance Information Paper on Peru (ST/ECA/SER.A/6),⁶⁰ the Review of Fiscal Developments 1951-1952 (E/CN.8/74),⁶¹ the periodic public finance data published in the International Monetary Fund's International Financial Statistics (based on a joint United Nations-International Monetary Fund questionnaire), and the public finance chapter contained in the Statistical Yearbook of the United Nations for 1951 and 1952.⁶² The Commission was also informed of the exploratory work done by the Secretary-General for the proposed volume "Public Finance Statistics 1938-1952."

Upon the Commission's recommendation, the Council at its 712th plenary meeting on 4 July, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, adopted resolution 486 D (XVI), recommending that the work of the Secretariats of the United Nations and the International Monetary Fund in preparing and publishing comparable public finance statistics be accelerated in so far as possible. It further recommended that the work of the projected special volume "Public Finance Statistics 1938-1952" be continued and that the "Manual on the Classification of Government Accounts" be distributed to Member Governments in draft form for their information and comments. Finally, the Council recommended that a questionnaire designed to obtain better public finance data be drafted and distributed to Member States for their comments.

The Commission also recommended the preparation of regional and country public finance surveys upon request of the regional commissions or when needed for technical assistance purposes. Special interest was expressed in the preparation of a public finance survey of Pakistan. Furthermore, the Commission requested the preparation of a review of fiscal developments in 1953-54.

I. STATISTICAL QUESTIONS

The Economic and Social Council at its fifteenth session had before it the report of the seventh session of the Statistical Commission (E/2365), held from 2 to 13 February 1953. This report covered important developments in the work of the Commission since May 1951 (there being no session in 1952) relating to: (1) principles of statistics of external trade; (2) development of national accounts; (3) concepts and definitions of capital formation; (4) construction of price and quantity indexes in national accounting; (5) definitions in basic industrial statistics; (6) principles for vital statistics; (7) recommendations for migration statistics; and (8) the fifth session of the Sub-Commission on Statistical Sampling.

The Council discussed the Commission's report at the 126th and 129th meetings of its Economic Committee, on 7 and 17 April, and at its 702nd plenary meeting on 27 April 1953. In resolution 469 A (XV), adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, the Council noted with satisfaction the report of the Commission. It also adopted four resolutions suggested by the Commission concerning the use of transaction value in external trade statistics, definitions in basic industrial statistics, principles for vital statistics and recommendations for migration statistics. The action taken on the various items is given below.

1. Improvement of National Statistics

A comprehensive summary (E/CN.3/148) was presented to the Commission containing a general description of the current position, recent developments and outstanding problems in international and national statistics. Emphasis was also laid on the need for continued efforts to improve the quality of statistics both at national and international levels.

The Commission commented favourably on the fact that, in the last four years, more than 30 countries had produced for the first time centrally prepared current statistical bulletins which were, in themselves, the Commission stressed, a method of effecting closer co-ordination in statistics within a country and of contributing to the wider usefulness of national statistics.

The Commission noted with satisfaction the increase in the number of statistical series currently available throughout the world and the marked improvement in their quality and comparability. This would appear to indicate, the Commission considered, that its efforts to promote the improvement of national statistics were having effective results.

Nevertheless, the Commission emphasized, prime responsibility for the progress of statistical development in any country must be borne mainly by the national organs. The carrying out of this responsibility depends in large measure on the continued improvement in the professional status of statisticians, and the Commission stressed the importance of international assistance in improving basic statistical training. It recommended that such assistance could best be given by manuals, national and regional training centres, additional facilities for education and training abroad.

Technical manuals on statistical methods and procedures for use by national technicians were being compiled by the Statistical Office in the fields of population censuses, statistical organization, national income (including capital formation), price statistics, trade statistics and vital statistics. During the year a manual entitled *Industrial Census and Related Enquiries*⁶³ was published.

Training centres were established in widely scattered areas. During March 1953 the first seminar in the five-year training programme, organized by the Inter-American Centre for Bio-statistics, opened in Santiago, Chile. The training provides for a six-month series of lectures and three months of practical training in governmental statistical demonstration centres. Thirty-three full-time students and five part-time students from sixteen Latin American countries participated in 1953.

In Cairo, the International Training Centre for National Income Statistics opened in January 1953. The Centre is jointly conducted by the Government of Egypt, the Technical Assistance Administration (TAA) and the Statistical Office. In addition to its courses on national income, certain basic courses in general economics and economic statistics are also held.

In January, the Inter-American Seminar on National Income was conducted jointly by the Government of Chile, the Pan American Union, the Inter-American Statistical Institute and the Statistical Office, with the co-operation of the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA). Eighty representatives and observers from nineteen countries, members of the Organization of American States and representatives of international organizations participated in the conference.

Facilities for education and study abroad were provided by the award of 22 fellowships in the field of statistics during 1953 under the technical assistance programme. Under the same programme, statistical experts were provided to a number of countries to assist them either in specific fields of statistics or for the improvement of their statistical services. During the year, experts were assigned to Afghanistan, Burma, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Greece, Haiti, Indonesia, Jamaica (British West Indies), Libya, Nicaragua, North Borneo, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Thailand and Turkey. A total of more than twenty man years of assistance was given in 1953 by 34 statistical experts.

To enable senior government officials to discuss common problems in particular fields of statistics, the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE) and the Statistical Office sponsored the Third Regional Conference of European Statisticians at Geneva in June 1953. The First Conference of National Committees on Vital and Health Statistics took place at London in October 1953 under the auspices of the World Health Organization (WHO) in close collaboration with the United Nations; 66 representatives from 28 countries attended.

2. International Trade Statistics

As a further advance towards achieving comparability in external trade statistics, attention was given to the uniformity of classification of commodities within the items of the Standard International Trade Classification (SITC). For this purpose the Statistical Office published the Commodity Indexes for the Standard International Trade Classification.⁶⁴ These Indexes list approximately 20,000 commodities showing for each the item of the SITC under which it is classified. These commodities are arranged in item order as well as alphabetically, and therefore provide not only a guide to the placing of individual commodities within the SITC but also show the content and definition of each of the 570 items themselves. It is believed that comprehensive use of the Indexes by countries reporting their trade under the SITC format will lead to increasing comparability of classification. The Indexes furthermore have considerably reduced the questions addressed to the Statistical Office from countries which were doubtful whether they had rearranged into the items of the SITC correctly the items appearing in their national classifications. Work was started in 1953 on a French edition of the Commodity Indexes while the Statistical Office co-operated with the Inter-American Statistical Institute in the compilation of a Spanish edition.

A further development in connexion with the SITC was the decision of the Committee on Economic Co-operation in Central America not only to adopt the SITC as the national classification for the five Central American countries but to use it also as a basis of their tariff nomenclatures. A group of experts from the five countries, supported by advisors from the Statistical Office, ECLA and the Inter-American Statistical Institute, adopted the SITC in the preparation of the "Uniform Central American Customs Nomenclature" (E/CN.12/AC.17/25).

A further advance was made on standard definitions and concepts concerning coverage, valuation and analysis of trade-by-country. The Commission endorsed the principal conclusions in the report (E/CN.3/142) of a group of experts which met in 1952 to study these definitions and concepts. Countries were consulted as to their ability progressively to adapt their external trade statistics to the methods and concepts which received the Commission's approval.

The Commission recommended for adoption by the Council a draft resolution (E/2365 B) on the question of the value to be assigned for statistical purposes to goods imported and exported.

The draft resolution was adopted, without change, by the Economic Committee (E/2406 B), at its 129th meeting on 17 April, by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and by the Council at its 702nd plenary meeting on 27 April, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 469 B (XV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Taking note of the work done by the Statistical Commission at its fifth, sixth and seventh sessions, and the comments received from governments and specialized agencies, on the subject of definitions and methods for external trade statistics,

"Taking note that the use of the principle of the "transaction value", as defined in the report of the Statistical Commission (seventh session), would substantially improve the accuracy, usefulness and comparability of external trade statistics for international purposes,

"Recommends that the governments of Member States, wherever possible, follow this principle:

"(a) By using "transaction values" in the compilation of their national statistics of external trade; or,

"(b) Where national practices are based on f.o.b. valuations of imports or other valuations, by endeavouring to provide supplementary statistical data based on this principle."

3. National Income Statistics

a. SYSTEM OF NATIONAL ACCOUNTS

The Commission considered a report, A System of National Accounts and Supporting Tables,⁶⁵ setting out a standard national accounting system for reporting national income statistics. The Commission directed that the report, prepared by an expert committee, should be circulated in order to assist countries who wished to adopt a system of national accounts along the same lines. The Secretary-General was asked to collect comments and information on the experience gained by countries applying the concepts and classifications proposed in the report in order to provide a basis for further recommendations relating to international standards in this field.

Work was continued on the Manual on Methods of Estimating National Income which will include a study of methods assessing the accuracy of the estimates of various components.

b. CONCEPTS AND DEFINITIONS OF CAPITAL FORMATION

The Commission approved concepts, definitions and classifications contained in Concepts and Definitions of Capital Formation⁶⁶ for use by countries in the compilation of statistics of capital formation. Information was requested on the experience of countries in applying the concepts and classifications. The Commission asked that a study on the methods of estimating capital formation should be completed and that estimates received from countries, including the estimates of real income and other statistics relating to economic growth, should be examined.

⁶⁴ U.N.P., Sales No.: 1952.XVII.9.

⁶⁶ U.N.P., Sales No.: 1953.XVII.6.

The Commission recommended that a study on methods of estimating national product and expenditure in constant prices should continue. Accordingly, a paper was prepared, discussing various national estimates in constant prices, theoretical aspects of the subject as well as methods of estimating such totals currently in use.

4. Definitions for Basic Industrial Statistics

The Statistical Commission completed work on the definitions of items of data, and these, together with earlier recommendations on coverage and the items of information to be obtained at specified intervals, were issued as International Standards in Basic Industrial Statistics.⁶⁷

The Commission recommended a draft resolution (E/2365 C), which was adopted, without change, by the Council's Economic Committee (E/2406 C), at its 129th meeting on 17 April, by 14 votes to 2, and by the Council at its 702nd plenary meeting on 27 April, by 16 votes to 2 as resolution 469 C (XV).

By this resolution, the Council recommended that governments at present collecting and publishing basic industrial statistics review their work in the light of the recommendations of the Commission, and also recommended that other governments undertake the collection and publication of such statistics in accordance with the Commission's recommendations, adapting the recommendations where necessary for national purposes.

In addition, basic industrial statistics were incorporated in a comprehensive manual covering all aspects of the planning and conducting of an industrial census. The manual (Industrial Censuses and Related Enquiries)⁶⁸ is in two volumes, one dealing primarily with methods and procedures and the other with summaries of country practices, examples of census questionnaires and recommended forms and tabulation schemes. The manual is regarded as provisional; countries are asked to make comments which will be taken into account when a revised edition is prepared.

5. Vital Statistics

The Council had before it a draft resolution recommended by the Commission (E/2365 D) concerning principles for a vital statistics system. A United Kingdom amendment (E/AC.6/L.54) to provide that the Secretary-General should draw the attention of the countries concerned to the priorities suggested by the Population and Statistical Commissions for the collection of vital statistics was adopted by the Economic Committee, at its 129th meeting on 17 April, by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by the Committee (E/2406 D) by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and by the Council, at its 702nd plenary meeting on 27 April, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

By resolution 469 D (XV), the Council recommended that Governments should give attention to the importance of developing vital statistics to meet demographic, economic, public health and social needs. In the development of these statistics, it suggested that governments review and appraise their procedures for registering vital events and compiling vital statistics, taking into account the Principles for a Vital Statistical System⁶⁹ which the Statistical Commission had approved at its seventh session. The Council also suggested that governments introduce such changes as are feasible to improve national statistics and their international comparability in this field. It requested that the Secretary-General draw the attention of governments to the priorities suggested by the Population and Statistical Commissions for the collection of vital statistics, and emphasize that where a vital registration system was being introduced or extended a sound organization of the registration system should precede any attempt to obtain from it the full range of vital statistics.

6. Migration Statistics

Recommendations for the improvement of international migration statistics, which the Population and Statistical Commissions had developed with the advice of Governments, were approved by the Council in resolution 469 E (XV) and appeared in International Migration Statistics.⁷⁰

The resolution as recommended by the Commission (E/2365 E) and adopted by the Council, by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at the 129th meeting of its Economic Committee (E/-2406 E), and by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at its 702nd plenary meeting, expressed the hope that governments might conclude mutual arrangements for the collection of migration statistics without introducing impediments to the movement of people.

7. Statistical Sampling

The Statistical Commission considered the report (E/CN.3/140) of the fifth and final session of the Sub-Commission on Statistical Sampling and came to the following broad conclusions:

(1) that periodic reports should continue to be made on sample surveys of current interest;

(2) that a report should be compiled bringing together the important recommendations made by the Sub-Commission during its five sessions; and

(3) that assistance should be given to countries wishing to undertake sampling projects, such assistance to include the issuing of technical reports and manuals.

The Commission agreed that there was a need for review and study of the use of sampling methods in promoting the improvement of the quantity and quality of basic statistics especially in the under-developed countries and that an ad hoc committee of experts should be convened for this purpose.

The Statistical Commission recommended that final decisions regarding the studies in statistical sampling to be undertaken by ad hoc groups of experts should be made by the Secretary-General, in consultation with the specialized agencies where necessary, and that in the studies of the subjects already suggested the special needs of under-developed countries and their available resources should be taken into consideration. A fifth report on the Sample Surveys of Current Interest⁷¹ appeared during the year under review.

J. ACTIVITIES OF THE REGIONAL ECONOMIC COMMISSIONS

1. Economic Commission for Europe (ECE)

The Economic Commission for Europe held its eighth session from 3 to 18 March 1953 at Geneva (E/2382, Parts III and IV). Representatives of 24 European countries, the United States and various specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations participated.

8. Collection and Dissemination of Statistical Data

During 1953, the Statistical Office continued the regular collection and publication of data in the fields of external trade, production and prices, transport, national income, population and vital statistics, as well as such other special fields as were required. The data published were obtained from official government sources.

The Statistical Yearbook 1953,⁷² containing principal economic and social series, and the Demographic Yearbook 1953,⁷³ which includes major basic demographic series, were prepared during the year. The Yearbook of International Trade Statistics 1952,⁷⁴ issued in 1953, contains detailed statistics for 70 countries, covering about 97 per cent of world trade; for 25 of these countries (or about 65 per cent of world trade) analysis by commodity of imports and exports is made according to the Standard International Trade Classification (SITC).

The following monthly and quarterly publications containing current statistical information were issued during the year to supplement these yearbooks. The Monthly Bulletin of Statistics contains current statistical series for more than 70 countries; Commodity Trade Statistics (quarterly) gives value of imports and exports classified according to the SITC; Direction of International Trade (cumulative monthly issues with an annual summary), published jointly by the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, contains monthly trade origin and destination figures for about 100 countries; Population and Vital Statistics Reports contains most recently available data of total births and deaths and population totals with mid-year estimates for more than 250 countries and territories; Statistics of National Income and Expenditure (semi-annual) contains current data concerning national income. In addition, Statistical Notes describe current events in international statistics.

Before the Commission were:

(1) Reports from the committees of the Commission on their activities since the closing date of their reports to the seventh session, and an additional Note to those reports by the Executive Secretary concerning the Committees on the Development of Trade, Industry and Materials, and Manpower (E/ECE/153);

(2) a Note by the Executive Secretary on other activities of the Commission and its secretariat, dealing principally with ECE co-operation with the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE) and the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA), the Technical Assistance Administration (TAA), specialized agencies and intergovernmental organizations (E/ECE/154);

(3) a Note by the Executive Secretary on decisions of the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly bearing on ECE (E/ECE/155);

(4) the Commission's programme of work for 1953/54; and

(5) the Economic Survey of Europe since the War (E/ECE/157).

The Commission discussed separately the reports of each committee on its past and planned activities and unanimously adopted resolutions concerning the work of the Committee on Agricultural Problems and of the Coal Committee and on the convening of a Consultation of Trade Experts.

In the first resolution, the Commission stated that certain adjustments in the policies of European countries with regard to agricultural production and trade in agricultural products might materially contribute to the improvement of the economy of Europe and to the welfare of its farmers. It invited the Executive Secretary, in co-operation with the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), to prepare a statement of the problems involved, together with proposals for possible action, for submission to governments for their consideration with a view to ascertaining whether the convening of the Committee on Agricultural Problems before the next session of the Commission would serve a useful purpose.

The second resolution called upon the Coal Committee to give special attention during 1953 to the formulation of practical recommendations with a view to restoring European self-sufficiency in solid fuel and putting an end to dependence on extra-European sources of supply.

The third resolution was adopted following a discussion concerning the Committee on the Development of Trade. All representatives who took part in this discussion reiterated their concern for, and interest in, the development of mutually fruitful commercial relations between countries of Eastern and Western Europe. The resolution approved the proposals (E/ECE/153-H Rev.1) made by the Executive Secretary regarding the Consultation of Trade Experts and invited him to convene it on 13 April 1953.

In connexion with its consideration of the Note by the Executive Secretary on decisions of the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly bearing on the work of ECE, and in the light of certain findings of the Survey, the Commission adopted a resolution stating that the economic development of the less developed countries in Europe, particularly in Southern Europe, could not only promote the welfare of the peoples living in those countries but could also contribute to a general improvement in European economic conditions. It invited the Executive Secretary: (1) to prepare a study of the current possibilities of expanding and accelerating the economic development of the less developed countries in Southern Europe; and (2) to consult with interested governments concerning the possibilities of further action.

a. WORK OF THE SUBSIDIARY BODIES OF THE COMMISSION

(1) Committee on Agricultural Problems

In the absence of an agreed programme of work, the Committee on Agricultural Problems was not convened during 1953 (E/ECE/153-A & E/ECE/177-A).

The Fourth Session of the Working Party on Standardization of Perishable Foodstuffs was held at Geneva in September. Unanimous agreement was reached on proposals for the establishment of European standards regarding seed and ware potatoes, peaches, apricots and plums. Reviewing the work on fruit and vegetables achieved so far, the Working Party came to the conclusion that it was now opportune to ask governments formally to accept, as a common basis for their national regulations and controls, the recommendations included in the "General Provisions" to be applied in Europe for the commercial standardization and quality control of fresh fruit and vegetables moving in international traffic, as adopted the previous year by the Working Party for use on a trial basis. The Working Party further agreed that the "General Provisions" should be incorporated in a draft, which was subsequently prepared. The conditions under which the work of standardization was to be continued and the European standards to be revised periodically were defined. The Working Party also stressed the desirability of enlisting the co-operation of countries which had not previously participated actively in the preparation of standards.

Two papers entitled "Output and Expenses of Agriculture in Some European Countries" (AGRI/42) and "Prices of Agricultural Products and Fertilizers 1952/53" (AGRI/43) were issued by the secretariat for general distribution.

(2) Coal Committee

The Coal Committee held its 27th to 30th sessions in February, May, August and December (E/ECE/153-B & E/ECE/177-B). The work of the Committee was directed towards ensuring that European coal needs are satisfied as economically as possible, that solid fuel should be used rationally and that the coal market should be rendered as stable as possible. In order to follow the market more closely, the Committee instituted half-yearly reviews to ascertain what measures should be taken to reduce the effect of short-term fluctuations. At the same time, the long-term problems of coal in relation to other forms of energy, consumption trends in particular sectors of the economy, and the classification of coal and lignite were also studied, as well as the possibility of improving coal statistics.

In addition to a decline in demand for coal in Western Europe during 1953, competition from other sources of energy such as dark oils, natural gas and hydro-electric power increased. This question was taken up by the Coal Committee and a study was initiated on post-war developments in the relationship of coal and black oils. Similar studies in the fields of hydro-electricity and natural gas, it was decided, would be undertaken at a later stage.

