The Committee further pointed out that, while the forms of forced labour contemplated in the ILO Conventions related almost entirely to "indigenous" inhabitants of dependent territories, the systems of forced labour for economic purposes found to affect the working population of some fully self-governing countries (where there was no "indigenous" population) raised new problems, calling for action.

Such systems, the Committee stated, resulted from various general measures involving compulsion in the recruitment, mobilization or direction of labour. The Committee found that these, taken in conjunction with other similar restrictive measures, went beyond the "general obligation to work" embodied in several modern constitutions, as well as the "normal civic obligations" and "emergency" regulations contemplated in ILO Convention No. 29 concerning forced or compulsory labour. Such measures often deprived the individual of the free choice of employment and freedom of movement and were contrary to the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, it stated. However attractive might seem the idea of using such methods of compulsion to promote a country's economic progress, the result, the Committee concluded, was a system of forced labour which not only subjected a section of the population to conditions of serious hardship and indignity, but which must gradually lower the status and dignity of even the free workers in such countries.

The Committee, therefore, expressed the opinion that the problems of compulsory labour which ILO had thus far considered mainly in connexion with indigenous workers should now be examined also in connexion with workers in fully self-governing countries. It suggested that, where necessary, international action be taken, either by framing new Conventions or by amending existing Conventions, so that they might be applicable to forced labour conditions among these workers.

In addition to these general observations, the report contained the Committee's findings and conclusions concerning the allegations of forced labour of either political or economic type, or both, for each of the 24 countries (or territories) examined.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The question of forced labour was not considered by the Economic and Social Council during 1953, since the relevant item was deferred by the Council to its seventeenth session.

At the request of the permanent representative of the United States, in a letter addressed to the Secretary-General on 14 August 1953 (A/2438 & Corr.1), the General Assembly, at its 435th plenary meeting on 17 September 1953, decided, without opposition, to include in the agenda of its eighth session the item "Evidence of Existence of Forced Labour" and to refer it to its Third Committee for consideration and report.

The Third Committee considered the item at its 529th to 534th and 536th meetings, on 20, 23, 24, 25 and 27 November 1953.

Although the report of the Ad hoc Committee was not formally before the Third Committee, the discussion was largely concerned with that document. The discussion was marked by clear differences of view. Most speakers endorsed the findings and conclusions of the Ad hoc Committee, as evidence of the existence of systems of forced labour employed as a means of political coercion or for economic purposes in a number of countries, and emphasized the importance which they attached to the abolition of such systems.

The representative of the United States stated that the Ad hoc Committee had provided evidence that forced labour as a means of political coercion and as an essential part of the national economy went hand in hand with Soviet Communism and that the USSR was the central source of infection. He cited, as one example, the penal codes of the USSR and "its constituent republics" which, he said, explicitly provided for several types of forced labour. After examining the detailed evidence, he further stated, the Ad hoc Committee had had no choice but to conclude that Soviet penal legislation was the basis of a system of forced labour used as a means of political coercion or punishment for holding or expressing political views, that the legislation was in fact used in such a way, that the system played a part of some significance in the national economy and that Soviet legislation involving compulsion to work and placing restrictions on freedom of employment led to a system of forced or compulsory labour. The spotlight of public debate, he concluded, had to be thrown on the subject in the hope that the moral pressure of the United Nations would lead to remedial measures which only the countries concerned could take.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR regarded the Ad hoc Committee's report as a collection of false and slanderous accusations, based on unofficial information. They rejected its findings and conclusions and charged that it had disregarded the existence of forced labour in France, the United Kingdom, the United States, colonies in Africa and Asia and in most Latin American countries. They accused the United States Government of attempting to sow hatred and discord among nations and of keeping the cold war alive. The Ad hoc Committee, the representative of the USSR charged, had refused to study real forced labour, in the form in which it appeared in capitalist countries and colonial territories, and had attempted to show that forced labour for economic and political purposes had its basis in legislation. Instead of taking into account the Constitution of the USSR, he continued, the agents of the United States reactionary circles were trying to distort the legislative provisions of the USSR; they gave fragmentary quotations, cited passages out of context, and referred to obsolete documents no longer in force. They distorted the penal code of the USSR and tried to cite it as the main evidence of the alleged forced labour system.

The representatives of Afghanistan, Ethiopia and India stressed that the question should be considered from a purely humanitarian point of view. The representative of India stated that any study of forced labour should include all forms of such labour and all circumstances involved. A preliminary study of the report showed that the investigation was too limited in scope in as much as it excluded some countries where forced labour might exist in practice. The Committee, he concluded, had placed undue emphasis on the word "systems" and had considered itself competent to deal with forced labour only if it was sanctioned by law or administrative measures, thus implying that, if illegal forced labour existed, it could not concern itself with the matter. Moreover, it had decided that forced labour sanctioned by law for economic reasons would not be regarded as forced labour unless it was being practised on such a wide scale as to constitute an important element in the country's economy. That, he said, led to the absurd conclusion that, if a few persons were subjected to forced labour for political purposes, forced labour existed, but if a few persons were thus subjected for economic purposes, no forced labour was involved. He considered that forced labour should be regarded as such, irrespective of whether it was practised for political or economic purposes or on a large or small scale, whether or not it was prescribed by law and whether or not it constituted an important element in the national economy. So long as the report excluded several categories of forced labour, it was valueless in assessing the real extent of the problem and his delegation would abstain from voting on the joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.395) before the Committee (see below).

The representative of Cuba agreed that the Committee had adopted a rather narrow interpretation of its terms of reference, but, within the limits of that interpretation, he considered that it had produced a valuable and impartial report.

The representative of the Union of South Africa questioned whether the report in some instances did not constitute interference in the domestic affairs of the countries concerned.

The majority supported the draft resolution (A/C.3/L.395) submitted jointly by Australia, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Greece, Pakistan, the United Kingdom and the United States.

At the request of the representative of Iraq a separate vote was taken on each paragraph of the joint draft resolution, as well as on the words "on such a scale as" in the first operative paragraph. The latter phrase was adopted by 35 votes to 8, with 8 abstentions, and the separate paragraphs were adopted in votes varying from 35 to 5, with 10 abstentions, to 42 to 5, with 3 abstentions. The joint draft resolution was adopted, as a whole, by the Committee (A/2588), at its 536th meeting on 27 November, by a roll-call vote of 36 to 5, with 10 abstentions.

It was adopted by the General Assembly, at its 468th plenary meeting on 7 December 1953, by a roll-call vote of 39 to 5, with 12 abstentions, as resolution 740(VIII). The voting was as follows:

In favour: Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Iceland, Israel, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Argentina, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Union of South Africa, Yemen.

Resolution 740(VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the determination of the peoples of the United Nations under the Charter to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights and in the dignity and worth of the human person,

"Regretting that the Economic and Social Council at its sixteenth session was unable to consider the conclusions contained in the report of the Ad hoc Committee on Forced Labour,

"Considering that systems of forced labour constitute a serious threat to fundamental human rights and jeopardize the freedom and status of workers in contravention of the obligations and provisions of the Charter of the United Nations,

"Observing that the report of the Ad hoc Committee on Forced Labour has now been placed on the agenda of the seventeenth session of the Economic and Social Council and of the 123rd session of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office,

"Considering that in view of this delay there is still time for certain governments which have not yet done so to provide information in response to the Ad hoc Committee's request for comments and observations on the allegations concerning them,

"1. Affirms the importance which it attaches to the abolition of all systems of forced or "corrective" labour, whether employed as a means of political coercion or punishment for holding or expressing political views or on such a scale as to constitute an important element in the economy of a country;

"2. Invites the Economic and Social Council and the International Labour Organisation, as a matter of urgency, to give early consideration to the report of the Ad hoc Committee on Forced Labour at their next sessions with this aim in view;

"3. Requests the Secretary-General to consult with governments which have not yet found it possible to provide information in response to the Ad hoc Committee's request to the effect that they submit such information before the seventeenth session of the Economic and Social Council so that these replies may be brought to the attention of the Council;

"4. Requests the Economic and Social Council to report on forced labour to the General Assembly at its ninth session."

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

Meanwhile, the report of the Ad hoc Committee was studied by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, at its 122nd and 123rd sessions, held in June and November 1953, respectively.

The Governing Body decided (E/2431/Add.2) to support the suggestion of the Ad hoc Committee that an appeal be addressed to all governments which in one form or another maintained or might maintain a system of forced labour of a political type, to the effect that they re-examine their laws and their administrative practices as suggested in the report.

It also decided (E/2431/Add.3)

(1) to address an appeal to governments which had not yet ratified the various International Labour Conventions of 1930, 1936, and 1939, inviting them to give prompt consideration to whether their ratification could be effected and, in the case of governments which had responsibilities for non-metropolitan territories, also to consider whether the Conventions could be applied without modifications to those territories;

(2) to authorize the Director-General to address an appeal to the governments which had ratified one or more of these Conventions to examine the possibilities of extending their application to any territories in which any or all of the provisions were not applied;

(3) to continue work on the five-year report on the working of the Forced Labour Convention of 1930, with a view to enabling the Governing Body to consider the possibility of the suppression of forced or compulsory labour in all its forms without a further transitional period;

(4) to affirm the willingness of ILO to continue and intensify its efforts towards the abolition of forced labour practices of an economic character, including practices not envisaged when the existing instruments were adopted; and

(5) to request the Director-General to continue his consultations with the Secretary-General of the United Nations on those aspects of the matter not dealt with in these proposals and to keep the Governing Body informed.

8. Slavery

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FIFTEENTH SESSION

At its fifteenth session, the Economic and Social Council had before it the report of the Secretary-General (E/2357) on slavery, the slave trade and other forms of servitude, submitted in accordance with Council resolution 388(XIII) by which the Secretary-General had been asked to collect information to supplement the material presented by the Ad hoc Committee on Slavery, to examine the Committee's report (E/1988) and to report to the Council with recommendations for appropriate United Nations action.¹¹¹

In compiling this report, the Secretary-General noted that the materials available included replies from 52 Member States and 22 non-member States and territories, ancillary memoranda prepared individually by members of the Ad hoc Committee on Slavery and a report by the International Labour Organisation (ILO) on indigenous workers in independent countries. He pointed out that certain countries and territories had not yet supplied full information in response to the Questionnaire on Slavery and Servitude and that certain available materials were unverified and in some cases contained contradictory statements. Therefore, the conclusions and suggestions put forward by him should not be considered at this stage as being either final or complete. Indeed, the question might be raised, he stated, whether the Council should take any definitive action before exhausting every possibility of completing the survey of slavery, the slave trade and other forms of servitude.

Chapter I of the Secretary-General's report recalled that the Ad hoc Committee had reached the unanimous conclusion that slavery, even in its crudest form, was still present in the world and that other forms of servitude existed in practically all regions. In some countries, these other forms of servitude were decreasing, but in others, the Committee had held, they were increasing in extent and the suffering caused by them was now greater than anything resulting from crude slavery. These forms of servitude, the report stated, as well as slavery itself should, therefore, be equally a concern of the international community.

The recommendations put forward by the Ad hoc Committee had recognized that existing forms of servitude could not be abolished by legislation alone, but that positive measures of international assistance in eliminating the underlying economic and social causes of such practices were necessary.

The first of these recommendations proposed that (1) the definition contained in article 1¹¹² of the International Slavery Convention, 1926, should continue to be accepted as an accurate and adequate international definition of slavery and the slave trade, and (2) that the functions and powers of the League of Nations under that Convention should be transferred to the United Nations by means of a Protocol which the Committee had drafted.

The Ad hoc Committee had further recommended that the Council set up a drafting committee to prepare a new supplementary convention, based on certain principles set forth in its report, which would aim at the elimination of other forms of servitude as well as of slavery.

It had drafted recommendations which might be made to governments regarding legislative and administrative measures for the abolition of slavery and similar customs and had proposed that a standing body of experts of the United Nations should be established to study and report to the Council on measures taken to eliminate slavery. The Committee had further recommended the conclusion of regional agreements to combat slavery, the slave trade and other forms of servitude, and the adoption of appropriate measures by the specialized agencies, particularly by the International Labour Organisation.

The Secretary-General examined these recommendations and, in addition, in chapter II made supplementary suggestions relating to:

- (1) completion of the survey;
- (2) preparation of drafts of separate and additional conventions aimed at the elimination of such institutions or practices resembling slavery in their effects as were not already covered by the International Slavery Convention of 1926;
- (3) establishment of a reporting procedure on the subject of slavery, the slave trade and other forms of servitude on a continuing basis; and
- (4) assistance which the United Nations and the specialized agencies might furnish to States in order to enable them to eliminate slavery, the slave trade and other forms of servitude.

¹¹² For definition, see Y.U.N., 1951, p. 503, footnote 174.

In chapter III of the report, the Secretary-General recapitulated the main problems which appeared to him to arise from his examination of the report and recommendations of the Ad hoc Committee and from his supplementary suggestions, and made alternative suggestions for action which might be taken by the Council. The questions raised related, in particular, to:

- (1) the completion of the survey begun by the Ad hoc Committee;
- (2) the use of existing and proposed international instruments for combating slavery, the slave trade and other forms of servitude;
- (3) the possibility of establishing a reporting procedure and international supervisory machinery to deal with these problems;
- (4) the possibility of combating slavery, the slave trade and other forms of servitude by means of regional arrangements;
- (5) the possibility of addressing recommendations to governments on appropriate legislative and administrative measures aimed at combating those practices; and
- (6) the possibility that the United Nations and specialized agencies might furnish assistance to States to aid them in eliminating slavery, the slave trade and other forms of servitude.

During the debate in the Council's Social Committee, at its 228th to 233rd meetings from 7 to 20 April 1953, the majority commended the Secretary-General's report. There was unanimous agreement that slavery, in all its forms, should be abolished as quickly as possible and that it was the duty of the United Nations to bring this about. It was also generally agreed, as observed by the Secretary-General in his report, that more accurate and comprehensive information was needed to enable the Council to take further measures towards the total elimination of slavery, the slave trade and other forms of servitude. The Belgian representative, in this connexion, suggested that those governments which had not replied fully or at all to the Questionnaire should be requested to do so. With reference to a reporting procedure, most representatives also felt that the continuous collection of additional information should be left to the Commission on Human Rights or perhaps to a group such as the Ad hoc Committee on Forced Labour.

The United Kingdom representative stated that he recognized the duty of the United Nations to strive with all the means at its disposal to abolish slavery as soon as possible but he considered that the Council should act with circumspection in view of the vast scope of the problem and the inadequacy of the information available. He drew attention to the importance of securing the goodwill and co-operation of all governments and an awakened international public opinion.

He and the representative of Sweden pointed out the need for recognizing that certain traditions, which were part of the social, economic, or religious structure of an area, could not be abolished at once without upsetting the entire system. The importance of improving the poor economic and social conditions, which were the underlying causes of slavery, was also stressed by the representatives of Australia, China, India, the United States and Venezuela. The Australian and Chinese representatives thought that technical assistance, as suggested in the Secretary-General's report, might be requested, perhaps under the United Nations Advisory Social Welfare Programme, with a view to reducing or eliminating conditions conducive to slavery.

The majority also supported the transfer, by the adoption of a protocol, of the functions under the International Slavery Convention of 1926 to the United Nations. The representatives of China and Sweden thought that an Assembly or Council resolution might be sufficient to effect the transfer, but several representatives, including those of France and the United States, considered that this would create a dangerous precedent. Moreover, it was pointed out, some States which had signed the Convention were not United Nations Members.

The Council recognized that slavery, while still existing in a crude form in some areas, in general in the modern world took the form of servitude with results similar to slavery. The representatives of Australia, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia nevertheless thought that the definition in article 1 of the 1926 Convention was adequate at present. The representatives of China and Sweden thought that it was clear that the definition would have to be interpreted in a very broad sense to allow its application to every possible form of slavery. The representatives of France, India, Sweden and the United Kingdom, among others, supported, at least in principle, the drafting of a supplementary convention covering both the institutions and practices covered by the 1926 Convention and certain other institutions and practices.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR stated that there was still no accurate and comprehensive report before the Committee and the Polish representative therefore proposed a draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.136), by which the Council would set up a committee composed of representatives of five States to prepare for the Council's seventeenth session recommendations for the earliest possible abolition of the slave trade and slavery in all its forms. The USSR representative, who supported the Polish proposal, stated that a return to the 1926 Convention and a supplement were not sufficient. The 1926 Convention was not an effective instrument for the abolition of slavery.

Among others, the representatives of China, Egypt, France, the Philippines and Sweden opposed the Polish draft resolution, stating that they did not consider the establishment of a new organ of the United Nations was the best solution. It was pointed out that the Commission on Human Rights had already studied the problem, or that the necessary work might be entrusted to the Secretariat, for the time being.

The Polish draft resolution was rejected by 14 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions, at the Social Committee's 233rd meeting on 20 April.

A joint draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.143) was presented by Belgium, Egypt, France, Sweden, the United Kingdom, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, amalgamating the provisions of four separate draft resolutions: by the United Kingdom (E/AC.7/L.138); by Belgium (E/AC.7/L.139); jointly by France and Sweden (E/AC.7/L.140); and by Egypt (E/AC.7/L.141).

The USSR and United States representatives criticized the fourth paragraph of the preamble to the joint draft, which referred to measures for the "progressive" eradication of slavery. The United States representative suggested the deletion of the word "progressive" and the USSR representative proposed to refer to measures aimed "at the earliest eradication of slavery and the slave trade in all their forms". The representatives of China, Egypt and Venezuela considered that the second operative paragraph calling for the preparation of the Protocol should set a more definite time limit.

The sponsors agreed to meet these points, and the draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Social Committee (E/2407), at its 233rd meeting on 20 April, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and at the Council's 702nd plenary meeting on 27 April, by the same vote, as resolution 475(XV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Recalling its resolution 388(XIII), and taking note of the report of the Secretary-General concerning slavery, the slave trade and other forms of servitude,

"Mindful of the principle of the dignity and worth of the human person proclaimed in the Charter and in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

"Noting that vestiges of crude slavery still exist, and that other institutions and practices which give rise to conditions similar to slavery, whether in law or in fact, also exist and affect a much larger number of people,

"Bearing in mind the progress already made towards abolishing slavery, the slave trade and conditions similar to slavery, and considering that measures should be taken to promote their earliest possible eradication,

"Believing that, as stated in the above-mentioned report of the Secretary-General, more information should be obtained in order that the Council may take further measures towards the total elimination of the institutions and practices referred to,

"1. Recommends that the General Assembly invite the States Parties, or which may become Parties, to the International Slavery Convention of 1926 to agree to the transfer to the United Nations of the functions undertaken by the League of Nations under the said Convention;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare a draft protocol to this end, to communicate it to the States Parties to the International Slavery Convention of 1926 for their observations, and to submit it to the General Assembly at its eighth session for appropriate action;

"3. Recommends to all States, both Members and non-members of the United Nations, which have not already done so, that they adhere as soon as possible to the International Slavery Convention of 1926 in respect of their territories and the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories for which they are responsible, in order that the said Convention may be given universal application;

"4. Requests the Secretary-General to consult the governments of all States, both Members and non-members of the United Nations, concerning the desirability of a supplementary convention and its possible contents, at the same time communicating to them the proposals of the Committee of Experts contained in its recommendation B, and to report to the Council, if possible at its first regular session in 1954;

"5. Invites the specialized agencies to submit to the Secretary-General their comments and suggestions;

"6. Requests the Secretary-General to urge those governments which have failed to supply information, or have supplied information which is incomplete, to reply accurately and fully to the questionnaire already transmitted to them;

"7. Invites the specialized agencies and the competent non-governmental organizations to collect and transmit to the Secretary-General all the material available to them relating to the problems under consideration, and asks the specialized agencies for their suggestions as to measures which might be taken in order to eliminate slavery and conditions similar to slavery;

"8. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the Council, if possible at its first regular session in 1954, a supplementary report collating information supplied in response to the present resolution."

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

In accordance with the resolution adopted by the Council, the Secretary-General prepared a draft Protocol, which he submitted to the eighth session of the General Assembly, together with a memorandum (A/2435) outlining the background to the question. Also annexed to the memorandum was a draft resolution for adoption by the Assembly. (For the text of the Protocol as adopted, with drafting amendments, see below.)

In his notes (A/2435/Add.1,2 & 3) the Secretary-General also transmitted to the General Assembly the observations he had received from governments on the draft Protocol, which he had circulated to States parties to the Convention of 1926.

Observations had been received from the Governments of the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Haiti, Switzerland and the United Kingdom, stating that they would accept, or had no objection to the proposed Protocol. Certain drafting amendments were suggested by the United Kingdom. The Belgian Government, in its observation, stated that, while the 1926 Convention at the time it was concluded was a step forward, as a measure for curbing slavery proper, it was inadequate at the present time, particularly in the light of the Ad hoc Committee's statements concerning forms of servitude other than slavery. The problem also involved some States not Members of the United Nations. Belgium therefore suggested the convening of a diplomatic conference to discuss the interrelated problems of slavery. The proposed conference, it considered, should be open to all States whose co-operation was essential for combating the various forms of servitude.

The question was considered by the Assembly at the 369th and 370th meetings of its Sixth Committee, on 12 and 15 October, and at its 453rd plenary meeting on 23 October 1953.

The Committee had before it a draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom (A/C.6/L.304) to which was annexed a slightly amended version of the draft Protocol submitted by the Secretary-General. Under the operative part of the United Kingdom draft resolution the General Assembly would:

- (1) approve the Protocol accompanying the draft resolution;
- (2) urge "all States parties to the Slavery Convention to sign or accept the Protocol"; and
- (3) recommend all other States to accede at their earliest opportunity to the Slavery Convention as amended by the Protocol.

In submitting the draft resolution the representative of the United Kingdom stressed the purely formal character of the accompanying Protocol. Its adoption, he considered, would cast no doubt whatever on the depositary functions exercised by the Secretary-General under Assembly resolution 24(I) of 1946, by which certain functions and activities of the League were transferred to the United Nations.

The United Kingdom draft provided in article II that States might become parties to the Protocol by (1) signature without reservation as to acceptance, (2) signature with reservation as to acceptance, or (3) acceptance, instead of by "accession" as stated in the Secretary-General's draft, since this form was considered to be in accordance with the precedents and to give governments a choice of a variety of methods of adherence to the Protocol.

The United Kingdom representative did not press an amendment to article III of the Secretary-General's draft, which his Government had suggested in its comments (A/2435/Add.3), and which expressly stipulated that States not parties to the Convention might become parties thereto if they simultaneously signed or accepted the Protocol and acceded to the Convention. The United Kingdom representative accepted the assurance of the representative of the Secretary-General that the practice of the Secretary-General was to give States an opportunity to accede to a protocol as well as the corresponding convention. Under the terms of article III, after the Protocol had come into force by the adherence of 23 States, States subsequently acceding to the Convention would become parties to the Convention as amended by the Annex to the Protocol.

During the discussions in the Committee the question was raised, in connexion with the broader problem of the adaptation of League of Nations conventions to the United Nations, whether a protocol was necessary for the transfer to the Organization of the functions and powers exercised by the League under the Slavery Convention.

The representative of Israel drew the Committee's attention to General Assembly resolution 24(I) and the resolution of the League of Nations Assembly of 18 April 1946. In resolution 24(I) the General Assembly of the United Nations stated that the Organization was prepared to accept the custody of international instruments formerly entrusted to the League of Nations and to charge the Secretariat of the United Nations with the task of performing for the parties the functions pertaining to a Secretariat formerly entrusted to the League of Nations and set forth in part A of that resolution. The League, by its resolution, had accepted the offer made by the United Nations. Therefore, the representative of Israel argued, there was no need for a protocol for the transfer of such functions.

Furthermore, the representative of Israel continued, an analysis of the Slavery Convention showed that only article VII, which laid upon the parties the obligation to inform the Secretary-General of the League, inter alia, of the laws and regulations enacted by them for the purpose of applying the Convention, might perhaps require a protocol before it could be sanctioned. However, it was pointed out, even if that were the case some practical remedy for the deficiency might easily be found. For example, the representative of Israel suggested, legal texts could be obtained in other ways. Presumably, also, the parties would be willing to furnish them to the Secretary-General irrespective of whether he was entitled to ask for them or not.

Turning to the question of the effectiveness of the Convention, the representative of Israel said that the substantive provisions of the Convention were meagre in content and its definitions had become obsolete. Its approach to forced labour, it was said, was "timid". He therefore suggested that instead of reactivating the Convention, efforts should be made to prepare a revised Convention in the light of the report of the Ad hoc Committee on Slavery.

The inadequacy of the 1926 Convention was also stressed by the representative of Belgium, who referred to the comments of his Government on the subject (see above). Technical amendments of the Convention such as those envisaged under the proposed Protocol would therefore, he considered, provide only a partial solution to the problem of slavery. The representative of Belgium pointed out that, under article III, the Protocol would enter into force only when two States had acceded to it, and the amendments to the Convention would take effect when 23 States had become parties to the Protocol. That, he said, meant that the amendments would not become binding on any of the 45 States parties to the Convention of 1926 which failed to accept the Protocol. Thus there might be two international conventions on the same subject concurrently in force, and resulting in inequality between signatory States. He suggested that the General Assembly should convene a diplomatic conference for a general review of the problem.

The representative of Yugoslavia said that though the principles of international law relating to slavery remained valid, there was at present no organ to deal with their application, and that this gap should be promptly and effectively filled. He said that he would vote for the United Kingdom proposal, on the understanding that it represented a temporary solution which would be followed by a broader and more effective Convention.

In reply to a question by the representative of Sweden, as to whether, in the view of the Secretariat, the draft Protocol was necessary, the representative of the Secretary-General replied that, in accordance with the terms of the General Assembly resolution 24 A (I), the functions conferred upon the Secretary-General were purely administrative and applied to all conventions concluded under the League. He had carried out these functions with regard to conventions to which there had been no protocols, and no objection had been raised by any State. On the other hand, in some cases transfer of functions had been effected by special protocols approved by the Assembly. Since there were precedents for either course of action, the Secretary-General felt that whether or not there should be a protocol in the present case was a matter of policy to be decided by the Assembly.

The representative of the United States said that, from the legal point of view, it was preferable that the transfer of functions from the League to the United Nations should be effected by the original parties to the Convention rather than by a resolution of the General Assembly. His Government, he said, was prepared to request the United States Senate to accept the draft Protocol annexed to the United Kingdom draft resolution.

The representative of El Salvador, supported by the representative of Uruguay, considered that article 1 of the text proposed by the United Kingdom might give rise to conflicting interpretations, and moved an amendment in favour of the draft text similar to that proposed by the Secretary-General. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that the text of the article as proposed by him followed that of similar protocols adopted by the General Assembly in the past, and the motion by El Salvador was rejected by 13 votes to 7, with 24 abstentions.

The United Kingdom proposal (A/C.6/L.304), including a draft resolution, a draft Protocol and an Annex to the draft Protocol, was then adopted by 38 votes to none, with 9 abstentions, at the 370th meeting of the Sixth Committee on 15 October.

The General Assembly at its 453rd plenary meeting on 23 October 1953 adopted the draft resolution, as recommended by its Sixth Committee (A/2517) in paragraph-by-paragraph votes, ranging from 52 to none, with 6 abstentions, to 47 to none, with 6 abstentions. It was adopted, as a whole, by 50 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 794(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

9. Prisoners of War

a. PROGRESS REPORT OF THE Ad hoc COMMISSION ON PRISONERS OF WAR

The Ad hoc Commission on Prisoners of War held its fourth session from 24 August to 11 September 1953. In its report to the General Assembly (A/2482 & Corr.1), the Commission covered its work from the time of its establishment in December 1950 (Assembly resolution 427(V)) up to and including its fourth session.¹³ The Commission emphasized that its report was confined to a strictly objective statement of the facts, from which the General Assembly would be able to draw its own conclusions.

The first section of the report dealt with the basic problem and summarized the task with which the Assembly had charged the Commission. It stated that, had all governments concerned co-operated in supplying information, the problem would have been well on the road to a satisfactory solution.

The second section analysed the Commission's approach to its task, and described its interpretation of its terms of reference and its method of direct consultation with representatives of the governments concerned. The information the Commission had received, the report stated, fell into two main categories:

(1) information from governments concerning the prisoners of war who, at one time or another, had been detained in their custody; and

(2) information from certain governments concerning the numbers of their nationals who were believed to have been at one time in the custody of a foreign Power and had not as yet been repatriated or otherwise accounted for.

The Commission further, it was stated, had been faced with two special problems:

(1) the problem of prisoners of war who had become war criminals through the judgment of military tribunals or other judicial proceedings; and

(2) the problem of Japanese nationals who had not yet been repatriated or of whom nothing was known.

The third section of the report summarized and tabulated the information made available to the Ad hoc Commission as a result of the requests addressed to governments and the direct consultations with representatives of governments. The Commission analysed and tabulated the information it had received, in reply to requests addressed to some 80 Member and non-member States, under the following headings: Governments who had replied or failed to reply to the various requests for information addressed to them by the Secretary-General or by the Commission; those who had, at any time, held any prisoners of the Second World War in their custody; those who were, at the date of the establishment of the Commission, holding any such prisoners; those who were, at the date of the report (12 September 1953), still holding any such prisoners; those who supplied information concerning prisoners of war who had died while in their custody; and those who had supplied information concerning prisoners of war still held in custody in connexion with war crimes or on whatsoever grounds.

In the fourth section of the report, the Commission surveyed certain developments which had occurred since its establishment and which it wished to bring to the attention of the Assembly. The fate of some prisoners of war, it stated, had been clarified in the light of information received from countries which had co-operated with the Commission, while similar clarification of the fate of others had proved unattainable as a result of the lack of co-operation by other countries, especially the USSR.

With regard to repatriation of war prisoners, about 2,300 persons, previously held in connexion with war crimes, had been released; some prisoners, previously detained in the USSR, had returned home; and some 23,000 Japanese nationals had been repatriated, as a result of negotiations initiated by the Government of the People's Republic of China and carried out by the Chinese and Japanese Red Cross Societies together with certain other Japanese private organizations. This process of repatriation, the Commission stated, was continuing.

In conclusion, the Commission summed up the situation of prisoners of war at the time of the submission of the report by asserting that, in sectors where the full co-operation of governments had been given, the problem no longer existed; in sectors where that co-operation had been withheld, the problem remained in its entirety. The Commission emphasized that it therefore attached the greatest importance to the questions addressed to governments concerning those prisoners of war who had died while in captivity, and those who were still detained in connexion with war crimes.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

At its 87th meeting, the General Committee discussed whether the item "Measures for the Peaceful Solution of the Problem of Prisoners of War" should be included on the Assembly's agenda. The representatives of the USSR and Poland opposed the recommendation, contending that, under Article 107 of the Charter, the question of prisoners of war was entirely outside the competence of the United Nations; that, in any case, the question had no basis in fact, since the USSR had long ago completed the repatriation of prisoners of war; and that the examination of the question would do nothing to relieve international tension or to improve relations between States. The representatives of the United Kingdom and Australia felt that the Secretary-General had been right in proposing the inclusion of the item in the General Assembly's agenda, and that since the argument that the United Nations was not competent to deal with the question had not been held valid at the fifth session of the General Assembly, the United Nations must continue to give attention to this problem that concerned the fate of so many thousands of human beings.

The General Committee decided, by 12 votes to 2, to recommend the inclusion of the item in the agenda (A/2477) and, at its 435th plenary meeting on 17 September 1953, the General Assembly decided by 51 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, to include the item.

The question was considered by the Third Committee at its 537th to 542nd meetings, from 30 November to 3 December 1953.

The Committee was informed by the Chairman (A/C.3/L.383, L.392 & L.394) that the Governments of the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy and Japan had requested that their representatives be heard by the Third Committee when it discussed the item. Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Mexico and Peru proposed a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.396 & Add.1) by which the Third Committee would invite a representative of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Permanent Observers of Italy and Japan to the United Nations to state the views of their Governments. After a brief discussion at the 537th meeting, in which the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR opposed the resolution, while the representatives of Afghanistan, Brazil, China, Cuba, Dominican Republic, India, Iraq, Mexico and Pakistan spoke in favour of it, the resolution was adopted by 48 votes to 5. Accordingly, statements were made at the same meeting by the representatives of the three Governments.

The representative of the Federal Republic of Germany said that the Soviet Government had announced on 4 May 1950 that repatriation of German war prisoners had been completed, except for 9,717 prisoners sentenced for major war crimes, 3,815 suspected of war crimes and fourteen sick prisoners. The Federal Government had found that, up to 1 September 1953, at least 102,958 former members of the armed German forces—whose names were known—had not been returned from the Soviet Union. At least 750,000 German civilians had been deported to the Soviet Union, of whom a minimum of 133,000 had still been alive and in detention in 1950. Poland, he said, was still detaining 2,047 German prisoners and Czechoslovakia 3,434—whose names and places of detention were known. In addition, the whereabouts of 5,921 German prisoners in Poland and of 3,131 in Czechoslovakia—whose names were also known—remained to be cleared up. His Government had welcomed the recent releases of prisoners by the Soviet Union, and urged all Members of the United Nations to do their utmost to see that all Germans still detained abroad were returned home and the fate of the missing brought to light.

The representative of Italy said that Italy was concerned about the continuing uncertainty as to the number and names of prisoners detained as alleged war criminals. Nothing was known of about 63,000 officers and men missing on the Eastern Front, and the lack of information suggested that other war prisoners besides those accounted for might still be detained in the Soviet Union.

The representative of Japan announced that 26,000 Japanese prisoners had been repatriated from Communist China in 1953 through Red Cross arrangements and that Red Cross negotiations in Moscow had resulted in an arrangement for the repatriation of over 2,000 prisoners. Nevertheless, Japan had estimated on 1 August 1953 that there were, in all, 85,000 Japanese prisoners still unrepatriated whose identity was known, and of whom 56,000 were known to be alive. Of these, 14,504 were in USSR territory and most of the remainder in Communist China.

Two draft resolutions were submitted which reflected the clear differences of views held by members of the Committee.

A draft resolution by Australia, Brazil, Thailand, the United Kingdom and the United States (A/C.3/L.397) would have the Assembly:

- (1) reiterate its concern that large numbers of prisoners had not been repatriated or otherwise accounted for;
- (2) appeal to governments still having control over such persons to give them an unrestricted opportunity of repatriation;
- (3) express appreciation of the work of the Commission and request it to continue its efforts;
- (4) note with satisfaction that valuable information had been made available to the Commission, but note with concern the refusal of certain governments to co-operate with it;
- (5) urgently appeal to all governments and authorities which had not already done so to give their full co-operation to the Commission and to grant right of access to areas in which prisoners of war were detained; and

(6) request the Commission to report on the results of its further work and possible suggestions.

The representative of Argentina expressed some apprehensions concerning the clause in the fifth paragraph which would ask governments to grant right of access to areas in which such prisoners were detained. The representative of Mexico proposed that the English text should be made to conform to the French text, whereby governments would be asked to grant the Commission access to these areas. The sponsors agreed to amend the draft resolution accordingly.

A revised text (A/C.3/L.397/Rev.1) was presented, which took the proposal of the representative of Mexico into account as well as an amendment by Iraq (A/C.3/L.399). This amendment would have added two new paragraphs by which the Assembly would note with satisfaction that some progress had taken place in the repatriation of prisoners of war in the last two years, and would express its appreciation to the Red Cross Societies and governments co-operating in that progress. The revised text of the joint draft resolution incorporated the two ideas proposed by Iraq in one new paragraph (paragraph 1).

The other draft resolution (A/C.3/L.398), submitted by the Byelorussian SSR, would have the Assembly state that by virtue of Article 107 of the Charter, the problem of prisoners of war was not within the competence of the United Nations and that the activities of the Ad hoc Commission were contrary to the provisions of that Article and were being used "to sow hatred and hostility between nations". The draft resolution therefore would have the Assembly resolve to discontinue the Commission.

The majority supported the joint draft resolution, many representatives, including those of Argentina, Belgium, Canada, Chile, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, the Netherlands, Peru, the Philippines, the Union of South Africa and Uruguay, stressing that they did so for humanitarian reasons.

It was pointed out that recognized standards of international conduct required the speedy repatriation of prisoners of war after the cessation of hostilities and full accounting for those who had died or were for any reason still detained, and reference was made in this connexion to the Hague and Geneva Conventions.

The sponsors of the joint draft and the representatives supporting it deplored the fact that, more than eight years after the end of the Second World War, a large number of prisoners of war had not been repatriated or otherwise accounted for by certain countries, and stressed the necessity of maintaining international interest in the problem of prisoners of war. In their view, the Assembly was competent and in duty bound to deal with the problem, which could only be solved with the goodwill of the governments concerned. It was obvious, they held, from the contradictory figures cited that further clarification was necessary and that the appeal to governments to account for all war prisoners was therefore justified and urgent. They also expressed appreciation of the work of the Commission and hoped that it would be continued until the problem of prisoners of war was completely solved.

Speaking in support of the Byelorussian draft resolution and against the joint draft resolution, the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR contended that the problem of prisoners of war was beyond the competence of the United Nations and that its inclusion in the agenda was contrary to the letter and spirit of Article 107 of the Charter. They stated that the artificial maintenance of the problem and the continuation in existence of the Ad hoc Commission did not serve the cause of peaceful relations, but contributed to international tension. The activities of the Ad hoc Commission, they stated, were designed to divert attention from the policy of reviving the German army under the same leadership it had had under Hitler, and generally to whitewash the Nazi, Fascist and Japanese militarists. They maintained that the problem of prisoners of war no longer existed, since all prisoners had been repatriated except those convicted of or under investigation for war crimes. They also alleged that the figures presented by the representative of the Federal Republic of Germany and the observers of Italy and Japan and by certain representatives, and referred to in the report of the Ad hoc Commission, were based on unfounded assumptions.

The representatives of Afghanistan, India and Saudi Arabia held that the continuation of the Ad hoc Commission was not the best nor the most effective way of dealing with the problem. The Indian representative thought that the matter should be placed in the hands of an international organization such as the Red Cross rather than in those of the Ad hoc Commission.

The representative of Saudi Arabia held that, since the governments concerned had clearly stated that they would not co-operate with the Ad hoc Commission on Prisoners of War, which they regarded as illegal, no practical results could be expected from the joint draft resolution. On the other hand, he said, the Byelorussian proposal took too narrow and formalistic a position on a matter which undoubtedly had a humanitarian aspect. Therefore, his delegation would abstain in the vote on both draft resolutions. The representative of Afghanistan associated himself with the views expressed by the representative of Saudi Arabia.

Following a separate vote on the first operative paragraph, as requested by the representative of Saudi Arabia, the revised joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.397/Rev.1), as a whole, was adopted (A/2604) by a roll-call vote of 44 to 5, with 5 abstentions, at the Third Committee's 542nd meeting on 3 December (see below for text).

The Chairman observed that, since a resolution approving the continuance of the Ad hoc Commission had been adopted, no vote was needed on the Byelorussian draft resolution. The representative of the USSR, however, formally moved that it be put to the vote. The Committee decided, however, by 21 votes to 11, with 16 abstentions, that the resolution should not be voted on.

The General Assembly considered the draft resolution proposed by the Third Committee (A/2604) at its 468th meeting on 7 December 1953. In addition to the report of the Third Committee, the Fifth Committee, in accordance with rule 152 of the rules of procedure, had submitted its report (A/2609) on the financial aspects of the resolution proposed by the Third Committee.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Poland and the USSR, explaining their votes, said that they would vote against the proposed resolution because the inclusion of the item in the agenda was contrary to Article 107 of the Charter and, since the repatriation of war prisoners from the Soviet Union had been completed long ago, the creation of the Ad hoc Commission on Prisoners of War had not been justified, but was prompted only by a desire of reactionary circles to delude public opinion and slander the peoples' democracies.

The representative of the United States explained that he would vote in favour of the resolution because, in his view, it reflected the best hope of thousands of families in Germany, Italy, Japan and other countries. These families were entitled to know whether their missing relatives were alive or dead.

The representative of the Byelorussian SSR re-submitted (A/L.171) his draft resolution, calling for the abolition of the Ad hoc Commission and asked that it be put to the vote first.

However, the Assembly rejected this motion by 35 votes to 5, with 14 abstentions, and adopted the draft resolution proposed by the Third Committee by 46 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 741(VIII). The Byelorussian SSR draft resolution was, accordingly, not voted on. Resolution 741(VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolution 427(V) of 14 December 1950 on measures for the peaceful solution of the problem of prisoners of war,

"Reaffirming its belief that all prisoners having originally come within the control of the Allied Powers as a consequence of the Second World War should either have been repatriated long since or have been otherwise accounted for as required both by recognized standards of international conduct and the Geneva Convention of 1949 relative to the treatment of prisoners of war, and by specific agreements between the Allied Powers,

"Having examined the progress report to the Secretary-General on the work of the Ad hoc Commission on Prisoners of War,

"1. Notes with satisfaction that some progress has taken place in the repatriation of prisoners of war in the course of the last two years, and expresses the hope that those governments and Red Cross Societies which have contributed to that progress will continue their efforts;

"2. Reiterates its grave and continuing concern at the evidence that large numbers of prisoners taken in the course of the Second World War have not yet been repatriated or otherwise accounted for;

"3. Urgently appeals to all governments and authorities which continue to hold prisoners of the Second World War to act in conformity with the recognized standards of international conduct and with the above-mentioned international agreements and the Geneva Convention of 1949 which require that, upon the cessation of active hostilities, all prisoners should, with the least possible delay, be given an unrestricted opportunity of repatriation;

"4. Expresses its sincere appreciation to the Ad hoc Commission on Prisoners of War for its efforts to assist in a solution of the problem of prisoners of war; and requests the Commission to continue its efforts to assist in a solution of the problem of prisoners of war under the terms of reference contained in General Assembly resolution 427(V) of 14 December 1950;

"5. Notes with satisfaction that a large amount of valuable information was made available to the Ad hoc Commission concerning prisoners of war; but notes with concern that certain governments and authorities mentioned in the report of the Commission have so far refused to co-operate with the Commission, which refusal represents the main obstacle by which the best efforts of the Commission have been frustrated;

"6. Urgently appeals to all governments and authorities which have not already done so to give their full co-operation to the Ad hoc Commission to supply the information requested by it on all prisoners of the Second World War who are still under their control and on such prisoners who have died while under their control; and to grant the Commission access to areas in which such prisoners are detained;

"7. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to furnish the Ad hoc Commission with the staff and facilities necessary for the effective accomplishment of its task;

"8. Requests the Ad hoc Commission to report as soon as practicable the results of its further work and possible suggestions to the Secretary-General for transmission to the Members of the United Nations."

10. Plight of Survivors of So-Called Scientific Experiments in Nazi Concentration Camps

During its fifteenth session, the Secretary-General furnished to the Economic and Social Council, for its information, a fourth progress report (E/2378) on action taken to implement resolution 386(XIII)¹¹⁴ on the subject of indemnification for survivors of so-called scientific experiments in Nazi concentration camps.

The report stated that, as of 31 January 1953, the Secretary-General had transmitted 468 claims to the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany. The Federal Government had informed the Secretary-General, in a note dated 22 December 1952, that final decisions had been passed in 156 cases and that a large number of applications were still being worked on. Of these 156, payments in the amount of DM 351,673.20 had been made to 108 applicants, while 48 claims had been rejected. The latter, it was stated by the Federal Government, had been rejected for the following reasons: in 27 cases they were not victims of so-called scientific experiments; fifteen applicants were not in need of assistance; in two cases the applicants did not suffer impairment of health; and in four cases they had received compensation previously.

By the end of 1953, a total of 510 claims had been transmitted to the Federal Republic of Germany.

In 1953, 500,000 Deutschmarks were appropriated for the plight of survivors in the Budget Bill submitted to the Parliament of the Federal Republic of Germany.

A new Federal law on "the indemnification of victims of national-socialist persecution", containing some provisions relevant to the plight of survivors of so-called scientific experiments in Nazi concentration camps, came into force on 1 October 1953.

L. FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

1. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Fifteenth Session

The Economic and Social Council, at its 677th plenary meeting on 6 April 1953, had before it the interim report of the Rapporteur on Freedom of Information (E/2345 & Add.1). The Rapporteur reported that satisfactory progress was being made in the preparation of the substantive report on freedom of information which he had been asked by the Council (442 C (XIV))¹¹⁵ to submit in 1953. Preparatory work on the report, he stated, had involved extensive consultations with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and correspondence with governments and with more than 600 information enterprises and national and international professional associations throughout the world. He had also taken into account suggestions made by several representatives in the Third Committee's debates at the Assembly's seventh session.¹¹⁶

In order to facilitate his work, he asked that the Council also permit him certain privileges concerning access to communications that had been received which contained specific criticisms or complaints against governments in the field of freedom of information.

The representatives of Belgium, India, Venezuela and the USSR, among others, opposed a draft resolution proposed by the Rapporteur to this effect. They considered that such communications were extremely vague and often unreliable and that conclusions based on them could be seriously distorted. Often such communications were motivated by bitterness or political hatred. It was also difficult to see how the Rapporteur could successfully study, within the time remaining, the hundred thousand communications which had reached the Secretariat over the years. While not doubting the Rapporteur's objectivity, some representatives, including those of India and the USSR, questioned the wisdom of giving such privileges to an individual. The representative of the USSR further stated that the proposal ran counter to the Charter, which, with the exception of petitions from Trust Territories, did not permit examination of such communications from any individual or organization. The representatives of Argentina and Yugoslavia thought the exact scope of the proposal must be clarified before the Council could take a decision on it.

Those favouring the draft resolution, including the representatives of China, France, the Philippines, the United States and Uruguay, felt that, in all fairness, the Council should give the Rapporteur all the facilities he needed to complete his assignment. The United States representative pointed out that, according to the draft resolution under discussion, the communications would be dealt with in conformity with the procedure defined in resolutions 75(V) and 116 A (VI).¹¹⁷ In that connexion, he recalled that the Commission on Human Rights itself, while having the right to take cognizance of those communications, was not entitled to act on any claims made in them. Moreover, according to the procedure laid down in resolution 75(V), the Rapporteur would simply review the confidential list of communications and would consult only such communications as related to the basic principles of freedom of information.

The Rapporteur, in further clarifying the intent of the draft resolution, stated that he would concern himself only with communications which related to freedom of information and emanated from national or international legally constituted enterprises or associations. The Secretariat had received over 25,000 communications relating to human rights, and he would be able to study only a small number in the two or three weeks remaining to him for the preparation of his report. Therefore, he would clearly confine himself to those communications which were relevant to the study he had been asked to carry out. Moreover, in accordance with the letter and spirit of resolution 240(IX),¹¹⁸ he did not intend to consider communications emanating from individuals or non-professional organizations. Where a relevant communication contained criticism of a given government, he stated, he supposed that he would receive a summary of it only, without the name and address of the author. He hoped that these explanations would dispel the doubts expressed by certain delegations.

The draft resolution proposed by the Rapporteur (E/2345/Add.1) was adopted by 13 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 473(XV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council

"Resolves to give the Rapporteur on Freedom of Information, Mr. Salvador P. Lopez, with respect to Communications dealing with freedom of information, the facilities which have been granted to the members of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press by Council resolution 240 C (IX), it being understood that if such communications include criticism of or complaints against governments, the procedure to be followed shall be the same as that established by resolution 75(V) as amended and by resolution 116 A (VI)".

2. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Sixteenth Session

In accordance with resolution 442 C (XIV), the report of the Rapporteur on Freedom of Information (E/2426), together with comments and suggestions of governments (E/2427) transmitted to him for his information and assistance, and a summary of comments and suggestions (E/2439) received by him from information enterprises and national and professional associations were submitted to the Council at its sixteenth session.

In Section I of the report, the Rapporteur dealt with the work accomplished prior to the existence of the United Nations concerning freedom of information, including the early work of non-governmental organizations and of the League of Nations, and with the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, particularly with reference to reasons for the successes and failures of the United Nations in this field.

Section II of the report covered the current situation and practical problems, namely: rights and responsibilities of the media of information; propaganda for war and false and distorted information; internal censorship and the suppression and coercion of media of information; censorship of outgoing news dispatches; status and movement of foreign correspondents; laws affecting the Press; monopolies; professional standards; independence of information personnel; protection of sources of information; development of Press, film, radio and television; professional training; production and distribution of newsprint; Press rates and priorities; international broadcasting; postal services; tariff and trade practices; and copyright.

Section II also contained a series of recommendations. The Rapporteur recommended that work on the draft Convention on Freedom of Information should proceed and he proposed a general formula which might be used as a basis for the drafting of article 2 of the Convention. This article, which lists permissible restrictions on freedom of information, had given rise to particular difficulties.

He recommended that a rapporteur be appointed for a further period of one year and that he be asked, among other things, to:

(1) prepare a working paper, in co-operation with the Secretary-General, on the drafting of a Declaration on Freedom of Information;

(2) draw up a concrete programme of action, in conjunction with the Secretary-General and UNESCO and in consultation with information enterprises and national and international professional associations, for enlisting the co-operation of the Press, radio and films throughout the world in promoting friendly relations among nations based on the Purposes and Principles of the Charter;

(3) undertake, in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies concerned and, where appropriate, in consultation with information enterprises and national and international professional associations, a world-wide survey of current internal censorship practices, a similar survey of current practices involved in the censorship of outgoing news dispatches, and a study of the problem of bringing into harmony articles 29 and 30 of the International Telecommunication Convention with articles of the United Nations Conventions on freedom of information;

(4) prepare, in co-operation with the Secretary-General and UNESCO, a programme of action for implementing the recommendations contained in two earlier studies, namely, "Study of the Law and Practice Governing the Status and Work of Foreign News Personnel and Measures to Facilitate the Work of Such Personnel" (E/CN.4/Sub.1/140) and "Study Relating to the Definition and Identification of Foreign Correspondents" (E/CN.4/Sub.1/148);

(5) make suggestions concerning the range and scope of and the most efficient manner of undertaking a detailed study of the legal aspects of the rights and responsibilities of the media of information;

(6) prepare, in co-operation with the Secretary-General, a detailed study of the problem of the protection of sources of information of news personnel; and

(7) make, in consultation with the Secretary-General and UNESCO, a detailed study and recommendations regarding the establishment of machinery which would serve as an international co-ordinating centre for professional action in regard to such matters as professional ethics and responsibility to the public, and as a liaison body between the profession and the United Nations.

As a means of coping with propaganda for war and false and distorted reports, the Rapporteur recommended that the International Convention concerning the Use of Broadcasting in the Cause of Peace (Geneva, 1936), formulated by the League of Nations, be revitalized. He also recommended that the specialized agencies co-operate with the United Nations in a number of special technical tasks, concerning, for example:

the collection of current information and completion of documentation on problems relating to the economic independence of information personnel;

the increasing of opportunities for professional training of information personnel;

the removal of tariff and trade obstacles affecting the free flow of information;

problems arising from lack of uniformity in copyright agreements;

the provision of services and advice and the formulation of plans for expansion of their production on pulp and paper;

problems of transmitting Press messages and the development of new techniques leading to economy in the use of radio frequencies and to elimination of wasteful competition and duplication; and reduction of postal rates for news materials.

The report listed in annex A the governments which had replied (E/2427 & Addenda) to the request for comments and suggestions as to contemporary problems and developments which, in their opinion, had tended to promote or hamper the free flow of information within countries and across national frontiers and any other relevant material which might be useful in the preparation of the report. The information enterprises and national and international professional associations which forwarded (E/2439) comments and suggestions on the subject, at the Rapporteur's request, were listed in annex B.

The Council also had before it a note by the Secretary-General (E/2465) stating that the Secretariat report concerning the encouragement and development of independent domestic information enterprises, called for by Council resolution 442 E (XIV) and Assembly resolution 633(VII),¹¹⁹ was not yet ready. While it could be presented to the Council before the end of the current session, it was suggested that, to allow more time for discussion of it, the Council might wish to postpone its consideration of this subject to the following session.

The Council, at its 705th plenary meeting on 30 June 1953, decided, by 12 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, to postpone consideration of the Rapporteur's report on freedom of information, since governments would not have sufficient time to study it prior to the Council's discussion. It was decided, without vote, to postpone also the discussion on the item concerning encouragement and development of independent domestic information enterprises.

Following brief discussions at the Council's 706th and 718th plenary meetings, on 30 June and 9 July, the Council was informed that the Rapporteur, Mr. Lopez, had agreed to present his report at the seventeenth session of the Council and that no financial implications for the United Nations would ensue, providing Mr. Lopez were in New York at that time. It was also agreed that provision for travelling expenses, if necessary, should be provided by the Secretary-General in submitting, at the end of the session, a statement of financial implications of the Council's decisions.

3. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

The question of freedom of information was not on the Assembly's agenda at its eighth session. However, it was introduced during the Third Committee's general debate, at its 503rd to 511th meetings, on 22, and 26 to 30 October and 2 and 3 November, on Chapter V, Human Rights, of the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430). As a result, it subsequently, at the Third Committee's 512th to 516th meetings, from 5 to 9 November, became the subject of a separate discussion and specific recommendations to the General Assembly.

At its 504th meeting, the Third Committee approved, without vote, a formal proposal by Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.362) to invite Mr. Salvador P. López, the Rapporteur on Freedom of Information, to address the Committee. Mr. Lopez stated that he had naturally been disappointed by the Council's decision not to discuss his report, but that assurance had been given that the Council would give high priority to its consideration at the seventeenth session and he was confident that it would be possible to make up for the time that had been lost. In view of the procedural difficulties, he stated that he thought it would be advisable for the Third Committee to proceed with caution and to confine itself to a general discussion of the report, leaving it to the Council to consider the recommendations for practical action. He briefly outlined the form of the report and the principles on which it was based. The Rapporteur also stated that, since May 1953, the situation had changed in a number of countries and that he would supply the Council with the latest information at his disposal on new developments.

Among others, the representatives of Afghanistan, China, Egypt, Mexico, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yugoslavia regretted that the Council had not discussed the Rapporteur's report and stressed that it should give urgent priority to it at its seventeenth session. They further hoped that, on the basis of the many useful suggestions in the report, the Council would be able to agree on new and practical measures to be taken in the field of freedom of information. The representatives of Mexico and the Philippines particularly emphasized the desirability of continuing work on the draft Convention on Freedom of Information, noting that the Rapporteur had proposed a revised text for the controversial article 2. The Egyptian and Syrian representatives also urged that the Secretariat should complete, in time for the Council's consideration at its next session, the study of concrete action for developing information media in under-developed areas of the world.

On the other hand, some representatives, among them those of Belgium, Canada, Turkey and the United Kingdom, maintained that, in view of the care which must be taken not to act hastily in such a delicate matter, the Council's decision to defer consideration of the Rapporteur's report was not necessarily to be regretted. In any case, they noted, the Council had decided to deal with the report at its seventeenth session.

A representative of the Secretary-General stated that the study of measures for the encouragement and development of independent domestic information enterprises had been ready for the sixteenth session of the Council; when the Council had decided to postpone consideration of the matter, the Secretary-General had decided to avail himself of the extra time at his disposal to attempt to improve the study.

Chile, France, Mexico, Netherlands, Pakistan, United Kingdom, United States and Uruguay submitted a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.364 & Add.1) by which the General Assembly, recalling the terms of its resolutions 631(VII) and 633(VII) and regretting that the Council had been unable to consider the subject of freedom of information at its sixteenth session, would request the Council to give priority at its seventeenth session to discussion of freedom of information, including the Rapporteur's report, and to the formulation of recommendations for the Assembly's consideration at its ninth session.

The draft resolution would further: (1) request the Council to take into account the views expressed on this subject at the eighth session of the Assembly; and (2) request the Secretary-General to complete his report on the development of information facilities in under-developed regions of the world in time for consideration at the Council's seventeenth session.

Amendments to the joint draft resolution were presented by Turkey (A/C.3/L.365) and Afghanistan (A/C.3/L.377).

The Turkish amendment proposed that the General Assembly should "note" instead of "regret" that the Council had been unable to consider freedom of information at its sixteenth session and that the request to the Council to give priority to discussions on freedom of information at its seventeenth session should be deleted.

The Afghanistan amendment proposed that the first paragraph of the preamble of the joint draft resolution should be replaced by a paragraph reaffirming the considerations and decisions contained in Assembly resolutions 631(VII) and 633(VII) and that a paragraph should be added to the preamble, by which the Assembly would also reaffirm its recommendation that United Nations bodies studying freedom of information consider measures to avoid the harm done to international understanding by the dissemination of false and distorted information.

The amendment also proposed that the second paragraph of the joint draft resolution be reworded to include a reference to consideration by the Council of the draft Convention on Freedom of Information in the light of the Rapporteur's report and that a new paragraph be added to the preamble referring to the fact that the General Assembly had not studied the draft Convention during its sixth, seventh and eighth sessions.

The amendment further proposed that the second operative paragraph of the joint draft resolution should be amended to include a request to the Council to take into account the views expressed on freedom of information at the seventh and eighth sessions of the Assembly and that a new operative paragraph should be added requesting the Council to submit to the Assembly at its next session a statement of its views and plans regarding future work in connexion with freedom of information and the problem of promoting and safeguarding freedom of information in accordance with the provisions of resolution 631(VII).

The representatives of Afghanistan, Chile, Egypt, France, Mexico, the Netherlands, Pakistan, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay met as an informal working group on 5 November to consider the consolidation of the joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.364 & Add.1) and the amendments submitted thereto (A/C.3/L.365 and A/C.3/L.377). Subsequently, the group presented a text (A/C.3/L.379) for the consideration of the Committee. Its report noted that unanimous agreement had been reached on everything except the first word of the first paragraph of the preamble of the new text, by which the Assembly would alternatively reaffirm or recall the decisions contained in its resolutions on freedom of information adopted at its seventh session. Thus, the new text incorporated all the points contained in the Afghanistan amendment except the word "reaffirming". The representative of Afghanistan agreed that this paragraph should begin with the word "recalling" and the word "reaffirming" was withdrawn.

The new joint text (A/C.3/L.379), as amended, was adopted by the Committee (A/2573 (IV) A), at its 514th meeting on 5 November, by 42 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

The General Assembly, at its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November 1953, adopted it by 53 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 736 A (VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the decisions contained in the resolutions on freedom of information adopted at its seventh session,

"Regretting that the Economic and Social Council was unable to give consideration at its sixteenth session to the subject of freedom of information, including the report of its Rapporteur,

"Noting that, at its sixteenth session, the Economic and Social Council postponed consideration of the question of freedom of information to its seventeenth session and decided, in agreement with the Rapporteur, that the Rapporteur would present his report at the seventeenth session,

"Noting that the General Assembly has not studied the draft Convention on Freedom of Information at its sixth, seventh and eighth sessions and that the Economic and Social Council, at its sixteenth session, did not consider the draft Convention on Freedom of Information concurrently with the report of the Rapporteur,

"1. Requests the Economic and Social Council to give priority, at its seventeenth session, to discussion of freedom of information, including the report of the Rapporteur, and to the formulation, in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 631(VII) of 16 December 1952, of recommendations for the consideration of the General Assembly at its ninth session;

"2. Requests the Economic and Social Council, in its discussion of freedom of information, to take into account the views expressed on this subject at the seventh and eighth sessions of the General Assembly;

"3. Requests the Secretary-General to complete the report on a programme of concrete action for the development of information facilities in under-developed regions of the world, requested in General Assembly resolution 633(VII) of 16 December 1952, in time for consideration at the seventeenth session of the Economic and Social Council."

The Third Committee also had before it, at its 514th to 516th meetings on 5, 6 and 9 November, a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.375) by Saudi Arabia and Syria concerning the draft International Code of Ethics for information personnel.

By this resolution the Assembly, recalling its resolution 635(VII)¹²⁰ concerning further work on the draft International Code of Ethics, would invite the Secretary-General to address a further communication to the information enterprises and national and international professional associations which had not yet replied to his previous letter concerning the organization of an international professional conference to complete work on the draft Code, requesting them to do so within a reasonable period, upon the expiry of which a conference should be organized for the purpose of preparing a final text of the Code and measures for its implementation.

The Committee also had before it a statement by the Secretary-General (A/C.3/L.375/Add.1) on the financial implications of the draft resolution, and a memorandum (A/C.3/L.381), entitled "Replies from information enterprises and national and international professional associations received under General Assembly resolution 635(VII)".

Chile, France and the United Kingdom submitted two amendments (A/C.3/L.380) to the draft resolution. The first amendment, that the third paragraph of the draft should be deleted, was subsequently withdrawn. The second, which suggested a new text for the first operative paragraph, was accepted by Saudi Arabia and Syria. Verbal drafting amendments proposed by the representatives of China, Egypt and the United States were also accepted by the sponsors and a revised draft resolution (A/C.3/L.375/Rev.2) was submitted to the Committee.

The majority supported the proposal on the grounds that:

(1) a code of ethics would help to correct some of the abuses in the field of freedom of information, to promote friendly relations among peoples and to solve the vexed problem of false and distorted reports;

(2) while the development of the code was a matter for the profession alone, the United Nations was legitimately interested in questions of professional ethics and could properly offer encouragement and assistance in such a problem; and

(3) even if an improvement in the international climate was necessary before an effective code could be drafted, every effort should be made to improve the situation.

However, they emphasized that the final adoption of a draft code was a matter for the information professions alone without any form of governmental interference at national or international levels.

A number of representatives, including those of Israel, New Zealand and Sweden, expressed doubt, however, as to whether the United Nations should interest itself any further in the draft Code. In their opinion it would be extremely difficult, under current conditions, for any conference to reach agreement on the text of a universally acceptable code.

Moreover, the New Zealand representative stated, it would be detrimental to the prestige of the United Nations to address another communication on the subject to enterprises and associations.

The representative of the USSR held that the question was outside the competence of the United Nations and that information personnel should decide on the calling of a conference and the preparation of a draft code.

In resolution 635(VII), the Assembly had requested the Secretary-General, if a representative group of information enterprises and of national and international professional associations expressed a desire to do so, to co-operate with it in organizing an international professional conference. However, various opinions were expressed as to what constituted a "representative group" under the terms of this resolution.

The representative of Sweden maintained that those enterprises and associations which, according to the Secretary-General's memorandum (A/C.3/L.381), favoured holding a professional conference did not constitute a representative group. On the other hand, the Egyptian representative stated that a federation, representing several units or syndicates, might itself constitute a representative group. The representatives of Canada and France believed that the task of defining a representative group should be left to the Secretary-General.

At the request of the representative of Guatemala, a separate vote was taken on the first operative paragraph of the revised draft resolution (A/C.3/L.375/Rev.2), and it was adopted by 43 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, at the Committee's 516th meeting on 9 November.

The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by the Third Committee (A/2573 IV B) by 44 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions.

The General Assembly, at its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November 1953, adopted it by 49 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 736 B (VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolution 635(VII) of 16 December 1952 in which it requested the Secretary-General, if a representative group of information enterprises and of national and international professional associations expressed a desire to do so, to co-operate with it in organizing an international professional conference for the purpose of preparing the final text of an International Code of Ethics for the use of information personnel,

"Noting that replies have already been received from a number of the information enterprises and professional associations consulted by the Secretary-General in pursuance of the aforementioned resolution,

"Considering that to await replies from all the information enterprises and professional associations consulted would unnecessarily delay the conference and the preparation of the final text of the Code,

"1. Invites the Secretary-General to address a further communication to the enterprises and associations which have not yet replied, requesting them to do so within a reasonable period, and, provided that a representative group of enterprises and associations expresses a desire to do so, to co-operate with the group in organizing an international professional conference for the purpose of preparing the final text of the Code and measures for its implementation;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General:

"(a) To bring the text of the present resolution to the notice of the information enterprises and national and international associations to which he communicated the draft Code;

"(b) To report to the General Assembly at its ninth session on any progress achieved."

M. STATUS OF WOMEN

The Commission on the Status of Women at its seventh session, held from 16 March to 3 April 1953, discussed, among other things: the nationality of married women; the status of women in private law; political rights of women; equal pay for equal work; economic and educational opportunities for women; participation of women in the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies; and technical assistance programmes in relation to the status of women.

The report of the Commission (E/2401) was discussed by the Economic and Social Council at its sixteenth session, at the 241st to 245th and 248th meetings of its Social Committee on 13 to 15 and 17 July, and at its 736th plenary meeting on 23 July 1953.

A resolution noting the Commission's report was adopted unanimously by the Social Committee at its 248th meeting on 17 July (E/2486) and, by 17 votes to none, by the Council, at its 736th plenary meeting on 23 July, as resolution 504 A (XVI).

The questions of political rights of women and technical assistance programmes in relation to the status of women were subsequently considered by the General Assembly at its eighth session. The action taken on the various items mentioned above is given below.

1. Nationality of Married Women

At its seventh session, the Commission on the Status of Women had before it notes (E/2343 & E/CN.6/217) by the Secretary-General on the action taken by the International Law Commission and the Economic and Social Council since the sixth session of the Commission, the report on "Nationality including statelessness" (A/CN.4/50) submitted to the International Law Commission by its special rapporteur, the relevant summary records of that Commission and a supplementary report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/206 & Add.1-2) on statutory and constitutional provisions relating to the nationality of married women.

The Commission proposed a draft resolution (E/2401 B) for adoption by the Economic and Social Council, which would note the recommendation of the Commission that a convention on the nationality of married persons be opened for signature by interested States, the text of a draft convention on that subject being appended to the resolution, and would request the Secretary-General to circulate that text to Member Governments for their comments.

During the Council's discussions of that draft resolution at its sixteenth session, the representatives of Belgium, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela, among others, expressed the view that it was premature to circulate for comments by governments a text which had not been studied adequately by the Council, especially as it involved the whole question of nationality of married persons and not just the nationality of married women. It would, they considered, be wiser to wait until the report on the work of the International Law Commission on the subject of nationality was available. Others, among them the representatives of Argentina, Cuba, China, France, the Philippines and Yugoslavia, opposed postponement of the question and considered that consultation with governments would facilitate the work of all organs of the United Nations on the subject.

A new text for the operative part of the draft resolution was proposed jointly by the Philippines, the United Kingdom and Venezuela (E/AC.7/L.161). In circulating the draft convention for comments, it would state that the Council had not considered its substance. It would also circulate to governments the records of the Council's discussions and the amendments submitted.

Two amendments to the substance of the draft Convention had been submitted. One by the Philippines recommended (E/AC.7/L.159/Rev.1) that a territorial clause should be added to extend the convention to all territories administered or governed by a contracting Metropolitan State. The second, by Egypt (E/AC.7/L.156), proposed to replace article 1 of the draft convention by a clause stating that each of the contracting States "agrees to direct" its legislation and practice in regard to nationality "towards abolishing" the distinction based on sex.

The joint amendment was adopted by the Council's Social Committee at its 244th meeting, by 15 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, with the exception of a clause (rejected by 4 votes to 4, with 10 abstentions) providing that comments of governments should include comments on the desirability of such a convention.

The amended draft resolution was adopted, as a whole, by the Committee at the same meeting by 14 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions (E/2486 B), and by the Council, at its 736th plenary meeting on 23 July, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 504 B (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Noting the recommendation of the Commission on the Status of Women, at its seventh session, that a convention on the nationality of married persons be opened for signature by interested States,

"Desiring to expedite by every appropriate means, in accordance with the principles of the Charter and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the extension to women in all countries of equal rights in the field of nationality,

"Requests the Secretary-General to circulate to the governments of Member States, for their comments, the following text of a draft convention on nationality of married persons, the substance of which the Council has not considered, together with the records of the discussions held and the amendments submitted at the sixteenth session, with the request that such comments be sent to the Secretary-General by 1 January 1954, to be made available to the Commission on the Status of Women for consideration at its eighth session."

CONVENTION ON THE NATIONALITY OF MARRIED PERSONS

2. Status of Women in Private Law

The Commission, at its seventh session, discussed the question of the status of women in private law, including family law and property rights. It had before it:

(a) a report on family law, (E/CN.6/185 & Add.1-10) prepared by the Secretary-General and based on replies of governments to part III of the Questionnaire on the Legal Status and Treatment of Women;

(b) a report (E/CN.6/208) by the Secretary-General on property rights of women based on replies of governments to part II of the same Questionnaire; and

(c) a report (E/CN.6/186 & Add.1-3) by the Secretary-General on the status of women in private law, covering both family law and property rights of women, based on replies of non-governmental organizations to questions concerning changes considered desirable in the legal systems of various countries in order to eliminate discrimination against women.

The Commission recommended (E/2401 C) that the Economic and Social Council request the Commission on Human Rights to include the text of article 16²¹ of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights relating to marriage and family rights in the draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Meanwhile, the attention of the Commission on Human Rights was drawn to this resolution prior to its consideration by the Council.

That Commission, at its ninth session from 7 April to 1 June 1953,¹²² drafted article 22 of the draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights substantially on the basis of article 16 of the Universal Declaration with the modification that the draft article did not specify that legislation would provide the equality of rights and responsibilities for the spouses as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution, but that legislation "shall be directed towards" that equality.

During the discussions in the Economic and Social Council in July, the representatives of Belgium and the Philippines pointed out that the proposal was obsolete in view of the action already taken by the Commission on Human Rights. However, the representative of India considered that, on the basis of that action, the Commission on the Status of Women should have the opportunity to reconsider its recommendation, and presented a draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.162) to this effect. The representative of France pointed out that article 22 had been adopted by the Commission on Human Rights after long discussion and that therefore it might be unwise to reopen the discussion of the text. A separate vote was taken on the operative paragraph of the draft resolution (see para. 3, below), and it was adopted by 8 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, at the Social Committee's 244th meeting on 14 July. The two introductory paragraphs were adopted jointly by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention, by the Social Committee (E/2486 C) at the same meeting and by the Council, at its 736th plenary meeting on 23 July, as resolution 504 C (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"1. Takes note of the recommendation contained in paragraph 30 of the report of the Commission on the Status of Women (seventh session);

"2. Draws the attention of the Commission on the Status of Women to article 22 of the Draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights included in the report of the Commission on Human Rights (ninth session);

"3. Suggests to the Commission on the Status of Women that it reconsider the recommendation in the light of the provisions contained in article 22 of the Draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights."

In its further considerations of the question, the Commission on the Status of Women agreed that discriminations existing against women, particularly married women, in family law and in regard to property rights were extensive and that measures should be taken as soon as possible for their elimination. It therefore requested (E/2401) the Secretary-General to prepare, for future sessions, detailed comparative studies of certain specific aspects of the status of women in family law and property rights. It also proposed a draft resolution, which the Council (E/2401 D) subsequently adopted.

During the discussions in the Council, at its sixteenth session, the representative of Egypt proposed (E/AC.7/L.155) that, in view of the complexities and difficulties involved in this problem, the Council should recommend to governments that they direct all possible measures towards ensuring equality of rights and duties of husband and wife in family matters rather than recommend specifically that governments take measures to do so.

However, the majority considered that the amendment would weaken the resolution and, moreover, that the expression "all possible measures" was not mandatory and did not necessarily require action. The Egyptian amendment was rejected at the Social Committee's 244th meeting on 14 July, by 8 votes to 4, with 6 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as proposed by the Commission, was adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, by the Social Committee (E/2486 D) at the same meeting, and by the Council, at its 736th plenary meeting, as resolution 540 D (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Considering that the principle of equality of rights for men and women is solemnly proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations,

"Recognizing, in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, that "the family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State", and that men and women "are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution",

"Believing that legal equality of husband and wife and the sharing by spouses of the authority, prerogatives and responsibilities involved in marriage are of benefit not only to the status of women but also to the family as an institution,

"Noting that the legal systems of many countries result in a subordinate status of the wife in family matters of fundamental importance, and that under numerous legal systems women are, during marriage, deprived of important personal and property rights or are subject to the authority and control of their husbands in the exercise of these rights,

"Recommends that governments:

"(a) Take all possible measures to ensure equality of rights and duties of husband and wife in family matters;

"(b) Take all possible measures to ensure to the wife full legal capacity, the right to engage in work outside the home and the right, on equal terms with her husband, to acquire, administer, enjoy and dispose of property."

3. Political Rights of Women

a. CONVENTION ON THE POLITICAL RIGHTS OF WOMEN

The Commission on the Status of Women, at its seventh session, had before it a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/209) on the action taken by the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly on the Draft Convention on the Political Rights of Women. By resolution 640 (VII)¹²³ of 20 December 1952, the General Assembly had adopted the Convention and had opened it for signature and ratification or accession.

The Commission therefore adopted a resolution (E/2401 E) which, after expressing satisfaction that the Convention on Political Rights of Women had been adopted by the General Assembly at its seventh session and had been opened for signature and ratification or accession by States, expressed certain recommendations to the Council concerning invitations to States not Members of the United Nations to ratify or accede to the Convention and concerning reports by States parties to the Convention on the implementation of the provisions of that instrument.

During the discussions in the Economic and Social Council at its sixteenth session, the majority praised the work of the Commission in securing the adoption of the Convention. The representatives of Poland and the USSR considered that, while the Convention had certain shortcomings, in general it represented a step forward. The representative of the Philippines thought that the Assembly's invitation to sign and ratify or accede to the Convention should be extended either on the principle of universality—that is, to all non-member States without exception—or on that of selectivity, by which the Assembly would consider each invitation to a non-member State on its individual merits. At the 736th plenary meeting of the Council, a separate vote was therefore taken on the final phrase of paragraph 4, concerning the invitation for signature (see below) and it was retained by 10 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions. A separate vote was also taken on the last paragraph at the request of Belgium, the representatives of Belgium and France having pointed out that the obligation of signatory States to report on implementation would place those States in an unfavourable position compared with non-signatory States. It was retained by 9 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions.

Following a paragraph-by-paragraph vote, the draft resolution, as proposed by the Commission (E/2401 E), was adopted by the Social Committee (E/2486 E), at its 244th meeting on 14 July, by 13 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, and by the Council, at its 736 plenary meeting on 23 July, by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

Resolution 504 E (XVI) urged Member States which had not yet done so to sign and ratify or accede to the Convention. It recommended to the Assembly that it invite signature and ratification or accession by non-member States which are or become members of one or more of the specialized agencies or are or become parties to the Statute of the International Court of Justice. It also requested States parties to the Convention to report every two years to the Council on the measures taken by them to implement the provisions of the Convention.

The question was considered by the General Assembly at its eighth session, at the 367th meeting of its Sixth Committee on 7 October and at its 453rd plenary meeting on 23 October 1953. It had before it a memorandum (A/2445) by the Secretary-General which contained the text of the Council's resolution and of the relevant articles of the Convention. A draft resolution (A/C.6/L.297) was proposed by Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Greece, and the Philippines which would refer to the Council's resolution and would request the Secretary-General to invite each non-member State fulfilling the conditions laid down therein to become a party to the Convention.

Statements in support of the draft resolution were made by the representatives of Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, the Byelorussian SSR, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, Greece, the Philippines, Syria, Thailand, the USSR and Yugoslavia, some of them announcing the intention of their countries shortly to ratify the Convention.

The representative of Peru stated that in his country women had not acquired full political rights because certain constitutional amendments were first required. That, however, would not prevent his delegation from voting in favour of the draft resolution.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the principles contained in the Convention were widely applied in his country but some practical difficulties remained which could not be solved without constitutional and legislative changes. He felt that his Government could not join in an invitation to other States until it had signed and ratified the Convention itself. He would therefore, he said, abstain on the draft resolution.