The Coal Committee considered that part of the falling demand was due to the lack of adequate stock-building by consumers for the winter months, and stressed the importance of proper stocking policies and the necessity of improving statistics of distributed stocks. The Committee therefore suggested that Governments should:

(1) recommend targets for coal stocks in the various sectors of consumption, based on what they considered would be the normal requirements;

(2) exert influence on consumers by publicity or other suitable means in order to ensure that these targets were attained; and

(3) compare the actual figures of stocks in hand at the commencement of the winter with the targets set.

The demand situation led to a sharp fall in the imports of coal from the United States, a decrease from 20.6 million tons in 1952 to 7.0 million tons in 1953. This drop might have been even greater had it not been that, as a result of the lowering of trans-Atlantic freight rates, United States coal became competitive in Europe in the latter part of the year. Most of these imports were of coking qualities which remained in short supply in Europe, and the Coal Committee continued to direct its attention to solid fuel quality problems in both the technical and economic aspects.

The Committee also studied consumption trends in the main sectors of the coal market, a start being made on the domestic sector.

At its May session, the Coal Trade Sub-Committee decided to hold only one session quarterly. Owing to the easing of the market, the Sub-Committee was able to adjust in nearly all cases discrepancies between export availabilities and import requirements, and agreement was reached without proceeding to a formal allocation.

The Classification Working Party met in April and November; it drew up and agreed on a proposal for a classification of hard coals by rank for commercial purposes. This commercial classification is an adaptation, in a simplified form, of the earlier agreed scientific system for hard coal classification. The proposal is to be fully considered by the participating governments and given a trial over a period of two years, i.e., up to the end of 1955.

Work was started on the classification of hard coals by size as well as on the classification of brown coal and lignites, and a second exchange of brown coal samples was arranged.

The Utilization Working Party met in May and November. An ad hoc working group was set up to examine the advisability and feasibility of creating an International Centre for Documentation and Research on the efficient use of solid fuels.

A consolidated report was issued on fuel advisory services and facilities for education and training of boilerhouse staff. Work was continued on the proper use of measuring instruments to improve results from existing plants.

The problem of the rational utilization of coking coal and the widening of the range of coals used for carbonization was considered and the preparation of a plan of future work was begun.

The Working Party on Coal Statistics, set up by the Coal Committee at the end of 1952, held its first session in January and two subsequent sessions in April and November. Work proceeded on the examination of the definitions used by participating countries, on the improvement of the comparability of statistics and on the inclusion of new statistics in the Quarterly Bulletin of Coal Statistics for Europe. By the end of 1953, considerable progress had been made, especially in the case of productivity, where comparable statistics are now available for the first time. Work was continued on statistics in the field of consumption, prices, wages, and other forms of energy.

During the year, the Quarterly Bulletin of Coal Statistics for Europe, the Monthly Coal Statistical Summary and the Monthly Coal News continued to be issued.

(3) Committee on Electric Power

The Committee on Electric Power held its tenth session on 9 and 10 June (E/ECE 153-C & E/ECE/177-C). A programme of work was drawn up which provided for detailed consideration of specific problems by ad hoc groups of experts and also for studies and negotiations to be undertaken under the auspices of the secretariat.

Six groups of experts met during the year, and the Working Party for the Study of Rural Electrification, which was set up by the Committee on Electric Power to make a periodic review of problems in that field, held its first session. This Working Party was an outcome of the recommendations of a technical study group convened in 1952 in conjunction with TAA and FAO. A comprehensive programme of work was drawn up, designed to make the experience of national experts in a wide range of special problems available for the general improvement of rural electrification practice.

Following the conclusions, adopted by the Committee, of a previous secretariat study on "Transfers of Electric Power Across European Frontiers" (E/ECE/151), a group of experts was appointed to investigate the possibilities of exporting electric power from Yugoslavia to neighbouring countries, and an intergovernmental body known as "Yougel-export", comprising experts representing Austria, Italy, the Western Zone of Germany and Yugoslavia, was set up to carry out the work. This body operates through four committees dealing respectively with technical, economic, financial and legal aspects of the problem.

Inquiries and negotiations concerning general legal questions — both those which hamper international trade in electricity and those involved in the development of rivers and lakes which constitute or cross common frontiers — was continued.

Studies completed by the secretariat during the year included a survey of "Hydro-electric Potential in Europe and its Gross, Technical and Economic Limits" (E/ECE/EP/131). This established on a uniform basis the hydro-electric resources of most European countries and set out methods of comparing development possibilities according to successive levels of theoretical, technical and economic feasibility.

The second of an annual series of surveys of the main factors governing the electric power situation in Europe was published under the title "The Electric Power Situation in Europe: 1952-53 in the Setting of Post-War Developments" (E/ECE/EP/142). This study includes a more comprehensive analysis of developments in the years following the Second World War.

Among a number of other studies on which the secretariat worked to provide documentation for governments was one dealing with the methods employed in different countries to estimate consumption of electric power in future years.

The Committee on Electric Power continued to act as a forum for the consideration of fundamental problems underlying the development of Europe's electric power resources. Such problems arise largely from the fact that the natural sources of power production, which are both highly diversified and widely distributed, are also very unevenly developed in the different countries. Thus it has often been necessary to supplement by intergovernmental action the efforts made by individual countries to meet a constantly increasing demand under the most favourable conditions. There has, moreover, been a gradual increase in the interconnexion of national transmission systems in order to support a limited but economically important international trade in electric power which has also helped to create a broad degree of interdependence over an ever-widening area of Europe.

In considering these problems, the Committee maintained close contact with other international bodies, initiated studies in special fields, and promoted general studies to bring together authoritative information on questions of current importance. It also continued to provide a medium for the conduct of negotiations between interested governments on any specific issues which arose and its secretariat was continuously available as a channel for this purpose.

(4) Industries and Materials Committee

The Industry and Materials Committee did not meet in 1953 (E/ECE/153-D & E/ECE/177-D). The activities of its subsidiary organs in the fields of engineering and materials continued to be governed by a programme of work drawn up towards the end of 1950 (E/ECE/IM/155).

The Ad hoc Working Party on Contract Practices in Engineering met in February and in June. In February, it finalized the text of "General Conditions for the Supply of Plant and Machinery for Export" (ME/188/53) for use on a permanent basis by interested parties. A "Commentary on the General Conditions for the Supply of Plant and Machinery for Export" (E/ECE/169) was approved during the June meeting. This meeting also decided to prepare similar model contract clauses dealing with the erection of equipment, a matter of particular interest to under-developed countries. It set out the main subjects to be considered and draft clauses were prepared for submission to a session to be held in February 1954.

Work continued on a "pilot" machine-tool glossary, with the preparation of definitions and drawings of 1,000 selected concepts approaching a semi-final stage.

HOUSING SUB-COMMITTEE

The Housing Sub-Committee, which met in October 1953 (E/ECE/153-D & E/ECE/177-D), continued to develop its work on housing and building in response to the wishes of the governments and also aimed at implementing, in Europe, the programme on housing and town and country planning recommended by the Social Commission and approved by the Economic and Social Council.

Several countries devoted greater attention to measures to reduce the high cost of building. Lower costs were achieved through a variety of measures, such as a rationalization of the building industry in Belgium, the better preparation of projects in Denmark and France, the use of simpler housing plans in the Netherlands, Norway and the United Kingdom, and increased mechanization and prefabrication in the USSR.

An important problem for many countries remained that of relating various aspects of the housing question to a comprehensive housing policy oriented towards a continually rising level of dwelling construction and capable of substantially reducing the remaining backlog of unfulfilled needs. Action in this direction would also encourage and facilitate technological progress leading to the development of a forward-looking and modern building industry.

Arrangements for organizing international co-operation in Europe in building research and documentation on the general lines recommended at the sixth session of the Housing Sub-Committee were completed. A General Assembly of interested parties was held under ECE auspices in June 1953, at which the International Council for Building Research, Studies and Documentation (CIB) was formally established as a non-governmental organization to encourage, facilitate and develop international co-operation in building research, studies and the application of research, and documentation concerning not only the technical but also the economic and social aspects of housing, building and town and country planning.

The Sub-Committee examined the first "Annual Survey of European Housing Progress and Policies" (IM/HOU/60 & Add. 1-7) and discussed some of the more important issues arising, including questions of credits and subsidies and measures governments were taking to reduce costs and promote a higher level of construction. The Sub-Committee expressed the wish that, in future, the survey analyse in greater detail the social and economic trends related to housing.

In the field of economic studies, the Sub-Committee also examined the completed report on "European Rent Policies" (E/ECE/170 & 172) and arrived at a number of general conclusions on points of principle. It was emphasized that rent policy should be regarded as an integral part of housing policy, closely related to credit and subsidy policy, to measures intended to reduce the real cost of construction and to the level of wages. It was also considered desirable to equalize, as far as possible, the rents of houses of substantially similar characteristics and amenities; where such equalization led to increases in the rents of old houses, it was deemed essential to adopt social measures to enable all categories of the population to pay increased rents. It was agreed that, as long as a general housing shortage persisted in some countries, the abolition of rent control and of subsidies could not be contemplated. Finally, it was emphasized that housing could not be regarded as a purely technical and economic problem but as one which had important social aspects of concern to governments.

The first Quarterly Bulletin of Housing and Building Statistics for Europe was published in August 1953. At its second meeting, in November, the Working Party on Housing and Building Statistics recommended methods for computing an index of building activity and a building cost index and began an examination of comparability of data relating to occupation of dwellings. As part of its future work in this field, the Working Party agreed to consider methods of calculating housing needs and overcrowding and methods of computing an index of building cost proper.

The Sub-Committee continued to consider what further steps it could take to reduce the cost of building and to increase the productivity of the industry. Arising out of the general study on "The Cost of House Construction" (E/ECE/165), a number of specialized studies were undertaken concerning: development of model building codes and regulations; methods of awarding building contracts and the placing of orders; trends in mechanization of house building; housing needs of a family; cost of various types of construction.

In addition, the Sub-Committee invited interested governments to examine the import requirements and export availabilities of their countries in building materials and components and to inform the secretariat of any trade possibilities which they considered worth exploring within the framework of ECE. The Sub-Committee further decided to initiate an examination of methods and techniques of developing and expediting the housing programmes of less-industrialized countries in Europe.

(5) Inland Transport Committee

The Committee continued to devote much of its time to problems bearing on general transport policy. As the work advanced, the extent to which problems of co-ordination of transport are bound up with the work on costs and tariffs became increasingly evident. The Committee further defined its aim with respect to the current studies in the field of co-ordination of transport and reached agreement on a number of principles concerning the social and economic burdens imposed on transport undertakings and the advantages and benefits granted to them.

The conclusions drawn by the Working Party on Transport Costs and Accountancy and the methods of calculation it adopted have provided a means of ascertaining the cost of the undertaking for rail, road and inland water transport and a way of facing most rate-fixing problems.

With railway tariffs now largely standardized as to form, attention is being given to achieving greater uniformity in tariff structure in order to simplify the task of those engaged in trade and thus facilitate commercial exchanges.

It was agreed that discrimination in railway tariffs should first be considered from the national standpoint, i.e. with the interest of the railways and of the countries' own economy in view, and then only from the European angle. A list of types of rail tariff discrimination was studied, type by type, at a session of the appropriate subsidiary body of the Committee, the various delegations indicating whether or not they regarded them as justifiable. The possibility of eliminating unjustified discrimination is to be dealt with at a later stage. Representatives from Eastern countries supplied full information on a uniform transit tariff applied by these countries for traffic between them and also for traffic between Western and Eastern countries when one of the latter is an exporter or importer of the goods transported. The possibility of extending the application of such tariffs was being studied. Questions relating to the establishment of international tariffs for road and inland water transport were also being studied.

The Committee, during 1953, prepared a General Agreement embodying economic regulations for international road transport, with an accompanying set of rules with which carriers engaged in international traffic should comply. The provisions relating to the transport undertaking itself, to mobile equipment, to conditions of employment, to the insurance to be carried, etc., are designed to improve the standard of international road services.

Governments were recommended to carry out a census of road traffic on the main international traffic arteries and, beginning in 1955, to take national road traffic censuses and censuses on main international traffic arteries during the same period in order to:

- (1) ascertain whether there is a need for new roads or for improving existing ones;
- (2) find out the extent to which roads are utilized by the various categories of users; and
- (3) obtain information for use in the prevention of accidents.

Progress was made in the study of standardized packaging and of matters relating to the equipment of road vehicles for the transport of perishable foodstuffs. The Committee's objective is to draw up one or more international agreements on packaging and on the quality and conditions of transport of perishable foodstuffs.

Regulations were drafted, to enter into force in 1954, for the temporary duty-free admission of reusable containers (e.g., for household goods, food and liquids) into foreign countries and on the technical conditions which containers must fulfil to be accepted in international traffic under Customs seal. These regulations, when applied, will allow a more extensive use of containers in international traffic.

The Committee agreed that the most important aspect of its work on the prevention of road traffic accidents was the co-ordination of the activities of governments and international organizations in keeping the public informed as to the different ways of preventing accidents. A catalogue of research activities on road safety in progress in the various countries was prepared for publication by the secretariat, as well as an international road safety manual for all road users. Progress was made in laying down the standards to be required of motor vehicle drivers and in studies of technical problems, such as the lighting of vehicles, safety glass and the general internal design of motor vehicles. The object of these particular studies is to reduce the risk of death or serious injury when accidents occur.

An inquiry was begun to ascertain the possibilities of putting into effect from 1 June 1954 a proposal that the duration of tax exemption for foreign tourist vehicles be extended to coincide with that of the temporary importation papers.

Many European countries during the year began applying the international insurance card system, instituted on the Committee's recommendation, and enabling drivers who are holders of the card to cross frontiers with a minimum of formalities, especially in countries where third-party insurance is compulsory.

The Committee, among other things, also considered problems of the temporary duty-free admission of small pleasure boats, the transport of dangerous goods, various customs questions and rational routing of rail traffic.

(6) Committee on Manpower

No meetings of the Committee were held during 1953, its programme having been taken over, on the decisions of the governments, by ILO in April 1948.

(7) Steel Committee

The Committee held its tenth and eleventh sessions in January and September 1953. During the year, its attention was directed mainly towards the problem of stimulating demand, the shortages of raw materials which had characterized the industry in previous years having been virtually overcome.

Despite some slackening in demand, the overall European steel production of 75 million tons of crude steel in 1953 remained virtually the same as in 1952.

The secretariat published the revised version of two studies, presented in preliminary form to the Committee in 1952, entitled *The European Steel Industry and the Wide-Strip Mill: A Study of Production and Consumption Trends in Flat Products*⁷⁵ and European Steel Exports and Steel Demand in Non-European Countries (E/ECE/-163). It also prepared and presented to the Committee the preliminary version of a study on competition between steel and aluminium. This latter study is divided into two main parts, the first covering the characteristics and growth of the aluminium industry and the second reviewing the present and probable future competitive position of aluminium in a number of specific industries, particularly the railway, motor-vehicle, ship-building, packaging and mobile container, and building and civil engineering industries. In addition to this major study, the secretariat prepared and presented a paper on methods of calculating the availability of capital scrap, and issued a report entitled "Some Important Developments during 1953 in Iron and Steel Technology" (E/ECE/-171).

During the year, collaboration between the secretariats of ECE and of ECAFE and ECLA continued to develop.

The Quarterly Bulletin of Steel Statistics for Europe was published regularly throughout the year and incorporated a number of improvements over earlier issues.

(8) Timber Committee

The joint FAO/ECE Working Party on European Timber Trends and Prospects met at Geneva in June; the Timber Committee met at FAO Headquarters at Rome in October 1953, when, as in the previous year, it participated in a joint session with the European Forestry Commission of FAO.

The Committee, reviewing its provisional estimates of the volume of European trade in sawn softwood in 1953, noted that the volume was likely to exceed the Committee's earlier expectations by about 10 per cent.

Production costs in some of the exporting countries have risen more rapidly in recent years than have corresponding export prices, and cost rigidities present an obstacle to any substantial downward revision of prices. The Committee agreed that technical improvements both in the production and utilization of wood should in time contribute to resolving this apparent dilemma.

For 1954, no marked change in total demand for sawn softwood was envisaged, and, after taking into account an expected increase in supplies from Eastern Europe, European import requirements from other continents were probably within the range of estimated availabilities in Canada, the United States and Brazil.

A comparison of pitprop import requirements and export availabilities for 1953 and 1954 showed that supplies in the importing countries appeared secure for these two years. For pulpwood, however, though import requirements in 1953 were below the level of actual imports in 1951 and 1952, export availabilities also declined markedly as compared with the two preceding years; there thus appeared to be a prospective deficit in pulpwood for both 1953 and 1954.

⁷⁵ U.N.P., Sales No.: 1953.II.E.6.

The FAO/ECE Working Party on European Timber Trends and Prospects, at its meeting in Geneva from 25 June to 1 July, considered the implications of the joint FAO/ECE study European Timber Trends and Prospects,⁷⁶ published in April, together with European Timber Statistics 1913-1950.⁷⁷ Its report was considered at the Joint Meeting of the ECE Timber Committee and FAO European Forestry Commission held at Rome in October 1953.

The Joint Meeting reached the following conclusions: Europe's consumption of industrial timber would tend to rise, affecting primarily pulpwood, only small increases being expected for saw logs and pitprops. In most European importing countries the rise in prices assumed in the study appeared to have taken place. Since 1951, upward revisions in felling estimates have been made in Sweden, Western Germany, and some other European countries with the result that the expected output of industrial wood in Europe (outside the USSR), estimated in the study at 155 million cubic metres, could now be estimated at 163 million cubic metres; this figure, however, remained substantially below the amount of industrial wood Europe might be expected to consume 10 to 20 years hence.

To ensure that Europe's future requirements of industrial wood would be met, the Joint Meeting agreed on a number of recommendations designed to raise Europe's supplies by both short and long-term measures. These included short-term measures to raise forest output by reducing waste in the forest and achieving a fuller use of the by-products of the wood-using industries. The Meeting also considered it desirable to increase the volume of imports of sawn softwood from the Soviet Union and other regions. Among the long-term measures recommended, particular importance was attached to the need for improved forest management, intensified silviculture, improved roadways and transport facilities, and a more ambitious programme of afforestation and reforestation. The need for a long-term programme designed to achieve a progressive improvement in statistical information was stressed.

The Joint Meeting recommended that high priority be accorded to the technical projects figuring in the Committee's programme of work, and requested ECE and FAO to convene joint working parties, as needed, in pursuance of its recommendations in the technical field.

(9) Committee on the Development of Trade

No meeting of the Committee itself was held during the period under review, but work on trade was continued on the basis of resolutions adopted at the seventh and eighth sessions of the Commission. The Executive Secretary convened an East-West Trade Consultation on 13 April 1953, which was attended by experts nominated by the governments of 24 countries participating in the work of ECE, as well as experts from the Eastern and Western Zones of Germany. In conformity with the plan for the Consultation, no summary records were issued, the Executive Secretary acted as Chairman, and the report to governments on the Consultation's proceedings was submitted by the Executive Secretary on his own responsibility.

This report, among other things, summarized the principal results of the Consultation as follows:

"At the conclusion of the Consultation, it was the general consensus of the experts and of the Executive Secretary:

"(a) That the Consultation had been of value and had helped prepare the way for an increase in East-West trade during the next twelve months;

"(b) That the work done at the Consultation would be followed up in early negotiations;

"(c) That a further Consultation of the same kind would be useful in April 1954;

"(d) That the experts would inform the Executive Secretary (if possible by 1 July 1953 and again by 1 September 1953) of the results of negotiations subsequent to the Consultation.

"(e) That the Executive Secretary would remain in contact with governments on this question and might determine whether it would be to the general advantage to convene a Consultation even before April 1954."

In December 1953, the Executive Secretary, in a communication to all participating governments, convened the next Consultation for 20 April 1954 at Geneva.

A detailed article, "Developments in Trade between Eastern and Western Europe from 1951 to 1952" was published by the secretariat in Volume 5, No. 2, of the Quarterly Economic Bulletin for Europe.