The joint draft resolution was adopted by the Committee (A/2508), at its 367th meeting by 44 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, and by the Assembly at its 453rd plenary meeting, without discussion, by 54 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 793(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Taking note of Economic and Social Council resolution 504 E (XVI) dated 23 July 1953,

"Considering that articles IV and V of the Convention on the Political Rights of Women provide, inter alia, that the Convention shall be open for signature and ratification or for accession on behalf of any non-member State to which an invitation has been addressed by the General Assembly,

"Decides to request the Secretary-General to dispatch such an invitation to each non-member State which is or hereafter becomes a member or one or more of the specialized agencies of the United Nations, or which is or hereafter becomes a Party to the Statute of the International Court of Justice."

By December 1953, 29 countries had signed the Convention and three had deposited instruments of ratification. It will come into force 90 days after the date of deposit of the sixth instrument of ratification or accession.¹²⁴

b. ADVANCEMENT OF POLITICAL RIGHTS

The Commission on the Status of Women, at its seventh session, also had before it a memorandum (A/2154 & Add.1-2) prepared annually by the Secretary-General on the advancement of political rights of women and a report (E/CN.6/212 & Add.1) on women in political and public life. The former brought up to date information on national constitutions, electoral laws and other legal instruments relating to the franchise of women and their eligibility to public office and functions.

The Secretary-General's report (E/CN.6/212 & Add.1) on women in political and public life (number of women in elective State bodies, local government bodies, etc.) contained information concerning 35 countries. It was based on information from governments in response to the Questionnaire on the Legal Status and Treatment of Women, on information received from the Inter-American Commission of Women, and on information taken from official government sources available to the Secretary-General.

The Commission, following a discussion of the two reports, adopted a resolution (E/2401), which, inter alia, noted that in several countries, including Bolivia, Lebanon and Greece, action had been taken since the last session of the Commission to extend the franchise to women or to improve laws regarding the right to vote. It commended the Secretary-General on the inclusion of historical data in his report for 1952 and suggested that this document in the future include pertinent information on all countries, information as to whether women who had been granted the vote had had an opportunity to participate in an election, and information on suffrage grants involving limitations on grounds of sex, and legislative changes subsequent to such grants in relation to the achievement of equal suffrage for women. The Commission further requested the Secretary-General to summarize suggestions on ways in which equal political rights for women could be achieved and made effective. It expressed its appreciation of the report on Women in Political and Public Life and suggested that the Secretary-General prepare a plan for a more complete report on this subject to be issued at a later date, possibly in 1955. It also expressed its appreciation of the publication The Road to Equality.

The Commission also considered in this connexion two further reports by the Secretary-General, one on the status of women in Trust Territories (E/CN.6/210) and the other on their status in Non-Self-Governing Territories (E/CN.6/211). The former contained information on political, social and economic, and educational advancement, based on the information supplied by the Administering Authorities in their annual reports to the Trusteeship Council. The report on the status of women in Non-Self-Governing Territories contained information taken from that transmitted by the Administering Authorities under Article 73e of the Charter and dealt with the status of women, in general, and political advancement.

Several members of the Commission expressed the opinion that the question of the political rights of women in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories should not be dealt with separately from that of the rights of women in sovereign States, inasmuch as in some of the latter States women did not enjoy any more political rights than women in dependent Territories. Separate treatment, they considered, would amount to discrimination. Other members stated that women in these Territories still had no rights and that special attention should be given by the Commission to the improvement of the status of women in dependent Territories; they referred particularly to decisions taken by the Trusteeship Council on this matter.

At the sixteenth session of the Economic and Social Council, the Commission's recommendations (E/2401 F) were adopted unanimously, without discussion, at the 244th meeting of the Social Committee (E/2486) on 14 July and at the Council's 736th plenary meeting on 23 July. Resolution 504 F (XIV) read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Considering that in some areas of the world, including certain Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, women do not enjoy full political rights, and that progress in this field can be achieved more readily if the education of women receives greater emphasis,

"1. Invites the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council, as appropriate, in collaboration with the governments of all States which administer territories, including Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, where women do not enjoy full political rights, to take all necessary measures leading to the development of political rights of women in such territories, in particular by means of education;

"2. Invites the Secretary-General to report to the Commission on the Status of Women on the steps taken to implement this resolution."

The Commission at its seventh session also noted with satisfaction (E/2401) that the Trusteeship Council had included in its Questionnaire, adopted under Article 88 of the Charter, questions on the status of women which contained some suggestions adopted by the Commission on the Status of Women at its sixth session. It expressed the hope that the Administering Authorities would reply in detail to all those questions in their annual reports to the United Nations. The Commission invited the Secretary-General to transmit regularly to the Commission information forwarded by the Administering Authorities in their annual reports on those questions and all relevant documents of the Trusteeship Council relating to that subject, as well as records of all discussions in that Council concerning the status of women in Trust Territories.

On the basis of an oral proposal by Cuba, the Economic and Social Council, at its sixteenth session, without discussion, by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at the 245th meeting of its Social Committee (E/2486 K) on 15 July, and by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention, at its 736th plenary meeting on 23 July, took note of the Commission's resolution and drew it to the attention of the Trusteeship Council (resolution 504 K (XVI)).

The General Assembly, at its eighth session, under the agenda item "Development of political rights of women in territories where these rights are not fully enjoyed", had before it the relevant section of the report of the Economic and Social Council (E/2430), together with a note by the Secretary-General (A/2452) calling attention to Council resolution 504 F (XVI).

The question was discussed at the 490th to 492nd meetings of the Third Committee, on 1, 2 and 6 October, and at the Assembly's 454th plenary meeting on 23 October 1953. The Committee had before it a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.345/Rev.1) by Chile, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Greece, India, Indonesia and the Philippines, based upon the Council's recommendations. The draft resolution would urge States to take all necessary measures, particularly educational, leading to the development of political rights for women in all territories—including Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories—in which women do not enjoy full political rights.

During the discussion, all speakers strongly supported the goal of equal political rights for women. The representative of Cuba pointed out that the draft resolution especially stressed educational measures, because education was the best means of raising people to the highest economic and social levels. It was clear that in many cases economic and social factors had prevented women from obtaining proper education and thus becoming fitted to exercise the vote, he said.

The representatives of Bolivia, Israel and Yugoslavia stressed that lack of education must not be used as a pretext for postponing the granting of political rights to women, and it was generally understood that the draft resolution had no such implications. The representative of the Philippines was of the opinion that, if literacy was a prerequisite of the franchise in any country, the same condition should apply to men as well as to women.

Syria submitted three amendments (A/C.3/L.347/Rev.1). The first would urge States to take legislative as well as educational measures leading to the development of political rights. This was opposed by the representatives of Argentina, Australia, Belgium, El Salvador and France, among others, on the basis that the resolution already provided for "all necessary" measures. The representatives of Bolivia, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Israel, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Venezuela, on the other hand, supported the amendment on the grounds that it might strengthen the resolution. The amendment was subsequently adopted by 32 votes to 8, with 12 abstentions.

A second Syrian amendment proposed the addition of a new operative paragraph requesting the Trusteeship Council to be careful to ensure that questions in the revised Trusteeship Questionnaire relating to the status of women were replied to adequately and in detail by the Administering Authorities. The representatives of El Salvador, Guatemala, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, among others, spoke in favour of the amendment. The representatives of Argentina, Australia, Cuba, and Mexico, however, pointed out that the Council in resolution 504 K (XVI) (see above) had already covered the matter. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom considered that such a strong injunction to the Trusteeship Council was derogatory and implied failure by the Administering Authorities to discharge their obligations. Doubts were also expressed as to the Third Committee's competence to deal with this matter.

The Committee decided, by 26 votes to 13, with 13 abstentions, on the basis of an oral Afghanistan proposal, to recommend that the Assembly refer the text of the amendment to the Fourth Committee for further consideration and report thereon to the General Assembly.

The third Syrian amendment, which would have called on the Secretary-General to report to the Assembly's ninth session on steps taken to give effect to the resolution, was withdrawn.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Third Committee (A/2503), at its 492nd meeting on 6 October, by a roll-call vote of 53 to none, with 1 abstention.

The General Assembly, at its 454th plenary meeting on 23 October adopted it, without discussion, by a roll-call vote of 59 in favour (the Union of South Africa was absent). Resolution 731(VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolution 56(I) of 11 December 1946 relating to the political rights of women, which was reaffirmed in resolution 640(VII) of 20 December 1952,

"Having considered Economic and Social Council resolution 504 F (XVI) of 23 July 1953,

"Urges States to take all necessary measures, particularly educational and legislative measures, leading to the development of the political rights of women in all Territories in which women do not enjoy full political rights, including Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories."

4. Equal Pay for Equal Work

The Commission at its seventh session had before it a report (E/CN.6/220) by the International Labour Office on the application of the Convention (No. 100) and Recommendation (No. 90) on Equal Remuneration for Work of Equal Value for Men and Women Workers, adopted at the 34th International Labour Conference in 1951. The Commission took note of the fact that the Convention had been brought into force by the ratification of three countries (Belgium, Mexico and Yugoslavia) and that it would come into effect on 23 May 1953. It also recommended a draft resolution (E/2401 G), which was subsequently adopted by the Council.

During the discussions at the sixteenth session of the Economic and Social Council, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the Commission on the Status of Women, in common with many United Nations bodies, appeared to believe that to adopt a resolution was equivalent to action. While accepting the principle of equal pay, his Government questioned the wisdom of adopting yet another resolution on the subject. The representative of Australia was also not in favour of the resolution since, in his opinion, it did not differ substantially from the resolution adopted at the Council's fourteenth session. The representative of Poland, on the other hand, stressed the importance of the draft resolution as a step in the right direction. The representative of Sweden stated that he would abstain in the vote, since his Government was not prepared to intervene in negotiations between parties in the labour market.

The draft resolution, as proposed by the Commission, was adopted by the Council at the 244th meeting of its Social Committee (E/2486 G) on 14 July by 15 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, and at its 736th plenary meeting on 23 July by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 504 G (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Noting the action of countries which have formally ratified the Convention on Equal Remuneration adopted by the International Labour Organisation in 1951,

"Noting also the progress being made in other countries towards obtaining increased acceptance, in law and in practice, of the equal remuneration principle as set forth in the Preamble of the United Nations Charter, in article 23, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and in the International Labour Organisation Convention and Recommendation on this subject,

"Noting the work of non-governmental organizations in many countries in creating a favourable public opinion for the application of this principle by calling attention to the value of women's work and the need for establishing improved personnel practices and for securing equal opportunities for training and advancement, by promoting the adoption of legislation and by other appropriate means,

"1. Urges increased efforts towards widespread implementation of the principle of equal remuneration in all countries, whether or not members of the International Labour Organisation, by means appropriate to their systems of wage fixing;

"2. Invites the Secretary-General in collaboration with the International Labour Office to furnish annually additional information on the progress being made in the various countries toward elimination of discriminatory wage practices against women, as well as similar reports on steps taken or methods used in those countries to put the principle of equal remuneration into force."

5. Educational Opportunities for Women

The Commission had before it at its seventh session:

(1) a note by the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/214) on the findings of the Fifteenth International Conference on Public Education convened by the United Nations

Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the International Bureau of Education in July 1952, together with the official report of this Conference (Publication No. 143);

(2) a note by the Secretary-General on legal provisions concerning educational opportunities for girls and women (E/CN.6/215) transmitting a joint publication of UNESCO and the International Bureau of Education (Publication No. 141);

(3) a progress report prepared by UNESCO on access of women to education (E/CN.6/223); and

(4) a progress report prepared by the International Labour Office on vocational guidance and on vocational and technical training of women (E/CN.6/221).

The Commission expressed its appreciation for the work which ILO intended to undertake in the field of vocational guidance and training of women and suggested that its studies be continued in co-operation with the Secretary-General, and include the field of access to apprenticeship.

Various members of the Commission expressed disappointment, on the other hand, with certain parts of recommendation 34, concerning the access of women to education, adopted by the Fifteenth International Conference, on the grounds that they did not provide for true equality. Stating that, in its opinion, it was essential to have identity of basic programmes if all children were to have an equal chance of really benefiting from educational opportunities, the Commission recommended (E/2401 H) that the Economic and Social Council draw the attention of governments and of specialized agencies to the need for ensuring the identity of basic school curricula for pupils of both sexes.

The Council, however, at its sixteenth session, adopted a joint amendment by Argentina, Cuba, France and the United States (E/AC.7/L.158) which, instead of drawing the attention of governments and specialized agencies to the need for ensuring "the identity of basic school curricula for pupils of both sexes", would call their attention to the need for ensuring that "pupils of both sexes have the same opportunity to take basic school curricula, including curriculum choices".

The majority supported this version on the ground of clarity. The representative of UNESCO also expressed approval, pointing out that educators were reluctant to use so categorical an expression as "identity of basic school curricula", since the trend in education was towards diversification and adaptation to needs.

The substitute proposal was adopted by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, at the 244th meeting of the Council's Social Committee (E/2486 H) on 14 July, and unanimously by the Council at its 736th plenary meeting on 23 July, as resolution 504 H (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Draws the attention of governments and of specialized agencies to the need for ensuring that pupils of both sexes have the same opportunity to take basic school curricula, including curriculum choices."

The Commission on the Status of Women further adopted a resolution requesting the Secretary-General, in collaboration with UNESCO, to provide the Commission at its next session with all available information on the number of scholarships and fellowships granted to men and women students respectively in primary, secondary, higher and technical education. It also requested the Secretary-General to continue to co-operate with the Director-General of UNESCO to advance opportunities for education of women, and to assure full consideration of the needs of and participation by women in all programmes relating to education on equal terms with men. It recommended a draft resolution (E/2401 I) for adoption by the Economic and Social Council (see below).

During the Council's discussion, the representative of UNESCO stated that the information in UNESCO's possession was inadequate as a basis for any serious study as requested by the Commission, and would involve lengthy and difficult research. UNESCO, he further pointed out, had no funds to devote to such a study before 1955. The United States representative thought that the cost would be out of proportion to the value of the results. Moreover, in the view of his Government, primary education ought to be compulsory and free and the question of scholarships should therefore not arise at that level, he stated.

The draft resolution proposed by the Commission was unanimously adopted by the Social Committee (E/2486 I), at its 244th meeting on 14 July, and by the Council at its 736th plenary meeting on 23 July, as resolution 504 I (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"1. Recommends to Member States that laws and regulations regarding the distribution of scholarships provide equal opportunities for girls and women, and that such scholarships be made available to them for education in any field and in preparation for all careers;

"2. Expresses the hope that, in countries where native and official languages exist, attention will be given in programmes of education to the importance of providing equal opportunities for women to acquire the language, in addition to their own, which will permit them access to the resources of knowledge in the general culture of the country."

6. Technical Assistance Programmes in Relation to the Status of Women

The Commission on the Status of Women had before it reports (E/CN.6/189 & Add.1) by the Secretary-General and other documents describing the nature and the extent of the technical assistance programmes administered by the United Nations and the various specialized agencies. It also had before it for information purposes: a report by the Secretary-General (E/2209) on United Nations Programmes of Technical Assistance; Evaluation of the Programme of Advisory Social Welfare Services 1947-1951 (E/CN.5/266); Programme of Fellowships and Scholarships for 1954; and Background Paper No. 74 (ST/DPI/SER.A/74) on United Nations Technical Assistance.

The Commission adopted a resolution (E/2401 J), asking the Council:

(1) to recommend to member Governments that they increase the participation of women in the formulation and carrying out of various technical assistance and other programmes;

(2) to recommend sympathetic consideration by the appropriate bodies of requests submitted by governments within the framework of those programmes for aid which would be useful in raising the status of women; and

(3) to authorize, subject to the approval of the General Assembly, the Secretary-General to render, at the request of Members, expert advice and other services in order to assist these States in improving the status of women, such services to include advice regarding the drafting of legislation and other matters which he deems appropriate.

During the discussion at the Council's sixteenth session, the majority supported the principles underlying the resolution. A number of representatives, however, among them those of Australia, Belgium, France, Sweden and the United Kingdom, thought it would be preferable to refer the question to the Council's Technical Assistance Committee. The representative of the United States pointed out that the draft resolution referred, in one paragraph, to existing technical assistance programmes and, in another, to a new type of programme, namely technical assistance to promote human rights. Therefore, at the Social Committee's 245th meeting on 15 July, he introduced an alternative draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.163) designed to simplify and rearrange the original text. Part A of the new text dealt with existing programmes and Part B with a new type of programme. While recognizing that separate funds might be required under Part B, he stated that in the initial stages they could be met out of existing resources.

The representatives of Australia and the United Kingdom thought it unrealistic to base a proposal on a remote possibility of obtaining funds through savings in other sections of the United Nations budget. The Australian representative therefore proposed (E/AC.7/L.164) that the authority of General Assembly resolution 418(V) on advisory social welfare services should be extended to cover the new expenses. However, he subsequently withdrew the amendment on the understanding that the draft resolution would not be regarded as committing the Council or Committee on any other eventual proposal concerning other forms of technical assistance in the field of human rights.

The representative of the United States accepted an oral United Kingdom amendment to address the recommendations concerning conferences, seminars and training courses to governments rather than to the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies.

The Social Committee, at its 248th meeting on 17 July, adopted Part A of the draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.163) by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention, and Part B by 13 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. It was adopted, as a whole (E/2486 J I & II), by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

The Council, at its 736th plenary meeting on 23 July, adopted the resolution, by the same votes, as resolution 504 J I & II (XVI). The representative of the United Kingdom stated that he had abstained, in particular, on the grounds that it was inappropriate for the Council to establish what might be regarded as a precedent when the whole question of technical assistance in the field of human rights had been referred to governments for their consideration. The French representative abstained since she did not disapprove of the principles but wished to leave the door open until the financial implications of Part II were better known.

Resolution 504 J I & II (XVI) read:

I

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Noting the constructive nature and extent of the technical assistance programmes administered by the United Nations and the various specialized agencies,

"1. Recommends to the organizations participating in the technical assistance and other programmes providing aid or assistance that they give sympathetic consideration to the requests which governments may submit for aid, within the framework of existing programmes, which would be useful in promoting the economic and social advance of women;

"2. Recommends to governments of Member States:

"(a) That, where women are not already participating in the formulation of requests for technical assistance, consideration be given to appointing qualified women to posts in which they may share in framing policy and planning specific technical assistance projects;

"(b) That they encourage increased participation of women in conferences, seminars and training courses organized under existing technical assistance programmes."

II

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Bearing in mind that, under Article 66 of the Charter of the United Nations, the Council "may, with the approval of the General Assembly, perform services at the request of Members of the United Nations and at the request of specialized agencies",

"Relieving that the fields in which the Secretary-General is at present authorized to render assistance for the purpose of improving the status of women may appropriately be broadened,

"Decides that, subject to the approval of the General Assembly, the Secretary-General shall be authorized to render, at the request of Member States, services which do not fall within the scope of existing technical assistance programmes, in order to assist these States in promoting and safeguarding the rights of women."

The General Assembly at its eighth session considered the question, at the 485th and 486th meetings of its Third Committee on 24 and 25 September, under the item "Technical assistance in promoting and safeguarding the rights of women". It had before it the relevant sections of the report of the Economic and Social Council (E/2430) and a note by the Secretary-General (A/2454) directing attention to Council resolution 504 J II (XVI). The discussion in the Committee was mainly directed to a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.339/Rev.1), submitted by Cuba, the Dominican Republic and Pakistan, which would note the Council's resolution and approve its decision to extend the Secretary-General's authority in the manner therein described.

All representatives agreed on the principles and the majority supported the draft resolution. Again, the main point of disagreement concerned the financial implications, the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands, the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom stressing the importance of fuller information regarding the extent of the commitment involved.

The representatives of Syria, the United Kingdom, Uruguay and Yugoslavia also questioned the absence of a more specific indication of the type of services to be rendered. The representative of the Dominican Republic thought that the exact nature of the services that would be rendered could be determined only after the receipt of requests from Member States. He and the representative of the United States suggested, as possible types of projects, advice in connexion with revision of laws and practices relating to property, inheritance and family rights of women and assistance in planning programmes for the progressive advancement of women's status in political as well as in economic and social fields. With respect to financial implications, the representative of the United States pointed out that the assistance provided for in the resolution could, for the year 1954 at least, be rendered by the Secretary-General without additional expenditure by utilizing existing staff, for whom requesting governments might bear local costs, and that a year's experience would provide a possible basis for future budgetary provisions if these became necessary.

The Secretary-General presented a statement (A/C.3/L.339/Rev.1/Add.1) of financial implications, indicating that assistance would be provided within available funds to the maximum extent possible through the use of staff members seconded from the existing establishment. It was foreseen that such requests would necessitate expenditures for travel and subsistence of such staff and for miscellaneous expenses. The local costs, it was assumed, would be borne by recipient governments, in accordance with normal technical assistance arrangements. Should this course of action prove inadequate, the Secretary-General would rely on the resolution on unforeseen and extraordinary expenses, whereby, with the concurrence of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, additional resources from the Working Capital Fund might be made available to meet urgent needs.

The Fifth Committee at its 392nd meeting on 19 October subsequently endorsed (A/2525) the decision of the Advisory Committee to concur in the Secretary General's proposal, inasmuch as the nature and volume of requests likely to arise were not known at that stage.

The draft resolution was adopted by a roll-call vote of 39 to none, with 14 abstentions, at the Third Committee's 486th meeting on 25 September (E/2494) and by the General Assembly, at its 453rd plenary meeting on 23 October, by a roll-call vote of 47 to none, with 13 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Syria, Thailand, Turkey, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Resolution 729(VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting Economic and Social Council resolution 504 J II (XVI) of 23 July 1953 concerning technical assistance in promoting and safeguarding the rights of women,

"Approves the decision of the Council authorizing the Secretary-General to render, at the request of Member States, services which do not fall within the scope of existing technical assistance programmes, in order to assist these States in promoting and safeguarding the rights of women."

7. Economic Opportunities for Women

The Commission on the Status of Women, at its seventh session, had before it a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/213) concerning part-time work for women and a preliminary report prepared by the International Labour Office (E/CN.6/222) on part-time employment. After noting these reports, the Commission requested (E/2401) the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the International Labour Office, to continue study of the question with a view to preparing such further reports as might be needed to serve as a basis for full discussion of the question at the Commission's eighth session. It invited them to give special attention to the work of women in cottage industries and handicrafts and in seasonal agricultural work in the economically underdeveloped countries of the world. The Commission also expressed the wish that the Secretary-General prepare a bibliography of books and pamphlets on this subject.

8. Participation of Women in the Work of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies

The Commission had before it a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/216 & Add.1) containing information on the nature and proportion of positions occupied by women in the secretariats of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and on the number and proportion of women who had served in delegations since the San Francisco Conference. The Commission, taking note of the report of the Secretary-General, deplored the exceedingly small number of women occupying senior and policy-making posts in the secretariats of the United Nations and the specialized agencies and the fact that no upward trend was discernible in the reports of past years. It urged the Secretary-General and the chief administrative officers of the specialized agencies, in making appointments to senior and policy-making positions in the secretariats, to give equal consideration to qualified women, in conformity with Article 8 of the Charter. It also urged that all discrimination against women be eliminated from the conditions of employment in the secretariats.

The Commission further invited the Secretary-General to continue to make such annual reports, to include in those reports data on the number and proportion of applications presented by women and accepted, and to continue to supplement the report by information on the number and proportion of women who had served during the year as delegates and alternates in sessions of the principal organs of the United Nations and in conferences of the specialized agencies. It suggested that, in addition, the report should include whatever information was available on the number and proportion of women in fellowship and internship programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and of those serving as experts on technical assistance projects.

The Commission also recommended to non-governmental organizations that they emphasize the importance of expanding opportunities for women at the national level as a means of encouraging the appointment of more women to policy-making posts in the United Nations and specialized agencies.

9. Other Work

The Commission at its seventh session also took note of two lists of communications, a non-confidential list (E/CN.6/CR.6) and a confidential list (SW/Communications List No. 3), submitted by the Secretary-General, together with a reply (SW/Communication No.1) from the Government of a Member State concerning a communication sent to it.

Concerning its programme of future work, it established a programme of priorities, the main headings of which were: political rights and public law; nationality; economic rights and equal pay; private law; educational opportunities; and activities of other United Nations organs affecting the status of women.

The Commission also took note of the report of the Inter-American Commission of Women (E/CN.6/224) on its activities during the year. It adopted a resolution concerning the attendance at its session of a representative of the Women's International Democratic Federation, a non-governmental organization in consultative status category B, expressing regret that the representative had not been granted an entry visa which would have enabled her to come to United Nations Headquarters and to take part in the work of the Commission, calling the attention of the Council to that abnormal situation and requesting it to examine this question at its fifteenth session in order to take appropriate measures.¹²⁵

N. REFUGEES

1. Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees

In accordance with the Statute of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees,¹²⁶ the General Assembly, at its eighth session, was to review the arrangements for the Office with a view to determining whether it should be continued beyond 31 December 1953. The High Commissioner accordingly submitted, through the Economic and Social Council at its sixteenth session, a report covering the period from June 1952 to May 1953,¹²⁷ giving as full an account as possible of the work undertaken by the Office during that time. The report contained a section on the historical background, and dealt with general activities and work of protection, the work of the branch offices and the situation of refugees in various countries, refugees requiring institutional care, the Refugee Emergency Fund, Ford Foundation grants for refugees, and the Advisory Committee on Refugees.

In his conclusions, the High Commissioner stated that, despite the fact that a number of individual countries had made great efforts to provide some permanent solution for the problem of refugees within the mandate of the Office, there remained a continuing need for some central international organization concerned with the problems of refugees. To ensure that the best possible use is made of the various international funds made available to help refugees, this central organization, he considered, must have some say in the allocation of the funds. Closer co-ordination and, therefore, more efficient use of existing machinery rather than the establishment of new machinery was needed, he maintained. Continued effort, he stated, must be made not only in the direction of resettlement but also in that of repatriation and integration. This did not imply that there was a need for an international organization with operational functions to deal with the current refugee problem; the responsibilities of the United Nations in providing international protection and seeking permanent solutions should, in his opinion, mainly be the promotion and co-ordination of operations on behalf of refugees. However, he considered, it was essential to prolong the arrangements for the Office for a period long enough to make it possible for it to devote its efforts entirely to the needs of refugees and not, after a very short period, to the administrative problems of liquidation. He therefore recommended that, should the Assembly continue the Office, it should do so for a period of not less than five years and that any subsequent review should take place at least one year before the termination date. In addition, he stressed in the report that it was urgent for the General Assembly to give renewed attention to the continuing problem of emergency aid to the most needy groups within the mandate of his office.

2. Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Sixteenth Session

The Economic and Social Council had the High Commissioner's report before it at its 713th to 715th plenary meetings on 6 and 7 July 1953. The majority congratulated the High Commissioner on the progress made by his Office, despite the limited resources at his disposal, and agreed that it was necessary for the work of the Office to be continued. It was also generally agreed that any question of extending the scope of the mandate should be raised in the Assembly. In this connexion, the representative of France, pending the Assembly's decision on the continuation of the Office, at the 715th plenary meeting withdrew a draft resolution (E/L.523) which would propose to increase the powers and responsibilities of the Advisory Committee.

With regard to continuing the Office, there was some difference of opinion as to whether a period should be defined at all, whether the Assembly should define it, or whether three years was preferable to five, but it was finally agreed that the Council should recommend that the Assembly approve the continuation of the Office for a further five years.

By 16 votes to 2, the Council, at its 714th plenary meeting on 7 July, adopted a draft resolution (E/L.521/Rev.1) submitted by Australia, Sweden and the United Kingdom.

By this resolution (500(XVI)) the Council, considering the valuable work performed by the Office of the High Commissioner both in providing international protection for refugees and promoting permanent solutions for their problems, expressed its appreciation of the report, recommended that the Office should be continued for a further period of five years, and drew the attention of the General Assembly to the importance of making provision for the arrangements of the Office to be reviewed at least one year before the expiry of the period which it would determine.

3. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

The General Assembly considered the work of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees at the 497th to 502nd meetings of its Third Committee, on 13 to 16, 19 and 20 October, and at its 453rd and 454th plenary meetings on 23 October 1953. In addition to the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (A/2394) (see above), it had before it the relevant sections of the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430), a note by the Secretary-General (A/2449) on the question of the continuation of the Office of the High Commissioner, and a memorandum by the Secretary-General (A/2457) containing his comments on the work of the United Nations on behalf of refugees.

At the Committee's 497th meeting on 13 October, the High Commissioner, Dr. G. J. van Heuven Goedhart, outlined the background and origins of the Office, explaining its functions in connexion both with international protection of refugees and the promotion of permanent solutions for their problems. He stressed, among other things, the precarious situation of refugees who were dependent on the Refugee Emergency Fund, particularly those of European origin in China; the difficult cases requiring special care; and the situation of a considerable number of refugees still living in camps in Europe. He also mentioned the valuable work which the interested organizations had enabled his Office to promote in the field of social and economic assimilation of refugees.

At the end of his statement, the High Commissioner submitted certain conclusions (A/C.3/- L.356) for the consideration of the Committee. In those conclusions, he pointed out that a solution of the refugee problem required the co-operation, in a co-ordinated manner, between the countries of first and second asylum and those of resettlement. There was need, he emphasized, for a better and more co-ordinated use of existing machinery rather than new machinery. Stressing the co-ordinating role of his Office, he pointed out that if the Office were consulted prior to the launching of any programme of international action on behalf of refugees, there would be a considerable increase in the efficiency of the work done. It would also be a step forward if governments would see their way to give attention at a higher level to refugee problems. He also emphasized that the complexity of the current refugee problem made it necessary for a certain amount of long-term planning to be undertaken and for this reason considered five years the minimum period for the prolongation of the Office. Finally, he appealed for further contributions to the Refugee Emergency Fund, pointing out that for many thousands of refugees within the mandate of his Office the living conditions were nearly desperate.

The discussion in the Committee was mainly directed to the question of the continuation of the Office and the need for greater co-ordination of international action on behalf of refugees. The majority expressed their appreciation of the work of the Office of the High Commissioner and emphasized the necessity of continued United Nations action on behalf of refugees through the Office. The majority also emphasized the necessity of working for permanent solutions of the refugee problem through integration and resettlement, and the importance of greater co-ordination of programmes. However, a number of representatives, among them those of Iraq, Saudi Arabia and Yugoslavia, considered that more attention should be paid to voluntary repatriation.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR considered that the work of the Office should be discontinued, and expressed strong criticism of international action undertaken on behalf of refugees since the end of the war through the International Refugee Organization and the Office of the High Commissioner. They maintained that the Office tended to perpetuate the refugee problem, which should be solved through the repatriation of the refugees in accordance with General Assembly resolution 8(I) of 12 February 1946, the provisions of which, they stated, had not been observed.

The High Commissioner, in answer, stated that he firmly believed that repatriation was the ideal solution for the refugee problem. However, it should be pointed out that repatriation should be voluntary, as was clear from the terms of the Statute of his Office. No person could be sent back to his country of origin against his will and, in fact, the refugees who asked for repatriation were few. Moreover, the High Commissioner's task was not to ensure repatriation or resettlement of refugees. His responsibility was only to facilitate solutions of that kind, not to carry them out. When a refugee expressed a desire to return to his country the High Commissioner could only put him in touch with the nearest interested consulate; such a case had occurred, for example, in connexion with 75 Yugoslav citizens in Greece and twelve European refugees from Shanghai. He was acting, he stated, within the means at his disposal; he had no funds to finance repatriation. Moreover, the Statute and the various resolutions of the General Assembly showed that a refugee who asked to return to his country ceased automatically to be a refugee within the meaning of their provisions and no longer came under the jurisdiction of the High Commissioner. Personally, he was entirely in favour of voluntary repatriation as a solution, yet it was not for him to encourage refugees to take that step but merely to aid those who showed a desire to return to their countries, so far as his means and his terms of reference allowed.

The Committee had before it two draft resolutions, one on the continuation of the Office of the High Commissioner, and a second on the work of the Office. The former, submitted by Belgium, Denmark, the Netherlands, Sweden, the United Kingdom and Uruguay (A/C.3/L.355/Rev.1) would reaffirm the Statute of the Office and recommend that it should be continued for a period of five years from 1 January 1954, with a review to take place not later than at the twelfth session of the General Assembly. The representative of the United States submitted an amendment (A/C.3/L.360) to this, which would omit any reference to the reaffirmation of the Statute but recommend that the Office be continued for five years on the basis of the Statute.

The second draft resolution, submitted by Belgium, Brazil, Colombia, Denmark, the Netherlands, Norway and the United Kingdom (A/C.3/L.357), and concerning the work of the Office of the High Commissioner, would invite the High Commissioner to concern himself in particular with refugees requiring emergency aid, those still living in camps and those requiring special care, and would appeal to governments to intensify their efforts to promote solutions for the problems of refugees in co-operation with the High Commissioner. It would congratulate the High Commissioner on the relations established with interested organizations and express the hope that appropriate consultations would take place in the drawing up of all programmes of international action designed to improve the situation of refugees who were the concern of the High Commissioner.

Amendments to this draft resolution were proposed by Syria (A/C.3/L.358 & 361) and by Yugoslavia (A/C.3/L.359). The first Syrian amendment (A/C.3/L.358) would request the High Commissioner in the exercise of his functions to take account of the provisions of General Assembly resolution 538 B (VI) of 2 February 1952 concerning repatriation and the provisions of the Statute, emphasizing the humanitarian character of the work of the Office and the importance of concentrating attention on the more destitute categories of refugees. The Yugoslav amendment (A/C.3/L.359) would also stress the question of repatriation and would invite the High Commissioner to pay particular attention and take care of refugees willing to be repatriated. It would further invite him to report to the Assembly's ninth session on his consultations with appropriate international organizations on all programmes of international action designed to improve the situation of refugees within his mandate.

The second Syrian proposal (A/C.3/L.361) would delete the paragraph in the preamble of the draft resolution expressing appreciation for the work accomplished and, in the operative part, the congratulations offered the High Commissioner for the relations he had established with interested organizations.

At the suggestion of the Chairman, the authors of the amendments and the two draft resolutions met informally and agreed on two compromise texts (A/C.3/L.355/Rev.2 & A/C.3/L.357/-Rev.1).

They were adopted by the Third Committee (A/2523 & Corr.1 (I & II)), at its 502nd meeting on 20 October, by 43 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions, and by a roll-call vote of 45 to 5, with 3 abstentions, respectively. The General Assembly, at its 453rd plenary meeting on 23 October, adopted the draft resolutions by 47 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions, and by 48 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions, respectively, as resolutions 727 and 728(VIII).

The same day, at its 454th meeting, on the nomination of the Secretary-General (A/2527) in accordance with Chapter III, paragraph 13 of the Statute of the High Commissioner's Office, the President of the Assembly declared Dr. G. J. van Heuven Goedhart elected as United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for a period of five years, beginning 1 January 1954. The representative of the USSR stated that, for reasons already explained, he wished to be considered as voting against the election of the High Commissioner. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, the Ukrainian SSR, Czechoslovakia and Poland associated themselves with the USSR's objections.

Resolution 727(VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolutions 319(IV) of 3 December 1949 and 428(V) of 14 December 1950, by which the Assembly decided to establish the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and adopted the Statute governing the operation of that Office,

"Considering the continuing need for international action on behalf of refugees,

"Considering the valuable work which has been performed by the Office of the High Commissioner both in providing international protection for refugees and in promoting permanent solutions for their problems,

"1. Decides to continue the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for a period of five years from 1 January 1954 on the basis of the Statute of the Office contained in the annex to General Assembly resolution 428(V);

"2. Decides to review, not later than at the twelfth regular session of the Assembly, the arrangements for the Office of the High Commissioner with a view to determining whether the Office should be continued beyond 31 December 1958;

"3. Decides that the High Commissioner shall be elected for a period of five years from 1 January 1954, and that the High Commissioner shall appoint a Deputy High Commissioner of a nationality other than his own."

Resolution 728(VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the problems of refugees who are the concern of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in the light of his report to the General Assembly at its eighth session and of the Secretary-General's memorandum,

"Having noted with appreciation the work being done on behalf of these refugees,

"Having noted with concern the precarious situation of certain groups of refugees within the High Commissioner's mandate, in particular those in need of emergency aid, the considerable number still living in camps, and those requiring special care for whom no satisfactory arrangements have yet been made,

"1. Invites the High Commissioner to concern himself in particular with these groups of refugees in carrying out his functions as defined in the Statute of his Office and to pay special attention to them in his report to the General Assembly at its ninth session;

"2. Appeals to the governments of States Members and non-members of the United Nations to intensify their efforts to promote, in co-operation with the High Commissioner, solutions for the problems of refugees, through repatriation, resettlement and integration in accordance with General Assembly resolution 538 B (VI) of 2 February 1952;

"3. Takes note of the relations which the High Commissioner has established with interested organizations, expresses the hope that appropriate consultations will take place in the drawing up of all programmes of international action designed to improve the situation of refugees within his mandate and invites the High Commissioner to give an account of such consultations in his report."

4. Work of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees

The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, established by the General Assembly as of 1 January 1951, continued to function during 1953.¹²⁸

On 2 February 1952, the General Assembly (resolution 538 B (VI))¹²⁹ had authorized the High Commissioner to appeal for funds to provide emergency aid to the most needy groups of refugees within his mandate. An appeal for funds with which to finance a programme of emergency relief was immediately launched under the name "United Nations Refugee Emergency Fund" (UNREF). During the subsequent year, it was possible, through voluntary contributions from governments and private persons, to provide food and medical attention for the most needy groups of refugees within the High Commissioner's mandate.

The continued provision throughout the world of international protection to refugees within the mandate was the major task of the Office during the year.

The branch offices¹³⁰ were particularly concerned with helping refugees represent their needs to the competent national and local authorities. They assisted refugees to establish their refugee status and to obtain the necessary legal documents. Representations were also made to the competent authorities concerning the right to work, social security benefits and public relief.

An important aspect of international protection for refugees is the promotion of the ratification of relevant international conventions. By the end of 1953 five countries—Belgium, Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, Luxembourg and Norway—had ratified the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees. It was to come into force 90 days after the deposit of the sixth instrument of ratification or accession.¹³¹

Special attention was given during the year to the difficult problem of finding asylum for the sick and elderly persons, currently numbering 800, among the group of 15,000 refugees of European origin in China. Barred by reasons of health from the regular programmes of immigration, these persons constituted the residual problem of several years of practical work on behalf of refugees in this region by previous organizations.

A new approach was made to governments, with the result that by the end of 1953, places in homes and sanatoria had been found for more than 300, and the first large group, made up of 51 persons, had been moved from Shanghai to Hong Kong to await transport to Sweden, Denmark and Belgium.

In Austria, a survey of the situation of sick and elderly refugees among the approximately 230,000 refugees within the High Commissioner's mandate was begun. The condition of refugees who have already been placed in institutions and the problems of those who require hospital treatment or special care are to form part of the survey.

In September 1952, the Ford Foundation made available a grant of $2,900,000 with which the High Commissioner, as Administrator of the grant, was able to launch a number of pilot projects designed to promote the economic integration of refugees in Austria, France, Germany, Trieste and Greece and opportunities for resettlement in Latin America, Canada and Australia. These projects were implemented by voluntary agencies. This work continued throughout 1953 and, by September, almost all the Ford Grant had been allocated; matching contributions to the value of $7,943,774 had extended the scale of the projects, with the result that nearly 300,000 refugees would benefit.

Some $400,000 of the $2,900,000 grant were allocated by the High Commissioner for practical assistance to Berlin refugees whose arrival in large numbers was affecting the position of the foreign refugees already in Germany. The High Commissioner also appealed to governments in January 1953 to support his action and, by 15 September, goods to the value of $2,323,843 had been received and the United States Government had donated $15,000,000 for housing settlements for East German refugees.

The High Commissioner's Advisory Committee met between 27 April and 2 May, when arrangements for the High Commissioner's Office were reviewed and discussion centred on international protection and the position of the refugees of European origin in China and Hong Kong.

O. SOCIAL QUESTIONS

The Economic and Social Council at its sixteenth session reviewed the report of the ninth session of the Social Commission, held from 4 to 20 May 1953 (E/2437), which, inter alia, dealt with two major subjects, the programme of concerted practical action in the social field and the future of UNICEF.¹³³ The Council also considered those sections of the Commission's report dealing with the progress made on a number of selected items of the Commission's work programme, as well as its general work programme and priorities for 1954-1955, as indicated below.

World Social Situation (E/CN.5/267/Rev.1)¹³⁷ the Secretary-General, in consultation with the executive heads of the specialized agencies concerned, submitted to the Social Commission at its ninth session a report on a "Programme of Concerted Practical Action in the Social Field of the United Nations and Specialized Agencies" (E/CN.5/291 & Addenda). The report represented the common efforts of the United Nations (including UNICEF, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) and the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA)), the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), and the World Health Organization (WHO), and took into account the observations submitted by various governments.¹³⁸ The essential findings of the report expressed the views of the executive heads of the international agencies concerned, but not of their policy-making bodies.

The report reviewed the development of policy in international social programmes, analysed the current programmes and suggested various developments and re-orientations in the following fields: background research basic to social policy; health and narcotic drugs; housing and town and country planning; nutrition and home economics; education; labour; community organization and development (with special reference to rural areas programmes); social security, social assistance and related measures concerned with income; social protection and rehabilitation; migration and refugees; and emergency relief. Further, it analysed the techniques used for the implementation of international social programmes: collection and dissemination of information, legal and semi-legal instruments in the social field and direct assistance to governments.

In the conclusions of the report, the Secretary-General and the Directors-General of the four specialized agencies concerned stated that, in their view, there did not appear to be any significant gaps in the substance of international programmes in the social field. They stated that the most important problems which arose in increasing the effectiveness of the social programme were: (1) improvement of techniques; (2) achieving full governmental and popular co-operation in the implementation of essential long-term programmes; and (3) obtaining new resources for social development. The international organizations, it was stated, might make a substantial contribution to the improvement of techniques within the limitations of existing constitutional arrangements but the solutions to problems of new resources and governmental and popular co-operation lay almost wholly within the province of Member Governments.

The Social Commission, in developing its recommendations at its ninth session, reviewed its own work programme and also considered the contributions which the specialized agencies and other organizations had made, and could make, towards improving social conditions.

The Commission, in its report (E/2437), set forth for the Council's approval certain general principles to be applied in matters of assistance to governments, the essential elements of a programme of practical action in the social field and the methods and techniques best adapted to carrying out activities in the social field.

The importance of the role of non-governmental organizations in promoting and developing programmes of social action was emphasized by various members of the Commission and also confirmed by the representatives of non-governmental organizations who participated either in the Commission's or the Council's consideration of this item.¹³⁹

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS SIXTEENTH SESSION

The question of concerted practical action in the social field was considered by the Council at its sixteenth session, during its 734th to 736th, 738th, 739th and 744th plenary meetings, held on 21, 23, 28 and 31 July 1953. Most representatives, including those of Argentina, Belgium, ¹³⁷ U.N.P., Sales No.: 1952.IV.11.

¹³⁸ The following Governments had, up to 15 February 1953, submitted observations: Canada, Ceylon, Egypt, France, Italy, the Philippines, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the USSR and the United States. In addition, the following Governments stated that they had no specific suggestions to offer: Austria, Denmark, Egypt, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, India, New Zealand, Panama, Switzerland and Thailand. Subsequently (by 23 April 1953) the following Governments submitted observations: Greece, the Netherlands, the Union of South Africa and Yugoslavia.

¹³⁹ Catholic International Union for Social Service, International Association of Penal Law, International Bureau for the Unification of Penal Law, International Catholic Migration Committee, International Committee of Schools of Social Work, International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, International Conference of Catholic Charities, International Conference of Social Work, International Federation of University Women, International Social Service, International Society for the Welfare of Cripples, International Union for Child Welfare, World Alliance of Young Men's Christian Associations, World Federation of Trade Unions.

France, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay, expressed general satisfaction with the report on this question.

During the discussion, several representatives, including those of Argentina, Belgium and Uruguay, spoke of the inter-relationships between economic and social problems. They were gratified that the Council was devoting more time to the study of social problems.

Several representatives, in particular those of Argentina, Belgium, India and the United States, agreed that in the programmes of international assistance to governments in the social field, emphasis should be placed on under-developed countries. Nevertheless, it was pointed out that all countries had urgent social problems.

There was also agreement that international action should be closely integrated with national programmes. The representative of Belgium, in particular, stated that governments were responsible for determining their own social policies; the United Nations could do no more than encourage, assist and inform the national authorities, whom they could not in any circumstances replace.

Many representatives held the view, emphasized by the Social Commission, that governmental activities should be based on the co-operation of the people themselves and on the initiative of local communities. The representatives of Belgium, the Philippines, the United States and Yugoslavia, among others, stressed the importance of developing programmes of community organization and development, and particularly of establishing social welfare centres, as well as of building up training facilities.

Certain representatives, in particular those of Argentina and Sweden, underlined the importance of preliminary studies.

The representative of the Philippines said that he was in favour of a bold and far-reaching programme measuring up to the world's needs in the field of social development. More than half the population of the world, he declared, was living at a level that failed to give it adequate nutrition, housing, education, conditions of work and reasonable freedom from preventable disease. The social situation in Asia and in other under-developed areas, he said, could not be dealt with decisively in the interests of world peace by half measures. The challenge to the United Nations was total: social and economic as well as political. Its response to that challenge should also be total.

The view was expressed by the representatives of Poland and the USSR that the Secretary-General's report, having proved the urgency of social problems, did not contain practical suggestions and that the Social Commission's resolution had also failed to incorporate proposals designed to improve the living standards of the populations throughout the world. The Council, they argued, must repair that omission. Many countries, they declared, had no social security systems at all, while in others the system was defective and was the victim of racial discrimination. In the under-developed countries, they stated, there was a very close link between economic development and social security; improvements in the social security systems could give an added impetus to economic development. They spoke in support of a memorandum (E/2422) by the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) on social security (see below).

The Council had before it (1) a Polish draft resolution (E/L.544 & Corr.2) and (2) a draft resolution proposed by the Social Commission for adoption by the Council (E/2437 B), with amendments to it.

The preamble to the Polish draft would have the Council draw attention to the memorandum by WFTU (E/2422) and the enclosed programme of social security prepared by the International Conference for the Defence, Improvement and Extension of Social Insurance and Social Security, held in Vienna in 1953 (E/C.2/349 & E/C.2/350). In its operative part, the draft resolution would have the Council:

- (1) state that the above-mentioned Conference's prepared programme of social insurance and social security corresponded with the principles of the United Nations;
- (2) express gratitude to the Conference for the preparation of constructive proposals; and
- (3) include in its plan of work for 1953-54 as a problem of priority importance, the programme prepared by the Conference for further substantive study and review at one of the sessions of the Council in 1954.

Certain representatives, in particular those of Australia, Belgium and the United States, considered that the Polish proposal was intended to by-pass, or even to undermine, the position of ILO, which had the necessary authority to deal with questions relating to social security. Furthermore, the Polish proposal sought to replace a number of important international instruments, treaties and intergovernmental declarations by a statement elaborated by a single non-governmental organization, which, they argued, represented only one political point of view.

In support of the Polish proposal, the representatives of Poland and the USSR argued that the programme which was being proposed for adoption by the Council had been developed by the representatives of 59 countries of various political views. Moreover, the purpose of the Polish draft was not to usurp the function of ILO but merely to incorporate in the Council's plan of work for 1953-54 the study of a programme of social security elaborated by a large and representative international conference, all of whose participants had had direct experience of the problems involved.

The representatives of Egypt and India considered that proposals by a recognized non-governmental organization ought to be given due consideration. They orally proposed that the preamble of the Polish proposal be voted upon paragraph by paragraph.

The first part of the preamble to the Polish draft, referring to the WFTU memorandum, was rejected by 11 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions, and the second part, referring to the enclosed programme prepared by the International Conference for the Defence, Improvement and Extension of Social Insurance and Social Security, was rejected, by 12 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions. The first operative paragraph was rejected by 12 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions, the second by 13 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions, and the third by 13 votes to 4, with 1 abstention.

The resolution submitted by the Social Commission (E/2437), inter alia, laid down a number of general principles which the Secretary-General was invited to apply in matters of assistance to governments. An annex to the resolution defined the essential elements of a programme of practical action in the social field.

A number of representatives, in particular those of Argentina, the Philippines, the United States, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, expressed the opinion that this draft resolution, while serving as a sound basis for the Council's consideration, failed to provide specific recommendations for implementation of the programme. Accordingly, they jointly submitted an amendment (E/L.541 & Rev.1 & 2) which would, inter alia, incorporate the annex of the resolution proposed by the Social Commission into the substantive part of the resolution, and proposed certain changes aimed at placing more emphasis on the importance of community organization and development in the programme of international organizations.

The joint amendment called for the following specific action by the Secretary-General:

(1) to convene one or more small groups of senior policy-making representatives of the governments of countries having similar social and economic problems with representatives of the secretariats of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies concerned to plan concrete programmes for expanding community projects and training facilities and for strengthening national and local organizations administering social programmes; and

(2) to submit to the Council a report containing recommendations on further practical measures.

The Secretary-General estimated that, as far as the United Nations was concerned, an expenditure of $2,000 to $3,000 would be required to convene such groups.

Sub-amendments to the joint five-Power amendment (E/L.541/Rev.2) were submitted: (1) jointly by France, Sweden and the United Kingdom (E/L.545, later revised as E/L.546); (2) by Australia (E/L.549, later revised as E/L.549/Rev.1); (3) by Poland (E/L.550); (4) by Belgium (E/L.552); and (5) by Turkey (E/L.558).¹⁴⁰

The joint three-Power sub-amendment (E/L.546) proposed, inter alia, to replace the provisions concerning the general principles to be applied in matters of assistance to governments by a provision inviting the attention of the General Assembly to previous Council resolutions on the subject (324(XI) & 451 A (XIV)) stating the opinion that these constituted sufficient guidance as to criteria and priorities.

This sub-amendment was rejected by the Council by 10 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions.

The Australian sub-amendment (E/L.549/Rev.1) would add assistance to "groups in need of special care", to the list of projects being undertaken in the social field.

This was adopted by 13 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

The first paragraph of the Polish sub-amendment (E/L.550) would have the Council state that international action in the social field should "give special consideration to the needs of" under-developed areas rather than "concentrate on" such areas.

The representative of Poland explained that his sub-amendment sought to provide that, while special consideration was given to the needs of the under-developed areas, the United Nations programme would also embrace other areas since deficiencies in the social field existed also in highly industrialized and developed countries.

This paragraph was adopted unanimously.

The second paragraph of the sub-amendment would have the Council state that international as well as national measures in the social field should be introduced and applied "without any difference as to race, sex, language or religion".

This paragraph was rejected by 6 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions.

¹⁴⁰ For the convenience of the members of the Council, the Secretariat prepared a working paper (E/L.559) for the Council's 744th meeting on 31 July, indicating the paragraphs of the draft resolution on the programme of concerted practical action in the social field which had been accepted and those yet to be voted upon.

The third paragraph of the sub-amendment, inter alia, would:

(1) have the Council refer to projects for improving "social insurance" as well as "social security" measures; and

(2) delete a reference to the development of "constructive employer-employee relationships" as a reason for assuring respect for trade union freedom.

The representative of Poland explained that he did not think it was the purpose of the Council to enter into the problem of contractual relationships between employers and employees.

The first part of this paragraph was adopted by 10 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, and the second part rejected by 6 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions.

The fourth paragraph of the Polish sub-amendment would add the following methods and techniques for assisting governments in carrying out activities in the social field:

(1) the strengthening of governmental administration of programmes in the social field;

(2) the continuing study of the relationship of measures to increase international trade; and

(3) surveys essential to the implementation of practical action.

The representative of Poland explained that these additions were taken verbatim from section C of the annex to the draft resolution submitted by the Social Commission.

The first part of this paragraph was rejected by 5 votes to 3, with 10 abstentions; and the last two parts, each, by 6 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions.

The Belgian sub-amendment (E/L.552) would add a provision for the encouragement of "scientific training and research" in the programme of practical action in the social field.

This sub-amendment was adopted by 9 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions.

The Turkish sub-amendment (E/L.558) would state that the programme should be established "without disturbing the balance between economic and social programmes".

The Turkish representative, however, accepted an oral United States proposal to reword the sub-amendment to state "without prejudice to the economic priority programmes".

The sub-amendment, as thus amended, was adopted by 9 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions.

The joint five-Power amendment and the sub-amendments to it were voted upon by the Council at its 738th, 739th and 744th plenary meetings, on 28 and 31 July. AH paragraphs were adopted by votes, ranging from unanimity to 15 to 2, with 1 abstention.

The draft resolution, as a whole and as amended, was adopted by the Council at its 744th meeting on 31 July by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 496(XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Taking into account the recommendations of its Social Commission on the programme of concerted action in the social field,

"Having considered the report by the Secretary-General on a programme of concerted practical action in the social field of the United Nations and the specialized agencies prepared in the light of criteria for, and priorities in the social field established by Council resolutions 324(XI) and 451 A (XIV), the findings of the Preliminary Report on the World Social Situation, the views of governments and policies established by the United Nations and the specialized agencies,

"1. Informs the General Assembly that, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 535(VI), it has examined the social activities undertaken by the United Nations and the specialized agencies;

"2. Calls attention to the fact that progress has already been made through national, bilateral and international action in dealing with the age-old problems of ignorance, poverty and disease, but that in spite of all efforts, the need as pictured in the report on the world social situation is so great that resources available are still inadequate;

"3. Notes with satisfaction that the Secretary-General's report contains suggestions directed to increasing the practical effectiveness of the social programme which the Council commends to the careful consideration of the organizations concerned;

"4. Agrees with the views expressed by the Secretary-General and the Directors-General of the specialized agencies concerned that, in the programme of activities now being undertaken as part of a broader plan for the promotion of social progress and the raising of standards of living among the people, there is need for reorientation, further concentration of effort, wider geographical coverage, improvement of methods and techniques, additional resources and for achieving full governmental and popular co-operation;

"5. Considers that special attention should be devoted to the exploration for broader sources indispensable for international financing of social and economic development;

"6. Considers that international action in the social field should give special consideration to the needs of under-developed areas;

"7. Requests the Secretary-General and invites the specialized agencies to apply in matters of assistance to governments the following general principles:

"(a) The inter-related character of economic and social factors and the benefits to social progress resulting from a balanced expansion of world economy require that economic development and social development go hand-in-hand with a view to improving standards of living; projects financed by the United Nations and the specialized agencies should be selected bearing in mind this inter-relationship;

"(b) Such projects should be concerted with integrated plans for economic and social development prepared by each of the beneficiary governments;

"(c) Such projects should yield early and permanent results and reach a maximum number of people;

"(d) Such projects should be adapted to the geographic, economic, social and demographic conditions of the country concerned, and studies of these conditions essential to effective practical projects should be undertaken but should not delay action to meet urgent needs;

"(e) The participation of appropriate non-governmental organizations in the implementation of international programmes in the social field should be encouraged and their experience, competence and facilities utilized to the fullest extent;

"8. Considers that a concerted programme of practical action in the social field should, within the framework of criteria and priorities established by Council resolutions 324(XI) and 451 A (XIV) and without prejudice to the priorities established in the economic field, concentrate on projects which:

"(a) Improve health and nutrition by increasing food supply and improving food distribution and dietary practices;

"(b) Strengthen national health services with greater accessibility of medical services, improve maternal and child health and prevent and control major communicable diseases;

"(c) Strengthen national family and child welfare services;

"(d) Introduce, extend and improve social security and social insurance measures such as assistance in old age, unemployment and disability;

"(e) Develop and extend services for the welfare of groups in need of special care;

"(f) Emphasize fundamental education, promote greater accessibility of education for the broad masses of the population, introduce or develop in the Member States of the United Nations free compulsory primary education for all and encourage scientific training and research;

"(g) Improve housing and community facilities, especially for persons in low-income groups;

"(h) Increase employment opportunities, improve labour standards, strengthen training and manpower services, assure respect for trade-union freedom so as to develop constructive employer-employee relationships and encourage any measures which will improve the social and economic status of workers;

"9. Considers it advisable, as an immediate objective, to pay particular attention to the use of the following practical methods and techniques for assisting governments in carrying out the activities set forth in paragraph 8:

"(a) The promotion and implementation of community development projects, particularly through the establishment of demonstration centres;

"(b) The rapid development of programmes and facilities for training both professional and technical personnel and auxiliary and community workers;

"(c) The development and strengthening of national and local organizations necessary for administering social programmes;

"10. Authorizes the Secretary-General to take early action, on an experimental basis and at the request of the governments concerned, to convene one or more small groups of senior policy-making representatives of governments having similar social and economic problems and of representatives of the Secretariats of the United Nations and the specialized agencies concerned, to plan concrete programmes for expansion of community development projects, including training facilities and the strengthening of organizations for administering social programmes related to community development in their respective countries;

"11. Requests the Technical Assistance Board to give sympathetic consideration, as resources permit, to such requests as the governments concerned may make regarding any particular aspects of these programmes;

"12. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Directors-General of the specialized agencies, to submit to an early session of the Council a report containing recommendations on further practical measures which might be taken to strengthen and make more effective methods and techniques of the type recommended in paragraph 9, taking into account the results of consultations provided for in paragraph 10."

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The question of concerted practical action in the social field was referred by the General Assembly at its eighth session to the Third Committee, which considered it at its 492nd to 496th meetings, on 6 to 9 and 12 October 1953. The Committee had before it chapter IV, section I of the report of the Economic and Social Council, which dealt with the Council's discussion of the matter, and a note by the Secretary-General (A/2474) drawing attention to Council resolution 496(XVI) of 31 July 1953.

The representatives of Argentina, Cuba, France, India, Iraq, Israel, the Netherlands, the Philippines and Yugoslavia, among others, emphasized the urgent necessity of promoting social as well as economic progress as a means towards the elimination of the evils reflected in the Preliminary Report on the World Social Situation.¹⁴¹ (This Report showed that more than half of the people in the world were still without means of satisfying their most elementary needs in health, nutrition, housing, education and conditions of work.) It was stated that the United Nations was responsible under the Charter for carrying out a social policy to achieve better living conditions. The realistic denunciation in the Report of the ignorance, poverty and disease from which mankind was suffering, said the representative of Cuba, removed any doubt of the urgent necessity for the United Nations to give all its support to social progress.

The representatives of Argentina, Ecuador, France, Guatemala, Liberia, the Philippines and Syria, in particular, drew attention to the inadequacy of available national and international resources for the implementation of the vast programmes essential to the solution of worldwide social problems.

Most representatives, nevertheless, considered that concerted practical action in the social field could be taken by the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

Certain representatives, including those of China, the Dominican Republic, Israel, Lebanon, the Philippines and Turkey, bearing in mind the current limitations of resources, considered the existing international social programmes as developing rather than final. The programme was only a beginning and might be improved, but the desired progress could not be anticipated overnight. The problems were not new and no one could hope to solve them alone; concerted action was required. The Council was playing an essential part as a co-ordinating factor, and it should be commended and encouraged.

A few representatives, among others those of Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Syria and the United Kingdom, stressed that it would be preferable to adopt a realistic approach and to concentrate the limited resources available on projects of primary importance.

A number of representatives, including those of France, Greece, India, Israel, the Netherlands, the Philippines and Yugoslavia, agreed with the Council that international assistance in the social field should aim particularly at promoting and implementing community development projects and extending training programmes and facilities.

In the various stages of development of a programme of concerted practical action in the social field, the importance of the co-operation of the various specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations was emphasized by, among others, the representatives of Belgium, Canada, China, France and Israel.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR declared that social conditions in many countries, and particularly in the Trust Territories and Non-Self-Governing Territories, were at a low level. Because of military preparations, the already very small allowances and pensions for unemployment, sickness and old age were being steadily reduced, while the continual rise in prices and the depreciation of the currency were reducing the real scale of expenditure on social insurance, which had already been curtailed, they asserted. The programme of concerted practical action adopted by the Council did not, in their view, meet the necessary requirements, as the programme was too wide and too abstract as a whole, and too general on certain points. They spoke in support of USSR amendments (see below) which, in their opinion, would give the work of the United Nations in the social field real practical value and would enable the United Nations to play its part in improving the world social situation.

The Third Committee had before it a joint draft resolution by Ecuador, the Philippines, the United States and Yugoslavia (A/C.3/L.348) by which the General Assembly would:

(1) thank the Economic and Social Council for the careful manner in which it had carried out the request contained in Assembly resolution 535(VI), in co-operation with Member Governments, the specialized agencies, the Social Commission and the Secretary-General;

(2) take note with appreciation of the programme of practical action in the social field of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies adopted in Council resolution 496(XVI); and

(3) request the Council: (a) to keep the development of this programme under review; (b) to consider, as appropriate, further practical measures which might be undertaken in accordance with its resolution 496(XVI); and (c) to report, as appropriate, to the General Assembly on the progress achieved.

Amendments to the joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.348) were submitted by Saudi Arabia and Egypt jointly (A/C.3/L.349); by France (A/C.3/L.350) with a Syrian sub-amendment to it (A/C.3/L.351); and by Lebanon (A/C.3/L.352).

The joint amendment of Saudi Arabia and Egypt proposed the deletion of the first operative paragraph of the four-Power draft, the words "with appreciation" in the second operative paragraph, and the words "as appropriate" in the last operative paragraph.

The sponsors considered that the expression of thanks and appreciation in the joint draft was inappropriate before it had been determined to what extent the Council resolution met the request expressed by the General Assembly in resolution 535(VI) and that to provide that the Council should consider further practical measures "as appropriate" and report "as appropriate" to the Assembly would give it too free a hand.

The French amendment proposed the insertion of a new operative paragraph, in which the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies would be invited to keep particularly in mind, in the implementation of the projects of the programme of practical action, the general principles and methods and techniques defined in Council resolution 496(XVI).

The sponsors of the joint draft accepted the French amendment.

The Syrian sub-amendment to the French amendment would provide for particular reference to paragraph 6 of Council resolution 496(XVI), referring to special consideration to the needs of under-developed areas.

The Lebanese amendment proposed that the Assembly note with appreciation the Council's "efforts to develop" a programme and state that the Council should keep the development of the programme under review "with a view to its constant improvement".

After consultation between the sponsors of the joint draft resolution and the authors of the amendments, a revised joint draft was introduced by Ecuador, Egypt, France, Lebanon, the Philippines, Syria, the United States and Yugoslavia (A/C.3/L.353) to replace the original four-Power draft (A/C.3/L.348) and the amendments to it.

An Argentine oral amendment and a USSR formal amendment (A/C.3/L.354) to the revised joint draft resolution were proposed. The Argentine oral amendment, which was designed to ensure that emphasis was placed on the special needs of the under-developed countries, was accepted by the sponsors of the revised joint draft.

The USSR amendment (A/C.3/L.354) proposed the insertion of a new operative paragraph in which the Assembly would recommend that the Council should supplement and amend the programme set forth in its resolution 496(XVI).

Sub-paragraph (a) of the amendment proposed that paragraph 8 (b) of resolution 496(XVI) be amended so as to "ensure greater accessibility of medical services for the population without discrimination as to race, sex, language, creed, property status or social origin".

This sub-paragraph was rejected by 27 votes to 10, with 14 abstentions.

Sub-paragraph (b) proposed that paragraph 8 (d) of resolution 496(XVI) be amended so as to "extend social security measures, unemployment, old age, disability and sickness insurance measures, and maternal and child welfare measures".

This sub-paragraph was rejected by 27 votes to 7, with 17 abstentions.

Sub-paragraph (c) proposed that paragraph 8 (f) of resolution 496(XVI) be amended so as to "promote greater accessibility of education for the broad masses of the population and introduce in the Member States of the United Nations free compulsory primary education for all citizens without any discrimination as to race, sex, language, creed, property status or social origin".

This sub-paragraph was rejected by 25 votes to 11, with 15 abstentions.

Sub-paragraph (d) proposed the addition of a new paragraph 8 (i) to resolution 496(XVI) concerning the improvement of health, education and social welfare in the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories.

This sub-paragraph was adopted by a roll-call vote of 28 to 13, with 10 abstentions.

In view of the adoption of this sub-paragraph, it was understood that the preamble to that amendment would be included in the new operative paragraph 3 of the joint draft and that the existing paragraph 3 was to become operative paragraph 4.

The joint draft, as amended, as a whole, was adopted by the Third Committee, at its 496th meeting on 12 October, by 38 votes to none, with 11 abstentions (A/2514), and by the General Assembly, at its 454th plenary meeting on 23 October, by 45 votes to none, with 12 abstentions, as resolution 732(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Reaffirming the principles contained in its resolution 535(VI) of 2 February 1952,

"1. Takes note with appreciation of the efforts made to establish the programme of concerted practical action in the social field of the United Nations and the specialized agencies adopted in Economic and Social Council resolution 496(XVI) of 31 July 1953;

"2. Invites the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies to keep particularly in mind, in the implementation of the projects of the programme of concerted practical action, the general principles, methods and techniques defined in Economic and Social Council resolution 496(XVI), special consideration being given to the needs of the under-developed countries;

"3. Recommends that the Economic and Social Council should supplement the programme of concerted practical action in the social field of the United Nations and the specialized agencies as set forth in resolution 496(XVI), by the insertion of a new paragraph 8 (i) reading as follows:

'Improve the situation with respect to health, education and social welfare in the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories.'

"4. Requests the Economic and Social Council:

"(a) To keep the development of the programme under consideration with a view to its progressive improvement;

"(b) To consider, as appropriate, further practical measures which may be undertaken in accordance with General Assembly resolution 535(VI) and Economic and Social Council resolution 496(XVI) with the addition thereto recommended to the Economic and Social Council by the General Assembly at its eighth session;

"(c) To report to the General Assembly on the progress achieved."

d. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS RESUMED SIXTEENTH SESSION

The question was again considered by the Council at its resumed sixteenth session, at the 753rd and 754th plenary meetings on 1 and 7 December.

At its 754th plenary meeting, the Council adopted (resolution 511(XVI)), without discussion and without objection, a draft resolution submitted by Argentina (E/L.573), by which the Council took note of Assembly resolution 732 (VIII), and, in accordance with that resolution, amended Council resolution 496(XVI) by the inclusion of a new sub-paragraph (i) in paragraph 8, reading as follows:

"Improve the situation with respect to health, education and social welfare in the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories."

2. General Programme of Work and Priorities of the Social Commission

The Social Commission, at its ninth session in May 1953, had before it progress reports giving a full account of the action taken by the Secretariat on the following selected items of its work programme which had been given high priority by the Commission and the Council, or in areas where policy guidance was needed: community welfare centres (E/CN.5/289/Add.1); strengthening of national programmes for family and child welfare (E/CN.5/289/Add.2); social defence (E/CN.5/289/Add.3); studies on financing of housing (including co-operative and self-help methods) (E/CN.5/289/Add.4); and advisory social welfare services and relevant assistance provided under the Expanded Programme of technical assistance for the economic development of under-developed countries (E/CN.5/289/Add.5).¹⁴²

The Commission also considered a detailed report by the Secretary-General on its work programme for 1954-55 (E/CN.5/292 & Add.1). A number of adjustments had been proposed as a result of the priorities established by the Council in resolution 451 A (XIV), involving a change of emphasis in order to make more staff available for direct assistance to governments in the extension of social programmes. For example, in the field of housing and town and country planning, higher priority had been assigned to training of personnel and regional land use planning, in the light of the increased attention of the Commission to training of all types of social workers and to the integration of studies with projects of practical action in the social field. Other examples concerned the restriction of the Biennial Report on Community, Family and Child Welfare to a report on significant developments in the field of family and child welfare; and the incorporation of the separate "Report on Social Welfare, Planning and the Organization and Administration of Social Services" in the quadrennial "International Survey of Programmes of Social Development".

The work programme for 1954-55, as adopted by the Social Commission, was listed in annex II of the Commission's report (E/2437). The programme was organized into four main fields of activity: social policy and development, housing and town and country planning, social services and social defence.

The Commission's report (E/2437) was considered by the Economic and Social Council at its sixteenth session, at the 234th to 236th meetings of the Council's Social Committee from 6 to 8 July, and at the 736th plenary meeting of the Council on 23 July 1953.

Members of the Council, in discussing the work programme, noted with satisfaction that the Commission had become increasingly aware of the close relationship between its work and other programmes for which the Council was responsible. The particular importance of the Commission's work, it was stressed, lay in the fact that it brought to light the complexity of world social problems and gaps that existed between the standards of living in developed and under-developed countries. Whereas during its early sessions the Commission had studied many specific welfare questions, more recently it had examined world social problems, thereby enabling it to advise the Council on the programmes and resources of international organizations in relation to the needs in the social field. As the General Assembly had recommended that the Secretariat should report every four years on the world social situation and also on national and international measures taken to improve social conditions throughout the world, it was suggested that the Commission, at each of its sessions to be held every second year, might consider the possibility of examining one of these two general reports; furthermore, that it might study two or three specific technical questions and receive sufficiently precise reports on them in order that effective recommendations might be made. Finally, it was suggested that the Commission might examine a general report on the work accomplished by the United Nations in the social field during the preceding two years and on the work it proposed to undertake during succeeding years. It was urged that, in all cases, documents should reach governments in sufficient time for thorough consideration.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR questioned the omission from the Commission's work programme of problems such as measures for promoting social and unemployment insurance, the extension of old age, sickness and other benefits. While omitting the important measures, the Social Commission, in their view, overloaded its agenda with such minor questions as, for example, penal statistics. They could not, therefore, subscribe to its work programme, and they hoped that such defects in the Commission's work as they had pointed out would be rectified and a practical programme adopted. Most representatives, however, while expressing concern for these important problems, considered that they fell within the competence of the specialized agencies concerned and their inclusion in the Commission's work programme would only result in duplication of effort.

The representative of Egypt said that he had hoped to find in the Social Commission's report not only information, but also guidance that would have been of use to his country. Since its liberation and the setting up of the Republican regime, Egypt, he said, had made great social efforts to break with the old system and improve the well-being of the people. Egypt had embarked on water supply schemes in the middle of the desert, and had built entire villages on the most modern lines. He had not, however, found in the Commission's report what he had been looking for, and wished to express in very general terms his profound disappointment.

The representatives of France and the United States urged that wider publicity should be given to the activities of the United Nations in the social field in order that this work might receive the support it deserved from the general public. While the majority of the publications issued by the Secretariat were of great value to social workers, organizations, national administration, and to those responsible for the planning of social policy in the various countries, many were of a highly technical nature and did not reach the public at large. It was suggested that a medium might be found between publications of a general nature and those of a more technical character of interest only to a limited number of readers.

Two draft resolutions were presented to the Social Committee, one jointly by China and France (E/AC.7/L.145) and one by Argentina (E/AC.7/L.146). They were consolidated and presented jointly by the three sponsors (E/AC.7/L.147). The second paragraph of the joint draft resolution approving the work programme of the Social Commission (which had formed part of the Argentine draft resolution) was adopted by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, and the draft resolution, as a whole, by the same vote at the Social Committee's 236th meeting on 8 July (E/2481).

In a statement of financial implications (E/2481/Add.1 & Corr.1) the Secretary-General noted that, although certain projects in the work programme of the Social Commission had been added or raised in priority in order to make available more direct assistance to governments, they were, nevertheless, counter-balanced by other projects which had been restricted or reduced in priority and that no net increase in the workload or budget of the United Nations would be required.

The Council, at its 736th plenary meeting, adopted the second paragraph of the draft resolution by 15 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, and the resolution, as a whole, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 494(XVI).

By this resolution, the Council: (1) took note of the report of the ninth session of the Social Commission (with the exception of the chapters concerning UNICEF and the programme of concerted practical action in the social field¹⁴³); (2) approved the work programme for 1954-55 drawn up by the Social Commission at its ninth session; and (3) invited the attention of the Social Commission, for its general guidance, to the records of the discussions on these subjects at the Council's sixteenth session.

At its eighth session, the General Assembly held a general debate on chapters IV and V of the report of the Economic and Social Council, which included the work programme of the Social Commission, at the Third Committee's 503rd to 511th meetings, from 22 October to 3 November. Draft resolutions concerning the work of the Social Commission were considered specifically by the Committee at its 516th to 518th meetings, from 9 to 11 November, and by the General Assembly at its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November.

During the Third Committee's debate, certain representatives, including, in particular, those of Canada, the Dominican Republic and Iraq, paid tribute to the work of the Social Commission, which, in their opinion, had achieved results that redounded greatly to the credit of the United Nations. During the discussion, the importance of family and child welfare, community organization and development, the training of professional and local personnel and the strengthening of administration of social programmes were emphasized. With regard to the problems of strengthening national programmes for family and child welfare, the representative of Syria stated that meetings of local experts would have little chance of success if held on a purely regional basis. He expressed the hope that the experts of Middle Eastern countries would be drawn from countries of similar ethnic characteristics so that they might have an opportunity to pool their knowledge and experience of their countries' common problems.

The importance of the training of qualified personnel in the social field was stressed by, among others, the representatives of Greece, Iraq and Israel. They considered, inter alia, that fellows should be guaranteed responsible posts in their countries on their return, and that they should also study in less-developed areas where conditions were similar to those in their own countries.

As regards housing, the representatives of Greece and Iraq stressed that the problem was one of financing and that co-operative and self-help methods would not provide a solution.

Speaking in favour of national programmes for cheap housing, the representative of Iraq expressed the view that the only effective solution to the world housing problem would be State grants or low-interest loans, since there was a risk of exploitation in the case of foreign assistance for national industries.

The representative of Syria attached particular importance to the reports on the world social situation and on national and international measures taken to improve social conditions throughout the world which the General Assembly had recommended that the Secretariat should make quadrennially. He hoped that they would be submitted in time for them to be studied in detail by the Social Commission.

The frequency of meetings and membership of the Social Commission was considered in detail by the Third Committee. Stressing the importance of the work of the Social Commission, some representatives, including those of Argentina, Iraq, the Philippines, Syria and Yugoslavia, expressed concern at the Council's decision that future meetings of the Commission should be held biennially instead of annually. Despite the additional financial and practical problems involved, it seemed unsound, these representatives held, that the Commission should not meet regularly during the formative years of its programme. Biennial meetings would also mean that some members would only be able to attend one session, and in order to render valuable service to the Commission members should be given an opportunity to attend at least two further sessions. It was further contended that, in view of the special importance attached by the United Nations to the needs of the less developed areas, it would be desirable to expand the membership of the Commission to provide better representation of the varying economic and social systems in those areas.

While recognizing the importance of the work of the Social Commission, certain representatives, including those of Belgium, Ecuador, France, the Netherlands, Peru, Sweden and the United States, considered that, as the Council was to review the organization of its functional commissions in 1954, it might be preferable to await the Council's findings as to whether annual meetings of the Social Commission were necessary.

Some representatives, among others those of Belgium, China, India and Israel, were of the opinion that the existing procedure of biennial meetings would give both governments and the Secretariat time to make fuller use of the documentation prepared. Most of the problems studied by the Commission, they said, were long-term and, despite progress in some areas, social conditions did not change rapidly enough to warrant an annual review. The representatives of India, the United Kingdom, the Union of South Africa and Uruguay, in particular, pointed out that financial considerations must be taken into account in considering an increase in the frequency of meetings or in membership.

The representative of China suggested that, in view of the major programmes being undertaken by the Commission, the Council might consider whether the Commission should meet for a longer period every two years rather than for two weeks each year.

The representatives of India, Israel, Peru, the Philippines and Yugoslavia, among others, thought that if the Commission was to continue meeting biennially the Council might consider convening ad hoc committees of experts to study in the interim period questions in the social field.

With regard to increasing the Commission's membership, the representative of the United States, in particular, drew attention to the fact that the Charter limited the Council's membership to eighteen and that this set a maximum for membership of its functional commissions. In the view of the representatives of Canada and Sweden, among others, any expansion might induce other functional commissions to seek a similar increase in their own membership with consequent financial and other problems for the United Nations.

The Third Committee had before it a draft resolution by Iraq (A/C.3/L.376) providing that the General Assembly request the Economic and Social Council:

(1) to reconsider its resolution 414(XIII), section B. I 18. (g),¹⁴⁴ with a view to convening the Social Commission every year; and

(2) to consider the expansion of the membership of the Commission to provide improved representation of under-developed areas and various economic and cultural patterns.

The Committee also had before it a statement by the Secretary-General (A/C.3/L.376/Add.1) on the financial implications of the Iraqi draft resolution, pointing out the extra costs involved if the Commission were to be convened every year instead of every two years and if its membership were to be increased. Budgetary provision for the 1953 meeting had amounted to $10,800 for eighteen members and the cost per Commission member was estimated at an average of $650.

A Netherlands amendment (A/C.3/L.382) to the Iraqi draft resolution proposed that the first operative paragraph be altered to ask the Council to investigate if there was a need for a more frequent convening of the Social Commission, and if it considered that such a need existed, to reconsider its resolution with a view to convening the Commission every year.

A Peruvian amendment (A/C.3/L.384) proposed a new text, by which the Council would be asked to consider among the methods and procedures of the Social Commission the establishment of a small number of committees of experts to deal with the technical matters within the purview of the Commission.

A Guatemalan sub-amendment (A/C.3/L.386) to the Peruvian amendment, proposed that the Peruvian amendment should be included as a third operative paragraph of the Iraqi proposal, instead of replacing the two existing operative paragraphs.

A draft resolution was put forward by Canada (A/C.3/L.385) which aimed at bringing together all of the suggestions made in the Third Committee. This draft would have the General Assembly invite the Council, in its review of this question, to consider the proposals made by Iraq, the Netherlands and Peru, as well as the suggestions made in the discussion of the matter during the Assembly's eighth session; and would have the Assembly request the Secretary-General to communicate the records of the debate on the question in the Assembly at its eighth session to the Council for its guidance and information.

The USSR representative proposed orally that the Canadian draft resolution be amended to include a reference to Article 61 as well as Article 68 of the Charter in the first preambular paragraph, and that the words "for its guidance and information" in the last operative paragraph be deleted. The representatives of Egypt and Uruguay orally proposed that, if direct reference were made to Articles 61 and 68 of the Charter in the first paragraph of the Canadian draft, it would not be necessary to quote the text of either Article.

The Committee adopted by 30 votes to 14, with 7 abstentions, an oral proposal by India that the Canadian draft resolution should be voted upon before the Iraqi draft resolution.

Following further oral drafting amendments by the representatives of China and Saudi Arabia, a revised version of the Canadian draft resolution (A/C.3/L.385/Rev.1) was presented to the Committee incorporating all of the oral amendments which had been proposed.

The words "61 and" in the first paragraph of the preamble of the revised Canadian draft resolution were voted on by roll call, at the request of the representatives of Afghanistan and the Philippines, and were adopted by 29 votes to 17, with 5 abstentions.

The representative of Canada accepted an oral United Kingdom amendment to reword the first sentence of the second preambular paragraph to state that "one of the aims" rather than "the aim" of the United Nations was to promote social progress and better standards of life.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted, as a whole, by the Third Committee (A/2573) at its 518th meeting on 11 November, by 45 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, and by the Assembly, without discussion, at its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November, by 51 votes to none, with 7 abstentions (resolution 735 (VIII)). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Mindful of the provisions of Articles 61 and 68 of the Charter,

"Considering that one of the aims of the United Nations is to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom and to this end to be a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations,

"Considering that the General Assembly at its present session has adopted a programme of concerted practical action in the social field,

"Recalling that the Economic and Social Council, in its resolution 414(XIII) of 18, 19 and 20 September 1931 decided that the Social Commission should meet biennially instead of annually,

"Bearing in mind that, in accordance with its resolution 414(XIII), the Economic and Social Council must review in 1954 the question of organization of its functional commissions,

"Having considered the draft proposals made with a view to the possible revision of the pattern of meetings of the Social Commission, as well as to the expansion of its membership to provide improved representation of under-developed areas and various economic and cultural patterns,

"1. Invites the Economic and Social Council, in its review of this question, to consider the aforementioned draft proposals, as well as the suggestions made in the discussion of this matter during the eighth session of the General Assembly;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to communicate to the Economic and Social Council the records of the debate on the question during the eighth session of the General Assembly."

3. Community Organization and Development

The progress report on community welfare centres (E/CN.5/289/Add.1), submitted to the Social Commission's ninth session, provided information on studies and surveys completed in 1952 or to be carried out in 1953, in accordance with Council resolution 390 D (XIII),¹⁴⁵ and on the technical assistance in this field being provided to Member Governments. The Social Commission noted the statements made concerning the recent field survey missions which had confirmed that the promotion of community self-development activities was dependent upon active co-operation and support from the government concerned, from non-governmental organizations and from the local community.

The Commission, while approving the proposed outline for the Secretary-General's full analytical report to the Commission at its tenth session, considered that the report should contain more complete information on the work carried out in the various regions of the world, as well as material which could form the basis of an evaluation of methods and results.

During the Council's discussion of the Social Commission's report at its sixteenth session, most representatives laid particular stress on the importance of community development projects, particularly through demonstration centres, training both professional and technical personnel, as well as auxiliary and community workers. It was noted that community welfare centres represented one form of community development and that the United Nations and the specialized agencies used the broad term "community organization and development" to describe the process by which local communities sought to raise their standards of living. It was pointed out that community development programmes were not designed to deal with problems singly, but in related groups, and that they could be really effective only when they encompassed the most important problems affecting the community.

Attention was drawn by the representatives of Belgium and the United Kingdom, in particular, to the importance of flexibility in the methods employed in setting up community welfare centres as effective instruments to promote economic and social progress throughout the world, so as to allow for adaption to differences in local conditions. The establishment of single purpose centres, in the view of the representatives of Belgium, China, the Philippines and Venezuela, among others, was a first stage in the development of wider social welfare activities, and it was recognized that such centres would be particularly useful in economically highly-developed countries. Multi-purpose centres which could be organized on a more economical basis, in the opinion of the representatives of Belgium and China, would be more appropriate in the less-developed areas, especially rural areas and areas undergoing a rapid process of development.

Since the ninth session of the Social Commission, the reports of the missions undertaken jointly by the United Nations and the specialized agencies for the purpose of surveying selected community development experiments in the Caribbean area and Mexico, in the Middle East and in South and South East Asia, were made available.¹⁴⁶ The report of the survey for the Caribbean area and Mexico was among the major papers discussed at the Brazilian Seminar on Rural Welfare, held in January 1953, and at the regional meeting on the training of auxiliary and community workers which took place in Bogota, Colombia, in December 1953; they would also form part of the documentation being prepared for the regional conferences referred to below. The surveys revealed that the most urgent needs were for the development and clarification of national policy, the training of personnel, the planning and organization of demonstration projects and the supply of technical literature.

To help in meeting the need for technical literature and training materials, information was made available to governments through the publications in the United Nations Series on Community Organization and Development. The series includes country monographs, special studies of selected experiments of particular significance, reports of survey missions, and training aids in the form of study kits and guides.

The Commission at its ninth session stressed the necessity for placing major emphasis on direct assistance to governments. In this connexion, four experts were provided to advise the Governments of Iraq, Pakistan, Thailand and Yugoslavia on the establishment of nation-wide community programmes and on the co-ordination of government services at the local level. United Nations experts in community organization and development were also engaged on work at the UNESCO Fundamental Education Training Centres at Sirs el Layyan in Egypt and at Patzcuaro in Mexico. In addition, 29 fellowships and scholarships were awarded in 1953.

A number of governments expressed interest in receiving advice on the utilization of under-employed manpower by means of simple community projects, such as building roads, irrigation canals, etc. In South Korea, such a programme was established in each province, with technical assistance provided by the United Nations, during March and April 1953. The United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA) reported that, as of 1 December 1953, the total number of projects initiated in Korean villages and cities was 189, of which 150 had been completed. This programme was being expanded.

Certain questions were raised by the Social Commission at its ninth session concerning the relationship of community development to fundamental education and related activities. An ad hoc meeting of technical officers representing the United Nations and the specialized agencies concerned (the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the World Health Organization (WHO)) was convened by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination from 9 to 11 July 1953 to consider such questions, to ensure maximum co-ordination in projects aimed at integrating social activities at the community level and to establish working arrangements on responsibilities in this field. These consultations resulted in an agreement on definitions of terms, and on the roles and objectives of the agencies participating in the joint programme for community organization and development (see E/2512).

Further consultations were held on 3 to 4 August, when a review was made of the work programmes and possible technical assistance projects of the United Nations and specialized agencies for 1954-55 in so far as they contribute to community development. The latter meeting also provided an opportunity to discuss the action to be taken as a result of paragraph 10 of Council resolution 496(XVI) which authorizes the Secretary-General "to take early action on an experimental basis, and at the request of governments, to convene one or more small groups of senior policy-making representatives of governments to plan concrete programmes for the expansion of community development projects . . .".

Plans were being made, in consultation with the specialized agencies concerned, for one conference to be convened during the latter part of 1954 for the South and South East Asian region, and another early in 1955 for the Eastern Mediterranean area. The Secretary-General in December 1953 addressed letters to governments requesting an indication of their desire to participate in these conferences.

4. Housing and Town and Country Planning

In endorsing the scope and purpose of the international programme in the social field, the Social Commission, at its ninth session, emphasized the importance of adequate housing and community facilities in raising standards of living in general, and stressed the urgency of increasing the supply of housing for the broad masses of the population and the low-income groups. The training of administrative and technical personnel in all phases of planning, and execution and management was given highest priority by the Commission in its 1954-55 work programme in this field. The Commission also discussed a report prepared by the Secretariat (E/CN.5/289/Add.4) relating to studies on financing of housing, including co-operative and self-help methods. This report outlined the progress of work undertaken in this field by the Secretariat, the regional economic commissions, the specialized agencies and interested non-governmental organizations.

The report indicated that meetings of experts, organized perhaps within the framework of the United Nations Expanded Programme of technical assistance, might be held to consider, on a regional basis, problems of national financing, including co-operative, self-help and similar housing practices, and international financing of housing, including the development of the building and building materials industries. Such meetings might also develop recommendations with respect to national policies and to appropriate international action, including technical assistance.

In its review of the report, the Social Commission stressed the importance of the financing of housing and community improvement programmes. It was recognized that governments were assuming increasing responsibility in this field as part of their general and economic and social policy. They had become aware of the magnitude of the problem, and the limited resources available called in many instances for active contributions by future householders through co-operative and self-help methods. The establishment of regional credit agencies was suggested as a sound method of attracting private savings for the purpose of granting mortgage loans for housing construction. The Social Commission further approved a new project dealing with regional land use planning in relation to economic, technological and human resources of a region.

In giving effect to the recommendations of the Commission, continuing attention was given to achieving greater co-ordination of activities among the interested specialized agencies and intergovernmental organizations participating in the integrated programme, and to co-operation with non-governmental organizations working in this field.

Studies were being reoriented so as to be more effectively related to the needs of particular countries and regions and to practical action and expert advice as expressed in requests received from governments.

Studies were also undertaken to supply basic information for technical assistance projects, which, in turn, furnished data for studies. The results of the studies continued to be made available through the *Housing and Town and Country Planning Bulletin*¹⁴⁷ and other publications.

Requests received from governments for direct assistance continued to increase. During 1953, nineteen experts were working in twelve countries (Burma, Ceylon, Colombia, Ecuador, India, Indonesia, Israel, Lebanon, Mexico, Pakistan, Paraguay and Turkey) and, in addition, 39 fellowships and scholarships were awarded in this field. The following are examples of case studies and pilot projects dealing with problems common to more than one country in a given area which were being carried out during 1953 under the technical assistance programme:

Development of national policies and programmes: United Nations experts were advising the Governments of Costa Rica, Ecuador and the Gold Coast on the development of national policies and programmes for housing and community improvement and on the establishment of required administrative organizations at the national, regional and local levels. As a result of recommendations by a United Nations expert, the Government of Bolivia formulated its national policy and was to establish a housing and planning agency.

Regional land use planning: Arrangements were being made to advise the Government of Egypt on a regional plan which would include the cities of Cairo, Alexandria and Port Said. United Nations experts were also assisting in the development of metropolitan plans for the capitals of Burma, Indonesia, Pakistan and Paraguay.

Rural housing and village planning: United Nations technicians were advising on the intensified use of local materials and skills for the improvement of rural housing and village planning at the UNESCO Fundamental Education Centres at Patzcuaro (Mexico) and at Sirs el Layyan (Egypt). Arrangements were also being discussed for a seminar on rural planning to take place in Latin America in 1955.

Research and training: Assistance in the development of research and training facilities for the different phases of planning and execution of housing and building programmes was provided to the Government of Indonesia, to Israel (Building Research Centre) and to Costa Rica and Turkey (Public Administration Centres). Negotiations were in progress for the establishment of regional housing centres in Indonesia and India similar to the already existing Inter-American Centre at Bogotá, Colombia. The activities of this Centre, which is a major project of the Organization of American States, have been further expanded with United Nations assistance in the form of expert advice and equipment.

Building and building materials industries: The development of the building and building materials industries, based on the resources of the countries concerned, was the subject of direct assistance projects in Burma, Ceylon, Indonesia and Israel. In Israel, the first part of the research and demonstration and training project in stabilized earth was completed. The demonstrations at several sites have proved that, under varying conditions, it is possible to build satisfactory modern houses using only earth, unskilled labour and small quantities of stabilizer. As a result, the Government and the Jewish Agency have decided to build a considerable number of such houses.

Financing of housing and community improvement programmes: Case studies were prepared during 1953 on the possibility of financing such programmes from national and external sources in Greece and Colombia, and a housing expert was included in the mission of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development to Syria. These studies, as well as previous studies on co-operative housing and on financing of housing from external sources, were prepared as working papers for a seminar on co-operative housing to be held in Copenhagen in 1954 and for a meeting of experts on financing of housing to be held in Brazil in 1955.

The reports and studies prepared in 1953 on national housing policies, on regional land use planning and on building and building materials industries also served as the preparatory work for the United Nations Regional Seminar on Housing and Community Improvement, to be held in New Delhi in February to March 1954.

5. Training of Social Welfare Personnel

The priority given to the training of social welfare personnel resulted in a marked increase in requests for direct technical assistance to governments in the form of experts, field surveys, scholarships and fellowships, regional seminars and technical groups, the supply (or lending) on a limited scale of training materials, and the making available of studies and reports on subjects pertaining to the training of social work personnel. The work of individual United Nations experts has varied from the setting up of demonstration training programmes where none existed to intensive work with schools and agencies in the improvement of theoretical and practical training. The United Nations was assisting in the training of three categories of personnel: (a) auxiliary and community workers; (b) preprofessional and professional social workers; and (c) employed personnel through in-service training.

¹⁴⁷ Bulletins Nos. 7 and 8 dealing, respectively, with urban land problems and policies and with building and housing research were to be published in the summer of 1954.

In view of the repeated stress on the importance of adequately trained personnel to carry out social welfare programmes aimed at promoting the economic and social development of the less-developed areas, three regional meetings were organized in co-operation with the specialized agencies concerned.

The first meeting was held in Gandhigram, India, for the Far Eastern region, from 22 to 26 December 1952. It was attended by experts from India, Burma, Ceylon, the Philippines and Thailand and representatives of the United Nations (including UNICEF), FAO, ILO, UNESCO and WHO. Experts from Indonesia and Pakistan submitted papers but were unable to attend the meeting.

The second meeting was held in Beirut, Lebanon, for the Middle Eastern region, from 9 to 18 September 1953. It was attended by experts from Lebanon, Egypt, Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Pakistan and Syria, by representatives from the United Nations (including UNICEF and UNRWA) and FAO, UNESCO, and WHO, as well as social workers from the Jubrail project in Lebanon. Two representatives of the Lebanese Government attended as observers.

The third meeting was held in Bogota, Colombia, for the Caribbean and Central American region, from 30 November to 12 December 1953. Experts from the following countries participated: Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Guatemala, Haiti, Jamaica and Mexico. Representatives from the United Nations, FAO, UNESCO and WHO, as well as local observers appointed by the Colombian Government, were also present. An expert from El Salvador submitted a paper but was unable to attend the meeting.

At each meeting, technical papers, prepared by the participating experts, giving an analysis and evaluation of their experiments in training auxiliaries and community leaders, served as the basis of discussion. The results of these meetings showed the existence in the three regions of similar problems, particularly the lack of professionally trained personnel, of technical literature in the native language of the area concerned and of co-ordination of training programmes at the national level.

The Economic and Social Council in August 1951 by resolution 390 B. 2 (c) (XIII) had requested that a report indicating significant developments in social work training, and a revised directory of schools of social work, should be submitted to the Social Commission every four years. The first report entitled Training for Social Work. An International Survey (E/CN.5/196/Rev.1)¹⁴⁸ was issued in 1950. The new report was being prepared in co-operation with twelve national associations of schools of social work, as well as the Pan American Union, the International Committee of Schools of Social Work, the Union catholique internationale de Service social, the American Council of Social Work and professional associations of social workers. The survey, which covers a wide geographical area, including the less-developed as well as developed countries, will describe the present stage of development and trends of training in the different regions. The Directory, in order to facilitate international exchange of information, will include some brief data on the set-up, standards and duration of the training programme.

Of the four hundred schools of social work already consulted, more than half supplied a considerable amount of valuable data. The first draft of the report was to be discussed at the International Conference of Social Work in Toronto in June 1954.

During 1953, eighteen United Nations experts were assigned to many parts of the world, mainly in less-developed areas but also in developed areas, organizing preprofessional or professional courses. In Pakistan and in Thailand, experts assisted the authorities in organizing preprofessional training, which will eventually be placed on a professional level. In Iraq, an expert was organizing a pre-professional course at Queen Aliya College. In Belgium, Italy and Yugoslavia, experts assisted in organizing case-work courses; and in Costa Rica and El Salvador, they advised schools of social work on methods of professional training. Also during 1953, seven fellowships and scholarships were awarded.

Some of these experts also provided in-service training to persons already in employment. For example, Italian social workers were being trained in methods of supervision; in Burma and Thailand, personnel was being trained in medical-social work, and in Pakistan, welfare staff was being trained by a team of United Nations experts.

6. Strengthening of National Programmes for Family and Child Welfare

The Economic and Social Council in July 1952 adopted resolution 434 E (XIV)¹⁴⁹ relating to various aspects of the international family and child welfare programmes and requested the Secretary-General to report progress at the next regular session of the Social Commission.

In pursuance of that resolution, a progress report (E/CN.5/289/Add.2) was submitted by the Secretariat to the Commission's ninth session, under the following headings: direct assistance to governments in strengthening child welfare projects, training of auxiliary and community workers, national plans for the assessment and development of an integrated child welfare programme, status of studies and reports included in the work programme, the improvement of child nutrition, revised statement of measures for family and child welfare, and matters requiring special attention.

The report called particular attention to:

- nutrition;
- effective arrangements for home visiting;
- the part played by voluntary organizations and individual volunteers in inspiring and carrying out social services, especially for children;
- the importance of technical assistance in promoting country projects; and
- health, education and community development.

At its ninth session, the Social Commission reviewed with approval the measures taken by the United Nations, UNICEF and the specialized agencies to strengthen national programmes for family and child welfare. It emphasized the importance of the use of auxiliary personnel in countries which were at an early stage in the development of social services, as well as in the more developed countries.

In connexion with the improvement of child nutrition through inter-agency consultation, the Commission noted the report prepared by FAO in co-operation with WHO and UNICEF on the "Improvement of Child Nutrition, with Special Reference to Inter-Agency Action" (E/CN.5/289/Add.2, annex I) and heard a statement by the representative of FAO on the progress that had been made on the problem of supplying milk substitutes and protein foods.

At the Council's sixteenth session, a number of representatives, including those of Belgium, India, the Philippines and Yugoslavia, emphasized the importance of the training and use of auxiliary social workers. The representative of the United States expressed the opinion that the Technical Working Group on Long-Range Activities for Children of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination,¹⁵⁰ while concentrating on certain specific problems, should also at its next session consider problems of a more general nature, such as income maintenance, which was of vital importance.

An important development during 1953 was the completion of the assessments of services for children, carried out, at the request of the Governments concerned, in Burma, El Salvador and Syria. The main purpose of these surveys is to assist governments to review existing services for the benefit of children and to advise on the initiation and development of comprehensive national programmes, applicable to both rural and urban areas.

Particular emphasis in the field of family and child welfare was given to extending direct assistance to governments in promoting the welfare of the family as the basic unit of society, and to measures designed to strengthen family life. For example, in Ecuador, a United Nations expert was working with a WHO team in a joint project for the setting up of child health centres; an expert was assigned to Burma to advise the Government on the implementation of the recommendations of the social services mission to that country in 1953, including services for children; and consultations were in progress with UNICEF in order to strengthen the social aspects of the work of the 5,300 maternal and child welfare centres receiving UNICEF aid. Seven experts were assigned to Israel, El Salvador, Syria, Trieste and Yugoslavia; and 35 United Nations fellowships and scholarships were awarded.

Under the general title Children Deprived of a Normal Home Life, of which the introductory study was issued in 1952 (E/CN.5/271),¹⁵¹ a second study on the practice and procedures related to the adoption of children, entitled Study on Adoption of Children, was prepared in co-operation with the International Union for Child Welfare for publication in 1953.¹⁵² This study covers fifteen countries selected in view of their different legal systems and various social and cultural patterns. The scope of the inquiry does not include Middle Eastern and Far Eastern countries, since in these countries the pattern of family life is such as to give adoption a different function from that which it has in the West. The study therefore deals with adoption practice as it has developed in selected countries of Europe, North America and Latin America.

Twenty monographs dealing with the legal aspects of adoption in fifteen different countries (Canada being represented by three Provinces and the United States by four of its States) have also been prepared. These will serve as the basis for a comparative analytical study on adoption legislation. The study is scheduled for publication by the end of 1954.

The mental health aspects of adoption were dealt with in a report published by WHO, based on the discussions of a joint meeting of experts representing that organization and the United Nations.¹⁵³

At its eighth session in May 1952, the Social Commission requested the Secretariat to prepare a report on "Methods of Administering Assistance to the Needy in Under-Developed Areas" and to present it for the Commission's consideration at a later session together with the study on Methods of Administering Assistance to the Needy,¹⁵⁴ prepared in 1952 (E/CN.5/273). Nine public assistance specialists from Japan, Ceylon, Burma, Egypt, Iran, Libya, Chile, Bolivia and Ecuador compiled, during 1953, information relating to existing methods of administering assistance to the needy in these countries, which will form the basis of a report by the Secretariat to the Social Commission's tenth session.

The Biennial Report on Community, Family and Child Welfare, covering, for the most part, activities and developments during 1949 and 1950, was published in 1953.¹⁵⁵

In the Legislative and Administrative Series on Child, Youth and Family Welfare, Volume II (Nos. 1-4) (ST/SOA/Ser.E/2 & Add.1 & 2) was completed in December 1953, and contains legislation adopted in 1950, reproduced in extenso or in part, from 33 countries; and titles of texts from eleven additional countries.

7. Rehabilitation of Handicapped Persons

Action in this field was mainly concentrated during 1953 on technical assistance aimed at advising governments in the planning of programmes for disability prevention and the rehabilitation of the handicapped. During the year, five United Nations experts in this field were provided to the Governments of Greece, India, Italy, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea and Venezuela; and 28 fellowships and scholarships were awarded.

In developing a co-ordinated international programme, a draft plan for the education and rehabilitation of the deaf and hard-of-hearing was prepared for discussion at the next meeting of the ACC Technical Working Group on Rehabilitation,¹⁵⁶ to be held in September 1954. A technical monograph on the subject was completed for publication in 1954. Reports on special allowances for the severely handicapped, including the blind, and an international definition of blindness would also be discussed at this meeting.

During 1953, co-operation with non-governmental organizations increased. Under the technical assistance programme, plans were made for joint projects, such as seminars and courses, the first of which would be a seminar on selective placement to be convened in October 1954 in Sweden, under the joint auspices of the Swedish Government, the World Veterans Federation, the United Nations and the International Labour Office. An example of a joint technical assistance project was the advisory mission to Egypt on the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped. The World Veterans Federation, an organization having consultative status with the Economic and Social Council, deposited funds with the Technical Assistance Administration to be used for the Egyptian project, for specific purposes recommended by the United Nations mission.

The Demonstration for the Rehabilitation of the Physically Handicapped, established in Belgrade under the United Nations programme, completed its first year of full-scale operations.

The Regional Demonstration Centre for the Rehabilitation of the Blind in Cairo received its first pupils in July 1953. Two home teaching courses were completed and the home teachers were posted to urban areas and rural social centres. An ILO expert on vocational training and placement took up his duties at the Centre in December 1953.

The first in a series of monographs, entitled "Rehabilitation of the Handicapped", was published as a special issue of the Social Welfare Information Series (ST/SOA)Ser.F/11:2). It contains an outline of the co-ordinated international programme for the rehabilitation of handicapped persons and selected bibliographies of books and films on rehabilitation.

8. Social Defence

The report¹⁵⁷ on Social Defence (E/CN.5/-289/Add.3), which was prepared by the Secretariat and submitted to the Social Commission at its ninth session, dealt with:

(1) the permanent functions assigned to the Secretariat for the purposes of carrying out international action on the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders;

(2) projects undertaken; and

(3) the number of experts, fellowships and scholarships in this field.

In discussing the question of regional consultative groups, the Social Commission expressed satisfaction with the achievements attained, particularly with regard to the methods employed in organizing and conducting such meetings, and urged their continuation. The Commission recognized that the ultimate aim of financial participation in these meetings should be exclusively a national responsibility, but that partial financing for the present would have to be assumed by the United Nations in order to ensure particularly the participation of the less-developed countries. The Commission considered that there should be no change in the periodicity of the meetings, provided that a certain amount of flexibility be permitted to the Secretariat.

Major emphasis in the field of prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders during 1953 was mainly directed towards the strengthening of international and regional co-operation and on providing assistance to governments. Preliminary work was being continued in connexion with the organization of the regional conferences, which were to take place either as meetings of regional consultative groups or as technical assistance seminars. Assistance to governments was also provided in the form of experts, fellowships and scholarships. During 1953, 31 fellowships and scholarships were awarded; and two experts were assigned to four countries (Burma, Israel, Pakistan and Turkey) to discuss programmes in the field of social defence with the governments concerned and to advise on future developments.

The Latin American Seminar on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, for which the Brazilian Government acted as host, was held in Rio de Janeiro in April 1953. Representatives from seventeen countries participated, as well as ten experts from the region who had prepared preliminary reports and acted as discussion leaders. The Seminar dealt with the standard minimum rules for the treatment of prisoners, the selection and training of correctional personnel, open institutions, juvenile delinquency and the trends of crime, as well as with questions of technical assistance.

One of the recommendations resulting from the Seminar concerned the establishment of a Latin American Institute for the Prevention of Crime (ST/TAA/Ser.C/13). At the request of the Government of Brazil (on behalf of the State of Sao Paulo) the Secretariat formulated a plan in connexion with this project which was submitted to the Government for consideration.

A further Seminar on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders for the Arab States took place in Cairo in December 1953, with the Government of Egypt acting as host. It was attended by representatives of Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Yemen, as well as by a number of technical experts and observers from the League of Arab States, the Government of Turkey, UNESCO and a number of non-governmental organizations. Major importance was attached to the question of juvenile delinquency, and recommendations were adopted for the improvement of the handling of juvenile cases in all phases, as well as for the development of adequate preventive measures. The question of open institutions was also examined, particularly from the point of view of the measures to be taken as transitional steps leading to the introduction of such institutions in the Arab States, where they are not yet generally known. A similar approach was followed in the consideration of the draft standard minimum rules for the treatment of prisoners to which several amendments were adopted, aimed at taking into account the special conditions prevailing in the region. The Seminar passed recommendations on future activity in the field among these States, advocating specifically the setting up of a bureau for the exchange of information within the League of Arab States and the creation of two centres, one for the training of personnel, and one for research.

In June 1953, the Secretary-General convened a meeting of the ad hoc advisory committee of experts¹⁵⁸ to advise the Social Commission and the Secretary-General on three main questions: the organization of the World Congress on the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders; prison labour; and the prevention of types of criminality resulting from social changes and accompanying economic development in less-developed countries. The Committee also discussed juvenile delinquency and advised the Secretariat on future action in the field (E/CN.5/298).

Preparatory work for the World Congress, which will deal on a universal basis with the topics now being studied from a regional point of view, was proceeding along the general lines of the recommendations made by the committee of experts. The Congress will be composed of experts appointed by their governments, observers representing the specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations concerned, and individual observers. The findings of the regional conferences, and additional documentation prepared by consultants and voluntary contributors, will be used as the basis of discussion.

The Social Commission was informed at its ninth session of the Secretariat's plan to hold the Congress in 1956. A majority of the advisory committee of experts, however, recommended that it be convened in Geneva in 1955, and several governments and correspondents subsequently expressed a similar point of view. Preparatory work on questions to be considered by the Congress was being given priority by the Secretariat within the work programme.

Close relationship between research and direct assistance to governments was maintained. The Social Commission, at its ninth session, gave priority to the study on the prevention of juvenile delinquency, inasmuch as earlier studies published in 1952-53 had dealt in substantial measure with the treatment of juvenile delinquents.¹⁵⁹ During 1953, preparations were started for a survey on the prevention of juvenile delinquency in Europe.

Another study which was given high priority by the Commission concerns prison labour. The advisory committee of experts, in emphasizing the importance of this question, recommended that a comprehensive study be made so as to make available sound guidance on policy and practice. Preliminary work was commenced on the study which is being carried out with the participation of the International Labour Office.

The study on the indeterminate sentence, which was completed in 1953 (ST/SOA/SD/2)¹⁶⁰ covered selected countries in Europe, the Middle East, Latin America, Asia and the Far East and Australasia. A comparative analysis was included of the legislation in force relating to the indeterminate sentence and its application in the countries under review.

A survey on the practical results and financial aspects of probation (supplementary to the Secretariat's study on "Probation and Related Measures"—E/CN.5/230) was also completed in 1953. It dealt with the measure of success attained by the application of probationary supervision to offenders in selected countries, including the Scandinavian countries and the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States. The study also included information on the financial aspects of this type of treatment. The report will be published in 1954.

A further study on parole and after-care, also to be published in 1954, provides analytical information and conclusions on the organization, content and the practical operation of parole and after-care systems in fourteen selected countries, as well as an analysis of the principles involved.

The third and the fourth issues (ST/SOA/Ser.M/4) of the International Review of Criminal Policy included various papers and information related to the programme on social defence.

In the Legislative and Administrative Series on Social Defence (prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, and the traffic in persons and related problems) Volume II (Nos. 1 and 2) (ST/SOA/Ser.E/3 & Add.1) was issued during 1953, containing legislation adopted in 1950, reproduced in extenso or in part, from 23 countries; and titles of texts from six additional countries.

The publication in June 1953 of an addendum (E/TWC/Summary 1948-1950 Addendum) to the summary of reports on the traffic in persons brought to a close the circulation of information based on the League of Nations questionnaire. Future reports will follow the outline of the new questionnaire which was prepared as a consequence of the adoption by the General Assembly in December 1949 of the consolidated Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others. Haiti became a party to this Convention in 1953.

Since the inception of the system of correspondents appointed by governments on matters of social defence, their number has been steadily increasing and, by December 1953, there were 78 in 40 States. During 1953 Pakistan appointed three correspondents to the Department of Social Affairs, in the field of the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, and the network of correspondents for the Commonwealth of Australia was completed by the appointment of a correspondent for South Australia. In addition to furnishing periodic reports and to complying with special requests in individual cases, correspondents have assisted the Secretariat in assembling information in connexion with the preparation of certain studies.

9. Advisory Social Welfare Services

In pursuance of General Assembly resolution 418(V),¹⁶¹ a report on the progress of the advisory social welfare services during 1952 (E/CN.5/289/Add.5) was prepared by the Secretariat.¹⁶²

The Social Commission at its ninth session expressed satisfaction with the progress made and stressed the importance of a progressive integration of social welfare projects with programmes for economic and social development at the national level. In view of the increase in the number of requests for expert assistance and the limitation of funds, emphasis was laid on the importance of paying increased attention to the careful selection, in co-operation with the governments concerned, of social welfare projects to be implemented.

The Commission agreed that in view of the possible reduction in the funds available from the Expanded Programme for social projects, the importance of quality, rather than quantity, of fellowships should be stressed and that international training through fellowships and scholarships should be supplemented as far as possible by training at the regional level. Importance was also attached to obtaining from requesting governments an assurance that, after their return to their countries, fellows would be offered responsible positions in the fields in which they had studied abroad.

The Commission noted the increase in the number of countries that had requested and received assistance under the programme of advisory social welfare services, and stressed the need for maintaining an adequate geographical balance of the programme. The European participation in this programme, particularly with regard to fellowships, should not be further reduced in relation to services rendered to other areas. While the interchange of ideas and techniques was as important to European countries as to other areas of the world, it was felt that this interchange could be effected through such programmes as the European Exchange Scheme, in which a relatively greater proportion of costs was borne by the interested governments, thus making a greater proportion of resources available to under-developed countries.

At the sixteenth session of the Economic and Social Council, the representatives of Belgium and the Philippines, in particular, expressed approval of the views of the Social Commission, especially the emphasis it had placed on the integration of technical assistance activities in social welfare with programmes of general national economic and social development. The representatives of Belgium, France and Sweden supported the Commission's views on the need for avoiding any further decrease of European participation in the allocation of fellowships under the advisory social welfare services.

During 1953 a total of 64 experts of 22 nationalities in various social welfare fields assisted 26 countries with programmes and problems of social development, including training for social work—auxiliary, in-service or professional level; administration of social welfare services; family and child welfare services; rehabilitation of the handicapped, including the blind and deaf; housing, town and village planning; community organization and development; and care of offenders and juvenile delinquency.¹⁶³

The United Nations Regional Office in Europe, through its Exchange Programme, arranged for 33 experts from European countries to go to countries in Europe other than their own, for short periods varying from a few days to one month. The assignments, also requested by governments, permit these experts to draw on their professional experience for the introduction of new social techniques or the improvement of existing techniques.

Another method of assisting governments is through fellowships and scholarships—during the year, 254 such grants were utilized by persons from 51 countries, who observed and studied in 20 countries. Under the Exchange Programme in and for Europe, participated in by sixteen countries, 243 exchange visits were organized. This regional exchange, administered by the United Nations in co-operation with ILO and the national exchange committees in the participating countries, enables persons or groups working in the field of social welfare or labour questions to observe and study abroad, on a reciprocal exchange basis, for periods varying from one week to several months.

Seminars and expert working groups held during 1953 included: one in Egypt, for the Arab States, on problems of the prevention of crime, the treatment of offenders and juvenile delinquency; one in Lebanon and one in Colombia on the training of auxiliaries; two in Brazil, one on the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders and the other on rural community welfare and development; three in Europe, under the Exchange Plan, one in Sweden on foster-home care of children, one in France on in-service training and one in Italy on services to individuals and families.

Technical publications in the social welfare field were furnished, on request, to Jamaica, Hong Kong, Indonesia and Burma and study kits covering selected material in community organization and development were sent to all governments, specialized agencies, experts and organizations in the field dealing with the subject. The Geneva Office of the United Nations handled 134 loans, comprising 517 films to nineteen countries, under its Film Library Service.

P. UNITED NATIONS CHILDREN'S FUND (UNICEF)

The UNICEF Executive Board held two sessions in 1953: the first from 19 to 26 March and the second from 8 to 16 September. Officers of the Board and members of the Programme Committee and the Committee on Administrative Budget for 1953 were elected¹⁶⁴ at a meeting of the 1953 Executive Board on 13 October 1952. The appointment of UNICEF representatives for 1953 to the UNICEF/WHO Joint Committee on Health Policy was made at the same time. At its 157th meeting on 13 October 1952, the Programme Committee appointed a Sub-Committee on Fund Raising.

1. UNICEF Assistance during 1953

In 1953 the Executive Board approved allocations totalling $15,864,090 as follows:

	Longe-range Aid	Emergency Aid
Africa	$582,000	—
Asia	4,666,850	$1,722,000
Eastern Mediterranean	959,000	320,000
Europe	289,000	200,900
Latin America	1,937,300	—
Assistance benefiting more than one region.....	295,000	—
	<hr/> $8,729,150	<hr/> $2,242,900
Total, project aid	$10,972,050
Freight	2,442,000
Operational services	942,780
Administration	1,507,260
	<hr/> $ 4,892,040
Grand Total	<hr/> $15,864,090

a. EMERGENCY AID

The Executive Board allocated a total of $2,242,900 for emergency aid in 1953. This represented about 20 per cent of all project aid approved. Of this amount, $1,722,000 went to four Asian countries: India, Japan, Korea and Pakistan, of which India received the largest amount, i.e., $718,000 for relief in famine areas. The Board approved $603,000 for aid to Korea for one year, since it had certain reservations regarding aid beyond this period in view of the existence of the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA), whose sole purpose is to provide aid for Korea. The Board decided that further aid to Korea would be considered only if it became clear that the need would not be covered by the activities of UNKRA.

Aid for Palestine refugees totalled $200,000 for the year. In accordance with the policy of the Executive Board, this allocation was to be used only for goods available in surplus, or from contributions in kind or restricted currencies, or for goods which could not be used effectively elsewhere. "Economic refugees" in the Israel villages along the Jordan border also received an apportionment for emergency assistance in 1953.

Emergency aid was approved twice during the year by a mail-poll vote: $100,000, in August, for Greek earthquake victims and $132,000, in December, for Japanese children in areas devastated by floods and typhoons. An additional $100,000 was approved for Greece by the Board at its September session, while an allocation of $132,000 for Japan supplemented the $154,000 approved at the September session.

b. LONG-RANGE AID

A total of $8,729,150, representing approximately 80 per cent of all project aid, was approved in 1953 for long-range aid. A total of 112 long-range programmes in 59 countries and territories received assistance; in addition, allocations were made for personnel engaged in BCG vaccination projects for two regions and for two projects which would benefit more than one region. During the year eight more countries were added to the list of those receiving UNICEF long-range aid: six in Africa (Bechuanaland, Kenya, Mauritius, Nigeria, Tanganyika and Uganda) and two in Latin America (British Guiana and St. Kitts).

The percentage distribution of long-range aid as between areas was as follows:

	Per Cent
Africa	6.7
Asia	53.4
Eastern Mediterranean	11.0
Europe	3.3
Latin America	22.2
Benefiting more than one region.....	3.4
	100.0

In terms of major types of assistance, the percentage distribution was as follows:

	Per Cent
Maternal and Child Welfare.....	41.1
Mass Health	33.1
BCG and other TB control.....	(10.4)
Malaria and insect control	(8.7)
Yaws, bejel and syphilis control....	(9.8)
Control of other diseases.....	(4.2)
Child Nutrition	25.8
Long-range feeding	(7.6)
Milk and other food conservation..	(18.2)
	100.0

Maternal and Child Welfare: About one third of total project aid, and over 40 per cent of long-range aid approved in 1953 was allocated to maternal and child welfare services and training programmes. This type of assistance has been increasing steadily during the past few years. In 1953, 57.6 per cent of long-range aid to Asia was for maternal and child welfare, as was 48.5 per cent of long-range aid in the Eastern Mediterranean area, 8.6 per cent in Europe and 6.4 per cent in Latin America.

The potential value of assisted maternal and child welfare centres in the development of health and other community services in rural areas, as well as in continuing large-scale campaigns against disease after the end of the mass phase, was increasingly recognized. By the end of 1953, UNICEF had approved aid for 5,200 centres. Because of the great need for trained auxiliary maternal and child care personnel, especially in rural areas, maternal and child welfare services aided by UNICEF usually provide training facilities as well as direct services to mothers and children. The training aspects of the programmes contribute not only to maternal and child welfare but to general public health work as well.

Aid for maternal and child welfare programmes included: equipment for centres; supplies and equipment for hospitals and wards; teaching equipment; transport; kits for midwives; school health supplies and equipment; special equipment for handicapped children; drugs and diet supplements; dried milk; soap; and stipends for training auxiliary personnel.

The following 28 countries and the International Children's Centre in Paris received $3,585,650 in aid for maternal and child welfare programmes in 1953:

Asia: $2,686,650 for Afghanistan, Burma, Cambodia, China,¹⁶⁵ Ceylon, Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Japan, Malaya, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sarawak, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam.

Eastern Mediterranean: $465,000 for Egypt, Iraq, Libya, Israel and Turkey.

Europe: $25,000 for Austria.

Latin America: $124,000 for Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Ecuador, Panama and Peru.

International Children's Centre in Paris: $285,000 benefiting more than one region.

BCG Vaccination Campaigns and Other Tuberculosis Control: Allocations totalling $907,000 were made to 25 countries and territories and two regions for BCG vaccination campaigns and other tuberculosis control work in 1953 as follows:

Asia: $585,400 for Brunei, Burma, Cambodia, Ceylon, China,¹⁶⁵ India, Indonesia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand, Vietnam, South East Asia Region.

Eastern Mediterranean Region: $133,000 for Ethiopia, Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Libya, Sudan, Turkey, Eastern Mediterranean Regional BCG project.

Latin America: $188,600 for British Guiana, British Honduras, Chile, Colombia, Grenada, Paraguay, St. Kitts.

Thus, tuberculosis control received slightly over 10 per cent of the allocations approved for long-range aid in 1953. By area, this type of assistance constituted 12.6 per cent of long-range aid to Asia, 13.9 per cent of that to the Eastern Mediterranean area and 9.7 per cent of that to Latin America. During 1953, BCG campaigns were being carried on in 23 countries, and approximately nine million children were vaccinated, as follows:

Area	No. of Countries	No. of Children Vaccinated
Asia	11	7,657,000
Eastern Mediterranean ..	6	1,077,000
	23	9,034,000

Control of Malaria and Other Insect-Borne Diseases: In 1953, allocations for the control of malaria and other insect-borne diseases amounted to 8.7 per cent of all allocations for long-range aid. This was about half of the percentage for 1952, the decline being attributable to the fact that new proposals for Africa and the Eastern Mediterranean area were being developed during the year for submission to the Board in 1954. Of the long-range aid approved for each area, the following percentages were allocated for malaria and insect control: 17.2 per cent to Africa, 7.2 per cent to Asia, and 16.8 per cent to Latin America. The total amount approved was $763,000 for eleven countries and territories as follows:

Africa: $100,000 for Kenya, Nigeria, Tanganyika, Uganda.

Asia: $338,000 for Afghanistan, Burma, Ceylon, Pakistan.

Latin America: $325,000 for the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Mexico.

Over nine million children and mothers in 30 countries were protected during 1953 in malaria and insect-control programmes aided by UNICEF, mainly with DDT supplies on hand from allocations made in previous years. The number protected in each area was as follows:

Area	No. of Countries	No. Children and Mothers
Africa	4	369,000
Asia	4	5,975,000
Eastern Mediterranean ..	4	531,000
Latin America	18	2,271,000
	30	9,146,000

Control of Yaws, Bejel and Syphilis: UNICEF aid for yaws, bejel and syphilis campaigns accounted for 9.8 per cent of all allocations for long-range aid programmes in both 1952 and 1953. In 1953, 49.4 per cent of the long-range aid approved for Africa was for the control of yaws, bejel and syphilis, as was 11.5 per cent of that for Asia and 3.3 per cent of that for the Eastern Mediterranean region. A total of $858,000 was allocated for this type of assistance in seven countries in 1953 as follows:

Africa: $288,000 for Bechuanaland, Morocco and Nigeria.

Asia: $538,000 for China,¹⁶⁶ India and Indonesia.

Eastern Mediterranean: $32,000 for Syria.

During 1953, over one million children and mothers were treated with penicillin by UNICEF in these campaigns in ten countries:

Area	No. of Countries	No. Children and Mothers Treated
Africa	2	80,000
Asia	5	373,500
Eastern Mediterranean ..	1	50,000
Europe	1	22,000
	10	1,019,500

A special progress report on the UNICEF/-WHO-assisted campaigns against yaws (E/ICEF/-233), submitted by the Director-General of the World Health Organization (WHO), stated that modern methods of control open the way to eventual complete eradication of the disease.

Other Health Measures: The Executive Board approved in principle two new types of aid during 1953, in accordance with criteria laid down by the UNICEF/WHO Joint Committee on Health Policy: aid for environmental sanitation, and aid for large-scale leprosy control measures. The Board noted the comments of the Joint Committee on Health Policy that environmental sanitation is a basic component of all maternal and child health work and might be associated with this work either as an integral part of it or as an independent programme. The Board agreed that it would be desirable if such programmes could be related to existing UNICEF-aided maternal and child welfare programmes, but that where this was not possible they would be considered on their own merits.

Regarding leprosy control, the nature of the aid provided, it was decided, would vary in each individual case along the lines laid down by the Joint Committee on Health Policy. Leprosy, it was noted, is a major health problem in underdeveloped tropical countries, and the prevailing opinion is that it is more often contracted during infancy and childhood than in later life. While leprosy control is a complex problem, the modern approach permits patients to maintain a fairly normal life in their own communities during treatment. The Board approved aid for a leprosy control programme in Nigeria at its March 1953 session.

Besides the mass campaigns against tuberculosis, malaria and yaws, UNICEF during 1953 approved $368,000 in aid for a number of other health programmes, including the leprosy programme in Nigeria and projects to control mycosis (Syria), trachoma (Morocco and Tunisia) and diphtheria, whooping cough and tetanus (Mauritius, Pakistan, Austria, Colombia, Peru), the latter chiefly through aid for vaccine production. The Board was interested in possible UNICEF aid for trachoma control on a large scale in areas where it constitutes a major child health problem, at such time as current experiments in mass control reach a stage where they can be technically recommended. The campaign in Morocco reached 124,000 people during 1953; while final evaluation of the results can not be made for some time, a constant evaluation is being made by the Government and by a WHO expert on trachoma. The campaign in Tunisia started in December 1953.

Child Nutrition: The Board approved a total of $2,247,500 for child nutrition projects. These included long-range feeding, and milk and other food conservation projects in 26 countries, and a group training course in milk quality control, held in Rome during 1953. Aid for milk and other food conservation projects accounted for 18.2 per cent of all long-range aid approved in 1953, while 7.6 per cent of this amount was allocated for long-range feeding. The percentage of total long-range aid for each area allocated to child nutrition in 1953 was as follows:

Area	Long-Range Feeding	Milk Conservation
Africa	1.4%	—
Asia	1.6	8.9
Eastern Mediterranean	12.7	17.4
Europe	—	79.6
Latin America	23.6	39.4
Projects benefiting more than one region	—	3.4

Aid for long-range feeding totalled $662,500 for fifteen countries:

Africa: $8,000 for Belgian Congo and Ruanda Urundi.

Asia: $75,800 for the Philippines and Thailand.

Eastern Mediterranean Region: $122,000 for Iraq.

Latin America: $456,700 for Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, Panama, Paraguay, Peru.

During 1953, a peak figure of half a million children and mothers received daily rations from UNICEF-assisted long-range nutrition programmes in nineteen countries, as follows:

Area	No. of Countries	No. of Children and Mothers
Africa	3	37,000
Asia	1	100,000
Eastern Mediterranean	3	11,000
	19	505,200

Aid for milk and other food processing totalled $1,585,000 for twelve countries and for the Rome training course:

Asia: $415,000 for India and Indonesia.

Eastern Mediterranean Region: $167,000 for Egypt, Iran, Iraq, Turkey.

Europe: $230,000 for Greece and Yugoslavia.

Latin America: $763,000 for Brazil, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras.

Assistance benefiting more than one region: $10,000 for milk conservation group training.

By the end of 1953, UNICEF had approved aid for milk or other food conservation in 23 countries. In six of these countries, assistance for eight dry milk plants, one food processing plant and 92 fluid milk plants had been completed. In seventeen of these countries, aid for thirteen dry milk plants, one soya milk plant and 44 fluid milk plants was in various stages of completion.

In 1953, the Board, for the first time, approved assistance for a milk conservation project in Asia (India) to produce dried buffalo milk and for a project to produce powdered vegetable milk from the soya bean (Indonesia). The latter represents the first effort by UNICEF to increase the use of local, protein-rich foods in countries where milk is scarce. Through a special report on the milk conservation programmes (E/ICEF/234), the Board's attention was directed not only to the impact of the projects in providing safe milk but also to the significant contribution made by the projects to the agricultural economy of the countries.

2. Finances

The following 55 governments contributed $14,266,000 to UNICEF in 1953:

Afghanistan, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Cambodia, Canada, Ceylon, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, France, Germany, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Jordan, Korea, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Malaya, Monaco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Peru, Philippines, Singapore, Sweden, Switzerland, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Vatican City State, Vietnam, Yugoslavia.

Of this group, eight governments were contributing to UNICEF for the first time: Cambodia, Ethiopia, Ireland, Korea, Monaco, Nicaragua, Vatican City State and Vietnam.

The largest contribution, $9,814,333, was made by the United States Government. On a per capita basis, the ten largest government contributors in 1953 were as follows: New Zealand, United States, Monaco, Canada, Liechtenstein, Switzerland, Thailand, Sweden, Australia, Nicaragua.

There has been a steady upward increase in contributions from governments since 1950. The amount contributed by governments in 1953 was 32 per cent higher than in 1952 and 80 per cent higher than in 1950. The number of contributing governments was 41 per cent higher in 1953 than in 1952 and 83 per cent higher than in 1950.

UNICEF income from private sources for 1953 totalled $828,000, of which $651,000 came from the proceeds of fund-raising campaigns and the United Nations Day collections. The remaining $177,000 came from individuals, private groups and a Halloween collection carried out by children in the United States, and compared with $99,000 received from similar sources in 1952.

UNICEF received $428,000 from UNRRA residual assets in 1953, as compared with $137,000 in 1952. Miscellaneous income for the year amounted to $655,000. The total income for the year from all sources was $1,677,000.

Target Programme of Allocations: The Executive Board, in September 1953, approved $20,000,000 as the target programme of allocations for the calendar year 1954, the same level as for 1953. Of the total approved for project aid (exclusive of freight and administrative and operational services), 84.5 per cent was set aside for long-range aid and 15.5 per cent for emergency situations.

The target did not include local expenses incurred by the countries in connexion with the UNICEF-assisted programmes; in the past, for every $1 allocated by UNICEF, assisted governments have spent or committed an average of $1.55.

Fund Raising Activities: In March 1953, the Sub-Committee on Fund Raising of the Programme Committee reported to the Executive Board on three meetings held in early 1953, at which relations with the General Assembly's Negotiating Committee on Extra-Budgetary Funds, the use of prominent personalities for fund-raising purposes, and the status of the organization of UNICEF National Committees were discussed.

In November 1953, the Sub-Committee held another meeting and agreed that the Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds should be requested to authorize its chairman to ask governments to consider making contributions to UNICEF. Accordingly, by the end of the year, 31 letters had been sent. Letters were not sent to governments which had recently announced contributions for 1953 or to which, for other reasons, it was considered advisable to delay a formal approach.

The Sub-Committee also considered ways in which UNICEF public information activities could be further improved and reaffirmed its belief that the development of UNICEF National Committees was an important part of UNICEF's public information programme. In some cases, these committees are sub-committees of United Nations Association organizations, while in others they represent continuing efforts of the United Nations Appeal for Children (UNAC) groups. The Sub-Committee expressed the opinion that a tie-in with United Nations Association organizations might offer advantages both to UNICEF and to the Associations.

3. Co-operation with Other United Nations Agencies

An essential factor in UNICEF's operation is the collaboration with related specialized agencies and departments of the United Nations. Such collaboration ensures that UNICEF supplies and equipment, and the plans of operations for which they are approved, are technically sound and that governments will receive necessary related technical advice and services. In addition, UNICEF co-operates with WHO and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) through certain committees created to study problems of mutual interest.

For example, in addition to the UNICEF/WHO Joint Committee on Health Policy (see above), an FAO/WHO/UNICEF committee, known as the "Inter-Agency Working Group on Milk and Milk Products", was formed in December 1952 to consider problems of mutual interest in the field of milk conservation and to act in an advisory capacity with regard to national legislation and sanitary regulations governing milk quality control. Its first major accomplishment was the development of a training course in milk quality control, which was held in Rome in October to November 1953.

In August 1953 two training courses with representatives from Latin American countries were held simultaneously in San Jose, Costa Rica, one on school feeding and the other on improving milk production. The former was sponsored by FAO (which assumed the international financial obligations), UNICEF and the Ministry of Public Health of Costa Rica in collaboration with the Institute of Nutrition for Central America and Panama (INCAP). The latter was organized by FAO, with the Ministry of Agriculture of Costa Rica as host; UNICEF and INCAP took an active part in the conference through the participation of staff members. The course dealt more with the basic problems of milk production than with the problems of milk quality control considered by the Rome seminar.

4. Co-operation with Non-Governmental Organizations

Close relationship is also maintained between UNICEF and international non-governmental organizations. A number of such organizations have passed resolutions requesting national member organizations to give active help to UNICEF through such means as educating the public, pressing for government contributions, establishing national committees.

At its meeting on 15 October 1953, the Non-Governmental Organizations Committee on UNICEF approved a four-point programme of action for 1954 in the fields of: maternal and child welfare centres, national UNICEF committees, utilization of voluntary resources, and nutrition. The purpose of the programme is to stimulate additional voluntary effort in carrying out UNICEF-assisted projects, and to enable the Non-Governmental Organizations Committee to make a constantly increasing contribution to UNICEF, although the activities of the Committee are not limited to the efforts outlined above.

5. Continuation of UNICEF

The Social Commission, at its ninth session from 4 to 20 May 1953, proposed a draft resolution (E/2437 A) for adoption by the Economic and Social Council, by which the Council would express its opinion that the regulations which governed UNICEF had enabled it to achieve satisfactory techniques, to acquire valuable experience, and to accomplish its tasks successfully, and would recommend that the Assembly reaffirm the pertinent provisions of its resolutions 57(I) and 417(V)¹⁶⁷ with the exception of any reference to time limits contained in these resolutions.

The Council considered the question at its sixteenth session at its 732nd and 733rd plenary meetings on 20 July 1953. In addition to the report of the Social Commission (E/2437), it had before it two reports of the Executive Board of UNICEF, which had also been before the Social Commission. The first of these (E/2430) set forth the basic principles under which the Fund operates and the major programming and financial trends since its inception, and the second (E/2409) presented a synthesis of the observations of the members of the Executive Board at its March 1953 session on the work of UNICEF.

In the general discussion on the future of UNICEF, the Council unanimously paid tribute, as had the Social Commission, to the work of UNICEF and to the principles of its administration. UNICEF, by its far-reaching effects, had brought help to millions of children throughout the world, particularly in under-developed areas. Among others, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France and India expressed satisfaction with the excellent co-operation between UNICEF and the specialized agencies and hoped that such co-operation would continue.

The majority expressed the hope that contributions would be forthcoming in amounts sufficient to enable UNICEF to continue to work effectively. In this connexion, the representatives of Belgium, Egypt and Yugoslavia announced their Governments' contributions to either the 1953 or 1954 budgets, and the representative of Uruguay stated that his Government was studying the possibility of making an additional grant. The representative of Turkey also indicated the amounts his Government was intending to pay towards the aid being given Turkey by UNICEF. The Australian representative, while supporting the continuation of UNICEF, emphasized that it was essential that the Fund should have the guarantee of continued financial support. If that support were not forthcoming, his Government, he stated, would have to review its attitude.

The majority noted with approval that, during the last two years, the emphasis of UNICEF's activities had shifted from Europe to under-developed countries and from emergency to long-range programmes for economic and social development, but agreed that it was important to continue to render emergency aid when necessary. The representative of China stressed that countries outside Europe were three years behind so far as assistance from UNICEF was concerned; therefore, they should certainly not be regarded as no longer in need of any but long-term assistance. It would be regrettable, he thought, if the change of emphasis should debar those countries from benefiting from the emergency programmes in which they stood of such need.

In view of the change of emphasis and the fact that UNICEF was not only concerned with international emergency situations, the representatives of Argentina, France, India, the Philippines and the United States presented a joint amendment (E/L.524) to the draft resolution recommended by the Social Commission (E/2437 A) to:

(1) change the name of the organization to the United Nations Children's Fund, retaining the symbol UNICEF;

¹⁶⁷ See Y.U.N., 1946-47, pp. 163-64 and Y.U.N., 1950, p. 621.

- (2) provide for a periodic review of UNICEF's work;
- (3) request the Secretary-General to ensure effective co-ordination with other United Nations agencies and to report thereon; and
- (4) commend UNICEF, the United Nations Secretariat and the specialized agencies for their close working relations and request that they strengthen them.

The joint amendment was adopted unanimously and the draft resolution, as thus amended, was also adopted unanimously by the Council at its 733rd meeting on 20 July.

By this resolution (495(XVI)), the Council recommended that the General Assembly:

- (1) reaffirm the pertinent provisions of its resolutions 57(I) and 417(V) with the exception of any reference to time limits contained in those resolutions;
- (2) change the name of the organization to the United Nations Children's Fund, retaining the symbol UNICEF;
- (3) request the Council to continue to review periodically the work of UNICEF and to make recommendations to the Assembly as appropriate;
- (4) request the Secretary-General to ensure that the programme carried out by UNICEF should continue to be co-ordinated effectively with the regular and technical assistance programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies and to report thereon to the Council in 1954 and subsequently as appropriate; and
- (5) that the Assembly commend UNICEF, the United Nations Secretariat and the specialized agencies concerned for the close working relations which have developed progressively, and request them to strengthen those relations in giving full effect to the desires of the General Assembly as expressed in General Assembly resolution 417(V) and in this resolution.

At its eighth session, the General Assembly considered the question of continuing UNICEF at its 451st and 452nd plenary meetings, on 5 and 6 October 1953. It had before it, inter alia, the report (E/2430) of the Executive Board of UNICEF, and a note by the Secretary-General (A/2467) indicating the action taken by the Council. Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, France, Greece, India, Iraq and the Philippines submitted a joint draft resolution (A/L.163) containing the text recommended by the Council.

Opening the debate, the representative of Iraq said that UNICEF was currently assisting more than 200 child-care projects in 75 countries. The major categories of these projects were: maternal and child welfare; control of malaria; BCG vaccination and other tuberculosis control; child nutrition; and control of communicable diseases and emergency aid projects. He recalled that the United States had thus far contributed over $97,250,000 to the Fund and other governments approximately a total of $45 million. He stressed that, moreover, these amounts did not take into account the extensive "internal matching" of governments. Out of every dollar spent on child-care projects the local government concerned was spending 61 cents, as compared to 39 cents contributed by UNICEF.

The representative of Australia and others stressed that no other voluntarily financed programme had had such a high proportion of support from under-developed countries as had UNICEF. The representative of the United States announced that her Government would shortly contribute $9,814,333 for the year 1953.

The Canadian representative said that his Government would maintain its financial support of the Fund, but that the amount of Canada's contribution for the coming year would be related to the support which the Fund received from other countries. The representatives of the United Kingdom, Syria, the Dominican Republic and Egypt also indicated that their Governments would consider making contributions in the following year.

Summing up the debate, in which the majority had praised the achievements of UNICEF, the President said that the General Assembly's unanimous support for the continuation of the United Nations Children's Fund was a recognition of the Fund's success in reaching tens of millions of children, not only in times of emergency but also with long-term and more permanent assistance. The joint draft resolution (A/L.163) was adopted unanimously at the Assembly's 452nd plenary meeting on 6 October as resolution 802(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering the world-wide disproportion between the magnitude of social service tasks to be undertaken and the available means of implementation,

"Considering the role that the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund plays in the whole international programme for the protection of the child,

"Considering that the Fund's activities are useful, not only because they realize some of the high objectives which have been adopted by the United Nations, but also because they create favourable conditions for the development of the long-range economic and social programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, particularly the World Health Organization and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations,

"Considering the urgent need for continuing the work of UNICEF, particularly in the under-developed regions of the world,

"Considering that the number of governments making contributions to UNICEF has increased constantly since 1950,

"1. Affirms that the regulations which govern the activity of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund have enabled it to achieve satisfactory techniques, to acquire valuable experience and to accomplish its task successfully;

"2. Reaffirms the pertinent provisions of General Assembly resolutions 57(I) and 417(V), with the exception of any reference to time-limits contained in these resolutions;

"3. Decides to change the name of the organization to the United Nations Children's Fund, retaining the symbol UNICEF;

"4. Requests the Economic and Social Council to continue to review periodically the work of UNICEF and to make recommendations to the General Assembly as appropriate;

"5. Requests the Secretary-General:

"(a) To ensure that the programmes carried on by UNICEF continue to be co-ordinated effectively with the regular and technical assistance programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies;

"(b) To report thereon to the Economic and Social Council in 1954 and subsequently as appropriate;

"6. Commends UNICEF, the United Nations Secretariat and the specialized agencies concerned for the close working relations which have developed progressively and requests them to strengthen those relations in giving full effect to the desires of the Assembly as expressed in resolution 417(V) and the present resolution."

Q. POPULATION AND MIGRATION QUESTIONS

The Population Commission held its seventh session from 19 to 30 January 1953 at United Nations Headquarters. It reviewed its work programme in the light of its terms of reference and considered that major progress had been made, in particular in the improvement of the quantity and quality of demographic data. It also considered, on the basis of a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.9/94), the progress of the various studies in course of preparation. These included work in connexion with the interrelationships of population trends and economic and social factors; migration; mortality; fertility; population estimates and forecasts; demographic aspects of the problem of aging; demographic aspects of labour supply, employment and unemployment; the population of Trust Territories; survey of demographic legislation; the demographic dictionary; and demographic aspects of technical assistance.

The Commission considered that first priority should be given to the preparatory work for the World Population Conference and to early completion of those projects which were already far advanced. It felt that certain other projects should be deferred to allow for a greater concentration of effort on those studies which could advance the priority programmes of the United Nations in the economic and social fields, namely:

(1) studies of interrelationships of demographic, economic and social factors;

(2) analyses of future population trends;

(3) studies of migration, both international and internal; and

(4) continuing Secretariat services including technical assistance.

At the request of the USSR and the Ukrainian SSR representatives the Commission included in its report a statement of their views. In their opinion, undue importance had been given to the study of secondary questions; higher priority should be accorded to the study of important social problems, such as the demographic aspects of unemployment, the demographic situation and living conditions of the people in the Trust Territories, and the living conditions of migrants in the countries of immigration.

The report of the Population Commission (E/2359) was considered by the Economic and Social Council at its fifteenth session, at the 227th and 228th meetings of its Social Committee on 7 April, and at its 685th plenary meeting on 14 April 1953.

The majority of the Council expressed satisfaction with the work of the Commission and with the studies being undertaken by the Secretariat. The representative of Argentina considered that undue emphasis was placed on data relating to the individual and not sufficient emphasis on the family as the basic element of the social structure. He also considered that more attention should be attached to qualitative methods in studying human groups. The representative of Yugoslavia suggested that States should be represented on the Commission by demographic experts or by economists readily able to understand demographic problems, and that it should be tacitly agreed that the Commission's members should be elected for two consecutive terms. A number of representatives, in particular those of Argentina, France, Egypt and the United Kingdom, emphasized the need for co-ordinating the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies in the demographic field.

A draft resolution proposed by the United States (E/AC.7/L.134) (with an oral amendment by Sweden, accepted by the sponsor, to refer to the Statistical as well as the Population Commission) was adopted by the Social Committee by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. (For resolution as adopted, see below.) Previously, the Committee rejected, by 16 votes to 2, a USSR amendment to delete a reference to internal migration.

The draft resolution (E/2392 A) was adopted by the Social Committee at its 228th meeting by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and by the Council at its 685th plenary meeting on 14 April, by the same vote, as resolution 471 A-(XV). The United Kingdom representative stated that he had voted for the resolution on the understanding that the analyses of future population trends provided for in the resolution included the recent rise of the birth-rate in certain countries.

In resolution 471 A (XV), the Council took note of the report, expressed its satisfaction with the progress made by the Population Commission, in co-operation with the Statistical Commission, in improving the quality and availability of basic demographic information and in creating a continuing programme for further improvement, and welcomed the decision of the Commission to concentrate its efforts and resources on three major lines of work now under way, namely: (a) studies of the interrelationship of demographic, economic and social factors; (b) analyses of future population trends; and (c) studies of migration, international and internal. The principal questions dealt with by the Commission and the Council are indicated below.

1. Demographic Aspects of Problems of Economic and Social Development

a. INTERRELATIONSHIPS OF DEMOGRAPHIC, ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL FACTORS

The Commission was informed that the revision of the report "Determinants and Consequences of Population Trends", which presents a summary of the findings of studies of the interrelationships of demographic, economic and social factors, was nearing completion. It recommended the publication of the report as soon as possible and expressed the hope that concrete studies likely to throw light on these interrelationships might be undertaken in the various countries. It suggested that such studies should be based on as complete an objective observation of the facts as possible.

The Commission also examined a memorandum (E/CN.9/98) by the Secretary-General which listed major gaps, revealed in the preparation of this report, in current knowledge of relationships between population trends and economic and social conditions. The list, which was confined to topics of prime importance on which there were practical possibilities of obtaining valuable results from further studies, mentioned, inter alia:

the relative importance of the various factors affecting mortality;

the effect of changing economic conditions, in particular the economic development of under-developed areas, upon the trend of fertility in various cultural settings;

the related question of the reasons for the increase in the annual birth rate, particularly in industrialized countries, during and after the war; and the interrelationships of demographic, social and economic factors in migration, in particular the effects of international immigration and emigration on population growth.

Some members of the Commission suggested modifications to the list, stressing, for example, the importance of internal migration in some under-developed countries and that of social organization as it affects population trends in relation to economic development. The Commission asked the Secretary-General to reconsider the list of topics in the light of the views expressed in the Commission, to publish the revised list and to communicate it to governmental and non-governmental agencies and private research institutions interested in population studies, as well as to experts in the field of demography, and invite their comments on the feasibility of carrying out studies on these topics; to report to the Commission on the replies received; and to call attention to these gaps at the World Population Conference.

Since the revised report "Determinants and Consequences of Population Trends" was not yet available, the Council had before it a memorandum (E/AC.7/L.132) by the Secretary-General on "Relation of Population Trends to Problems of Economic and Social Development", summarizing the report. The memorandum stressed the importance of taking into account the influence of contemplated measures for economic and social development upon the population trend and of understanding the possible consequences of population changes. It also pointed out the particular difficulties caused by the fact that the most rapid increases of population were currently taking place in under-developed countries.

During the Council's discussions at its fifteenth session, the importance of analysing the data in order to enable conclusions to be drawn was stressed by the representatives of Belgium and the United States. Certain representatives, including those of the United States and Yugoslavia, referred to the particular importance of the question in under-developed areas. The representative of India considered that demographic problems in under-developed countries could best be met by dealing with economic rather than with biological factors. The Egyptian representative thought such problems could be solved, not only by economic development, but also by a better distribution of the world's material resources.

The Council's Social Committee, by 14 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, adopted two United States amendments (E/AC.7/L.133), the first to provide that the Council refer to the summary of the report rather than to the report itself; and the second, as amended orally by the Philippines, to draw the attention of governments to the importance of obtaining fuller information on the subject.

The amended draft resolution was adopted by the Social Committee at its 227th meeting, by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions (E/2392 B), and by the Council at its 685th plenary meeting on 14 April by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 471 B (XV).

In this resolution, the Council drew the attention of Member States to the importance of obtaining fuller information on, and considering the interrelationships between, population changes and the economic and social changes in developing various portions of their economic and social programmes aimed at raising the standard of living of their peoples.

The Population Commission at its seventh session discussed studies within various under-developed countries which the Council, in resolution 308 D (XI), had declared to be valuable in the consideration of the problem of technical assistance, namely, studies of the possible effects of various types of developmental measures upon population growth, and of the social and economic consequences of population growth.

The Commission was informed of the progress being made in the study of population in relation to social and economic conditions in Mysore State, India, which had been undertaken jointly by the United Nations and the Government of India (E/CN.9/94). The Commission was also informed of the negotiations being conducted with that Government regarding the possible extension of co-operative population studies in India and of the efforts of the Secretary-General to explore the possibilities of carrying out similar studies in other countries (E/CN.9/94). The Commission recommended that the Secretary-General co-operate in studies of this type with Member Governments requesting such co-operation on the widest scale compatible with the priorities established by the Commission.

b. ANALYSIS OF THE RESULTS OF POPULATION CENSUSES TAKEN IN AND AROUND 1950

The Population Commission at its seventh session considered the large amount of information concerning demographic, economic and social conditions obtained in the national population censuses taken in and around 1950 and noted that little could be achieved unless the statistics made available were analysed to determine their bearing on programmes of action. It listed ten topics as particularly important for study where relevant information had been obtained in the censuses:

- (1) completeness and accuracy of census results and comparability with earlier censuses;
- (2) size, density, and geographical distribution of population in relation to natural resources;
- (3) trends and characteristics of urban and rural population;
- (4) structure of the population with special regard to age groups, economically active and inactive groups, social classes, and (where relevant) ethnic groups and nationalities;
- (5) trends in mortality, fertility, and family size for the country and its subdivisions;
- (6) fertility and mortality differentials between regions, economic groups, social classes, and (where relevant) ethnic groups, nationalities, etc.;
- (7) prospects for future population growth, with special reference to labour supply and employment;
- (8) internal and external migration and their effects on the age structure, labour force, and other demographic characteristics of the country and its subdivisions;
- (9) composition of the population with reference to occupation, industry, status, and social classes; and
- (10) economic and social conditions such as labour supply, housing, standard of living, education, and social welfare measures.

During the Council's discussions at its fifteenth session, the representative of Venezuela referred to the value of the 1950 census taken in his country. The United Kingdom representative considered that, in technical assistance programmes, preferential treatment could not be given to censuses.

The draft resolution proposed by the Commission (E/2359 B) was adopted by the Social Committee (E/2392 C) at its 227th meeting on 7 April, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and, by the same vote, by the Council at its 685th plenary meeting on 14 April, as resolution 471 C (XV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Having in mind the great potential value of the results of the population censuses taken in various countries during recent years as a basis for analytical studies which would elucidate major social and economic problems facing Member States,

"1. Invites the governments of those countries and territories where population censuses have recently been taken, or will be taken in the near future, to prepare analytical studies based on either complete or sample tabulations of census results, devoting primary attention to those demographic topics which are of foremost importance to their programmes of economic and social development and taking into account, in the selection of topics, the views on this matter expressed by the Population Commission at its seventh session;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to give, within the limits of the resources available and in accordance with the work priorities, appropriate technical assistance to those governments requesting aid in order to help them carry out analytical studies of their census results."

c. FERTILITY AND MORTALITY STUDIES IN UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

The Population Commission noted that information on trends in fertility and mortality rates and their effects on population changes are of major importance in the long-range planning of economic and social development programmes, and pointed out that in under-developed countries these trends cannot be predicted with assurance on the basis of existing knowledge. The Commission recommended that the Secretary-General continue to explore the possibilities of intensive field studies of factors affecting these rates and trends in areas where large-scale development programmes are under way and that he extend the fullest possible co-operation to interested governments and agencies within the resources available and the priorities established by the Commission.

d. POPULATION ESTIMATES AND FORECASTS

The Commission was informed (E/CN.9/94) of the progress being made in compiling population and manpower projections. It considered that this work should be continued and that special attention should be paid to the under-developed countries where there existed a sufficient statistical basis.

2. Demographic Seminars

The Commission at its seventh session examined a report prepared by the Secretary-General on plans for regional seminars in the field of population (E/CN.9/105), one to be held in Latin America, and another in Southeast Asia. The Commission's view was that a third seminar to be held in the Middle East was highly desirable. The representative of Egypt expressed support in the Economic and Social Council for this recommendation.

3. World Population Conference

The Population Commission at its seventh session reviewed plans for the World Population Conference to be held in 1954, as authorized by Economic and Social Council resolution 435 (XIV), and considered the preliminary agenda of the Conference contained in the report of the Preparatory Committee (E/CONF.13/PC/1).¹⁶⁸ The Commission called attention to the desirability of focusing the Conference on the main population problems confronting the world, and to the danger that the Conference might lose in effectiveness if too many topics were included in the agenda. During the Council's discussions at its fifteenth session, the representatives of Australia, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia also emphasized this point.

The Commission was also informed that, after the Council had authorized the holding of the Conference with the stipulation that it be convened "at the site which will involve the least cost to the United Nations, but at Geneva, if in Europe", the Italian Government had offered to contribute 25,000 dollars toward the financing of the Conference, if it should take place in Rome. The Preparatory Committee had recommended that the Conference be held in Rome. The majority of members of the Council were in favour of accepting the Italian Government's offer, in the absence of any financial objection. A draft resolution proposed jointly by Argentina, Belgium, Cuba and Uruguay (E/AC.7/L.135) was adopted by the Social Committee (E/2392 E) at its 228th meeting on 7 April, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and, by the same vote, by the Council at its 685th plenary meeting on 14 April, as resolution 471 E (XV).

By this resolution, the Council modified paragraph 6 of its resolution 435 (XIV) to read as follows:

"Authorizes the Secretary-General to convene the Conference at a site which will involve the least cost to the United Nations, but at Geneva or Rome if in Europe."

4. Migration

a. DEMOGRAPHIC ASPECTS OF MIGRATION

The Population Commission at its seventh session reviewed the international programme of studies on migration, considering the value of the results as an aid to national governments and international bodies in the formulation of co-ordinated migration policies and the planning of related programmes in the social and economic fields.

In this connexion the Commission considered two documents submitted by the Secretary-General: (1) a report on the progress made since its last session in various migration studies (E/CN.9/100); and (2) a summary of the results of studies of international migration undertaken by the United Nations and the specialized agencies since 1946 (E/CN.9/109).

The Secretary-General reported that reports on the following subjects would be completed during 1953:

(1) The revised study "Elements of Immigration Policy" (previously entitled "Prerequisites to Immigration") prepared jointly by the United Nations and interested specialized agencies;

(2) Sex and age of international migrants: statistics for 1918-1947;

(3) Economic characteristics of international migrants: statistics for selected countries, 1918-1950;

(4) Methodological problems in statistics on economic characteristics of international migrants; and

(5) Analytical bibliography of sources of migration statistics.

The Commission requested the Secretary-General, in co-operation with ILO and other interested specialized agencies, to publish these reports as soon as possible. During the Council's discussions at its fifteenth session, certain representatives, including those of Australia and the United States, also called attention to the value of these reports.

In the discussions in the Commission and the Economic and Social Council certain representatives, including, in the Council, the representatives of the Philippines and the United States, expressed the view that internal migration was an important factor in the demographic, economic and social development of many countries and deserved more attention than it had received. Others, in particular the representative of the USSR, considered that questions relating to internal migration were properly the concern of national governments only, and not of international organizations.