The secretariat was instrumental in bringing together, and arranging for bilateral trade negotiations (with the consent of the governments concerned) between the representatives of the Greek and Hungarian Chambers of Commerce. These talks took place in connexion with the East-West Trade Consultation of April 1953. On 1 June 1953, a one-year trade agreement was signed for the exchange of goods totalling about $4.5 million in value.

b. ECONOMIC SURVEY OF EUROPE SINCE THE WAR

The Economic Survey of Europe Since the War⁷⁸ published in February 1953, was the sixth annual survey prepared by the secretariat of the Commission. It was based on official statistics and statistical estimates made by the secretariat, and sought to draw on the experience of the whole post-war period and to analyse its significance for the future.

⁷⁶ U.N.P., Sales No. 1953.II.E.3.

⁷⁷ U.N.P., Sales No. 1953.II.E.5.

According to the Survey, the adverse effects of the major shifts in the world economy during and after the war were concentrated on Western Europe. The political split of Europe intensified Western Europe's balance-of-payments difficulties, and the dependence of Western European countries on the dollar area as a source of supply grew. At the same time, it became far more difficult than before to earn from other countries the means to cover the deficit.

Following five post-war years of continuous expansion of production, the economy of Western Europe stagnated for a year and a half—despite a continuous increase in armament expenditure and a sustained boom in the United States. The progress, goals and development plans of Western European countries appeared very modest in comparison with those of the Soviet Union and the United States. The problem, the Survey indicated, was to find the means to further economic progress without relapsing into inflation.

Despite difficulties in particular industries at various times in Eastern Europe, countries there made rapid progress in industrialization, particularly in heavy industry. As long as their agricultural plans remained relatively modest, the chance of a rapid and general increase in standards of living remained rather slight. The reported rise in the increase in industrial output in the Soviet Union slowed down in recent years but further industrialization was continuing at a rate surpassing that in any Western country, the Survey stated.

The gap between rural pauperism in Southern Europe and industrial progress and higher living standards in Western and North-Western Europe continued to widen in recent years. While the goal of highly industrialized countries should be further mechanization, both in agriculture and in industry, the goal of over-populated countries in Southern and Eastern Europe, it was indicated, should be an expansion of industry hand-in-hand with an increase in total food production. Since large-scale international migration was neither likely nor desirable, agricultural production needed to be expanded where the surplus manpower exists.

The Survey stressed that the development of industrially retarded countries was in the long-term interest of Europe as a whole. There has been for four decades a persistent trend towards international disintegration in Europe's economy. From 1913 to 1951 total commodity output in Europe (not counting the USSR) increased 70 per cent, but intra-European trade increased only 2 per cent. The trend has been accentuated by government intervention in the economy. When labour and capital movements are restrained and capital is scarce, the obstacles to reaching a higher degree of international integration solely by the automatism of free commodity trade are immense, the Survey pointed out.

Economic stagnation would be fatal to even the most humble efforts to break the historical trend towards national economic autarky in Western Europe, it said, pointing out that a general climate of expanding economy was required to avoid a setback in intra-European trade and thereby in production. Private business had to be given firm confidence that governments take responsibility for maintaining total demand at a high level.

Governments needed to lay the foundation for a new equilibrium in international trade and payments and for a more regular and normal functioning of the world market before removal of controls on trade and payments and the achievement of currency convertibility were possible without serious threats to European production and trade. The situation required adequate action by the European countries themselves, with co-operative efforts on a wider scale to promote steady economic progress in Europe and the world, the Survey declared.

c. CO-OPERATION WITH SPECIALIZED AGENCIES AND OTHER ORGANIZATIONS

Co-operation of the Commission's technical bodies and the secretariat with specialized agencies continued. Co-operation with FAO was maintained mainly through the Joint ECE/FAO Agriculture and Timber Divisions servicing the ECE Committee on agricultural problems and the Timber Committee respectively. FAO collaborated in the preparation of a "Statement on Agricultural Production and Trade in Agricultural Products". An ECE/FAO Working Party met to examine the joint "Study of European Timber Trends", and its recommendations were submitted to a joint session of the ECE Timber Committee and the FAO European Forestry Commission (see above). Collaboration with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) continued on the compilation of a pilot machine tool glossary. Co-operation with the World Meteorological Organization (WMO) was initiated in regard to the hydrological aspects of the work of the Electric Power Committee and the influence of the weather on coal consumption. Co-operation in various fields was maintained with ILO, the World Health Organization (WHO), the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Monetary Fund, the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) and the Interim Committee of the International Trade Organization (ICITO).

The secretariat maintained informal contacts on a technical level with the staff of the Office of European Economic Co-operation (OEEC), the secretariat of the Council of Europe, and the High Authority of the European Coal and Steel Community. Collaboration with non-governmental organizations was maintained, particularly in the fields of coal, electric power, housing, industry and materials, and inland transport.

d. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS SIXTEENTH SESSION

The Council considered the fifth annual report of ECE (E/2382) at its 716th and 717th plenary meetings on 8 July. It also had before it the Economic Survey of Europe Since the War.

In introducing the annual report, the Executive Secretary of the Commission stressed that the past twelve months had seen two encouraging developments. The first was that experts from Eastern and Western European countries had met in the ECE Trade Consultation to discuss specific trade possibilities, and had thus created means of forging new links between certain countries which had ceased commercial relations, and of enlarging the volume of East-West trade. The second encouraging development had been indications of an increasing willingness on the part of Eastern European Governments to take part in the Commission's technical work. The Executive Secretary explained various ways in which ECE, during the period under review, had devoted greater attention to the problem of economic development. Just as ECE was endeavouring to prevent the fractionalization of Europe, he said, so it was working, in conjunction with ECLA and ECAFE, towards a fuller integration of the various regions of the world into a co-ordinated whole, in conformity with the aims of the United Nations Charter.

During the discussion of the ECE report, a number of representatives commended the practical work done by ECE in various fields. Economic and technical studies of the secretariat were also highly praised, especially the Economic Survey of Europe Since the War, and the Quarterly Economic Bulletins, as well as basic studies on timber, steel and inter-regional trade, certain of which had been prepared in co-operation with FAO, ECAFE and ECLA.

Non-European members of the Council, including the representatives of Argentina, Australia, the Philippines and Venezuela, joined European members, including the representatives of France, Sweden and Turkey, in expressing appreciation of ECE efforts to relate developments in the European economy to the world situation, and in stressing the importance of past and future inter-regional collaboration. Various representatives, including those of Argentina, France, Turkey, the United States and Yugoslavia, also emphasized the importance of new work by ECE on behalf of less-developed countries in Southern Europe, which was in line with the emphasis placed by the Council on economic development.

The majority expressed hope and optimism concerning greater participation by Eastern European countries in the future work of ECE technical committees and congratulated the Executive Secretary on his efforts to foster East-West trade. The Polish and USSR representatives underlined their view that ECE should concentrate first and foremost on developing trade among all the countries of Europe.

The Council at its 717th plenary meeting on 8 July unanimously adopted, as resolution 484 (XVI), the draft resolution proposed by the Commission (E/2382), taking note of the annual report of ECE and of the views expressed during its eighth session.

2. Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE)

The Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE) held its ninth session at Bandung, Indonesia, from 6 to 14 February 1953. In its report (E/2374) to the fifteenth session of the Economic and Social Council, held in March and April 1953, the Commission drew attention to the rapid growth of regional economic consciousness, the increasing recognition of sharing experiences, and the development of the Commission as an effective and favoured instrument for economic advance of the countries of the region.

The action taken by the Commission at its ninth session, the Council's consideration of the Commission's report and the Commission's activities covering the period up to 31 December 1953 are described below.⁷⁹

⁷⁹ For question of membership in the Commission, see pp. 33-34. For amendments to its rules of procedure, see p. 33.

a. PROBLEMS OF INDUSTRY AND TRADE

At its ninth session, the Commission approved (E/CN.11/361/Rev.2) the report of its Committee on Industry and Trade (E/CN.11/357) which had met for its fifth session in Bandung, Indonesia from 26 January to 2 February 1953. ECAFE noted especially the effective manner in which much of the Committee's work is carried out through sub-committees, expert working parties, and special conferences.

In adopting the report of the Committee, the Commission approved, among other things, recommendations concerning economic and financial aspects of rural electrification; technical and economic aspects of extraction and utilization of lignite and other mineral resources; the visit of a group of experts to Japan to study small-scale industries and handicrafts marketing in 1954; the organization (in co-operation with the Government of India, the Technical Assistance Administration (TAA), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the World Health Organization (WHO) and the United Nations Department of Social Affairs) of a seminar on housing and building materials in 1954; a seminar (with TAA and the International Institute for Administrative Science) on organization and administration of public enterprises in the industrial field in 1954; the continued analysis of trade development and prospects of the region, especially work on a joint ECAFE/ECE/FAO Report on Trade Between Asia and Europe; trade promotion activities, including the convening of a second ECAFE conference on trade promotion and supply of capital goods, in March 1953; a seminar (with FAO and TAA) on agricultural development financing in 1954; and a working party of financial aspects of economic development programmes.

(1) Industrial Development

Electric Power: The Sub-Committee on Electric Power, at its third session at Bangkok, Thailand, from 5 to 9 October 1953, considered reports on co-ordinated development of hydro and thermal power and integrated power development; rural electrification (tariffs and finance); supply of plant and machinery for export; the utilization of lignite in thermal power plants (E/CN.11/EP/22, 23, 26, 27); and the first issue of ECAFE's Electric Power Bulletin for Asia and the Far East.

Advisory services were rendered to Burma on rural electrification and to the Government of East Pakistan on electricity tariffs.

Iron and Steel: The Sub-Committee on Iron and Steel at its fifth session at Bangkok, from 31 August to 3 September 1953, considered the report of the ECAFE/TAA study group of iron and steel experts on Japanese production techniques (ST/TAA/SER.C/5) and reports on the applicability of Japanese techniques to countries of Asia and the Far East and on the development and expansion of the iron and steel industry and allied industries in the countries of the region (E/CN.11/I&S/41 & 42). In view of the usefulness of the group visit to Japan, it was decided to seek TAA and other assistance for a study trip to Europe and North America in 1955. Advisory services on steel projects were rendered to Burma.

Mineral Resources: A regional conference on mineral resources development, the first of its kind, was held in Tokyo from 20 to 30 April 1953. It considered various phases of mineral resources development in the region, possibilities of increasing production, and ways and means of speeding up geological surveying. The report and essential documents of the conference were published in Development of Mineral Resources in Asia and the Far East.⁸⁰ Following the conference, delegates toured areas in Japan of geological and mining interest.

A study group visit for Asian lignite experts to Australia in October and November 1953 was jointly sponsored by ECAFE and TAA. In a preliminary report (ECAFE/I&T/14), concrete recommendations were made for consideration by the countries of the region concerning the organization and administration of lignite mining concerns, lignite prospecting, analysis, mining, processing, and the utilization of lignite.

Advisory services were provided to Thailand and arrangements were made for the testing in Japan of coals from Burma, lignite from Thailand and Malaya, and kaolin and peat from Ceylon.

Among reports issued were those on "Mining Development in Asia and the Far East 1952-53" and on "Clays in Relation to Ceramics and Building Materials Industries" (E/CN.11/I&T/87 & 94).

Cottage and Small-Scale Industries: At its third meeting in Bangkok, from 21 to 26 September 1953, the working party on small-scale industries and handicraft marketing considered reports on economic aspects of cottage industries and on domestic and export marketing of handicrafts of countries in Asia and the Far East. It also considered various reports describing government aid to handicraft marketing and finance, as well as the results of research and experiments concerning handloom production, common facilities services, handmade paper, pottery production, and spinning with bast⁸¹ fibres. An exhibition of bamboo woodwork, including lacquerware, was arranged in Bangkok.

Trained Personnel: The third meeting of the ECAFE/ILO/UNESCO Inter-Secretariat Working Party on Trained Personnel for Economic Development was held in Bangkok from 7 to 14 September 1953. It considered, among other things, the question of the establishment of an International Institute of Management, but concluded that the stage had not yet been reached for such a project.

Housing and Building Materials: The Inter-secretariat Working Party on Housing and Building Materials, at its first meeting from 17 to 21 November 1952, recommended that regional research and demonstration centres for construction methods and designs (one for arid and another for humid climates) be established in co-operation with TAA. A report on "Housing and Building Materials in Asia and the Far East" (ECAFE/I&T/HBWP.2/1) was prepared.

(2) Trade and Finance

Trade Analysis: The Study of Trade Between Asia and Europe⁸², jointly undertaken by the secretariats of ECAFE, ECE and FAO, was completed and published in November 1953.

Trade promotion: The second ECAFE Conference on Trade Promotion was held in Manila from 23 February to 4 March 1953. The Conference suggested (E/CN.11/I&T/84) that the governments should keep under constant review the possibilities of simplifying exchange, customs, import and export regulations. It emphasized the need for the development of arbitration facilities and the promotion of marketing research, which might concern itself with the production and marketing of commodities, the search for new products for export, new uses of existing products, and utilization of by-products. It also dealt with various other aspects of trade promotion and recommended, inter alia, that full use be made of the existing trade associations in the region and that the governments increasingly utilize the advice of business groups in the formulation of trade policies.

The Trade Promotion News, previously issued monthly, continued to be issued once every two months. A preliminary draft of a Glossary of Commodity Terms was revised and publication was expected in 1954.

Financial aspects of economic development: At the third session of the working party of experts on financing of economic development in Asia and the Far East, which was held at Bangkok from 7 to 12 September 1953, reports on recent developments in mobilization of domestic capital, taxation as an instrument of development policy, development expenditure and variability in tax yields (ECAFE/I&T/FED.3-5) and a large number of other papers were considered. The report of the working party (E/CN.11/I&T/89) contained recommendations relating to taxation, including taxation in relation to individual development projects.

b. INLAND TRANSPORT

At its ninth session, the Commission approved (E/CN.11/365) the report of the second session of the Inland Transport Committee (E/CN.11/350), held at Bandung from 19 to 21 January 1953. It agreed to enlarge the terms of reference of the Inland Waterways Sub-Committee to cover coastal shipping.

Railways: The Railway Sub-Committee held its second session in Paris from 5 to 10 October 1953—the first session of a subsidiary body of ECAFE to be held outside Asia. It considered reports on the Regional Railway Training Centre for Operating and Signalling Officials, improved methods of track construction and maintenance, the prevention and speedy disposal of claims and the best types of diesel locomotives and railcars (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.1/26-30, 32-34). The Sub-Committee reviewed in detail the progress made in establishing the ECAFE/TAA Regional Training Centre for Railway Operating and Signalling Officials at Lahore, Pakistan. The Centre was scheduled to begin operation on 5 April 1954. The session of the Sub-Committee was followed by a group inspection tour of important rail installations in France, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, West Germany and Switzerland.

Highways: The Highway Sub-Committee at its second session, at Bangkok from 14 to 19 September 1953, considered and approved: standard forms for highway bridge register and recording data on cement concrete pavements and highway project schemes (their preparation and presentation) and recommended these for adoption by governments. Other documents considered dealt with the economics of highway engineering, vehicle maintenance and repair, the training of mechanics and highway safety (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.2/14-16, 18, 19).

⁸² U.N.P., Sales No.: 1953-II.F.3.

Waterways: The Inland Waterways Sub-Committee at its first session at Bandung, Indonesia, from 14 to 17 January 1953, considered the revised draft report of the expert working group on inland water transport from Asia and the Far East (E/CN.11/TRANS/R.1). This report was finalized (ST/TAA/SER.C/9) later in the year and was to be published by TAA. The Sub-Committee recommended the establishment of a regional training centre for inland water transport personnel, especially diesel marine mechanics, and the preparation of a draft convention for uniform methods of craft measurement (E/CN.11/TRANS/87).

In line with the recommendations of the expert working group on inland water transport for Asia and the Far East, trials were held by the Joint Steamer Company in East Pakistan to establish the relative efficiencies of the various towing methods and craft design. Details of these operations and an analysis of their results were given in a special report (ECAFE/TRANS/Sub.3/11).

c. FLOOD CONTROL AND WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

At its ninth session, the Commission approved (E/CN.11/366) the report of the Bureau of Flood Control (E/CN.11/352). This report recommended, among other things, the convening of a regional technical conference on water resources development in 1954. The Commission approved the suggestion to redesignate the Bureau as "Bureau of Flood Control and Water Resources Development".

Multiple-purpose river basin development: The Bureau of Flood Control and Water Resources Development completed work on the preparation of a manual on methods of economic analysis and planning of multiple-purpose river basin development and country-by-country surveys of water resources development for Burma, Ceylon, China (Taiwan), India, Japan, the Philippines and Thailand. Surveys for Cambodia, Laos, Vietnam, Indonesia and Pakistan were in preparation. The manual and the country surveys begun in 1951 together form a comprehensive study of water resources development in the region.

Flood control and water resources development of international rivers: The Bureau drew up a schedule to investigate the Mekong River along the Thai-Laotian border to study possibilities of irrigation, water power development and navigation. A preliminary study was also made of the possibility of diverting the Mekong River to provide irrigation for the north-eastern part of Thailand.

Studies on the problems of sediment (silt), river bank protection and river training were completed by the Bureau. Hydraulic experiments of silting and scouring of canals and rivers with heavy silt-laden flow, undertaken in co-operation with organizations in India and Thailand, were continued.

Technical advice was given to China (Taiwan), India and Thailand concerning multiple-purpose development of water resources.

The publication of the Flood Control Journal (ST/ECAFE/SER.C/13-17) was continued, and the fourth and fifth volumes of the Flood Control Series ("River Training and River Bank Protection" and "The Sediment Problem" (ST/ECAFE/SER.F/4 & 5)) were published. The Bureau also distributed various publications and reports to national technical organizations at their request.

d. RESEARCH AND STATISTICS

The ninth session of the Commission opened with a discussion on the economic situation in the region, with the annual Economic Survey of Asia and the Far East for 1951 and 1952⁸³ serving as a background document. At the conclusion of the debate, the Commission adopted a resolution (E/CN.11/356) drawing attention to:

(1) the urgent need for measures designed to assure stability of prices, particularly of the primary export products from countries of the region;

(2) the need to bring about general conditions of trade in which the prices of capital goods and other manufactured articles bear an adequate, just and equitable relation to prices of primary commodities; and

(3) the continued need for foreign capital and assistance on mutually agreed terms for the development of the region's agricultural and industrial resources.

Preparations for the 1953 Survey were also completed by the end of the year. It was decided that the Survey, for the first time, should include, besides an analysis of regional economic developments, separate country-by-country reviews. A special article on "Economic Developments in Mainland China, 1949-1953" was published in the November issue of the quarterly Economic Bulletin for Asia and the Far East. Other articles published in the May and November issues of the Bulletin dealt with "Aspects of Urbanization in ECAFE countries"; "Diversification of Production and Trade in ECAFE Countries"; and "Taxation and Economic Development in ECAFE Countries".

Statistical compilation and services: The building up of files of basic statistical series on such items as production, transport, trade, finance and prices was continued in collaboration with the statistical offices and departments of governments, the Statistical Office of the United Nations, and the specialized agencies including, in particular, FAO, ILO and the International Monetary Fund. Work on the index of economic statistics on the collection of details relating to statistical series was regularly published in the quarterly Economic Bulletin.

Statistical conference: At its ninth session, the Commission approved (E/CN.11/364) the recommendations of the Second Regional Conference of Statisticians, held at Bangkok from 1 to 13 September 1952, concerning statistics of agricultural and industrial production and wholesale prices. Preparations were being made for the third Regional Conference of Statisticians, to be held in New Delhi, India, in March 1954. This conference would consider the application and promotion of international standards for the estimation of national income in ECAFE countries.

e. AGRICULTURE

The Agriculture Division, jointly set up by ECAFE and FAO and located at ECAFE headquarters, started its work on projects agreed upon by the two organizations. It undertook, for FAO and ECAFE, a continuing review of developments in the field of food and agriculture in the countries of the region. This review was used by FAO in the preparation of the State of Food and Agriculture and by ECAFE in the preparation of the half-yearly and the annual economic surveys.

f. RELATIONS WITH TAA

At its ninth session, the Commission, noting with satisfaction the close co-operation with TAA, requested (E/CN.11/369) the latter to intensify its activities in the region so as to accelerate the pace of economic development. The ECAFE secretariat continued to bring to the notice of TAA many regional needs for technical assistance, and TAA continued to seek the secretariat's advice in preparing its own operational programmes and in dealing with the requests of individual countries. The secretariat also continued to comment on fellowship and scholarship applications and on requests by governments to TAA for technical assistance.

During 1953, TAA co-operated with ECAFE in a number of regional projects, especially on:

(1) the preparations for a regional training centre for railway operating and signalling officials at Lahore, Pakistan, to be opened on 5 April 1954;

(2) a group study tour of lignite experts to Australia in October and November 1953;

(3) arrangements for a study tour of cottage industry experts to Japan in April-May 1954;

(4) a seminar on the organization and administration of public enterprises in the industrial field at Rangoon, Burma in March 1954; and

(5) a seminar on housing and community improvement, at New Delhi in January and February 1954.

TAA also made experts available for the ECAFE conference on mineral resources development, held in Tokyo in April 1953, and the ECAFE working party on cottage and small-scale industries and handicraft marketing held at Bangkok in September 1953.

g. RELATIONS WITH SPECIALIZED AGENCIES AND OTHER ORGANIZATIONS

Close and extensive co-operation with specialized agencies was maintained. Informal meetings were held periodically with representatives of FAO, WHO, UNESCO, ICAO, as well as UNICEF, stationed in Bangkok. The establishment of a joint ECAFE/FAO Agricultural Division at ECAFE's headquarters resulted in still closer co-operation between the two organizations. Co-operation was further developed between the Commission's secretariat and the Consultative Committee for Co-operative Economic Development in South-East Asia (known as the Colombo Plan). Consultations continued with a number of non-governmental organizations.

h. TEMPORARY HEADQUARTERS OF THE COMMISSION

At its ninth session, the Commission considered the question of the location of its working site. After an invitation from the Government of the Philippines had again been put before the Commission, the Commission endorsed (E/CN.11/368) a statement by the Assistant Secretary-General, in agreement with the governments concerned, that the Secretary-General should be asked to explore conditions and facilities at the various sites offered, including Bangkok, to ascertain the most suitable working site. The Secretary-General was requested, following these explorations and keeping in touch with the Chairman of the Commission, to use his administrative discretion and to take appropriate action.

The Commission unanimously recommended to the Council acceptance of an invitation from the Government of Ceylon to hold its tenth session and the meetings immediately preceding it in Ceylon.

i. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FIFTEENTH SESSION

The Economic and Social Council, at its fifteenth session, considered the annual report of ECAFE (E/2374), at its 699th to 701st plenary meetings on 24 and 27 April. Most representatives felt that the Commission had achieved good results in all branches of its work, that it had rendered useful service to the countries of its region, and that it had become an effective instrument for the promotion of economic development in Asia and the Far East.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR, however, argued that the work of the Commission was practically paralysed because the People's Republic of China, the most important country of Asia and the Far East, was not represented there.

Several representatives, including those of Australia, China, France and the United States, stressed the usefulness of the work of the technical committees and working parties of the Commission in the fields of industry and trade and of inland transport. They praised the efforts made by the Commission in promoting trade between Asia and the Far East and the other countries of the world, including the organization of trade promotion conferences. The work of the Commission's Bureau of Flood Control and Water Resources Development was also commended. The representative of the Philippines, in particular, expressed the view that as an integrated and balanced economic development was of paramount importance, ECAFE should make positive recommendations in this respect and should promote the diversification of production, the fuller use of non-agricultural resources, industrialization and the development of trade.

The representatives of Australia, China and the United States, among others, considered that the co-operation of ECAFE with TAA and the specialized agencies had proved fruitful and profitable for the countries in the region. The establishment of a joint ECAFE/FAO Agriculture Division, said the representative of Australia, was also satisfactory for in the past insufficient attention had perhaps been paid to agriculture.

As regards its working site, the Commission was in favour of the suggestion that the Secretary-General be requested to explore conditions and facilities at the various sites offered, including Bangkok itself, and ascertain what would be the most suitable working site from the points of view both of operating costs and of other relevant factors.

The Council, at its 700th plenary meeting on 24 April, adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, two resolutions (464 A & B (XV)) recommended by ECAFE. In resolution 464 A (XV), the Council took note of the Commission's annual report and the programme of work and priorities contained therein.

In resolution 464 B (XV), the Council, noting the Commission's recommendation regarding the future location of its working site, requested the Secretary-General to take appropriate action.

3. Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA)

The Economic Commission for Latin America held its fifth session at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, from 9 to 25 April 1953. In general, the representatives expressed satisfaction with the studies and reports that had been prepared by ECLA's secretariat. The principal issues dealt with by the Commission concerned the need for greater industrialization and the promotion of intra-regional as well as international trade. The Commission called for intensification of studies of iron and steel (including transforming industries), paper and pulp, and chemical and other industries. It decided, inter alia, to investigate the possibilities of establishing processing industries utilizing local raw materials. The Commission's activities in Central America were endorsed, and satisfaction was expressed with the progress achieved under the United Nations Expanded Programme of technical assistance.

The Commission's report (E/2405) covering its fifth session was considered by the Economic and Social Council at its sixteenth session. A progress report by the Executive Secretary (E/CN.12/AC.24/2), covering the period from the end of the fifth session to 31 December 1953, was also issued in preparation for the meeting of the Committee of the Whole on 8 February 1954. The following is an account of some of the activities of the Commission and of the Council's consideration of ECLA's report.⁸⁴

a. ANNUAL ECONOMIC SURVEY

The Commission at its fifth session took note with satisfaction of the Economic Survey of Latin America, 1951-52⁸⁵ submitted by the secretariat. It requested the secretariat in the future to broaden the treatment of subjects not sufficiently covered, and recommended that governments provide the necessary information. The secretariat was also asked to take into account the observations made in the course of the debate, and to include in future editions of the Survey an explanation of the statistical concepts and methods employed.

⁸⁴ For amendments to the Commission's rules of procedure, see p. 33.

The Executive Secretary reported (E/CN.12/AC.24/2) that, while the main part of the Economic Survey of Latin America, 1953 had been completed by the end of the year, it was to be published early in 1954. The 1953 Survey contained sections on income, investment and consumption; foreign trade and the effects of the world economic situation on Latin American trade and balance of payments; monetary problems; agricultural production; and industrial and mining production. The Survey showed that 1953 was marked by changes in the world economic situation which had important repercussions on the economy of Latin America. Attention was drawn to the falling off in world demand, especially demanded by the United States, and the drop in prices of most of Latin America's traditional exports of raw materials. On the other hand, the resurgence of the European industrial producers, with the consequent competition for foreign markets, had favoured Latin America to some extent. A reduction of United States capital flow to Latin America, both government and private, was noted.

For Latin America as a whole, the 1953 Survey showed that the balance of payments in 1953 was maintained in equilibrium, but only as a result of drastic reductions in imports. It was recognized, however, that this was a temporary measure which, if continued too long, would inevitably have an adverse effect on economic activity and the rate of progress.

In addition to the external factors of supply and price relations, the economies of some Latin American countries were weakened by inflation. Moreover, agricultural exports, particularly of foodstuffs, were faced with increased competition from outside the area.

Mining production dropped sharply, due principally to the contraction in world demand for strategic metals. Special studies were made in the Survey of some of the problems arising from inflation and of monetary policies aimed at checking inflation in selected countries.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AND TECHNIQUE OF PROGRAMMING

The Commission at its fifth session requested the secretariat of ECLA to continue its work on general problems of economic development and the technique of programming. Emphasizing the need for studying the role of monetary and fiscal policies in promoting economic growth, it asked the secretariat to undertake studies in these fields.

The Commission specifically requested that the type of analysis contained in the "Preliminary Study of the Technique of Programming Economic Development", which was presented to ECLA's fifth session (E/CN.12/292), should be perfected, and that the refined method of analysis should be applied in the preparation of studies of development in individual countries.

ECLA's secretariat worked on the revision of the preliminary programming study, for which purpose comments were invited, and an expert visited Santiago, Chile, for a period of three months to make an appraisal of the study. It was planned to complete the revision of the study by the middle of 1954.

ECLA's secretariat also undertook a number of studies on economic development in individual countries, the purpose of which was to collect and analyse data with a view to measuring the rate of economic growth in the recent past and to prepare projects for the different sectors of the economy. It was hoped that such studies would aid governments in formulating integrated economic development programmes. Work undertaken in 1953, which would continue into 1954, included the following:

- (1) a study on the economic development of Brazil, undertaken in collaboration with the Brazilian Development Bank;
- (2) studies on the economic development of Argentina and Colombia; and
- (3) studies of the monetary policies of Chile and Peru and their effects on the economic development of these countries.

c. ECLA/TAA ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT TRAINING PROGRAMME

The Commission at its fifth session recommended that this joint Programme of ECLA and the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration be maintained and expanded as far as possible.

The scope of the training programme for 1953 was increased and covered the period from April to December inclusive. Twelve trainees from the following nine Latin American countries participated: Argentina (2), Bolivia (1), Brazil (2), Chile (2), Costa Rica (1), Ecuador (1), Guatemala (1), Mexico (1) and Nicaragua (1).

The first month of the Programme was spent in studying statistical tools, including social accounting, input-output, wealth accounting, sources and uses of funds, and resource inventories. The second month was spent in examining the experience in development of a number of Latin American countries, as well as the United States, the USSR and Japan. The next two months were devoted to studying programming techniques, this subject being the principal aim of the Training Programme, Special attention was given to development policies in the different countries.

In addition to following the general course, the participants worked on special studies dealing with the particular problems of their individual countries. These studies, which were undertaken in collaboration with economists on the staff of ECLA, included reviews of the world situation and markets, balance of payments and projections of foreign exchange receipts, evaluation of the effects of government fiscal policy on the rate of economic development, factors determining the rate of investment, and consideration of priority criteria for investment projects.

d. TECHNICAL MEETING ON BUDGETARY MANAGEMENT

A technical meeting on budgetary management was held in Mexico City in September 1953, under the auspices of ECLA, TAA and the Fiscal Division of the United Nations Secretariat. It was attended by experts from Costa Rica, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama and the United States.

The main purpose of the meeting was to examine the problems of classification, presentation and analysis of accounts in the public sector, as well as the outlines drawn up by the United Nations for the preliminary draft of a Classification Manual.

e. INDUSTRIES STUDIES

(1) Iron and Steel Transforming Industries

The Commission at its fifth session recommended that the ECLA secretariat continue work relating to the iron and steel industry and investigate, in particular, the development of the iron and steel and related transforming industries in Latin America.

Work on a general study of the iron and steel transforming industries in Latin America was accordingly initiated immediately after the session. This study, to be continued into 1954, is to present a general description of the iron and steel transforming industries in selected Latin American countries, in terms of the origin and use of raw materials, technological knowledge, skilled labour, existing equipment and the means and possibilities of acquiring or improving it, relation of investment and production costs to production processes, output and the size of the market.

A market study was undertaken of the different types of steel and the economic feasibility of establishing plants for their manufacture. The effects which these industries, and the mechanical industries which would use their output, might have on the balance of payments and on the general economy of the countries concerned was also being considered. One of the aims of this study is to indicate what types of capital goods as well as consumer goods could be produced in the area.

The first phase of the general study of the iron and steel transforming industries in Latin America consisted of a study conducted in Chile. This was done in order to determine the method of investigation best suited for carrying out the general study. A preliminary report on the Chilean study was prepared in December 1953. At the end of the year, field work was under way for a study on Brazil, and studies on Colombia, Mexico and eventually Argentina were to follow.

(2) Pulp and Paper Industry

A preliminary study of the possibilities for the development of the pulp and paper industry in Latin America (E/CN.12/294), carried out with the collaboration of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), was presented to the Commission's fifth session and subsequently published.⁸⁶ In accordance with a recommendation of the Commission, the ECLA secretariat, in conjunction with FAO and TAA and in collaboration with other specialized agencies, continued the research begun in the preliminary study.

These further studies were designed to provide the documentation for a meeting of experts on all aspects of the question, to be held in Buenos Aires, Argentina, in September 1954. This project is sponsored by ECLA, TAA and FAO, with the collaboration of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and other specialized agencies and the secretariat of the Economic Commission for Europe. The collaboration has been obtained of leading pulp and paper technicians and institutions in a number of countries in Western Europe, Canada, the United States, and Latin America. A preliminary work programme for this meeting was drawn up in Santiago immediately after the fifth session. The following tentative agenda was prepared:

(a) present and prospective demand for pulp and paper in Latin America;

⁸⁶ U.N.P., Sales No.: 1953.II.G.2.

(b) availability of Latin American raw materials for the manufacture of pulp and paper;

(c) comparison of the economics of pulp and paper manufacture from conifers, with pulp and paper manufacture from (i) Latin American tropical and sub-tropical hardwoods, (ii) Latin American plantation woods, and (iii) sugar-cane bagasse;

(d) essential steps in planning new pulp and paper industries;

(e) review of development prospects for pulp and paper industries;

(f) prospects in pulp and paper trade; and

(g) financing of Latin American pulp and paper development.

Due to a lack of industrial experience in the utilization of tropical hardwoods in the manufacture of pulp and paper, special studies are to be made in two regions which may be considered as possible sites for the industry, namely, the Yucatán Peninsula in Mexico and the Território Amapá in Brazil. These studies were to consist of preliminary forest inventories, pulping tests with the native woods, the design of wood extraction and transportation systems, and the preliminary design of pulp and paper mills.

(3) Chemical Industries

In response to a recommendation of the Commission at its fifth session, the ECLA secretariat continued its studies of the technical and economic aspects of the chemical industries, including an analysis of imports of chemical products in regard to selected countries in Latin America. Special consideration was being given to the relation between consumption of heavy chemicals and national income. Data was also collected on the consumption of nitrogen for industrial uses.

(4) Energy Studies

As a result of the Commission's recommendation at its fifth session, the ECLA secretariat began work on a study concerning the production and consumption of energy, including an examination of existing and potential energy resources, and research in the consumption of energy by different sectors of industry.

f. INTERNATIONAL AND INTER-LATIN AMERICAN TRADE

The Commission at its fifth session unanimously adopted a resolution which, inter alia, requested the ECLA secretariat to continue studies of the effects of changes in the terms of trade on the rate of development in the Latin American countries. The ECLA secretariat undertook the preparation of a paper on the "Theory of International Trade and Terms of Trade" from the point of view of the Latin American periphery. In addition to the foreign trade section of the 1953 Survey, which deals principally with trade between Latin America and Europe and the United States, work was continued, in accordance with a resolution of the Commission's fifth session, on the study of the possibilities of expanding the markets for Latin American goods by means of greater trade within the region. One part of this study, to be continued into 1955, would include:

(1) an analysis of the flow of trade between Colombia, Ecuador, Venezuela and Panama, and between Mexico, Central America and the Antilles;

(2) a study of recent developments in trade between the seven southern countries of South America;

(3) a study on inter-Latin American trade in specific raw materials and manufactured products;

(4) a study of the effects on inter-Latin American trade of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; and

(5) a study of trade problems in their relation to maritime shipping.

g. CENTRAL AMERICAN ECONOMIC INTEGRATION PROGRAMME

ECLA, in conjunction with TAA, FAO and UNESCO, has been engaged in a project designed to co-ordinate economic activities suitable to the individual countries in the area in such a way that they will mutually benefit the other countries in the region. This has involved questions concerning technical training, transport facilities, energy resources, development of specific industries, etc.

The Committee on Economic Co-operation in Central America held its second meeting at San Jose, Costa Rica, in October 1953, to review the work done since its previous meeting and to obtain the approval of member Governments for the continuation of the work programme. In addition to the reports of the Executive Secretary of ECLA and of the Resident Representative of the Technical Assistance Board and a paper on "Problems of Financing Economic Development and Integration in Central America" (E/CN.12/AC.17/27, 28 & 30 respectively), reports on other technical meetings were received.

The Committee approved a report of the Subcommittee on the Unification of Central American Tariff Nomenclature (E/CN.12/AC.17/25) which had met at Tegucigalpa, Honduras, from October 1952 to March 1953, and had recommended the adoption of a standard tariff nomenclature for Central America. The Committee noted that the project had been studied by the five governments concerned and that definite steps had been taken for its implementation. The governments were recommended to take measures to standardize tariff nomenclature covering export products, to unify customs regulations and procedures and to study means for overcoming differences in duties and other taxes on imported products which might give rise to illicit trading. The Committee constituted a new sub-committee to carry out this work.

The Committee expressed its appreciation of the work accomplished by the seminar on transportation in Central America, which was held in San Jose, Costa Rica, from 9 to 20 June 1953. The seminar, which was conducted under the auspices of ECLA, TAA and the Government of Costa Rica, published its final report under the title "Transportation in Central America" (E/CN.12/356). The report, the first complete study made of transportation problems affecting Central America, covered all methods of transport and was divided into three parts. The first part described the existing transport situation regarding each country; the second examined the regional problems affecting the different methods of transportation and made recommendations for their solution; and the third dealt with international transport problems common to the six countries, with recommendations. The Committee requested the ECLA secretariat to submit preliminary plans for implementing the recommendations of the seminar which are to be examined by meetings of Central American experts.

The Committee approved a proposal for the creation of an Advanced School of Public Administration (E/CN.12/AC.17/31). The school, scheduled to be inaugurated early in 1954, would provide theoretical and practical instruction for an initial group of 25 fellows from the Central American republics. TAA has agreed to contribute two thirds of the cost of the school and the Central American governments, jointly, are to contribute the remainder. The offer of Costa Rica to establish the institute in San Jose was accepted.

Field work was also being undertaken by groups of experts on an Institute of Industrial Technological Research; electric energy; forestry products, pulp and paper; cattle and dairy products; and technical and administrative training.

b. CO-OPERATION WITH SPECIALIZED AGENCIES AND OTHER ORGANIZATIONS

ECLA maintained co-operation with several specialized agencies. Collaboration with FAO centred on the project for economic integration in Central America and the preparation for a meeting of experts on pulp and paper to be held in 1954. Other specialized agencies participating in the project for economic integration in Central America were the International Labour Organisation (ILO), UNESCO and the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO). The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development was also consulted on this project. The International Monetary Fund co-operated with ECLA in the preparation of studies for a forthcoming meeting of experts on monetary and fiscal policies in relation to economic development. Collaboration with the Inter-American Economic and Social Council continued, and there has also been co-operation with a number of non-governmental organizations.

i. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS SIXTEENTH SESSION

The report of the fifth session of ECLA (E/2405) was considered by the Economic and Social Council during its sixteenth session, at its 718th, 719th and 721st plenary meetings, held on 9 and 10 July. In addition to ECLA's report, the Council had before it a statement of financial implications (E/2405/Add.1) submitted by the Secretary-General, which said that the $15,000 estimated additional costs for 1953 could be absorbed within the 1953 budget appropriation and that for 1954 an increase of $63,360 would be required.

In presenting ECLA's report, the Executive Secretary, at the Council's 718th meeting, stressed that, notwithstanding the significant increases in per capita income in Latin America in recent years, an acceleration of the rate of economic growth with corresponding structural changes in production and trade and, in many countries, an expansion of industrial capacity would be required if the gap between living standards in Latin American countries and in the industrially advanced countries were to be narrowed within a reasonable space of time. However, he said, the participation of Latin America in international trade could be expected to grow with the rise in per capita income.