The Social Committee, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, adopted a United States amendment (E/AC.7/L.133) to delete from the Commission's draft resolution (E/2359 C) clauses relating to particular types of technical assistance in order, the United States representative explained, to avoid giving the impression that more importance was attached to technical assistance programmes relating to the study of migration than to other such programmes. The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Social Committee (E/2392 D), by 16 votes to 2, at its 227th meeting on 7 April.

At its 685th plenary meeting on 14 April, the Council, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, adopted a Swedish amendment (E/L.491), requesting the Secretary-General to report only on the implementation of paragraph 3 on technical assistance activities and not on the resolution as a whole. At the same meeting, the Council adopted the amended resolution by 15 votes to 2, with 1 abstention, as resolution 471 D (XV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Considering the importance of internal migration in connexion with economic progress and the attendant social and political phenomena, especially in the economically under-developed countries, and noting that in these countries internal migration has not been sufficiently studied, and

"Paying due attention to the priorities established for the implementation of the work programme of the Population Commission,

"1. Recommends that Member States continue to give special attention to the problem of internal migration and its social and economic implications, particularly within a process of economic development;

"2. Invites Member States to take appropriate action with a view to improving the statistical and demographic information in the field of internal migration;

"3. Recommends that the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the appropriate specialized agencies, aid those Member States requesting technical assistance pertaining to the field of internal migration;

"4. Calls the attention of Member States having similar problems relating to internal migration to the advantage of conducting joint studies, and further directs the attention of the regional economic commissions to the importance of internal migration especially in connexion with economic development;

"5. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Population Commission at its eighth session on the implementation of paragraph 3 of the present resolution."

During the consideration by the General Assembly, at its eighth session, of chapters IV and V (concerning social questions and human rights) of the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2430) a draft resolution on the subject of internal migration was submitted jointly by Brazil, Indonesia, Mexico and Peru (A/C.3/L.363/Rev.1). This draft was referred to during the general debate on these chapters at the Third Committee's 503rd to 511th meetings, from 22 October to 3 November 1953, and was discussed and voted on at the 511th meeting.

In addition to the sponsors, the representatives of China, Iraq and Syria spoke in favour of the draft resolution. The sponsors of the draft resolution stressed the importance of obtaining increased knowledge of the processes of internal migration and urbanization occurring in a number of economically under-developed countries and pointed out the many ways in which further economic development was interrelated with problems of encouraging and planning internal migration. The representatives of Peru and Syria drew attention to the fact that the draft resolution stipulated that the suggested programme of studies should be drawn up within presently available resources and that, therefore, no additional financial burden would be imposed.

The USSR representative stated his opposition to the draft resolution, on the ground that internal migration fell entirely within the domestic jurisdiction of States and thus outside the competence of the United Nations. On the other hand, the representative of Syria considered that no interference with the internal jurisdiction of States should be feared, as the draft resolution specifically stipulated that studies should only be carried out when requested by the countries concerned. The representative of China believed that the question was primarily the concern of each government but that sample studies made by a United Nations organ in some countries would be of interest to others.

The Third Committee adopted the joint draft resolution at its 511th meeting on 3 November by 40 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions (A/2373 I).

It was adopted by the General Assembly at its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November 1953, by 49 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions. Resolution 733 (VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering the close connexion existing between internal movements of population and economic and social progress in the economically less developed countries,

"Noting with satisfaction that the Economic and Social Council, in examining the work of the Population Commission, has recently paid attention to the problems of internal migration (resolution 471 D (XV) of 14 April 1953) which have generally not been sufficiently studied,

"1. Invites the Economic and Social Council, in co-operation with the International Labour Organisation and other interested agencies, to develop, within available resources, an appropriate programme of studies on internal migration, especially in the economically less developed countries, to be carried out at the request of the countries concerned;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to communicate to the Economic and Social Council, for its guidance and information, the records of the debate on this question in the General Assembly at its eighth session."

The Population Commission considered the necessity, emphasized in General Assembly resolution 624(VII),¹⁶⁹ of orienting the programme of work on migration to produce results of practical value for co-ordinated international effort. It noted that the work of international agencies has hitherto been concerned largely with the short-term problems of refugees and displaced persons, and recommended that more exhaustive study should be made of the relationship between migration and population trends in order to determine the longer range factors to be taken into account in the formulation of migration policies. The Commission further recommended that the Secretary-General, in co-operation with ILO and other interested agencies, prepare a summary of international migratory movements since 1950.

b. SOCIAL ASPECTS OF MIGRATION

(D Recognition and Enforcement Abroad of Maintenance Obligations)

In accordance with Council resolution 390 H (XIII)¹⁷⁰ concerning the recognition and enforcement abroad of maintenance obligations, a committee of experts, appointed by the Secretary-General, met in August 1952. The Committee prepared two international instruments—a draft convention on the recovery abroad of claims for maintenance and a draft of a model convention on the enforcement abroad of maintenance orders.

The Committee's report (E/AC.39/1) was submitted to the Council at its fifteenth session, but the Council, at its 673rd plenary meeting on 31 March, decided to postpone consideration of the question until its seventeenth session.

The question was, however, discussed by the General Assembly at its eighth session in connexion with the Assembly's consideration of chapters IV and V (concerning social questions and human rights) of the report of the Economic and Social Council. References were made to the subject in the general debate on these chapters which took place at the Third Committee's 503rd to 511th meetings from 22 October to 3 November. Certain representatives, in particular those of Denmark and Greece, expressed the view that the problem was important and extremely urgent.

A joint draft resolution submitted by Brazil, Denmark, Greece, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden (A/C.3/L.373) on this question was considered by the Third Committee at its 511th and 512th meetings, on 3 and 4 November. It proposed that the Assembly request the Economic and Social Council to complete its work on this question and report to the Assembly at its next regular session.

A number of representatives, including those of Belgium, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Indonesia, Israel, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, the Philippines, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay, spoke in support of the joint draft resolution. They observed that the failure to enforce maintenance obligations abroad had caused many tragedies and that a remedy was urgently needed. The joint draft resolution, in their view, was designed, not to bind those voting for it to the adoption of the relevant draft conventions on the question, but merely to ask the Council to do its best to complete a task which had been outstanding for so long.

Other representatives, however, including those of Afghanistan, Iraq and Saudi Arabia, argued that the Council's agenda was heavy, and the Third Committee ought not, therefore, to keep referring matters to it with a demand for priority. The Council, they said, had long been trying to complete its work on freedom of information, the draft Covenants on Human Rights and the right of peoples and nations to self-determination, and those items were all too often crowded off its agenda. They felt that self-determination warranted priority over the enforcement abroad of maintenance obligations, as the former question affected tens of millions while the latter affected, at most, a few hundred thousand.

The representative of Syria orally proposed that the joint draft resolution be amended so as to have the Assembly request the Council to complete its work on this question "as soon as possible", rather than by the ninth session of the Assembly.

The representative of China said that the Council might not be able to complete the work on this question in time for the Assembly's ninth session. He orally proposed that the joint draft be amended so as to insert the words "if possible" after the word "complete" in order to make it more flexible. The sponsors of the joint draft agreed to accept the Chinese amendment, in consequence of which the Syrian amendment was withdrawn.

The Third Committee at its 512th meeting on 4 November adopted the joint draft resolution, as amended, by 43 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

The representative of Afghanistan, while voting for the joint draft resolution, reserved his position on the substance of the question. The representative of Iraq declared that she had abstained because she considered that better results could be achieved through bilateral or regional action than through the United Nations.

At its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November, the General Assembly adopted the draft resolution proposed by the Third Committee (A/2573), without discussion, by 48 votes to none, with 7 abstentions, as resolution 734(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having noted that the question of the reciprocal recognition and enforcement abroad of maintenance obligations has been before the Economic and Social Council which, at its fifteenth session, decided to postpone consideration until its seventeenth session,

"Being aware of the urgent need to improve the situation of members of families whose legal supporters living in another country fail to comply with their maintenance obligations,

"Requests the Economic and Social Council to do its utmost to complete, if possible, its work on this question in such time as to enable it to report on the results to the General Assembly at its next regular session."

(2) Conference of Non-Governmental Organizations Interested in Migration

During the year under review, the United Nations sponsored, with the International Labour Office, the Fourth Conference of Non-Governmental Organizations Interested in Migration, which was held at Geneva from 11 to 15 August. The Conference, attended by representatives of 60 voluntary agencies active in this field, took action with respect to such questions as: the information to be given to migrants before their departure; minimum standards for the protection of migrants during the journey; legal assistance to migrants; integration of migrants into the life of countries of resettlement; resettlement of aged, sick and disabled refugees; problems of migrants in the professional categories.

The Conference took note of the programme established by the United Nations, the High Commissioner for Refugees, the International Labour Organisation and other specialized agencies, and the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration to relieve the plight of migrant professional workers. This programme includes:

the collection and dissemination of information on the conditions of admission and employment in immigration countries and on employment opportunities for such workers in various under-developed countries;

special action to obtain employment opportunities for refugee professional workers in various under-developed countries; employment of such workers by intergovernmental organizations in their technical assistance projects; and training to prepare refugee professional workers for their future life and work in their own or allied professions in the new countries.

The Conference recommended that the non-governmental organizations extend their activities on behalf of migrant professional workers, and agreed to co-operate in the implementation of the programme, particularly by surveying the social situation of refugee professional workers who have already emigrated and the development of employment opportunities for migrants in the professional categories.

R. NARCOTIC DRUGS

The Economic and Social Council, during its fifteenth and sixteenth sessions, dealt with the following subjects related to the control of narcotic substances: the United Nations narcotics laboratory, the report of the eighth session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, a study undertaken on the Council's request under Council resolution 436 E (XIV)¹⁷¹ on certain proposed experiments concerning the problem of the coca leaf, the report of the Permanent Central Opium Board on its work in 1952 and the report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Opium Conference, 1953.

The first subject was considered by the Council at the 681st plenary meeting of its fifteenth session on 10 April; the remainder, at its sixteenth session, at the 246th, 247th and 249th meetings of the Social Committee on 16 and 23 July, and at the 739th plenary meeting on 28 July. In addition to the report of the Social Committee (E/2490), the Council, at its sixteenth session, had before it a statement by the Secretary-General on the financial implications of the report (E/2490/Add.1), in which he estimated the total direct costs at $342,400.

1. The United Nations Narcotics Laboratory

Under the terms of Council resolutions 159 II C (VII)¹⁷² and 246 F (IX),¹⁷³ the United Nations Secretariat continued to carry out laboratory research into the nature of opium, mainly with a view to determining by chemical and physical means the geographic origin of opium. It used laboratory facilities put at its disposal on a temporary basis by the United States Government. At its seventh session, in 1952, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs had expressed the view that methods for determining the origin of opium had now been sufficiently developed to allow of a beginning to be made in putting them to practical use. It proposed that, when seizures of opium from the illicit traffic were under investigation, the Secretariat should be authorized, by arrangement with the authorities making the seizure, to examine samples of such opium and subsequently to notify the Commission of its laboratory findings.

The Commission referred to the fact that no extension of laboratory work would be possible in the premises used at present and expressed the opinion that the establishment of a permanent United Nations laboratory should not be further delayed. Such a step would also facilitate important research work which could not be undertaken currently, such as developing methods for the analysis of adulterated illicit narcotics and for the identification of synthetic narcotics seized in the illicit traffic.

As requested by the Council in resolution 436 F (XIV),¹⁷⁴ the Secretary-General submitted to the Council, at its fifteenth session, a report (E/2372) on the cost of preparing and equipping an adequate laboratory, preferably in the Headquarters building.

In his report, the Secretary-General stated that the United Nations would incur an expenditure of approximately $85,000 to $90,000 for the construction and fitting out of a laboratory plus a further $3,000 annually for maintenance. The bulk of the costs, he emphasized, related to the basic construction entailed in opening up the 39th floor of the Headquarters building—which offered the only suitable space—to accommodate the laboratory. In addition to the establishment of a laboratory, the full work programme envisaged would eventually necessitate additional staff costs of about $8,000 per year.

The Council considered the Secretary-General's report at its 681st plenary meeting on 10 April.

¹⁷⁴ See Y.U.N., 1952, p. 527.

In addition to this report, the Council had before it a draft resolution submitted by the United States (E/L.485), a note by the Secretary-General on the financial implications of that draft resolution (E/L.485/Add.1) and amendments submitted by France (E/L.486) and by Belgium (E/L.487 & Rev.1).

The United States draft resolution proposed that the Council should take note of the Secretary-General's report, should defer decision regarding changes in the existing arrangements, and should request the Secretary-General to appoint an international committee of three chemists to evaluate the progress made in developing methods to determine the origins of raw opium by chemical or physical means and to arrive at conclusions as to whether the methods had been advanced to a point where they could be given practical application. The report was to be submitted to the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, which was to transmit its recommendations to the Council at its eighteenth session, at the latest.

The Secretary-General estimated that this proposal would involve an expenditure of $3,000, assuming that the three chemists came from America, Asia and Europe, and that the committee met at Headquarters and sat for five days.

The French amendment would add a new paragraph to the United States draft resolution, to note with satisfaction the "work undertaken by the United Nations up to the present within the framework of the international programme of scientific research on narcotics".

The Belgian amendment proposed the addition of a clause to the effect that the report by the Commission on Narcotic Drugs would take into account the whole of the scientific work undertaken by the Secretariat in this field. It would also reverse the order of two paragraphs, so as to make clear, as the Belgian representative explained, that the United Nations was deferring its decision on the establishment of the laboratory pending fuller information from the Commission on Narcotic Drugs. In its revised form, the amendment proposed that the Council ask the Commission on Narcotic Drugs to submit a note on the cost of installing and equipping a United Nations laboratory at Geneva.

The representative of the United States accepted the Belgian and French amendments; he also accepted some other minor drafting amendments suggested by the representatives of Belgium, France and Yugoslavia. He, as well as the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Egypt, France, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia, spoke in support of the amended draft resolution. They felt that a further study of the question was necessary.

The representatives of Australia and the United Kingdom doubted the wisdom of entrusting Secretariat chemists with the delicate task of analysing samples of seized opium. To determine the origin of opium seized in the illicit traffic would amount, the United Kingdom representative considered, to undertaking detective work for governments which they could carry out themselves.

The Australian representative also considered that the Secretariat's work might duplicate that of national laboratories.

The representative of the United States pointed out that it was not yet possible to say whether the methods used to determine the origin of opium seized in the illicit traffic could be guaranteed as effective, and some doubts as to the value of these methods were expressed by the representatives of Belgium, France and Yugoslavia.

The representative of Egypt considered that a narcotics laboratory under the auspices of the United Nations could render useful service to countries which did not have the necessary means to undertake their own research. However, if the majority of the Council thought that such a laboratory should not be established for the moment, he would be prepared to support the United States draft resolution, as amended.

The USSR representative opposed the United States draft resolution. He considered that the control of narcotic drugs was essentially a task for governments and it was their duty to prevent any smuggling or illicit traffic. There was no provision in the Charter for creating bodies of the kind proposed and it was inadmissible, he said, that constantly increasing financial burdens should be imposed on the whole United Nations simply because one Member State or another proposed the establishment of new offices, laboratories, etc.

The Council, at its 681st plenary meeting on 10 April, adopted the amended United States draft in parts, by votes ranging from 16 to none, with 2 abstentions, to 14 to 2, with 2 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 16 votes to 2, as resolution 477(XV). It read:

"1. Takes note of the report of the Secretary-General regarding the cost of preparing and equipping a United Nations narcotics laboratory;

"2. Notes with satisfaction the work undertaken by the United Nations up to the present within the framework of the international programme of scientific research on narcotics;

"3. Defers decision regarding changes in the existing arrangements;

"4. Invites the Commission on Narcotic Drugs to transmit to the Council not later than its eighteenth session its recommendations regarding the future of the United Nations narcotics laboratory, taking into account the whole of the scientific work undertaken by the Secretariat in this field;

"5. Requests the Secretary-General:

"(a) To appoint an international committee of three chemical experts with a view to evaluating the progress made in developing methods to determine the origins of raw opium by chemical or physical means, and to arrive at conclusions as to whether the methods have been advanced to a point where they can be given practical application in the international field;

"(b) To submit the above-mentioned report to the Commission on Narcotic Drugs for its consideration;

"(c) To submit to the Commission a note on the cost of installing and equipping a United Nations laboratory at Geneva."

2. Experiments on the Problem of the Coca Leaf

The United Nations Commission of Enquiry on the Coca Leaf, set up under Council resolutions 159 IV (VII)¹⁷⁵ and 246 H (IX),¹⁷⁶ had recommended the gradual suppression of coca leaf chewing. Since there were differences of opinion between the Governments chiefly concerned (those of Bolivia and Peru) and the Commission of Enquiry as to the harmful effects of chewing the coca leaf, the possibility of conducting experiments was considered by these Governments and the Commission. These experiments were to consist of observing in selected communities the reactions of individual coca-chewers after improving their living conditions, and in particular their diet. As requested in Council resolution 436 E (XIV),¹⁷⁷ the Secretary-General submitted to the Technical Assistance Committee (TAC) a paper (E/TAC/7), prepared in co-operation with the Technical Assistance Board, on the possibility of carrying out such experiments within the framework of the existing technical assistance programme. In view of the fact that TAC had not yet reported to the Council on this subject, and as certain relevant information in connexion with one of the technical assistance projects under consideration had not yet been received from Peru, the Council, at its sixteenth session, decided to postpone the consideration of the question of these experiments until its seventeenth session.

3. Report of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs on its Eighth Session

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs held its eighth session at United Nations Headquarters from 30 March to 24 April 1953. At that session, the Commission's attention was mainly devoted to the working of the current system for the international control of narcotic drugs and to the preparation of the draft single convention designed to codify the provisions of the existing treaties.

The Commission adopted its report to the Economic and Social Council by 11 votes to 2, with 1 abstention. The representative of the USSR, explaining his vote against the report, stated that the USSR had asked the Commission to decide that certain documents which, he alleged, had been illegally placed before it should be removed from the files and that passages containing insinuations against certain governments should be deleted from other documents. As the majority of the Commission had not acceded to the "wholly justified and admissible requests of his delegation", he could not approve the report or endorse its conclusions. Furthermore, he said, the Commission, by having refused to include in the report "an exact statement of the USSR representative's views", had taken an unfair and illegal decision. The representative of Poland said that he had voted against the adoption of the report for the same reasons as had the USSR representative.

The report of the Commission was considered at the 246th and 249th meetings of the Council's Social Committee, on 16 and 23 July, and at the Council's 739th plenary meeting on 28 July. A resolution was adopted by the Social Committee at its 249th meeting (E/2490) by 15 votes to 2, and by the Council, by the same vote, (resolution 505 A (XVI)) taking note, with appreciation, of the report.

The USSR representative explained that he had voted against the resolution for the reasons given by the USSR representative at the time the Commission itself adopted the report. The various subjects discussed and the action taken by the Council on them are indicated below.

a. CONTROL AND IMPLEMENTATION OF INTERNATIONAL TREATIES ON NARCOTIC DRUGS

velopments in the field of control had occurred during the year:

Two States during 1953 became parties to the Protocol,¹⁷⁸ signed at Paris on 19 November 1948, bringing under international control drugs outside the scope of the Convention of 13 July 1931 for limiting the manufacture and regulating the distribution of narcotic drugs, as amended by the Protocol signed at Lake Success, New York, on 11 December 1946: Switzerland (18 March) and the Philippines (7 December).

The Secretary-General on 9 June 1953 transmitted to States parties to the 1931 Convention for Limiting the Manufacture and Regulating the Distribution of Narcotic Drugs and to the World Health Organization (WHO) a notification from the United States Government requesting appropriate decisions, under article 11 of the Convention, as to the status of each of the drugs 6-methyl Δ^6 -desoxymorphine and diacetyl-N-allylnormorphine and their respective salts.

On 11 December 1953, the Secretary-General transmitted, under article 11, paragraph 5, of the 1931 Convention, a notification from the Director-General of WHO containing the findings made by that body regarding the drug 6-methyl Δ^6 -desoxymorphine and its salts. In accordance with this notification, the High Contracting Parties are to apply to 6-methyl Δ^6 -desoxymorphine and its salts the regime laid down in the 1931 Convention for the drugs specified in article 1, paragraph 2, Group I, sub-group (a), thereof.

On 10 June 1953, the Secretary-General transmitted, under article 1, paragraph 1, of the 1948 Protocol, signed at Paris, a notification from the United States Government in respect of the following drugs and their respective salts:

- alpha-6-dimethylamino-4, 4-diphenyl-3-acetoxyheptane (alpha-acetylmethadol);
- alpha-6-dimethylamino-4, 4-diphenyl-3-heptanol (alpha-methadol);
- bêta-6-dimethylamino-4, 4-diphenyl-3-acetoxyheptane (bêta-acetylmethadol);
- 3-dimethylamino-1, 1-di-(2-thienyl)-1-butene;
- 3-ethylmethylamino-1, 1-di-(2-thienyl)-1-butene

On 13 November 1953, the Secretary-General transmitted, under article 1, paragraph 4, of the 1948 Protocol, a notification from the Director-General of WHO containing the findings made by that body regarding the above-mentioned drugs. In accordance with this notification, the States parties are to apply to all these drugs and their respective salts the regime laid down in the 1931 Convention for the drugs specified in article 1, paragraph 2, Group I of that Convention.

On 4 June 1953, in accordance with article 3 of the 1948 Protocol, the Secretary-General transmitted to the States parties to this Protocol, to the members of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, and to WHO a notification from the Government of Switzerland regarding the exemption from international control of the dextrorotatory isomer of 3-hydroxy-N-methylmorphinan (dextrotrphan) and the dextrorotatory isomer of 3-methoxy-N-methylmorphinan (dextromethorphan).

The Secretary-General in 1953 communicated to governments the revised form of annual reports (E/NR.1953/Form) incorporating modifications concerning prepared opium, synthetic narcotic drugs and diacetylmorphine, made by the Commission on Narcotic Drugs at its eighth session.

Pursuant to Council resolution 436 D (XIV) of May 1952,¹⁷⁹ the first list of merchant seafarers and members of the civil air crews convicted of narcotic offences on or after 1 January 1953 was circulated in 1953 to governments (E/NM.1953/1).

In the light of information given in the annual reports of governments for 1952, etc., the Division on Narcotic Drugs of the United Nations Secretariat brought up to date a list of firms authorized to manufacture and convert narcotic drugs.¹⁸⁰ A list of names and addresses of national authorities empowered to issue import certificates and export authorizations was also issued (E/NA.1953/1 & Corr.1).

The Commission reviewed, as it does each year, the implementation of treaties concerning narcotic substances. It had before it communications furnished by governments under provisions of the treaties, annual reports,¹⁸¹ laws and regulations concerning the control of narcotics,¹⁸² and reports on seizures¹⁸³ of narcotics in the illicit traffic.

The total number of annual reports received during 1952 was as follows: 114 for 1951 (57 for Metropolitan countries and 57 for territories); fifteen for 1950 (twelve for Metropolitan countries and three for territories); and two for 1949 (one for a Metropolitan country and one for a territory). In the same period, laws and regulations concerning the narcotic drugs for 30 Metropolitan countries and 29 territories were received by the Secretariat.

From 21 March 1952 to 28 February 1953, the Secretary-General received reports on 1,372 cases of seizures of narcotic drugs from the illicit traffic.

The Commission, when discussing the illicit traffic, noted problems arising from the fact that illicit manufacturers shift their establishments and skilled personnel to countries where government control is less effective. It had evidence of the existence of a large international organization. It also noted that considerable amounts of narcotics legally manufactured became available to the illicit traffickers from legal sources.

Difficulties in the international control of narcotics arising from the existence of free ports and from certain political situations were discussed in connexion with the drug situation of Tangiers and Trieste.

The Commission noted the value of regional co-operation in the fight against the illicit traffic in narcotics and decided to extend its congratulations to the Director of the Permanent Anti-Narcotics Bureau of the Arab League on the successful work reported by that Bureau.

The Commission finally requested the Secretariat to include in its periodical summaries of reports of seizures of narcotic drugs a separate section on synthetic drugs and, in the annual memorandum on the illicit traffic, a special chapter on the illicit traffic by the crews of merchant ships. It also discussed the part which members of the crew of civil aircraft played in this traffic.

b. CONTINUING PROBLEMS OF INTERNATIONAL NARCOTICS CONTROL

(1) The Question of Cannabis

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs approved the programme of studies (E/CN.7/256) relating to the question of "Indian hemp" (cannabis) and the resin of the plant, as outlined by the Secretary-General, and asked the Secretariat to carry them out, in consultation with the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) and WHO, whenever appropriate. It also decided that an additional study on the physical and mental effects of Indian hemp should be made. The representative of WHO indicated that his organization, if requested, would consider making such a study.

Some favourable information concerning the resumption of efforts to deal with the question was reported to the Commission. The production, import, export, trade in and use of "Indian hemp" and the galenical preparations containing it had been prohibited in France (including Algeria); a Moroccan decree was in preparation banning the sale of "Kif", an Indian hemp preparation, and the Government Tobacco Monopoly of Morocco had already received orders to suspend its sale as of 1 April 1953. The Bey of Tunis had issued a decree prohibiting the harvesting, production, distribution, sale, import and export of Indian hemp and its preparation "takrouiri"; but the cultivation of the Indian hemp plant for its fibre would be permitted on licence in Tunis. The Commission was also aware of the Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee (Union of South Africa) on the Abuse of Dagga (Indian hemp), issued in 1951.

(2) The Question of Synthetic Drugs

The Commission recommended that the Council:

(1) invite WHO to undertake certain studies regarding synthetic drugs; and

(2) invite governments which had acceded to the 1948 Protocol and other important drug-manufacturing countries to furnish the Secretariat with information concerning certain aspects of these drugs.

When this question was discussed by the Council's Social Committee during the sixteenth session, the representatives of Egypt, France, the United Kingdom and the United States submitted a joint proposal (E/AC.7/L.167) which, in effect, would have the Council take the action recommended by the Commission. The representative of WHO stated that his organization would gladly co-operate with the United Nations Secretariat in preparing the requisite information. The joint draft resolution was adopted by the Social Committee by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at its 249th meeting on 23 July (E/2490), and by the Council, unanimously and without discussion, at its 739th plenary meeting on 28 July, as resolution 505 C (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Considering the increasing importance of the therapeutic use of synthetic drugs throughout the world,

"Having regard to the considerable number of aspects of the problem,

"Taking into account the report submitted by the Secretary-General to the Commission on Narcotic Drugs on the problem of synthetic drugs and the recommendations of the Commission,

"1. Invites the World Health Organization to prepare, in consultation with the United Nations Secretariat, information regarding the views expressed in the technical literature on the following problems:

"(a) The addictive properties and therapeutic advantages of synthetic narcotics as compared with natural narcotics;

"(b) The status of scientific knowledge on the relationship between the chemical structure of a drug and its addictive properties;

"(c) The relationship between the strongly analgesic qualities of a drug and its addiction-producing properties; and to transmit this information to the Commission in order to enable it to give further consideration to the question of the studies required in this field and the method of carrying them out;

"2 Invites the governments represented on the Commission on Narcotic Drugs and those of other important drug-manufacturing countries to furnish the Secretariat with such information on the following subjects as they may be able to provide:

"(a) The question of the extent to which synthetic analgesics in general and synthetic opium alkaloids in particular are replacing, or are likely to replace in the future, natural narcotics made from opium and from poppy straw;

"(b) The question whether the manufacture of synthetic drugs is desirable only when it presents economic or therapeutic advantages, or whether such manufacture is desirable even where no such advantages exist;

"(c) Their view on the provisional measures referred to in part II, section 2, of document E/CN.7/259/Rev.1 and on the applicability or inapplicability of the control measures referred to in part III;

"(d) The question whether, having regard on the one hand to the control problems involved, and on the other hand to the relevant economic and therapeutic considerations, it is desirable:

"(i) To prohibit the use of synthetic drugs, or

"(ii) To limit their number;

"3. Requests the Secretariat to prepare compilations of the information so obtained and to submit them to the Commission for its consideration."

(3) Transport of Dangerous Goods

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs also considered the question as to whether and to what extent international regulations governing transport and communications should be designed to prevent illicit traffic in narcotics. After considering the work undertaken by the Transport and Communications Commission under Council resolution 379 E (XIII)¹⁸⁴ in respect of uniform regulations concerning the transport of dangerous goods, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs did not recommend that narcotic drugs should be included at present among the dangerous goods to which these regulations would apply.

(4) Co-operation with the Universal Postal Union

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs recommended to the Council several measures intended to promote co-operation between the United Nations and the Universal Postal Union in respect of control of narcotic drugs.

The Commission's draft resolution was adopted unanimously, by the Social Committee at its 249th meeting on 23 July, with the addition of clarifying amendments proposed jointly by France and the United States (E/AC.7/L.165). The resolution proposed by the Committee was, in turn, adopted unanimously by the Council at its 739th plenary meeting on 28 July, as resolution 505 D (XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Noting that the Universal Postal Convention of Brussels (1952) and related agreements contain provisions limiting the use of the mails for the shipment of narcotic drugs,

"Recognizing the need for close co-operation between the Universal Postal Union and the United Nations on matters pertaining to the international control of narcotic drugs,

"1. Requests the Secretary-General to send to the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union a list of the narcotic drugs, including synthetic drugs, which are now controlled by the international narcotics conventions for transmission to the members of the Universal Postal Union for their information and guidance;

"2. further requests the Secretary-General to consult the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union as to the arrangements which should be made both as regards supplementing this list from time to time and as regards the application to all narcotics controlled by the international narcotics conventions of the existing provisions of current international postal agreements which already apply to some narcotics;

"3. Invites the Secretary-General to compile and transmit to the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union semi-annual reports on any seizures of narcotics shipped by post that may have been effected;

"4. Considers that the question of the use of mails for the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs should be further examined, and therefore requests the Secretary-General to study this matter and report thereon to the next session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs;

"5. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit to the Director of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union the summary records of the Commission's discussion of this subject and any other relevant documentation pertaining thereto."

(5) The Problem of Drug Addiction

The problem of "drug addiction" in its subjective aspects, i.e., identification, treatment and rehabilitation of drug addicts and the underlying causes of drug addiction, has been on the agenda of several sessions of the Opium Advisory Committee of the League of Nations and of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs of the United Nations. It has been the subject of attention by many national authorities and organizations, but as yet no definite programme of international action has been agreed upon.

The governments represented on the Commission on Narcotic Drugs were invited by the Commission at its eighth session to furnish, for its ninth session, studies on drug addiction which had been published in their countries. The Commission requested the Secretariat to give relatively high priority to the study of this problem.

(6) Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs

The Commission informed the Council of the progress achieved with the preparation of a draft single convention to replace the existing multi-lateral treaties for the control of narcotics. During its eighth session, it reviewed in detail the following subjects covered in the draft convention:

- (a) the constitutional position and functions of the proposed International Narcotics Board, which, under the terms of the draft convention, would take the place of the Permanent Central Opium Board and the Drug Supervisory Body;
- (b) the secretarial services of the proposed International Narcotics Commission, which would take the place of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, as well as of the International Narcotics Board;
- (c) the national control organs;
- (d) manufacture of narcotic drugs; and
- (e) international trade in narcotic drugs.

It postponed, until its ninth session in 1954, consideration of the remaining parts of the draft convention, i.e., the internal trade in narcotics, the production of agricultural raw materials (opium, opium poppy straw, coca leaf and cannabis (Indian hemp)) from which narcotic substances may be obtained, measures of domestic supervision, penal provisions concerning illicit traffickers in narcotics, the treatment of drug addicts and the final clauses.

The Commission suggested that the proposed International Narcotics Board, a semi-judicial organ, should be composed of nine members, who should measure up to the highest standards of character and technical competence and, collectively, should possess a thorough knowledge of the legal, administrative, statistical and medical aspects of narcotics control, as well as of the conditions in different countries (drug manufacturing countries, countries producing agricultural raw materials for narcotics, countries exclusively or predominantly importers and countries which are the principal victims of the illicit traffic in narcotics). The members should also be chosen on the basis of as wide a geographic distribution as would be compatible with other requirements of competence. They should be appointed by the Council, seven from a list of candidates nominated by governments and two from a list of three persons nominated by WHO. In order to ensure close co-operation between the International Narcotics Commission and the International Narcotics Board, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs decided that the revised draft convention should authorize the new International Narcotics Commission to elect the representative of one of its members (governments) to attend the sessions of the International Narcotics Board as an observer.

Provision would be made for removal of members of the International Narcotics Board who fail to fulfil the conditions required for membership. In addition, members who failed to attend sessions four times or during a full calendar year would automatically be considered to have resigned.

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs decided, in principle, that the members of the International Narcotics Board should enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities and that the new convention should provide for adequate remuneration to them.

The proposed International Narcotics Board would take over the functions of the Permanent Central Opium Board and the Drug Supervisory Body. It would, therefore, critically review the estimates of drug requirements to be furnished by all governments on behalf of all territories for each following year, a review currently undertaken by the Drug Supervisory Body. The new Board would, if necessary, change such estimates with the consent of the government concerned and establish estimates for territories on behalf of which they had not been furnished. These estimates would, as at present, be binding, i.e., determine the amount of narcotics which each country or territory would be permitted to manufacture and import.

Under the terms of the proposed new convention, the post factum review of the narcotics situation in each country, currently undertaken by the Permanent Central Opium Board, would also be carried out by the proposed International Narcotics Board. Its powers would be considerably larger than those of the Permanent Central Opium Board and the Drug Supervisory Body. Under the existing conventions, the date by which estimates and statistical returns must be furnished is fixed by treaty provisions; the new International Narcotics Board would have the authority to fix the date by which estimates must be furnished, because of the relation these estimates would have to the sowing and harvesting of agricultural crops, which are undertaken at different times of the year in different hemispheres and climates.

Furthermore, under the existing system, the items on which governments must furnish estimates and statistics are enumerated in the texts of the conventions. The new International Narcotics Board, however, would be entitled to request governments to supply information which it might consider necessary to supplement information on subjects listed in the new convention. The new International Narcotics Commission would also have the right to amend, on recommendation of the International Narcotics Board, the list in the new convention of subjects on which governments would have to supply information. Such amendments and other decisions of the new International Narcotics Commission would be subject to review by the Economic and Social Council.

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs expressed the view that the powers of the proposed International Narcotics Board should be strengthened, and it proposed that this board be authorized to undertake, with the consent of the government concerned, local inquiries in territories in which the drug situation required clarification. The new convention would also provide for import and export embargoes which could not only be recommended, but also be imposed, by the new International Narcotics Board. In the latter case, parties to the new convention would be bound legally to obey the embargo order and an appeal would be permitted to a permanent committee, to be appointed by the International Court of Justice for a period of five years. The Commission also proposed that the new convention contain a general clause authorizing the proposed International Narcotics Board to perform "other functions necessary or useful for the application of the Convention".

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs decided to provide for a separate secretariat of the semi-judicial organ, i.e., of the International Narcotics Board. The secretariat of the new International Narcotics Commission, on the other hand, would form an integral part of the United Nations Secretariat.

The new convention, it was decided, should, in agreement with the existing treaties, require governments to maintain special machinery for the control of narcotic drugs, which should either concentrate the various functions in this field or at least co-ordinate the efforts of various governmental organs. The domestic control of the manufacture of narcotic drugs would, at the choice of the government concerned, be ensured either by a licensing system or by the establishment of a national monopoly.

Similarly, in respect of the control of the international trade, parties to the new convention would have the choice of establishing a monopoly of the foreign trade in narcotics or of securing such control by a licensing system.

In view of the close interdependence of all the sections of the new convention, the Commission decided that the further revision of the text should be postponed until it had examined in detail all the provisions of the draft.

(7) Other Measures Including Priorities

Under Council resolution 159 II B (VII),¹⁸⁵ the governments concerned were requested to report annually to the Secretary-General on the progress of suppression of opium smoking. Accordingly, the Commission on Narcotic Drugs at its eighth session examined certain reports of governments (E/CN.7/244 & Add.1-3) for 1950, 1951 and 1952. It recommended for adoption by the Council a draft resolution, one paragraph of which would have the Council express the view that no good reason could be adduced to justify the continued existence of opium smoking and that no excuse could henceforth be regarded as acceptable in this field.

When the recommendation was considered in the Council's Social Committee, an amendment was proposed jointly by the United Kingdom and India (E/AC.7/L.170) aimed at allowing for the practice of furnishing opium-smoking addicts with diminishing quantities to ensure their disintoxication. The joint amendment proposed to substitute for this paragraph a statement that the evil of opium smoking should be suppressed as speedily as possible.

The amendment was adopted by the Social Committee at its 249th meeting on 23 July by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and the amended draft resolution was adopted unanimously both by the Committee (E/2490) at the same meeting, and by the Council at its 739th plenary meeting on 28 July, as resolution 505 B (XVI).

In this resolution, the Council noted the legislative and other progress made in certain areas towards the abolition of opium smoking; expressed the desire to simplify the task of governments in carrying out their obligations in respect of the international control of narcotic drugs; and stated the view that the evil of opium smoking should be suppressed as speedily as possible. It therefore repeated its invitation to governments to suppress the practice of opium smoking as soon as possible and requested them, in the future, to include information on this subject in their annual reports to the Secretary-General under the narcotics conventions rather than in separate reports.

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs examined a preliminary list of the basic narcotic drugs (E/CN.7/247) prepared by the Secretariat in accordance with Council resolution 49(IV).¹⁸⁶ It asked the Secretariat to complete the list, to include the synonyms for those names used in various countries in the licit and illicit traffic, and to send a copy of the preliminary list to the governments mentioned therein for any necessary corrections or additions. The Commission also considered the question of the list of preparations coming under the international narcotic treaties, which was being compiled by the Secretariat under resolution 49(IV), and recommended to the Council that this should be discontinued.

The Council adopted a joint French-United Kingdom draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.166) based on the Commission's recommendation, with the addition of a Swedish amendment (E/AC.7/L.171) to state that the discontinuance should be "for the time being." The amended draft resolution was adopted by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at the Social Committee's 249th meeting on 23 July (E/2490), and by the Council at its 739th plenary meeting on 28 July, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

In this resolution (505 E (XVI)), the Council noted with satisfaction the progress made in the preparation of the list of basic drugs. Bearing in mind more urgent projects, it requested the Secretary-General to discontinue for the time being work on the publication of the list of preparations and pharmaceutical specialties containing narcotic drugs and not to make further requests for information to governments in this respect.

The Commission recommended the following order of priority for the work of the Division of Narcotic Drugs:

- (1) Performance of functions directly related to the implementation of the international treaties on narcotic drugs;
- (2) The proposed single convention on narcotic drugs;
- (3) Drug addiction;
- (4) The study of the problem of synthetic drugs;
- (5) The problem of Indian hemp;
- (6) The assay, characteristics, composition and origin of opium;

- (7) The problem of the coca leaf; and
- (8) Abolition of opium smoking.

4. Report of the Permanent Central Opium Board on its Work in 1952

At its sixteenth session, the Council reviewed the annual report for 1952 (E/OB/8) submitted to it by the Permanent Central Opium Board in accordance with article 27, as amended, of the International Opium Convention of 19 February 1925.

The Board presented a survey of the current state of narcotics control throughout the world. It noted with approval the general trend towards lower consumption of diacetylmorphine and the growing inclination of governments to prohibit the use and manufacture of this drug. The report included, as it does annually, synoptic statistical tables, with information for 1951. The Board enumerated the outstanding characteristics of the current situation as follows:

- insufficiency of the statistical returns of the principal opium-producing countries;
- impossibility of determining the production of coca leaves;
- the increasing number of narcotic drugs;
- the steady and "remarkable" increase in the consumption of codeine; and
- the increasing use of synthetic narcotics without any corresponding significant decline in the use of opium derivatives.

The Board called special attention in this report to the fact that it was an executive and not a recommending body, that its activities were prescribed by treaty provisions and had to be performed within a given time, and that, consequently, its budgetary requirements were not as susceptible of reduction or adjustment as might be the case with bodies whose activities were less definitely prescribed. The Board also expressed the view that at each stage when the budgetary estimates submitted by it were considered by the competent organs of the United Nations, it should be enabled to present its views to those organs including, if necessary, the General Assembly. The Board referred also to the fact that its members and those of the Drug Supervisory Body performed their functions, involving a continuously growing workload, without compensation. The Board considered that, if the current state of affairs were to continue, the future of these bodies might be jeopardized and concluded that the whole question of the remuneration of members of these bodies should be reviewed.

A draft resolution proposed jointly by France and the United Kingdom (E/AC.7/L.168) was adopted in three parts, the first two parts being adopted unanimously both by the Social Committee at its 249th meeting on 23 July and by the Council at its 739th meeting on 28 July, and the third part by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, by the Social Committee and by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, by the Council at the same meetings.

In the first part of this resolution (505 F. I (XVI)), the Council took note with appreciation of the report. In the second part (505 F. II (XVI)), it noted the Board's statement regarding budgetary and administrative matters and invited the Secretary-General to continue to consult with the Board from time to time regarding the arrangements necessary for its organization and working. In the third part of the resolution (505 F. III (XVI)), the Council recommended to the General Assembly that the matter of adequate remuneration of the members of the Board and Supervisory Body be given favourable consideration.

The question of the remuneration of members of the Permanent Central Opium Board and the Drug Supervisory Body was considered by the General Assembly at its eighth session, at the 403rd meeting of the Fifth Committee on 6 November. The Committee had before it a report (A/2509) by the Secretary-General and observations thereon by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, in its tenth report (A/2528) to the eighth session.

In his report, the Secretary-General gave a resume of the considerations leading to the Council's recommendation and also reviewed the practices and principles covering payments to members of other organs of the United Nations.

The Advisory Committee summarized the considerations which led the Board and the Supervisory Body to submit the matter to the Council. It expressed agreement with a proposal by the Secretary-General that he should undertake, during 1954, a full study of the question and of its relation to other United Nations bodies and that he should submit proposals to the General Assembly at its ninth session.

The representatives of Egypt and Pakistan expressed the view that, in any review of existing allowances, account should be taken of the special position of members of United Nations bodies serving in an expert capacity who are not officials of their governments and who are obliged to devote much of their time to such service.

On the proposal of the Chairman, the Fifth Committee, without objection, adopted a draft resolution (A/2571) which was adopted by the General Assembly, also without objection, at its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November as resolution 775(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting resolution 505 F. III (XVI), adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 28 July 1953, concerning the question of the remuneration of members of the Permanent Central Opium Board and the Drug Supervisory Body,

"Noting also the intention of the Secretary-General to undertake, during 1954, a comprehensive study of the system of allowances to members of commissions, committees and other subsidiary bodies of the General Assembly or other organs of the United Nations, and to submit proposals to the General Assembly at its ninth session,

"Requests the Secretary-General to circulate his proposals, together with the comments of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, to all Members four weeks before the opening of the ninth session of the General Assembly."

5. The United Nations Opium Conference, 1953

In accordance with Council resolution 436 A (XIV),¹⁸⁷ the Secretary-General convened the United Nations Opium Conference "to draft and adopt a protocol relating to the limitation of the production of opium." He invited to the Conference all Members of the United Nations, the non-member States Parties to the international conventions concerning narcotic drugs, and representatives of the specialized agencies, of the Permanent Central Opium Board (PCOB) and of the Drug Supervisory Body, in accordance with his note (E/2348 & Add.1) submitted to the Council at its resumed fourteenth session. The Council, at its 676th plenary meeting on 2 April, during the fifteenth session, adopted resolution 478(XV) requesting the Secretary-General to send invitations to Libya, Nepal, the Republic of Korea and Spain. Accordingly, these States were invited.

The Secretary-General submitted for the use of the Conference

(1) a draft protocol (E/2186, annex) for regulating the production of international and wholesale trade in and use of opium;

(2) provisional rules of procedure (E/Conf.14/13 and Corr.1 and 2);

(3) a compilation (E/Conf.14/1 & Addenda, & E/Conf.14/2) of observations of governments and of the PCOB and Drug Supervisory Body on the draft protocol;

¹⁸⁷ See Y.U.N., 1952, p. 524.

(4) technical papers (E/Conf.14/3 to 12 with certain addenda and corrigenda) on the following subjects: quasi-medical use of opium; the abolition of opium smoking, the occurrence of the opium alkaloids in opium and the poppy plant, artificial opium alkaloids, manufacture of morphine from poppy straw, legal provisions concerning national opium agencies in opium-producing countries, illicit traffic in opium, historical survey of attempts to achieve the international limitation of opium production, the status of multilateral conventions (concerning narcotic drugs), and a general note on the opium poppy; and

(5) a paper on statistics on opium, the manufacture of morphine and of synthetic narcotic drugs, for the years 1946-51 (E/Conf.14/14 & Corr.1 & Add.1 (Add.1 contains statistics for 1952)), prepared by the secretariat of PCOB.

Thirty-four¹⁸⁸ States were represented at the Conference, which was held at the United Nations Headquarters from 11 May to 18 June 1953, and seven¹⁸⁹ States sent observers, without the right to vote. Observers, without the right to vote, were also sent by WHO, PCOB and the Drug Supervisory Body.

The Conference adopted a Protocol for Limiting and Regulating the Cultivation of the Poppy Plant, the Production of, International and Wholesale Trade in, and Use of Opium (E/NT/8), which was opened for signature on 23 June 1953.

The Protocol, under the terms of its article 16, remained open for signature until 31 December 1953.¹⁹⁰

States which had not signed by this date might become Parties by way of accession in accordance with article 18. The Protocol, in accordance with its article 21, was to come into force on the 30th day after the latest date of deposit of the instrument of ratification or accession of at least 25 States including at least: (1) three of the following opium-producing States—Bulgaria, Greece, India, Iran, Turkey, USSR and Yugoslavia; and (2) three of the following drug manufacturing States—Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Final Act (E/NT/8) was signed by the representatives or observers of the following States: Belgium, Burma, Cambodia, Canada, Chile, China, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, India, Iraq, Israel, Italy, Japan, Republic of Korea, Lebanon, Liechtenstein, Mexico, Monaco, Netherlands, Pakistan, Philippines, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Vietnam and Yugoslavia.

The United Nations Opium Conference sought to fill two serious gaps in the existing system of international narcotics control. Under the existing narcotics treaties limitations restricting narcotic substances to the amounts needed for medical and scientific purposes had been realized in respect of manufactured drugs but hitherto it had not been possible in respect of opium, coca leaves and cannabis (Indian hemp). Consequently a considerable volume of excess production, particularly of opium, flowed into the illicit trade and became available to clandestine manufacturers of narcotic drugs derived from opium.

Secondly, while the existing narcotics treaties limited the use of manufactured narcotic drugs to medical and scientific purposes, it had not, hitherto, been possible to incorporate the prohibition of the non-medical use of opium, coca leaves and cannabis in treaty provisions for the international control of narcotics. This was principally due to the fact that the non-medical use of these substances was widespread in large parts of the world and not condemned until recently by public opinion.

The Protocol adopted by the Conference is based on two guiding ideas: (1) free trade in opium should be maintained in so far as this is compatible with the limitation of production and with the maintenance of effective government control; (2) the methods applied for controlling the manufacture of, and trade in manufactured narcotic drugs should also be applied to opium in so far as this is consistent with the nature of opium as an agricultural product.

The provisions of the Protocol may be summed up as follows:

(1) The production of opium would be limited with a view to reducing the amounts harvested to the amounts needed for medical and scientific purposes. Indirect means are adopted to achieve this aim. Different levels of maximum opium stocks are set depending on the position of a State as exporter of opium produced in its territory, as manufacturer or importer of narcotic drugs. Each State would be required not to hold opium stocks in excess of the maximum amount to be established in accordance with the rules applying to the particular group of States to which it belongs. The maximum amount would, in the case of the opium exporting countries listed in the following paragraph, be equal to two and a half years' requirements for manufacture of opium alkaloids and export of opium, in the case of any other country, which manufactures opium alkaloids to its "normal" requirements for a period of two years, and in the case of all the other countries to the total amount of opium consumed during the preceding five years. Opium held by, or under the control of the government for military purposes, would not be considered in the computation of these maxima (article 5).

(2) The number of States which would be permitted to export opium produced in their own territories would be limited to seven, i.e., Bulgaria, Greece, India, Iran, Turkey, USSR and Yugoslavia. However, each country would be authorized to produce opium for its domestic needs (article 6).

(3) The use of opium would be limited to medical and scientific needs. The Protocol provides, however, for temporary exceptions in favour of countries which do not have sufficient medical facilities and which permit the use of opium without medical assistance mainly for the relief of pain (quasi-medical use of opium). A time limit of fifteen years is set after which such use of opium would have to be discontinued. The Protocol would also permit opium smoking by people, not minors, who are addicted to this practice and who would be registered to this end on 30 September 1953 (articles 2 and 19).

(4) The Protocol provides for control measures as follows:

(a) On the national level: Governments which would permit the cultivation of the opium poppy for the production of opium, would be required to establish a governmental machinery which would amount to a national monopoly of the production of, and international and wholesale trade in, opium. Only licensed farmers would be permitted to cultivate the poppy for the production of opium. Each licence would fix the acreage on which such cultivation is permitted (article 3).

States which permit the cultivation of the poppy for other purposes than for the production of opium (e.g., for seeds or oil) would be called upon to ensure that opium is not produced from such poppies and that the extraction of alkaloids from poppy straw is adequately controlled (article 4).

The import and export of opium would require previous authorization by the government which would not, in particular, issue an export authorization unless the exporter substantiates that the government of the importing country has authorized the shipment. The import of opium from States not Parties to the Protocol would be prohibited (article 6).

(b) On the international level: A system of estimates of the area to be cultivated with the opium poppy for the production of opium, of the opium harvest and opium requirements should enable the Drug Supervisory Body to advise the governments concerned as to the desirable size of the opium crop and thus as to the acreage to be cultivated. A system of statistical returns would in addition enable PCOB to supervise the execution by governments of important provisions of the Protocol (articles 8 and 9).

If the Board has reasons to assume that a gravely unsatisfactory opium situation exists in a country, it would also be authorized to arrange a local inquiry but only with the express consent of the government concerned. In general, the execution of the Protocol relies on the good faith of the Parties and on the strength of public opinion resulting from criticism by the Board. In very extreme cases the Board would, however, be authorized to recommend or impose an import and/or export embargo of opium. The rights of the country concerned are protected by procedural guarantees such as the right to be heard, and in the case of the imposition of an embargo, by the right of appeal to a special appeal body to be appointed, in principle, by the President of the International Court of Justice. The President of the Court has agreed to undertake this function (articles 11 and 12).

(5) The Protocol adopts, in agreement with the existing narcotics conventions, the principle of universality. In respect of States, not Parties to the Protocol or of territories to which the Protocol would not apply, the PCOB would accordingly be authorized to adopt measures provided for in the Protocol and intended to appeal to public opinion and, in the very extreme cases referred to above, to recommend or impose an opium embargo (article 13).

The United Nations Opium Conference also adopted seventeen resolutions which were incorporated in the Final Act referred to above. Most of them (resolutions II to XIII) interpreted provisions of the Protocol or made suggestions as to its implementation. Resolution XV recommended, in the main, to governments to prevent restrictive business practices in the opium trade in so far as they are not required by the aims of the Protocol. Resolution XVI, in addition, stated that such restriction of the free opium trade as would be required by the provisions of the Protocol should not be considered as a precedent for restrictions of the freedom of activity in international trade.

Three resolutions (I, XIV and XVII) requested Council action. The first of these was adopted without discussion by the Council's Social Committee, at its 249th meeting on 23 July, by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and by the Council at its 739th plenary meeting on 23 July, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

In accordance with this resolution (505 G (XVI)), the Council recommended: (1) that all the Members of the United Nations and all the non-member States, referred to in article 16 and 18 of the Protocol, sign and ratify or accede to the Protocol as soon as possible; and (2) that all States implement as far as may be possible the provisions of the Protocol pending its coming into force or their adherence.

Resolution XIV proposed by the Conference was adopted with the addition of a Chinese amendment (E/AC.7/L.173), adopted at the 249th meeting of the Social Committee on 23 July, by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, to provide that the Commission on Narcotic Drugs might draw up a "commentary" as well as a code for the application of the Protocol. The representative of the United Kingdom, in particular, spoke in favour of this amendment. The amended draft resolution was adopted by the Committee at the same meeting by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and by the Council, at its 739th plenary meeting on 28 July, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

In this resolution (505 H (XVI)), the Council requested the Commission on Narcotic Drugs to draw up, for the guidance of governments, a model code and commentary for the application of the Protocol.

Resolution XVII recommended by the Conference was adopted at the same meeting of the Social Committee and the Council, by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, respectively.

In this resolution (505 I (XVI)), the Council recommended to the General Assembly to approve the assumption of the functions and responsibilities assigned to organs of the United Nations by the Protocol and to include this Protocol among the multilateral treaties relating to the control of narcotic drugs for the purpose of assessing, in accordance with resolution 455(V) of the General Assembly, non-member States which are parties to such treaties, for their fair share of the expenses borne by the United Nations in connexion with the international control of narcotic drugs. It also proposed that the General Assembly include this recommendation in the provisional agenda of the eighth regular session of the General Assembly.

The representative of Argentina explained that her delegation had been unable to express a final opinion on the Protocol since it had not received the documents in time. She had voted in favour of the resolutions because her Government approved of their purpose, but Argentina, she emphasized, must give notice that it would cultivate the papaver somniferum for medical and scientific purposes if it was unable to obtain the requisite products elsewhere.

The question of the assumption by organs of the United Nations of functions and responsibilities assigned to them under the terms of the Opium Protocol, and of the financial burdens resulting therefrom, as proposed by the Council, was considered by the General Assembly at its eighth session at the 403rd meeting of the Fifth Committee on 6 November. The Committee had before it a report by the Secretary-General (A/2516), together with the eleventh report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to the eighth Assembly session (A/2529).

The Secretary-General reported that the President of the International Court of Justice informed the Secretary-General that he was willing to undertake the responsibility of appointing the members of the Appeals Committee provided for under article 12 of the Protocol. In this connexion, the Advisory Committee observed that no provision was included in the Protocol for an award of costs against an appellant State in cases where the Appeals Committee affirmed the decision of the Board, and that the advisability of including such a provision should be considered in future whenever the establishment of machinery for hearing appeals was contemplated in a protocol or other similar instrument.

With regard to the financial obligations which would result from the assumption by organs of the United Nations of responsibilities assigned to them under the Protocol, the Committee was informed, in the reports of the Secretary-General and of the Advisory Committee, that the position would be as follows:

(1) Responsibilities assigned to the Secretary-General, the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on Narcotic Drugs could be assumed without additional budgetary provision, with the possible exception of the costs of reproduction of annual reports. The Advisory Committee considered that any such additional requirement was likely to be slight.

(2) The financial implications of the additional responsibilities assigned to the Permanent Central Opium Board (PCOB) and the Drug Supervisory Body were to be examined by the Board and the Supervisory Body at future sessions. It was considered that these additional responsibilities would not be unduly heavy, though they might call for some addition to the staff of the Board when the Protocol came into force. The Advisory Committee was therefore of the opinion that action under the Protocol need not be delayed pending the submission of the relevant supplementary estimates and that any additional costs arising thereunder should, in the meantime, be absorbed within the appropriations relating to the work of the PCOB that were administered as a single unit.

(3) While it was not expected that the Appeals Committee would meet until there was a likelihood of actual cases arising, any funds required for such a purpose should be withdrawn from the Working Capital Fund, with the concurrence of the Advisory Committee, as an unforeseen or extraordinary commitment.

The Fifth Committee agreed to inform the General Assembly that approval of the Economic and Social Council's recommendation would involve financial obligations as indicated above, and decided, by 27 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, to recommend to the General Assembly the adoption of the draft resolution proposed by the Council.

The draft resolution proposed in the Fifth Committee's report (A/2570) was adopted by the Assembly, without discussion, at its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November, by 54 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 774(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having regard to resolution 505 I (XVI) adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 28 July 1953,

"Decides:

"1. To approve the assumption by organs of the United Nations of the functions and responsibilities assigned to them by the Protocol, adopted by the United Nations Opium Conference (1953), for Limiting and Regulating the Cultivation of the Poppy Plant, the Production of, International and Wholesale Trade in, and Use of Opium;

"2. To include this Protocol among the multilateral treaties relating to the control of narcotic drugs for the purpose of assessing, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 455(V) of 16 November 1950, non-member States which are Parties to such treaties for their fair share of the expenses borne by the United Nations in connexion with the international control of narcotic drugs."

S. CULTURAL QUESTIONS

1. International Co-operation on Cartography

In pursuance of Council resolution 261(IX),¹⁹¹ the Secretary-General submitted to the Council's fifteenth session a report on international co-operation on cartography (E/2362 & Corr.1 & Add.1). He reported that his communication to governments concerning the calling of regional meetings on cartography, to be attended by representatives of governments having a common interest in a specific region, resulted in replies from the Governments of twenty Members and six non-members. No opposition to the proposal was registered while many suggestions and favourable comments were set forth. India, he said, offered to act as the host country for the proposed Asia and Far East conference, subject to the approval of the neighbouring countries.

The Secretary-General also submitted to the fifteenth session of the Council a progress report (E/2366, annex III) on the efforts made by the Secretary-General and by the President of the Central Bureau, International Map of the World on the Millionth Scale, for the purpose of effecting the transfer to the United Nations of the functions and assets of that Bureau, as recommended by the Council in resolution 412 B (XIII). He informed the Council that all the countries which subscribed to the International Map since the end of the Second World War had agreed to the transfer and that the detailed arrangements were being negotiated with the Central Bureau.

The Council also had before it a report by the Secretary-General on means for furthering the completion of the International One-Millionth Map of the World (E/2376 & Add.1), prepared pursuant to Council resolution 412 A II (XIII)¹⁹² of September 1951. The report was based on the findings of international organizations directly concerned with the International Map and on the views of experts in various parts of the world. The Secretary-General proposed to continue maintaining close liaison with the responsible national cartographic agencies and the interested international scientific organizations in order to further the completion of the International Map and, in agreement with the findings of the latter, to prepare proposals for amending the existing specifications governing the publication of the Map.

The three reports were considered by the Council at its 676th and 677th plenary meetings on 2 and 6 April. The Council also had before it two draft resolutions, one proposed by the United States (E/L.480), with an Indian amendment to it (E/L.482); and the other proposed by the United Kingdom (E/L.481).

The United States representative accepted the Indian amendment, which provided that the Secretary-General, in addition to continuing consultations on the holding of regional cartographic conferences, should continue consultations on the adoption of a standard method of writing geographical names on maps.

The Council, at its 677th plenary meeting on 6 April, adopted the United States draft, as amended, by 15 votes to 2, with 1 abstention (resolution 476 A (XV)) and the United Kingdom draft by the same vote (resolution 476 B (XV)).

The USSR representative stated that his Government would not consider itself bound legally or financially by these decisions. He argued that cartographic work did not fall within the competence of the United Nations, but was the responsibility of each State. In addition, the absorption of the Central Bureau of the International Map of the World on the Millionth Scale in the United Nations did not seem to him to be legally justifiable. Some elucidation on that point seemed to be necessary, he said, before the Council could approve a transfer of functions which was not provided for in the Charter.

The Council, in resolution 476 A (XV), took note, with satisfaction, of the report on international co-operation on cartography, and in particular, of the efforts made by governments to stimulate the accurate surveying and mapping of their territories, and requested the Secretary-General to continue the consultations with governments and interested intergovernmental organizations on the holding of regional cartographic conferences, and on the adoption of a standard method of writing geographical names on maps. He was requested to submit, in due course, a report to the Council on the result of such consultations.

In resolution 476 B (XV), the Council took note with satisfaction of the report on means for furthering the completion of the International One-Millionth Map of the World, together with the progress report on the transfer of the Central Bureau, International One-Millionth Map of the World, to the United Nations, and requested the Secretary-General, upon completing the transfer, to take appropriate steps to further the completion of the map on the lines indicated in the report.

On 23 July 1953 the Protocol of transfer was signed in London. In accordance with this Protocol, the United Nations Cartographic Office assumed, as of 30 September 1953, the functions hitherto carried out by the Central Bureau, including, inter alia, serving as liaison between governments for the exchange of information, assisting in co-ordinating the publication of the map and rendering advice on the fair drawings of the map sheets before publication.

Working liaison was established during the year between the Secretariat and some of the national cartographic agencies concerned.

2. Teaching About the United Nations

During 1953, the Department of Public Information of the United Nations, through its network of 765 volunteer educational centres and speakers units in 86 countries, reached some five million people. A large number of requests were received by these centres, mainly from educators, teachers and adult education groups, in the preparation of United Nations exhibits, the showing of United Nations films and filmstrips, the organizing of study groups and seminars on teaching about the United Nations, and the promoting of special talks on the United Nations. As a result of a questionnaire sent to all these centres, a report was prepared on their work in helping to disseminate information on the United Nations entitled "The Role Played by Volunteers in the Building of Peace". Some 250 non-official publications on teaching about the United Nations were collected through these volunteer centres and the United Nations Information Centres and an exhibit of them placed on display during the Geneva session of the Economic and Social Council, held from 30 June to 5 August 1953.

A workshop for teachers, at which 125 elementary and secondary schools in New York City and the vicinity were represented, met monthly at the United Nations Headquarters.

The United Nations also co-operated with UNESCO in a fellowship programme to promote teaching about the United Nations. In 1953, six UNESCO fellows came to the United Nations Headquarters to study the work and activities of the United Nations; fifteen fellows from the Ford Foundation also spent several weeks studying and doing research work at Headquarters.

Material was also published concerning the work of the United Nations for the use of schools, and speakers were provided for educational groups in several regions of the United States. Educators and students visiting Headquarters were also provided with lectures and guidance on the subject of the United Nations in the school curricula.

T. QUESTIONS OF CO-ORDINATION AND RELATIONS WITH SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

The Economic and Social Council at its sixteenth session, at the 740th and 741st plenary meetings on 29 July, reviewed the development of co-ordination between the United Nations and the specialized agencies. It had before it the twelfth and thirteenth reports of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) (E/2340 & E/2446 & Corr.1), the annual reports of the commissions of the Council, as well as information on their programmes provided by the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF), the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA) and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) and a communication from the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (E/2483).

During the Council's discussion, general satisfaction was expressed with the progress which had been made in the past year towards more effective co-ordination of the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. Several members commended the emphasis laid upon programme matters in the reports, while some, in particular the representatives of France and the United States, considered that further information was desirable on the progress of co-ordination, together with suggestions on any specific problems which might merit the Council's attention.

Members noted with satisfaction that the ACC had continued to give careful consideration to financial and personnel questions, including those relating to the development of common services, to the co-ordination of services and to external audit procedures.

The Council, at its 741st plenary meeting, adopted resolutions 497 A and B (XVI). The first resolution, adopted by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention, took note, with satisfaction, of the reports of the ACC and of the communication from the Advisory Committee. The second, adopted unanimously, expressed satisfaction with the progress made in the past year towards more effective co-ordination of the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and urged continued efforts in this direction.

The General Assembly at its eighth session also considered a number of questions relating to co-ordination between the United Nations and the specialized agencies. The action taken is described below.

1. Programme and Substantive Matters

a. PROGRAMME REVIEW AND PRIORITIES

In accordance with the procedure laid down by the Economic and Social Council at its fourteenth session,⁹⁵ the Council at its sixteenth session, at the 740th and 741st plenary meetings on 29 July, discussed the action taken by the functional and regional commissions and by the specialized agencies regarding the annual review of work programmes and the establishment of priorities.

In the thirteenth report of the ACC to the Council (E/2446) the main emphasis was placed on programmes and priorities. The ACC stated that an important part of international programmes now consisted of assistance to governments in carrying out national and local projects and it was for this kind of work that the Council priorities seemed to be designed. In such assistance, experience had shown that the most important priorities were those which each government itself established in allocating available national and international resources.

In its general observations (E/2483), the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions noted that because of its schedule, it would be unable to offer comments on the administrative and budgetary implications of the 1954 programmes of the specialized agencies until after the sixteenth session of the Council. The Committee therefore limited itself to preparing a memorandum on matters of general policy.

At the Council's sixteenth session, several representatives, in particular those of Belgium and the United States, noted with satisfaction the progress which had been made by commissions and specialized agencies in complying with the requests made in the resolutions of the Council and the General Assembly regarding priorities, though it appeared that some of the functional commissions had not been as successful as the regional commissions in this regard. The information concerning programmes submitted by UNICEF, UNKRA and UNRWA was also received with appreciation.

The representative of France endorsed the observations made by the ACC concerning the application of priorities. In his view, those observations brought out both the importance and the limitations of the Council's efforts to fix priority programmes.

The representative of Australia took the general view that any change in the priorities established by the Council at its fourteenth session should be resisted unless there were strong reasons to the contrary. The purpose of establishing long-term priorities, he argued, would be defeated if they were altered before the programmes had been completed.

At the conclusion of its discussion, the Council, at its 741st plenary meeting, unanimously adopted resolution 497 C (XVI). This resolution noted the progress made by commissions of the Council, the operating agencies of the United Nations in the economic and social fields and the specialized agencies in reviewing as appropriate their programmes for 1954, in accordance with the requirements of Council resolutions 324(XI), 402 B (XIII) and 451 A (XIV). It also requested the commissions of the Council and the operating agencies of the United Nations in the economic and social fields, and invited the specialized agencies to review their programmes for 1955 in the light of the resolutions referred to above, and to include in a special section of their next reports to the Council a description of the progress made in so concentrating their efforts.

b. ANNUAL REPORTS OF THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES¹⁹⁴

(1) International Labour Organisation (ILO)

The Economic and Social Council considered the annual report of the International Labour Organisation (E/2462) at its 708th and 709th plenary meetings on 2 July and heard a statement by the Director-General of that organization. Most members expressed appreciation of ILO's work, in particular the continuing attention which it had given to increasing the productivity of labour, combating under-employment, and increasing the emphasis on practical operational and technical assistance activities, while still pursuing its traditional objective of the improvement of labour standards. While ILO was commended for its judicious use of technical assistance funds and for having stabilized its budget, some representatives, in particular those of India, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, expressed concern that budgetary restrictions might prevent the implementation of specific programmes already approved.

The representative of Belgium considered that, while the promotion of international labour legislation was one of ILO's main tasks, the time had come for the organization to consolidate the gains already made. An analytical study showing how far conventions which had been ratified were actually in application, he said, would give a clearer picture of the progress made.

The representative of Poland considered that the report indicated that ILO's achievements were not satisfactory, good relations between capital and labour being still far from achievement. In order to fulfil its aims, ILO, in his view, should change its structure and methods, establishing much closer ties with trade unions and workers' organizations, and thus becoming more closely acquainted with the real needs of the working masses.

The representative of Argentina took exception to certain recommendations contained in the report of the Governing Body's Committee on Freedom of Association. He argued, inter alia, that the distinction made in Argentina between recognized trade unions and other trade union organizations did not violate any ILO convention. Under Argentina's revised constitution, workers, he said, were guaranteed the right to form trade unions and to participate in all legitimate activities in defence of their interests, and the Government was bound to prevent any interference with the exercise of that right.

At its 709th plenary meeting, the Council adopted, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, resolution 498(XVI) taking note, with appreciation, of the report.

(2) Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO)¹⁹⁵

The Council considered the annual report of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (E/2432 & Add.1 & 2) at its 709th and 710th plenary meeting on 2 and 3 July 1953 and heard a statement from the representative of FAO. In resolution 488(XVI), adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, the Council took note of the report of FAO with appreciation and noted with approval the continued emphasis on the carrying out of operational activities in the field.

¹⁹⁴ For an account of the activities of the specialized agencies during 1953, see Part Two of this Yearbook, under their respective headings.

(3) United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO)

In view of the fact that the report of UNESCO had not been made available to the members of the Council before the beginning of the sixteenth session, the Council, at its 706th plenary meeting on 30 June, decided, by 12 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, to postpone consideration of the report until the seventeenth session, scheduled to convene on 30 March 1954.

(4) International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO)

The Council considered the annual report of the International Civil Aviation Organization (E/2417 & Add.1) at its 716th plenary meeting on 8 July and heard a statement by the representative of that organization. Most members noted with satisfaction the part played by ICAO in promoting and encouraging international action to ensure the sound growth of international civil aviation. They further commended the organization's continuing efforts to improve the safety and reliability of aircraft, noting the part it had played in negotiating the Rome Convention on Damage Caused by Foreign Aircraft to Third Parties on the Surface, and in acting as mediator in a disagreement between India and Pakistan, as a result of which an air corridor over Pakistan's territory had been provided for the use of the Indian air services.

The representatives of Belgium and France, however, considered that ICAO could take more effective action on such problems as economic competition and commercial rights in air transport; they felt that ICAO might have left too much international responsibility in this sphere to a non-governmental organization, the International Air Transport Association (IATA). The representative of France drew attention to the difficulties which seemed to result from uncontrolled competition between different modes of travel, and to the apparent need for a conference of United Nations Members on the co-ordination of air, rail and river transport.

The Council at its 716th plenary meeting adopted, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, resolution 489 (XVI) taking note, with appreciation, of the report.

(5) International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and International Monetary Fund¹⁹⁶

The Council considered the annual report of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (E/2360 & Add.1) at its 684th and 685th plenary meetings on 14 April and that of the International Monetary Fund (E/2351 & Add.1) at its 682nd and 683rd plenary meetings on 13 April. The President of the Bank and the Managing Director of the Fund made statements before the Council. The Council at its 685th meeting on 14 April and at its 683rd meeting on 13 April adopted, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, resolutions 466(XV) and 467(XV) taking note, respectively, of the reports of the Bank and the Fund.

(6) World Health Organization (WHO)

The Council considered the annual report of the World Health Organization (E/2416 & Add.1-5) at its 707th and 708th plenary meetings on 1 and 2 July, and heard a statement by the Deputy Director-General of that organization. Most members expressed general appreciation of the work done by WHO, in particular the concentration on the strengthening of national health services, the continued emphasis given to the education and training of qualified personnel and to programmes for combating such diseases as malaria and tuberculosis. The opinion was expressed by, among others, the representatives of China, Egypt, India, the Philippines and Yugoslavia, that the regional organizations of WHO, developed as a result of the organization's policy of decentralization, were producing valuable results. The representative of France emphasized, however, the necessity for regional programmes to be examined in detail by a central body.

The representatives of, in particular, India and Yugoslavia voiced apprehensions that the World Health Assembly's reductions in the 1954 budget might affect the organization's future programmes. The representative of the United Kingdom, on the other hand, was gratified that budget stability had been achieved. While it was recognized that it was difficult to impose limits on expenditure on such matters as efforts to combat and control disease, several representatives, including those of Australia and the United States, considered that resources in the sphere of WHO's activities were limited not so much by funds as by trained personnel and facilities. The representative of France suggested that, in order to balance the budget, it might be advisable to reduce the number of meetings.

The Council at its 708th meeting on 2 July adopted, by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, resolution 499(XVI), taking note, with appreciation, of the report, and noting with approval the continued emphasis given to the development of effective public health services and programmes for the training of public health workers.

(7) Universal Postal Union (UPU)

The Council considered the annual report of the Universal Postal Union (E/2383) at its 715th plenary meeting on 7 July and heard a statement by the Director of that organization.

The value of the work of UPU in its own technical field was emphasized and it was noted that the XIIIth Universal Postal Congress, which had met in Brussels in 1952, had revised the Postal Convention. With regard to the resolution adopted by the Congress concerning the relationship of the United Nations Postal Administration and UPU to any proposals by other specialized agencies to undertake postal activities, it was pointed out by the representative of the United States, which had sponsored that resolution, that the resolution was not intended to apply to arrangements between a specialized agency and a host government for the issue of over-printed or special stamps by that national postal administration.

The Council adopted, by 17 votes to none, (one member being absent when the vote was taken) resolution 490(XVI), taking note, with appreciation, of the report.

(8) International Telecommunication Union (ITU)

In view of the fact that the report of the International Telecommunication Union had not been made available to the members of the Council before the beginning of the sixteenth session, the Council, at its 706th plenary meeting on 30 June, decided, by 11 votes to none, with 7 abstentions, to postpone consideration of the report until the Council's seventeenth session.

(9) World Meteorological Organization (WMO)

The Council considered the annual report of the World Meteorological Organization (E/2428) at its 715th and 716th plenary meetings on 7 and 8 July. Members noted with appreciation that the secretariat of WMO had succeeded in completing the organizational stage of its development in a comparatively short time, and that administrative work was being superseded by technical activities. Tribute was paid to WMO's co-ordination of meteorological services through co-operation among the expert technical commissions, the regional associations and the secretariat. It was emphasized by the representative of the United States, in particular, that the essential task of WMO was to bring together the work of other bodies engaged in the field, rather than to disperse its own activities, and satisfaction was expressed at the fact that hundreds of meteorologists had co-operated in the preparation of material for WMO meetings, thereby enabling the organization to achieve a great deal at small cost. The representative of Yugoslavia suggested that, in future, more meetings of the technical commissions might be held in Europe. The representatives of India and Yugoslavia considered that countries in which meteorological services had not yet reached full development might well be granted technical assistance in improving the equipment and techniques of the national services.

The Council, at its 716th meeting on 8 July, unanimously adopted resolution 491(XVI) taking note, with appreciation, of the report.

c. FORM OF REPORTS OF THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES TO THE UNITED NATIONS

At its sixth session, the Council had adopted resolution 128 A (VI)¹⁹⁷ which took note of the articles of the Agreements with the specialized agencies providing for the transmission of reports to the United Nations, and of General Assembly resolution 125(II); it requested the specialized agencies to submit to the Council, not later than 15 May of each year, such reports as appropriate under the terms of their respective agreements, specifying certain detailed information which should be given on the organization and activities of the agency for the past year.

The Council during its sixteenth session, at its 740th and 741st plenary meetings on 29 July, discussed the possible revision of the operative part of this resolution in the light of the experience of the last few years. Some members, in particular the representative of the United States, expressed the view that regular information on the basic problems peculiar to each agency was of special interest to the Council; that, however, it was no longer necessary to receive such organizational details as had previously been requested; and that, in future, the form of the reports might be simpler, concentrating on the major developments and dealing primarily with matters of specific interest to the Council. While the Council did not wish to restrict the information supplied by the specialized agencies, account was taken of the fact that the agencies themselves would welcome steps to simplify the reporting required of them.

The representative of France suggested the possibility of the agencies reporting biennially. Others, including the representatives of Sweden, the United Kingdom and Uruguay, thought that it was desirable to attain some standardization in the form of reports. It was generally agreed that the whole problem of reporting by the agencies required review, that this was a matter on which the views of the agencies themselves should be taken into account, and that meanwhile it was desirable to establish interim arrangements to simplify the next reports of the agencies to the Council.

The Council at its 741st meeting, by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention, adopted resolution 497 D (XVI), requesting specialized agencies, in addition to the background information contained in their annual reports, to give particular attention in their next reports to the Council to:

(1) the major developments in their programmes during the past year, the current year and those planned for the ensuing year, with an indication of priorities established, and of any major shifts of emphasis in these programmes;

(2) the extent and nature of participation in co-operative projects and activities with the United Nations and other specialized agencies;

(3) major developments in their relations with the United Nations and with other specialized agencies;

(4) specific actions taken pursuant to recommendations of the General Assembly and the Council;

(5) any other actions taken or contemplated in implementation of their agreements with the United Nations; and

(6) a list of meetings held or contemplated with an indication of their purpose.