The Council members expressed satisfaction with the work of ECLA and there was general agreement that The Economic Survey of Latin America, 1951-52 had made an important contribution to the understanding of the problems of the region. Certain representatives, including those of Argentina and Venezuela, commented favourably on the practical direction which had been given to the activities of ECLA, as exemplified in its studies on intra-regional trade (E/CN.12/304),⁸⁷

the economic integration of the Central American States (E/CN.12/296) and the possibilities for developing the iron and steel and the pulp and paper industries in Latin America (E/CN.12/293 & E/CN.12/294).⁸⁸

The attention given by ECLA to the development of agriculture was commended. The representative of Cuba stated that, in practice, the Latin American countries were prevented from expanding their agricultural production by various difficulties such as, for example, the total lack of fuel or electric power, which made it impossible to export certain agricultural products in substantial quantities. It was for this reason, among others, that Latin American countries were seeking a balanced development of their agricultural and industrial resources. On the other hand, the representative of France, in particular, argued that it was necessary for Latin American countries to raise considerably the output of agricultural products so as to provide an adequate basis for industrial development.

The representative of Belgium expressed reservations concerning references in ECLA's report to the need for replacing imports of industrial goods by domestic products, which he considered appeared to imply a trend towards autarky. The statement of the Executive Secretary, he said, made it clear, however, that there would be scope for an expansion of inter-regional trade and co-operation as the incomes of Latin American countries rose.

The representative of the United States welcomed the growing diversification of the Latin American economy which, in the absence of excessive protectionism, would provide a basis for enlarged trade between Latin America and the rest of the world. In this connexion, the representative of Belgium suggested that Latin American countries might be interested in adhering to a trade and payments system along the lines of the European Payments Union.

Two amendments to the draft resolution proposed by ECLA (E/2405, p. 36) were submitted. One by Argentina, Cuba, Venezuela and Uruguay (E/L.528/Rev.1—originally submitted as a substitute draft resolution (E/L.528)) would add a paragraph recognizing the importance of the work being done by ECLA and would amend the first operative paragraph to have the Council note with appreciation the Commission's report. An amendment by France, India and the United States (E/L.529) proposed to add to the first paragraph a reference to the views expressed during the discussions at the Commission's fifth session and to delete the remaining paragraphs of the resolution. These paragraphs would have the Council: consider the Commission's work programme of primary importance to the economic development of Latin America; endorse the priorities allocated by the Commission to individual work projects; recommend that the necessary funds should be made available; and take note of the Commission's decision to hold its sixth session in Bogota.

The Council, at its 721st plenary meeting on 10 July, unanimously adopted a compromise draft resolution (E/L.530) submitted jointly by Argentina, Cuba, France, India, the United States, Uruguay and Venezuela. In the resolution adopted (485(XVI)), the Council, after recognizing the importance of ECLA's work, took note of its annual report and the views expressed at the Commission's fifth session, endorsed the priorities allocated by the Commission to the individual work projects and took note of the arrangements made by the Commission to hold its sixth session in Bogota, Colombia.

K. HUMAN RIGHTS

1. Draft International Covenants on Human Rights and Measures of Implementation

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

In accordance with Council resolution 440 A (XIV),⁸⁹ the Commission on Human Rights proceeded at its ninth session, held from 7 April to 30 May 1953, to consider the draft International Covenants on Human Rights and measures of implementation in the light of the instructions contained in previous resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Economic and Social Council⁹⁰ and on the basis of the report of its eighth session (E/2256). The major part of the session was devoted to this work.

The Commission drafted (E/2447) a number of articles dealing with additional rights for inelusion in the draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, based on proposals submitted at previous sessions and on a draft resolution adopted by the Commission on the Status of Women concerning the inclusion in the draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of the text of article 16 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights relating to marriage and family rights.⁹¹ It adopted seven new articles:

⁸⁹ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 447-48.

- (1) on the rights to vote, to be elected and to hold public office;
- (2) on the treatment of persons deprived of liberty and on the penitentiary system;
- (3) on the rights of minorities;
- (4) on equal rights of men and women;
- (5) on the protection of the privacy, home, correspondence, honour and reputation of the individual;
- (6) on condemnation of incitement to hatred and violence; and
- (7) on the right to marry and to found a family.

It was not able, however, to discuss certain draft additional articles, such as that concerning the right of property, for inclusion in the draft Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

With regard to measures of implementation of the draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Commission revised the text of most of these articles, but made no far-reaching changes. It rejected a proposal to reduce the membership of the Human Rights Committee from nine to seven, as well as a proposal that the members should be elected by the Assembly instead of by the International Court of Justice. It also rejected proposals:

- (1) to grant the Committee the right to receive and consider communications from non-governmental organizations, groups of individuals and individuals concerning the non-observance of any provision by States parties;
- (2) to allow the Committee to take the initiative in cases where it considered that non-observance of any provision of the Covenant was sufficiently serious;
- (3) to permit the Committee to accept, for information, petitions from persons who complained that they were victims of violations of the Covenant; and
- (4) to exclude from the Committee's competence the power to deal with communications regarding the right of self-determination.

The Commission drafted two new articles on implementation. The first of these would grant to a State party complained of or lodging a complaint the right to bring the case to the International Court of Justice in the event of the failure of the Committee to reach a solution. The other article related to the implementation of the right of peoples to self-determination. The Commission did not consider measures of implementation of the draft Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

In the time available, the Commission was unable to carry out the other instructions of the General Assembly and the Council, and in particular to consider the federal State clause, the final clauses, the question of reservations, the question of applying the provisions relating to a Human Rights Committee to the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the examination of the provisions relating to the system of periodic reports and its application to the two Covenants.

A proposal by the USSR to request the Council to suggest to the General Assembly that it review its decision concerning the drafting of two covenants instead of one was rejected.

Reference was made by the Chairman of the Commission to the fact that the text of the article on the territorial application of the Covenant, prepared by the General Assembly, was included in the annex of the Commission's report relating to both Covenants; it followed that that article was considered as being applicable to both draft Covenants.

In annex I of the Commission's report (E/2447), section A contained the provisions of the draft Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights drafted at the eighth session of the Commission; section B contained the provisions of the draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as prepared at the eighth and ninth sessions, including provisions on implementation through the establishment of a human rights committee; section C contained the article on the territorial application clause adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 422(V); and sections D and E contained respectively the draft articles on a system of periodic reports drafted at the seventh session, and the final clauses drafted at the sixth session. Annex II included proposals for an additional article on the right of property to be included in the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, for a federal State article, for the final clauses and for the establishment of an office of a United Nations High Commissioner (Attorney-General) for Human Rights.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS SIXTEENTH SESSION

The Council decided, at the 236th meeting of its Social Committee on 8 July, not to deal with the substance of the Commission's report (E/2447) relating to the draft Covenants, but to confine its discussion to the procedural question of whether to refer the matter to the General Assembly or back to the Commission. Varying opinions were expressed on this subject at the 256th to 240th meetings of the Social Committee, from 8 to 10 July 1953.

The representatives of Chile, India, the Philippines, Uruguay, the USSR and Yugoslavia preferred to send the report of the Commission on Human Rights (E/2447) to the General Assembly rather than to refer the draft Covenants back to the Commission. Among their reasons were that: the Commission had completed its assignment; the issues outstanding were political and could only be solved by the Assembly; the Assembly should be asked, at least, for guidance on outstanding issues; and it would be helpful to ascertain the views of governments not represented on the Commission.

On the other hand, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, Turkey, the United Kingdom and Venezuela held that the draft Covenants should be returned to the Commission. They pointed out, inter alia, that: the Covenants were far from complete and that the Commission should, as far as possible, produce a final version before sending the two texts to the Assembly; effective agreement in the Assembly was more likely once the Commission had formed its own conclusions on outstanding questions; a small technical group was best able to do the work; and it would imply lack of faith in the Commission to send the report directly to the Assembly.

As a compromise, the representative of Egypt proposed a draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.149) which:

(1) would request the Commission to complete the preparation of the Covenants, concentrating exclusively on those parts not touched upon at its ninth session; and

(2) would, at the same time, request the Assembly to provide directives on certain specific questions to simplify the Commission's task.

The representative of Chile⁹² proposed (E/AC.7/L.150) alternatively that the Council should request the Secretary-General to transmit the report to Member States for comments by 1 January 1954 so that the Commission might consider them at its tenth session.

India, the Philippines and Uruguay presented an amendment (E/AC.7/L.151) to the Egyptian draft resolution which would have the effect of transmitting the work of the Commission directly to the Assembly instead of asking the Commission to complete its work.

The Committee at its 238th meeting on 9 July set up a working party consisting of the representatives of Argentina, Egypt, India, the Philippines, Sweden, the United Kingdom and Uruguay and of the observer for the Government of Chile to draft a single text. The working party submitted a text (E/AC.7/L.153) at the following meeting, which was subsequently adopted with minor amendment.

The Committee rejected, by 9 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions, a proposal⁹³ that the Secretary-General be requested to place the report on the Assembly's agenda as a separate item, and adopted, by 10 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions, a United States amendment (E/AC.7/L.154), to specify that the comments requested should be submitted not later than 1 January 1954 so that the Commission might have them available at its next session.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Social Committee (E/2482 A), at its 240th meeting on 10 July, in paragraph-by-paragraph votes, ranging from a unanimous vote to 12 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, and as a whole, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. The Council adopted the Committee's draft resolution, at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August, by 14 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 501 B (XVI).

By this resolution, the Council noted the progress made by the Commission in the drafting of the Covenants, requested the Commission to complete the drafting of the Covenants during its tenth session, and transmitted the report of the ninth session of the Commission to the General Assembly at its eighth session. The resolution also requested the Secretary-General to communicate the report of the ninth session of the Commission to Member States, the specialized agencies and the non-governmental organizations concerned for their observations, to be submitted not later than 1 January 1954.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The General Assembly discussed aspects of the Covenants during the general debate of the Third Committee, at its 503rd to 511th meetings, on 22 and 26 to 30 October and 2 and 3 November, on Chapters IV (Social Questions) and V (Human Rights) of the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430) and, specifically, at the Committee's 518th to 521st, 523rd and 524th meetings, from 11 to 16 November 1953.

The question was raised of the need for directives from the Assembly to the Commission on Human Rights on the federal State clause, reservations, and the right of petition. The arguments for and against this procedure were similar to those raised in the Council. Among those favouring directives from the Assembly were the representatives of China, Costa Rica, Egypt, India and the Philippines. Those opposed included the representatives of Belgium, Canada, France, Turkey, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR. Some representatives, including those of Afghanistan, the Byelorussian SSR and Poland, thought that the question of a single covenant should be reopened. The representative of Saudi Arabia preferred a single covenant, but stated that he would not press the point.

With regard to reservations, the representative of India thought it advisable to allow reservations to the Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, but not to the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The representative of Syria also thought that reservations should be permitted, but limited as to articles and the time during which they would apply. The representatives of Egypt, France and the Philippines also pointed out that to allow too many reservations would weaken the force of the Covenants and expressed the view that certain articles should not be open to reservation.

The Committee, at its 518th to 521st meetings on 11, 12 and 13 November, had before it two draft resolutions relating to a federal State clause.

A draft resolution by Egypt (A/C.3/L.366) proposed, inter alia, that the General Assembly should request the Commission on Human Rights not to include provisions relating to federal States in the draft International Covenants on Human Rights.

A draft resolution by Australia proposed (A/C.3/L.374) that the General Assembly should request the Council:

(1) to draw the attention of the Commission on Human Rights to Assembly resolution 421(V) calling for a study of the question of a federal State clause; and

(2) to invite Member States and the specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations concerned to review the Assembly's discussion of the federal State article at its fifth and eighth sessions and, with this discussion in mind, to include their views on the question in their observations submitted to the Secretary-General under Council resolution 501 B (XVI). The available time for submission of these comments would be extended to 1 February 1954.

A number of representatives expressed themselves against the inclusion of a federal State clause. The representatives of the Dominican Republic, Egypt, Iraq and Mexico, among others, held that such a clause was out of place in covenants on human rights, the universality of which should be ensured. The representatives of Guatemala, Syria and Yugoslavia were of the opinion that to include a federal State article would discriminate in favour of federal States and might, on that account, discourage non-federal States from signing the Covenants. The representatives of Egypt and Yugoslavia also expressed the view that a federal State article might be applied by Metropolitan Powers to their dependent territories and that its adoption would be tantamount to an outright repeal of the article on the territorial application of the Covenants which the Assembly had adopted (resolution 422(V)) and which was now incorporated in the draft Covenants.

The representatives of Denmark, Egypt and Saudi Arabia suggested that the constitutional difficulties of federal States might be overcome by the use of reservations at the time of signature. The Pakistan representative agreed, but thought it necessary for federal States themselves to decide whether or not a federal State clause should be included. The representatives of Egypt and Yugoslavia also suggested that federal governments could secure the agreement of all their constituent units before signing the Covenants.

Other representatives, including those of Australia, Canada and the United States, held that to omit the federal State clause would constitute an insuperable barrier to ratification of the Covenants by federal States. The representatives of India and the United States stressed that a majority of unitary States should not attempt to force the hand of federal States which had particular constitutional difficulties. The representative of New Zealand also pointed out that to decide at this time against the inclusion of a federal State clause would prejudice the question of reservations.

A number of representatives, including those of Brazil, Cuba and France, were of the opinion that a decision on this important question would be premature without further study. The representatives of Afghanistan, Bolivia and Chile thought that the Commission on Human Rights, as a body of experts, was the most appropriate organ to study the matter first. The representative of Afghanistan therefore proposed (A/C.3/L.387) that the Egyptian proposal be amended to invite the Commission on Human Rights to decide, in the light of the Assembly's discussion at its eighth session, whether or not it was necessary to include a federal State clause in the Covenants.

The representative of Guatemala thought that the International Court of Justice should be consulted, and proposed an amendment (A/C.3/L.388) to the Egyptian draft resolution by which the Assembly would, instead, request the Court for an opinion on the desirability or undesirability of including a federal State clause in the Covenants, having regard to the universal application of those rights and the constitutional problems of some federal States. The amendment would also have the Assembly request the Commission on Human Rights not to consider the matter before the Court had delivered its opinion.

The representative of Egypt made a proposal, which was formally submitted by the representative of Saudi Arabia. The draft resolution (A/C.3/L.389) proposed that the Assembly transmit to the Commission on Human Rights the draft resolutions and amendments submitted to the Committee, together with the records of its debate, and request the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps to ensure that the members of the Commission would receive the documents not less than two weeks before the opening of its tenth session. In view of this proposal, the representative of Afghanistan withdrew his amendment to the Egyptian draft resolution.

Some representatives, among them those of Peru, the USSR and Uruguay, thought that it was unnecessary to adopt a formal resolution, since the Saudi Arabian proposal seemed to appear to have the general agreement of the Committee. However, the majority thought that a clear indication of the Committee's wishes should be expressed by a formal resolution, and the proposal was adopted (A/2573 V A) by 40 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, at the Committee's 521st meeting on 13 November.

It was adopted by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November 1953, by 50 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 737 A (VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolution 421 (V), section C, of 4 December 1950,

"Having discussed the draft resolutions contained in documents A/C.3/L.366 and A/C.3/L.374 and the amendment contained in document A/C.3/L.388,

"1. Decides to transmit these draft resolutions and the amendment to the Commission on Human Rights, together with the records of the meetings of the Third Committee relating to the federal clause;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps to ensure that the members of the Commission on Human Rights receive the above-mentioned documents not less than two weeks before the opening of the tenth session of the Commission."

The Third Committee discussed, at its 523rd and 524th meetings on 16 November, a proposal by Ecuador, Egypt, Guatemala, the Philippines and Uruguay (A/C.3/L.372) concerning the right of petition. The draft resolution, which was revised (A/C.3/L.372/Rev.1) to take account of drafting amendments by Afghanistan (A/C.3/L.390), would request the Commission on Human Rights to draft provisions recognizing the right of petition of every natural person, every duly constituted group of individuals and every recognized non-governmental organization, for inclusion in the draft Covenants, in accordance with the decision of the Assembly contained in resolution 421 F (V) and in the light of discussions at its present session.

Among the arguments advanced in support of this proposal by, among others, the representatives of Denmark, India, Iraq, Israel, Mexico and Syria, were the following:

(1) that, without the inclusion of provisions extending the right of petition to individuals, groups and non-governmental organizations, the whole value of the Covenants would be in question;

(2) that General Assembly resolution 421 F (V) was the equivalent of an instruction to the Commission on Human Rights to include the right of petition in the Covenants;

(3) that individuals and non-governmental organizations had, in most countries, the right to petition their national governments, and that, since the Covenants attempted to place human rights under international protection, the individual should be accorded the right of international petition;

(4) that to restrict the right of petition to States would lead to an increase in international friction; and

(5) that States were free to ratify or not to ratify the Covenants and could not therefore claim that to grant the right of petition to individuals and organizations would constitute an infringement of domestic jurisdiction.

Others, including the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Brazil, Cuba, Ethiopia, France, Honduras, New Zealand and Yugoslavia, argued:

(1) that to extend the right of petition to individuals and organizations would lead to intervention in the domestic affairs of States and would violate Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter;

(2) that the principle of the sovereign equality of Member States might also be infringed, since States which had not signed the Covenants would be in a position to invite individuals or non-governmental organizations to submit complaints against States which were parties to the Covenants;

(3) that the position of individuals in international law had not yet been established and that it would not be wise to attempt to achieve too much at one time; and

(4) that international relations were not yet so far developed that the right of petition could be granted in such general terms.

The representatives of Chile, China and Yugoslavia also thought that the question was one that the Commission on Human Rights should decide. The representatives of China and Saudi Arabia thought that it would be wiser for the Committee to take a decision similar to that adopted in the case of the federal State clause and the representative of China presented a formal proposal (A/C.3/L.391) to that effect.

It was adopted by the Committee (A/2573 V B), at its 524th meeting on 16 November, by 34 votes to 3, with 10 abstentions, and by the General Assembly at its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November 1953, by 45 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions, as resolution 737 B (VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolutions 421(V), section F, of 4 December 1950 and 547(VI) of 5 February 1952,

"Having discussed the draft resolution contained in document A/C.3/L.372/Rev.1 on the right of petition,

"Decides to transmit the draft resolution to the Commission on Human Rights, at its tenth session, together with the records of the discussion thereon in the Third Committee."

2. Development of the Work of the United Nations for Wider Observance of, and Respect for, Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms

The Commission on Human Rights, at its ninth session, considered together two items on its agenda relating, respectively, to the development of the work of the United Nations for wider observance of, and respect for, human rights and fundamental freedoms throughout the world, and annual reports on human rights. It had before it the memorandum by the Secretary-General (E/1900) on the development of a Twenty-Year Programme for achieving peace through the United Nations. It also had before it two notes by the Secretary-General (E/CN.4/535 & Add.1), containing background information on the subject and certain suggestions for future activities in the field of human rights, and a memorandum (E/CN.4/567) relating to annual reports.

Four draft resolutions were submitted. The first (E/CN.4/L.266/Rev.2) envisaged a programme for annual reports on developments in the field of human rights by Member Governments and their review by the Commission. The second (E/CN.4/L.268)⁹⁴ proposed the initiation by the Commission of a series of studies on specific aspects of human rights on a world-wide basis with the assistance of expert advisers to be appointed by the Secretary-General. The third (E/CN.4/L.267/Rev.1) proposed the establishment of advisory services in the field of human rights on lines somewhat similar to the existing advisory social welfare services. The fourth draft (E/CN.4/L.286) proposed changes in the procedure for handling communications whereby allegations of violations of human rights might be brought to the attention of the governments concerned and of the Council.

The Commission resolved (E/2447) not to take any decision on the proposal, submitted by Egypt, India, the Philippines and Uruguay, on communications. It was unable to complete consideration of the other three proposals, submitted by the United States, and it transmitted them, together with the amendments submitted thereto and the records of the discussion thereon, to the Economic and Social Council, with a recommendation (E/2447 I) that the Council decide to transmit the documents concerned to Member States and specialized agencies with a request that they submit their comments to the Secretary-General by 1 October 1953.

During the discussion at the Council's sixteenth session, at the 240th meeting of its Social Committee on 10 July 1953, the representative of the United Kingdom expressed the view that governments could not be expected to reply by 1 October 1953 and that 1 January 1954 would be a more appropriate date and would still enable the Commission to consider the replies at its tenth session. The representatives of Sweden and Yugoslavia doubted whether the Commission should be specifically requested to consider the replies of governments at its tenth session, when it would be occupied with the drafting of the Covenants.

The representatives of China, Egypt and the United States, however, considered it desirable that comments of governments and specialized agencies should be received before the forthcoming session of the General Assembly in order to provide additional guidance should a comprehensive debate develop in the Assembly. The Committee, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, adopted an oral United States amendment to request the comments by 1 October "in so far as possible". The draft resolution, as thus amended, was adopted by the Committee by 16 votes to 2 (E/2882 & Corr.1 B), and by the Council, at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August 1953, by 15 votes to 2.

⁹⁴ Amendments were submitted to this proposal by France (E/CN.4/L.304/Rev.1); Yugoslavia (E/CN.4/L.305/Rev.1, 306 and 307); Egypt and India (E/CN.4/L.308); and Chile (E/CN.4/L.309/Rev.1).

By this resolution (501 C (XVI)), the Council transmitted the draft resolutions submitted to the Commission and the amendments thereto (see above) to Member States and to the specialized agencies and requested them to submit their comments on the proposals to the Secretary-General in so far as possible by 1 October 1953.

At the General Assembly's eighth session during the Third Committee's general debate, at its 503rd to 511th meetings, on 22 and 26 to 30 October and 2 and 3 November, concerning Chapters IV (Social Questions) and V (Human Rights) of the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430), the representative of Egypt submitted a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.367 & Add.1) on this question. This draft, of which the representative of the Philippines subsequently became a co-sponsor (A/C.3/L.367/Add.2), was considered specifically at the Committee's 527th to 529th meetings, from 18 to 20 November, and at the Assembly's 460th plenary meeting on 28 November 1953.

The draft resolution, noting that the Commission on Human Rights had considered three draft resolutions (E/CN.4/L.266/Rev.2, E/CN.4/L.267/Rev.1 & E/CN.4/L.268) concerning development of the work of the United Nations for wider observance of, and respect for, human rights and fundamental freedoms throughout the world, and that the Economic and Social Council had requested Member States and specialized agencies to submit their comments on them and the amendments thereto to the Secretary-General in so far as possible by 1 October 1953, would request the Council to ask the Commission:

(1) to consider at its tenth session the three draft resolutions and to prepare recommendations thereon, in order that these recommendations might be considered by the Council at its eighteenth session; and

(2) to take account of the comments made by Member States and specialized agencies and of the views expressed at the General Assembly's eighth session.

Syria proposed an amendment (A/C.3/L.370) to the draft resolution which, as orally corrected by the Syrian representative, would ask the Commission:

(1) to consider the three draft resolutions at its tenth session "after completing the drafting of the two Covenants on Human Rights and its consideration of the other important matters pending"; and

(2) to prepare recommendations "if possible".

He accepted an oral Afghanistan amendment to rephrase the second amendment to state "if possible, to supplement the provisions of the Covenants on Human Rights . . .".

The debate in the Committee centred principally on the possible significance in relation to the drafting of the Covenants on Human Rights of the three draft resolutions submitted to the Commission on Human Rights. The majority of representatives agreed that the principal task of the Commission on Human Rights should be to complete the preparation of the draft Covenants.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia and Poland felt that, in the light of the recent statement that the United States Government did not intend to sign any conventions on human rights, the United States proposals contained in the three draft resolutions were intended to constitute an alternative method of protecting human rights and that to approve them would be to abandon the work on the Covenants. The United States representative, on the other hand, stated that her Government would continue to co-operate in drafting the Covenants and was not trying to sidetrack them. The United States view, she said, was that covenants were not the only means of ensuring respect for human rights and she pointed out that in certain matters, such as the status of women, the protection of minorities, freedom of information, forced labour and war prisoners, the United Nations was continuing its efforts by other means. The representative of France also considered that the two methods were not mutually exclusive. The sponsors of the draft resolution stated that it was in no way the purpose of their text that the three draft resolutions should hinder the completion of the work on the draft Covenants; the programme envisaged was intended to supplement the Covenants.

The representatives of Chile and Cuba thought that the proposals would span the transitional period until the Covenants were adopted. The Yugoslav representative suggested that the proposals could at the most be regarded as a trial for the measures of implementation in the Covenants until such time as the Covenants came into force. The representative of Afghanistan, while considering the proposals of value, thought it premature to consider them at the present stage.

The representatives of Argentina, Iraq, Peru, Venezuela and the Union of South Africa supported the draft resolution on the understanding that it was purely procedural and did not commit delegations as to the substance of the three proposals. A number of other representatives, including those of Afghanistan, New Zealand and Saudi Arabia, also reserved their Governments' position on the substance of the proposals.

The Canadian representative stated that she would abstain on the Syrian amendments since it was neither advisable nor necessary to give such directions on priority to the Commission on Human Rights.

The representatives of France and the United Kingdom expressed the view that the second part of the first Syrian amendment, referring to "other important matters pending", would have the effect, if strictly interpreted, of indefinitely postponing consideration of the three proposals. On the proposal of the Greek representative, the Committee decided by 25 votes to 10, with 7 abstentions, to vote on the first Syrian amendment in two parts, the first part referring only to the drafting of the Covenants. The representative of Syria stated that, should the first part of the amendment be adopted and the second rejected, some delegations might claim that the three United States proposals should be considered immediately after the completion of the draft Covenants to the detriment of priority for the recently adopted resolution on the right of peoples and nations to self-determination. He therefore withdrew the whole of his first amendment.

The second Syrian amendment was adopted by 27 votes to 3, with 15 abstentions.

The joint draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by the Third Committee (A/2573(VII)), at its 529th meeting on 20 November, by a roll-call vote of 36 to 5, with 7 abstentions.

It was adopted by the General Assembly at its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November, without discussion, by 47 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 739(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that, under Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter, the Members of the United Nations have pledged themselves to take joint and separate action to promote universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

"Desiring to advance as rapidly as possible respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms and to stimulate Member States to press forward toward attaining the goals set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

"Noting that the Commission on Human Rights, at its ninth session, considered three draft resolutions concerning the development of the work of the United Nations for wider observance of, and respect for, human rights and fundamental freedoms throughout the world,

"Noting that the Economic and Social Council, in resolution 501 C (XVI) of 3 August 1953, requested Member States and specialized agencies to submit their comments on the draft resolutions and the amendments thereto to the Secretary-General in so far as possible by 1 October 1953,

"Requests the Economic and Social Council to ask the Commission on Human Rights:

"(a) To consider, at its tenth session, the three draft resolutions concerning the development of the work of the United Nations for wider observance of, and respect for, human rights and fundamental freedoms throughout the world, and to prepare, if possible, to supplement the provisions of the Covenants on Human Rights, recommendations thereon, in order that these recommendations may be considered by the Economic and Social Council at its eighteenth session;

"(b) To take account, at its tenth session, of the comments made by Member States and specialized agencies and of the views expressed on this subject at the eighth session of the General Assembly."

3. Communications Concerning Human Rights

In accordance with resolution 75(V) of the Economic and Social Council, as amended by resolution 275 B (X),⁹⁵ the Secretary-General prepared two lists of communications for the ninth session of the Commission on Human Rights:

(1) A non-confidential list of communications (E/CN.4/CR.22 and Add.1) dealing with the principles involved in the promotion of respect for human rights. This list contained summaries of or references to 352 communications received during the period 28 April 1952 to 31 March 1953.

(2) A confidential list of other communications, i.e., complaints and alleged violations of human rights (H.R. Communications List No. 3 & List No. 3/Add.1). This list, which was presented to the Commission in a private meeting, contained summaries of or references to 2,118 communications received during the period 7 May 1952 to 7 March 1953. Of these communications 1,562 alleged persecution on political grounds, the majority of them (1,352) relating to one country. Other communications alleged discrimination and violations of the rights of minorities (96), denial of the right of fair trial (56), infringements of trade union rights (42), denial of the right to freedom of movement (30), violations of freedom of religion (29), denial of the right of self-determination (22) and inhuman use of germ warfare (92). The remaining communications related to a variety of subjects, such as genocide, status of women, cruel and inhuman punishment, freedom of information and of the press, freedom of assembly, right of asylum, old age rights, refugees, right to a nationality and statelessness.

Also distributed at the private meeting were fifteen observations from governments (H.R. Communications Nos. 26-39, E/2371).

The Commission noted the distribution of the lists of communications, and decided to make public the record of the meeting.

⁹⁵ See Y.U.N., 1950, p. 534.

Similar lists of communications relating to the status of women were presented to the seventh session of the Commission on the Status of Women.

At its ninth session, the Commission on Human Rights also discussed the question of communications during its consideration of the question of the development of the work of the United Nations for wider observance of, and respect for, human rights and fundamental freedoms throughout the world. The Commission had before it a draft resolution submitted by Egypt, India, the Philippines and Uruguay (E/CN.4/L.286) according to which the Economic and Social Council would request:

(1) that the Commission forward to governments for their comments communications which it considered to contain alleged violations sufficiently serious to justify such action;

(2) that the Commission transmit to the Council communications—and any replies from governments thereto—which it considered should be drawn to the Council's attention and, also, that the Commission make any appropriate recommendations thereon; and

(3) that the Secretary-General submit a report to the Commission suggesting appropriate changes in the procedure for handling communications in the light of the present resolution.

The Commission, however, voted not to take any decision on the draft resolution.

At the 521st and 522nd meetings of the Third Committee on 13 November, the Assembly discussed an Egyptian proposal (A/C.3/L.368), which had been presented during the Committee's general debate on Chapter V (Human Rights) of the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430).

The draft resolution proposed that the Assembly decide that, pending the entry into force of the Covenants on Human Rights, the Commission on Human Rights would:

(1) transmit to governments, for their comments, communications received by the United Nations containing allegations of violations of human rights which it regarded as serious enough to justify reference to the governments concerned; and

(2) transmit to the Council such communications, together with the replies or comments by governments, as the Commission considered should be brought to the Council's attention.

At the suggestion of the representative of China during the discussion, the representative of Egypt amended the first operative paragraph of his proposal to read: "Request the Secretary-General to transmit to governments . . .".

The representative of Egypt stated that the current procedure for dealing with communications as laid down in Council resolutions 75(V), 192 A (VIII) and 275 B (X) was very unsatisfactory and damaged the prestige of the United Nations and of the Commission on Human Rights. The Commission's terms of reference, he argued, authorized it to submit proposals, recommendations and reports on "any other matter concerning human rights" and that this entitled it to make recommendations on its own initiative in the matter. It would be preferable, he thought, to discontinue the practice of bringing communications to the attention of the Commission on Human Rights if the Commission were not given an opportunity of taking some further action on them than was possible under the current procedure.

Speaking in support of the proposal, the representative of Ecuador said that, while the draft resolution before the Committee might not be very far reaching, it might, through moral pressure, restrain governments from violating human rights.

The representatives of Belgium, France and Peru, in opposing the draft resolution, argued that it would confer on the Commission on Human Rights quasi-judicial functions which that Commission was not competent to fulfil. Until the Covenants were completed, there was no legal definition of human rights on which the Commission could base its judgment with regard to alleged violations. The representatives of Afghanistan, France and the United Kingdom also expressed the opinion that it would be very difficult to establish criteria to decide when a violation was "serious enough" to justify reference to the governments concerned. The representatives of Greece and the United States pointed out that adoption of the proposal would cause such an increase in the number of communications received that the Commission on Human Rights would be unable to deal with them, and that false hopes would be raised on the part of the authors of communications, which would be damaging to the prestige of the United Nations. The Peruvian representative considered also that the transmission to governments of such confidential communications would create international tension. The representatives of France and the United Kingdom also stated that the Charter did not provide the right of individual petition except on Trusteeship matters.

The Committee, at its 522nd meeting on 13 November, rejected the first paragraph of the operative part of the draft resolution by a roll-call vote of 26 to 11, with 12 abstentions, and the second by a roll-call vote of 26 to 9, with 13 abstentions. The Chairman observed that, since the operative part of the draft resolution had been rejected, it followed that the resolution had been rejected as a whole.

4. Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities

The Commission on Human Rights, at its ninth session, from 7 April to 30 May 1953, considered the reports of the fourth and fifth sessions of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities (E/CN.4/641 & Corr.1 & E/CN.4/670 & Corr.1), which had been held from 1 to 16 October 1951, and from 22 September to 10 October 1952, respectively.

The reports of these sessions were discussed under four main headings: recommendations relating to prevention of discrimination; recommendations relating to protection of minorities; general recommendations; and recommendations on the programme of work of the Sub-Commission. The Commission took note (E/2447) of the reports of the two sessions of the Sub-Commission and made recommendations for consideration by the Economic and Social Council.

The Council at its sixteenth session considered the Commission's report, at the 250th to 256th meetings of its Social Committee from 24 to 31 July, and at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August 1953. The questions of the acceleration of the ratification of the Convention on Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide⁹⁶ and of technical assistance in the fields of prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities were subsequently considered by the General Assembly at its eighth session. The action taken under the headings mentioned above is given below.

The Commission on Human Rights also elected⁹⁷ members of the Sub-Commission to take office on 1 January 1954 and invited the Council to provide that the Sub-Commission should meet at least once a year in a session lasting three weeks and to convene the next session in January 1954 in order that the Sub-Commission's report might be discussed by the Commission at its tenth session.

The Council, at its sixteenth session, at the 253rd meeting of the Social Committee on 27 July, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and at the 746th plenary meeting on 3 August, by the same vote, adopted a resolution (502 A (XVI)), in which, noting its previous decision⁹⁸ that the Sub-Commission in principle be convened as early as possible in 1954 so that its report could be discussed at the tenth session of the Commission and having considered the Commission's resolution, it decided that the Sub-Commission should meet at least once a year and that each session should last three weeks.

a. PREVENTION OF DISCRIMINATION

In the field of prevention of discrimination, the Commission on Human Rights considered recommendations on the collection of anti-discrimination provisions, the abolition of discriminatory measures, the preparation of studies on erroneous views concerning religion, the co-operation of non-governmental organizations, the position of persons born out of wedlock and the acceleration of ratification of the Genocide Convention.

The Commission rejected the recommendation relating to the preparation of studies on erroneous views concerning religion. It considered that such studies should be undertaken only by theologians and philosophers and expressed the fear that discussion of such matters in United Nations organs might increase rather than lessen misunderstanding. However, it approved the Sub-Commission's recommendation on the collection of anti-discrimination provisions and requested the Secretary-General "to arrange for anti-discrimination provisions, in particular those formulated under the League of Nations system or by organs of, or under the auspices of, the United Nations, to be collected, made available, and kept up to date, to serve as a body of suitable precedents for use when constitutional or statutory provisions are to be elaborated".

(1) Abolition of Discriminatory Measures

The Commission on Human Rights endorsed the Sub-Commission's recommendation on the abolition of discriminatory measures and added a reference to resolution 644(VII)⁹⁹ of the General Assembly relating to racial discrimination in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It proposed (E/2447 B) that the Economic and Social Council:

(1) note resolutions 323(IV) and 644(VII) of the General Assembly and 127(VI) of the Trusteeship Council;

(2) consider that the prevention of discrimination in Metropolitan territories is as important as prevention of discrimination in Trust and other Non-Self-Governing Territories;

⁹⁶ For discussion of this item, see pp. 687-89.

⁹⁷ See p. 32.

⁹⁸ Adopted at its 707th plenary meeting on 1 July during the discussion of the calendar of conferences.

⁹⁹ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 575-76.

(3) consider further that in certain countries or territories minorities might exist which require protection otherwise than by implementation of the principle of non-discrimination; and

(4) recommend to Member Governments that they review their national legislation and administrative practices with a view to abolishing all measures of discrimination that might exist in countries and territories under their jurisdiction and with a view to taking effective measures for the protection of minorities, if any, in those countries and territories.

The Economic and Social Council discussed the question at the 251st and 253rd to 256th meetings of its Social Committee, on 24, 27, 30 and 31 July, and at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August 1953.

During the debate, the representative of Yugoslavia pointed out that certain minority groups would not be covered unless the recommendation referred to all States, and proposed an amendment (E/AC.7/L.174) to that effect. The representative of Belgium also proposed (E/AC.7/L.179) that the resolution should refer to independent States rather than Metropolitan territories and that the idea of progressive action should be embodied in the resolution to make it more acceptable to all governments.

The representatives of Argentina, Uruguay and Venezuela, among others, were of the opinion that the persistence of discriminatory measures should be regarded as an international problem likely to endanger peace. In Latin America, they stated, there were no minority problems that could engender international disputes, because the civic rights of all nationals of those countries were safeguarded by law. However, communities of immigrants should not be given privileged treatment provided they were not denied or obstructed in their exercise of certain common rights. The representatives of Argentina and Venezuela proposed an amendment (E/AC.7/L.178) to give effect to this point. The majority felt that the joint amendment, as presented, was not clear and a substitute draft resolution was submitted by Argentina, Belgium, Venezuela and Yugoslavia (E/AC.7/L.184) incorporating this idea in the joint amendment, as well as those expressed by Belgium and Yugoslavia.

The operative part of the new text would have the Council:

(1) recommend to all governments that they make every possible effort to abolish in any territories under their jurisdiction or administration any legal provisions and administrative or private practices which discriminate against certain sections of the population; and

(2) recommend, likewise, to the governments of those States in which minorities exist, that they make every possible effort to give such minorities the special protection they need, besides implementing the principle of non-discrimination, it being understood that groups of aliens of the same origin which have entered or may enter a certain State as immigrants shall not be entitled to such special protection as a minority.

The Philippine representative suggested (E/AC.7/L.185) that reference to dependent territories should only be made specifically with respect to minorities since the Assembly had already made recommendations concerning the abolition of discriminatory practices in such territories. The representative of Uruguay, as a further qualification of the word immigrants, suggested (E/AC.7/L.186) a reference to displaced persons.

The representative of India, however, thought that a much clearer definition of the word immigrants was necessary if certain groups of aliens were not to be unjustly deprived of protection. The joint draft resolution, he said, would have the effect of singling out a group or class of persons as one not entitled to protection. Moreover, it might lead to vast numbers of people being denied minority rights if governments chose to call them aliens. The representatives of Poland and the USSR shared this concern. The representatives of France and Sweden thought that the main problem was the lack of any clear definition of a minority group.

In an attempt to reach a compromise, a working group was established, consisting of the representatives of Belgium, Egypt, India, the Philippines, Sweden, the United Kingdom, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia and the Chairman of the Committee. The Chairman announced at the Committee's 255th meeting on 30 July that the group had been unable to draft a text capable of commanding general support. It had accordingly approved a substitute text (E/AC.7/L.187) for the Commission's draft resolution which omitted all reference to minorities. At the same time, it had approved a new draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.188), by which the subject of protection of minorities would be referred back to the Commission on Human Rights and the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities for further study.

The substitute draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.187) was adopted (E/2499 B I), at the Committee's 256th meeting on 31 July, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The Committee unanimously agreed to accept an oral Chinese amendment to the second draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.188) to request that recommendations be submitted to the Council at its eighteenth session rather than "at an early date".

The amended draft resolution was adopted (E/2499 B II) at the same meeting by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR explained that they had abstained in both instances because they had preferred the original proposal of the Commission on Human Rights.

The draft resolutions, as proposed by the Social Committee, were adopted by the Council at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August by a unanimous vote and by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, respectively, as resolution 502 B I & II (XVI).

In resolution 502 B I, the Council, considering that the prevention of discrimination in independent States was as important as prevention of discrimination in Trust and other Non-Self-Governing Territories, recommended to all States that they make every possible effort to abolish any legal provisions and administrative or private practices which discriminated against certain sections of the population.