At the same time the ACC was requested to review all aspects of the problem of reporting by the specialized agencies to the United Nations, including the question of the frequency, length, content and method of presentation of their reports, in the light of this resolution and of the Council's discussions, and to submit its observations to the Council at its seventeenth session.

d. INTERGOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS

The Council, during its fifteenth session, at the 676th plenary meeting on 2 April, considered the 1953 edition of the Council's List¹⁹⁸ of intergovernmental organizations in the economic, social, cultural, educational, health and related fields which have responsibilities similar to those of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, as prepared by the Secretary-General (E/2361 & Corr.1). This list covered 49 organizations. It also considered information on thirteen additional organizations (E/2361/Add.1 & Corr.1) (see below) which had been submitted for consideration for possible incorporation in the Council's List. In addition, reports by the Secretary-General on eight, and by FAO on three, particular inter-governmental organizations were before the Council (E/2366 & Corr.1), as requested by the Council in resolution 412(XIII).

The Council confirmed the inclusion in its List of the various organizations listed by the Secretary-General (E/2361 & Corr.1) with the exception of the Central Bureau, International One-Millionth Map of the World,¹⁹⁹ and of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, which the Secretary-General had proposed to omit from future editions of the List, their having been terminated and their functions absorbed by the United Nations.

In connexion with the International Office of Epizootics, the Director-General of FAO was requested to keep the Council informed at intervals, through the Secretary-General, of the progress made towards developing an integrated world-wide programme of animal disease control and prevention, and of any action which the General Conference of FAO might ultimately take on the question of integration of this organization. The Director-General of FAO was further requested to report to the Council through the Secretary-General at a session in 1956 on the extent of co-operation between FAO and the International Seed-Testing Association and on the progress of negotiations for closer integration of the work of the two organizations. States members of both FAO and the International Commission for the Scientific Exploration of the Mediterranean Sea were urged to bring about complete exchange of information between the two organizations, in order to avoid duplication, and the Director-General of FAO was asked to report to the Council in 1956, through the Secretary-General, on steps which might be taken to develop a single integrated fisheries programme in the Mediterranean area.

¹⁹⁸ The Council in resolution 262 Q (IX) of 10 August 1949 had decided to maintain the List as a standing document, to be revised periodically for consideration by the Council. The purposes of the List were originally stated in Council resolution 171(VII) of 29 August 1948, in which the Council had expressed the belief that it was desirable that Member Governments should re-examine possible duplication or dispersion of effort between intergovernmental organizations, on the one hand, and the United Nations and specialized agencies, on the other. The Council has examined from time to time (1) the relationship which might be established between listed organizations and the United Nations or the specialized agencies, and (2) the possible termination, absorption or integration of any of these organizations into the United Nations or the specialized agencies.

The Council further decided to include in its List the thirteen additional organizations (E/2361/Add.1) as follows:

the Council of Europe, the General Fisheries Council for the Mediterranean, the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the International Materials Conference, the Consultative Committee on Economic Development in South and South East Asia, the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara, the Organization of American States, the Organization of Central American States, the Brussels Treaty Organization (Western Union), the Organization for European Economic Co-operation, the Council for Mutual Economic Aid, and the League of Arab States.

e. OTHER SUBSTANTIVE QUESTIONS CONSIDERED BY THE ACC

(1) Productivity

In its thirteenth report to the Council (E/2446 & Corr.1), the ACC stated that one aspect of the problem concerning increased production of goods other than food to which particular attention had been given and which called for continuing action was that of productivity. In general, as industry developed, a good climate of industrial relations was essential to foster the co-operative efforts of labour, management and government needed to raise productivity. The existence of a free and strong trade union movement, the practice of collective bargaining and the development of good worker-employer relations in industry were of the greatest importance in this connexion. ILO, said the ACC, had been giving special consideration to these factors and would shortly report fully to the Council.

The ACC noted with interest the establishment of a European Productivity Agency. The United Nations, in collaboration with ILO, FAO and UNESCO, the ACC reported, was considering a request by the Central American governments to determine a programme of inter-related projects, including the setting up of an Institute of Industrial Technological Research to deal with the problem of raising productivity in that region.

(2) International Trade

The ACC stated in its thirteenth report (E/2446) that discrimination and restrictions in international trade and balance of payments continued to exist on a wide scale, and, indeed, had been reintroduced in a few major trading countries. Involved in the problem of an effective solution were, for example, questions of fiscal, monetary and commercial policies; the international movement of capital; the prices of primary products entering into international trade; and the adequacy of international monetary reserves.

The United Nations and the specialized agencies concerned, the ACC said, had a major responsibility in helping to promote the highest practicable level of world trade on a multilateral basis. The ACC called the Council's attention to the importance of any steps which could be taken to this end, and assured the Council that the agencies concerned would continue to give high priority to this and related problems.

(3) Refugees

The ACC drew attention (E/2446) to the importance of the refugee problem, in regard to which the United Nations had assumed certain direct responsibilities as the result of the establishment of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. A permanent solution for the refugees who had not been re-established, the ACC declared, required the prompt and co-ordinated action of all United Nations agencies and of Member States. The continuing aspect of the problem made it necessary to look beyond such temporary measures as the provision of emergency aid, and to seek permanent solutions. It would be necessary, said the ACC, to promote the integration of large numbers of destitute refugees who were not likely to qualify for overseas resettlement schemes and who had not yet been assimilated into the economies of their countries of residence.

(4) Migration

The migration programmes for 1953 of the various international organizations concerned were reviewed in February 1953 at a meeting convened by ILO under the auspices of the ACC. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, the Organization for European Economic Co-operation and the Council of Europe were represented at the meeting. The ACC again drew attention to the need for even more effective co-ordination of the migration activities of the international agencies within and outside the United Nations.

Note was taken by the ACC (E/2446) of the conclusions and recommendations of the ILO Latin American Manpower Technical Conference, which was held at Lima, Peru, in December 1952. The Conference, among other things, called attention to the possibilities of technical assistance by ILO in connexion with the establishment of national machinery for carrying out migration operations.

The Inter-Agency Regional Co-ordination Committee on Migration in Latin America, the ACC reported, had taken steps to establish or strengthen relations with national organizations interested in migration problems. Preliminary arrangements had been agreed upon for a survey in a limited number of countries of migrants belonging to the professional categories, with a view to absorbing them in immigration countries.

(5) Long-Range Activities for Children

Inter-agency consultations on long-range activities for children, the ACC said (E/2446), had been continued. A technical report on the improvement of child nutrition, particularly in under-developed areas, had been jointly prepared by the agencies concerned, and arrangements for its publication were being considered.

The ACC agreed on the importance of joint planning by government officials and the competent international organizations for the purpose of encouraging the development of appropriate services and programmes in countries which would ensure:

- (a) suitable measures to provide adequate supplies of local foods of high nutritive value;
- (b) the distribution of such foods to infants and children through supplementary feeding programmes;
- (c) the dissemination among the people of a sound knowledge of nutrition and of good feeding practices in the home; and
- (d) an increase in the number of professional and auxiliary personnel trained in nutrition.

(6) Promoting and Encouraging Respect for Human Rights

A great effort had been made, the ACC reported, to implement the mandate of the General Assembly to disseminate more fully the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Among other things, the Secretary-General had maintained the closest collaboration with UNESCO which had made education in human rights a vital part of its programme.

Among the methods open to the United Nations to promote universal respect for and observance of human rights, the ACC listed the following:

annual reports by governments on developments in the field of human rights—these, it suggested, could be prepared with the assistance of national or local human rights committees and could form the basis for recommendations to governments;

surveys of various aspects of human rights throughout the world—specialized agencies as well as non-governmental organizations could co-operate in these surveys;

a satisfactory solution of the problem of handling communications concerning human rights; and advisory services, regional seminars, scholarships and fellowships in the field of human rights.

2. Administrative and Servicing Matters

a. ADMINISTRATIVE BUDGETS OF SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

In considering the question of financial implications of requests made to the specialized agencies by United Nations organs, the ACC, in its thirteenth report (E/2446) to the Economic and Social Council, stated that Council resolution 324 B (XI) called for inter-agency consultations to be made through the ACC in connexion with "all proposals for surveys, meetings or programmes which concern more than one organization . . . prior to their adoption by the competent commissions, Councils or Assemblies concerned". In addition, the majority of agreements between the United Nations and the specialized agencies, the ACC pointed out, contain an article on financing of special services, which provides for consultations to determine the most equitable manner in which substantial extra expense should be borne, as a result of any request which the United Nations might make for special reports, studies or assistance on the part of the agency concerned. The ACC felt that a more meticulous observance of the provisions of Council resolution 324 B (XI), prior to the approval of projects calling for joint inter-agency action, would be desirable.

The ACC also drew attention again to the difficulties and problems raised by the large number of reports and studies on closely related economic and social subjects requested of the United Nations and the specialized agencies for consideration by the different international and regional bodies examining these questions, thereby diverting resources from the practical implementation of the programmes. The burden involved, it said, would be greatly lightened if the preparation of periodic reports of this character were spaced out at larger intervals.

In its communication to the Economic and Social Council (E/2483), the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions noted, among other things, that the budgets of certain specialized agencies showed a continuous expansion, which was the more striking when considered together with the fact that technical assistance funds had been made available to agencies for supplementary programmes during those years. The Committee expressed the opinion that technical assistance projects should receive advance consideration by legislative bodies, if only in broad outline, and that a review of projects should be made at periodic intervals. It noted that the joint administrative costs of the technical assistance programme were not submitted for review to any budget-approving body. The Advisory Committee also commented on the burden imposed by the large number of reports and studies on closely related economic and social subjects and called attention to the problems arising out of the creation of new international machinery outside the framework of the United Nations.

In resolution 497 A (XVI) the Council took note with satisfaction of the reports of the ACC and of the communication from the Advisory Committee.

The question of administrative and budgetary co-ordination between the United Nations and the specialized agencies was considered at the General Assembly's eighth session, at the 425th and 428th meetings of the Fifth Committee on 7 and 8 December. The Committee had before it the 26th report of the Advisory Committee to the eighth session (A/2582) and the information annex II (A/2383/Add.1) to the budget estimates for the financial year 1954.

In its report, the Advisory Committee stated that, while certain of the figures were estimates, the aggregate of expenditure proposed for 1954 in the United Nations and the specialized agencies, nevertheless, continued to show a marked increase in certain items, notably in official travel of staff and consultants. Even where, as in the case of printing, an actual increase was not recorded, the total still remained extremely high. Pointing out that budgets of the United Nations and the specialized agencies were adopted, according to the constitutional processes of the several organizations, by independent legislative bodies, the Advisory Committee stated that it therefore fell to governments to examine individually, in connexion with each separate budget, the problem of relative priority among major fields of activity. This process, the Committee considered, might be greatly facilitated if intergovernmental discussions were held at a central point.

The Advisory Committee again drew attention to the desirability of achieving a reasonable degree of uniformity in the presentation and form of budgets among the United Nations and the specialized agencies. It declared that it was the clear duty of a secretariat, whenever a large economy could be made, to lay alternative procedures before the legislative body concerned. A certain basic presentation, it considered, could be developed, to which would be added, where necessary and as requested by legislative bodies, additional informative material in the form of annexes.

The Advisory Committee urged the legislative bodies of the specialized agencies to give special attention to the problem of documentation, and stressed the need for a stricter editorial control of United Nations publications.

Information Annex II to the budget estimates for the financial year 1954 contained an analysis of United Nations and specialized agencies budget appropriations or estimates, an analysis of the financial status of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and a statement of extra-budgetary funds administered by the United Nations and the specialized agencies in the economic and social fields.

The Chairman of the Advisory Committee, in introducing his Committee's report to the Fifth Committee, made it clear that no attempt had been made to present a detailed or exhaustive analysis of agency budgets or budget estimates for 1954. These, he said, had been or would be examined by the competent bodies in each of the specialized agencies and, where appropriations had already been voted, there existed a record of the deliberations of the appropriate General Conference or Assembly, together with other pertinent material. With respect to technical assistance activities, he informed the Fifth Committee that the Advisory Committee during its first session in 1954 would conduct a review of the administrative expenditures of the Technical Assistance Board and of the participating organizations financed from the Special Account and also of their administrative procedures.

The Fifth Committee unanimously adopted a draft resolution proposed by the Committee Chairman (A/2619), which was adopted, without objection and without discussion, by the General Assembly, at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December, as resolution 779(VIII).

By it, the Assembly took note of the Advisory Committee's report concerning the administrative budgets of the specialized agencies for 1954, and invited the attention of the specialized agencies to the recommendations and suggestions made in that report.

b. CONFERENCE PATTERN

The General Assembly on 20 December 1952 adopted resolution 694(VII), by which it, inter alia, decided that a regular pattern of conferences should be established for a period of four years from 1 January 1954, under which sessions of all Headquarters-based bodies should be held in New York and sessions of all Geneva-based bodies should be held in Geneva, with certain exceptions.

Among the exceptions was the summer meeting of the Economic and Social Council, which could be held each year in Geneva. The Secretary-General was requested to transmit to all organs of the United Nations and to the specialized agencies a conference pattern based on the above principles.

The ACC, in its thirteenth report to the Council (E/2446), stated that on several occasions it had drawn attention to the desirability of a long-term pattern of international conferences which would enable the various organizations to make their arrangements for such conferences with adequate knowledge of the plans of other organizations. It noted with satisfaction that such a pattern had been approved by the General Assembly for a period of four years, and expressed the hope that this pattern would be maintained. It emphasized, however, that the proposed regular pattern could only fulfil its purpose if it were strictly adhered to by all the organs concerned.

In accordance with an instruction of the Fifth Committee, the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions reviewed (A/2501) the question. The Advisory Committee surveyed the developments which had led to the establishing of a fixed pattern of conferences. It stated that the Secretary-General had taken provisional action to implement the above decision of the Assembly, and that organs of the United Nations had arranged their 1954 sessions in accordance with a pattern presented by the Secretary-General which had also been examined by several specialized agencies. The Advisory Committee pointed out that the proposals to distribute in a more rational way the conference work-load between Headquarters and Geneva in themselves occasioned expenditure, and still left unsolved the question of the most profitable use of Headquarters conference space, for which maintenance costs would continue. When judged in relation to the heavy conference costs of previous years, which had been incurred on the basis of ad hoc decisions because of the absence of a pattern, strict adherence to the fixed pattern would result in distinct administrative and budgetary advantages, it stated.

At the General Assembly's eighth session, during the Fifth Committee's general discussion on budget estimates for the financial year 1954, particularly at its 397th and 398th meetings on 27 and 28 October, most representatives supported the views of the Advisory Committee concerning the necessity of adhering strictly to Assembly resolution 694(VII).

The representative of the United Kingdom submitted a draft resolution (A/C.5/L.246), which would have the Assembly stress the need to adhere to the fixed pattern and would invite the specialized agencies to give it due consideration in drawing up their own programme of meetings. The United Kingdom representative explained that, given the importance of this question, his delegation considered that the Committee should adopt a recommendation rather than merely express an opinion. The draft resolution, he stated, was intended to meet the desire of the Fifth Committee for economy and efficiency.

Some representatives, including those of Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Israel and the Netherlands, while not denying the importance of adhering to the pattern of conferences, saw no point in requesting the General Assembly to confirm a decision it had so recently taken. They were of the opinion that there was the danger of a precedent in this connexion which might lead to an impression that other decisions which were not subsequently confirmed ceased to be valid. The draft resolution appeared to them to contain no new elements, for it was an understood thing that any modification of the programme would need special authorization by the General Assembly.

Certain other representatives, however, including those of Egypt, Denmark, Pakistan, Syria and the United States, believed that confirmation by the General Assembly of its previous decision would be desirable because already, since the adoption of the resolution on programme of conferences, several organs had asked for an exception to be made in their case. Adoption of the United Kingdom draft resolution, they believed, would forestall any attempt to modify the pattern of conferences which had been accepted as an appropriate means for making the best use of the staff and resources of the United Nations. They considered that the General Assembly might, with advantage, confirm a previous decision in order to give it added weight, and there had been instances of such action in the past which had clearly not raised the point of precedent.

The Fifth Committee, at its 398th meeting on 28 October, adopted the United Kingdom draft resolution by 21 votes to 1, with 23 abstentions. The resolution recommended by the Committee (A/2622) was adopted unanimously, without discussion, by the Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December, as resolution 790(VIII).

By it, the Assembly noted the recommendations of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (E/2446) in its thirteenth report to the Economic and Social Council to the effect that the regular four-year pattern of conferences approved by the Assembly in 1952 could only fulfil its purpose if it was strictly adhered to by all the organs concerned. It also noted the opinion of the Advisory Committee (A/2501) to the effect that it regarded the programme as firmly fixed for the period of 1954 to 1957 and that any variations would presumably be authorized only by a special decision of the Assembly.

The Assembly then endorsed the opinion of the Advisory Committee and reaffirmed its recommendation that all organs of the United Nations arrange their meetings in accordance with the dates and places set forth in the pattern presented by the Secretary-General, and that the specialized agencies concerned be invited to give due consideration to this pattern in drawing up their own programmes of meetings.

c. REVIEW OF AUDIT PROCEDURES OF THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

The General Assembly on 20 December 1952 adopted resolution 672 B (VII),²⁰⁰ inter alia, inviting the Secretary-General and the executive heads of the specialized agencies to review in the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) the audit procedures and arrangements of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. Reports were called for by the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions.

The Secretary-General reported (A/2479) that the existing audit procedures and arrangements had been reviewed by the ACC (E/2446) at its sixteenth session, held from 25 to 27 May 1953. He stated his agreement with the conclusion reached by the ACC that there did not appear to be at present any need for a general change in the type of audit arrangements. He thought that any change in the existing audit system could be dealt with more satisfactorily in connexion with the more general question of the reorganization of the Secretariat and suggested postponing the question to the ninth session of the Assembly.

The Advisory Committee in its report (A/2546) endorsed the proposed postponement and expressed the hope that nothing would be done in the course of the review of the question to weaken the principle that had inspired, during 1948-49, the establishment of a Joint Panel of Auditors and the formulation of a common set of principles for the audits.

Both reports were considered by the Fifth Committee at its 405th meeting on 16 November. The observation of the Advisory Committee was endorsed by the representatives of Argentina and the Netherlands, in particular. The representative of Argentina also supported the opinion expressed by the ACC to the effect that any full-time staff that might be set up to deal with questions of external audit should not replace the existing Board of Auditors and thereby impair the accepted principle that final responsibility for external audit rested with governmental auditors.

The Fifth Committee adopted, without objection, a recommendation proposed by the Committee Chairman (A/2566), and the General Assembly, at its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November, without objection and without discussion, adopted the Committee's recommendation, as resolution 768(VIII).

By it, the Assembly, after taking note of the Secretary-General's report and the observations on it by the Advisory Committee, postponed consideration of this item until its ninth session.

d. AUDIT REPORTS RELATING TO EXPENDITURE BY SPECIALIZED AGENCIES OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE FUNDS ALLOCATED FROM THE SPECIAL ACCOUNT

The General Assembly in resolution 519 A (VI)²⁰¹ of 12 January 1952 called on the specialized agencies participating in the Expanded Programme of technical assistance to provide in their regular budget documents, information concerning their estimates for the expenditure of technical assistance funds and to transmit to the General Assembly, for examination and approval, the audit reports relating to expenditure of technical assistance funds allocated from the Special Account after approval by the appropriate body of the agencies.

Accordingly, the Secretary-General, in a note (A/C.5/546) dated 7 October 1953, transmitted to the Assembly the reports submitted by the specialized agencies participating in the Expanded Programme. These reports comprised for each agency financial statements covering operations under the Expanded Programme in the form prescribed by the Technical Assistance Board (TAB), accompanied by the Certificate of the External Auditors and, where applicable, by such further comments on technical assistance matters as the auditors had included in their reports to the general conference or equivalent authority of the agency concerned. The Secretary-General's note was also accompanied by a combined statement showing the status of allocations to the participating organizations under the Expanded Programme as of 31 December 1952, and summarizing the separate audited financial statements submitted by the agencies, as well as similar information regarding the transactions of the United Nations under the same Programme.

With one exception, the audit reports had been approved by the general conference (or equivalent authority) of the agency concerned. In the case of FAO, the audit reports were to be considered by the FAO Conference in November 1953.

Total allocations during the period under review amounted to $25,372,377, of which $23,905,388 was spent or obligated up to 31 December 1952.

In its report to the Assembly (A/2545), the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions stated that strict adherence to the letter of resolution 519 A (VI)—in respect of prior approval of the reports by the general conferences—would produce an unreasonable delay, with the possibility that General Assembly consideration might have to be deferred until some four years after certain of the audited transactions had been effected.

In connexion with the accounts of FAO, special attention was drawn to the fact that the external auditor had questioned an amount of approximately $125,000 recorded as an obligation at 31 December 1952 in respect of certain fellowships. The Advisory Committee understood that had this obligation been omitted from the 1952 accounts (in accordance with the definition of obligations adopted by the Technical Assistance Board in respect of fellowships), the amount available for redistribution during 1953 among participating organizations (including FAO) would have been correspondingly increased. Consequently, not only was the authority of TAB involved, but also the interest of other agencies participating in the Expanded Programme.

The Advisory Committee observed that the External Auditor of ICAO called attention to the fact that participating organizations had not yet agreed upon a policy to govern pension scheme obligations (if any) to technical assistance personnel.

The Secretary-General's report and the comments on it by the Advisory Committee were considered by the Fifth Committee at its 405th meeting on 16 November. Referring to the comments of the Advisory Committee regarding entitlement of project personnel to pension rights under the Joint Staff Pension Fund, the representative of Australia inquired as to what would be the effect of the decision of TAB to introduce, as from 1

January 1954, revised conditions of service, under which project personnel appointed for one year or more to continuing posts (that is, posts normally expected to continue for at least five years) would receive appointments governed by the basic conditions of service applied to regular staff members, including eligibility for admission to the Pension Fund. He suggested that the admission as participants in the Fund of any considerable number of such personnel might conceivably have actuarial implications with respect to which the Joint Staff Pension Board should perhaps be consulted.

The Fifth Committee adopted, without objection, a draft resolution proposed by the Committee Chairman and amended by the representative of Australia (A/2567), which was likewise adopted, without objection and without discussion, by the General Assembly at its 458th plenary meeting on 27 November, as resolution 769(VIII).

By it, the Assembly took note of the audit reports relating to expenditure by specialized agencies of technical assistance funds allocated from the Special Account, for the year ended 31 December 1952, and of the observations on them by the Advisory Committee.

e. COMMON SERVICES AND CO-ORDINATION OF SERVICES

The ACC, in its thirteenth report to the Economic and Social Council (E/2446 & Corr.1), stated that, in pursuance of Assembly resolution 672 A (VII) concerning the co-ordination of administrative procedures and services between the United Nations and the specialized agencies, studies had been initiated on such questions as: library co-ordination; co-ordination of public information services; co-ordination of printing services; and the establishment of a joint purchasing and a common supply service in Geneva.

f. TELECOMMUNICATION FACILITIES

In the field of telecommunication facilities, the ACC stated that it was studying such questions as: the circumstances in which the urgency or importance of the telecommunications of the specialized agencies warrants special treatment for their telegrams or telephone calls; the possibility of changing the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies as it concerns the question of government privileges for telegrams and telephone calls; and the question of the use by the specialized agencies of the United Nations point-to-point telecommunication network when such use competes with existing commercial telecommunication networks.

U. RELATIONS WITH NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS

1. Application of the Headquarters Agreement to Representatives of Non-Governmental Organizations in Consultative Status with the Economic and Social Council

In accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 288(X)²⁰² of 27 February 1950 concerning consultative arrangements with non-governmental organizations, the Women's International Democratic Federation (WIDF), a non-governmental organization in consultative relationship with the Council in category B, designated Mrs. Margarette Rae Luckock as its representative to attend the seventh session of the Commission on the Status of Women, which was to convene at United Nations Headquarters on 16 March 1953. After the Commission was informed that Mrs. Luckock had not been granted an entry visa to the United States to enable her to come to United Nations Headquarters, it adopted a resolution (E/2386) regretting this fact, and calling the Council's attention to the situation. The Council was requested to examine the question at its fifteenth session which was then in progress in order to take appropriate measures.

Accordingly, the Economic and Social Council, at its 673rd plenary meeting on 31 March 1953, decided to add to its agenda for its fifteenth session the item: "Admission of the representative of the Women's International Democratic Federation for participation in the Commission on the Status of Women in accordance with the resolution adopted by the Commission".

The Council considered the matter at its 675th to 677th, 679th, 686th, 687th, 694th, 701st, 702nd and 704th plenary meetings, on 1, 2, 6, 9, 15, 21, 27 and 28 April.

At the Council's 679th meeting on 9 April, the representative of the United States informed the Council that his Government had refused visas to Mrs. Luckock, the representative of WIDF, to attend the seventh session of the Commission on the Status of Women and the fifteenth session of the Council, and to Jan Dessau, the representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), a non-governmental organization in category A, to attend the same session of the Council, in the exercise of the right to safeguard its security which it reserved to itself in section 6 of the Joint Resolution (Public Law 357) of the 80th Congress, which authorized the United States to enter into the Headquarters Agreement with the United Nations.

On the proposal of the representative of Sweden, which was supported by the representative of France, the Council decided to ask the Legal Department of the United Nations Secretariat for an opinion on the legal aspects of the decision taken by the United States Government.

The Legal Department accordingly submitted a memorandum (E/2397) on the question, which concluded that the persons falling within the classes referred to in section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement²⁰³ were entitled to transit to and from the Headquarters District, and that this right of transit had not been made the subject of any reservation. The memorandum stated that, should the United States adhere to its position, it was clear that there would then exist a dispute between the United Nations and the United States concerning the interpretation or application of the Headquarters Agreement. In such event, the memorandum continued, the Council would note that section 21 of the Headquarters Agreement provided for negotiations, and, if necessary, arbitration.

At the Council's 686th meeting on 15 April, the United States representative stated that the Legal Department's memorandum showed that there was a difference of opinion between that Department and the United States Government. His Government, he said, recognized the validity of the Headquarters Agreement and of the Joint Resolution (Public Law 357) of the 80th Congress and would co-operate with the Secretary-General in whatever negotiations the latter might arrange to discuss the problem. He considered that little would be gained by embarking on a discussion of the matter in the Council at the moment and he therefore suggested that the negotiations, to which he had referred, should be started as soon as possible.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR stated that the failure to permit entry of the representatives of WFTU and WIDF was incompatible with the specific obligations assumed by the United States Government under the Headquarters Agreement. They argued that the Council must make every effort to ensure attendance at its current session of the duly accredited representatives of WIDF and WFTU. They should be permitted to enjoy the consultative status granted them in accordance with the Charter.

The representative of Sweden remarked that the memorandum had helped to clarify the issue. As the United States representative had indicated the readiness of his Government to enter into negotiations at the earliest opportunity, it was very possible that the problem would be solved amicably, and he therefore orally proposed that the Council should take no further action for the time being.

Most of the representatives, including those of Australia, Belgium, Egypt, France, India, the Philippines, Turkey, the United Kingdom, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, supported the Swedish proposal. They strongly favoured the suggestion that the Secretary-General and the United States Government should immediately enter into negotiations and, if necessary, into arbitration, as provided under section 21 of the Headquarters Agreement. It was essential, they said, that the work of the United Nations and its organs should be allowed to proceed in an orderly manner consistent with the provisions of the Charter and of the Agreement, and that no obstacles should arbitrarily be placed in their way.

The Council, at its 687th plenary meeting on 15 April, unanimously approved an Indian oral proposal to adjourn discussion of the matter in order to create a favourable atmosphere for immediate negotiations.

The United States Government and the Secretary-General then entered into negotiations. Since the negotiations had not been concluded at the close of the session, the Council, at its 704th plenary meeting on 28 April, decided to include on the agenda of its sixteenth session the item: "The question of access to Headquarters of representatives of non-governmental organizations in consultative status: report by the Secretary-General on the result of his negotiations with the United States Government."

At the Council's sixteenth session, the question was discussed at the 743rd and 745th plenary meetings, on 31 July and 1 August.

The Secretary-General presented a progress report (E/2492) and an oral statement (subsequently distributed as document E/2501) on the negotiations with the United States concerning the interpretation of the Headquarters Agreement. In additional oral comments, he stated that it was his view that the negotiations had been completed in the sense that the principles involved had been reaffirmed and the area of disagreement delimited. At the same time, they were not completed and should remain incomplete in the sense that they could be continued in respect of any concrete cases which might arise in the future.

The Council had before it three draft resolutions on the question: one by Poland (E/L.493/Rev.1), one by Cuba (E/L.560) and one by India (E/L.561).

The Polish draft resolution, inter alia, would have the Council request the Secretary-General to continue negotiations with the United States. In the event that such negotiations did not yield positive results by 1 November 1953, the Secretary-General would then be requested to submit the problem to arbitration in accordance with the Headquarters Agreement.

The Cuban draft resolution would have the Council: (1) note the report of the Secretary-General on the question; and (2) trust that any remaining questions would be resolved satisfactorily in the "application of the Headquarters Agreement or in further negotiations".

The Indian draft resolution would have the Council: (1) take note of the Secretary-General's report; (2) express satisfaction at the progress achieved; and (3) request the Secretary-General to submit a further report at the Council's seventeenth session.

In submitting his draft resolution, the representative of Poland said that his delegation attached great importance to the question of access to the United Nations Headquarters of representatives of non-governmental organizations in consultative status. The problem, he submitted, was much larger than the title of the item on the agenda indicated. It concerned, not only the simple question of access of representatives, but also the adequate functioning of the United Nations, the proper interpretation of the Charter and of the various agreements with Member States, the independence of the United Nations and the question of equality of treatment of persons having and desiring to exercise the right to certain relationships with the United Nations. While believing that a satisfactory solution could be found in the near future, his delegation considered, however, that the discussions should not be prolonged indefinitely, with a debate in the Council when a fresh case arose. A time limit was therefore proposed in the Polish draft, he explained, at the expiry of which the United Nations should resort to other means than consultation, as was provided in the Headquarters Agreement.

The representative of Cuba, explaining his draft resolution, said that his delegation sought an impartial and objective approach to the question. In view of the Secretary-General's belief that any remaining questions would be satisfactorily solved, it was undesirable, he stated, to go into the substance of the question or to discuss matters of principle or of law. Any legal analysis of the Headquarters Agreement, he argued, would merely introduce confusion, instead of helping the Secretary-General to safeguard United Nations interests; it would also raise questions of international law which were possibly not within the competence of the Council and, in any case, could not be dealt with at short notice. In view of the optimistic tone of the Secretary-General's progress report, and of the importance of not taking any action that might be interpreted by the United States Government as affecting its right to safeguard its own security, Cuba had drafted its resolution.

The representative of India said that the issue, although arising out of a few specific cases, was of great importance, and that it might even be maintained that the success of the United Nations activities at Headquarters depended on its satisfactory solution. The first two paragraphs of his draft resolution, he explained, were not likely to arouse any opposition, since they merely took note of the Secretary-General's report and expressed satisfaction at the progress made. The third paragraph, calling for the submission of a further report, he said, had been inserted because the Council was involved, and had asked the Secretary-General to submit a report.

The representative of the United States congratulated the Secretary-General on his personal conduct of the negotiations with the United States Government on the question under discussion, which involved some difficult points of law and practice. He expressed great satisfaction at the progress achieved in those negotiations and was confident that the understanding reached would eliminate any future difficulties in the matter. He stated that the United States Government stood ready, in direct consultations with the Secretary-General, to resolve any further questions should they arise.

The USSR representative said that no one disputed the sovereign rights of the United States Government, or of any other government, to safeguard its own security. That was not the question at issue; what was involved was a question of disagreement on the interpretation of the Headquarters Agreement. For that reason, his delegation supported the Polish draft resolution. In his view, there were no substantial differences between the three draft resolutions before the Council, and it ought therefore to be possible for the representatives of Cuba, India and Poland to find some common ground and submit a joint draft resolution.

The representative of Yugoslavia also stated that, despite the doubts expressed in the discussion, there was considerable unanimity of opinion, and he therefore urged that there should be one text and one unanimous vote.

Most of the representatives on the Council, including those of Australia, Belgium, China, Egypt, France, the Philippines, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, supported wholeheartedly or with certain reservations the Cuban draft resolution. They agreed that the broader issue underlying the discussion was one of fundamental importance. The particular question of access to Headquarters of representatives of non-governmental organizations in consultative status was, and would continue to be, of interest to the Council because of the Council's responsibilities under the Charter, its day-to-day work, in which representatives of non-governmental organizations participated, and its right to determine which organizations it would admit to a special consultative relationship. They shared the Secretary-General's optimism as to the outcome of the negotiations in progress, and believed that the imposition of a time limit for the achievement of a particular aim would be undesirable.

The Cuban representative agreed to amend his proposal in accordance with various suggestions made during the discussion. Thus, he accepted, inter alia, a suggestion by the French representative to refer to the Secretary-General's statements in addition to his report and a suggestion by the representatives of India and Uruguay to delete in the operative part of the draft the reference to "further negotiations". It was stated that the implication of that phrase was that negotiations could be carried on outside the framework of the Headquarters Agreement.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted unanimously by the Council at its 745th plenary meeting on 1 August, as resolution 509(XVI). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council

"1. Notes the report of the Secretary-General and his oral statements of 31 July and 1 August 1953 on negotiations with the United States of America concerning the interpretation of the Headquarters Agreement on the question of access to Headquarters of representatives of non-governmental organizations in consultative status;

"2. Trusts that any remaining questions will be satisfactorily and expeditiously resolved within the provisions of the Headquarters Agreement."

Five additional written statements were submitted jointly by a number of consultative non-governmental organizations. c. AGENDA ITEMS PROPOSED BY NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS

The following items were proposed for the provisional agenda of the Council by non-governmental organizations in category A:

(1) Reconversion after the rearmament period: item proposed by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

At its meeting on 22 April, the NGO Committee decided to recommend to the Council "that it place the item proposed by the ICFTU on the provisional agenda of its sixteenth session in the form of a sub-item to the item 'Full Employment'".

The Council then decided that the sub-item should be included in the agenda of the sixteenth session (E/2421).²¹⁰

(2) Measures to be taken for the application of a progressive social policy throughout the world, particularly for the defence, improvement and extension of social security: item proposed by the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU).

At its meeting on 23 April the NGO Committee decided "to postpone consideration of the request submitted by the WFTU until the series of meetings of the Council Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations to be held during the sixteenth session of the Council, provided the organization submits further documentation on the subject to the Committee in time to reach members of the Committee not later than four weeks before the opening of the sixteenth session of the Council".

The Council then decided that the WFTU memorandum, previously issued as document E/C.2/R.17, would be included in the basic documentation (E/2422) for item 10 of the provisional agenda for the sixteenth session, which dealt with the programme of concerted practical action in the social field of the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

6. Union of International Associations

The Council, at its sixteenth session, received a report of its Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations (E/2489) which referred to resolution 334 B (XI) in which the Council had decided that the United Nations should not publish a Yearbook of International Organizations, in view of the intention of the Union to do so, and expressed the hope that the Secretary-General would co-operate with the Union. The Committee noted that the co-operation had given complete satisfaction and pointed out the value of the work done by the Union in the field of international non-governmental organizations. The Committee unanimously expressed its appreciation of the value and usefulness of the Yearbook and members voiced the hope that the work of the Union would become better known to Member States and that its continuation would be secured.

On the basis of information transmitted during 1953, the Secretary-General, in accordance with Assembly resolution 218(III), prepared a number of summaries and analyses (A/2407, A/2408, A/2409, A/2410 & Add.1, A/2411 & Add.1, A/2413 & Add.1-8, A/2414 & Add.1 & 2).²

Summaries and analyses were considered by the sixteen-member Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories set up for this purpose by General Assembly resolution 332(IV)³ of 2 December 1949 and renewed by General Assembly resolution 646(VII) of 10 December 1952. The Committee held seventeen meetings, from 18 August to 8 September. The Committee's report to the Assembly (A/2465) contained, among other things, sections dealing with: educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories; the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73e of the Charter; participation of representatives from the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee; social and economic conditions; and international collaboration in respect of economic, social and educational conditions, including technical assistance.

The report was considered during the General Assembly's eighth session, at the 331st to 339th meetings of the Fourth Committee, from 12 to 21 October, and at the 459th plenary meeting of the Assembly on 27 November. The Assembly's consideration of particular aspects is dealt with below under subject headings.

Generally speaking, representatives in the Fourth Committee considered that the report had made a good contribution to the study of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and that the special study on educational conditions supplemented earlier studies by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on economic and social conditions. The representatives of Argentina, Brazil, the Dominican Republic, France, Guatemala, Haiti, Indonesia, Iran, Saudi Arabia and Uruguay were among those who praised the Committee's report.

In the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and in the General Assembly, statements reserving the position of their Governments in regard to sovereignty over and the transmission of information on Netherlands New Guinea (Irian) were made by the representatives of Indonesia and the Netherlands. Reservations were made in regard to sovereignty over British Honduras (Belize Territory) by the representatives of Guatemala and the United Kingdom. The representative of Mexico stated that if the constitutional status of British Honduras were changed the rights of Mexico over a part of that Territory would have to be taken into account. Reservations were also made in regard to sovereignty over the Falkland Islands (Islas Malvinas) by the representatives of Argentina and the United Kingdom, and over Aden by the representatives of the United Kingdom and Yemen.

Formal declarations were made by the representatives of Iraq, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Syria to the effect that their participation in the discussion on information relating to Morocco and Tunisia was without prejudice to the recognition by their Governments of the sovereign status of these two Territories which were bound only by treaty obligations to France.

1. Conditions, Development and Policies in the Non-Self-Governing Territories

a. GENERAL CONDITIONS

During the Fourth Committee's general debate on information from Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73e of the Charter, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France, the United Kingdom and the United States assured the Committee that they were carrying out policies aimed at the achievement of self-government or independence for the Territories, but they stressed that real and enduring progress could not be made too rapidly.

Some representatives, including those of Haiti, India, Indonesia, Liberia, Pakistan, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, felt that insufficient progress was being made in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representatives of Venezuela and Yugoslavia emphasized that peace was indivisible and stated that failure to meet the aspirations of the indigenous inhabitants would endanger world peace. They and the representatives of Brazil, Egypt, Indonesia, Liberia, Mexico and the Philippines called for the co-operation of both Administering and non-administering Members in seeking a solution of the problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR maintained that the Administering Members were not fulfilling their obligations under the Charter; that they were failing to carry out the recommendations of the General Assembly; and that, in pursuance of their colonial policies, they were exploiting the indigenous inhabitants, and were attempting to conceal the real conditions which prevailed in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

At the 335th meeting of the Fourth Committee, during the general debate, the representative of Guatemala asked the Chairman of the Fourth Committee to arrange for the communication from Reverend Michael Scott, dated 15 October, and his letter to the Secretary-General, dated 5 May 1953, to be circulated to the Committee.

The communication asked the General Assembly to include in its agenda an examination of the proposed Central African Federation of Northern Rhodesia, Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. At its 337th meeting on 19 October, the Committee decided, without dissentient vote, that the letter (A/C.4/241) should be circulated; the representative of the Union of South Africa asked that the reservations of his Government be recorded.

In his letter, Mr. Scott said that he had been asked to present the observations of 83 Chiefs of the Nyasaland Protectorate, of African members of the Legislative Assembly of Northern Rhodesia, and of members of the Northern Rhodesian African Congress. These observations, he claimed, indicated that no adequate consideration of the economic, social and educational problems of Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia could be undertaken without an understanding of the constitutional changes which were taking place in those Territories, to the prejudice of the large majority of inhabitants.

The Chiefs also stated that the proposed Federation would obstruct the progress of the African people, reinforce colour barriers which they said already existed in Southern and Northern Rhodesia, and relegate Africans to a position of subordination. They asked that the United Nations refer the question to the International Court of Justice or another appropriate organ to determine whether the proposed Federation would not be contrary to the Charter.

During the general debate on information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, France, Guatemala, India, Poland and Syria, among others, made references to the question of the Federation. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Poland and Syria were among those who stated that the question should be considered by the Committee. The opposition to the scheme shown by Africans justified an examination, these representatives felt. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia and Poland said that the Federation was an attempt to enforce the colonial regime and to oppress the indigenous inhabitants. They also felt that rights of self-determination were being endangered and that the problem of racial discrimination would be extended by the scheme.

At the 342nd meeting the representative of India, referring to the communication which had been circulated to the Committee, formally proposed that the Committee should not close the debate on the item of the agenda under discussion.

The representatives of France and the United Kingdom, on the other hand, opposed inclusion of such an item in the agenda. Moving closure of the debate on the agenda item concerning information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the General Assembly had no authority to examine certain aspects of the political situation in Central Africa. Petitions could be considered from Trust Territories but not from Non-Self-Governing Territories and the United Kingdom, although prepared to co-operate, could not concede that its record be examined in the light of communications from individuals without competence in the matter. Moreover, an examination of the question was untimely since the Central African Federation was already in being.

The United Kingdom motion for closure of the debate was rejected by 25 votes to 17, with 11 abstentions.

Speaking against the motion for closure, the representative of India said that two of the Territories involved in the Federation were Non-Self-Governing Territories on which information concerning educational, economic and social conditions was furnished to the United Nations. Members of the Committee would be anxious to know how these two Territories would be affected. She asked for assurances from the United Kingdom representative that the constitutional changes contemplated by the Central African Federation had the support of the African people and that the Act constituting the Federation did not violate the treaties granting to the African Chiefs the protection of the United Kingdom Government.

She recalled that information on Nyasaland transmitted to the Secretary-General in 1952 had shown the beginnings of social and economic progress and development and said that the Committee could ask for information on the future of plans and programmes outlined in that information in view of the new constitutional status which would be inaugurated during 1954.

The representative of India said that the Committee could not ignore the just fears of the Africans that the scheme would prevent the political evolution of the people of Nyasaland. That Territory had 5,000 white settlers and two million indigenous inhabitants, and, under the federation plan, the white settlers would be answerable to no one outside the area. Existing safeguards were illusory and provision should be made for securing African interests, she said. The consequences of the federation would include territorial segregation of Indians and Africans, increased European migration and a halt to Asian migration, she maintained.

The representative of India proposed the adjournment of the debate on the understanding that delegations would be able to revert to the item later.

By 25 votes to 4, with 22 abstentions, the Committee adopted the Indian proposal.

At the 395th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 7 December, the Chairman recalled that, at the request of India, the Committee had decided to keep open the agenda item.

The representative of India made a statement, alleging that certain political and administrative measures were jeopardizing the welfare of the people of some Non-Self-Governing Territories in Africa and retarding their political, economic, social and educational advancement.

Communications from the Nyasaland Chiefs to the Secretary-General, she said, revealed the fears regarding the proposed Central African Federation. Newspapers reported violence, repression and general dissatisfaction. Africans felt that the proposed federation would check progress towards freedom under the protection of the United Kingdom administration, she said. The Committee was justified in asking for an assurance that the United Kingdom Government would be able to continue the guarantees against disabilities of the Africans already laid down in the Royal Instructions. India, she said, asked further assurance that the freely expressed wishes of the people would be taken into consideration before the changes were finalized.

The representative of India also referred to the situation in Kenya and Uganda, and asked for assurances that the change in the political state of the protectorates would not leave them outside the scope of Article 73e of the Charter and that the educational setback following the closing of schools in Kenya would be halted.

The representative of the United Kingdom said that he would not comment on the statement made by the representative of India as the substance of her statement was outside the scope of the Committee. The basic views of his delegation had already been stated on this matter in the Fourth Committee, he said, and he had nothing to add to those views.

The Committee then closed the debate.

b. EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

In accordance with Assembly resolutions 333(IV)⁴ and 565(VI)⁵ the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories paid special attention during 1953 to educational conditions in the Territories. A special section of the Committee's report (A/2465) was devoted to this subject.

In view of the fact that the Committee was to pay special attention to education, studies had been prepared dealing both with a review of the aspects of education to which special attention had been given during 1950, including literacy (A/AC.35/L.123 & A/AC.35/L.136), use of indigenous languages (A/AC.35/L.137), equal treatment (A/AC.35/L.130), participation of inhabitants in educational policies and programmes (A/AC.35/L.127), as well as other aspects of education not previously treated in detail, which included compulsory education (A/AC.35/L.128 & A/AC.35/L.143), education of girls (A/AC.35/L.133), vocational education (A/AC.35/L.132 & A/AC.35/L.141), the financing of education (A/AC.35/L.122 & Add.1). In addition, the Committee had before it, for reference, the special report on education prepared in 1950 and a report by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) on its activities in Non-Self-Governing Territories. Special advisers on education were included in the delegations of France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Committee also had before it a brief account of the action taken by the Members concerned to bring the reports of the Committee to the attention of the authorities responsible in the Territories for the implementation of educational, economic and social policies (A/AC.35/L.140).

While it was generally agreed by members of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories that most of the technical problems of education were common to all countries, it was considered by some representatives that certain aspects had particular application to Non-Self-Governing Territories. In the main, these concerned the objectives of educational policy and practice, the type and content of the education provided and the attitude adopted toward the indigenous culture. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories established a sub-committee to prepare a special report on educational conditions. This Sub-Committee, composed of the representatives of Brazil, China, France, India, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, held six meetings from 27 August to 3 September and its report was unanimously approved by the full Committee.

The special report on education which formed part 2 of the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/2465) stated, among other things, that the importance of educational advancement had been increasingly advanced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and that there had been an appreciable increase in the educational facilities obtainable in many of them. Available information, it stated, on progress in school enrolment in 59 Non-Self-Governing Territories showed that between 1945-46 and 1951 the number of children enrolled in schools increased from over 5,000,000 to over 7,000,000. The advance in university education during recent years, said the report, was another test of progress. In 1952, in Territories under United Kingdom Administration, there were 3,234 full-time students in the new or restored territorial university institutions while, on 1 January 1953, over 6,000 students were attending such institutions in the United Kingdom and in the Irish Republic, compared with under 4,000 on 1 January 1950. The increase in enrolment at French Metropolitan universities by students from overseas Territories had also been marked, the number reaching by mid-1952 a total of 2,012, comprising indigenous and non-indigenous students from North Africa and 1,760 from the other overseas Territories. Higher education in the Territories had expanded at the same time. In North Africa, for instance, the institutes of higher studies had a total enrolment of 3,392 students, and that of French West Africa a total of 297 students. In the Territories under United States administration, there were over 20,000 students in university institutions.

The expenditure on the various forms of education had generally increased both absolutely and as a percentage of general expenditure. In seven African Territories under United Kingdom Administration (Gold Coast, Kenya, Nigeria, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Sierra Leone, Uganda), 1946 recurrent expenditure on African education amounting to £2,100,000 increased to £6,100,000, according to the latest figures (1950, 1951 or 1952). In French Equatorial Africa, the recurrent budget for education for 1952 was 1,495 million metropolitan francs and, in French West Africa, the budget of the various Territories, excluding grants from the Metropolitan country, was 7,420 million metropolitan francs. In Madagascar, the budget for education rose from 1,373 million metropolitan francs in 1951 to 1,955 million in 1952. In Morocco and Tunisia, the budgets for recurrent expenditures, excluding capital outlay, amounted in 1953 to 7,814 million and 6,131 million metropolitan francs, respectively. In the Belgian Congo, the corresponding 1948 budget figure of 188 million francs was reported to have increased to 482 million francs by 1952. Expressed in the terms of local currencies, 20,500 thousands of units were spent on education in the Federation of Malaya and Singapore in 1948 and 92,872 in 1951; in Jamaica, 780 in 1948 and 1,578 in 1950.

Figures such as the above, the report said, should be read in conjunction with many other facts which showed how much remained to be done. The figures on the increase in school enrolment had to be balanced by the situation in many parts of Africa where less than one tenth of the children were attending school; they did not show that there and elsewhere a large proportion of the children enrolled failed, or were unable, to remain at school for anything approaching the minimum period required for the laying of the first foundation of a literate education. There were, in general, fewer girls than boys in primary schools and still fewer in secondary schools. Again, while the proportion of government revenue spent on education was from 15 to 20 per cent or more of territorial revenue in a number of Territories, it fell far below 10 per cent in many others. In general, the opportunities for school attendance were far below the demands and the needs of the peoples of the Territories.

When the wider aspects of education were considered, the call for accelerated action was all the more striking, the report said. Not only was there too little education, with too few schools and too short a period of schooling, but in most cases the quality of education was open to criticism. The need for education had increased, the problems had become even more complex, and the whole process of aiding the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to attain self-government was hindered by inadequacies in their education. Even though the Administering Members had, in their various Territories, done much to introduce and to develop education, sometimes with spectacular results, the education which was being provided did not yet satisfy the needs of the peoples either in quantity or in quality.

In the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the objectives of education were stated in the special report to be:

(1) to develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility among the peoples, and to enable them to take an increasing share of responsibility in the conduct of their own affairs;

(2) to raise the standards of living of the people by helping them to improve their economic productivity and standards of health;

(3) to promote the social progress of the Territories, taking into account the basic cultural values and the aspirations of the peoples concerned;

(4) to secure the extension of the intellectual development of the peoples so as to provide for them access to all levels of culture.

Education was thus an integral part of general progress, reaching the adults as well as the children and aiming at the highest possible development of the individual in the changing society of which he forms part. In the Non-Self-Governing Territories, this process would include familiarity and training in the use of tools of economic, social and political advancement so that a full measure of self-government could be attained.

Following approval of the report (A/AC.35/L.149), the members of the Sub-Committee presented to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories a joint draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.151), which would have the General Assembly approve the report on educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories as a supplement to the report approved in 1950, and invite the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned, for their consideration. The draft resolution was approved unanimously by the Committee (A/2465 A).

This resolution was considered by the Fourth Committee during its discussion of the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Although representatives referred to individual aspects of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, principal attention was given to general educational policies and programmes in the Territories.

A number of amendments were submitted to the draft resolution approving the special report on education.

At the 339th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 21 October, Poland submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.284) which, in effect, would have the General Assembly note the report without formally approving it. This amendment, which was supported by the representatives of the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, and opposed by the representatives of Australia, Colombia, France, Guatemala, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Mexico, New Zealand, Thailand and Venezuela, was rejected by the Committee at its 341st meeting on 22 October by 41 votes to 5, with 1 abstention.

Guatemala submitted amendments (A/C.4/L.280) which sought a number of additions to the recommendations by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, including a declaration by the Assembly of the aims of education in those Territories. In terms of the amendment, the Assembly would declare, as the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories had done in its report (see above), that such education should be designed to familiarize the inhabitants with and train them in the use of the tools of economic, social and political progress, with a view to the attainment of a full measure of self-government. The Guatemalan amendment would also have the General Assembly enunciate and emphasize the objectives of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as stated in the special report.⁶

In addition, it would have the Assembly recommend to the Administering Members that in order to carry out these objectives and, in general, to solve the educational problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, they should make the greatest possible use of the facilities of United Nations technical assistance and of the specialized agencies, especially those of UNESCO and the International Labour Organisation (ILO).

Support for the Guatemalan amendments, with or without reservations, was expressed by the representatives of Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, the Philippines, Thailand and Venezuela.

Colombia presented an amendment (A/C.4/L.286) to the Guatemalan proposal, seeking the redrafting of the amendment, but later withdrew its proposal.

Brazil also submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.287 & Corr.1) to the Guatemalan draft which would delete the recommendation that Administering Members should make the greatest possible use of the facilities of the United Nations technical assistance and the specialized agencies, replacing it with the text: "they should seek the technical advice of the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and make the greatest possible use of the facilities of the specialized agencies".

Guatemala accepted the Brazilian proposal, and, in addition:

(1) at the request of Australia, agreed to a redrafting which, among other things, would have the Assembly affirm that education should be planned in accordance with the four stated objectives of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories; and

⁶ See A/2465, Part 2; see also above.

(2) at the request of Australia, India and the USSR agreed to avoid specific mention of UNESCO and ILO in a reference to aid by the specialized agencies which Administering Members would be urged to seek.

All the Guatemalan amendments were adopted by the Committee at its 341st meeting on 22 October, by votes ranging from 50 to 1 to 42 to 1, with 7 abstentions.

Egypt had also submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.281/Rev.1) which would add to the Guatemalan amendment a paragraph recommending further to the Administering Members that they make the greatest possible use of offers made to them by other Member States, through the Secretary-General or the specialized agencies concerned or in other appropriate ways, to aid educational advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, in such ways as by making available fellowships, scholarships and internships to qualified students from these Territories.

The representatives of Brazil, Colombia, Guatemala, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Thailand and Venezuela supported the Egyptian amendment, stating that it was in the best interests of the dependent peoples that full advantage be taken of available opportunities; it was adopted by 41 votes to 1, with 8 abstentions.

The remaining paragraphs of the draft resolution recommended by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories were adopted, in votes ranging from 50 to none to 45 to none, with 5 abstentions. The amended draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by the Fourth Committee by 51 votes to none.

At its 459th plenary meeting on 27 November, the General Assembly adopted the resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2556 II) unanimously. Resolution 743(VIII) lead:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that, by resolution 445(V) adopted on 12 December 1950, it approved the special report on education drawn up in 1950 as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and of the problems still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Noting the further report prepared in 1953 by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on educational conditions in these Territories,

"1. Approves this further report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories as a supplement to the report approved in 1950;

"2. Emphasizes that the objectives of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories are:

"(a) To develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility among the peoples, and to enable them to take an increasing share of responsibility in the conduct of their own affairs;

"(b) To raise the standards of living of the peoples by helping them to improve their economic productivity and standards of health;

"(c) To promote the social progress of the Territories, taking into account the basic cultural values and the aspirations of the peoples concerned;

"(d) To secure the extension of the intellectual development of the peoples so as to provide for them access to all levels of culture;

"3. Affirms that, in accordance with the above objectives, the process of education should be designed to familiarize the inhabitants with and train them in the use of the tools of economic, social and political progress, with a view to the attainment of a full measure of self-government;

"4. Recommends to the Administering Members that, in order to carry out the said objectives and in general to solve the educational problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, they should seek the technical advice of the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and make the greatest possible use of the facilities of the specialized agencies;

"5. Recommends further to the Administering Members that they similarly make the greatest possible use of offers that may be made to them by other States Members of the United Nations through the Secretary-General or through the specialized agencies concerned or in other appropriate ways, for the purpose of facilitating the educational advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories by such means as making available fellowships, scholarships and internships to qualified students from these Territories;

"6. Invites the Secretary-General to communicate the report on education and the present resolution to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration."

c. ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Both in accordance with the provisions of its work set out in resolution 333(IV) and with resolution 564(VI), wherein the General Assembly approved the special report of the Committee in 1951 on economic conditions and problems of economic development in Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories had before it the Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information concerning economic conditions and the consideration of any questions arising out of the special report adopted by the General Assembly in 1951 (A/AC.35/L.134, 135 & Corr.1, and A/AC.35/L.140).

The representatives of Brazil, India and Pakistan expressed their concern about the effects that the fall in the world market prices of raw materials was having on the economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The representatives of France and the United Kingdom gave an account of the various solutions which had been devised in order to meet such a situation. These included the establishment of reserve funds sustained by increases in direct and indirect taxation and the operations of marketing boards, wherever there was a large production of staple crops.

The representatives of Brazil, India and Iraq held the view that the economic policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was not directed primarily to the benefit of the indigenous inhabitants. They pointed out that in many Territories the production of raw materials for export was at the expense of food crops and that to a large extent Territories were dependent on the metropolitan countries both for commercial activities and for consumer goods. The representative of India felt that export and import prices should be stabilized by means of international commodity agreements.

The representatives of France and the United Kingdom answered some of these criticisms by pointing out that capital investment in Non-Self-Governing Territories entailed many risks and often did not yield immediate returns. They stressed the fact that the Territories benefited from the development of their resources, since profits largely remained in the Territories through the medium of capital formation, salaries, wages and local purchases. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that in the majority of the Territories under the administration of his Government most of the agricultural production was in the hands of indigenous producers. He felt that it would be expedient to draw up international agreements on raw materials so as to protect certain Territories whose whole economy could be upset by the fluctuations in prices. The representative of France cited the various advantages derived by the Non-Self-Governing Territories from their connexion with the metropolitan country. In order to illustrate these statements, particular references were made to economic conditions in the Federation of Malaya, Northern Rhodesia, Morocco and Tunisia.

Neither the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories nor the Fourth Committee made any specific recommendations concerning economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. Various points were raised with a view to drawing the Committee's attention to them when it discusses economic conditions at its next session. Among such points were the question of land distribution, the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the economic life of the Territories and the extent to which development programmes ensured the economic and social well-being of the local inhabitants.

d. SOCIAL CONDITIONS

In conformity with resolution 333(IV), setting out its work, and with resolution 643(VII),⁷ approving the special report of the Committee in 1952 as a brief but considered indication of social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories and of the problems of social development, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories had before it information on social conditions prepared by the Secretary-General and questions arising out of the special report approved by the General Assembly in 1952 (A/-AC.35/L.131 & 140).

The representative of India pointed out that the movement of people from rural to urban areas had led to a tragic aggravation of the social problems of most Territories. Furthermore, he said, the information revealed that drastic reductions had been made in the expenditures on social development. Racial discrimination was still prevalent in many Non-Self-Governing Territories, while the status of women was still an inferior one and corporal punishment was still practised, particularly in many Territories under United Kingdom administration.

The representative of Iraq recognized the importance of the financial aspect of the problem of social development. He acknowledged that the Administering Members, and more particularly the United Kingdom and France, had contributed considerable amounts of money to the development of their Territories, but he stressed the fact that these States were in a position to dispose of the resources of the Territories under their administration. He drew the attention of the Committee to the lack and insufficiency of the statistical data available to the Committee.

The representative of the United Kingdom referred to the Committee's report of 1952 on social development. He gave various examples of how the social problems dealt with in that report had been treated in a practical manner in different Territories under United Kingdom administration, including such questions as the training of medical personnel, housing programmes, especially the aided self-help schemes, and the development of trade unions.

The representative of France reviewed the progress of social conditions which had been carried out in French Territories and answered some of the criticisms made by the representative of Iraq in respect to social conditions in Morocco and Tunisia, with particular reference to the wages of agricultural workers in Morocco and membership of trade unions, which he stated was open to Moroccans.

In the Fourth Committee, the representatives of Haiti, Indonesia, Iraq, Liberia, Poland, Uruguay, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR were among those who criticized the continued existence of racial discrimination in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representatives of Haiti, Indonesia and Liberia stressed the need for an improvement in human relations and equality of opportunity in those Territories, particularly in the field of education. Several representatives drew attention to the low standards of living in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the need for more adequate social services. They emphasized the inter-relationship of progress in the economic, social and educational fields, and pointed out that such progress was essential to achieve the objectives laid down in the Charter, namely the welfare of the inhabitants and the attainment of a full measure of self-government. The General Assembly, however, did not give separate consideration to the social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

e. INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION IN RESPECT OF ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS IN THE NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

In accordance with General Assembly resolutions 331(IV), 336(IV), 444(V) and 445(V)⁸ the Secretary-General had prepared a memorandum (A/AC.35/L.138) giving details of international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions and of technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies and memoranda concerning activities in their respective fields of interest to Non-Self-Governing Territories were submitted by FAO (A/AC.35/L.145), UNESCO (A/AC.35/L.139), and the World Health Organization (WHO) (A/AC.35/L.129).

In the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States outlined the collaboration existing between them and the Territories under their administration, with each other and with specialized agencies, in regional commissions and conferences, as well as the technical assistance being afforded to their Territories from both Metropolitan and international sources.

Further references to international collaboration and technical assistance were made during the Committee's other discussions on economic, social and educational conditions; however, neither the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories nor the Fourth Committee discussed this item separately.

2. Closer Association of Non-Self-Governing Territories with the Work of the United Nations

a. ASSOCIATION OF REPRESENTATIVES FROM THE NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES AND OF SPECIALIST ADVISERS IN THE WORK OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

In resolution 647(VII),⁹ the General Assembly recalled resolution 566(VI)¹⁰ and recognized that direct participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories could be of further assistance in promoting the progress of those Territories and their peoples towards the goals set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter. It invited the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study further the question of the direct participation, in its discussions on economic, social and educational conditions, of representatives of those Territories, the inhabitants of which had attained a wide measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies. The Committee was asked to include recommendations on this question in its report to the General Assembly at its eighth session.

The Committee also had before it a memorandum by the Secretary-General (A/AC.35/L.126) indicating changes which had occurred in connexion with constitutional and other provisions for associate membership or participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in certain international bodies.

Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, India and Pakistan presented in the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories a joint draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.152) by which Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories would be invited to attach to their delegations—as members of the delegations, but duly qualified to act as spokesmen of their local governments—indigenous representatives from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the inhabitants of which had attained a large measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies. The draft would also invite the Administering Powers to accredit such spokesmen for the Territories, when informing the Secretary-General of the composition of their delegations.

The sponsors emphasized that they were motivated by a desire to meet, as far as possible, the main objections of the Administering Members, more particularly with respect to the principle of unity of representation. Furthermore, they had sought to conciliate divergent opinions and merely wished to establish the principle.

The representative of Iraq expressed his support for the joint draft resolution, although he did not find it far-reaching enough.

The representative of France, while commending the spirit of compromise and conciliation which had inspired the sponsors of the joint draft resolution, expressed strong doubts regarding the possibility of its implementation in practice. He pointed out that his delegation could not countenance the possibility that indigenous representatives from the Non-Self-Governing Territories might express before the Committee views not in accordance with the lines of policy laid down by his Government. Accordingly he proposed (A/AC.35/L.153): (1) to amend the first operative paragraph to invite Administering Powers to attach to their delegations as members of their delegations indigenous experts possessing suitable qualifications in economics, social affairs and education; and (2) to delete the second operative paragraph inviting the Administering Powers to accredit the spokesmen for the Territories.

The representative of the United Kingdom, while recognizing the value of the participation of representatives from the Non-Self-Governing Territories, expressed doubts as to the feasibility of such a policy. However, he stated, his delegation would accept the invitation conveyed in the joint draft resolution, reserving, nevertheless, the full right of his Government to make appointments to its delegations as it wished. The United States representative commended the sponsors of the joint draft resolution on the spirit that had motivated them, especially in having incorporated the principle of unity of representation. Nevertheless, he found it necessary to submit certain amendments (A/AC.35/L.154).

In the light of statements made by various representatives the sponsors revised the wording of the draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.152/Rev.1) so that the text of the operative part would read: "Invites the Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories, the inhabitants of which have attained a large measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies, to attach to their delegations specially qualified indigenous representatives to speak for the Territories on these matters". The representative of France maintained his amendments to the revised text.

The Committee voted on the draft resolution by paragraphs. In the course of voting it adopted an oral Brazilian drafting amendment to one of the United States amendments and an oral drafting amendment by the United Kingdom. The Committee rejected the first French amendment (see above) by 8 votes to 7 and adopted the second by the same vote. The amended draft resolution was adopted (A/2465 B) by 12 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

In its final form, this draft resolution proposed that the General Assembly should invite the Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories, the inhabitants of which had attained a large measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies, to attach to their delegations, without prejudice to the principle of unity of representation, indigenous representatives specially qualified to speak on these matters as they related to these Territories.

At the 341st meeting of the Assembly's Fourth Committee on 22 October, the representative of Poland formally introduced his amendments (A/C.4/L.284) to the draft resolution proposed by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, which, he stated, did not provide for the true representatives of the dependent Territories but only for the association in the work of the Committee of persons selected by the Administering Powers. He therefore proposed the deletion of those clauses which, in effect, excluded the direct participation by independent representatives by maintaining the principle of unity of representation. This amendment, however, was rejected by 33 votes to 11, with 10 abstentions.

The representative of Venezuela, on the other hand, felt that the main defect of the draft resolution on the association of representatives from Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee was that it seemed too final. As a further step forward it was acceptable; but if it was intended to be a last step, it would be a very dangerous one, in fact a concealed step backwards. He proposed amendments (A/C.4/L.285) which would make it quite clear that it did not represent the Assembly's final action on the question. This amendment would request the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to continue, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 647(VII), the study of means of securing a progressive increase in the participation of duly qualified representatives of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in its work.

The amendment was adopted by 41 votes to 9, with 4 abstentions, by the Fourth Committee at its 341st meeting on 22 October. The Committee adopted the individual paragraphs of the draft resolution, in votes ranging from 36 to 5, with 9 abstentions, to 44 to none, with 10 abstentions, and adopted the draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, by 36 votes to 8, with 10 abstentions.

The resolution proposed by the Fourth Committee (A/2556 III) was, in turn, adopted by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 459th plenary meeting on 27 November, by 43 votes to 8, with 7 abstentions, as resolution 744(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Whereas the direct association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies has been considered as an effective means of promoting the progress of the populations of these Territories towards a status of equality with the States Members of the United Nations,

"Whereas it has been recognized that the direct association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories can be of further assistance in promoting the progress of these Territories and their peoples towards the goals set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations,

"Whereas the Administering Members have been invited to make possible the association of qualified representative inhabitants of the Territories in the work of the Committee,

"Considering the technical difficulties advanced by the Administering Members on the question of accepting the collaboration in the work of the Committee of Non-Self-Governing Territories as "associate members",

"Considering that the principle of unity of representation must be maintained,

"Noting that the Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories have from time to time attached representative inhabitants of the Territories to their delegations,

"Considering that this practice should be stimulated and developed,

"1. Invites the Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories, the inhabitants of which have attained a large measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies, to attach to their delegations, without prejudice to the principle stated in the fifth paragraph of the preamble, indigenous representatives specially qualified to speak on these matters as they relate to these Territories;

"2. Requests the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to continue, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 647(VII) of 10 December 1952, the study of means of securing a progressive increase in the participation of duly qualified representatives of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in its work."

At the 338th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 20 October, the representative of the United Kingdom submitted a further draft resolution (A/C.4/L.282) concerning representation on the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, which was adopted by the Fourth Committee at its 341st meeting on 22 October, by 47 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

At its 459th plenary meeting on 27 November the General Assembly, also without discussion, adopted the draft recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2556 IV) by 48 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, as resolution 745(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting that the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, particularly in relation to the special studies of certain functional fields initiated under General Assembly resolution 333 (IV) of 2 December 1949, has been materially assisted by the action of States members of the Committee, including certain non-administering Members, in associating with their delegations persons with special qualifications in the functional fields studied by the Committee,

"Considering that this is a practice which might be extended with advantage to the work of the Committee, in that the pooling and exchange of knowledge and experience thus achieved will enable it more efficaciously to assess the economic, social and educational problems of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the light of the solutions being found to those problems elsewhere in the world,

"1. Commends the action of those Members which have included specialist advisers in their delegations to the Committee;

"2. Expresses the hope that those Members which have not hitherto found it possible to do so, will find it appropriate to associate with their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview."

b. EMPLOYMENT OF INTERNATIONAL STAFF FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

At the 340th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 21 October, Egypt, Iraq, Liberia, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Syria submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.283/Rev.1) on the employment of international staff from Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, according to which the General Assembly would:

(1) recommend to the Secretary-General the desirability of substantially increasing the recruitment of suitably qualified inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories in the Secretariat of the United Nations as soon as possible; and

(2) invite the Secretary-General to draw the attention of the specialized agencies to this resolution with a view to a similar policy being followed as far as possible in the secretariats of those agencies.

The representative of Pakistan, clarifying the purposes of the joint draft resolution, stated that its adoption would ensure that such recruitment would be on a proper geographical basis and would be responsible for the advancement of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories. As to the mechanics of implementation, it was in no way intended to fetter the discretion of the Secretary-General nor to suggest that he should take any specific measures in this direction. He recalled that paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Charter provided that "due regard shall be paid to the importance of recruiting staff on as wide a geographical basis as possible". On this latter basis, he had no doubt, the Committee would agree that the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories deserved a certain amount of representation, which the sponsors of the joint draft resolution did not consider adequate at the moment. They were convinced that the desired goal could be achieved without any difficulty through appointments to posts which would ordinarily fall vacant from time to time in an organization like the United Nations Secretariat.

A statement was read to the Committee on behalf of the Secretary-General, in which he questioned whether it was desirable to put the matter in the form of a resolution and whether perhaps it did not more properly come within the sphere of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the Fifth Committee, rather than that of a substantive committee like the Fourth Committee. He assured the Fourth Committee that he had taken good note of the Committee's wishes and was aware of the importance of the question. He hoped that it would be apparent that no resolution on the subject was necessary and that the joint draft resolution would not be pressed.

Following this statement, the sponsors of the joint draft resolution revised the text (A/C.4/L.283/Rev.1) to have the Assembly recommend that the Secretary-General consider the desirability of increasing the recruitment of suitably qualified inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories in the Secretariat of the United Nations. An oral drafting amendment and an oral amendment to add to the six-Power draft a reference to the statement made by the Secretary-General, presented by India, were accepted by the sponsors.

Representatives who expressed support of the draft resolution, maintaining that the collaboration of dependent peoples would aid the work of the Secretariat and that adoption of the resolution would in no way infringe on the discretionary powers of the Secretary-General, included those of Mexico, Syria and Yugoslavia.

On the other hand, reservations were expressed by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, New Zealand and the Philippines. Most of these representatives stated that, while they sympathized with the intention of the draft resolution, they feared that its effect might abridge the discretion of the Secretary-General or create a precedent. They also pointed out that the Secretary-General was currently undertaking a review of Secretariat matters.

The joint draft resolution, as revised and amended, was adopted by the Committee by 34 votes to 11, with 7 abstentions.

When the resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2556 V) was considered by the General Assembly at its 459th plenary meeting on 27 November, the Secretary-General stated that the most satisfactory way of meeting the wishes expressed in the resolution would be, in the first instance, to provide arrangements for training courses and training service. The possibility of such arrangements would be studied and the results reported to the General Assembly for consideration in its Fifth Committee as the body competent in questions of personnel policy.

Without further discussion, the General Assembly adopted the resolution recommended by the Committee (A/2556 V), by 39 votes to 15, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 746(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that the paragraph 3 of Article 101 of the Charter of the United Nations, regarding the employment of the staff of the United Nations, states that, in addition to the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity in employment of Secretariat staff, due regard should be paid to the importance of recruiting the staff on as wide a geographical basis as possible,

"Having regard to the objectives set forth in Chapters XI and XII of the Charter in respect of the advancement of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories,

"Considering that the services of individuals from Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories in the Secretariat of the United Nations will contribute to a wider geographical coverage in the recruitment of staff,

"Considering the statement made by the Secretary-General that he has already taken note of the wishes expressed in the Fourth Committee on this matter,

"1. Recommends that the Secretary-General consider the desirability of continuing and increasing the recruitment of suitably qualified inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories for the Secretariat of the United Nations;

"2. Invites the Secretary-General to draw the attention of the specialized agencies to the present resolution with a view to a similar policy being followed as far as possible in the secretariats of those agencies."

B. FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING WHETHER A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

In 1946, the General Assembly enumerated (resolution 66(I)) Territories falling within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter. In 1949, by resolution 334(IV),¹¹ the Assembly noted the cessation of transmission of information under Article 73e in respect of certain of these Territories, and called for an examination by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories of the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose peoples have not yet achieved a full measure of self-government. By resolution 567(VI),¹² adopted on 18 January 1952, the Assembly appointed a ten-member Ad hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) to undertake a further study. This Committee reported to the General Assembly at its seventh session, and by resolution 648(VII),¹³ adopted on 10 December 1952, the Assembly appointed an Ad hoc Committee, comprising Australia, Belgium, Burma, Cuba, Guatemala, Iraq, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela, to continue and carry out a more thorough study. The Committee was invited to take into account the list of factors prepared in 1952 by the Ad hoc Committee and the views of governments.

The Ad hoc Committee met at the Headquarters of the United Nations from 21 to 30 July 1953.

In its report (A/2428) to the General Assembly, the Ad hoc Committee recalled that it had been agreed that no list of factors could serve as more than a guide in determining whether any particular Territory had attained a full measure of self-government. Moreover, as stated in resolution 648(VII), each concrete case should be considered and decided in the light of the particular circumstances of that case. Taking these circumstances into consideration, it might be thought that, while a further refining and clarification of the list of factors would still be possible, a stage might have been reached in the studies of the subject which made unnecessary any immediate action, since the current list was sufficient to serve as a guide in the sense indicated in resolution 648(VII), permitting the full consideration of each concrete case.

The Ad hoc Committee nevertheless amended the list of factors before it and, in particular, divided the factors into three categories indicative of:

(1) the attainment of independence or of other separate systems of self-government;

(2) the attainment of other systems of self-government in continuing association with the Metropolitan country or in other forms; and

(3) the free association of a Territory with the Metropolitan or other country as an integral part of that country.

The question of factors was considered by the General Assembly at the 322nd to 331st meetings of its Fourth Committee, from 1 to 12 October, and at its 459th plenary meeting on 27 November. The representative of Iraq, Chairman of the Ad hoc Committee, formally introduced the report to the 317th meeting on 25 September.

During the general discussion on this item, representatives presented the views of their Governments¹⁴ on individual factors listed by the Committee. In their general observations, a number of representatives, among them those of Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Israel, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand and the United States, emphasized that any list of factors could serve only as a guide in individual cases.

¹³ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 563-65.

Among those representatives who emphasized the importance of the right of self-determination of peoples as a paramount consideration in deciding the question of whether a Territory had become fully self-governing were those of Afghanistan, Burma, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Israel, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, the USSR and Yugoslavia.

A number of representatives stressed the need for reconciliation of divergent views between Administering and non-administering Members. These representatives included those of Brazil, Canada, Cuba, Norway, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sweden, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

At the 325th meeting of the Committee on 6 October, the representative of Brazil presented a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272). He said that his proposal was designed to reconcile the views of the majority of delegations and was based on a study of what he called "the arithmetic of voting" on the four-year-old question. No substantial improvement on the work already accomplished could be achieved by the Committee; rigid rules could not be applied and the list of factors approved by the Ad hoc Committee could only serve as a guide in considering individual cases, he said. His proposal, accordingly, would have the Assembly:

- (1) take note of the conclusions of the report of the Ad hoc Committee;
- (2) approve the list of factors contained in that report;
- (3) recommend that the annexed list of factors should be taken by the Administering Members and the General Assembly as a guide and applied in the light of all relevant circumstances pertinent to each particular situation, in determining whether any Territory, due to changes in its constitutional status, is or is no longer within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter, in order that, in view of the documentation provided under resolution 222(III),¹⁵ a decision might be taken on the continuation or cessation of the transmission of information required by Chapter XI of the Charter;
- (4) recommend that in the study of each case paramount consideration should be given to the evidence which might indicate that the people concerned had exercised its rights to self-determination;
- (5) reaffirm that the factors, while serving as a guide in determining whether the obligations as set forth in Article 73e of the Charter shall exist, should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by a Non-Self-Governing Territory;
- (6) further reaffirm that, for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs, it was essential that its people should have attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter;
- (7) further instruct the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study any subsequent documentation concerning cessation of transmission of information in the light of the list of factors approved by the current resolution, among other relevant considerations which might arise from each concrete case of cessation of information; and

(8) recommend that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories should take the initiative of proposing to the General Assembly revisions and interpretations of, or additions to, the list of factors whenever, due to difficulties of application or the arising of new circumstances, the Committee found it so advisable.

The Committee took this draft resolution as the basis of its discussions. Support for the Brazilian draft resolution was expressed by the representatives of Ethiopia, Pakistan, Peru, Sweden, Thailand and Yugoslavia.

Joint amendments (A/C.4/L.273) to the Brazilian draft were proposed by Bolivia, Egypt, Guatemala, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Venezuela, Yemen and Yugoslavia.

The ten-point amendment would, among other things (see below), add a statement asserting the competence of the General Assembly to consider the principles that should guide the United Nations and Member States in the implementation of obligations arising from Chapter XI (Declaration on Non-Self-Governing Territories) of the Charter and to make recommendations in connexion with such principles. It would also ask the Assembly to adopt a revised list of factors.

These revisions formed part of a second 24-point amendment by the same countries (A/C.4/L.274)¹⁶, which would insert additional factors, among them factors concerning national defence, voluntary limitation of sovereignty, change of political status, geographical considerations, ethnic and cultural considerations, freedom to modify status and the right to change political status in the light of the consideration whether that Territory is or is not subject to any claim or litigation on the part of another State.

Opposition to the eleven-Power amendments was expressed by the representatives of Belgium, Denmark, France, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom, among others. These representatives felt that no changes should be made in the list of factors approved by the Ad hoc Committee. The representative of the United Kingdom claimed that the additional factors which the amendments would insert were of parochial significance.

Following the presentation of the amendments, discussion in the Fourth Committee centred on the competence of the General Assembly to decide whether or not a Territory had become fully self-governing.

¹⁶ See pp. 524-26.

Among those representatives who felt that the General Assembly had the competence were those of Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, the Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

Among representatives who denied the Assembly's competence in this respect and considered that the Administering Member alone was competent to decide this question were those of Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom. The representative of Belgium said that if the General Assembly declared itself competent to say whether an Administering Power should be compelled to continue transmission of information, Belgium would reserve its right to raise the question of whether a State which had not previously transmitted information should begin to do so. He said that the list of factors should be generally applied in so far as a study of the list would determine whether a Territory was no longer non-self-governing and should be used as a touchstone to judge whether a State should begin to transmit information on certain Territories or peoples as well as to decide whether a State was justified in ceasing to transmit information. For its part, Belgium had maintained that such a decision should be made by the Administering Power alone; but those who thought otherwise should be consistent in their attitude.

The following table gives the text of the Brazilian draft resolution and the amendments. Voting, which took place at the 330th meeting on 9 October, is shown in parentheses.

In a statement made before the vote was taken, the representative of Brazil announced that, in view of the adoption at the 329th meeting on 8 October of an amended list of factors (see below), his delegation had considered withdrawing its draft resolution. In order, however, not to complicate the work of the Committee, it had been decided to maintain the draft resolution since, in the event that its operative paragraph 2 (which proposed to approve the list of factors approved by the Ad hoc Committee and not an amended list as sought by the eleven Powers) were adopted, that would have the effect of annulling the amended list of factors. Ad hoc Committee, namely, factors indicative of the attainment of independence.

In this category, the Committee decided, by 31 votes to 9, with 10 abstentions, to reword the factor concerning national defence. In place of the recommended text "Freedom of the territory to enter into arrangements concerning its national defence", the Committee adopted instead the text "Sovereign right to provide for its national defence".

By 27 votes to 15, with 9 abstentions, the Committee decided to amend the title of the Second Part of the list of factors recommended by the Ad hoc Committee, replacing the title "Factors Indicative of the Attainment of Other Systems of Self-Government in Continuing Association with the Metropolitan Country or in Other Forms" with the title "Factors Indicative of the Attainment of Other Separate Systems of Self-Government". In this category, the Committee adopted eleven-Power amendments (A/C.4/L.274) inserting new factors concerning freedom of choice of several possibilities including independence, geographical considerations, ethnic and cultural considerations and change of political status.

The Committee also adopted as a whole, by 25 votes to 18, with 9 abstentions, a revised text for the factor concerning voluntary limitation of sovereignty. In this respect, the text of the factor recommended by the Ad hoc Committee read:

"Degree to which the sovereignty of the Territory is limited by its own free will when that Territory has attained a separate system of self-government. Degree of evidence that the attribute or attributes of sovereignty which are not individually exercised will be collectively exercised by the larger entity thus associated."

The new text adopted by the Committee read:

"Degree of evidence that the attribute or attributes of sovereignty which are not individually exercised will be collectively exercised by the larger entity thus associated (adopted by 30 votes to 8, with 12 abstentions) and the freedom of the population of a Territory which has associated itself with the Metropolitan country to modify at any time this status through the expression of their will by democratic means" (adopted by roll-call vote of 25 to 18, with 10 abstentions).

The additional factors added to the Second Part of the list by the adoption of the eleven-Power amendments were:

"Freedom of choice—Freedom of choosing on the basis of the right of self-determination of peoples between several possibilities, including independence" (adopted by 27 votes to 15, with 8 abstentions).

"Geographical considerations—Extent to which the relations of the Non-Self-Governing Territory with the capital of the Metropolitan Government may be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles; (adopted by 26 votes to 14, with 11 abstentions) and extent to which the interests of boundary States may be affected, bearing in mind the general principle of good-neighbourliness referred to in Article 74 of the Charter" (adopted by 23 votes to 18, with 10 abstentions. The paragraph, as a whole, was adopted by 24 votes to 19, with 10 abstentions.)

"Ethnic and cultural considerations. Extent to which the populations are of different race, language or religion or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associate themselves" (adopted by 26 votes to 17, with 8 abstentions).

"Change of political status. The right of the Metropolitan country or the Territory to change the political status of that Territory in the light of the consideration whether that Territory is or is not subject to any claim or litigation on the part of another State" (adopted by 23 votes to 18, with 12 abstentions).

The Second Part of the list of factors, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 24 votes to 18, with 11 abstentions.

By 23 votes to 16, with 11 abstentions, the Fourth Committee adopted as a whole, as amended, the Third Part of the list of factors recommended by the Ad hoc Committee, after deciding to change the title from "Factors Indicative of the Free Association of a Territory with the Metropolitan or Other Country as an Integral Part of that Country" to "Factors Indicative of the Free Association of a Territory on an Equal Basis with the Metropolitan or Other Country as an Integral Part of that Country or in any Other Form". The Committee voted separately on the phrase "on an equal basis", adopting it by 25 votes to 15, with 15 abstentions. It also voted separately on the phrase "or in any other form", adopting it by 26 votes to 14, with 13 abstentions.

The Committee voted 28 to 15, with 10 abstentions, to delete from the factor concerning constitutional considerations, association "by virtue of the constitution of the Metropolitan country".

By a roll-call vote of 25 to 17, with 10 abstentions, it decided to insert as an additional factor:

"The freedom of the population of a Non-Self-Governing Territory which has associated itself with the Metropolitan country as an integral part of that country or in any other form to modify this status through the expression of their will by democratic means."

To the text recommended by the Ad hoc Committee concerning geographical considerations, the Committee, by 22 votes to 18, with 11 abstentions, decided to add a further provision. The recommended text read:

"Extent to which the relations of the Territory with the capital of the central government may be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles."

The addition adopted by the Committee read:

"The right of the Metropolitan country or the Territory to change the political status of that Territory in the light of the consideration whether that Territory is or is not subject to any claim or litigation on the part of another State."

The Committee adopted the amended paragraph as a whole by 23 votes to 18, with 8 abstentions.

At the 459th plenary meeting of the General Assembly on 27 November, the representative of Mexico urged that the Assembly should decide that it would not be necessary to have a two-thirds majority vote for the adoption of the resolutions before it on matters concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories but that a simple majority would be adequate.

The representative of Denmark, opposing the Mexican suggestion, asked the President to rule that the question of factors was an important question both in the general sense and, more particularly, as defined in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter and rule 84 of the rules of procedure, and, therefore, required a two-thirds majority.

The representative of Denmark recalled that in 1951 and 1952 it had been suggested that this was an important question and would require a two-thirds majority. The General Assembly, he said, had voted on it with this understanding. The draft resolution relating to factors would purport to lay down certain criteria to be taken into account in determining the field of application of Chapter XI of the Charter. This was clearly an important issue and the Assembly should act with consistency.

The President stated that the Assembly had never been called upon specifically to decide this question, although it did give its tacit assent to a ruling that a two-thirds majority was required on this subject. She believed, therefore, that the Assembly should express its opinion. Accordingly, she put to the vote the motion of the representative of Mexico to the effect that the draft resolution might be carried by a simple majority. The motion was adopted by 30 votes to 26.

The representative of Belgium stated that he would vote against the draft resolution because it would confer upon the Assembly powers which were not conferred upon it by the Charter and would sanction a restrictive interpretation of the Charter.

The draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2556 I), including the annex which contained the list of factors, was adopted by 32 votes to 19, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 742(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Bearing in mind the principles embodied in the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories and the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter,

"Recalling the provisions of resolutions 567(VI) and 648(VII), adopted by the General Assembly on 18 January and 10 December 1952 respectively, indicating the value of establishing a list of factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government,

"Having regard to the competence of the General Assembly to consider the principles that should guide the United Nations and the Member States in the implementation of obligations arising from Chapter XI of the Charter and to make recommendations in connexion with them,

"Having examined the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) set up by resolution 648(VII),

"1. Takes note of the conclusions of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories);

"2. Approves the list of factors as adopted by the Fourth Committee;

"3. Recommends that the annexed list of factors should be used by the General Assembly and the Administering Members as a guide in determining whether any Territory, due to changes in its constitutional status, is or is no longer within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter, in order that, in view of the documentation provided under resolution 222(III) of 3 November 1948, a decision may be taken by the General Assembly on the continuation or cessation of the transmission of information required by Chapter XI of the Charter;

"4. Reasserts that each concrete case should be considered and decided upon in the light of the particular circumstances of that case and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples;

"5. Considers that the validity of any form of association between a Non-Self-Governing Territory and a metropolitan or any other country essentially depends on the freely expressed will of the people at the time of the taking of the decision;

"6. Considers that the manner in which Territories referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter can become fully self-governing is primarily through the attainment of independence, although it is recognized that self-government can also be achieved by association with another State or group of States if this is done freely and on the basis of absolute equality;

"7. Reaffirms that the factors, while serving as a guide in determining whether the obligations as set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter shall exist, should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by a Non-Self-Governing Territory;

"8. Further reaffirms that, for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs, it is essential that its people shall have attained a full measure of self-government;

"9. Instructs the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study any documentation transmitted hereafter under resolution 222(III) in the light of the list of factors approved by the present resolution, and other relevant considerations which may arise from each concrete case of cessation of information;

"10. Recommends that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories take the initiative of proposing modifications at any time to improve the list of factors, as may seem necessary in the light of circumstances."

C. CESSATION OF TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION UNDER ARTICLE 73e OF THE CHARTER

1. Netherlands Antilles and Surinam

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE Ad hoc COMMITTEE ON FACTORS

By resolution 650(VII) of 20 December 1952,²³ the General Assembly decided that its Ad hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) should examine, in the light of Assembly resolution 648(VII) of 18 November 1952²⁴ on factors indicative of whether a Territory had or had not attained a full measure of self-government, the communication²⁵ submitted by the Netherlands Government concerning the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam and should report to the Assembly's eighth session.

The communication (A/2177), among other things, stated that, in view of the latest constitutional changes granting a full measure of self-government in all internal matters to the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, the Netherlands Government was of the opinion that these two Territories were no longer to be considered Non-Self-Governing Territories as referred to in Article 73e of the Charter and that the Netherlands Government had decided no longer to submit an annual report on the Territories.

When the Ad hoc Committee on Factors met in 1953, a further communication was brought before it, a letter dated 23 July 1953, from the permanent representative of the Netherlands to the United Nations, addressed to the Secretary-General (A/AC.67/3). In this letter, the Netherlands Government stated that, according to Article 73e, the obligation to transmit information was subject to such limitation as security or constitutional considerations might require. The Netherlands Government based its decision to discontinue the transmission of information in 1951 on this limitation. After the enactment of the Interim Orders of Government which accorded a new status to Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, there were constitutional objections to continuing the transmission of information. The Netherlands Government further expressed doubt whether the examination of the cessation of the transmission of information in the case of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam would be facilitated by applying the resolution on factors as a yardstick. According to the Netherlands Government, the question was: has a Territory attained such a measure of self-government that it is fully responsible for the three fields mentioned in Article 73e, namely, the economic, social and educational conditions?

The representative of the Netherlands presented this communication to the Committee, and said that the Netherlands Government was confronted with the impossibility of transmitting information by the fact that the Governments of the Territories themselves had opposed such transmission.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, the United Kingdom and the United States, though not all for the same reasons, agreed with the Netherlands delegation that information on Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, hitherto supplied in accordance with Article 73e, might now cease.

The representatives of Burma, Cuba, Guatemala and Iraq, however, did not consider that the reasons advanced by the Netherlands delegation were sufficient to justify the cessation of information because they were not in conformity with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 648(VII). The representative of Venezuela maintained that, although the Ad hoc Committee was competent by virtue of its terms of reference to deal with the matter, nevertheless, it would be better to refer the problem directly to the General Assembly.

In view of the wide divergencies which prevailed in the Ad hoc Committee, it was decided (A/2428) that this matter should be referred to the General Assembly without recommendation.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

At its eighth session, the General Assembly considered the question at the 343rd to 347th meetings of its Fourth Committee, from 26 to 29 October, and at the 459th plenary meeting on 27 November. Opening the general debate, the representative of the Netherlands recalled that in 1951 his Government had informed the Secretary-General that it could no longer transmit information on the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam as the Interim Orders had accorded those Territories complete autonomy in domestic affairs; that the new constitutional provisions did not allow such action; and that the Governments of both Territories had stated that action of that nature could no longer be regarded as compatible with their new status. He also recalled the context of the letter dated 23 July 1953 addressed to the Secretary-General. Representatives of both Territories, he said, supported the Netherlands view.

Without entering into argument on whether the Territories had attained a full measure of self-government, the representative of the Netherlands said that his Government was not only legally discharged from the obligation to furnish information but was also unable to supply it. Moreover, while the final and complete terms of the new Constitution were still under discussion between the Government of the Netherlands and the Governments of both Territories, no useful purpose could be served by debating the merits of the new system. The Parliaments of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, freely elected on a basis of general franchise, had made it known that they held themselves to be self-governing in internal affairs and that they objected to the transmission of information by the Netherlands Government as an infringement of their autonomous rights.

The representative of the Netherlands asked the Committee to confine itself to taking note of the conditions he had outlined. His Government, he stated, was willing to complete and bring up to date the information already submitted on the constitutional developments when the Constitution came into force.

At the same meeting, the General Representatives at The Hague of the Governments of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, both alternate members of the Netherlands delegation, addressed the Fourth Committee. The General Representative of Surinam, outlining the constitutional provisions for Surinam, said that his country was exclusively responsible to the Surinam Parliament for its policy in social, economic and educational affairs. If the Netherlands Government were to transmit information on these matters it would be doing so in respect of questions for which it was not responsible.

The General Representative of the Netherlands Antilles spoke of the constitutional and juridical considerations involved in the transmission of information in respect of the Netherlands Antilles in view of the achievement by his country of autonomy in domestic affairs and supported the position taken by the Netherlands representative and the General Representative of Surinam.

The Fourth Committee's discussions were concerned principally with: (1) whether a full measure of self-government had been achieved in the Territories; (2) whether the Netherlands could or should continue the transmission of information; and (3) whether the Netherlands Government itself was competent to decide when the transmission of information under Article 73e should cease.

In view of the fact that negotiations between the Government of the Netherlands and the Governments of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam had not yet been concluded, however, the representative of Sweden, at the 343rd meeting on 26 October, suggested (A/C.4/L.292) that the General Assembly should:

(1) consider that the new status of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam could only be rightly appraised after these negotiations had led to a final result and this had been embodied in constitutional provisions;

(2) invite the Government of the Netherlands to communicate to the Secretary-General in due course the result of these negotiations and the constitutional provisions; and

(3) invite the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine these communications in connexion with the information already transmitted and to report thereon to the General Assembly.

Support for the Swedish draft resolution was expressed by the representatives of Pakistan and Venezuela, who felt that, since further constitutional negotiations were pending, it would be premature for the Committee to take a decision at once. Other representatives, including those of Guatemala, Yugoslavia, Mexico, India and the USSR, indicated they would support the resolution if certain amendments were adopted.

At the 344th meeting on 27 October the USSR proposed an amendment (A/C.4/L.294), in terms of which the Assembly would request the Government of the Netherlands to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General the information specified in Article 73e of the Charter in regard to the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam until such time as the Assembly took a decision that the transmission of information in regard to those Territories should be discontinued.

The representative of the USSR expressed the view that neither Territory had achieved autonomy. Judicial, legislative and executive powers were still exercised by the Government of the Netherlands and not by the local authorities, he said, and in arbitrarily deciding to cease the transmission of information, the Netherlands had violated the United Nations Charter.

The representatives of Argentina, Burma, the Byelorussian SSR, Egypt, Iraq and Poland supported the Soviet draft, which was opposed by the representatives of Australia and Belgium, who asserted that the Administering Member had the right and competence to state when the transmission of information should cease and that conditions in the two Territories made the transmission of information unnecessary.

At the 345th meeting on 28 October, Indonesia proposed (A/C.4/L.293) that the Assembly should also:

(1) express to the Netherlands Government its confidence that as a result of the negotiations a new status would be attained by the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam representing a full measure of self-government in fulfilment of the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter; and

(2) invite the Netherlands Government to bring to the notice of the Governments of the Netherlands Antilles and of Surinam the desirability of the continuation of the transmission of information under Article 73e of the Charter until such time as the Territories no longer fall within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter.

While expressing appreciation of what had already been done by the Netherlands Government in assisting the progress of the two Territories towards self-government, the representative of Indonesia stated that after a careful examination of the information communicated by the Netherlands Government, the Indonesian delegation was not convinced that the peoples of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam had attained a full measure of self-government. She felt, further, that an Administering Member should not take a unilateral decision on whether the transmission of information should cease. In view of an eight-Power proposal (see below) the representative of Indonesia subsequently withdrew that part of her amendment which would invite the Government of the Netherlands to bring to the notice of the Governments of the Territories the desirability of continuing the transmission of information.

Support for the Indonesian amendment was expressed by the representatives of Burma, Egypt, Iraq and Venezuela. The representatives of Australia and Belgium opposed the amendment on the ground that it implied an obligation on the part of an Administering Member which could not be justified by the United Nations Charter.

At the 345th meeting, further amendments to the Swedish draft were submitted jointly by Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Egypt, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico and Uruguay (A/C.4/L.295), which, in addition to a number of drafting changes, would add a provision to have the Assembly note with satisfaction the progress towards self-government achieved by the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam and express its confidence that the Netherlands would find a means of continuing to transmit the information required under Article 73e.

The representatives of Cuba, Iraq, Pakistan and the Philippines supported the eight-Power amendment and thought that the transmission of information should continue.

The representative of New Zealand proposed additions (A/C.4/L.296) to the Swedish draft, which would have the Assembly note that the Government of the Netherlands was unable to continue the transmission of information for the reasons stated by its representative and note the decision of that Government not to continue the transmission of information.

The representative of New Zealand, presenting his amendment, asserted that independence was not the only equivalent of self-government, as experience of some now independent States had shown. Adoption of his amendment would amount to a generous recognition by the Assembly of the advanced stage of political development reached by the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam.

The New Zealand amendment was supported by the representative of Australia. The representatives of Argentina, Pakistan, Poland and Venezuela, however, expressed opposition to the amendment because they felt either that partial self-government did not constitute autonomy, and that the transmission of information should be continued at least until negotiations between the three Governments had been finalized, or that information should only cease when the General Assembly decided that this was appropriate. The representatives of Cuba, China, the Dominican Republic and Pakistan were among those who suggested that it might be premature to attempt an assessment of the position before the conclusion of negotiations concerning the constitutional position of the two Territories.

At the 347th meeting on 29 October, Poland also submitted amendments (A/C.4/L.297), which would, in effect, set the next Assembly session as a time limit for the submission of the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and the report, called for by the Swedish draft, of the Netherlands Government on current negotiations on constitutional provisions for the Territories.

The representative of Sweden stated that her delegation had been prompted by a spirit of compromise and that the Assembly should not try to force the issue and thus "pin the colonial label" on the two Territories. That spirit of compromise would be lost if the amendments were adopted, she said.

Replying to points raised in the general debate, the representative of the Netherlands stated that his Government confirmed its interpretation of Chapter XI of the Charter regarding the obligations of Administering States.

The contention that the real power in the Territories was still in the hands of the Netherlands Government was a misconception, he said. Ultimate power rested with the States themselves, and these were the representatives of the people, freely elected on a basis of universal franchise.

Regarding the allegation of the invalidity of constitutional considerations which, the Netherlands maintained, made it impossible to continue the transmission of information, he repeated his stand that the Netherlands could not assume responsibility for matters over which it had no jurisdiction. The Netherlands had freely undertaken to report on the final outcome of the negotiations between its Government and those of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam.

At the 347th meeting on 29 October, the Committee voted on the Swedish draft (A/C.4/L.292) and the amendments to it. As finally adopted by the Committee, the draft incorporated amendments by Indonesia (A/C.4/L.293), the USSR (A/C.4/L.294) and, jointly, by Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Egypt, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico and Uruguay (A/C.4/L.295).

By 30 votes to 5, with 17 abstentions, the Committee rejected the two Polish amendments (A/C.4/L.297) which would stipulate a time limit in seeking reports on the question not later than the ninth session of the General Assembly.

In two separate roll-call votes of 31 to 12, with 9 abstentions, and 34 to 12, with 6 abstentions, the Committee rejected the New Zealand amendments (A/C.4/L.296) which would note the decision of the Netherlands Government to cease transmission of information.

The Committee adopted by 42 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, the eight-Power amendment (A/C.4/L.295) to note with satisfaction the progress toward self-government made by the two Territories.

It adopted, in a roll-call vote of 31 to 11, with 10 abstentions, the Indonesian amendment (A/C.4/L.293) expressing confidence that as a result of the current negotiations a new status, representing a full measure of self-government, would be attained by the two Territories.

The Soviet amendment was adopted by a roll-call vote of 24 to 18, with 10 abstentions. In view of its adoption, the Committee did not vote on a further eight-Power amendment which would express confidence that the Netherlands would find the means to continue to provide the information it was obliged to transmit.

The Committee adopted the amended draft resolution as a whole by a roll-call vote of 30 to 13, with 9 abstentions.

The Assembly considered the Committee's draft resolution (A/2556 VI) at its 459th plenary meeting on 27 November. Prior to the voting, the New Zealand representative requested that resolutions VI and VII be regarded as important questions subject to a two-thirds majority vote. The President stated that the Mexican proposal²⁶ had been intended to cover these two resolutions as well as the Committee's draft resolution I on factors. Following a brief discussion, the President put to the vote a proposal that the prior decision taken on voting procedure applied only to resolution I. It was rejected by a roll-call vote of 34 to 21, with 4 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Iceland, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Chile, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua.

Therefore, these resolutions, as well as the others proposed by the Fourth Committee (A/2556), were regarded as requiring only a simply majority vote.

²⁶ Seep. 526.

The resolution recommended by the Committee (A/2556 VI) was adopted by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 459th plenary meeting on 27 November. The Assembly adopted the preamble and the first two operative paragraphs by 30 votes to none, with 15 abstentions. It adopted the third operative paragraph by 33 votes to 5, with 13 abstentions; the fourth and fifth paragraphs by 39 votes to 2, with 15 abstentions, and the sixth paragraph by 35 votes to 13, with 2 abstentions.

The resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 33 votes to 13, with 8 abstentions, as resolution 747(VIII).

The Netherlands representative stated that, regretfully, whatever the opinion of the majority, the Netherlands Government could not possibly act in a way which would be contrary to its own laws and Constitution; nor was it prepared to take steps which would be at variance with the opinion and the wishes of the Governments and Parliaments of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, whose interests were at stake in this controversy.

Resolution 747(VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling that in its resolution 650(VII) of 20 December 1952 it invited the Committee set up to study the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government to examine carefully the documents submitted by the Netherlands Government relating to the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam in the light of resolution 648(VII) of 10 December 1952,

"Having received and considered the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) established by resolution 648(VII),

"Having taken note of the statement of the representative of the Netherlands that the negotiations between representatives of the Netherlands, the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, which were adjourned in the year 1952, will shortly be resumed,

"1. Notes with satisfaction the progress made by the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam towards self-government;

"2. Considers that the new status of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam can only be rightly appraised after the said negotiations have led to a final result and this has been embodied in constitutional provisions;

"3. Expresses to the Netherlands Government its confidence that, as a result of the negotiations, a new status will be attained by the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam representing a full measure of self-government in fulfilment of the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter;

"4. Invites the Government of the Netherlands to communicate to the Secretary-General the result of these negotiations as well as the provisions mentioned in paragraph 2 above;

"5. Invites the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine these communications in connexion with the information already transmitted and to report thereon to the General Assembly;

"6. Requests the Government of the Netherlands to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General the information specified in Article 73e of the Charter in regard to the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam until such time as the General Assembly takes a decision that the transmission of information in regard to these Territories should be discontinued."

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

In resolution 222(III)²⁷ of 3 November 1948, the General Assembly had considered that, having regard to the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter, it was essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional position and status of any such Territory as a result of which the responsible Government concerned considered it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that Territory under Article 73e of the Charter; and had requested the Members concerned to communicate to the Secretary-General, within a maximum period of six months, appropriate information, including the constitution, legislative act or executive order providing for the government of the Territory and the constitutional relationship of the Territory to the Government of the metropolitan country.

Furthermore, in resolution 448(V),²⁸ the General Assembly had requested the Committee to examine such information as might be transmitted in the future to the Secretary-General in pursuance of resolution 222(III) and to report to the General Assembly.

In conformity with the terms of resolution 222(III), the United States Government transmitted to the Secretary-General communications dated 19 January and 20 March 1953, enclosing the text of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico; a memorandum by the Government of the United States concerning the cessation of transmission of information under Article 73e of the Charter with regard to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico; and a copy of a letter dated 17 January 1953, from the Governor of Puerto Rico to the President of the United States.

In the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the representative of the United States summarized the four main events which had led to the establishment of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico:

(1) The fact that, in the general elections held in 1948, the Puerto Rican people had, by an overwhelming majority, voted to become a Commonwealth associated with the United States.

(2) The adoption by the United States Congress of legislation in the form of a compact, to give effect to that vote and authorizing the Puerto Rican people to draft their own Constitution.

(3) The adoption of a Constitution for Puerto Rico by a Constitutional Convention and its ratification by the people in a referendum.

(4) The approval of the compact and the Constitution by both the Congress of the United States and the people of Puerto Rico.

The Resident Commissioner of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, alternate representative of the United States on the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, then outlined in detail the political progress of Puerto Rico from the time of its first association with the United States in 1899 until the attainment of full internal self-government in political, economic, social and cultural affairs in 1952. This political development, he stated, indicated that the Puerto Rican people had worked out a free, democratic and fully self-governing way of life in harmony with their geographical, demographic, economic and cultural circumstances. He referred to the economic, social and educational conditions of the Commonwealth and the development programmes being carried out in those fields, as well as to the part played by the Puerto Rican people in the two world wars and in the United Nations action in Korea. He concluded by pointing out that the steps leading to the compact and Constitution had been initiated by Puerto Ricans and were based on the free decisions of the electorate.

The representatives of Brazil, Ecuador and China expressed the view that, in accordance with the request of the Assembly conveyed in resolution 448(V), the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories was competent to examine the information before it and to report its findings to the General Assembly.

The representative of Brazil stated that, after examining the documentation before it, the Committee should express an opinion either in favour of or against cessation of information or, if it considered the documentation inadequate, it might inform the General Assembly that it could not reach a satisfactory conclusion. He suggested that the Committee should adopt a resolution which, after setting out the reasons on which its findings were based, would recognize that Article 73e no longer applied to Puerto Rico in view of the degree of self-government reached by the Puerto Rican people, and that the purposes of Chapter XI had thus been attained.

The representative of Ecuador stated that Puerto Rico had achieved a full measure of self-government and that no more information need be transmitted under Article 73e and suggested the submission of a draft resolution for the consideration of the General Assembly expressing approval of the action taken by the United States Government.

Supporting the point of view expressed by the representative of Brazil, the representative of China recalled the terms of the relevant resolutions pertinent to the question, as well as the list of factors set out in the report of the 1953 Ad hoc Committee on Factors (A/2428). He concluded that the Territory had achieved almost complete self-government, the most important element in this respect being the freely expressed will of the people. He thought, therefore, that the Committee should comply with the provisions of resolution 448(V) and submit its views to the General Assembly.

The representatives of Iraq and Pakistan, however, expressed the opinion that, irrespective of the competence or ability of the Committee to examine the information and make any pronouncement thereon, it was preferable not to discuss the substance of the question but to refer it without comment to the Assembly for necessary action.

The representative of India concluded that the present status of Puerto Rico did not completely comply with any of the elements of an independent or fully self-governing State. She appreciated, however, the importance of the fact that the people of Puerto Rico had freely expressed their will in deciding in favour of their present status.

The representative of New Zealand submitted a draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.147) by which the Assembly would take note of the communications and documentation transmitted by the United States pursuant to resolution 222(III) with respect to the attainment of self-government by Puerto Rico.

The representatives of Brazil, Ecuador and India jointly proposed amendments (A/AC.35/L.148) to this draft resolution.

Among other things, the amendments would have the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories take note that the people of Puerto Rico, after expressing their will in a free and democratic way, had achieved a new constitutional status. The amendments would also have the draft state that:

(1) the documents before the Committee showed that the choice of the Puerto Rican people constituted a mutually agreed association with the United States;

(2) Puerto Rico had attained internal self-government;

(3) the Committee noted the political advancement with satisfaction;

(4) the information indicated that Puerto Rico could be considered as falling outside the scope of Article 73e of the Charter; and

(5) the Committee took note of the opinion of the former Administering Authority that it was no longer necessary or appropriate to transmit information.

The amendments were adopted by the Committee in a series of 14 votes, ranging from a unanimous vote to 5 votes to 1, with 9 abstentions, after which the Committee adopted the amended draft resolution, as a whole, by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/2465) was considered by the Fourth Committee at its 348th to 356th meetings, from 30 October to 6 November. The Committee considered earlier two requests for oral hearings on this question by representatives of political organizations in Puerto Rico.

At the 321st meeting of the Committee on 30 September, the Committee considered such a request by the President of the Independence Party of Puerto Rico (A/C.4/236).

Among the arguments put forward by representatives supporting the request were:

that the Committee should have further information from the people of Puerto Rico and not only from the Administering Power; that Puerto Rico remained a Non-Self-Governing Territory until the General Assembly should declare that a full measure of self-government had been achieved; that, in the interest of fair play, the representatives had a right to be heard; that the information presented by the petitioner would help the Committee reach a decision on the question of cessation; and that the broadest interpretation of the right of petition was needed.

Among representatives in favour of granting the request were those of Argentina, Bolivia, Guatemala, India, Iraq, Mexico, Saudi Arabia and Yugoslavia.

Representatives who opposed the granting of a hearing included those of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Greece, Israel, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Among the reasons put forward by these representatives were:

that the request was not a petition in terms of Article 87b of the Charter, which applied to Trust Territories; that Chapter XI of the Charter (Declaration on Non-Self-Governing Territories) contained no reference to petitions from Non-Self-Governing Territories; that the Charter drew a fundamental distinction between Non-Self-Governing Territories and Trust Territories; that it was undesirable to afford minority political parties a platform from which to plead their cause against elected governments;

that the United Nations could not become a forum for defeated minorities;

that the granting of a hearing to a person from a Non-Self-Governing Territory might set a dangerous precedent and that this should be done only if there were grave doubts about conditions in a Territory; that by granting the request the Committee might interfere in the internal affairs of a sovereign State, thus infringing Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter; and that to grant the request might encourage the political party to fight against the established government.

Other representatives doubted the usefulness of granting the request for an oral hearing or felt that it would be more desirable, in the interest of a peaceful settlement of the question, not to accede to the request. These representatives included those of Haiti and Thailand.

The Committee decided, in a roll-call vote of 25 to 19, with 11 abstentions, to reject the request.

At the 343rd meeting on 26 October, the Committee considered a similar request by the delegate of the Nationalist Party of Puerto Rico in the United States (A/C.4/239).

The representative of the United States told the Committee that both the Governments of the United States and of Puerto Rico registered the strongest opposition to the granting of the request since in their view the party was a minority group dedicated to a policy of violence. They considered that granting a hearing to this party would constitute an attempt to undermine the legitimate and popular Government of Puerto Rico.

The representatives of Denmark and Panama supported the contention of the United States that the Committee should not accept the application. The representatives of Guatemala and Poland, however, felt that the Committee should accede to the request. The Committee decided, by a roll-call vote of 29 to 17, with 8 abstentions, to reject the request.

Opening the general debate, the representative of the United States outlined the main events which preceded the decision of her Government to cease transmitting information on Puerto Rico. She said that in 1948 the people of Puerto Rico had held a national election in which they chose whether Puerto Rico should become: (1) a State within the United States Federal Union; (2) an independent State; or (3) a commonwealth associated with the United States. By an overwhelming majority, she said, they had chosen commonwealth association. Subsequently, to give effect to the will of the Puerto Rican people expressed in the election, the United States Congress had adopted Public Law 600, which authorized the people of Puerto Rico to draft and adopt their own constitution. The new Constitution had later been ratified by the United States Congress and the Puerto Rican people—again by an overwhelming majority.

The Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico, alternate delegate of the United States, told the Fourth Committee that Puerto Rico was a free State whose authority emanated from the people of Puerto Rico themselves. It was a State associated with the United States by virtue of the fact that the people of Puerto Rico, upon constituting themselves a commonwealth, had agreed that the exercise of certain aspects of political authority, with corresponding responsibilities, remained with the United States Government. Puerto Rico was not a constitutional part of the Federal Union, but was associated with the Union by virtue of a bilateral compact. The specific terms of the association between the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and the United States were embodied in the Puerto Rican Federal Relations Act, which was part of the compact and could not be amended except by mutual agreement between the people of Puerto Rico and the United States.

The fundamental aspects of the political union between the United States and Puerto Rico were:

(1) that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States";

(2) that the citizens of Puerto Rico are citizens of the United States;

(3) that citizens of the United States, after having resided in Puerto Rico for one year, automatically become citizens of Puerto Rico;

(4) that all the public domains are under the control of the people of Puerto Rico;

(5) that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico exercises complete authority over its internal affairs; and

(6) that Puerto Rico freely elects a Resident Commissioner to the United States, who represents Puerto Rico before all departments of the Government of the United States. The Resident Commissioner enjoys the privileges of membership without vote in the House of Representatives of the United States Congress.

He added that amendments to the Constitution of Puerto Rico could be adopted only by the people of Puerto Rico. They were not subject to subsequent approval by the United States Congress.

The Resident Commissioner also outlined the principal provisions for economic union between Puerto Rico and the United States.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, however, said that Puerto Rico still remained a colony under the political and economic control of the United States. The adoption of a constitution was a unilateral legislative act which could in no way be considered as a compact between Puerto Rico and the people of the United States. This instrument, moreover, did not substantially change the status of the Territory or the relationship between the two peoples in economic, social or legislative matters, in which Puerto Rico still lacked independence. The United States, they alleged, aimed at disguising the existing state of affairs in the Territory, which it used for the establishment of large military bases in the Caribbean. A decision to cease the transmission of information could only lawfully be taken by the General Assembly when a Non-Self-Governing Territory had become sovereign and independent and when legislative, executive and judiciary powers were in the hands of the people of the Territory, they said.

These representatives also contended that in Puerto Rico foreign investors owned most of the land and drew large profits, while the cost of living had greatly increased. There were insufficient doctors and schools and many Puerto Ricans had emigrated to the United States in search of work.

At the 350th meeting on 3 November, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Panama and Peru submitted a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.300), according to which the General Assembly would:

(1) take note favourably of the conclusions set forth by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in its resolution;

(2) recognize that the people of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, by expressing their will in a free and democratic way, had achieved a new constitutional status;

(3) express the opinion that it stemmed from the documentation provided that the association of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico with the United States had been established as a mutually agreed association;

(4) recognize that when choosing their constitutional and international status, the people of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico had effectively exercised their right to self-determination;

(5) recognize that in the framework of their Constitution and of the compact agreed upon with the United States the people of Puerto Rico had been invested with attributes of political sovereignty which clearly identified their status as an autonomous political entity;

(6) consider that, due to these circumstances, the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories and the provisions established under it in Chapter XI of the Charter could no longer be applied to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico;

(7) take note of the opinion of the United States Government as to the cessation of the transmission of information on Puerto Rico under Article 73e of the Charter;

(8) consider it appropriate that this information should cease; and

(9) express its assurance that, in accordance with the spirit of this resolution, the ideals embodied in the United Nations Charter, the traditions of the people of the United States and the political advancement attained by the people of Puerto Rico, due regard would be paid to the will of both the Puerto Rican and American peoples in the conduct of their relations under their present legal statute, and also in the eventuality that either of the parties to the mutually agreed association might desire any change in the terms of this association.

The sponsors of the joint draft resolution emphasized their acceptance of the basic principle that territories on the American Continent should achieve independence as soon as possible and applauded the first step towards complete independence which had been taken by Puerto Rico. They also stated that Puerto Rico had achieved internal autonomy and that the people of Puerto Rico had, by the exercise of their own right to self-determination, chosen the constitutional form which that independence should take. The constitutional form they had accepted guaranteed the development of a democratic system; independence was being achieved by peaceful means.

The representative of Peru said that the economy of Puerto Rico explained why commonwealth association with the United States had been chosen.

The representative of Ecuador outlined advances which had been made by Puerto Rico between 1940 and 1950 in the economic, social and educational fields and cited figures showing the increase in school enrolment and in wages and production and the decrease in the death rate and illiteracy. Because Puerto Rico had now become self-governing, he added, nothing warranted the obligation to transmit to the United Nations information under Article 73e of the Charter. The role of the United Nations was clearly to encourage the people of Puerto Rico.

The representative of Costa Rica also cited figures to show the economic progress of Puerto Rico. Puerto Ricans had achieved their desire for independence and had also assured their economic stability. The deciding factor was the expression of the will of the majority, freely expressed. As Puerto Rico had achieved social, economic and cultural autonomy, the United States could not continue the transmission of information on that Territory.

The representatives of Canada, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Iran and Israel, emphasizing that Puerto Rico had exercised its right to self-determination, said that the Non-Self-Governing Territories normally advanced by stages to self-government. Puerto Rico had reached the stage of exercising control over its economic, social and educational affairs. The representative of Cuba said that the new Constitution of Puerto Rico recognized no limitation to the subordination of all powers to the will of the people, and thus internal political independence represented full self-government. Direction of international relations and defence by the United States did not, he stated, constitute interference in the internal affairs of Puerto Rico. Moreover, the status of the Territory would always represent the wishes of the majority of the population. Should the people of Puerto Rico seek complete independence as their status, he felt sure that this would not be opposed by the United States.

Among those who supported that part of the seven-Power draft which stated that the Assembly considered it appropriate that the transmission of information should cease were the representatives of Haiti, Iran and Israel. On the other hand, the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Honduras, India and Poland were among those who felt that this paragraph should not form part of the draft resolution because they felt that the information should continue to be transmitted.

Burma, Guatemala, Honduras, Indonesia and Mexico submitted joint amendments (A/C.4/L.302) which would, among other things, add to the preamble a paragraph stating the competence of the General Assembly to decide whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter; and would, further, have the Assembly express its confidence that the United States would find it possible to continue to transmit information in respect of Puerto Rico under Article 73e of the Charter, rather than consider it appropriate that the transmission of information should cease. It also sought to delete from the operative part of the seven-Power draft the paragraphs which provided that the Assembly should:

(1) take note favourably of the conclusions of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories;

(2) recognize that the people of Puerto Rico had been vested with attributes of political sovereignty which identified their status as an autonomous political entity; and

(3) consider that Chapter XI of the Charter no longer applied to Puerto Rico.

The sponsors of these amendments stated that, while they applauded the achievement by the people of Puerto Rico of their current status, the existing form of government fell short of a full measure of self-government and the transmission of information should therefore continue. They also paid tribute to the United States and to the Government of Puerto Rico for the progress made.

India submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.301) which, in effect, would have the Assembly establish a six-member ad hoc committee which would examine further the question of the cessation of the transmission of information on Puerto Rico, with oral hearings if it considered these necessary, and report to the Assembly at its next session. Presenting her amendment, the representative of India said that appreciation for what had been accomplished by the United States, as Administering Authority, should not blind the Committee to the need of a full study before it took a final decision on the question of cessation. As Puerto Rico was economically and commercially dependent on the United States, she said, the Territory had not reached a full measure of self-government envisaged by the Charter, which would place it outside the scope of Chapter XL

At its 355th meeting on 5 November, the Committee cast 20 separate votes before adopting the draft resolution. The only amendment adopted by the Committee was that part of the five-Power amendment (A/C.4/L.302) which stated the competence of the General Assembly to decide when a Territory had become fully self-governing. This was adopted by a roll-call vote of 32 to 19, with 8 abstentions.

By 34 votes to 13, with 12 abstentions, the Committee rejected another part of the five-Power amendment which would have the Assembly express its confidence that the United States would find it possible to continue transmitting information on Puerto Rico under Article 73e of the Charter. It also rejected, by 31 votes to 15, with 13 abstentions, that part of the five-Power amendment which would delete several paragraphs from the seven-Power draft resolution (see above).

Those parts of the Indian amendment which included the proposal for an ad hoc six-member committee to study the question further were rejected by the Committee by 34 votes to 18, with 7 abstentions.

After voting on the amendments, the Committee voted separately on each paragraph of the resolution. Votes on the individual paragraphs ranged from 48 to 1, with 6 abstentions, to 24 to 17, with 17 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 22 to 18, with 19 abstentions.

In explanation of vote, the representatives of France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States said they had abstained on the resolution because of the adoption of that part of the five-Power amendment asserting the competence of the General Assembly. The representatives of Australia and New Zealand explained that they had voted against the resolution for similar reasons.

The draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2556 VII) was considered by the General Assembly at its 459th plenary meeting on 27 November.

The United States representative said that he was authorized to state on behalf of the President of the United States that if, at any time, the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico adopted a resolution in favour of more complete or even absolute independence, he would immediately thereafter recommend to the United States Congress that such independence be granted. The President also wished to say that, in that event, he would welcome Puerto Rico's adherence to the Rio Pact and the United Nations Charter. The President's statement was an expression of the traditional interest which the United States has always had in encouraging and promoting political freedom for all people in all parts of the world whenever conditions were such that their freedom would not be jeopardized by internal or external pressures, said the United States representative. He would vote for the resolution, he said, on the understanding that any participation by the Assembly in a decision as to whether or not a country had ceased to be non-self-governing was limited to discussion and an expression of views and recommendations. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala and India explained their votes on the basis of their views expressed in the Committee.

The Assembly first adopted the first five paragraphs of the preamble, by a vote of 39 to none, with 17 abstentions. By a roll-call vote of 34 to 19, with 7 abstentions, it adopted that part of the preamble which stated the competence of the Assembly to decide when a Territory had become fully self-governing. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, France, Iceland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Sweden, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Brazil, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Honduras, Israel, Nicaragua, Peru.

It adopted the operative part of the draft resolution by 26 votes to 11, with 19 abstentions. By a roll-call vote of 26 to 16, with 18 abstentions, it adopted the draft resolution, as a whole, as resolution 748(VIII). Voting was as follows:

In favour: Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Iran, Israel, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Thailand, Turkey, United States, Uruguay.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, Union of South Africa, USSR, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Argentina, Denmark, Egypt, France, Iceland, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, Venezuela, Yemen.

Resolution 748 (VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that, in resolution 222(III) of 3 November 1948, the General Assembly, while welcoming any development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories, considers it essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional status of any such Territory as a result of which the government responsible for the transmission, under Article 73e of the Charter, of information in respect of that Territory thinks it unnecessary or inappropriate to continue such a practice,

"Having received the communications dated 19 January and 20 March 1953 informing the United Nations of the establishment of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, as a result of the entry into force on 25 July 1952 of the Constitution of Puerto Rico, and stating that, in consequence of these constitutional changes, the Government of the United States of America would cease to transmit information under Article 73e of the Charter,

"Having studied the report prepared by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, during its session of 1953, on the question of the cessation of the transmission of information on Puerto Rico, and presented to the General Assembly in conformity with paragraph 2 of resolution 448(V) of 12 December 1950,

"Having examined the communications of the Government of the United States of America in the light of the basic principles embodied in Chapter XI of the Charter and of all the other elements of judgment pertinent to the issue,

"Considering that the agreement reached by the United States of America and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, in forming a political association which respects the individuality and the cultural characteristics of Puerto Rico, maintains the spiritual bonds between Puerto Rico and Latin America and constitutes a link in continental solidarity,

"Bearing in mind the competence of the General Assembly to decide whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter,

"1. Takes note favourably of the conclusions set forth by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in its resolution;

"2. Recognizes that the people of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, by expressing their will in a free and democratic way, have achieved a new constitutional status;

"3. Expresses the opinion that it stems from the documentation provided that the association of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico with the United States of America has been established as a mutually agreed association;

"4. Recognizes that, when choosing their constitutional and international status, the people of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico have effectively exercised their right to self-determination;

"5. Recognizes that, in the framework of their Constitution and of the compact agreed upon with the United States of America, the people of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico have been invested with attributes of political sovereignty which clearly identify the status of self-government attained by the Puerto Rican people as that of an autonomous political entity;

"6. Considers that, due to these circumstances, the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories and the provisions established under it in Chapter XI of the Charter can no longer be applied to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico;

"7. Takes note of the opinion of the Government of the United States of America as to the cessation of the transmission under Article 73e of the Charter of information on Puerto Rico;

"8. Considers it appropriate that the transmission of this information should cease;

"9. 3. Greenland

At the 324th meeting of the Assembly's Fourth Committee on 2 October, the representative of Denmark recalled that a new Constitution had been adopted by the Danish Parliament and had later been approved by the people of Denmark in a referendum on 5 June 1953. The Constitution incorporated the provision, in accordance with which Greenland became an integral part of the Danish realm with rights corresponding to those of other parts of Denmark and gained representation in Parliament on an equal footing.

In view of this change, he said, Greenland was no longer a Non-Self-Governing Territory falling within the scope of Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter, and this information, together with relative documents, had been communicated (A/AC.35/L.155) to the Secretary-General of the United Nations on 3 September 1953. It was the understanding of the Danish Government that the communication would come before the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories at its next session.

D. THE QUESTION OF SOUTH WEST AFRICA

In resolutions 65(I), 141(II), 227(III), 337(IV) and 449(V),²⁹ the General Assembly expressed its opinion that South West Africa should be placed under the International Trusteeship System and that a Trusteeship Agreement should be submitted in respect of the Territory.

In resolution 570(VI),³⁰ adopted on 19 January 1952, the Assembly reiterated its recommendations and recalled that it had accepted the advisory opinion of 11 July 1950 of the International Court of Justice, which stated, inter alia, that:

(1) the Union of South Africa continues to have the international obligations stated in article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the Mandate for South West Africa as well as the obligation to transmit petitions from the inhabitants of that Territory, the supervisory functions to be exercised by the United Nations, to which the annual reports and the petitions are to be submitted, and the reference to the Permanent Court of International Justice to be replaced by a reference to the International Court of Justice, in accordance with article 7 of the Mandate and Article 37 of the Statute of the Court;

(2) the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter are applicable to the Territory of South West Africa in the sense that they provide a means by which the Territory may be brought under the Trusteeship System;

(3) these provisions do not impose on the Union of South Africa a legal obligation to place the Territory under the Trusteeship System; and

(4) the Union of South Africa, acting alone, has not the competence to modify the international status of the Territory and that such competence rests with the Union acting with the consent of the United Nations.

By the same resolution, the Assembly reconstituted the Ad hoc Committee on South West Africa to "confer with the Government of the Union of South Africa concerning means of implementing the advisory opinion of the Court."

By resolution 651(VIII),³¹ adopted on 20 December 1952, the Assembly decided to postpone consideration of the question, requesting the Ad hoc Committee to continue on the same basis and to report to the General Assembly at its eighth session.

1. Report of the Ad Hoc Committee

The Ad hoc Committee, composed of the representatives of Norway, Syria, Thailand, the United States and Uruguay, held four meetings during 1953 and reported (A/2475 & Add.1) that negotiations with the Union of South Africa had not resulted in agreement. On 14 September, however, the Committee had sent a letter to the representative of the Union of South Africa, giving its assurance that, so long as the Committee's mandate from the Assembly continued to exist, it was ready and willing to continue consultations.

The report showed that the unresolved issue was the question of United Nations supervision of the Union's administration of South West Africa. The Committee maintained that, under its terms of reference, it was bound to insist on the implementation of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of 11 July 1950 (see above). South Africa, on the other hand, did not recognize the principle of United Nations supervision, maintaining that the Court's opinion was only advisory and that it would be impossible to devise a system under which South Africa would be accountable to the United Nations, without extending the obligations it had incurred under the League of Nations Mandate. Instead, the report recalled, South Africa had offered to carry out its international obligations by negotiating an agreement with France, the United Kingdom and the United States, the three remaining members of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers of the First World War. South Africa would thus undertake a legal obligation to these three Powers and not to the United Nations, although the Union was prepared to accept final confirmation by the United Nations of the proposed new agreement.

The report said that, during the 1953 negotiations, South Africa had asked whether the Committee had decided formally to reject these proposals on their merits, and not merely on its own terms of reference. The Committee replied that since the proposals did not provide a means of carrying out the Court's opinion, and also did not recognize the principle of United Nations supervision, it was unable to accept them as a basis for a detailed discussion. The Committee re-emphasized its belief that negotiations for a new international agreement could be undertaken only by the United Nations, acting through an agency appointed by and responsible to it.

In reply to the Union's contention that accountability to the United Nations would increase the international obligations it had previously assumed, the Committee said that it appeared premature at the stage when fundamental problems of principle were not agreed upon, to make any pronouncement concerning the possibility of detailed implementation of the Court's advisory opinion. In addition, it pointed out that the Court had stipulated that the degree of supervision to be exercised by the United Nations should not exceed that which had applied under the League Mandate.

Restating the position of his Government, the representative of the Union of South Africa said, in a letter reproduced in the Committee's report, that the Union Government maintained that the Mandate in respect of South West Africa had lapsed and that, while South Africa continued to administer the Territory in the spirit of the trust originally accepted, as a result of the demise of the League of Nations it had no other international commitments.

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

The question of South West Africa was considered by the General Assembly at its eighth session, at the 357th to 364th meetings of the Fourth Committee, from 6 to 12 November, and at the 460th plenary meeting of the Assembly on 28 November.

The representative of Thailand, Chairman of the Ad hoc Committee, introduced the report, which, he said, made it clear that no substantial progress had been achieved. The last meeting between the Ad hoc Committee and the representative of the Union of South Africa had been held on 25 June. He regretted, the representative of Thailand stated, that the negotiations had not helped to settle the question or find a way of implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court, adding that, although the Committee had been unable to persuade the Union Government to negotiate on the basis of the Court's opinion, negotiations were at all times conducted without recrimination.

At the 357th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 6 November, the representative of the Union of South Africa said that the proposals made by his Government to achieve a solution were realistic and it was for the Fourth Committee to decide whether the Ad hoc Committee should be authorized to continue negotiations without undue restrictions. Much common ground had already been established and the South African Government appreciated the spirit in which the negotiations had been conducted. South Africa desired to co-operate with the United Nations and to settle finally what he called the unfortunate differences over South West Africa.

The Union representative repeated the stand taken in the Ad hoc Committee and said that no solution could be arrived at unless both parties made concessions. He recalled the earlier offers made by South Africa and the Ad hoc Committee's interpretation of its terms of reference, based on the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. He emphasized that the opinion of the Court was purely advisory and not automatically binding. Moreover, South Africa did not accept all the findings of the Court in this matter—a fact which did not affect its respect for the Court.

South Africa, he said, had proposed a new international instrument to revive the obligations of the Mandate Agreement and South Africa's international commitment with regard to carrying it out. The Ad hoc Committee had not considered this adequate and desired some provision for international supervision. Although South Africa contended that the powers and functions of the League of Nations did not devolve automatically on the United Nations and that no formal arrangements for international supervision were necessary, the Union Government had nevertheless offered to submit to juridical supervision and to accept, in that connexion, the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court. This also did not satisfy the Ad hoc Committee. South Africa further proposed the new instrument on the understanding that the Union would assume responsibility only to France, the United Kingdom and the United States, representing the Principal Allied and Associated Powers who had conferred on South Africa the original Mandate, but the Ad hoc Committee had decided that any new instrument would have to be concluded with the United Nations.

The negotiations, said the representative of South Africa, were handicapped by the very restrictive terms of reference of the Ad hoc Committee, which would not permit the negotiators to adjust differences. South Africa's proposals, he concluded, were designed to meet the differences and to ensure:

- (1) revival of the obligations assumed under the Mandate as a legal obligation;
- (2) its embodiment in a new instrument;
- (3) re-assumption by South Africa of international accountability to the Three Powers; and
- (4) provision to ensure the carrying out of the trust undertaken under the Mandate by accepting beforehand the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court.

Burma and India submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.304) which would, in effect, call on the Union to place the Territory under the International Trusteeship System. Presenting the proposal, the representative of India said that it was false to contend that, as the Mandate conferred by the League had lapsed, South Africa no longer had any international commitments with regard to South West Africa. The International Court had confirmed this, he said.

Thirty years of administration of the Territory by South Africa had left South West Africa a place in which the best lands were held by European settlers, in which there were no secondary schools and in which health services, housing conditions and living standards were poor, the representative of India continued. It had been said that 90 per cent of the people of South West Africa were in favour of incorporation in the Union of South Africa, but the measure of consultation of these inhabitants was not of a kind on which the United Nations could place any reliance.

The United Nations should not allow the Trusteeship System to become a system of spoliation, the representative of India contended. There was no legal, moral or political justification for the Union of South Africa to annex South West Africa or to refuse to place it under Trusteeship. He added that the system of apartheid prevailing in the Union would bring South Africa into sharp conflict with the United Nations, and the Union Government had rejected Trusteeship as a solution because this would carry an obligation to administer the Territory without racial discrimination.

The representative of India supported the stand taken by the Ad hoc Committee on South West Africa in its refusal to compromise what he called two vital principles: that any instrument of international accountability could be concluded only with the United Nations or an agency appointed by it, and that supervision of the Territory should be exercised by the United Nations.

The representative of Burma, co-sponsor of the joint draft, said that South West Africa was the only former Mandated Territory which had neither become independent nor been placed under the International Trusteeship System. It had thus been deprived of progress towards self-government which it might have achieved under Trusteeship.

At the following meeting, the representative of India announced that Burma and India had withdrawn their joint proposal in favour of two new drafts, of which both delegations had become co-sponsors. Their action, the representative of India said, was designed to achieve the greatest measure of co-operation. The two new proposals were: (1) An eleven-Power draft resolution (A/C.4/L.306 & Add.1), sponsored by Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Uruguay; and (2) a fifteen-Power draft resolution (A/C.4/L.305/Rev.1 & Add.1), sponsored by Afghanistan, Brazil, Burma, Denmark, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Liberia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand and Uruguay.

The eleven-Power draft resolution (A/C.4/L.306 & Add.1) would reiterate the resolutions of the General Assembly to the effect that the Territory of South West Africa should be placed under the International Trusteeship System and reassert that the normal way of modifying the international status of the Territory would be to place it under that System by means of a Trusteeship Agreement in accordance with Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter (Declaration on Non-Self-Governing Territories).

The great majority of representatives expressed support of the eleven-Power draft, which was adopted, as a whole, without amendment, by 42 votes to 1, with 10 abstentions, at the 364th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 12 November. Eight separate votes were recorded on individual paragraphs of the draft. Votes ranged from 44 to 1, with 7 abstentions, to 39 to 6, with 6 abstentions.

The draft resolution adopted by the Fourth Committee (A/2572) was adopted in turn by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 460th plenary meeting on 28 November, by a roll-call vote of 47 to 1, with 11 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Union of South Africa.

Abstaining: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Sweden, United Kingdom.

The resolution (749 B (VIII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having recommended, by its resolutions 65(I) of 14 December 1946, 141(II) of 1 November 1947, 227(III) of 26 November 1948, 337(IV) of 6 December 1949, 449 B (V) of 13 December 1950 and 570 B (VI) of 19 January 1952, that the Mandated Territory of South West Africa be placed under the International Trusteeship System, and having repeatedly invited the Government of the Union of South Africa to propose, for the consideration of the General Assembly, a Trusteeship Agreement for South West Africa,

"Having accepted, by resolution 449 A (V) of 13 December 1950, the advisory opinion of 11 July 1950 of the International Court of Justice concerning South West Africa, inter alia, to the effect that:

"(a) While the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter do not impose on the Union of South Africa a legal obligation to place the Territory under the Trusteeship System', they 'are applicable to the Territory of South West Africa in the sense that they provide a means by which the Territory may be brought under the Trusteeship System',

"(b) ' . . . the Union of South Africa acting alone has not the competence to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa', and ' . . . the competence to determine and modify the international status of the Territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations',

"Considering that, in accordance with Chapter XII of the Charter, all Mandated Territories which have not achieved independence have been brought under the Trusteeship System with the sole exception of the Territory of South West Africa,

"1. Reiterates its resolutions 65(I) of 14 December 1946, 141(II) of 1 November 1947, 227(III) of 26 November 1948, 337(IV) of 6 December 1949, 449 B (V) of 13 December 1950 and 570 B (VI) of 19 January 1952, to the effect that the Territory of South West Africa be placed under the International Trusteeship System;

"2. Reasserts that the normal way of modifying the international status of the Territory would be to place it under the Trusteeship System by means of a Trusteeship Agreement in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter."

The fifteen-Power draft resolution (A/C.4/L.305/Rev.1 & Add.1) sought the establishment by the General Assembly of a new nine-member Committee on South West Africa, which, until such time as an agreement was reached between the United Nations and the Union of South Africa, would:

(1) examine, within the scope of the Questionnaire adopted by the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations in 1926, such information and documentation as might be available in respect of the Territory of South West Africa;

(2) examine, as far as possible, in accordance with the procedure of the former Mandates System, reports and petitions which might be submitted to the Committee or to the Secretary-General;

(3) transmit to the General Assembly a report concerning conditions in the Territory taking into account, as far as possible, the scope of the Reports of the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations;

(4) prepare for the examination of the General Assembly a procedure for the examination of such reports and petitions which should conform as far as possible to the procedure followed in this respect by the Assembly, the Council and the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations.

The draft resolution would further authorize the Committee to continue negotiations with the Union of South Africa in order to implement fully the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice regarding the question of South West Africa and request the Committee to submit reports on its activities to the General Assembly at its regular sessions.

In terms of the fifteen-Power draft resolution the Assembly would further:

(1) commend the Ad hoc Committee on South West Africa for its constructive efforts to find a basis of agreement with the Union Government on the question of South West Africa;

(2) record "with deep regret" that that Government continued in its refusal to implement the Court's advisory opinion concerning the Territory;

(3) note with concern that no reports on the Territory had been submitted by the Union Government;

(4) note that the Union Government had "refused to co-operate with the United Nations" concerning the submission of petitions from that Territory;

(5) note the communications on South West Africa received by the Ad hoc Committee;

(6) reaffirm that the Union Government should assume its obligations to the United Nations with regard to that Territory;

(7) appeal solemnly to the Union Government to reconsider its position;

(8) reaffirm that the Territory was a Territory under the International Mandate assumed by the Union in 1920;

(9) reaffirm that the Union Government continued to have international obligations in respect of the Territory and that supervisory functions were to be exercised by the United Nations;

(10) express the view that without such supervision the inhabitants were deprived of what was envisaged by the Covenant of the League of Nations; and

(11) state its belief that the United Nations would not be fulfilling its obligations to the inhabitants of the Territory if it were not to assume supervisory responsibilities.

During the general debate, the sponsors of the fifteen-Power draft resolution—Afghanistan, Brazil, Burma, Denmark, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Liberia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand and Uruguay—argued that it was clear from the opinion of the Court that South Africa should have submitted a Trusteeship Agreement in respect of South West Africa. It was invalid, they held, to contend that the Mandate for South West Africa had lapsed with the demise of the League of Nations and that South Africa had no international commitments in respect of the Territory. They could not accept the South African proposal to recognize responsibility to the three remaining members of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers of the First World War, since this amounted to an arrangement to take the question of South West Africa outside the control of the United Nations. Nor could they accept the South African argument that concern by the United Nations over the Territory constituted interference in the internal affairs of the Union of South Africa. The United Nations could not abandon a people for which it had an international responsibility and United Nations control would ensure the orderly progress of the peoples of South West Africa towards the goal of self-government or independence.

South Africa, they said, had undertaken solemn obligations and it was the duty of that country to honour them. There could be no agreement unless and until the South African Government accepted the principle of supervision of the administration of the Territory by the United Nations, which was the very core of the advisory opinion given by the International Court of Justice. South Africa's refusal to accept this principle had predestined the negotiations to failure. The United Nations should avail itself of all means at its disposal to ascertain whether the terms of the Mandate were being carried out. If it were shown that the Territory was not being administered in those terms, then, under article 7 of the Mandate, the way was open for the United Nations to initiate proceedings.

The sponsors of the fifteen-Power draft appealed to South Africa to co-operate in seeking a solution. This solution was important to the United Nations as every Member of the Organization had an interest in the inhabitants of all territories which were not now administering their own affairs. A clear indication of the earnest desire of the General Assembly to arrive at a just solution was evidenced in the proposal to establish a new committee with new terms of reference, following what they called the uncompromising attitude of the Union Government through three years of negotiation. The achievement of an early solution of the problem was in the interest not only of the indigenous inhabitants of the Territory but was also of paramount importance in the interests of peace and harmony in Africa as a whole.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR maintained that South Africa had annexed the Territory of South West Africa in violation of the Charter, and the United Nations could not associate itself with what they called an illegal act. South Africa, they said, was administering South West Africa against the will of the people of that Territory and without the formal authority of the United Nations. It was, further, ignoring world international opinion as well as the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. In South West Africa, racial discrimination was being practised; the people were suffering unbearable domination, being deprived of the most elementary rights, and carrying heavy burdens of a social, political, economic and legal nature. The continued refusal of the South African Government to place the Territory under Trusteeship was an undermining of the International Trusteeship System and a violation of the Charter. The reason for this refusal, these representatives maintained, was that the Union Government wished to perpetuate its mastery over the Territory and to exploit its people.

The fifteen-Power draft was supported generally by the great majority of representatives in the Committee.

Replying to points raised in the general debate, the representative of the Union of South Africa said that the debate had concentrated on: (1) criticism that South Africa's interpretation of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice was unjustifiable; (2) allegations that South Africa had virtually incorporated South West Africa as a fifth province; and (3) allegations of backwardness and exploitation of the Territory.

The Union Government, its representative stated, had concluded that the Court had erred in its juridical reasoning and could not accept the Court's opinion as a whole. In particular it could not accept certain of the Court's statements and conclusions as a correct exposition of the law.

Regarding the allegations that South Africa had annexed the Territory of South West Africa, he said that South Africa had been given the competence under the Mandate to administer and to legislate for South West Africa as an integral part of South Africa. The only limitation on its powers was the obligation to carry out the sacred trust conferred on it. South Africa had at all times scrupulously observed that trust.

In reply to the charges of backwardness in South West Africa, the Union representative stated that the Administration's record showed progress and development which could scarcely be conceived at the time the Union took over responsibility for the Territory. From 1946 the Territory had enjoyed considerable economic prosperity from which the indigenous population had benefited fully: in three years expenditure on education for the indigenous population had been more than doubled and that on health and general services increased by 80 per cent. Average holdings of the best lands were 225 acres for every man, woman and child of the indigenous population.

Statements attempting to discredit the Government of the Union of South Africa, he said, could not be conducive to an atmosphere in which realistic negotiation was possible.

He added that his Government's decision not to furnish reports on the administration of the Territory was not due to any desire to suppress information on South West African affairs. Statistics and reports on the Territory continued to be made public.

At its 364th meeting on 12 November, the Fourth Committee adopted, as a whole, without amendment, the fifteen-Power draft resolution by a roll-call vote of 41 to 1, with 11 abstentions. It completed a series of 32 separate votes on individual paragraphs and sub-paragraphs, with votes ranging from 50 to 1, to 35 to 5, with 11 abstentions. The paragraph of the draft recommending the establishment of the new Committee was adopted by roll-call vote of 39 to 8, with 6 abstentions.

At the 460th plenary meeting of the General Assembly on 28 November, the representative of India introduced an oral amendment to the resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2572) which would reduce from nine to seven the number of members of the proposed new Committee on South West Africa and provide that these members be appointed by the President of the General Assembly.

The representative of the Union of South Africa said that the position taken by his delegation had been clearly stated in the Fourth Committee and that he would not take part in the decision of the General Assembly concerning the particular point raised by the Indian oral amendment.

The Assembly adopted the Indian oral amendment by 47 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions. It adopted the amended paragraph calling for the establishment of the new Committee by a roll-call vote of 44 to 8, with 7 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen and Yugoslavia.

Against: Belgium, Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, France, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, Union of South Africa, USSR.

Abstaining: Australia, Canada, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, United Kingdom.

The Assembly also voted by roll call on that part of the resolution which would state that the Union Government should assume its obligations to the United Nations and not, as proposed by the Union, to the three Powers (France, the United Kingdom and the United States) as principals. Voting, which was 51 to 1, with 8 abstentions, was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Union of South Africa.

Abstaining: Australia, Belgium, France, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, United Kingdom, United States.

After adopting the remaining paragraphs of the draft resolution in a series of separate votes, ranging from 48 to 1, with 6 abstentions, to 39 to 2, with 12 abstentions, the Assembly adopted the amended draft resolution, as a whole, by a roll-call vote of 46 to 1, with 12 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Union of South Africa.

Abstaining: Australia, Belgium, Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, France, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Kingdom.

The resolution (749 A (VIII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having accepted, by resolution 449 A (V) of 13 December 1950 and by resolution 570(VI) of 19 January 1952, the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with respect to South West Africa,

"Recalling that the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with respect to the Territory of South West Africa sets forth, inter alia, that:

"(a) The Territory of South West Africa is a Territory under the international Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa on 17 December 1920,

"(b) The Union of South Africa acting alone has not the competence to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa, and that the competence to determine and modify the international status of the Territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations,

"(c) The Union of South Africa continues to have the international obligations stated in Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the Mandate for South West Africa as well as the obligation to transmit petitions from the inhabitants of that Territory, the supervisory functions to be exercised by the United Nations to which the annual reports and the petitions are to be submitted,

"Considering that, in accordance with the opinion of the International Court of Justice, the Union of South Africa is under an obligation to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court as provided by Article 37 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, by Article 80, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations and by article 7 of the Mandate for South West Africa,

"Having reconstituted the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa, consisting of the representatives of Norway, Syria, Thailand, the United States of America and Uruguay, by General Assembly resolution 570 A (VI) of 19 January 1952 and, by General Assembly resolution 651(VII) of 20 December 1952, having continued it on the same basis as before,

"Having considered the reports of the aforesaid Ad Hoc Committee, i.e., document A/2261 submitted on 21 November 1952 and documents A/2475 and Add.1 and 2 submitted on 16 September, 8 October and 9 November 1953,

"1. Commends the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa for its earnest and constructive efforts to find a mutually satisfactory basis of agreement;

"2. Records with deep regret that the Government of the Union of South Africa continues in its refusal to assist in the implementation of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice concerning South West Africa, and continues to maintain that the Union of South Africa has no international commitments as the result of the demise of the League of Nations, and that the Government of the Union of South Africa is prepared only to enter into new arrangements for the Territory of South West Africa with the Principal Allied and Associated Powers of the First World War (France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America), and not with the United Nations;

"3. Notes with concern that, as required by paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 570 A (VI), the Ad Hoc Committee was unable to examine reports on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa because again no such reports were submitted by the Government of the Union of South Africa;

"4. Notes with further regret that the Union of South Africa has refused to co-operate with the United Nations concerning the submission of petitions in accordance with the procedures of the Mandates System;

"5. Notes the contents of the communications relating to South West Africa received by the Ad Hoc Committee in 1951, 1952 and 1953 from sources within and outside the Territory of South West Africa and contained in the aforesaid reports of the Ad Hoc Committee;

"6. Reaffirms that, in order to implement the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with regard to South West Africa,

"(a) The supervision of the administration of South West Africa, though it should not exceed that which applied under the Mandates System, should be exercised by the United Nations; judicial supervision by the International Court of Justice, which the Union Government is prepared to accept, is not in accordance with the advisory opinion expressed by that Court and accepted by the General Assembly;

"(b) The Union Government should assume its obligations to the United Nations and not, as proposed by the Union Government, to the three Powers (France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America) as principals;

"7. Appeals solemnly to the Government of the Union of South Africa to reconsider its position, and urges it to continue negotiations with the Committee on South West Africa, established under paragraph 12 below, in accordance with the aforesaid principles for the purpose of concluding an agreement providing for the full implementation of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice; and urges it further to resume submission of reports on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa and to transmit to the United Nations petitions from individuals or groups of the population of the Territory;

"8. Recalls and reaffirms that the Territory of South West Africa is a Territory under the international Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa on 17 December 1920;

E. CONDITIONS IN TRUST TERRITORIES IN THE PACIFIC

During its twelfth session, held from 16 June to 21 July 1953, the Trusteeship Council examined annual reports submitted by the Administering Authorities on the administration during the year 1951-52 of each of the four Trust Territories in the Pacific: Nauru, New Guinea, Western Samoa and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.³²

The Council also examined individually six petitions concerning Nauru, twelve concerning New Guinea, two concerning Western Samoa and eighteen concerning the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.³³

In examining the annual reports and petitions, the Council took into consideration the observations (T/1062) of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) on the annual reports on Nauru, New Guinea and Western Samoa and the reports concerning the four Trust Territories of the Visiting Mission sent to the four Territories in 1953 (T/1054-1057).

The decision and preliminary arrangements to send a visiting mission to the four Trust Territories in the Pacific were made by the Trusteeship Council during the second part of its eleventh session and were reported³⁴ to the General Assembly at its seventh session. The members of the Mission were as follow: Enrique de Marchena (Dominican Republic), Chairman; Leon Pignon (France); Najmuddin Rifai (Syria), and W. A. C. Mathieson (United Kingdom).

The Mission left New York on 12 February 1953 and on 16 February arrived by air in Honolulu, where it spent four days in discussions with the Acting High Commissioner of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, his headquarters staff and the Commander-in-Chief of the United States Pacific Fleet. The Mission then visited Guam, the Western Carolines, the Northern Marianas, the Eastern Carolines and the Marshall Islands, leaving the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands on 10 March.

³⁴ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 586-87.

On 10 March, the Mission arrived by air in the Trust Territory of Nauru where it stayed until 13 March. During its three-day visit, the Mission held meetings with the Administrator, two of the British Phosphate Commissioners, the Nauruan Local Government Council, people of the Territory and representatives of the Chinese community. It also visited the installations of the British Phosphate Commissioners, the Chinese, Gilbertese and Ellice Islander settlements, a number of schools and the Administration hospital.

The Mission next visited New Guinea and arrived at Rabaul on 14 March. From then until 9 April, the Mission visited various parts of the Trust Territory, including the New Britain, Bougainville, New Ireland, Manus, Sepik, Eastern Highlands, Madang, Western Highlands and Morobe Districts. On 9 April, the Mission left the Territory for Port Moresby in Papua and remained there for meetings with the Administrator and departmental heads until 13 April when it left Papua for Australia. During its stay in Australia, the Mission held conversations on Nauru and New Guinea at Canberra with the Australian Minister for Territories.

The Mission arrived in New Zealand on 21 April, where it held discussions on Western Samoa with the Prime Minister of New Zealand, the Minister of Island Territories and the principal officials of the latter's staff.

The Mission arrived in Western Samoa on 28 April. During its ten-day visit, it held discussions with the High Commissioner and his principal officials, the Samoan members of the Council of State, the Executive Council, the Legislative Assembly, the Fono of Faipule, the President and members of the Samoan Democratic Party and people of the Territory. The Mission visited various parts of the Trust Territory, including the outlying districts of Upolu and Savai'i.

After stopping briefly at Honolulu, the Mission returned to New York on 16 May and unanimously adopted the reports on the four Territories visited in May-June 1953.

At its 482nd meeting on 20 July 1953, the Council adopted, by 11 votes to none, resolution (648(XII)) by which it took note of the reports, expressed its appreciation of the work accomplished by the Visiting Mission and drew attention to the fact that, at its twelfth session, in formulating its own conclusions and recommendations on conditions in the Territories concerned, it had taken into account the Mission's observations and conclusions. The Council decided that it would continue to take these observations and conclusions into account in the future examination of matters relating to the Trust Territories concerned, and invited the Administering Authorities concerned to give the most careful consideration to the conclusions of the Visiting Mission as well as to the comments made thereon by the members of the Trusteeship Council.

A brief description of the conditions in each of the Trust Territories in the Pacific is given below, together with summaries of the observations of the Visiting Mission and of the conclusions and recommendations of the Council in connexion with its examination of annual reports.

1. Western Samoa, Administered by New Zealand

Western Samoa comprises two large islands, Savai'i and Upolu, and a few smaller islands and islets, with a total area of about 1,130 square miles.

The provisional results of the last census taken in September 1951, the Administering Authority stated in the annual report,³⁵ showed that at that time the population consisted of 78,340 Samoans and persons of other races holding Samoan status, 4,199 persons of part-Samoan blood possessing European status, 393 Europeans and 164 Chinese, making a total population of 83,096, or 14,899 more than in September 1945.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council noted the progress achieved in all fields during the period under review and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority and the Samoan people would continue full collaboration to continue this development and, in particular, to solve the economic and social problems which might arise from the rapid growth of population.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

The Samoa Act, 1921, and the Samoa Amendment Acts of 1947, 1949 and 1951 and 1952 are the foundation of the Territory's legal and political structures.

The executive branch of the Government is entrusted to the High Commissioner who presides over the Council of State, the Executive Council, the Legislative Assembly and meetings of the Fono of Faipule. No ordinance passed by the Legislative Assembly can become law without his assent and no finance bill disposing of public revenue may be passed by it except upon his recommendation.

The High Commissioner is advised by a Council of State, composed of the High Commissioner and the two Fautua (advisers who are Chiefs of the highest standing) and by an Executive Council created pursuant to the Samoa Amendment Act, 1952. The High Commissioner is directed to consult the Council of State on all proposals for legislation to be submitted to the Legislative Assembly, concerning all matters closely relating to Samoan custom and on any other matters affecting the welfare of Western Samoa which he considers proper.

As recommended by the Trusteeship Council, an Executive Council was established by the Samoa Amendment Act, 1952, and came into being early in 1953. This body is composed of the High Commissioner, the two Fautua, three official members appointed by the High Commissioner, three Samoan and one European elected members of the Legislative Assembly appointed by the High Commissioner upon nomination, respectively, by the Samoan and European elected members of that body. The function of the Executive Council is to "confer with and advise the High Commissioner on the forming, determining and implementing" of government policy. Any member of the Council of State may require any matter within the competence of that Council to be referred to it, in which case, unless the High Commissioner directs otherwise, the Executive Council may not consider the matter until the Council of State has advised on it. The Amendment Act further provides that the three official members of the Executive Council shall be, ex officio, three of the official members of the Legislative Assembly.