In resolution 502 B II, the Council noted the recommendations to governments contained in the Commission's draft resolution concerning the application of special measures for the protection of minorities. It considered that before adopting recommendations to that effect it was necessary to undertake a more thorough study of the whole question, including the definition of the term "minority". It requested the Commission and the Sub-Commission to continue their work on the protection of minorities with that consideration in mind and to submit revised recommendations to the eighteenth session of the Council. The Council also drew the attention of both organs to its discussion of the subject.

(2) Co-operation of Non-Governmental Organizations

The Commission on Human Rights adopted a draft resolution (E/2447 C) for consideration by the Economic and Social Council, based on the recommendation of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, concerning the co-operation of non-governmental organizations.

At the Council's sixteenth session, a United States amendment (E/AC.7/L.177) to provide for consultations concerning the advisability of calling "a conference" of non-governmental organizations to discuss the subject rather than "one or more conferences" was adopted by 9 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions, and the draft resolution as thus amended was adopted unanimously by the Council's Social Committee (E/2499 C), at its 255th meeting on 30 July, and by the Council at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August

By this resolution (502 C (XVI)), the Council noted that a number of non-governmental organizations, including organizations in consultative status, were actively engaged in activities designed to eradicate prejudice and discrimination. It considered, however, that uncoordinated action in this field was conducive to duplication, and that certain important aspects of the work might be overlooked, and, further, that some organizations having as their objective the promotion of social progress generally might well be encouraged to devote particular attention to the vital problem of eradicating prejudice and discrimination. It appealed to non-governmental organizations active in the field of eradicating prejudice and discrimination, or having as their objective the promotion of social progress generally, to co-ordinate their endeavours in this work.

The Council requested the Secretary-General, in collaboration with competent specialized agencies, to consult the non-governmental organizations in consultative relationship with it or the specialized agency concerned, in order to determine if it would be advisable to convene the interested non-governmental organizations in a conference in order that they might: exchange views concerning the most effective means of combating discrimination; co-ordinate their endeavours in this work if they found it desirable and feasible; and consider the possibility of establishing common objectives and programmes. The Secretary-General was further requested, after consultation with the non-governmental organizations and the specialized agencies concerned, to report to the Council on the advisability of convening such a conference in accordance with resolution 479 (V)¹⁰⁰ of the General Assembly.

(3) Position of Persons Born Out of Wedlock

The Commission submitted to the Economic and Social Council a draft resolution (E/2447 D), based substantially upon the draft resolution of the Sub-Commission, by which the Council would draw the attention of the Social Commission, other inter-governmental organs and interested non-governmental organizations to

(1) the discriminations which may be practised against persons born out of wedlock and

(2) the desirability of preparing recommendations with a view to eliminating any such discrimination, and in particular with a view to eliminating the disclosure of illegitimacy in extracts from official documents delivered to third parties.

¹⁰⁰ This resolution provides rules for the calling of non-governmental conferences by the Council.

At the Council's sixteenth session, the representative of Belgium criticized the draft resolution as being too categorical; by doing away with all discrimination in respect of all persons born out of wedlock, she said, the draft resolution, if adopted, would introduce changes indirectly fatal to the family as an institution. She therefore proposed two amendments (E/AC.7/L.181). The first of these would insert a phrase to have the Council request the bodies mentioned to "study these problems and to examine the desirability" of preparing recommendations; it was rejected by 7 votes to 6, with 5 abstentions. The second amendment, to refer to "unjustifiable discrimination" rather than "any discrimination" was rejected by 16 votes to 1, with 1 abstention. The Council's Social Committee, however, by 13 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions, voted to delete the word "any".

Argentina presented an oral amendment by which the Council would call attention to the desirability of preparing recommendations with a view to eliminating, with due regard to the necessity of preserving the unity of the family, discrimination practised against persons born out of wedlock, rather than with due regard to the principles set forth in article 16 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It was adopted by 6 votes to 2, with 8 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Social Committee (E/2499 D), at its 255th meeting on 30 July, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and by the Council at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August, by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention. Resolution 502 D (XVI) read:

"The Economic and Social Council

"Draws the attention of the Social Commission, other inter-governmental organs and interested non-governmental organizations to:

"(a) The discrimination which may, in existing social conditions, be practised against persons born out of wedlock;

"(b) The desirability of preparing recommendations with a view to eliminating, with due regard to the necessity of preserving the unity of the family, discrimination which may, in existing social conditions, be practised against persons born out of wedlock, and in particular of preparing recommendations with a view to eliminating the disclosure of illegitimacy in extracts from official documents delivered to third parties."

b. PROTECTION OF MINORITIES

In the field of protection of minorities, the Commission on Human Rights, having studied the work of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, noted its results with appreciation, without expressing any opinion on the proposed definition of minorities. It requested (E/2447) the Sub-Commission to proceed with its work on the definition and protection of minorities, bearing in mind the discussions which had taken place in the Commission, and to make recommendations for the tenth session of the Commission.

The Commission also requested the Secretary-General, as recommended by the Sub-Commission,

"to arrange for as complete as possible a collection of provisions for the protection of minorities to be made available, and kept up to date, for use in the drafting of clauses to be included in international and national instruments which deal with the protection of minority rights, notably in cases when minority rights are to be safeguarded in newly-established States, but also in cases where minorities are to be protected following upon the establishment of new boundary lines between States."

The Commission endorsed the draft resolution of the Sub-Commission on the protection of newly-created minorities and recommended (E/2447 F) it to the Economic and Social Council. The Council unanimously adopted the draft resolution, at the 255th meeting of its Social Committee (E/2499 F) on 30 July, and at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August.

By this resolution (502 F (XVI)), the Council recommended that, in the preparation of any international treaties, decisions of international organs, or other acts which establish new States or new boundary lines between States, special attention should be paid to the protection of any minority which might be created thereby.

c. GENERAL RECOMMENDATIONS

The Commission adopted (E/2447) articles 25 and 26 of the draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights relating, respectively, to rights of minorities and incitement to hatred or violence, substantially on the basis of draft articles proposed by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities.

It also considered recommendations of a general character proposed by the Sub-Commission relating to reports on the relevant work of UNESCO and to publications. It noted (E/2447) the statement of the representative of UNESCO that that organization would devote a special chapter of its annual report to the Economic and Social Council on its work in the field of prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities, copies of it being made available to the Sub-Commission. This statement was repeated by the representative of UNESCO in the Council's Social Committee.

In accordance with Council resolution 443 (XIV),¹⁰¹ UNESCO also submitted to the Council for its information a report dealing with its educational campaign against prejudice and discriminatory attitudes and measures, with its research work and dissemination of scientific data on race questions and with the surveys it had undertaken into the position of the problem in different Member States.

The Commission noted the proposals of the Sub-Commission concerning publications and requested (E/2447) the Secretary-General to prepare a publication containing an account of the work of the United Nations and an analysis of the information from governments in the field of prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities.

d. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

The Commission on Human Rights endorsed and forwarded to the Economic and Social Council for action (E/2447 G) the proposal of the Sub-Commission that the Council should recommend organizations participating in the technical assistance programmes to give sympathetic consideration to requests for technical assistance in connexion with measures aimed at the eradication of prejudice or discrimination or at the protection of minorities. By the same draft resolution, the Council would recommend to the General Assembly that it adopt a resolution authorizing the Secretary-General to render technical assistance to Members in the eradication of prejudice or discrimination or in the protection of minorities. (For text of resolution as adopted, see below.)

(1) Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Sixteenth Session

During the discussions in the Social Committee of the Council, the representative of the United Kingdom expressed the opinion that it would be premature and undesirable for the Council to pronounce on technical assistance in the particular group of human rights in question at a time when the problem of technical assistance in the entire field of human rights was being referred to governments for their comments. He submitted a substitute text (E/AC.7/L.182), which would request the Commission on Human Rights to take the Sub-Commission's proposal into account when studying the question in detail.

A number of representatives, including those of Australia and France, agreed that it would be better to consider advisory services to combat prejudice or discrimination within the general framework. The representatives of France, Sweden and the United Kingdom considered that the services envisaged could be provided under existing technical assistance programmes.

The majority, however, supported the Commission's proposal, emphasizing that the United Kingdom draft resolution would only result in further delay, and the substitute text was rejected by the Committee by 13 votes to 4, with 1 abstention.

A United States amendment (E/AC.7/L.183), to specify that the organizations should consider requests for technical assistance "within their terms of reference", was adopted by 11 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions. The Committee voted separately on the provision that technical assistance services authorized by the General Assembly should "also extend to education programmes designed to combat prejudice and discrimination" and deleted this phrase by 8 votes to 7, with 3 abstentions.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Committee (E/2499 G) by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, and by the Council at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 502 G (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council

"1. Recommends to the organizations participating in the technical assistance and other programmes providing aid or advice at the request of Member States, that they give sympathetic consideration, within their terms of reference, to the requests which governments may submit for such technical assistance in connexion with measures aimed at the eradication of prejudice or discrimination or at the protection of minorities;

"2. Recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of a resolution authorizing the Secretary-General to render, at the request of Member States of the United Nations, expert technical advice and other services in order to assist these States in the eradication of prejudice or discrimination or in the protection of minorities; and that the services to be so authorized should include, but need not be restricted to, technical expert advice regarding the drafting of legislation and the establishment of administrative and judicial machinery."

(2) Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

At its eighth session, the General Assembly considered the question at the 487th, 488th and 489th meetings of its Third Committee, from 28 to 30 September, and at its 453rd plenary meeting on 23 October 1953. It had before it the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430) and a note by the Secretary-General (A/2453) drawing attention to the second operative paragraph of Council resolution 502 G (XVI).

The discussion was mainly directed to a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.340) by Ecuador, Haiti, India, Lebanon, Liberia and the Philippines, which would extend the Secretary-General's authorization in the manner recommended in the Council's resolution.

The majority spoke in favour of the proposal. However, the representatives of Australia, Burma, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, among others, either doubted its usefulness or considered it premature. The question of technical assistance in the whole field of human rights, they held, should be studied first. The representative of Saudi Arabia, moreover, considered the proposal dangerous and impracticable. It would encourage, he said, a tendency, which was becoming more and more marked, to turn to technical assistance in order to solve all current world problems. The representatives of Guatemala, the Netherlands, Saudi Arabia, Sweden and the United Kingdom also felt that the aims of the resolution were not defined in the text with sufficient precision.

Amendments to the joint draft resolution were submitted by Mexico (A/C.3/L.341/Rev.1), by Syria (A/C.3/L.342) and by Guatemala (A/C.3/L.343). Syria also submitted a sub-amendment to the Guatemalan amendment (A/C.3/L.344).

The Mexican amendment proposed to add a provision for services "in such matters of fundamental importance" as education, subject to arrangements within existing agreements with the competent specialized agencies.

The Syrian amendment proposed to specify that technical assistance should be granted at the request of Member States "directly interested" in order to assist these States, "each in so far as it is concerned". The reason for the amendment, the Syrian representative stated, was to avoid any interference in the internal affairs of States under the cover of technical assistance.

The Guatemalan amendment proposed a rewording of the first paragraph to authorize the Secretary-General at the request of Member States "in whose jurisdiction there are minorities" to render technical advice to assist these States "each in so far as it is concerned" in the eradication of prejudice or discrimination "against minorities and in the development of their economic and social potentialities".

The Syrian sub-amendment to the Guatemalan amendment covered the same points as the Syrian amendment to the joint draft resolution. It was subsequently withdrawn.

Following an informal meeting between the sponsors of the draft resolution and the authors of amendments, a new text (A/C.3/L.346) was submitted jointly by the sponsors of the six-Power draft resolution and Mexico at the Committee's 489th meeting. In introducing the text, the representative of Lebanon stated that it incorporated the substance of some of the amendments and took into account suggestions made during the debate. However, the representative of Lebanon stated, the Guatemalan amendment had not been accepted since the group had felt that it would tend to confine the purpose of the draft resolution to the protection of minorities, without stressing the need for the prevention of discrimination.

The Mexican and Syrian amendments were withdrawn. Guatemala maintained its amendment to the new text and it was rejected by 23 votes to 8, with 21 abstentions.

The first operative paragraph of the revised draft resolution (A/C.3/L.346) was adopted in two parts, the first part being adopted by a roll-call vote of 37 to none, with 18 abstentions, and the second part (referring to the protection of minorities) by 35 votes to none, with 18 abstentions. A Venezuelan oral amendment to add the words "or both" at the end of the paragraph was adopted by 17 votes to 4, with 30 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted (A/2495) by a roll-call vote of 36 to none, with 18 abstentions (see below for text) at the Committee's 489th meeting on 30 September.

The Secretary-General, in presenting a statement of the financial implications of the proposal, indicated (A/C.3/L.340/Add.1) that requests would be met as far as possible from existing budgetary provisions and that any additional expenses to meet urgent needs contemplated in the resolution could be financed from the Working Capital Fund as an unforeseen and extraordinary commitment requiring the Advisory Committee's prior concurrence. This was subsequently endorsed by the Advisory Committee (A/2511) and by the Fifth Committee (A/2525) at its 392nd meeting on 19 October.

The draft resolution proposed by the Third Committee (A/2495) was adopted by the General Assembly at its 453rd plenary meeting on 23 October, without discussion, by 41 votes to none, with 16 abstentions, as resolution 730(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the recommendation contained in paragraph 2 of Economic and Social Council resolution 502 G (XVI) of 3 August 1953 on technical assistance in the fields of prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities,

"1. Authorizes the Secretary-General to render, at the request of any State Member of the United Nations, technical advice and other services which do not fall within the scope of existing technical assistance programmes, in order to assist the government of that State within its territory in the eradication of discrimination or in the protection of minorities or both;

"2. Decides that the services so authorized may include, but need not be restricted to, technical advice regarding the drafting of legislation and the establishment of administrative and judicial machinery and appropriate services in such matters of fundamental importance as education, subject to arrangements within existing agreements with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and other competent specialized agencies."

e. PROGRAMME OF WORK OF THE SUB-COMMISSION

In its report, the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities requested the Commission on Human Rights to approve a programme of work it had adopted at its fifth session in September and October 1952 (E/CN.4/670).¹⁰² The Sub-Commission proposed to undertake studies on discrimination in the fields of education, employment and occupation, political rights, religious rights and practices, residence and movement, immigration and travel, the right to choose a spouse and enjoyment of family rights. Measures for the cessation of any advocacy of national, racial or religious hostility that constituted an incitement to violence would also be studied. The Sub-Commission proposed to initiate immediately the study of discrimination in the field of education, and to appoint a special rapporteur who would be requested to submit a provisional plan of work, together with relevant information concerning discrimination in education. UNESCO and other appropriate specialized agencies, and national and international non-governmental organizations would be requested to co-operate. (On 10 October 1952 it chose Mr. M. R. Masani, a member of the Sub-Commission, as the Special Rapporteur.)

Furthermore, the Sub-Commission requested the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the International Labour Office, to prepare suggestions concerning the procedure for the study of discrimination in the field of employment and occupation.

In addition, the Sub-Commission requested the Secretary-General to compile and analyse information on legislation, judicial decisions and administrative practices relating to the protection of minorities. The Sub-Commission proposed (E/CN.4/670 F) that the Commission on Human Rights note the resolution on its work programme, approve the programme of work contained therein, and recommend that the Council arrange for the co-operation of UNESCO and other appropriate specialized agencies, and national and international non-governmental organizations, with the Special Rapporteur appointed in connexion with the study of discrimination in the field of education.

The Commission on Human Rights approved the work programme with certain amendments to the preambular clauses and an amendment to the operative part of the Sub-Commission's resolution to provide for the study of measures for the cessation of hostility constituting an incitement to "hatred and violence jointly or separately" rather than simply an incitement "to violence".

The Commission recommended (E/2447 H) that the Economic and Social Council:

- (1) note its resolution relating to the Sub-Commission's work programme;
- (2) request UNESCO and other appropriate specialized agencies, and national and international non-governmental organizations, to co-operate with the Special Rapporteur; and
- (3) note the financial implications of the programme.

During the discussion in the Council's Social Committee at the sixteenth session, the majority felt that the programme proposed by the Sub-Commission needed revision and clarification. The United States representative thought that there was much that could be done in the immediate future in the field of the protection of minorities, and it should therefore be dealt with as a matter of priority. As to discrimination, there was much uncertainty as to the best ways of tackling the problem. The Sub-Commission itself could not undertake all the necessary studies. The representative of the USSR stated that the programme lacked any specific reference to discrimination in social and economic matters. The representatives of Sweden and Venezuela suggested that the Sub-Commission would be more likely to achieve results by choosing one subject for study each year. The United Kingdom representative questioned whether the range of studies proposed would yield really effective results, since the remedies were already known, namely, education and publicity. He and the representative of the United States thought that the programme should be more modest and that the Commission on Human Rights should give the Sub-Commission guidance every year or two.

The representative of the Philippines considered that the Council should not interfere with the Sub-Commission, which was a body of experts and should be left free to organize its work as it saw fit.

A number of representatives, including those of Australia, France, Sweden, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela, expressed the opinion that studies which fell within the scope of the specialized agencies and other international institutions should be left to them and not carried out by the Sub-Commission. This did not mean, the French representative pointed out, that the Sub-Commission could not co-ordinate such studies at a later stage. The representatives of Poland and the USSR, however, stated that they could not agree that any matters falling clearly within the terms of reference of the Sub-Commission should be delegated to the specialized agencies.

The representatives of Sweden, the United States and Venezuela, among others, doubted the necessity for the appointment of a Special Rapporteur to study discrimination in the field of education and thought that UNESCO was best qualified to make such a specialized study. The representatives of France and the United Kingdom also objected to the appointment of a Special Rapporteur on the ground that it might create a precedent.

The representatives of India and Sweden jointly proposed a series of amendments (E/AC.7/L.180) to replace the second and third paragraphs of the draft resolution proposed by the Commission. These were adopted at the Social Committee's 256th meeting on 31 July in paragraph-by-paragraph votes, ranging from a unanimous vote to 14 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

The amended draft resolution was adopted, as a whole, by the Committee (E/2499 H) by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, and by the Council, at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August, by the same vote, as resolution 502 H (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Noting the resolution of the Commission on Human Rights relating to the programme of work of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities,

"1. Commends the Sub-Commission for its intention to study in a systematic manner concrete aspects of the problem of discrimination and, as a matter of equal priority, to study at its sixth session the problem of minority rights;

"2. Notes the decision of the Sub-Commission immediately to initiate a study of discrimination in the field of education;

"3. Approves, in order not to cause any delay in this study, the appointment of a Rapporteur on discrimination in the field of education;

"4. Believes, however, that future studies which fall within the scope of specialized agencies or other bodies should normally be carried out by the specialized agencies or other bodies directly concerned;

"5. Invites the appropriate specialized agencies, particularly the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and interested non-governmental organizations to co-operate with the Rapporteur on discrimination in the field of education;

"6. Requests the Sub-Commission at its sixth session:

"(a) To undertake further consideration, in the light of the discussions in the Commission on Human Rights and in the Council, of the general work programme developed by the Sub-Commission at its fifth session and amended and approved by the Commission on Human Rights at its ninth session;

"(b) To consider, as regards proposed studies of discrimination, which of the studies should be undertaken by specialized agencies or other bodies concerned and which directly by the Sub-Commission in collaboration with the Secretary-General;

"(c) To formulate specific proposals, including procedures to be followed, for the carrying out of studies on discrimination, indicating which studies should be undertaken immediately;

"(d) To continue its work regarding the protection of minority rights;

"(e) To report on the above matters to the tenth session of the Commission on Human Rights."

5. The Right of Peoples and Nations to Self-Determination

The General Assembly, in resolution 637 C (VII),¹⁰³ inter alia, requested the Economic and Social Council to ask the Commission on Human Rights to continue preparing recommendations concerning international respect for the right of peoples to self-determination, and particularly recommendations relating to the steps which might be taken by the various organs of the United Nations and by the specialized agencies, within the limits of their resources and competence, to develop international respect for the right of peoples to self-determination. It also requested the Commission to submit through the Council its recommendations to the General Assembly.

The Economic and Social Council, at its fifteenth session, at the 674th and 675th plenary meetings on 1 April, briefly discussed the item and agreed, generally, that the Council should merely transmit the Assembly's recommendations to the Commission without adding any comments of its own.

A draft resolution (E/L.478) to this effect was presented jointly by Argentina, Egypt and the Philippines and was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, at the 675th plenary meeting. By this resolution (472(XV)), the Council transmitted Assembly resolution 637 C (VII) to the Commission for the contemplated action therein.

The Commission on Human Rights included the item in the agenda of its ninth session, which was held from 7 April to 30 May 1953, but reported (E/2447) that it had not had time to consider it.

The General Assembly at its eighth session discussed the question during the debate of its Third Committee on Chapter V (Human Rights) of the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430). The Third Committee, which held a general debate on this Chapter and on Chapter IV (Social Questions) at its 503rd to 511th meetings, on 22 and 26 to 30 October and on 2 and 3

¹⁰³ See Y.U.N., 1952. p. 447.

November, had before it two similar draft resolutions on the right of peoples and nations to self-determination. However, one of the draft resolutions submitted by Bolivia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Mexico and Uruguay (A/C.3/L.369) was withdrawn by its sponsors in favour of the second, a draft resolution by Afghanistan, Burma, Cuba, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen (A/C.3/L.371); the former group of representatives subsequently joined with the sponsors of the second draft resolution in submitting one joint proposal (A/C.3/L.371/Rev.1).

The Committee discussed the joint draft resolution at its 525th to 527th meetings on 17 and 18 November.

The joint draft proposed that the Assembly request:

(1) the Commission on Human Rights to give due priority at its tenth session to the preparation of recommendations concerning the right of self-determination; and

(2) the Secretary-General to transmit to the Commission the summary records of the debate on this matter.

In the preamble to the draft resolution, reference was made to Assembly resolution 637 C (VII) and Council resolution 472(XV), to the fact that the Commission had not had time to prepare recommendations at its ninth session, and to the importance of the observance and respect for the right to self-determination in the promotion of world peace and friendly relations between peoples and nations.

Among others, the representatives of Afghanistan, Mexico, the Philippines and Uruguay emphasized that the exercise of the right of self-determination was a vital factor in preserving peace in the world and maintaining friendly relations between nations. The representatives of Afghanistan, Indonesia, Iraq, Peru, Syria and Yugoslavia stressed that this right was universal and should be enjoyed by all peoples and all nations, and that respect for the right of self-determination was a prerequisite for the enjoyment of all other human rights. The representatives of Afghanistan, Cuba and Uruguay also pointed out that the importance accorded to the question of the right of peoples and nations to self-determination was reflected in the fact that 20 delegations had joined in sponsoring the joint draft resolution.

The Burmese representative thought that some action should be taken pending the completion and coming into force of the Covenants on Human Rights by which States would explicitly bind themselves to ensure respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Yugoslav representative suggested that certain transitional measures might be taken, such as participation of indigenous populations in legislative and executive organs of government. The representatives of Iraq, the Philippines and Syria stressed the link between economic and social problems and the political aspects of the right to self-determination. The Indian representative expressed the view that the Assembly should leave the Commission sufficient latitude to consider the question but impress upon it that the matter was urgent. It was explained by the representative of the Philippines that, in asking the Commission to give "due priority" to the preparation of recommendations, it was intended that the Commission would first complete its work on the draft Covenants.

The representatives of Afghanistan, Egypt, Honduras, Guatemala, Liberia, the USSR and Yugoslavia referred, during the discussion, to General Assembly resolution 648(VII),¹⁰⁴ which laid down certain factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory was or was not one whose peoples had attained a full measure of self-government, some of them suggesting that a reference to these factors be incorporated in the draft resolution.

Accordingly, the representative of Argentina proposed an amendment (A/C.3/L.393/Rev.1) to add a second paragraph to the preamble reading:

"Recalling also, with reference to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, resolution 648(VII) and the annexed list of factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government."

However, the representatives of China, Chile and Cuba, among others, criticized the amendment on the grounds that it gave too much emphasis to self-government, which formed only one part of the whole question of the right of peoples to self-determination.

The representative of Argentina subsequently withdrew the amendment because the list of factors to which it referred could not yet be considered as final since the new list had been approved by the Fourth Committee and would be considered in plenary session.¹⁰⁵ He accepted the proposal of the representative of India that a second paragraph should be added to the preamble, to refer to Assembly resolution 648(VII). This second additional paragraph of the preamble to the draft resolution was adopted by 33 votes to 12, with 6 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted (E/2447 & Corr.1 (VI)) by a roll-call vote of ¹⁰⁴ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 563-65.

¹⁰⁵ See pp. 520-26.

39 to 8, with 6 abstentions, at the Third Committee's 527th meeting on 18 November.

In explaining their votes against this resolution, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Turkey and the United Kingdom stated, inter alia, that they were opposed to it because of its restrictive character, since it was directed principally to the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, and they considered that the addition of the reference to resolution 648(VII) lent emphasis to the restrictive nature of the resolution. It was also pointed out by the Australian representative that the principle of self-determination was a political principle applicable to peoples but not a juridical right vested in individuals.

The draft resolution, as proposed by the Third Committee, was adopted by the General Assembly at its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November 1953 by 43 votes to 9, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 738(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 637 C (VII) of 16 December 1952 and Economic and Social Council resolution 472(XV) of 1 April 1953 inviting the Commission on Human Rights to make recommendations concerning international respect for the right of peoples and nations to self-determination,

"Recalling also General Assembly resolution 648 (VII) of 10 December 1952,

"Considering that the Commission on Human Rights had been unable due to lack of time to prepare such recommendations at its ninth session,

"Considering the importance of the observance of and respect for the right of self-determination in the promotion of world peace and of friendly relations between peoples and nations,

"1. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to give due priority at its tenth session to the preparation of such recommendations;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit to the Commission on Human Rights the summary records of the debate on this matter."

6. Allegations Regarding Infringements of Trade Union Rights

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FIFTEENTH SESSION

At its fifteenth session, the Council, at its 679th and 680th plenary meetings on 9 April, had before it a number of communications, submitted in accordance with Council resolution 277 (X),¹⁰⁶ alleging that trade union rights were being infringed in various countries (E/2333 & Add.1-37).

In order to facilitate the Council's consideration of the item, the Secretary-General submitted a memorandum (E/L.471 & Corr.1) dividing the communications into four categories, namely, those relating to States, members of both the United Nations and of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) (32); those relating to States, members of ILO but not Members of the United Nations (2); those relating to States, Members of the United Nations but not members of ILO (1); and those relating to States members neither of the United Nations nor of ILO (3).

The Secretary-General also informed the Council (E/2370) that, in implementation of Council resolution 444(XIV),¹⁰⁷ he had addressed letters to the Governments of Romania, Spain and the USSR, inviting them to reply to the requests previously addressed to them under resolution 351 XII¹⁰⁸ with respect to certain allegations relating to their countries, but that no replies had yet been received. Under Council resolution 444(XIV) the Secretary-General had also addressed letters to the Government of Spain, the competent authorities of the Saar and the Allied Military Government of the Free Territory of Trieste (British-United States Zone), inviting them to submit their observations with respect to certain allegations relating to their territories brought to the attention of the Council at its fourteenth session. The note further stated that only the Allied Military Government had replied (E/2335).

The Council, in addition, had before it a document (E/2371) containing certain observations of the Permanent Representative of Greece to the United Nations on one of the new communications (E/2333/Add.21) and two statements by the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) (E/C.2/341) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) (E/C.2/343), respectively.

The representatives of Sweden and the United Kingdom had also submitted a five-part draft resolution (E/L.484), which was subsequently adopted with minor amendments at the Council's 680th meeting on 9 April.

During the debate, several members, including the representatives of Egypt, Poland, the USSR, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay, discussed specific allegations relating to their own or other countries.

The main issue, however, was whether the procedure under which the Secretary-General is requested to bring allegations of the infringement of trade union rights to the attention of the Council should be changed, as proposed by Sweden and the United Kingdom (E/L.484(I)), to the effect that in the future allegations relating to States Members of ILO should be forwarded by the Secretary-General, acting on behalf of the Council, directly to the Governing Body of the International Labour Office. The representatives of Egypt, Poland and the USSR contended that the procedure established under resolution 277(X) already constituted an abdication of the Council's responsibility and thought that, if the Council were to agree to the proposed change, it would be divesting itself to a still larger extent of one of its important functions under the Charter. The representative of WFTU also spoke to this point, her organization having urged the Council in a written statement (E/C.2/341) to undertake at each session substantive discussions of complaints of violations of trade union rights. Other representatives, including those of Argentina, Australia, Belgium, the United Kingdom and the United States, pointed out that the ILO Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association was the proper agency to handle allegations regarding infringement of trade union rights, and that the proposed change in procedure would only serve to expedite the forwarding of complaints.

An amendment by India (E/L.488), providing that a summary of the allegations be submitted to the Council for its information or discussion was rejected by 9 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions.

The sponsors of the draft resolution agreed to an oral Argentine proposal to delete the reference in the first paragraph to resolutions 351(XII) and 444(XIV) dealing with procedure.

Draft resolution I, as amended, was adopted by 13 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, as resolution 474 A (XV).

By this resolution, the Council decided to forward to the Governing Body of the International Labour Office for its consideration as to reference to the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission those allegations enumerated in document E/L.471 and those received subsequently relating to States Members of ILO, and requested the Secretary-General, acting on behalf of the Council, to forward to the Governing Body of the International Labour Office for similar action all such allegations in the future.

Another item briefly discussed by the Council was the absence of a reply from the Government of the USSR to several requests addressed to it by the Secretary-General, acting on behalf of the Council, seeking its consent to permit an allegation relating to that country (E/1882) to be handled under the international machinery for safeguarding trade union rights and freedom of association, agreed upon between the United Nations and ILO. Additional material relating to the previous allegation had been submitted by ICFTU (E/2333/Add.6). In its written statement (E/C.2/343), ICFTU had suggested that the Council should establish a committee, similar to the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, to handle complaints directed against States Members of the United Nations but not Members of ILO, which have not given their consent to let a complaint relating to them be referred to the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission of ILO. The tasks of this Committee would be

(1) to consider for recommendation to the Economic and Social Council whether cases are worthy of examination by the Council, and

(2) where so determined affirmatively, to recommend alternative action designed to safeguard the rights relating to freedom of association involved in the case.

In discussing the allegation, the representative of the USSR maintained that there could be no question of infringements of trade union rights in the USSR, because the country was ruled by the working class and the labour legislation was worked out with prior consent of the trade unions.

The Swedish representative thought that the procedure proposed by ICFTU would serve no useful purpose at this time and the United Kingdom representative expressed the hope that the USSR would reply in the near future. The United States representative, however, stated that the Council had waited two years for a reply and that it would be remiss, in his opinion, not to take some action. The Indian representative proposed that the Council should note, rather than note with concern, that the USSR had not yet replied and an amendment deleting the words "with concern" was adopted by 7 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions. Draft resolution II was adopted, as amended, by 13 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 474 B (XV).

By this resolution the Council, noting that the Government of the USSR had not yet replied to the invitations addressed to it by the Secretary-General under the terms of resolution 277(X) (sub-paragraph (c) of the second operative paragraph), requested the Secretary-General to forward to the Government of the USSR the further material relating to the allegation previously submitted by ICFTU, and to invite it to reconsider its attitude in the matter.

Concerning the question of replies from the Governments of Romania and Spain, the Argentine representative held that the United Nations could not confer obligations on a State without also giving it the rights of membership. He would, therefore, vote against the draft resolution concerning these Governments. Draft resolution III was adopted by 13 votes to 4, as resolution 474 C (XV).

By this resolution, the Council, noting that the Governments of Spain and Romania had not responded to invitations addressed to them, in accordance with resolutions 351(XII) and 444 (XIV), to submit their observations on certain allegations relating to them, and noting that further allegations relating to Spain (E/2333/Add.4 & 5) had been received, requested the Secretary-General to bring the latter allegations to the attention of the Government of Spain and to invite it to submit its observations on them, bringing to its attention the provisions of resolution 277(X). It further expressed the hope that the two Governments might find it possible to indicate their willingness to co-operate with the United Nations in its efforts to safeguard trade union rights by submitting their observations on the allegations already referred to them.

As to the observations of the Allied Military Government of the Free Territory of Trieste (E/2335) on the allegation contained in document E/2154/Add.20, some representatives, including those of Argentina and the Philippines, felt that it would be outside the competence of the Council to examine the case in substance. The Philippine representative therefore proposed (E/L.489) that draft resolution IV should be redrafted to read "Considers that the allegation is not within its [The Council's] competence to examine". This was rejected by 7 votes to 4, with 6 abstentions. An Egyptian proposal to delete draft resolution IV completely was rejected by 7 votes to 3, with 7 abstentions.

By resolution 474 D (XV), which was adopted by 10 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions, the Council took note of the observations of the Allied Military Government, observed that no question of trade union rights was involved, and dismissed the allegation as not meriting further examination.

With regard to draft resolution V, the French representative recalled that the case of the complaint previously addressed to the competent authorities of the Saar had been referred to the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association. A Commission of the Saar Diet was currently studying the matter and the ILO Committee would be informed of the outcome in the near future. He therefore considered it inexpedient to bring the allegations once again to the attention of the Saar authorities, who were apparently acting in good faith.

The sponsors of the draft resolution therefore agreed to amend it accordingly. As amended, it was adopted by 14 votes to 2, with 1 abstention, as resolution 474 E (XV).

By this resolution the Council recalled the procedure established in its resolution 444(XIV), paragraph 4, concerning an allegation (E/2154/Add.43) relating to the Saar, noted that a further allegation relating to the Saar (E/2333/Add.19) had been received and requested the Secretary-General to bring the latter allegation to the attention of the competent authorities of the Saar, and to invite them to submit their observations, bringing to their attention the provisions of resolution 277(X).

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS SIXTEENTH SESSION

At its sixteenth session, the Council had before it, in accordance with its resolutions 277(X) and 474(XV), a communication (E/2434) alleging infringements of trade union rights in Spain. The Council also had before it a note by the Secretary-General (E/2464) in which it was stated that he had received no reply from the Governments of the USSR, Spain and Romania, and the competent authorities of the Saar to his note sent in pursuance of Council resolutions 474 B, C and E (XV).

During the discussion at the Council's 719th, 720th and 722nd plenary meetings, from 9 to 11 July, a representative of the International Labour Office, and representatives of WFTU, the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU) and ICFTU were heard. The representative of ILO reminded the Council of the statement of the Director-General of ILO during the discussion on the seventh report of ILO to the United Nations that the Governing Body of the International Labour Office was considering the possibility of improving the procedure regarding allegations and their consideration by the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association.

The WFTU representative criticized the procedure followed by ILO and urged the Council to reintroduce the procedure under resolution 277(X) and to maintain a closer supervision over the protection of trade union liberties. The representative of IFCTU urged the establishment of an ad hoc committee by the Council to consider allegations against governments which were not members of ILO, in consultation with the free trade unions, with a view to making recommendations on action to be taken by the Council. The representative of ICFTU requested the Council to provide for some machinery whereby such allegations could be dealt with, and referred to ICFTU's suggestion on the matter at the fifteenth session.

The Council did not take up the substance of the matter. The majority agreed that it might be desirable for the Council to take up eventually the question of the machinery for dealing with such allegations but were willing to support, without prejudice to future action by the Council, the procedural proposal (E/L.532) presented by the Argentine representative that the allegations referred to in the documents before the Council be referred to the governments concerned.

The Council, at its 722nd plenary meeting on 11 July 1953, adopted the Argentine draft resolution by 16 votes to 2. By this resolution (503 (XVI)) the Secretary-General was requested to transmit to the governments concerned the allegations regarding infringements of trade union rights contained in documents E/2434 and E/2464.

7. Forced Labour

a. REPORT OF THE Ad hoc COMMITTEE ON FORCED LABOUR

The Ad hoc Committee on Forced Labour, appointed by the Secretary-General and the Director-General of the International Labour Office in accordance with resolution 350(XII)¹⁰⁹ of the Economic and Social Council, held its fourth and last session from 17 April to 27 May 1953 and unanimously adopted its final report (E/2431) for submission to the Economic and Social Council and to the Governing Body of the International Labour Office.

The fourth session was devoted to a final study of the documentation before the Committee relating to 24 countries (and/or territories under their administration) concerning which allegations of the existence of forced labour had been made either in the Council or subsequently by non-governmental organizations or individuals. The object of this study was to determine whether those allegations were relevant to the Committee's terms of reference and, if so, whether the documentation submitted to the Committee revealed the existence of a system of forced labour of either the "political" or "economic" or of both types coming within the meaning of the Committee's terms of reference.

During the interval between the third and fourth sessions, on 2 March 1953, a letter of reminder, under the Chairman's signature, was sent to those of the 24 governments which had not replied by that time to the Committee's letter of 22 November 1952, by which an informal document summarizing the allegations and other material in the possession of the Committee had been communicated confidentially to each of the governments concerned for comment.

On 23 April 1953, another reminder was sent to these governments, by cable, indicating the Committee's intention to conclude its work by 22 May 1953 and requesting that their comments and observations be forwarded by 10 May.

By 20 May, the following Governments had transmitted their comments and observations:

Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, France, Peru, Portugal, Spain, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

The following Governments had not replied:

Argentina, Brazil, Bulgaria, Chile,¹¹⁰ Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Germany (Democratic Republic of), Hungary, Paraguay, Poland, Romania, USSR, Venezuela.

The Committee, in its final report (E/2431), stated that its inquiry had revealed the existence in the world of two principal systems of forced labour, the first being employed as a means of political coercion or punishment for holding or expressing political views and the second being used for important economic purposes.

The Committee found that a system of forced labour as a means of political coercion had been established in certain countries, was probably in existence in several other countries, and possibilities for its establishment existed in others. Such a system was found to exist in its fullest form, and in the form which most endangered the fundamental rights of the human person as guaranteed by the Charter of the United Nations and proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, where it was expressly directed against people of a particular "class" (or social origin) and even against political "ideas" or attitudes in men's minds; where a person might be sentenced to forced labour for the offence of having expressed his ideological opposition to the established political order, or even because he was only suspected of such hostility; when he might be sentenced by procedures which did not afford him full rights of defence, often by a purely administrative order; and when, in addition, the penalty of forced labour was intended for his political "correction" or "re-education", i.e., to alter his political convictions to the satisfaction of the government in power.

The Committee stated that its inquiry had again shown the importance of the work of the United Nations for ensuring and safeguarding human rights and dignity. The Commission on Human Rights, it noted, was engaged in drafting articles for Covenants on Human Rights which had a direct bearing on many of the issues considered by the Committee and the problems raised by such issues. The Committee suggested that an earnest appeal be addressed to all governments concerned to re-examine their laws and administrative practices in the light of the current conditions and the increasing desire of the peoples of the world "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights [and] in the dignity and worth of the human person".

While less seriously jeopardizing the fundamental rights of the human person, systems of forced labour for economic purposes constituted, in the Committee's opinion, no less a violation of the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Although such systems may be found in different parts of the world, they differ in nature and scope. These systems—still found by the Committee to exist in some countries or territories where a large indigenous population lived side by side with a population of another origin—most often, it stated, resulted from a combination of various practices or institutions affecting only the indigenous population and involving direct or indirect compulsion to work. Examples of such practices were: compulsory labour properly so called, various coercive methods of recruiting, the infliction of heavy penalties for breaches of contracts of employment, the abusive use of vagrancy laws, and other similar measures.

Recalling that the International Labour Organisation (ILO) had been working for some 25 years to bring about the abolition of such practices by Conventions and other means, the Committee expressed the hope that it would continue and would intensify its efforts towards this goal.