At the Trusteeship Council's twelfth session, the special representative of the Administering Authority said that the ratio of Samoan to European members of the Executive Council would be important if, in discussion or voting, Samoans and Europeans were ranged in opposition. In practice, this was not the case; the Executive Council operated in a smooth and almost informal fashion and decisions were usually reached by agreement, with very little strict voting being required.

The measure of control exercised by the Government and the High Commissioner, he stated further, was no more than was required at present to support the authority and the responsibility of the Administering Authority under the terms of the Trusteeship Agreement.

The work of the Executive Government is carried on, under the High Commissioner, by a secretariat headed by the Secretary of the Government, who is also a member of the Legislative Assembly and the Executive Council and the permanent head of the Western Samoan Public Service. He is assisted by two Assistant Secretaries, one for district affairs and the other for administrative matters. It is intended that the District Affairs Branch should gradually take over the Department of Samoan Affairs and, as a first step, the Secretary for Samoan Affairs was appointed in 1952 to the position of Secretary to the Government.

The Western Samoan Public Service is controlled by a Public Service Commissioner, appointed by the Governor-General of New Zealand and subject to the control of the New Zealand Minister of Island Territories regarding regulations for the conduct of the Service and regarding all matters which, in the opinion of the Minister, affect the policy of the Administering Authority. In 1952, the Legislative Assembly passed a motion requesting that the Commissioner should be subject to direction by the Executive Council "in matters which affect the policy of the Government of Western Samoa". The 1953 Visiting Mission did not comment upon this motion but felt that some control over the Service should be exercised by the High Commissioner.

Wage increases for public servants to compensate for the rise in the cost of living were granted with effect from January and 1 July 1952, the Administering Authority reported.

At the end of 1952, the Public Service employed a total of 1,039 persons of whom 986 were domiciled in the Territory. All department heads were Europeans of whom two were classified as "local Europeans". Out of a total of 72 persons in the professional and technical or senior administrative assistant categories, 21 were Samoans or "local Europeans".

In connexion with the new proposals for constitutional reform (see below), the Administering Authority considered that there existed a need for intensive training to fit Samoans for key administrative positions. The Visiting Mission endorsed this opinion and believed that an intensive programme of training should be commenced without undue delay. It suggested that such a programme might include the appointment of Samoans as assistants or understudies to senior officials but that the most rapid results would probably be obtained by secondment of Samoan officials for periods of overseas training.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council, at its twelfth session, that an organized scheme of staff training had been undertaken under the supervision of a senior officer, who, prior to his appointment to the Government of Western Samoa, had had experience with this work in the office of the Public Service Commission of New Zealand. Consideration was also being given to the appointment of a full-time staff training officer.

The Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session noted with satisfaction the steps taken by the Government of Western Samoa to institute an organized scheme of staff training and also that consideration was being given to the appointment of a full-time staff training officer, drew the attention of the Administering Authority to the suggestion of the Visiting Mission concerning the secondment of Samoan officials for periods of training with the New Zealand service and, where possible, with other government services.

The Trusteeship Council noted the observation of the Visiting Mission that it would be desirable for the Minister of Island Territories to delegate part of his authority over the Public Service Commission to the High Commissioner. It also noted that the organization of the Public Service of Western Samoa would be considered at the constitutional convention (see below) and said that it awaited information on the decisions taken in this respect.

Under the Act of 1947, the Samoan Legislative Assembly possesses extensive legislative powers in so far as concerns domestic matters, including the approval of the Territorial budget, although the New Zealand Government still retains its inherent legislative power in respect of Western Samoa and the Governor-General in Council has the power to make regulations for the peace, order and good government of the Territory.

The Legislative Assembly consists of the Council of State, twelve Samoan members elected by the Fono of Faipule, five elected European members and six official members, of whom three are required by the Samoa Amendment Act, 1952, to be the official members of the Executive Council and not more than three may be members of the Western Samoan Public Service appointed by the High Commissioner and holding office during his pleasure. The High Commissioner, as President, has a casting vote but has never used this nor his power to veto legislation. The Assembly holds two sessions each year.

The Fono of Faipule consists of 41 members representing territorial constituencies based on the traditional districts and sub-districts of Western Samoa and selected by the matais (family heads). The Fono ordinarily meets twice a year and is a purely advisory body having the statutory right to express opinions and make recommendations to the High Commissioner on matters concerning the welfare of the Samoan people. It also submits nominations for the appointment of Samoan district judges, plantation inspectors and associate judges of the Land and Titles Court, and it elects the Samoan members of the Legislative Assembly.

The Visiting Missions of 1950 and 1953 both drew attention to the absence of any co-ordinated and regulated system of local government in Western Samoa, where district and village affairs continue for the most part to be controlled in the traditional Samoan manner by councils of matais which exercise certain quasi-judicial powers which are not officially recognized. Intervention by the central government is confined to such matters as health and sanitation, education, criminal jurisdiction and, to a limited extent, public works. The 1953 Visiting Mission considered that the absence of a proper constitutional relationship between the Government and the local councils constituted a serious defect, since it hindered the growth of a mutual sense of obligation and responsibility.

A District and Village Government Board Bill, based on the recommendations of the Commission of Enquiry which had investigated the question in 1950, was considered by the Legislative Assembly in 1952, the Administering Authority reported. This Bill provides for the establishment of a District and Village Government Board, composed of the two Fautua and six members nominated by the Fono of Faipule under the Chairmanship of the High Commissioner, to furnish a link between the central Government and the local authorities and to interpret the requirements of each to the other. The Board would examine proposals and make recommendations concerning the legal establishment of local authorities and district and village courts, approve their by-laws and rules of procedure, and render them advice and assistance. A final amended draft of the Bill, it was stated, was to be reported on in August 1953 by the Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly set up for the purpose. In order to make possible those of its provisions relating to the creation of local courts, the Administering Authority was prepared to introduce legislation into the New Zealand Parliament for the necessary amendment of the Samoa Act, 1921. The Visiting Mission regarded the introduction of the District and Village Government Board Bill as a most important step in the political advancement of Western Samoa and believed that its implementation would greatly assist in preparing the Territory for self-government.

At its tenth session, the Trusteeship Council had expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would make progress towards devising a form of local government for the urban area of Apia, the capital of Western Samoa. The District and Village Government Board Bill makes no provision for this and the Administering Authority, in explanation, stated that the Samoan members of the Legislative Assembly had deleted the matter from the terms of reference of the Commission of Enquiry, and that any attempt to force this development might be suspected by most Samoans for historical reasons. However, it hoped that the Legislative Assembly would soon agree to a detailed study of the problems involved. The Visiting Mission shared this hope and considered that, in the new political situation created by the prospect of early self-government, such fears as might still exist in the minds of the Samoans could have no validity.

The Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session noted with satisfaction that a final draft of the District and Village Government Board Bill would be submitted to the Legislative Assembly in 1953 and reiterated its hope that early consideration might be given to the establishment of some system of local government for the urban area of Apia.

Except for the European community, which possesses universal adult suffrage, the franchise among Samoans continues to be confined to the matai who elect the members of the Fono of Faipule, who in turn elect the Samoan members of the Legislative Assembly.

The Trusteeship Council has in the past urged that constant attention should be devoted to educating the Samoan people towards the realization of the place of universal suffrage in a system of democratic self-government.

In its annual report for 1952, the Administering Authority stated that continued efforts had been made to educate the Samoans in this direction, but without great success. It pointed out that the Samoans were inherently conservative and that their traditional social and economic system had a strong hold on their affections and influenced their whole way of thinking and acting.

During 1952, it reported, the Samoan Democratic Party, which advocates universal suffrage, was aided by the Government to the extent consonant with the maintenance of strict impartiality, but the results had not been very encouraging.

The 1953 Visiting Mission, in agreeing with the opinion expressed by the Administering Authority, nevertheless drew attention to the existence of economic and social factors, particularly the growth of a money economy and the rapid population increases, which might eventually result in a modification of the traditional social structure. It believed that these factors might lead to an increase in the number of persons advocating a wider franchise. Consequently, it recommended that, in the proposed constitutional plan for a future State of Western Samoa, a legislative structure should be found which would be flexible enough to permit adjustments to be made as the changing situation might require.

Full civil and criminal jurisdiction in the Territory is exercised by the High Court of Western Samoa, which consists of a chief judge, four commissioners, four Samoan associate judges and fourteen Samoan district judges. The chief judge and the commissioners are appointed by the Minister of Island Territories, and the district and associate judges are nominated by the Fono of Faipule and appointed by the High Commissioners for a term of three years. The number of associate judges was increased from three to four as from 1 October 1952.

In the more important defended criminal cases, four assessors are employed by the High Court to sit in an advisory capacity with the chief judge. In Samoan cases there are two Samoans and two European assessors.

As from November 1952, it was proposed that two Samoan associate judges should sit in the High Court at Apia and possibly at Tuasivi, Savai'i, to hear and determine cases within their jurisdiction.

The only other legally constituted judicial body is the Land and Titles Court which has jurisdiction in respect of disputes over Samoan land and succession to Samoan titles. The chief judge (of the High Court) is President of this Court and is assisted by two or three European assessors and three Samoan judges. During 1952, the Legislative Assembly amended the Land and Title Protection Ordinance to provide that the President would convene sittings of the Court, instead of the High Commissioner, as previously, and to lift the restriction on the number of Samoan judges, previously limited to three. Since that time, an additional Samoan judge has been appointed to the Court.

Every inhabitant of Western Samoa has a double status, affecting his rights inside and outside the Territory. With regard to the latter, he may be either a New Zealand-protected person or a national of some sovereign State. In domestic status, inhabitants are divided into "Samoan" and "European". A Samoan is defined as "a person belonging to one or more of the Polynesian races" and the law also classifies as Samoan any persons who are of more than three-quarters Polynesian blood, unless they are specifically declared to possess some status other than Samoan. Under prescribed conditions, individuals may petition the High Court for a change of status. Up to the end of 1952, the Court had declared 573 former Samoans to be Europeans and 56 Europeans to be Samoans.

The distinction between European and Samoan status is primarily a legal one. Persons of European status are not permitted access to Samoan land, even by inheritance through their maternal forebears or through marriage, and they may not accept a Samoan title without permission and even then may not exercise the rights conferred by it. Samoans may not be members of any incorporated company or legal partnership without the consent of the High Commissioner. Formerly, they could not be sued for trade debts, but the immunity was removed by an ordinance of the Legislative Assembly passed at its first session in 1953.

The 1953 Visiting Mission believed that these restrictions had lost much of their usefulness and pointed out that the distinction between Samoan and European status was rapidly losing its significance in view of the fact that most Europeans were predominantly Samoan in outlook and were tending to merge with the Samoans through inter-marriage. The Mission therefore considered it desirable that the legal distinction should be abolished. A similar suggestion had been put forward by the Administering Authority for consideration in connexion with the constitutional plan for the future State of Western Samoa (see below).

On 19 March 1953, the Prime Minister of New Zealand issued a statement setting forth proposals for a constitutional plan for a future State of Western Samoa and announcing a comprehensive programme of development in the administrative, judicial, economic and social fields intended to contribute to the establishment of a self-governing Samoa. In his statement, the Prime Minister said, among other things, that, in view of the record of the Samoans in assuming increased responsibilities, the Administering Authority felt that the time had arrived for further important steps towards the advancement of the Territory and that the rapid population increase introduced a note of urgency into all problems of future development. The Administering Authority wished to assist the Samoans during the period of adjustment by helping them to develop a strong, responsible Samoan government, a population united regardless of race, and the administrative machinery, institutions and knowledge necessary for the solution of the problems which would arise.

It therefore proposed that a constitutional convention, representative of all sections of the Samoan community, should be held in the Territory before the end of 1954, to consider a constitutional plan for the future State of Western Samoa. The plan could, it was suggested, include provision for:

- (1) A common citizenship for all the inhabitants of Western Samoa;
- (2) A single House of Representatives to replace the Legislative Assembly and Fono of Faipule;
- (3) Direct election in secret ballot of members of the Legislature upon the widest suffrage the Samoan people feel able to accept;
- (4) The eleven traditional political districts to be the constituencies, with each district returning one member for each 2,000 to 2,500 of its total population;
- (5) The method of appointment and tenure of office of the Head of State;
- (6) Executive Government to be conducted by a Premier and Cabinet Ministers who would be members of, and responsible to, the House of Representatives;
- (7) Western Samoa to control her own Public Service;
- (8) The special relationship between New Zealand and the future self-governing State of Western Samoa.

The Prime Minister's statement added that these points would be open for full discussion and the constitutional convention would be free to consider any other proposals. The recommendations of the convention would be carefully considered by the New Zealand Government which was prepared to implement any scheme consonant with its responsibilities as Administering Authority and its regard for the welfare of the Samoan people. It would, at the same time, fulfil its duty of keeping the Trusteeship Council informed, and would give due consideration to the latter's views and advice.

The statement also referred to the special problem created by the existence in Samoa of a small minority which was not wholly of the Samoan race. It declared that the Administering Authority, which had a responsibility to ensure the protection of minorities, would be concerned to see that a satisfactory solution to the problem was found, to the advantage of both sections of the community.

In order to provide a firm foundation for self-government, it was announced that the Administering Authority had approved a comprehensive programme of measures which would embrace economic development, agriculture, local government, vocational training and education.³⁶ Finally, the statement announced that the Administering Authority was prepared to consider ways and means whereby the New Zealand Reparations Estates would be handed over to Western Samoa as a going concern.

The 1953 Visiting Mission's report dealt primarily with the constitutional problems raised by this policy statement. The Mission found that the Samoans welcomed the proposal for a constitutional convention and were confident of their ability to agree upon a constitutional plan. They had not, however, had sufficient opportunity to form more than tentative views on the detailed aspects of the statement and were therefore unwilling to express views on the provisions which the constitutional plan would contain. A more definite reaction, the Mission stated, was obtained from the leaders of the small Samoan Democratic Party and a group of young professional workers comprising the "Ex-Scholarship Association" who considered that the existing social structure, in which the matai controlled Samoan affairs, would be a hindrance to democratic elections and that any electoral plan would have to provide for the existence of systems of elections both by the matais and by universal suffrage, allowing for the possibility of a gradual transfer to the latter if the people so desired. The "Ex-Scholarship Association" was particularly concerned about the small number of Samoans or local Europeans holding senior executive positions with the Government which, they considered, constituted an obstacle to the granting of immediate self-government. They advocated a transitional period during which a corps of Samoan civil servants could be trained.

The Mission reported that the local European community appeared to welcome the proposal of the Administering Authority and seemed to be confident that it would not be discriminated against as a minority group in a Samoan State. The Mission noted that this was in marked contrast to the attitude of the European community as observed by the first Visiting Mission in 1947 and that a spirit of great harmony seemed to prevail among all sections of the population regardless of their legal status.

In the opinion of the Visiting Mission, the statement of the Prime Minister of New Zealand constituted an important and forward-looking pronouncement for which the Administering Authority should be commended, especially its decision to submit the question of the future constitution of Samoa in the first instance to the decision of the Samoan people. The Mission noted with appreciation the assurance that the Administering Authority was fully cognizant of its responsibilities under the Trusteeship System, and that it would fulfil its duty of keeping the Trusteeship Council informed and would give due consideration to the latter's views and advice.

The Mission commented at some length on the suggestion for a constitutional plan set forth in the Prime Minister's statement. It considered that the continued existence of different categories of citizenship would be inconsistent with the objectives of the Trusteeship System. However, it believed that special provision would have to be made for persons who wished to retain their non-Samoan nationality.

With regard to the suggestion that there should be a single legislature, the Mission considered that much would depend upon the decision of the constitutional convention concerning suffrage. Both the Administering Authority and the Visiting Mission reported that there were some indications of a trend towards a more Western form of democracy in the Territory, but the Administering Authority stated that the present outlook of the people was so fluid as to discourage dogmatism about future development. The Mission thought it desirable that a legislative structure should be found for the Samoan State which would be sufficiently flexible to permit such adjustments as the changing situation in this respect might require. The special representative of the Administering Authority told the Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session that both the Administering Authority and the Territorial Government would welcome and encourage universal suffrage if the Samoan people desired it.

As regards the executive and administrative branches of government, the Mission observed that the Samoans had least experience in this field and would do well to take advantage of all possible sources of advice and assistance. In this connexion, the Mission drew attention to the hope expressed in the Prime Minister's statement that the talents of all Samoan citizens of ability and education would be mobilized for the benefit of the Territory, regardless of their position in Samoan society.

With regard to the question of the relationship between New Zealand and the future self-governing State of Western Samoa, the Mission believed that it would be premature to assume that the Territory could undertake obligations extending beyond its own shores and that it was therefore incumbent upon the Administering Authority to be prepared to maintain a special relationship with Western Samoa after the attainment of self-government. The Mission noted with satisfaction that in all its contacts with the Samoans the desire for such a relationship was fervently expressed.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council at its twelfth session that, in order to aid the Government and people of Western Samoa in carrying out the proposals contained in the statement of the Prime Minister of New Zealand, a new position of Special Assistant, Western Samoa Development Plan, had been created. The principal duties of this officer would be to aid the High Commissioner in the development of all matters covered in the statement and to attend to the necessary preliminary work preparatory to the constitutional convention. The Special Representative added that the first positive steps to implement the development programme were the preparation of the amended District and Village Government Board Bill, to be submitted to the Legislative Assembly in 1953, and the initiation of an organized scheme of staff training for the Public Service.

The Council at its twelfth session commended the Administering Authority for its forward-looking pronouncement of policy, especially the decision to submit the future status of Western Samoa in the first instance to decisions of the people of Western Samoa. It noted with satisfaction that the proposals for constitutional reform were intended to prepare a programme for the establishment of full self-government for Western Samoa and expressed the hope that the Samoan people would take every advantage of the opportunities offered to them and would co-operate with the Administering Authority in the realization of further democratization of Samoan society which would facilitate the attainment of self-government. The Council endorsed the conclusions of the Visiting Mission regarding the proposed constitutional plan.

The Council also noted with satisfaction the decision to appoint a special assistant to work in close association with the High Commissioner in the development of all matters covered in the Prime Minister's statement.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The economy of Western Samoa is almost completely based on agriculture with the majority of the inhabitants engaged mainly in growing subsistence crops. Pigs and poultry are also raised for local consumption. The Samoans are, however, turning increasingly to commercial production, principally of copra, cocoa and bananas for the export market, as a means of satisfying their growing requirements of foreign products. The value of exports rose from £1,303,761³⁷ in 1950 to £1,778,084 in 1952 and imports rose from £1,095,121 to £1,687,790.

The marketing of export crops is carried out partly by governmental contractual arrangements and partly through the open market. Total exports of the principal product, copra, about 80 per cent of which is produced by Samoans, increased from 13,917 tons in 1950 to 17,037 tons in 1952. It is assured a guaranteed price, under a contract with the United Kingdom Ministry of Food, up to 31 December 1957. The Visiting Mission, while noting that the prices for Western Samoan copra would be maintained until 1957, pointed out that the world market for this product was notoriously unstable and therefore welcomed the results of a survey conducted in 1952 by a cocoa expert under the South Pacific Commission which indicated that the Territory offered possibilities for substantially increased cocoa production.

Exports of cocoa amounted to 3,212 tons in 1951 and 2,448 tons in 1952, of which more than half the total crop was produced by Samoans.

Banana production fell off seriously during and after a severe drought in 1951, but, the Administering Authority reported, there were signs of a recovery; in 1952, a total of 65,588 cases of bananas, valued at £55,816, were exported. About 95 per cent of the crop was produced by Samoan growers. It was hoped, the Administering Authority stated, to establish during 1953 a Banana Board, one of whose functions would be to build up a reserve fund for the banana industry.

The Administering Authority considered that, in view of the continued demand for the staple exports of the Territory, there was no need for the Government to promote external trade by seeking to create new markets.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council at its twelfth session that the first five months of 1953 had seen a remarkable revival in the banana trade, exports of bananas being nearly double the quantity exported during the whole of 1952. Production of copra had been somewhat reduced owing to the delayed effects of the drought of 1951, but was expected to improve later in the year. Cocoa beans had maintained a high level of production and it was significant that approximately 900 tons had been exported up to the end of May 1953, as compared with 505 tons for the corresponding period in 1952.

The representative of New Zealand informed the Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session that the Administering Authority had completed its study of the problem of preferential tariffs and had informed the Government of Western Samoa that it had no objection to the abolition of the preferential tariff and the substitution of a general tariff. He stated that it remained for the Government of Western Samoa to take appropriate legislative action. The Council noted this statement with satisfaction.

Industries in the Territory are few and are confined mainly to small enterprises producing for local consumption. No known mineral resources exist and the economic potentialities of commercial fishing are not such as to invite its development on a large scale.

Both the Administering Authority and the Visiting Mission agreed that a basic problem in Western Samoa might well turn out to be the difficulty of adapting the traditional socio-economic organizations to the need for increased production created by the rapidly growing population and the rising standard of living. In order to provide an alternative means of organization to the traditional production by family groups, a Co-operative Societies Ordinance was passed by the Legislative Assembly in 1952 and was to come into operation as soon as the services of an experienced Co-operatives Officer were obtained. The 1953 Visiting Mission attached great importance to this Ordinance and hoped that the Samoans would not be slow to take advantage of it. The Mission nevertheless considered that the problem of adapting Samoan traditions to the requirements of modern economic life, which would involve a modification of the Samoan system of land tenure, was one which must ultimately be solved by the people themselves.

The Trusteeship Council had on several occasions drawn attention to the need for expanding and diversifying the economy of the Territory, and the Prime Minister of New Zealand, in his statement concerning the political advancement of Western Samoa, pointed out that the success of the future Samoan State, which must be capable of feeding its growing population as well as maintaining an export trade, would depend on an expanding agricultural production; and that, in order to achieve this, the Administering Authority had approved a comprehensive programme of development.

The Visiting Mission reported that the first and most important aspect of the programme would be the institution of the general economic survey, as urged by the Trusteeship Council at its tenth session. The survey would include an aerial and a soil survey in addition to an extensive study of such subjects as population, production, trade resources and national income. A second aspect of the programme would include measures to develop agricultural production, taking into account the recommendations made as a result of an agricultural study conducted by an expert of the New Zealand Government in 1952. The Mission was encouraged to note that an energetic approach was being made to the formulation of a basic agricultural programme, in view of the fact that agricultural planning had been virtually at a standstill during the inter-war years owing to the existing domestic political problems in Western Samoa.

Other development projects undertaken during the period under review included the extension of roads and initiation of work on a new shipping point on Savai'i. A plan was also prepared for the construction of a hydro-electric scheme at Avele near Apia. With the aim of broadening the basis of the economy, which was considered desirable by the Visiting Mission, the Territorial Government was giving continued assistance to experiments in crop diversification.

During the period under review, the Government of Western Samoa continued to co-operate in the work of the South Pacific Commission, from which it received assistance in a variety of research projects and which will provide financial and technical aid in carrying out the economic survey of the Territory. The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council at its twelfth session that the Samoan delegation participated actively at the second South Pacific Conference, held in April 1953, and that a proposal was being considered to hold the third conference in Western Samoa. The assistance of the South Pacific Commission was being sought to obtain the services of an entomologist to assist in the development of agricultural production, and who would, in particular, study possible measures for the eradication of the rhinoceros beetle.

The Special Representative also informed the Council that work on the economic survey and the aerial survey had begun, and that a development plan to increase the port facilities of Apia had been instituted. He agreed with the need for increased agricultural production but said that the rate of development of individual incentive would depend largely upon the nature of the solution which was found to the problem of land tenure. He stated that the Samoan leaders were now more ready to vote funds for the employment of outside experts and that a high degree of co-operation in this respect could be expected as the goal of self-government came nearer.

The Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session noted the progress achieved in the economic field and particularly the inception of a comprehensive programme of development, welcomed the initiation of the general economic survey and the aerial survey and the intention of the Territorial Government to carry out intensive measures to develop agricultural production on the basis of the recommendations contained in the report of the consultant on tropical agriculture of the New Zealand Government. It noted further the increased willingness of the Samoan leaders to co-operate with the Territorial Government in voting funds for economic development and expressed the hope that the co-operation would continue.

The Council, stating that it was aware of the need for increased expansion of the Territory's economy in view of the rapid population growth and the requirements of self-government, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue its efforts to find a solution to the problem of land tenure, would meet with success in promoting agricultural co-operatives and would persist in its efforts to broaden the basis of the economy by developing additional crops and industries.

The New Zealand Reparation Estates consist of plantation land held by the New Zealand Government as a payment for reparations due from Germany after the First World War. The policy of the New Zealand Government has been to operate these plantations under Government control but to make the profits available for expenditure on social and economic development schemes for the benefit of the Territory. The Estates currently produce copra, cocoa, beef, rubber and timber.

Roughly 8,800 out of a total of about 10,000 cattle are owned by the Estates which, during 1952, also started work on developing a superior type of cocoa.

In his statement of 19 March 1953, the Prime Minister of New Zealand announced that the Administering Authority was prepared to study ways and means whereby the New Zealand Reparation Estates would be handed over to Western Samoa as a going concern. It was suggested that this should be done by transferring ownership to a statutory corporation under the control of a board of governors, consisting of four locally appointed members and one New Zealand nominee who would be withdrawn on the attainment of complete self-government. The Visiting Mission, in commenting on the proposal, considered that the Administering Authority deserved warm commendation for a most generous gesture, and expressed the view that the suggested method of transfer would ensure that the Estates would continue to be an efficient organization in Samoan hands.

In all, 42,000 acres were transferred from the Reparation Estates to the Government of Western Samoa to help cope with population pressures as of December 1952. Of the total land in the Territory, Samoans owned between 580,000 and 585,000 acres, Europeans about 16,000 and missions about 5,000 acres. The New Zealand Reparation Estates owned 33,000 acres, and the extent of Crown land in right of the Samoan Government was about 88,000 acres, large areas of which were used by indigenous inhabitants for their own ends.

The Council, at its twelfth session, commended the Administering Authority for its decision to transfer ownership of the New Zealand Reparation Estates to the Samoan people which was announced in the statement of the Prime Minister of New Zealand of 19 March 1953, hoped that the representatives of the people of Western Samoa would give careful consideration to the suggestions of the Administering Authority for effecting the transfer of the Estates as a going concern, and said that it awaited with interest further information on the outcome of the negotiations.

The Council, at its twelfth session, also considered a petition (T/Pet.1/6) containing a complaint that the New Zealand Reparation Estates had refused to renew the lease of a plot of land which the petitioner had cultivated. The Administering Authority explained in detail that it would appear that the petitioner had no legal claim for compensation in respect of the termination of his lease, and had thus far not resorted to the courts. The Council therefore decided (resolution 838(XII)) that, in the circumstances, no recommendation was necessary.

Approval of the annual budget and of all financial legislation is the responsibility of the Legislative Assembly, subject to the provision that no finance bill disposing of public revenue may be passed by the Assembly except upon recommendation of the High Commissioner. Revenue is derived mainly from direct taxes, import and export duties, shipping and port dues and the proceeds from public undertakings. The most important source of revenue consists of import and export duties, which accounted for more than half of the total receipts during the period under review. Salary tax is payable by all persons other than incorporated companies and is progressive from a minimum of £1 to a maximum of ten per cent. Store tax is levied on all merchants and is based on the gross selling price of goods.

During 1952, public revenue reached a record total of £781,980 as compared with £521,859 in 1950.

The 1953 Visiting Mission commented that the financial position of the Territorial Government was very sound and that there were no outstanding debts other than those arising in the ordinary course of trade. It noted that the Government was displaying commendable caution by holding a general reserve fund of £500,000 invested in New Zealand securities but it felt that, in view of the vast developmental needs of the Territory, some of this fund might with safety be utilized for investment in capital goods and utilities.

During 1952, work proceeded on the improvement of piped water supplies to villages, for which the Legislative Assembly voted £50,000 during the year, as well as on the construction and improvement of roads and bridges; several construction projects involving the building of school facilities and extensions to the Apia and Fayamalo hospitals were completed.

During 1952, foundations were laid for an additional diesel generating plant which was expected to be in service in 1953, and progress was made on a 1,000-kilowatt hydro-electric scheme at Avele which was expected to be completed in late 1954 or early 1955.

The Administering Authority stated that, in 1951, £27,964 was spent on maintaining and improving roads, while in 1952 over £84,000 was spent on roads and bridges.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority stated that, at the current stage of the Territory's development, it sought to achieve social advancement mainly by raising the standard of general education and the level of public health.

A close interrelationship exists between the problems of social advancement and of political and economic progress in Western Samoa, a factor which was emphasized by the 1953 Visiting Mission. Samoan society is organized along strictly traditional lines and is essentially conservative in outlook. The basis of Samoan social life is the extended family (aiga), the members of which all acknowledge the leadership, and are subject to the control of, the matai, or family head. This individual, who is chosen by the group for life, is responsible for the leadership and care of the family under his control. In return for this, the matai receives the co-operation and services of those under his charge; he also holds in his name the title to family land and is the only one qualified to vote in the selection of village officials or to participate in the nomination of political representatives.

Both the Administering Authority and the Visiting Mission noted the existence of factors which might in the long run tend to modify the social structure. These factors were the growth of a money economy, the rising standard of living, the increased educational opportunities and the rapid population growth. The Visiting Mission believed that some modification of the community system was essential if Western Samoa was to continue to advance economically.

The Administering Authority stated that no social security scheme was needed for the Samoans in view of the nature of their social structure. As of 1952, all treatment at the hospitals, including maternity treatment, was provided free, but charges were made for food and accommodation. The sums appropriated by the Legislative Assembly were greater in 1952 than in previous years, reflecting the upward trend in the Territorial revenue and the attitude of the Samoans to Government expenditure. In 1952, over 40 per cent of the Territorial revenue was spent on health, broadcasting and education. This was supplemented by grants from the Administering Authority.

At its twelfth session, the Council considered a petition (T/Pet.1/4) from a retired government official, who complained of the inadequacy of his retirement retainer due to the increase in the cost of living and requested that it should be increased. The Council (resolution 836(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioner to the observations of the Administering Authority, to the effect that his request would receive consideration, and requested the Administering Authority to inform the Council at its thirteenth session of the decision reached on the petitioner's request.

No surveys relevant to the standard of living of the various sections of the community have as yet been undertaken, with the exception of an agricultural survey made in 1950-51 and a consumers' price index, based on the family budgets of public servants, which was prepared in 1951-52. The Administering Authority stated that it was difficult to ascertain the cost of living for indigenous inhabitants in the absence of a general cash economy. However, the natural productivity of the land, together with the current high prices for the Territory's exports, had ensured a relatively high standard of living for the Samoan people. The Visiting Mission observed that signs of prosperity were everywhere apparent in the increased number of imported goods and in the generally healthy appearance and contented attitude of the people.

Only a small proportion of the population of the Territory is dependent on wages and the Administering Authority stated that, in the absence of a working class, strictly speaking, the need had not arisen for a highly organized labour administration or for a very precise labour legislation. There were no problems of unemployment nor was there any general shortage of labour.

The largest employer of labour is the Government (with the New Zealand Reparation Estates) and the rate of wages paid by the Government to unskilled and semi-skilled workers is fixed by the Public Service Commissioner. In 1952, the Government rate for casual labourers was 9s. a day for unskilled labour, while the majority of private employers paid 8s. 6d. a day. The period of employment of labour employed by the Government had been generally reduced in 1951 to a 40-hour week with a full holiday on Saturdays and other holidays. Government working hours were usually observed by most private employers. The Public Works Department currently had in operation a training scheme which enables unskilled workers to become semi-skilled and their rate of pay to be accordingly increased. It was hoped to expand the scheme. Trade training was also being developed in the Government and mission schools and was to be included in the curriculum of the Samoan College.

During the period under review, legislation was enacted prohibiting the recruitment of workers for employment outside the Territory. The Government had also under consideration the promulgation of an ordinance dealing with workmen's compensation, and a select committee of the Legislative Assembly had been established to study and report in 1953 on a proposal to create a permanent arbitration board to decide wage claims and disputes.

The Health Service provided, as far as possible, coverage to employees as well as to other members of the population in respect of inspection and protection of their health. Further provisions to improve this protection were under consideration.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council, at its twelfth session, that the Legal Officer of the New Zealand Department of Labour and Employment was investigating labour conditions in the Territory, with a view to advising the Government of Western Samoa as to the types of labour ordinance required and the legislation necessary to introduce a sound scheme of workmen's compensation.

Women in Western Samoa are equal in law with men. The 1953 Visiting Mission noted that, although women did not tend to seek prominence in public affairs, they exercised a considerable influence, especially through the village women's committees which assisted the work of the village schools, hospitals and dispensaries. The Mission noted that among the younger generation women were becoming increasingly desirous of playing an important role in social affairs. At its twelfth session, the Council noted this statement and expressed the hope that every encouragement would be given to them.

With the exception of the Samoa Amendment Act, 1951, no major legislation affecting public health was enacted during the period under review. Facilities for treatment of tuberculosis were greatly improved.

The medical services of Western Samoa are under the control of the Health Department, which maintains a general hospital at Apia and thirteen out-stations including three cottage hospitals. The staff includes the Director of Health, five European or New Zealand-trained doctors and 31 Samoan medical practitioners.

Samoan medical practitioners are trained at the Central Medical School in Suva, Fiji, and nurses are trained at a training school in Apia hospital. Refresher courses are also carried on at the hospital for both medical practitioners and nurses. During the period under review, eight Samoan medical practitioners completed their training at Suva and returned to the Territory and sixteen nurses graduated from the Apia school. Three scholarship pupils were training in New Zealand to become fully qualified doctors and, at the beginning of 1953, five female scholarship pupils were being trained in New Zealand as nurses.

The Administering Authority stated that, although many of the Samoan medical practitioners were experienced men, within the limits of their training, the quality of their work varied, due partly to the fact that in many cases their preliminary education was poor, but also because the medical course at Suva had undergone considerable change and development over the years. A factor of considerable importance in raising the standard of medical practice was the formation in 1951 of a Samoan medical practitioners' association which held biennial meetings and lectures (a Samoan trained nurses' association was likewise formed in 1952). In addition, the refresher course for Samoan medical practitioners was revised to provide for the attendance of selected practitioners during a six-month period of training at the Apia hospital in all branches of medical work. The Visiting Mission, in commenting upon this, also noted with satisfaction that henceforth it was the desire of the Health Department to select only candidates who had reached a higher stage of general education for medical training at Suva.

The main development during the period under review was the completion in 1951 of a new wing for tuberculosis patients at the Apia hospital, which brought the number of beds available for patients with this disease to 63. The provision of these facilities formed part of a new scheme for the ascertainment, registration, treatment and continuous supervision of all cases of tuberculosis coming to notice within the Territory, and must not be regarded as indicating an undue prevalence of the disease.

The Administering Authority also reported that intensive educational action concerning tuberculosis was being taken by the Department of Health, with satisfactory results.

A further development during 1952 was the completion of a new village hospital at Poutasi, consisting of two wards and a dispensary under the charge of a Samoan medical practitioner. The Visiting Mission, in noting this, observed that there was also a need for additional hospital facilities on the island of Savai'i and therefore reported with satisfaction that the Health Department intended to build the nucleus of a cottage hospital in each district as the necessary funds became available.

As from 1952, all treatment at the hospitals, including maternity treatment, is given free and most dispensary charges have been abolished. Any charges made are small and are for the provision of food (at three shillings a day) or for special accommodation (new wards or private rooms).

The Administering Authority stated that a considerable expansion had taken place in medical work during recent years and that the rate of expansion had increased during the period under review. This was indicated by the number of treatments carried out in hospitals and dispensaries which rose from 141,328 in 1949-50 to 204,787 in 1951.

The Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session noted that it was the policy of the Government of Western Samoa to establish subsidiary hospitals in all areas of the Territory which were difficult of access, and to improve the qualifications of Samoan medical practitioners by providing annual refresher courses at the Apia hospital and by raising the standard of preliminary education required of candidates for medical training. It expressed the hope that continued attention would be given to the improvement of medical services.

The Council also considered a petition (T/Pet.-1/5) from the Progressive Committee of the Local Government of Matautu which contained requests for a number of improvements in the fields of health, water supplies, education, road communications, and local government in an area of Savai'i Island. The Council (resolution 837 (XII)) noted that the petitioner's requests were receiving the attention of the Administering Authority, and requested the Administering Authority to inform the Council at its thirteenth session of the decisions reached.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The educational system of Western Samoa is in the hands of the Government and the five religious missions which are active in the Territory. The Government maintains a free but not compulsory public school system providing education at the primary and secondary levels. Advanced training is provided by means of scholarships awarded each year by the New Zealand Government for study in New Zealand and elsewhere. The Territorial Government also maintains a teachers' training school, a school for Samoan nurses and regular courses of adult education.

The public school system consists of 103 village elementary schools (two less than in 1950), four district primary schools, two residential boys' primary schools, a primary school in the Aleisa European settlement, an infant school and a primary school for both Samoan and European children in the Apia area, and Samoa College (with both primary and secondary departments). The number of pupils totalled 13,158 in 1952, or about 700 less than in 1950. The enrolment in mission schools in 1952 was 6,478, of whom 4,176 attended pastor schools only.

Developments during the period under review included the completion of the Vaipouli residential primary school for boys in Savai'i which, like its counterpart Avele, places emphasis on agricultural training. In early 1953, the Malifa Samoan and Leififi European schools were combined to form the Apia Infant and Apia Primary School, staffed by both European and Samoan teachers and together having rolls totalling 1,500 pupils. At the beginning of 1953, Samoa College was completed; its secondary department will admit each year 30 to 40 selected students from the public and mission primary schools, reaching an eventual enrolment of 200 students in addition to those in the primary department. During 1952, the number of district primary schools was increased from two to four, and it is the aim of the Department of Education to establish at least one district school in each of the eight educational districts providing instruction up to a level higher than that at present available in the village schools.

The aims of the Territorial Government and the Administering Authority are, it was stated, first to provide a general education for all which would be suited to an agricultural community and would provide the possibility of more advanced agricultural training for senior students; second, to develop a sound and adequate system of secondary education for selected students so as to prepare them for executive positions, higher specialist training and entrance to a university.

The Visiting Mission drew attention to the need to improve the teaching and other facilities provided by the village elementary schools. The Administering Authority stated that progress had been made in improving the buildings in which village schools are housed. The principal problem, however, was to raise the standard of teaching. The village schools were staffed by Samoan teachers, many of them uncertificated and most of them with only an elementary education, as a result of which they could not carry the education of their pupils beyond the elementary level. In order to remedy this situation, every effort was being made to educate and train Samoan teachers to a higher standard; for this purpose, the Teachers' Training College had been greatly enlarged and improvements had been made in the staffing and equipment. Between 1950 and 1951, the number of student teachers enrolled in the College rose from 119 to 172. Each year, the standard of applicants was higher and a few entrants were now coming from high schools.

Expenditure on education rose from £74,000 during the period of nine months ended 31 December 1950 to £163,000 in 1952. Of the latter sum, £115,500 was provided by the Territorial Government and £47,500 by the Government of New Zealand, £31,500 being for the construction of Samoa College. Approximately £21,000 was devoted to the provision of scholarships for overseas training.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council, at its twelfth session, that the Territorial Government had studied the possibility of introducing compulsory education but had encountered a number of practical difficulties in view of the rapidly increasing population and the shortage of trained teachers. He stated that arrangements had been made for the New Zealand Director of Education to visit the Territory at the end of 1953 in order to study and report on educational problems, including the possibility of instituting a system of compulsory education.

With the exception of the Teachers' Training College, the Nurses' Training School and the vocational schools (at the secondary school level) conducted by the missions, there are no specialized institutions for vocational or higher education in the Territory. However, scholarships are awarded for training at New Zealand institutions and at the Central Medical School in Suva, Fiji. Since 1945, a total of 83 students have been awarded Government scholarships by the New Zealand Government for training in New Zealand, or fourteen more than was reported in the annual report for the period ending 31 December 1950. Of these, eleven had returned to work in Government departments in Western Samoa up to the end of 1952. Sixty Government scholarship holders were still training in New Zealand, of whom nine were in teacher-training colleges, five in universities and the remainder were enrolled at preparatory or secondary schools. In addition, seventeen students were receiving medical training in Fiji under scholarships granted by the Territorial Government.

The Administering Authority stated that when Samoa College was fully functioning, further consideration would be given to its overseas scholarship scheme.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council, at its twelfth session, that, of the more advanced scholarship students, three women graduates of the New Zealand teachers' training college had returned to take up teaching duties in the Territory and one student had completed training in New Zealand as a motor and diesel engineer. In addition, one student was in his third year of medical training at Otago University and two other holders of Samoan scholarships had passed their intermediate medical examinations at the same college. In all, fifteen scholarship students had completed their training and had returned to Western Samoa where they were employed in various Government departments.

The Trusteeship Council, at its twelfth session, noted the progress made in the educational field and, in particular, the completion of Samoa College, but stated that it was nevertheless aware of the need for further advancement and trusted that the Administering Authority would continue its efforts in this direction. It expressed the hope that further information on plans for educational development, including the question of compulsory education, would be forthcoming after the proposed visit of the Director of Education of the New Zealand Government to the Trust Territory.

The Council further hoped that the construction of Samoa College would not result in a reduction of the number of scholarships granted to the inhabitants of Western Samoa for education in New Zealand but that the scholarships would in future be devoted to the provision of additional advanced technical training and university training.

Regular courses of instruction in general and commercial subjects continued to be held at the adult night school and were attended by approximately 50 students in 1952, as compared with 43 at the end of 1950. The standard of work is equivalent to that of a second-year class in a secondary school and enables the students to sit for the Samoan Public Service examination. The Health Department also sponsors women's committees in the villages which are provided with lectures and demonstrations on health and sanitation; educational information is disseminated through the local radio station and a weekly newspaper, the Samoa Bulletin.

The Administering Authority stated that, as few adult Samoans had evinced much interest in night classes on specific subjects, it might be wise to concentrate mainly on forming a well-advised public opinion.

The five religious missions together operate a total of 395 schools with an enrolment of 6,478 pupils, the Administering Authority reported. The great majority of these are pastor or catechist schools (324) which account for 4,176 pupils, many of whom also attend the Government village schools. In addition to 35 primary schools and two secondary schools, the latter having 95 pupils, there are three theological colleges, a boys' agricultural school and a girls' school for commercial training.

The Administering Authority stated that, in addition to the developments in the public school system, a close and harmonious relationship existed between the Department of Education and the missions. Although the missions did not in most cases receive financial aid from the Government, they did receive assistance by being able to import their materials free of duty. Efforts were being made with a view to establishing better liaison and, as far as possible, a common standard of attainment at the different grades, and it was believed that the creation in 1951 of a joint committee of mission and Government representatives might pave the way for further co-operation in educational matters.

2. New Guinea, Administered by Australia

New Guinea has a land area of 93,000 square miles, and includes some 600 islands. The total indigenous population on 30 June 1952 was estimated by the Administering Authority in its annual report³⁸ at 1,090,332.

The 1953 Visiting Mission emphasized in its report (T/1056) that physical conditions in New ³⁸ Commonwealth of Australia, Report to the General Assembly of the United Nations on the Administration of the Territory of New Guinea from 1st July 1951 to 30th June 1952 (Gov't, Printer, Canberra, 1951). For detailed discussions of this report in the Trusteeship Council, see Trusteeship Council Official Records, Twelfth Session (16 June-21 July 1953); summaries of the observations of individual members are included in the Council's report to the General Assembly (A/2427).

Guinea, for which there was no real parallel in other Trust Territories, must be taken into account in any realistic appraisal of the Territory. The Mission considered that, while the pace of political development should be accelerated, it would be unrealistic to assume that the existing tribal structure could be greatly modified in the very near future. The work of training the people in the purposes and processes of representative institutions even at the village level had been started only in a few areas and the process of establishing political systems above that level was not yet beyond the blueprint stage. Training in representative government was a task which should be prosecuted with all possible speed, the Mission felt, and use might be made of indigenous inhabitants from those villages where representative institutions had already been established.

The Mission also found the economic development of the Territory difficult and slow, and that it required, in particular, co-ordinated planning.

At the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority agreed that significant political development would take a very long time. The Administering Authority was fully aware that a great deal still remained to be done before many of the aims of the International Trusteeship System could be realized, and trusted that the Council would not doubt its good faith and earnest endeavours to uphold the principles of the Charter and the International Trusteeship System. With regard to the dissemination of information on the United Nations, he stated that several years ago special recordings describing the work of the United Nations had been made in "Melanesian pidgin English". These were still used from time to time. The Administration would also welcome any assistance from the Department of Public Information regarding material which could be used to effect a wider knowledge of the United Nations and its activities, provided of course that the material was suitable for the particular stage of development which the inhabitants had attained.

The Trusteeship Council, at its twelfth session, noted that the Territory was characterized by abnormally difficult terrain, excessive fragmentation of indigenous society and a diversity of vernaculars and that its human and economic resources were still largely unexplored. It endorsed in general the views and recommendations of the Visiting Mission, commending them to the Administering Authority. The Council, noting that the Mission did not find in the Territory any appreciable knowledge among the indigenous inhabitants concerning the aims and activities of the United Nations or of the basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System, expressed the hope that collaboration between the Administering Authority and the Secretary-General would result in increased information on the United Nations suitably adapted to the linguistic and other cultural conditions of the indigenous inhabitants.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

New Guinea is administered under the Papua and New Guinea Act, 1949-1950, which provides for the joint administration of New Guinea and the adjacent Territory of Papua.³⁹ The organs of government comprise an Administrator and an Executive Council, both appointed by the Governor-General of Australia, and a Legislative Council. The first Assistant Administrator was appointed in September 1951. Under the Administrator, twelve government departments provide administrative and technical services for both Papua and New Guinea, except in the case of public works which come under the Department of Works of Australia. The Territory consists of nine administrative districts, each administered by a District Commissioner.

The 1953 Visiting Mission considered that the authority of District Commissioners was considerably circumscribed by control from administrative headquarters in Port Moresby. Many decisions could well be made on the spot subject to review by headquarters, the Mission felt. It was informed that simplified channels of communication were being considered. The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session that plans were being made for greater decentralization of responsibility and powers. This was noted with interest by the Council, which endorsed the Mission's view on the desirability of delegating additional responsibility and power to the District Commissioners.

Considerable areas of the Trust Territory not yet under normal administrative control are being brought under it by a policy of "peaceful penetration", the Administering Authority reported. By 30 June 1952, it stated, 69,812 out of the total of 93,000 square miles were under administrative control, compared with 65,570 square miles in 1951. The Visiting Mission felt that the Administering Authority deserved the commendation of the Trusteeship Council (which hoped, with the Administering Authority, to see the process completed in 1954) on its record of peaceful penetration. This commendation was endorsed by the Council which noted in particular the arduous nature of the duties of the officers entrusted with this task.

The staffing organization of the combined Territories of Papua and New Guinea increased from 1,581 to 1,601 during 1951-52, and occupied positions increased from 1,280 to 1,293 during the same period, the Administering Authority reported. Of the classified positions, 395 were common to both Territories, 761 were assigned to the Trust Territory and 445 to Papua. The 1953 Visiting Mission noted that established positions and those occupied had further increased to 1,632 and 1,404, respectively, by 31 March 1953.

The Administering Authority informed the Council that a recruiting campaign, begun in July 1952, had resulted in 134 new appointments up to 15 June 1953. Since that date a further 121 vacancies were in process of being filled and the campaign was to be continued.

At least 50 per cent of the new appointees, apart from those to be attached to headquarters, would be assigned to the Territory of New Guinea.

The Visiting Mission was favourably impressed by the student body of the Australian School of Pacific Administration, which provides special courses for the education of officers and prospective officers of Papua and New Guinea as well as other prescribed persons. Twenty-five students received diplomas during 1951-52, a total of 26 cadet patrol officers successfully completed the induction course and took up duty in the Department of District Services and Native Affairs, and 28 officers commenced the two-year course of study for the diploma in 1952.

The Mission noted that, although the situation regarding personnel had generally improved, many special projects had not as yet been fully staffed for the work which was to be done. The Administration frankly recognized that the improvement of administrative services was one of its principal problems. During the current year, it had embarked on a scheme of forward planning and felt confident that, from now on, it would be able to secure the services of a better type of officer. The Mission was greatly impressed by the devotion with which the Australian personnel carried out their duties and was glad to note that the Administration was attempting to secure more specialized officers for the many special tasks needed for the proper development of the Territory.

Indigenous inhabitants employed by the Administration, the Administering Authority reported, increased from 8,409 to 8,587 during 1951-52. This number included 5,856 general labourers, 803 medical workers, and 543 probationers and trainees. In addition, 1,324 persons were enrolled in the Royal Papuan and New Guinea Constabulary.

The Legislative Council, established in 1951 for the combined Territories of Papua and New Guinea, consists of the Administrator, sixteen official members and twelve non-official members. Three of the non-official members are indigenous inhabitants, two of whom are appointed from the Trust Territory.

The Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council that in its first year the new legislature, in the course of two sessions, had passed a total of 85 ordinances, of which 72 related to the Trust Territory.

The Native Apprenticeship Ordinance, 1952, provides for the training of apprentices in various trades and opportunities for training are provided by the Administration and the religious missions. Training facilities are provided by government departments for teachers, tradesmen, medical and hygiene personnel, agricultural and forestry technicians, clerical workers, ships' masters and engine attendants.

The Visiting Mission expressed the opinion that the Administration should continue its efforts to draw into its services qualified indigenous people and make a strenuous effort to train them for employment in the many technical services which the Territory greatly needed.

Although recognizing the great value of participation by the indigenous inhabitants in the work of the Legislative Council, the Visiting Mission felt that, at the existing stage of political development in New Guinea, such participation could only be educational, and suggested that the Administration consider the possibility of associating additional indigenous people with the work of the Council, and of sending indigenous observers to attend its meetings, thereby giving them some understanding regarding legislative procedures. The Administering Authority subsequently informed the Council that arrangements had been made for the indigenous members to confer with indigenous groups and communities in other districts, both before and after meetings of the Legislative Council.

At the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority stated that participation on the existing small scale was experimental and future participation would depend on the experience gained and on the political development of the people.

The Trusteeship Council recalled its previous recommendations favouring increased participation by the indigenous inhabitants in the legislative system of the Territory. Noting the views of the Visiting Mission, it considered that the gradual increase of representation of the indigenous inhabitants on the Legislative Council might be most effectively approached by developing its usefulness as a means of political education and preparation for more active participation. It therefore recommended that the Administering Authority take all practicable steps, including the possible participation of additional indigenous persons in the work of the Council as observers as proposed by the Visiting Mission, to extend among the indigenous population an understanding of the legislative procedures. It asked the Administering Authority to include information on this matter in its next annual report.

According to the Administering Authority, during 1951-52 District Advisory Councils were established in seven districts, in addition to existing Town Advisory Councils. Membership of these Councils is limited to non-indigenous inhabitants. In response to an earlier request by the Trusteeship Council that indigenous inhabitants be considered for appointment to these Councils, the Administering Authority replied that the Councils were non-statutory bodies established to advise on matters mainly affecting the non-indigenous community and were not related to the Advisory Councils for Native Matters provided for in the Papua and New Guinea Act.

The 1953 Visiting Mission was informed that the officers of the Department of District Services and Native Affairs, attending meetings of the Advisory Councils, afforded protection for the indigenous inhabitants. It was also informed that it had been made clear in the directions issued to the Administration that there was no policy against either the election or appointment of people of any race to the District or Town Advisory Councils, but in most cases the only people skilled or interested in managing town or district affairs were Europeans.

The Mission considered that there should be no rigid formalization of political institutions on a bi-racial basis and it was glad to hear that this was not the policy of the Administration. It felt that indigenous individuals might serve on local advisory bodies, even if initially only as observers and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would influence towards this end the local European inhabitants who, the Mission stated, appeared to be hostile to such a suggestion.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council endorsed the Mission's views and welcomed the assurance of the Administering Authority that, when conditions were appropriate for the establishment of statutory district organs, it would pay full attention to the desirability of establishing them on a multi-racial basis.

In most of the Territory the village still forms the largest political unit, and is the basis of the local administration of the indigenous inhabitants. Village officials appointed by the Administration consist of luluais and tultuls.

Luluais have certain statutory authority relating generally to maintenance of law and order, sanitation, hygiene, census compilation and similar matters. Their powers in relation to the maintenance of law and order are restricted to the power of arrest and issue of orders. Tultuls have restricted authority and responsibility, and their main duty is to see that the lawful orders and instructions of the luluais are carried out.

The Papua and New Guinea Act, 1949-1950, provides for the establishment of Advisory Councils for Native Matters and Native Village Councils.

The Administering Authority reported to the Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session that a total of six Native Village Councils had been established but that no Advisory Council for Native Matters had yet been set up. As far as practicable, the Native members of such Councils were to consist of persons who had performed meritorious service as members of village councils and there were not a sufficient number of the latter to provide members for advisory councils. A Native Authorities Section had been established within the Department of District Services and Native Affairs and the necessary guidance and assistance was being given to the village councils, particularly in the early stages. Guidance and tuition in local government were also being given to unofficial village councils, functioning as advisory bodies, to assist them towards assuming the responsibility of official councils.

The 1953 Visiting Mission was favourably impressed by the degree of autonomy that had been granted to the official village councils, but considered that their development should be carefully watched as the transition from the chief and luluai system to the council system, the Mission felt, might easily be marked by power struggles in village politics, with resultant frustration and disappointment if the old system died too hard.

The Mission held meetings with members of all six Native Village Councils and was greatly impressed by the enthusiasm of the people for this new development. It noted that their work embraced more than local government. Their Council houses were being used as centres for social and sporting activities. They were encouraging indigenous production by purchasing motor trucks and boats to carry produce to markets and by opening stores for the purchase of produce and for trade goods. They had plans for such projects as the purchase of unoccupied plantations, the establishment of saw mills and the operation of rice mills.

Although it was clear to the Mission that large groups were not yet at the stage where councils could usefully be introduced, there were many who lacked only assistance from the Administration in order to take this step.

The Mission learned that the development of councils in Kavieng, Wewak, Madang and Lae would commence as soon as the population had sufficient income to enable them to function efficiently, a condition being fostered in three of the districts by rural progress societies and/or co-operative activities. Councils would be established within about two years, but would be developed immediately in the New Ireland and Manus Districts.

The Mission was firmly convinced that a speedy development of the village council system would do much to hasten the political advancement of the Trust Territory. It stated that it had gained the impression that some administrative officials were not always ready to appreciate fully the degree of political preparedness reached by the people.

The Administering Authority subsequently emphasized that, despite difficulties facing it, six Native Village Councils had been established, including two since 30 June 1952, and that the policy was gradually to replace the direct rule system of village officials by properly constituted Native councils. Any attempt to accelerate the pace of political development, by more or less forcing local government upon the indigenous people before they were ready for it, would merely give those people an unenlightened sort of local autonomy and would inevitably result in failure, and probably in loss of confidence in the Administration.

The Mission believed that, in view of the importance of the task for the development of the Territory, the Administration should take all possible steps to increase the personnel for this type of work or take such other steps which might enable officers of the districts to assist the people in the establishment of such councils. It suggested that in certain parts of the Territory with comparatively dense populations, the possibility of beginning the work of political education within larger geographic areas might be considered.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority stated at the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council that the policy of the Administering Authority was gradually to replace the direct rule system of village officials with properly constituted Native councils, and to establish councils whenever and wherever the Native people were ready and able to accept the responsibility.

The Trusteeship Council, endorsing the view of the Mission and welcoming the statement of the Administering Authority, noted further that a number of village councils already had jurisdiction over areas containing a group or groups of villages and urged the Administering Authority to proceed with the development of such wider units of local government, having due regard to the desirability of adapting the pattern of their organization to the varying conditions and requirements of the peoples concerned.

During its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council examined a petition from the Tavuilu Committee (T/Pet.8/7) in which opposition was expressed to the establishment of a village council and a desire expressed for the establishment of a co-operative. The Trusteeship Council (839 (XII)) drew the petitioners' attention to its recommendation on local government and recommended that the Administering Authority should make an additional effort to explain to the petitioners the advantages of a village council. It also drew the attention of the petitioners to the Administering Authority's policy, as part of the economic development of the Territory, to give every assistance to persons desiring to establish co-operatives.

No judicial tribunals composed of indigenous inhabitants are recognized by the Administration as a part of the judicial system of the Territory; village courts exist but have no statutory authority. Their decisions, however, are recognized administratively in the interests of administrative contacts and the encouragement of co-operation between the people and the Administration.

The 1953 Visiting Mission felt that statutory recognition of village courts throughout the Territory would be quite impossible with the many varying levels of development which now exist. However, it viewed such courts as the next step after the establishment of the Native Village Councils since, in its opinion, there was nothing to prevent people who were conducting a village council satisfactorily from maintaining also their own court with specified statutory powers. It considered the frequent recognition of decisions by courts which themselves were not recognized to be a tacit acknowledgment of the competence of those courts, and that it would be no major step in certain advanced areas to give them statutory recognition.

After investigating the Paliau movement⁴⁰ the 1953 Visiting Mission concluded that undue apprehension had been aroused by the movement. It was responsible for bringing the traditionally unfriendly sea-faring and land-dwelling groups of Manus people into friendly co-operative work, and its adherents had pressed for the establishment of the Baluan Native Village Council, which had shown excellent results and to a considerable extent had absorbed the movement. Baluan, where the movement originated, impressed the Mission as one of the most orderly, progressive, and prosperous communities that it had encountered in the Territory.

The Mission suggested that the handling of the Paliau movement might serve as an important precedent for the supervision of indigenous leaders and movements in the future. By giving constructive attention and assistance, the Administration had directed and encouraged the aspirations of the indigenous people to the mutual benefit of both.

The Mission learned that cult movements in the Madang District, noted by the 1950 Visiting Mission, no longer existed and that there was nothing at present to indicate any active manifestation of cargo cults in areas of the Territory not visited by the Mission.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The economy of New Guinea is based upon agriculture and the development of land resources generally. The principal industries are the production of copra and cocoa, mining and forestry. There are no major secondary industries. Apart from locally grown crops, which are largely consumed by the indigenous inhabitants, the Territory is dependent upon external sources of supply for manufactured goods and foodstuffs. Merchandizing, shipping and air services, mining, lumbering and most commercial agricultural operations are largely controlled by Europeans. The economy of the indigenous inhabitants is primarily based upon subsistence agriculture.

The Administering Authority drew attention to considerable progress in the establishment among the indigenous inhabitants of co-operative movements dealing with consumption and production. During 1951, a Native Economic Development Ordinance was passed, providing for the registration and supervision of co-operative societies. Two schools were being maintained to give fundamental training to members of the societies in co-operative principles, procedure, bookkeeping and general business principles and advanced training was provided at the headquarters of the Co-operative Section. By 30 April 1953, the Administering Authority stated, the registration of 50 societies and three associations had been approved.

The 1953 Visiting Mission stated that it had been informed that, at the moment, a long-term plan for the Territory's economic development could not be developed; apart from the difficulty caused by the lack of knowledge of the resources of the Territory and the backwardness of the indigenous inhabitants, no forecast was possible of what financial provisions could be made over a period of 20 to 25 years. The Administration preferred to state long-term objectives and then, within those objectives, to develop plans as information and resources became available.

Since little development could take place without capital, the Administration was endeavouring to arrange for the introduction of capital by providing public works and other facilities to enable private enterprise to invest its capital, establish projects and develop the country.

The Mission stated that, although the level of economic advancement was extremely low, geographical and historical factors were to a very large degree responsible, and the destruction brought by war and the need to rebuild had greatly retarded development. No detailed knowledge existed concerning the Territory's economic resources or its economic potential and therefore little economic development and exploitation of resources had thus far taken place. The economic advancement of the indigenous people had been slow, and in many areas they remained totally unaffected by the introduction of new crops and new methods of cultivation. The economic development which had taken place was primarily in the hands of the European planters, a few mining companies and a few trading firms, and all these activities had not appreciably affected the general development of New Guinea. The Mission considered that the time appeared to be approaching when more energetic steps for the economic improvement of the Territory should be urgently undertaken.

The Mission noted that the Territory's social, educational and political advancement was directly dependent on the expansion and broadening of its economic structure but recognized the great obstacles which the Administration faced in this regard. It was of the opinion that, irrespective of the amount of the financial assistance which the Administering Authority would continue to be able to give for the economic development of the Trust Territory, these subsidies should be fitted into a development plan, covering five or ten years, so as to guarantee a fully co-ordinated programme and establish the guide-lines for the type of economic expansion judged best fitted to enhance the future prospects of the inhabitants.

The Council at its twelfth session endorsed this view and recommended that the Administering Authority again study the desirability of proceeding on these lines and incorporating into such a plan those of its long-term objectives which might be adapted to the purposes of the plan.

At the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority stated that the Administering Authority was fully aware of the desirability of adequate planning. For the time being, however, it felt that a more realistic approach to developmental problems was to have long-term objectives and to plan for the fulfilment of these objectives by means of annual work programmes.

The Administering Authority had clearly in mind its objectives, which were in accordance with its obligations under the Trusteeship Agreement. In fact, plans for economic and social development had already been devised and put into operation which had produced and would continue to produce satisfactory results and progress, having regard to physical and human resource difficulties with which it was faced.

Since it appeared that it was essential to the economic development of the Territory that its natural resources should be properly known and assessed, the Mission expressed the opinion, which was endorsed by the Council, that all possible steps should be taken to undertake the necessary surveys. It was glad to learn that the Administration was aware of the need, and expressed the hope that a concerted effort would be undertaken in this regard.

The Administering Authority subsequently informed the Council that arrangements had been concluded for the Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organization to carry out a survey of the natural resources of the Territory. The Administering Authority further stated that the immediate economic policy was to encourage development on the basis of the experience gained thus far in terms of suitable crops and lands and through the construction of new roads. To facilitate the acquisition of land in suitable areas by settlers, a Land Development Board had been established and had initiated surveys with a view to the future development of certain areas.

At the twelfth session of the Council, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority stated that the Administering Authority would press on with its survey of the resources of the Territory, although the full results of the survey would not be available for some time. With reference to co-operatives, he stated that the Council would be kept informed of the progress made in this field. The Council welcomed the intention of the Administering Authority to proceed with existing and proposed surveys and expressed the hope that adequate staff might be made available for this purpose to ensure that the essential studies were completed as soon as possible. It also welcomed the intensified efforts of the Administering Authority to foster the development of co-operative organizations among the indigenous producers, and expressed the opinion that activities of this kind should be given a prominent place in the formulation of an economic development plan.

The Mission believed that the problem of European settlement presented the Administration with a very real problem. On the one hand, the Administration pursued a policy of prohibiting the alienation of indigenous land but, on the other, it realized that only non-indigenous people were likely to have the capital and the skills which were needed for the development of the Territory at this particular time. The Council felt that emphasis in planning should be placed upon the role of the indigenous population in general and accordingly drew the attention of the Administering Authority to the Visiting Mission's observation that a decision by the Administration on this important question was likely to determine to no small degree the economic future of the Territory.

With regard to export production and trade, the Administering Authority reported that the value of imports and exports had increased from £6,186,669⁴¹ and £5,436,617, respectively, in 1950-1951 to £8,154,102 and £6,517,881 during the year 1951-52. Exports of local origin showed an increase of £749,204, the principal contributing items being cocoa, copra, coffee, gold, shell, silver and timber.

Import restrictions on imports from sources other than Australia were introduced in March 1952 in order to conserve overseas exchange.

The Papua and New Guinea Copra Marketing Board was established in 1952 to take over the duties and functions of the Australian New Guinea Production Control Board in relation to the purchase, disposal and export of copra from the Territory.

Revenue in the form of a direct grant by the Australian Government increased from £2,356,310 in 1950-1951 to £3,126,059 during 1951-1952, and internal revenue increased from £1,219,411 to £1,486,375, making a total of £4,612,434 in revenue from both sources, the Administering Authority reported. Expenditure, totalling £4,612,434, was £1,036,713 more than in 1950-1951.

No direct income, business or head tax is levied in the Territory except for taxes raised by Native Village Councils. Internal revenue comes from import and export duties, various fees and duties, and royalties on gold and timber.

The Administering Authority reported that it had not been considered administratively practicable or desirable to introduce a general system of income tax, as previously recommended by the Trusteeship Council, into the Territory in its present state of development.

The 1953 Visiting Mission learned that a committee of inquiry investigating the economic structure of the Territory had not yet submitted a report summarizing its views.

It noted that the Papua and New Guinea Customs Inquiry Committee, the terms of reference of which were "to inquire and report on future customs policy in the Territory of Papua and New Guinea," had found its inquiry considerably limited due to the dependence of the Territory on import and export duties for its internal revenue. The Committee's main conclusion had been that there should for the present be no fundamental change in the tariff policy of the Territory, but added that there should later be a comprehensive examination of the whole financial system of the Territory, of which tariff policy was only a part. A statistical officer had been appointed to obtain fundamental information on taxation, but he had not yet taken up his duties.

The Mission attached considerable importance to the Customs Inquiry Committee's conclusion that there should be a comprehensive examination of the whole financial system of the Territory. It thought that no important means of increasing revenue would be found by any internal adjustments in customs tariffs or in other indirect taxes currently levied and that no major contribution could be made by direct taxation. The Territory's revenue was inadequate and, in the Mission's opinion, it would remain so until further economic development furnished new sources of revenue both among indigenous and non-indigenous inhabitants.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority said at the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council that his Government would give close attention to the recommendations of the Papua and New Guinea Customs Inquiry Committee and to the comments of the 1953 Visiting Mission on fiscal policy. The question of direct taxation was receiving close examination.

The Trusteeship Council endorsed the view of the Mission that there should be a comprehensive examination of the whole financial system. It also expressed the hope that in carrying out a further examination of the matter the Administering Authority would consider introducing some form of direct taxation and requested it to include further information on the matter in its next annual report.

The total area of the Territory is 93,000 square miles, or 59,520,000 acres, the Administering Authority reported. Alienated land consists of 519,380 acres held in freehold and 175,817 acres held in leasehold by non-indigenous persons, 291,875 acres held by the Administration, and 26,611 acres vested in the Director of District Services and Native Affairs as Native reserves. This represents an increase in alienated land in the past year of 5,595 acres held by private individuals and 67,826 acres held by the Administration.

All unalienated land is regarded by the Administration as "Native-owned land" and may be sold or leased only to the Administration.

The New Guinea Land Titles Restoration Ordinance, 1951, provides for the compilation of new registers and official records relating to land, mining and forestry, in place of those lost or destroyed during the recent war. A new Native Land Registration Ordinance, 1952, made by the Legislative Council, provides for a Land Commission, consisting of a Chief Commissioner and such other Commissioners as the Administrator considers necessary, to determine the rightful and hereditary property of indigenous persons or communities by customary right. The 1953 Visiting Mission learned that, in order to implement this new Ordinance, a Chief Commissioner had been appointed on 15 July 1952 and a Land Commissioner on 21 October. The latter took up duty at Rabaul in November and his work was currently confined to the Gazelle Peninsula of New Britain. Work on the restoration of titles had proceeded very slowly since nearly all the land records had been lost during the war. However, improvements in the administrative services and a recent organization of the Lands Department were considered to be the first step towards the solution of the problem.

In the Rabaul area, the Mission learned that 25 to 30 persons were preparing claims to present to the Commission, and it was estimated that probably 4,000 or 5,000 claims might be expected. Since the Commissioner could only dispose of about 100 of these per annum, it was believed that a great expansion of the Land Commission would be necessary. As the indigenous people in other areas became aware of the Commission's work, the Mission foresaw an increasing demand for registration of their land.

Both the Titles Branch Commission and the Native Land Commission had been established too recently for the Mission to draw any conclusions regarding their activities.

The Mission noted that the indigenous people in general showed no desire to dispose of their land and sometimes desired to repossess alienated land. It found no evidence of hardships arising due to land alienation in any areas where the indigenous people displayed any apprehension concerning their land. However, continued caution must be exercised, the Mission held, in determining where land might be made available to foreign settlement, particularly in the Highland areas where the heaviest concentrations of population occurred.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council that the Administering Authority was most anxious to ensure that the interests of the indigenous peoples in regard to land were fully safeguarded. The object of the Native Land Registration Ordinance was to ascertain the precise extent of Native lands and the tribal or individual ownership of them. It would then be very much easier to gauge the extent of available lands, so that they could be leased to persons, whether indigenous or non-indigenous, who might desire to make use of them. He also pointed out, in this connexion, that the Administration was at present considering the possibility of permitting indigenous owners to lease their lands under conditions which included an obligation to restore them at the expiration of the lease in as productive a state as at its commencement.

The Council, recalling its previous recommendation that the Native Land Commission should be organized without delay, was pleased to note that the Commission had now begun its work in part of the New Britain area, and recommended that the earliest possible steps be taken to extend the activities of the Commission to other parts of the Trust Territory.

Noting from the report of the Visiting Mission that indigenous inhabitants in some areas had shown a desire to repossess land previously alienated, it invited the Administering Authority, when such land became available for transfer of ownership, to give sympathetic consideration to applications which might be received from indigenous persons, with a view to according them all possible preference in the acquisition of title.

Copra, the main export crop, amounted in 1951-52 to approximately 63,000 tons, of which about 15 per cent was produced by the indigenous inhabitants.

To assist in improving the varieties and methods of producing the present subsistence crops grown by the indigenous inhabitants and to encourage them, as well as Europeans, to develop new agricultural industries, the Administration during 1951-52 created eighteen new scientific posts in the Department of Agriculture, Stock and Fisheries and began recruiting entomologists, plant breeders, chemists and soil survey officers. During the year, specialists visited the Territory to advise in regard to the cultivation of tea, kenaf, hemp, cinchona and rice and upon agricultural mechanization and fibre processing.

Three agricultural experimental stations were engaged in work on cinchona, tea, coffee, manila hemp and other crops, and investigations were made into the conservation of soil fertility in the rotation of indigenous food crops. District Agricultural Stations served mainly as demonstration areas for the Districts and provided a base from which extension officers carried out their work. The Department of Agriculture, Stock and Fisheries had continued its supervision of two indigenous rice projects and an indigenous cocoa project. As a result, the number of cocoa trees planted by indigenous growers had increased from 200,000 to over 500,000 in the past year. The Administering Authority informed the Council that arrangements had been made for a recognized world authority on coconut cultivation and improvement to visit the Territory.

The Administration, aiming to introduce animal husbandry in order to provide a source of protein in the peoples' diet and improve their methods of land utilization, maintained six livestock stations, the activities of which included survey and experimental work, the introduction, propagation and distribution of stock, the promotion and development of animal industries, and animal health.

The Visiting Mission reported that it was greatly impressed with the work which was being done at some agricultural stations. Among some indigenous people there was a definite desire to improve their agriculture and some signs of improvement were already noticeable. While considering that too great an improvement could not be expected in the near future, the Mission believed that an impressive start had been made. Although realizing that the effect of these stations upon the native economy was thus far slight, it believed that, if vigorously supported, particularly by an increase in the trained personnel, their influence and effectiveness would grow.

Forests cover more than 70 per cent of the Territory, but the inaccessibility of many areas has prevented their effective utilization. Most of the forests are indigenously owned and before timber can be disposed of the land or timber rights must be acquired by the Administration. District Commissioners must ascertain that such acquisitions are not detrimental to indigenous interests before they may proceed with purchases.

The value of exports of log and sawn timber increased from £24,332 in 1950-51 to £126,971 in 1951-52, the Administering Authority reported.

The consumption of logs by sawmills operating during the same period increased from 7,677,901 to 16,300,000 superficial feet.

During the year, a joint public company was formed by agreement between the Commonwealth of Australia and Bulolo Gold Dredging Ltd. to engage in lumbering, the manufacture of plywood, and the marketing of timber and timber products. The Visiting Mission learned that the production of plywood in the factory then under construction would begin by the end of 1953 or soon thereafter.

The principal mining activity in the Territory is the production of gold. During the past year the quantity produced was valued at £1,707,401, the Administering Authority reported. The Administration receives a royalty of 5 per cent of the value of all gold won; this amounted to £79,665 during 1951-52.

Five local mining companies and eleven foreign companies, with a total nominal capital, respectively, of £738,000 and £13,191,388 and $6,000,000, were operating in the Territory. In addition, some gold was mined by a number of European and indigenous individuals. The latter produced bullion with a declared value of £6,263 in 1951-52.

With regard to increasing the revenue from gold production, the Administering Authority reported that full detailed information, as requested by the Council, on the costs of production and profits of the gold industry were not yet available. Investigations were proceeding, but they were necessarily protracted because of the limited information available in published statements of the operators and the difficulties of determining costs as between various sections of the field worked by one operating concern.

The Administering Authority stated that the current tax, on the product rather than on profits, was considered to be extremely high. Any increase could not be carried by a number of mining operators because the current price of gold gave them little margin over the costs of production; it would also seriously limit work on what were at present marginal or sub-marginal operations, and would be a deterrent to investment in new fields. Consideration had been given to the introduction of a sliding scale of royalties based on profitability as recommended by the Council. Practical difficulties, however, included the question of earnings on minerals won in association with gold; the fact that one operator might have some undertakings which were profitable and some which were temporarily unprofitable; and the necessity of allowing for a level of profits to pay for further exploration of lodes and expenditure on development.

The Administering Authority stated also that there appeared to be no justification for singling out the gold-mining industry from the rest of the community in the application of a tax on net income, and that consequently it did not propose to consider the imposition of any charges on the industry based on profitability, other than through such general form of income tax as might be made applicable to the whole community.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority at the Council's twelfth session said that, in regard to gold royalties, it was necessary to ensure an adequate balance which, on the one hand, would return a reasonable contribution to the revenue and, on the other hand, would ensure that capital investment would not be unduly discouraged. The present royalty rate was fair and equitable in all the circumstances, he said.

The 2,346 miles of vehicular roads and 20,457 miles of bridle-paths in the Territory represented an increase of 366 miles in roads and 753 miles in paths in the year under review, the Administering Authority reported. During the period expenditures on roads and bridges amounted to £397,359.

The Administering Authority stated that a steady programme of road construction was being followed and that, during the year, the construction of a bridge across the Markham River, at a cost of £178,000, had been approved.

The Visiting Mission was impressed by the physical difficulties encountered in road building in the Territory. In placing emphasis on the development of roads, however, the Mission was not unmindful of the fact that air transport might for many places remain an important part of the Territory's transport system. The Mission was satisfied that the Administration realized the importance of an adequate transportation system for the economic development of the Territory, and hoped that it would continue the policy which it had initiated a few years ago.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council noted that the Visiting Mission had observed that, in spite of the physical difficulties and high cost of road construction in the Territory, the Administering Authority recognized its importance for general economic development and was pursuing construction wherever possible. It noted also the continuing increase in the funds allocated for road construction and again emphasized that an effective road network was essential to large-scale economic development and to social cohesion, and urged the Administering Authority to intensify its efforts in this direction.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority stated that the objective of all Departments of the Administration was the improvement of the social conditions of the indigenous people; due to the nature of indigenous society the Administration had not found special legislation dealing with social services to be necessary.

The standard of living of the majority of the indigenous people is based on hamlet and village units and a subsistence economy involving gardening, hunting, fishing and the collection of certain foods. The Administering Authority stated that its general policy in relation to health, education, agriculture and housing was aimed at the gradual raising of living standards. No special surveys of living standards were made but such matters were reported to be investigated by all administrative officers in the normal course of their patrols and their functions. The Trusteeship Council had previously requested that cost-of-living surveys should be conducted in selected areas, but the Administering Authority considered that, in view of the subsistence nature of the indigenous economy, it was not practicable to conduct such surveys.

Workers employed in the Territory at 30 June 1952, consisting of 16,405 engaged by agreement, 10,846 casual workers and 8,587 Administration employees, totalled 35,838, the Administering Authority reported. All were indigenous inhabitants, with the exception of 903 workers from Papua. An additional 2,564 indigenous inhabitants of New Guinea were employed in Papua.

The employment of indigenous labour is regulated by the Native Labour Ordinance, 1952. This Ordinance, amending the Native Labour Ordinance, 1950, which substituted a system of agreements for employment for the system of contracts previously in force, introduced a number of important changes. A worker under agreement may be engaged for a maximum period of two years in the first instance and, subject to the concurrence of the worker and the approval of a government officer, a second agreement may be entered into on the expiration of the first for a period not exceeding twelve months. On the termination of their agreements, workers are to be paid their deferred wages in the district in which they have been employed. Monetary payments in lieu of rations are restricted to casual workers with permits issued by District Commissioners, after it has been established that they are competent to purchase rations from a store or that they reside in their own villages during the period of employment.

The Visiting Mission learned that the new Ordinance came into operation on 1 December 1952, but that administrative action had been taken to defer the enforcement of the amendment which provided that workers were to be paid their deferred wages in the district in which they had been employed. It was informed that amending legislation might be necessary to restore the original provisions whereby the parties to an agreement could specify a particular district in which deferred wages would be paid. The Mission was informed that all available evidence pointed to a smooth change-over and to the acceptance of the new legislation by both workers and employers.

At the twelfth session of the Council, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority remarked that the minimum rates fixed and the provision of food, lodging, clothing and medical attention had been decided upon after a full consideration of the circumstances of the indigenous inhabitants. To a large extent, the salaries and other emoluments paid or made available to the worker were supplementary to other income or subsistence derived from village and tribal activities, and there was certainly no hardship suffered by the families of absent workers.

The Council, at its twelfth session, considered two petitions in connexion with wages. The Paramount Luluai of the Bianga People complained (T/Pet.8/8) that he had received no pay for serving as luluai. The Council noted (resolution 840(XII)) that action was being taken to pay the petitioner any sum which might be due him and requested the Administering Authority to inform the Council at its fourteenth session of what payment might have thus been made. With respect to a petition from Mr. Kanabi (T/Pet.8/9) requesting an increase in wages, the Council (resolution 841(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioner to the Administering Authority's observation that he was receiving ten shillings a month more than the wage prescribed for the position and recommended that the Administering Authority consider the petitioner's claim sympathetically in the light of the general conditions of wages and service obtaining in the public service of the Territory.

The number of hospitals, dispensaries and clinics maintained by the Administration increased from 398 to 506 during the year 1951-52, the Administering Authority reported. These included eight European, three Asian and 39 Native hospitals, 444 aid posts, eight welfare clinics and four leprosaria. The official medical personnel included 170 Europeans and 2,235 non-Europeans, an increase of one European and 129 non-Europeans over the previous year. The European staff included 28 medical officers, two dentists, 40 nurses, 63 medical assistants, and other staff members. The non-European staff consisted of medical assistants, orderlies, sanitation workers and other staff members.

Expenditure on public health, including aid to religious missions, increased from £826,613 to £987,465 during 1951-52. An additional £31,494 was expended on hospital construction.

The Administering Authority reported that improvements in the health services were indicated by the fact that hospital admissions of indigenous persons and those treated by European medical personnel on patrol or sent to hospital for treatment had increased by 3.84 and 21.9 per cent respectively over the previous year. A total of 215,872 persons from 1,942 villages were medically examined during patrols. Special health projects included research and treatment for the control of malaria, tuberculosis, Hansen's disease, granuloma venereum and endemic goitre.

An Assistant Director (Medical Training), appointed during the year, was sent to Fiji to study methods at the Central Medical School at Suva. Two indigenous students were also attending the course for assistant medical practitioners at Suva and arrangements had been made for indigenous students to attend a school for dental mechanics established at Port Moresby.

Courses for Native medical and hygiene assistants, given at five medical training schools in the Territory, were attended by 97 students at the end of the year under review. During this period, 198 students graduated, bringing the total number of graduates up to 609. Of these, 481 remained in the employment of the Administration.

The 1953 Visiting Mission, while recognizing the great financial contribution made by the Administering Authority to the improvement of the health services, stressed the great amount of work which needed to be done in the field of public health. Many of the indigenous hospitals were in urgent need of improvement, while, in contrast, many of the European hospitals were more than adequate, as far as both equipment and facilities were concerned, the Mission observed.

It was informed that the Administration furnished ample medical supplies and that no hardships were experienced due to lack of these. The Mission learned with regret that due to financial considerations it had been necessary to modify the plan proposed in 1951 for the construction of hospitals at an estimated cost of £4,500,000 and to adopt a less costly type of construction. However, provision had been made for a base hospital at Lae, on which construction was expected to commence before the end of 1953, and for a regional hospital at Wau and an indigenous hospital at Nonga, near Rabaul, in 1953-54. It was expected that construction of regional hospitals at Madang and Wewak would be undertaken during 1954-55.

The Administering Authority subsequently informed the Council that the reason why the hospital construction programme drawn up in 1951 had not been implemented was that it had been decided that the centres concerned did not require the type of hospitals originally planned.

The Mission, stressing the importance of the adequate training of indigenous practitioners, considered that the present system of training indigenous medical assistants was unsatisfactory. It believed that such students should be better selected and should be given at least an additional period of training so that they would be able to render adequate services. The Mission further suggested that provision should be made for reorientation courses at frequent intervals so as to give indigenous medical assistants the opportunity to improve the standards of their work.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority, at the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, pointed out that, regarding the medical assistants who had been trained to give simple medical treatment in villages and outlying areas, the system was purely auxiliary to the health services and, as such, performed a very useful function.

The Trusteeship Council, noting the increase in hospital, dispensary and clinic facilities and in the number of persons receiving hospital care or skilled medical treatment during the period under review, and noting also the opinion of the Visiting Mission that many of the existing hospitals were in urgent need of improvement, and the fact that the 1951 plan of new hospital construction had not been implemented, invited the Administering Authority to take into consideration, in revising the hospital programme, the views expressed by the Visiting Mission. The Council expressed the hope that the revised plan would provide for the ultimate establishment of an integrated system of hospitals adequate in number, equipment and location to satisfy the needs of the Territory, and requested the Administering Authority to include in its next annual report its definitive plans in this respect.

The Council also noted that the dispensaries or aid posts in the Territory are for the most part staffed by indigenous medical assistants without supervision except for the occasional visits of administrative officers, and drew the attention of the Administering Authority to the opinion of the Mission that the present system of training indigenous medical assistants was unsatisfactory, and that they should be better selected, better trained and their work regularly supervised by properly qualified medical personnel. It recommended that the Administering Authority take measures to review and improve the existing systems of selection, training and supervision, in the light of the observations of the Mission.

During 1951-52, the laws of the Territory relating to corporal punishment were reviewed and amendments were effected which abolished such punishment for all offences other than certain offences by juveniles, sexual offences against females, certain offences of violence and prison offences relating to mutiny and gross personal violence. The Administering Authority stated that it supported the principle of abolition of corporal punishment and that the action taken represented a substantial step towards complete abolition.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council reaffirmed its view that corporal punishment should be formally abolished and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would do so as soon as possible.

The Council at its twelfth session noted with interest the community development project being carried out on Tabar Island in co-operation with the South Pacific Commission, recommended that the Administering Authority devise plans to undertake projects of this kind in other parts of the Territory, and invited it to explore the availability of expert assistance under the United Nations technical assistance programme for the planning and execution of such projects.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The educational system of the Territory includes schools operated by the Administration, by religious missions (most of which receive educational grants from the Administration), and a few recently established by Native village councils.

Education is free but not compulsory. Transportation, books or materials and food are provided to the pupils attending Administration boarding schools and higher training centres.

The aims of the Administration's educational programme include:

- (1) universal literacy and as high a standard of general education as possible;
- (2) training for the practice of skilled trades and professions, and the development of manual skills;
- (3) emphasis on education relating to planned projects in community development, and the encouragement of economic self-determination;
- (4) the recognition of schools as the points of focus of community interest; and
- (5) the fostering of such activities as the Boy Scout and Girl Guide movements and the indigenous co-operative movement.

The number of Administration schools increased from 65 to 69 during the year 1951-52 and the number of pupils enrolled increased from 3,675 to 3,757, the Administering Authority reported. There were nine European schools with 272 pupils, three Asian schools with 310 pupils, two part-indigenous schools with 60 pupils and 55 indigenous schools with 3,115 indigenous pupils, of whom 2,594 were in elementary schools, 355 in central schools, and 166 in secondary or higher training centres.

All the schools for non-indigenous pupils gave primary instruction and some secondary classes were taught in one Asian school. During the year, financial assistance was granted to 136 approved European pupils for secondary education in Australia. Schools for indigenous pupils had four levels of instruction.

The 1953 Visiting Mission was informed that the segregation of indigenous pupils was largely due to the fact that they could not keep pace with European children, and that some Asian children and some half-castes classed as Asians were in the same category.

During 1951-52, the Department of Education expended a total of £303,152 on education, including grants-in-aid to missions amounting to £41,485 as a general grant and £7,394 for reconstruction training. Expenditure by the Department for the preceding year totalled £245,270.

The Visiting Mission learned that the Administration proposed to increase the educational facilities between 1953 and 1958 to provide for 80 area schools, 20 training schools for boys and ten for girls, eight manual training units attached to central schools and two higher training institutions. The annual enrolment in all types of Administration schools for indigenous pupils at the end of the five-year period was expected to be approximately 15,000. The total costs involved were estimated at approximately £3,000,000, of which nearly 90 per cent would be allocated for indigenous education, principally above the village school levels.

The great majority of pupils attend mission schools. The total number of such schools increased from 2,407 to 2,560 during 1951-52 and the number of pupils enrolled increased from 87,134 to 91,389, the Administering Authority reported. Four schools for Europeans, Asians and pupils of mixed race had 488 pupils, and only indigenous pupils attended the remaining schools: 80,673 in village schools, 8,036 in intermediate schools and 2,192 in higher training schools.

The Administration assists the educational work of the missions by financial grants-in-aid, by the supply of basic school materials, and by the issue of syllabi which are designed to establish uniformity of standards of attainment.

The Visiting Mission observed that the Central Highlands had the fewest educational facilities and were the least advanced educationally in the Territory.

Although realizing the great obstacles which the Administration faced, the Mission was of the opinion that the expansion of educational facilities must be one of the primary duties of the Administering Authority. It considered that no sound economic and political advancement was realizable as long as vast segments of the population remained illiterate. Although placing primary emphasis on the importance of teacher training, the Mission expressed the hope that the Administration would push forward with its plans for the general improvement of education at all levels of instruction.

The Administering Authority subsequently informed the Council that, since the submission of the annual report, an Education Ordinance had been adopted. It provided, among other things, for the establishment of an Education Advisory Board, the establishment of a District Education Committee for each district, and the establishment and maintenance of schools, including pre-school, adult education and vocational training institutions. The Director of Education would determine the language or languages to be used for secular education in a school. The Ordinance also provided for compulsory attendance at specified places and for the registration and recognition of schools, and stated that no person would be permitted to conduct a school unless it had been registered or recognized.

The Visiting Mission learned that regulations under the new Ordinance were being drafted. These would provide for the registration of mission schools and for the inspection, supervision and control of non-Administration schools in all matters that concerned secular instruction.

At the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority said that the Administration was fully aware of the immensity of its task, and would exert every effort to extend and improve the educational system, especially in teacher training and in secondary and vocational education. It was also the Administering Authority's policy to do everything possible to reduce the incidence of illiteracy.

The Trusteeship Council endorsed the opinion of the Mission that the expansion of educational facilities must be one of the primary duties of the Administering Authority and that it should push forward with its plans for the general improvement of education on all levels. It again drew attention to the fact that, although some facilities for general secondary education were available in the Territory for Asian students and in Australia for the children of Europeans, no such facilities were provided for indigenous students, and recommended that the Administering Authority take the necessary measures, including the provision of scholarships, to give indigenous students access to secondary and other more advanced levels of education. It recommended further that, in revising the educational programmes for training indigenous medical personnel (see above), the Administering Authority take into account the desirability of ensuring that the programmes were so designed as to facilitate the selection and adequate basic education of candidates for medical and other specialized training.

The Administration stated that it subscribed to the policy of children mastering the skills of reading and writing in the vernacular and recognized the need for certain of its Education Officers to become proficient in the local languages. However, it considered the use of English to be the ultimate solution to the problem of linguistic diversity in the Territory. Except at the village school level, English is the only approved medium of instruction and the policy of the Administering Authority is to make this language universal throughout the Territory.

The Visiting Mission learned that it was not intended to perpetuate the use of "pidgin" (a mixed jargon developed in the earlier years of contact between Europeans and Pacific and Asian peoples) as a medium of instruction in non-Administration schools, but at the present time it was often the only practical medium of communication between pupils and teachers. Under the new Education Ordinance, the Director of Education was empowered to prescribe the language of instruction to be used in any particular school. The Administration considered that in principle it was undesirable to forbid the use of "pidgin" at the present time and that it was at least preferable to use it for teaching purposes rather than force upon the pupils as a so-called lingua franca some Native vernacular which was quite unlike their own.

With regard to the general use of "pidgin," the Visiting Mission was glad to note that it was the policy of the Government to use only English in institutions of higher education. However, it noted that "pidgin" was used on lower levels of instruction as well as in certain non-governmental schools and that all administrative officials were using "pidgin" in all their contacts with the indigenous population. The Mission was strongly of the opinion that "pidgin" was not only not a suitable language for instruction, but that it had characteristics which reflected now outmoded concepts of the relationship between indigenous inhabitants and immigrant groups. The most energetic steps should be taken to eradicate it from all instruction given within the Territory, and plans should be urgently developed to eliminate it from the Territory completely, the Mission felt.

At the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority said that, despite the shortcomings of "Melanesian pidgin English," it was a language of great adaptability and facility, with a synoptic vocabulary of over 1,300 words; that through these 1,300 words it was possible to translate about 6,000 English words; and that it was quite as exact as any Native language, more adaptable and capable of embracing any subject. It should not be confused with the painful jargon of broken English and sonorous twaddle which too many persons passed off for "Melanesian pidgin." To ban the use of this practical lingua franca and try to use all 53 Native languages would obviously hamper the Administering Authority and the progress of the people of New Guinea and it would seriously retard their economic, political and educational advancement. The Administering Authority had made it quite clear, he stated, that the ultimate objective was to make the indigenous inhabitants literate in the English language, and during the transitory period the continued use of "Melanesian pidgin" was in the best interests of the Native people.

The Council, noting that the Administering Authority had determined that English should be the approved medium of instruction and the universal language of the Territory, and at the same time noting from the report of the Visiting Mission the wide extent to which "Melanesian pidgin" was at present used both in the lower levels of education and by all administrative officials in their contacts with the indigenous population, endorsed the opinion of the Mission that "Melanesian pidgin" was not only not suitable as a medium of instruction but had characteristics derived from the circumstances in which it was invented which reflected now outmoded concepts of the relationship between indigenous inhabitants and immigrant groups. It recommended that the Administering Authority take energetic steps to eradicate it from all instruction given within the Territory, that it urgently develop plans to eliminate it completely from the Territory, and that in areas where the population was as yet unfamiliar with "Melanesian pidgin" its use should be officially prohibited immediately.

The Council, noting that a linguistic map of the Territory was in course of preparation and that work had begun on the examination of languages suitable for regional use in vernacular instruction, and noting the interest expressed by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in this project, requested the Administering Authority to keep it informed of the progress and the results and to consider the desirability of seeking the collaboration of UNESCO in completing the project.

The teaching staff of Administration schools was increased from 191 to 200 during the year under review. It consisted of 49 Europeans, 138 indigenous inhabitants, two of mixed origin, and eleven Asians. Indigenous teachers are trained at education centres at Dregerhafen and Kerevat. At each there is a central or higher elementary school, and a higher training institution for the training of teachers. At the beginning of 1952, both centres were reorganized. A higher standard is now required for admission, and the training course has been lengthened. Trainees at both schools totalled 61 in June 1952.

The Visiting Mission learned that, under the Administration's five-year educational expansion programme, provision had been made for the employment of total personnel of approximately 616, consisting of 200 Europeans, 20 Asians and persons of mixed origin, and 396 indigenous persons. The Mission felt that, at this point, the Administration would need to pay particular attention to the creation of a large and competent corps of elementary school teachers by the establishment of new teacher-training centres and by the employment of more European teachers.

The Administering Authority informed the Council that it had approved an increase in the staff of the Department of Education and that, under this approval, 30 European teachers had already been appointed.

The Council, reaffirming its previous recommendations for the expansion of facilities for the training of teachers, endorsed the opinion expressed by the Visiting Mission on this matter, and drew the particular attention of the Administering Authority to the fact that the substitution of standard English for "Melanesian pidgin" and the consequent raising of the general level of education depended very largely upon the institution of an intensive programme of training of teachers competent in the use of standard English.

3. Nauru, Administered by Australia, on Behalf of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom

Nauru has an area of 5,263 acres. Its indigenous population, according to the annual report⁴² of the Administering Authority, totalled 1,672 in June, 1952. In addition, there were 560 Gilbertese, 759 Chinese and 253 Europeans. During 1951-52, the Administering Authority reported, there was an increase of 424 in the number of Gilbertese and Ellice Islanders. The Chinese community, however, decreased by 652.

a. FUTURE OF THE NAURUAN COMMUNITY

At previous sessions, the Council had considered the problem of the future fate of the Nauruans after they can no longer depend on the phosphate industry for their livelihood and had recommended that, if possible, other economic enterprises should be developed.

The Trusteeship Council's Visiting Mission in 1953 noted (T/1076) that the Nauruans had progressively adapted themselves to a European way of life but were becoming concerned about their future on the island because of the prospect of the exhaustion of the phosphate deposits. There were no other natural resources capable of commercial exploitation, the Mission noted, and the possibilities of agricultural development were limited by irregular rainfall and mediocre soil.

Representatives of the Administering Authority informed the Mission that the Administration hoped to start a study of the local resources of Nauru, including the possibility of rehabilitating the worked-out phosphate land, in order to determine how many Nauruans might be able to get a reasonable existence from the land when the phosphate deposits were exhausted. Consideration had also been given to the possibility of resettling the Nauruan community elsewhere in the Pacific, but as yet no suitable location had been found where they could settle as a community. It was felt, however, that the solution offering the greatest possibility of success would be to educate and train the Nauruans up to a standard where they could find avenues of employment, either in groups or individually, anywhere in the Pacific. It was estimated that the Long-Term Investment Fund derived from phosphate royalties would ultimately provide the Nauruans with £2,500,000,⁴³ which might be used to establish elsewhere those Nauruans left on the island when the phosphate deposits came to an end.

⁴³ All figures in this section are given in Australian currency: £A 125 = £Sterling 100 = $US280.

The Mission doubted whether at that time Nauru would be habitable for a people who could be expected to have achieved a relatively high level of advancement, and it saw no alternative to the resettlement of the population elsewhere. It believed that every effort should be made to minimize the social impact of the transfer and felt that this might well be achieved if the movement were to be made gradually by individuals, by groups or as a community. A plan for gradual resettlement should be agreed upon as soon as possible; it should aim to reduce the number of older people on Nauru when the phosphate deposits became exhausted and to provide the younger generation with more vocational training to fit them for employment in other Pacific areas. Responsibility for such transfer, the Mission held, should rest in a measure upon the British Phosphate Commissioners (see below) who should give Nauruans all possible help for the transfer.

The Mission felt that the primary responsibility of the phosphate industry was to provide for the future welfare of the Nauruans after the mining of phosphate had apparently made necessary their resettlement elsewhere, and that it should assist the people whose lands would be made useless and aid them in re-establishing themselves outside their island by purchasing land and contributing to their other needs. The Mission felt that consideration should be given at an early date to the establishment of a capital fund to be used for the resettlement of individuals or groups of the Nauruan community in accordance with a plan of gradual resettlement. It felt that the existing Nauruan Community Long-Term Investment Fund might not be sufficient to meet the requirements of such a plan.

At the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, the representative of the Administering Authority noted that the people of Nauru were attaining an advanced political and social position and said that his Government was fully aware of the need for ensuring their continued well-being. A review of the resources of Nauru was being conducted specifically at the request of the Nauruan people and against the possibility that some Nauruans might not wish to leave the island. Policy was being directed towards a gradual and progressive resettlement. Plans had already been made for increased vocational training for the younger Nauruans and the question of funds for resettlement was also being closely studied. The Administering Authority would inform the Council on the progress of these plans.

The Council, in resolution 842(XII), noted that the views of the Visiting Mission and the Administering Authority on the need for resettlement were in general accord and recommended to the Administering Authority that it formulate plans, in consultation with the Nauruan people, for resettlement, consider the ways and means of livelihood for those Nauruans who might wish to remain in the Territory and also give consideration to the Mission's views on the establishment of a capital fund for that purpose.

b. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

An Administrator, appointed by the Government of Australia, has full powers of legislation, administration and jurisdiction. He is assisted by an administrative staff which, on 30 June 1952, the Administering Authority reported, consisted of sixteen Europeans, 280 Nauruans and 31 Chinese.

Three Commissioners, one appointed by each of the partner Governments, manage the phosphate enterprise, on which the Territory depends for its livelihood. The first Visiting Mission had noted that the Phosphate Commissioners were virtually independent in administrative matters and that, as a result, there existed a duality of administration in numerous areas of activity. The 1953 Visiting Mission gained the impression that some duplication of administration was unavoidable, but that there had been considerable improvement in the relationship between the Commissioners and the Administration.

The Nauruans play a part in the government of the Territory through an elected and advisory Local Government Council, whose members also exercise administrative functions in their districts, and through the employment of Nauruans in the administrative services.

At the end of 1951, the Nauruan Council of Chiefs, which had been established by Nauruan custom and which advised the Administrator on Nauruan affairs, was replaced by the Nauruan Local Government Council, members of which are elected by universal suffrage. The Administering Authority stated that the new Council had fairly wide powers to take part in the legislative work of the community and also to engage in business undertakings, which the Council of Chiefs did not have. Its composition, powers and functions are defined by ordinance; the Council of Chiefs had had no statutory basis. The functions of the new Council include advising the Administrator on Nauruan affairs, including the enactment of new ordinances and making rules, with the approval of the Administrator, for regulating the peace, order and welfare of the Nauruans. It may also co-operate with the Administration in providing public or social services. It submits yearly to the Administrator estimates of its receipts and expenditure. Deficits are payable from the Nauru Royalty Trust Fund.

The Administering Authority, while indicating that the new Council had not undertaken any functions additional to those transferred to it from the former Council of Chiefs, stated that discussions were taking place with the Administrator as to the future functions and activities of the Council. The Administering Authority stated, at the Trusteeship Council's twelfth session, that the new Council had not availed itself of all the powers which were granted to it by ordinance, but that there was no doubt that its members would do so when the implications of the Ordinance were made clear to them.

The Administering Authority had taken steps to provide greater assistance and advisory services from the Administration to help encourage the Nauru Local Government Council in the understanding and exercise of its powers and functions.

The 1953 Visiting Mission held a meeting with the Local Government Council and was impressed by the ability and seriousness shown by the councillors. The Mission observed, moreover, that harmony existed between the Administration and the Council. Dissatisfaction was expressed, however, by the councillors concerning a number of clauses in the Ordinance relating to the Council's participation in the administration and especially in regard to the financing of the Council's activities, the Mission stated in its report (T/1076).

The Mission was informed by the Secretary of the Department of Territories at Canberra that, in his opinion, the functions and duties of the Council were clearly set out in the Ordinance, as was also the manner in which the Council would get funds to operate. He believed that the Nauruans did not yet fully understand the Ordinance and were not well enough versed in the procedure and forms of local government, the methods by which they should proceed to work and the types of regulations and by-laws they should make. The Council needed education and guidance, which the Administration would make every effort to provide.

The Mission noted this statement, but nevertheless felt that the present Ordinance did not fully satisfy the persons directly concerned. It believed that the question of revision of the Ordinance should be studied anew so as to remove all possible misunderstanding which might exist at present; it believed also that all possible steps should be taken to explain to the Nauruan people the functions and duties of the Council.

A complaint was received by the Mission on the manner in which the first elections for the Local Government Council, which took place at the end of 1951, had been conducted in the Boe District. It was claimed that, owing to a certain ambiguity in the Election Ordinance, the popular candidate had been declared ineligible. The Mission was informed by the Administering Authority that the candidate in question had been declared ineligible because his nomination had been submitted in an irregular manner. Since there had been only one other candidate, he had been automatically declared elected unopposed. There was no provision in the Election Ordinance for invalidating an election and therefore the Administration could not accede to requests from the Boe District electors for a new election.

The Mission, while considering the situation unfortunate, appreciated that it would be difficult for the Administration to make an exception in applying the electoral law. It believed, however, that in future elections every effort should be made to explain the electoral procedures to the population well in advance of the date for submission of candidates.

Noting the statement of the Administering Authority and the Visiting Mission's opinion that the question of the revision of the Ordinance should be studied anew to remove any possible misunderstanding, the Trusteeship Council, at its twelfth session, endorsed the views of the Mission and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would give the question further attention.

The Administering Authority reiterated to the 1953 Visiting Mission that it is its policy to prepare Nauruans to assume greater responsibilities, and that the Nauruan staff is given every opportunity and encouragement to gain experience and to qualify for higher public offices.

Up to February 1953, when 269 of the total of 480 male Nauruans over the age of sixteen years were in the employment of the Administration, only one Nauruan, the Head Chief, held a position of high responsibility in the Public Service, the Mission noted. He held the post of Native Affairs Officer, and was also one of the two District Magistrates. The Mission reported with regret, however, that he had died on 11 April 1953. The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council, at its twelfth session, that the Local Government Council had since elected a new Head Chief who was also Acting Native Affairs Officer.

The Local Government Council in its petition (T/Pet.9/8) raised with the Mission the question of employing more Nauruans in the Public Service. Referring to representations made by the former Council of Chiefs to the first Visiting Mission concerning the education of Nauruans, it stated that the situation had not much improved and pointed out that after thirty years of compulsory education there was only one Nauruan holding a key position.

The 1953 Visiting Mission, while noting the observations of the previous Mission concerning the difficulty of finding suitable persons who could occupy higher positions in government service, was of the opinion that the Administration should continue its efforts with a view to ensuring to the Nauruans greater participation in government activities, and to that end intensify its programme of training Nauruan officials to fill higher positions.

The Trusteeship Council, in considering the petition at the twelfth session, drew the attention of the Administering Authority to the views of the Visiting Mission (842(XII)).

At the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, the representative of the Administering Authority stated that it was the firm policy of the Administering Authority to advance Nauruans to responsible positions in Government service as and when they were capable of giving reasonably satisfactory service in these positions. Arrangements had been made to intensify the programme of training Nauruan officials.

The Council in resolution 842(XII) endorsed the view of the Visiting Mission that the Administering Authority should intensify its programme of training Nauruan officials to fill higher positions.

The Nauru Local Government Council also raised in its petition (T/Pet.9/8) the question of direct participation of the indigenous people in the work of the Trusteeship Council and requested that part of the expenses entailed should be borne by the United Nations.

The Visiting Mission informed the Local Government Council of resolution 554(VI) of the General Assembly on this matter and the Trusteeship Council's subsequent recommendations in resolution 466(XI) to the effect that the Administering Authorities should associate suitably qualified indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the work of the Council as part of their delegations or in any other manner which they deemed desirable. The Mission explained that no provision, however, had been made for separate indigenous representation or for financial contributions to meet the expense involved.

The Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session (842(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioners to Council resolution 466(XI), to Assembly resolution 653(VII) and to its own decision (647(XII)) to establish a Committee to study further the question of the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the work of the Council in the light of the Assembly's resolution.⁴⁴

Under the judicial system of the Territory, the Administrator himself constitutes a Court of Appeal and has the power to appoint and remove members of the lower courts, which consist of a Central Court, a District Court and fourteen Native Courts. There are two resident European judges and one European magistrate in the Central Court, two magistrates (one European and one Nauruan) in the District Court and fourteen chiefs in their respective District Courts. The Central and District Courts have civil and criminal jurisdiction; the Native Courts deal with offences committed by Nauruans.

During 1952, the Judiciary Ordinance 1922/52 was amended to enable one judge or magistrate to exercise the jurisdiction of the respective courts.

c. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The economy of Nauru is almost entirely dependent upon the phosphate industry. Earnings from this industry, which, according to the Visiting Mission, supplies more than half the phosphate needs of Australia and New Zealand, financially support the Administration, as well as provide funds for various Nauruan Trust Funds.

The only other industrial activity is the production for export of small quantities of copra, which was revived in 1950. A total of 7.3 tons of copra had been exported in 1950-51, but there was no export in 1952 because the coconut trees had not recovered from the drought of 1950. The land is regarded as suitable for the cultivation of coconuts, pandanus, small quantities of other tropical fruits and some vegetables; the Territory is now mainly dependent upon outside sources for its supply of food.

The smallness of the island, the absence of pastureland and the limited water supply preclude the keeping of livestock with the exception of some pigs, goats and poultry. There is no large-scale fishing, but some Nauruans are occupied in fishing to supply local requirements. The Nauruan Co-operative Society, operated under the direction of the Local Government Council, engages in general trading and conducts a piggery, poultry farm, bakery and other enterprises.

The 1953 Visiting Mission found (T/1076) that the material rehabilitation of the island from the effects of the Second World War had been achieved to a remarkable extent and that there were signs of general economic prosperity among all sections of the population.

The Mission stated that the phosphate industry had now been completely restored and provided with modern equipment. Production was above pre-war levels and for 1952 had established a record, being 52,531 tons in excess of the 1949-50 record output of 1,009,266 tons. The value of the phosphate exported was given by the Administering Authority as £1,725,420.

The Trusteeship Council had earlier requested the Administering Authority to make known to it the separate financial operations of the British Phosphate Commissioners in respect of Nauru and the actual prices received for the phosphate, all of which is exported either to Australia or New Zealand, in comparison with the world market price for phosphate. This matter was also raised by the Local Government Council with the 1953 Visiting Mission. In asking for an increase in the royalties payable by the Commissioners to the Nauruans, the Local Government Council pointed out its inability to determine what was a reasonable increase due to lack of information on the finances of the Commissioners.

The information contained in the 1952 annual report of the Administering Authority in respect of the economics of the industry was similar in scope to that provided in previous years. The financial accounts submitted covered the Commissioners' operations in respect of Nauru and Ocean Island combined.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council, recalling its earlier recommendations, urged the Administering Authority to make every effort, in agreement with the British Phosphate Commissioners, to provide in its next annual report the information earlier requested.

The Local Government Council, as the Council of Chiefs before it, is responsible for negotiating with the British Phosphate Commissioners the amount of royalty to be paid into the Nauruan Royalty Trust Fund. The Lands Ordinance prescribes the conditions under which the phosphate or non-phosphate bearing land is leased, together with the royalty rates or rents which are determined by agreement between the Nauruan Local Government Council and the British Phosphate Commissioners.

Both the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council had recommended that the Administering Authority should prepare the indigenous inhabitants for participating in all government activities affecting the phosphate industry. The Council had also recommended that the dominant economic position of the phosphate industry should not adversely affect the interests of the indigenous population in general.

The Administering Authority stated that all government activities had an indirect effect on the phosphate industry and referred to its efforts to increase participation of Nauruans in government activities. The Administering Authority also said that the Nauruan population benefited from the industry by the receipt of royalty payments and by employment in the industry.

The Local Government Council, in a meeting with the 1953 Visiting Mission, pointed out that a greater participation by Nauruans in the Administration would enable them to have a more compelling voice in the negotiations with the Commissioners, and the Mission was requested to obtain assurances from the Commissioners that Nauruans, when properly qualified, would be given some of the responsible positions with the Commissioners.

Except for a small amount of revenue derived from import duties, postal revenue and sundry other items, all moneys accruing to the Territory's budget are obtained from royalties or advances made by the British Phosphate Commissioners. In addition, the Commissioners pay certain royalties which go into trust funds for the immediate or long-term benefit of the Nauruans.

The royalties payable to the Administration on each ton of phosphate exported by the Commissioners, the Administering Authority reported, was 2s. 6d. in 1951-52, compared with 2s. 3d. the previous year and 1s. 6d. during 1949-50. Of the amount of 2s. 6d. an amount of 1s. was paid to meet the ordinary expenses of the Administration, 9d. to repay the rehabilitation advance and the remaining 9d. to repay the advance for Nauruan housing. Royalties paid to or on account of the Nauruans, the report stated, totalled 1s. 4d. during 1951-52, which equalled the amount paid during the previous year and was 3d. higher than the amount paid during 1949-50. Of the amount of 1s. 4d. an amount of 6d. was paid to the owner of the land from which the phosphate was extracted, 3d. was paid to the Nauruan Royalty Trust Fund to be used exclusively for the benefit of the Nauruans, 2d. was to be invested for the benefit of landowners in the Nauruan Landowners' Royalty Trust Fund, and 5d. was to be invested for the benefit of Nauruans in the Nauruan Community Long-Term Investment Fund.

The greater part of the cost of the Administration was, until recently, met from the proceeds of the 1 shilling royalty and from payments made by the Phosphate Commissioners in respect of customs duties and other charges, the Administering Authority reported. In addition, the Phosphate Commissioners agreed in 1946-47 to advance to the Administration two sums of money, one to cover the cost of the reconstruction and rehabilitation of the island and the other to cover the cost of Nauruan housing.

At its twelfth session, however, the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council that, as from the financial year 1952-53, the British Phosphate Commissioners were paying the Nauru Administration a sum to cover the whole estimated annual Administration expenditure and charges, in place of the 1 shilling royalty on each ton of phosphate exported and the commutation of payments in respect of customs duties. For the year 1952-53, the sum involved, £162,000, was the equivalent of 3s. 3d. a ton of phosphate.

Explaining this change, the representative of the Administering Authority stated that basically its effect was to increase the payment by the Commissioners so as to cover all Administration costs. It did not in any way place the Administration in a position of dependence upon the Commissioners, nor did it in any way limit the expenditure of the Administration on developmental and other projects.

The amount fixed for the rehabilitation advance in 1946-47 was £200,000 but, as this proved inadequate, it was subsequently increased to £300,000 and again in 1951-52 to £350,000, the Administering Authority reported. The total payment, as of June 1952, from this advance amounted to £325,000, which is repayable with interest. The second advance, for Nauruan housing, amounted to £200,000. To repay these advances the Administration levies two royalties on the British Phosphate Commissioners. These royalties each amounted to 9d. per ton of phosphate exported during the year ending 30 June 1952. As from 1 July 1952, however, according to information received by the Council at its twelfth session, the rehabilitation royalty was increased to 10½d. a ton.

The total revenue received by the Administration in 1951-52 amounted to £155,414, as compared with £145,019 in 1950-51, and was made up of £50,660 from the royalty rate of 1s. per ton on phosphate exported, £27,000 from commutation of payments of customs and other charges of the Administration, £65,000 from the rehabilitation advance, and £12,754 from other sources, the Administering Authority reported. It also reported that expenditure on both the administration and reconstruction activities totalled £146,742 during the year, as compared with £130,491 in 1950-51.

Most of the expenses of Nauruan education and of the Nauruan Native Administration are paid for out of the Nauruan Royalty Trust Fund, financed from the royalty of 3d. a ton. During 1952, the income accruing to this Fund amounted to £12,665 and expenditure to £13,932, the balance at the end of the year being £9,754. A recommendation had been made earlier by the Trusteeship Council that the Administering Authority should pay for such expenditures out of the budget proper, and not from the Trust Fund.

In addition to the royalty of 6d. a ton to the landowners from whose property the phosphate is extracted, the Commissioners pay a lump sum of £45 an acre to the landowners for all the phosphate land leased to them and a rent of £4 10s. an acre per annum for all non-phosphate-bearing land.

For the long-term benefit of the Nauruans, two Trust Funds have been established, the Nauruan Landowners' Royalty Trust Fund and the Nauruan Community Long-Term Investment Fund. The first, financed by the royalty of 2d. a ton, totalled £135,770 in June 1952; and the second, financed by a royalty which was increased from 2d. to 5d. a ton in 1950-51, stood at £55,042.

In its petition (T/Pet.9/8) to the Visiting Mission, the Local Government Council claimed that the current royalty rate of 1s. 4d. a ton payable to or on behalf of the Nauruans was insufficient, and requested that the rate should vary according to the rising cost of living. Provision should also be made whereby the royalty agreement could be reviewed at more frequent intervals.

Various individual requests were also made to the Mission for an increase in the royalty rates and another request was made that the sums credited to the Nauruan Landowners' Royalty Trust Fund should be released to the individual landowners.

The view of the Administering Authority, according to the Visiting Mission, was that it was doubtful whether the Commissioners had any legal obligation to pay more than the costs of administration of the Territory. However, their actual payments amounted to considerably more than that sum and they had agreed to consider the possibility of an increase in the royalty payments. In the past they had been reluctant to increase payments to individual landowners, preferring to pay any increases to trust funds for the benefit of the whole Nauruan community.

The Mission considered that the Local Government Council's request that the royalty rate should increase in proportion to the cost of living was basically legitimate. It was not, however, in a position to determine whether the cost of living had in fact risen since the royalty rate was last adjusted.

In considering the petition, the Trusteeship Council noted (842(XII)) the Mission's views and drew them to the attention of the Administering Authority.

At the Council's twelfth session, the representative of the Administering Authority said that the various comments made in the Council had raised the issue of the extent to which the Trusteeship Council should inquire into the internal affairs of commercial undertakings in Trust Territories. It appeared to the Administering Authority that the Council's over-riding function was to concern itself with the fiscal policy of the Administering Authority in the Territory and to ensure that adequate provision was being made for the well-being and advancement of the inhabitants, leaving to the discretion of the Administering Authority the raising of the financial means necessary. He suggested that too inquisitorial an attitude towards commercial and industrial concerns might tend to have a discouraging effect on investment in Trust Territories; without investment the pace of economic development would be adversely affected and the advancement of the people retarded.

He referred to the benefits derived from the phosphate industry by the Administration and the Nauruan landowners and pointed out that the amount of royalty paid by the British Phosphate Commissioners was in no way dependent upon the market price of the phosphates or on the profits of the company. Furthermore, a trust fund was being accumulated from year to year with a view to safeguarding the economic future of the Nauruan people.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that full details of the new financial arrangement between the Administering Authority and the British Phosphate Commissioners would be furnished in the next annual report.

Of Nauru's total area of 5,263 acres, 1,147 are coconut, lagoon or non-phosphate land and 4,116 are phosphate-bearing, situated on the central plateau and of inferior quality for agricultural purposes. By far the greater part of the land is owned privately by indigenous landowners, and when required for the mining of phosphate it is leased to the British Phosphate Commissioners. As of June 1952, the Commissioners held under lease approximately 1,200 acres of phosphate-bearing land and 137.757 acres of non-phosphate-bearing land. The Lands Ordinance 1921-1951 prescribes the conditions under which the land is leased to the Commissioners, together with the royalties and rents, which are determined by agreement between the Nauruan Local Government Council and the Commissioners. Disputes regarding land ownership are settled by a Land Committee composed of indigenous members, and the Land Ordinance makes it illegal for any sale, lease, contract or agreement to be concluded without the consent of the Administrator.

The Local Government Council informed (T/Pet.9/8) the Visiting Mission that it desired an over-all review of the lands agreements in order to provide landowners with a greater voice in land matters. The agreements, the Council felt, should also be subject to review at more frequent intervals than was the current practice.

With regard to phosphate lands, the Local Government Council requested that provision should be made in the Lands Ordinance for landowners to negotiate a new rate of payment for phosphate removed from their land if it were to be used for other purposes than the manufacture of superphosphate fertilizer.

As for non-phosphate-bearing land, the Local Government Council requested that different rental rates should be applied according to stipulated conditions, to be agreed upon by the Council for the landowners and by the Administration for the Administering Authority. Some payments should also be made, the Council considered, for rock and other substances not containing phosphate which were used for construction purposes. Various other requests concerning land problems were also made to the Mission.

The people of the Boe and Yarren districts, who had complained in 1950 about the use and permanent acquisition by the Australian Government of a Japanese-built airstrip located on some of their best land, requested (T/Pet.9/9) the Visiting Mission to assist them in obtaining the return of their land. They stated that no fair solution for compensation or payment of back rental had been offered to them. In March 1952, the Mission reported, the Administering Authority had decided to extend the airstrip, to conform with international standards, from 4,300 feet in length and 200 feet in width to 5,200 feet in length and 500 feet in width.

The petitioners still considered that there was no value in having an airstrip in the Territory and that the land could be used with greater benefit by the inhabitants for the growing of food or for housing purposes. If an airfield were needed, it could be constructed on land from which phosphate had been extracted, with the assistance of community finance and labour.

The Administering Authority maintained that the airstrip was in the general interests of the Nauruan community and that no other site was practicable. Compensation provided in the Aerodrome (Acquisition of Land) Ordinance was, in its view, fair and reasonable, being fixed at twice the amount normally payable for the lease of non-phosphate land. Fair compensation would also be given for trees or buildings located on the land at the time of its acquisition. The value of the buildings would be fixed by a Committee comprising the Administrator, the Head Chief and the Councillor of the District. Landowners had been paid £6 an acre per annum as compensation by the Administration from 15 November 1945 to 30 June 1951 and £9 an acre per annum to the date of the acquisition of the land.

The Mission agreed that an airport was necessary for the island, even if it were not frequently used, and gained the impression that the people of Boe and Yarren would be ready to negotiate with the Administration to arrive at a fair solution provided the rate of compensation was raised. The former Council of Chiefs had previously proposed that £12 should be paid per acre instead of £9. The Mission was further of the opinion that the people who were most affected should be encouraged to resettle in other areas, particularly the abandoned east coast.

The Trusteeship Council, in considering the petition at its twelfth session noted (resolution 843(XII)) the Mission's views and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority and the petitioners would work out a satisfactory arrangement for providing the people concerned with other suitable land.

Several requests were also received by the Mission for war damage compensation. The Chief and people of Aiwo stated (T/Pet.9/10) that, though the Australian Government had approved a certain sum as compensation to them, the Department of Territories had paid it into a fund for the purchase of furniture for Nauruans having houses under the housing scheme. This arrangement was unacceptable to them and they wanted a reconsideration of the whole question of war damages.

The Mission noted that, in 1949, the Council of Chiefs had negotiated with the Administering Authority for the settlement of war damages. The negotiations had resulted in £15,000 being paid by the Administration to establish the furniture fund, in view of the inability of the Nauruans to pay for the necessary furniture in their newly constructed homes.

At the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, the representative of the Administering Authority stated that the question of war damages had been fully considered by the Administering Authority and, with the support of the Council of Chiefs, it had decided not to meet requests for ex gratia payments as compensation for war damage of individual Nauruans. However, action had been taken by the Administering Authority to construct European-type houses for the Nauruans and an amount of £15,000 had been made available for a fund to provide furniture for the houses.

The Trusteeship Council (resolution 844 (XII)) drew the attention of the petitioner to the observations of the Administering Authority, namely: that in the view of the Administering Authority there was no legal liability to individual Nauruans for compensation for war damage and that the former Council of Chiefs had endorsed this policy; that the assessment of individual claims was impracticable; and that the money which the Administration had made available was better applied to carrying out certain community betterment schemes. The Council decided that in the circumstances no recommendation was necessary.

d. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Nauruan community, which is still in some respects organized along traditional lines, has modified its way of life as a result of the operation of the phosphate industry. There is almost complete employment of able-bodied male Nauruans for money wages. For food, Nauruans are now almost completely dependent on imported goods.

Immigrant communities are permitted to settle only in specific areas and, under the Movement of Natives Ordinance, the movement of Nauruans, other Pacific Islanders and Chinese is controlled during the hours of darkness by means of a pass system. The Trusteeship Council had previously requested the Administering Authority to consider modifying the provisions of this Ordinance, as well as those of the Chinese and Native Labour Ordinance, with a view to removing the restrictions on the movement of the Nauruans and the Chinese.

The Administering Authority maintained that the Movement of Natives Ordinance was in the best interests of the Territory and the welfare of the communities concerned and that its continuance had the support of the Nauruan population. It reported, at the twelfth session of the Council, that, after full consideration of the matter, it had decided not to modify the present provisions or to revoke the Ordinance. It stated that the law was liberally interpreted and passes were issued without undue restriction so as to enable persons with valid reasons to move outside their district during prohibited hours. In the case of the Chinese and Native Labour Ordinance, the Administering Authority similarly considered it not to be in the best interests of the Territory that any change should be made in the direction indicated by the Council.

During 1952, there were 32 convictions for offences under the Movement of Natives Ordinance (28 Nauruans, three Gilbertese and one Chinese), the penalties imposed ranging from a caution to a fine of 5 shillings.

The 1953 Visiting Mission noted that it had received no complaints arising from the application of the Ordinance. However, although it was aware that the Ordinance had the support of the Nauruans, it believed that a question of principle was nevertheless involved and therefore welcomed the statement of the Administering Authority that the provisions of the Ordinance were liberally applied.

At previous sessions, the Trusteeship Council had made various recommendations to the Administering Authority concerning the conditions of Chinese workers.

The 1953 Visiting Mission found that the Chinese workers employed by the British Phosphate Commissioners, whose numbers were reduced by one-half during 1951-52, had now been assigned adequate quarters and that increased recreational facilities were being provided.

It was gratified to note that recently, under certain conditions, a few wives and families of Chinese had been admitted to the Territory. The wife of the worker and not more than two children under twelve years of age were permitted to reside in Nauru for a period of three years. However, all members of the family, including children born on the island, were required to leave at the expiration of the permit. The Mission was informed that twelve Chinese families had been admitted and that consideration was being given to the admission of twelve others.

The Mission generally gained the impression that many of the difficulties to which the Chinese had been subjected in the past had been eliminated. At a meeting with the Chinese community it was informed that some of the workers who had returned to Hong Kong wished to obtain re-employment with the British Phosphate Commissioners.

The Council noted with satisfaction the measures taken by the Administering Authority permitting Chinese workers under certain conditions to bring their families to the Territory, and requested the Administering Authority to furnish full information periodically on the implementation of this programme.

The Administering Authority reported that, on 30 June 1952, 1,819 adults were employed in the Territory. Of this number, the British Phosphate Commissioners employed 1,360, compared with 1,597 in 1951, the reduction being due to the introduction of further mechanical methods of mining phosphate and the completion of the reconstruction and development programmes. The Visiting Mission reported that the number of Nauruans employed by the British Phosphate Commissioners had decreased since June 1952 to about 100. The Commissioners stated that this was due to the difficulty of inducing Nauruans to work steadily in the industry.

The basic labour legislation is the Chinese and Native Labour Ordinance, which lays down that every contract for work in Nauru for Chinese, Nauruans and other Pacific Islanders must be made in the presence of and subject to the agreement of the Administrator. Contracts for service are for one year. There are no labour organizations, but the Local Government Council acts for Nauruans in matters of wage rates and working conditions.

Labourers under contract were, until recently, subject to penal sanctions and six Chinese were convicted under the Labour Ordinance during 1952. The Administering Authority informed the 1953 Visiting Mission, however, that legislation for the abolition of penal sanctions was being drafted and that it would be completed very shortly. The Mission welcomed this action, which it felt to be in accordance with recommendations made by the Trusteeship Council.

According to information given by the representative of the Administering Authority at the twelfth session of the Council, the wage rate of Nauruan employees of the British Phosphate Commissioners was increased, as from 14 April 1953, from 8s. 8d. to 12s. a day, equal to about £175 per annum, plus a mid-day meal valued at £40 per annum. With this increase, the wife's allowance was discontinued, but the child's allowance was retained.

The Commissioners also authorized an increase, as from 14 April 1953, in the basic wage rate of Chinese and Gilbertese labourers employed by the Commissioners from £8 to £9 per month, plus existing margins and adjustment for overtime rates. Wages under £8 were proportionately adjusted and the wages of Chinese mechanics were raised by £1 10s. 0d. per month (in July 1950, Chinese mechanics received from £14 to £16 per month).

The working week for Nauruans, other Pacific Islanders and Chinese in the phosphate industry is 44 hours; for Europeans, it is 40 hours. To a suggestion of the first Visiting Mission that the 40 hour week should be applied to all communities, the Administering Authority replied that a 44-hour week was considered suitable for the industry, but that in order to obtain essential European staff it had been necessary to engage Europeans on the basis of the 40-hour week, in conformity with conditions of employment in the country of their recruitment.

In the case of employment by the Administration, the Administering Authority informed the Council, at its twelfth session, that a further increase in the basic rate for Nauruans had been granted as from 1 July 1952. Under the new arrangements the minimum wage rate for Nauruan employees had been increased to £191 per annum, based on the living costs of a man and his wife. The additional wife's allowance previously paid was discontinued, but the child's allowance was retained.

The basic rate is paid to labourers and others; salaries rise above it according to the nature of the employment. Nauruan teachers, for instance, are paid from £144 to £210 per annum, a senior wireless operator £300, a native medical practitioner £270 to £312, and the acting head teacher of the secondary school £764. The Head Chief, who until his death occupied a senior position in the Administration, received £836 per annum, the highest salary paid to a Nauruan.

The public accounts of the Administration showed that the total salaries and wages paid in 1951-52 to the European staff, which numbered 17 in June 1952, were £20,421; to the Nauruans, numbering 280, £36,408; and to the Chinese, numbering 31, £3,729.

The 1953 Visiting Mission suggested that, in undertaking a review of wages previously urged by the Council, the Administering Authority should take into consideration any increase in the cost of living.

Representations were made to the Visiting Mission by Nauruan employees of the Administration for improved wages and working conditions. In particular, a senior laboratory assistant at the Nauru hospital complained (T/Per.9/14) that he received only £17 per month though he had been with the Medical Department for thirteen years and had had a good deal of training. He felt that he should receive £25 per month and pointed out that he would have to pay 6 shillings per week for his house under the Nauruan housing scheme.

The Chief of Aiwo, Mr. Thoma Q, complained (T/Pet.9/13) that he had received no remuneration for his services during his term of office as Chief of the Aiwo District. The Mission noted that this case and others had been considered by the Administration and by the former Council of Chiefs. It understood that senior employees of the Administration who were also chiefs with certain community obligations did not receive allowances in addition to their salaries. It believed that the case involved certain principles adopted by the Administration concerning the public responsibilities of the chiefs and therefore was unable to determine the right of the petitioner to receive the payments requested in his petition.

At the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, the representative of the Administering Authority stated that the question of the disparity in wage scales of the Nauruan and European inhabitants was one which, for obvious reasons, applied probably in all Territories simply because it was necessary, in order to carry out responsibilities under the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreements, to obtain the services of adequately qualified persons and to induce them to leave their own country and the financial and other advantages available there, in order to give their time and energy to the training and welfare of the inhabitants of less fortunate or less advanced lands.

He stated that it was felt that, with the new minimum wage rates fixed recently, the Nauruans were placed in a good financial position, bearing in mind the low rentals charged for the modern houses which had been made available to them. He added that separate investigations had been made into the existing Nauruan wage margins for skill and responsibility, and that it was expected that decisions in regard to any variations of those rates would soon be taken.

With regard to the first petition (T/Pet.9/14), the Trusteeship Council (resolution 847(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioner to the Administering Authority's observations and expressed the hope that sympathetic consideration would be given to the request in view of the petitioner's seniority and length of service. The Council considered (resolution 846(XII)) that in the case of the petition by the Chief of Aiwo, no recommendation was necessary in the circumstances.

The completion of the first rehousing programme for Nauruans had been noted with satisfaction by the Council at its tenth session. The programme, made necessary by the destruction during the Second World War, was initiated in 1949 when arrangements were made for the construction of 250 European-style houses for Nauruans at an estimated cost of £200,000, the funds being supplied out of the housing advance made by the British Phosphate Commissioners.

The Administering Authority subsequently informed the Council that a further programme for the erection of 100 more houses had been approved. The Mission reported that, at the time of its visit, 62 of these houses were in varying stages of completion.

According to information supplied to the Mission, 1,041 persons were living in the completed houses, the number in each house varying between two and ten, and priority of allocation was given to married couples and families. The Mission was greatly impressed with the progress made under the housing scheme. Nauruans also, according to the Local Government Council, were very satisfied with the programme, except that they wanted an improvement in the electricity and water supply facilities. No rent was being charged for the houses at the time of the Mission's visit but a draft ordinance was under consideration for a rent of 6s. a week, or £15 12s. per annum, as compared with an earlier estimate of £12 per annum. The Mission was of the opinion that, since the intended rate represented less than the true economic rent of the houses, which had cost some £850 each, it must be regarded as reasonable.

Medical facilities provided by the Territory's Health Department consist of a general hospital, two out-patient clinics, a leper station and other clinics for tuberculosis, dental and infant care.

In addition, two hospitals, one for Europeans and the other for Chinese, are maintained by the British Phosphate Commissioners. European Government medical staff in June 1952 consisted of a medical officer, a qualified nurse and a mothercraft nurse; the Nauruan staff consisted of 22 medical personnel, including three medical practitioners. The British Phosphate Commissioners' medical staff consisted of a European medical practitioner, a nurse and a dispenser and ten hospital orderlies.

Expenditure by the Administration on health in 1952 amounted to £18,069, as compared with £19,712 in 1951 and £10,841 in 1950.

In June 1952, the Administering Authority reported, six Nauruan nurses were in training at the Administration hospital. Two Nauruans were in training in 1952 at the Central Medical School, Fiji, as native medical practitioners, and three graduates of the Fiji school were employed by the Health Department. Four students were also training in Australia, two as doctors, one as a chemist and one as a nurse.

The principal diseases treated by the Administration hospital during the year were filariasis bronchitis, enteritis, influenza, infantile diarrhoea and poliomyelitis. The Council, which had noted that the rate of leprosy in 1951 was high, 71 cases having been treated, received the report of a recent investigation by an expert into the treatment of the disease. The expert concluded that the position was under control and that the existing policy could hardly be bettered and was likely both to prevent any material spread of the disease and eventually to eliminate it. The Administering Authority further reported that no new cases of leprosy had been admitted to the leprosy station in 1952, or treated at the leprosy clinic. At the close of the year there were nine cases in segregation and 41 cases receiving treatment at the out-patients' clinic.

The 1953 Visiting Mission, while appreciating the efforts of the Administering Authority to provide medical facilities for the indigenous population, considered that the existing facilities were insufficient. The Administration hospital, it noted, was not fully equipped, had an insufficient number of beds and was far from meeting all the requirements of hygiene. Although it was aware that the facilities of the British Phosphate Commissioners' hospitals would be available in case of need, the Mission was of the opinion that all possible steps should be taken to improve the Administration's hospital and medical services, and it was glad to note that the Administration itself was aware of this need.

The representative of the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council, at its twelfth session, that approval had been given for the construction of a new Administration hospital with a capacity of 25 beds and with facilities which the Administering Authority considered would be adequate for the needs of the Nauruan community.

At the Council's twelfth session, the representative of the Administering Authority stated that, with the construction of the new hospital, hospital facilities would be quite adequate to meet the needs of the population.

The Council, noting the observations of the Visiting Mission on medical and health questions, and noting the Administering Authority's statement regarding improvements which are to be made, welcomed the decision of the Administering Authority to construct a new hospital.

The 1953 Visiting Mission reported that many persons in the Territory had referred to a previous petition (T/Pet.9/3) requesting assistance to visit relatives in the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

The Mission discussed the matter with both the Administering Authorities involved and was informed that there was no difficulty in principle in satisfying the request, but that all vessels visiting the Trust Territory travelled only between Nauru, Australia or New Zealand. The Mission was informed, however, that transport arrangements were being examined by the authorities in compliance with Trusteeship Council resolution 321(VIII).⁴⁵

e. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Education for Nauruan children between the ages of six and sixteen is compulsory. The cost of all indigenous education, both in Nauru or overseas is charged against the Nauruan Royalty Trust Fund. The Administering Authority reported that expenditure on Nauruan education during 1952 amounted to £11,179, compared with £5,936 in 1951. The main increases were salaries of teachers (£2,384) and cost of students overseas (£2,386). Expenditure on European education is charged against Administration general funds to which the salary of the Director of Education and other general expenses are also debited; in 1952 this expenditure amounted to £5,673, in comparison with £4,119 in 1951.

Education is controlled by the Administrator, and provision has been made for a European Director of Education to supervise the schools.

The teaching staff consists of four European teachers (two for European children and two for Nauruan children) and 26 Nauruan teachers.

There are six Administration primary Nauruan schools and a special school at the leper station. The Sacred Heart Mission also maintains a school at Arubo. There is one European primary school. Curriculum in the primary schools is based on that in Australia and includes instruction in English, arithmetic, manual training, geography, history, civics and nature study and appreciation.

Local facilities for secondary education were destroyed during the Second World War, and at its fifth and seventh sessions the Trusteeship Council had urged the Administering Authority to re-establish them in the Territory. In 1951, a secondary school with two classes had been opened in temporary buildings. The enrolment in 1952 was 44 pupils; in March, 1953, there were 58. During 1952, a European head-teacher was appointed to the school. He is assisted by two senior Nauruan teachers and other Nauruan instructors. The Administering Authority reported that plans were being prepared for a permanent building, and proposals were under consideration for the further development of secondary education to the intermediate standard with a bias towards technical training, domestic art and science and the needs of local employment. In March 1952, a secondary class was started at the Arubo Mission school, with an enrolment of fourteen girls. The 1953 Visiting Mission inspected the majority of schools in the Territory; it was impressed by the discipline and alertness displayed by the students and was pleased to observe that, on the whole, the schools were fairly well equipped.

In June 1952, 23 Nauruan students were studying overseas, as compared with eighteen in 1951. Of these, two male students were at the Central Medical School in Fiji and two were attending theological colleges. The remainder, comprising fifteen boys and four girls, were undertaking courses of secondary education at selected schools in Australia. Seventeen students were sponsored by the Administration, two by the religious mission and four by their families. The number of students abroad had increased to 35 by 31 March 1953. During 1952, a system of bursaries for European secondary education in Australia was instituted, the cost being borne jointly by the Administration and the British Phosphate Commissioners.

There are no teacher-training schools in the Territory, and most of the Nauruan teachers have no special training beyond that gained in the Territory's schools, except that the European teaching staff has held training classes for the Nauruan staff. The Administering Authority subsequently informed the Council, which had been concerned with the matter, that proposals were under consideration for the special training of Nauruan teachers. It also pointed out that ten potential teachers were attending secondary schools in Australia and that one junior male teacher was undergoing a special course there. The 1953 Visiting Mission, in examining this question, gained the impression that the training of some of the teachers was still unsatisfactory.

Adult and community education is given in evening classes for adults and senior scholars and through the medium of films. The Territory possesses two libraries. The development of an adult communal and welfare centre is under consideration by the Administration.

Dissatisfaction was expressed to the 1953 Visiting Mission by the Local Government Council on the manner in which Nauruan education was being handled. The Mission observed a scepticism regarding the progress achieved after 30 years of compulsory education. In its petition (T/Pet.9/8), the Council stated that a comprehensive report on Nauruan education had been sent to the Administrator for submission to the Department of Territories in July 1952. Six months had elapsed, however, before the matter was followed up. In December 1952, a Committee of five members, three of whom were members of the Local Government Council, had discussed the question and agreed upon certain principles to be recommended for consideration by the appropriate authority. These principles had yet to be considered and finalized, and experience had shown that it would be some time before this would be done. It was due to this dilatory way of handling Nauruan education, the petitioners concluded, that there was only one Nauruan holding a key position in the administration after 30 years of compulsory education. The Visiting Mission was therefore requested to take up the matter of Nauruan education with the Administering Authority with a view to arriving at certain conclusions which would ensure that progressive steps were taken towards Nauruans assuming most of the key positions in the Administration within a stipulated period.

The Mission, in discussing the future of Nauruan education and the complaints raised by the Local Government Council with the Administrator, was informed that the inauguration of future educational programmes was awaiting the arrival of the Director of Education.

The Mission considered that the principles outlined in the Nauruan Local Government Council's petition were basically sound, and it was of the opinion that the Administration should take all possible steps to implement them in the near future. In this connexion, greater emphasis should be given to the training of qualified teachers as well as to the expansion of vocational training programmes.

Apart from the need for improving education generally, the Mission believed that it was imperative to devise a training programme designed to satisfy the special demands which might be made on the Nauruans in the future as a result of the inevitable exhaustion of the island's phosphate deposits. As an integral part of the plan of resettlement of the Nauruan people which it had suggested (see above), the Mission felt that Nauruans should be provided with educational and vocational training which would enable them to obtain employment or otherwise maintain themselves outside their island. It attached great importance, therefore, to the training of students abroad, not only in skills specially required within the Territory. The Mission was of the opinion that, unless this objective of mobility was clearly stated, it would be difficult to devise practical programmes of education which would meet the needs of the Nauruans.

While local leaders were generally familiar with the nature and purposes of the United Nations and the International Trusteeship System, the Mission noted that the general public still lacked information.

The representative of the Administering Authority, at the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, stated that his Government was fully alive to the necessity of providing the Nauruan people with the benefits of a sound and well-balanced education and would exert every effort to assure them the wide knowledge and training required to fit them for responsible posts and contribute to their ability to take their places in modern communities.

A new Director of Education had recently been appointed in the Territory, and he had been instructed to conduct a full examination of the existing education system of the Territory and to submit plans and recommendations thereon. The views of the Visiting Mission concerning the dissemination of information on the United Nations had been noted and consideration would be given to the inclusion in the work of the schools of information regarding the organization and activities of the United Nations.

The Council, in considering the petition, noted (resolution 842(XII)) the observations of the Administering Authority and the Mission concerning the principles of educational policy.

The Council noted with satisfaction the increased number of Nauruan students studying abroad and hoped that the Administering Authority would continue its efforts in this regard in order to provide the greatest possible number of Nauruans with such training facilities.

4. Pacific Islands, Administered by the United States

This Territory, spread over some three million square miles, consists of three groups of Micronesian Islands: the Marshalls, Carolines and Marianas (except Guam) and contains 96 distinct island units with a combined land area of about 687 square miles.

The 1953 Visiting Mission emphasized the importance of the great area of ocean over which the, mostly very small, island units were distributed, the paucity of the Territory's apparent economic resources and the ethnic, cultural and linguistic diversity of its some 57,000 inhabitants as factors bearing on the administration and development of the Territory.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council endorsed the Mission's report and commended the findings and recommendations of the Mission in general to the earnest consideration of the Administering Authority. It also noted with pleasure the inclusion by the Administering Authority in its delegation, on the occasion of the examination of conditions in the Trust Territory, of two Micronesians resident in the Marshall Islands District.

The enactment of organic legislation for the Trust Territory, on which the Council had previously made recommendations, continued to await action by the Congress of the United States. The Administering Authority reported⁴⁶ that a draft law had been resubmitted to the Congress in January, 1953 and that hearings on it by the appropriate committee of the House of Representatives were planned for the month of July. A petition from the representatives of the people of Saipan (T/Pet.10/8), transmitted to the Trusteeship Council by the Visiting Mission, referred to the desirability of an organic act.

At its twelfth session, the Council recalled its previous recommendations favouring the enactment of basic legislation for the Territory, and considered that the adoption of a suitable Organic Act would serve the best interests of the inhabitants. The Council noted with pleasure that a draft law had been resubmitted to the Congress of the United States, and expressed the hope that such legislation would be enacted in the near future.

Responding to a request made by the Council at its tenth session, the Administering Authority submitted a list of 16 international treaties, agreements and conventions which, in the course of a continuing review, it had determined to be applicable to the Trust Territory.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority reported that the transfer of the administration of the Trust Territory from the control of the United States Navy Department to a High Commissioner appointed by the President and responsible to the Secretary of the Interior had taken place smoothly and with virtually no interruption of government services. It submitted to the Council the texts of the relevant orders. They included a message from the Secretary of the Interior which forms, with the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement, the basis of government for the Territory and which states, inter alia:

"The department will dedicate itself to the principle that the interests of the indigenous inhabitants are paramount, subject only to the requirements of international peace and security. It will foster the maximum practical participation by indigenous inhabitants in their own governmental, social and economic affairs."

The Visiting Mission reported that, by an Executive Order of 10 November 1952, an area including the islands of Saipan and Tinian (whose populations are 5,209 and 390 respectively) in the Northern Marianas had been returned, for security reasons, to Navy administration with effect from 1 January 1953. For reasons of administrative efficiency it was anticipated that this area would be administered by a local naval administration stationed at Saipan. The Mission was assured that every effort would be made to ensure continuity of administrative policy and the fullest co-operation with the High Commissioner and staff of the Trust Territory. On the islands of Saipan and Tinian, the Mission found no signs of dissatisfaction among the indigenous population with this change.

The Visiting Mission, while recognizing that the Chamorro people of the Saipan district had little in common with the other islanders and were more closely related to the people of Guam, expressed the hope that the closest attention would be given to preserving the unity of the Trust Territory by constant liaison on all matters of administrative policy and by encouraging the Saipanese to participate fully with the people of other districts in the political, educational and economic fields.

The Council at its twelfth session, noting the transfer of a part of the Territory to naval administration, requested the Administering Authority to ensure that the general policies applied in respect of all parts of the Territory might be so co-ordinated as to meet the evident need of the inhabitants for a period of stability in administration and to preserve the identity of the Territory as a whole.

Together with the Saipan district, the Trust Territory consists of five administrative districts—Palau and Yap (a sub-district until 1 July 1951) in the Western Carolines, Truk and Ponape in the Eastern Carolines, and the Marshall Islands—each of which is administered by a district administrator and his staff under the general supervision of the High Commissioner. The Visiting Mission found that a degree of autonomy was enjoyed by the District Administrators, to whom was delegated operational responsibility for the carrying out of programmes emanating from the High Commissioner and his headquarters staff.

This degree of autonomy was the result, the Mission observed, of the great distances involved. The Mission also considered that the tremendous distance which separated the headquarters of the High Commissioner, situated temporarily at Honolulu, from the scene of operations in the Territory, was the principal weakness in the present organization. The Trusteeship Council was informed at its twelfth session that Dublon Island in the Truk Atoll had now been designated as the permanent seat of government. The Visiting Mission inspected the proposed site and considered it to have all the desirable physical characteristics.

The Mission at the same time saw many disadvantages in transferring the headquarters to a place within the Trust Territory, including: the distances (although reduced) to the various administrative centres; increased difficulties of liaison with government departments in Washington and Navy headquarters in Honolulu; and difficulty in retaining the existing senior staff and obtaining new personnel of a high calibre. The Administering Authority informed the Council that the factors involved would have to be carefully weighed and that no funds were yet being requested for the construction of the necessary facilities.

The Council at its twelfth session recalled the views it had previously expressed concerning the desirability of establishing the administrative headquarters within the Territory, and noted the opinions of the Visiting Mission and the Administering Authority. It recommended that the Administering Authority continue to study all the implications of a decision on the matter, having due regard not only to those of immediate practical importance but also to those which might arise from the progressive assumption of responsibility by the indigenous inhabitants. It asked that the results of such study should be included in the next annual report.

The Visiting Mission noted an increasing participation of Micronesians in government at the higher levels, especially in the educational and health services and the judiciary. The Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council that a training specialist was establishing in the Truk district, as a pilot project, an in-service training programme of wide scope with the purpose of accelerating the training of Micronesians to replace American personnel wherever practical. Micronesians employed by the district administrative units and the islands constabulary on 30 June 1952 totalled 1,564, as compared with 1,539 a year previously. Some 130 of them, mostly in the Palau and Marshalls districts, were classified as administrative assistants, accountants, interpreters, medical practitioners, school principals, etc. At the same date, a total of 301 United States civil service employees held higher posts, as well as a number of technical and clerical positions, in the headquarters and district administrations.

The Mission stated that it had been greatly impressed by the quality and devotion of the civil service personnel, particularly the senior staff at headquarters; some of the technical staff was also of high calibre. As regards the district personnel, however, it remarked that, with few exceptions, the administrative personnel did not possess a knowledge of the indigenous languages and that on certain levels a degree of segregation existed.

The Mission attributed these problems to the difficulty of obtaining highly qualified personnel for service in remote areas with few social amenities. Urging greater security of employment and possibilities of promotion, the Mission expressed the opinion that the existing regulations, which did not provide for adequate continuity of service, were contrary to the interests of the Territory. It also thought that greater emphasis should be given to pre-service and in-service training which would give personnel a greater understanding of the cultures, traditions and problems of the Micronesians and at least a familiarity with the languages.

The Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council of its awareness of these personnel problems. It stated that, on the whole, the staff met the necessary standards of education, training and performance, and that a steady increase in its quality and ability which had taken place over the previous two years would be continued. As regards special training, staff members were given an orientation in Honolulu before assignment to the Trust Territory, and attention was being given to an extension of this training to provide additional study in the fields of ethnology and anthropology.

The Council, at its twelfth session, commended the suggestions of the Visiting Mission in the matter to the continuing attention of the Administering Authority.

The Administering Authority stated that, because of the widely differing stages of development in various parts of the Territory, it could not estimate, in the terms of General Assembly resolution 558(VI),⁴⁷ a specific period of time in which the Trust Territory as a whole might achieve the objective of self-government or independence.

The absence of cultural and political homogeneity in the Territory and its people had led the Administering Authority to concentrate in the first instance on developing forms of self-government on a purely local scale. An increasing number of municipalities, as the Trusteeship Council had urged, had been encouraged to elect their officials, principally those known as magistrates, by methods of popular and secret vote. The Visiting Mission stated that, out of a total of 117 municipalities, 97 had elected their magistrates, an increase of 29 since 1950, leaving eight more conservative communities where the position was still held by hereditary chiefs and twelve in which the Administration made the appointment after consultation. The Mission felt that in some areas the adoption of democratic principles might be more apparent than real, since the hereditary chiefs still retained their customary authority and might invariably be elected to office, but more generally it observed an increasing tendency to evaluate the capabilities and performance of seekers for office. The Administering Authority subsequently commented that it felt it desirable that there should not have been any drastic casting-off of traditional authority before the people were sufficiently adapted to the new cultures which they were meeting.

On the regional or district level, the Administering Authority and the Visiting Mission reported advances in the field of self-government, but at a slower pace than on the municipal plane. The Mission was impressed in particular by the bicameral Marshallese Congress, convened for the first time in 1950, which it considered to be one of the most effective of the local government bodies in the Territory. A new Congress for Ponape Island, rather than for the Ponape district as a whole, similarly constituted in 1952, of a house of hereditary leaders and an assembly of elected representatives, appeared to the Mission to be still in a somewhat rudimentary stage. The Truk district has two regional councils of chiefs but no district-wide organization; in October 1952, however, the Administration held a conference of all the island chiefs to discuss common problems, and the Mission considered that further conferences of a similar kind would be most desirable. The Administering Authority subsequently informed the Trusteeship Council that annual conferences were, in fact, planned as a step towards regional integration and the eventual formation of a regional congress.

In the Saipan district, approximately 86 per cent of the population resides in the municipality of Saipan. The Mission was informed that the establishment of a district council had been postponed at the request of the municipalities pending a decision on, among other things, the reorganization of the Saipan municipality; but it considered that the establishment of a district-wide council should not be delayed.

In the two remaining districts of Palau and Yap, the Mission found that little change had taken place since 1950. In Palau, which had been among the first districts to have a regional congress, it gained the impression that, in spite of the progress made, the Congress was at present somewhat lacking in effectiveness and relied unduly upon the leadership of the Administration. The Administering Authority indicated to the Council its general agreement with these views. The Mission, feeling that the Palauans were going through a difficult phase of adjustment after years of direct Japanese rule and of war, believed that every effort should be made to develop initiative in the Congress and to give it increasing responsibility compatible with the abilities of its members. In Yap, the least advanced of all the districts, the Mission found the people clinging strongly to their traditions and unlikely to show for some time to come a desire for democratic representation in local government.

In commenting generally upon these regional bodies, the Mission stressed that they were essentially consultative organs, although in practice the district administrators appeared rarely to seek to impose local regulations without first obtaining their approval. The principal weakness of the councils rested in their reluctance to express themselves in a forthright manner, but the Mission was satisfied that every effort was being made to induce greater confidence in them. The Administering Authority subsequently explained to the Council that it was seeking to provide assistance in the form of advice to members and explanation of procedures, rather than in the form of direct leadership by the Administration.

On the territorial level, the development of a territory-wide legislative body, the Administering Authority stated, was included in its long-range plans, but problems of transportation, communication and, even more important, the divisive effect of ethnocentricity had to be overcome before the plan could be carried out effectively. The Administering Authority again assured the Council at its twelfth session that it wished to develop a territorial advisory and eventually legislative body composed of local inhabitants as soon as possible. It intended, but had not yet found it practicable, directly to associate the inhabitants, as the Council had previously suggested, in the work of the newly-formed legislative advisory committee consisting of five heads of staff departments. The Visiting Mission was informed that, as a further step towards the eventual establishment of a representative body, the Administration would convene a conference of representatives of the district advisory bodies. The Mission observed that the conference—which the Administering Authority informed the Council would be held at Truk in July 1953—was intended to encourage the participants to assume responsibility in administering their own affairs and to provide them with an appreciation of the meaning of self-government.

The Mission, although attaching great importance to these developments, observed that the vast distances between islands, the lack of transportation, the cultural diversity of the Territory, the extreme insularity and the absence of a common language constituted formidable difficulties in the way of political unification. Undoubtedly these difficulties would be reduced as economic progress was achieved and a higher level of political consciousness reached, but a central body, if established, could not for some time be more than an inter-regional commission which might usefully attempt to co-ordinate economic and other problems. The Mission recommended that, at the present stage, attention should be devoted primarily to the development and improvement of the regional and district organs, and that these should be granted greater legislative authority as their capabilities improved, until ultimately they might become fully responsible for local legislation affecting their districts. It observed, with commendation, that a significant measure of political advancement had been achieved during the past seven years, and attributed this primarily to the fact that the Administering Authority had placed special emphasis upon education, advice and encouragement, thereby creating a desire among the inhabitants for political advancement and for increasing responsibilities compatible with their abilities.

At its twelfth session, the Council welcomed the observation of the Visiting Mission that, in spite of the peculiar difficulties arising from the geographical and ethnical characteristics of the Territory, a significant measure of political advancement had been achieved. It supported the decision of the Administering Authority to concentrate in the first instance on developing forms of self-government at the district level and, in this connexion, noted with satisfaction a further increase recorded during the past year in the number of municipalities electing their officials by methods of popular suffrage and the intention of the Administering Authority to hold a central conference of district representatives to discuss local and district matters of common concern.

The Council noted with interest the continuing efforts of the Administering Authority to establish representative organs of government on a district basis and, while encouraging the Administering Authority to proceed with its plans to create such organs in all districts, recommended that it take all practicable measures to ensure that in each district, and particularly for the time being in the case of Saipan, the island or atoll containing the district headquarters did not assume a disproportionately dominant position in relation to the interests of the outlying areas. It recommended further that the Administering Authority, bearing in mind the eventual establishment of a central representative organ for the Territory as a whole, endeavour to develop as far as practicable district forms of self-government along uniform lines.

The Council, recalling its previous suggestions in favour of the taking of all practicable steps towards the creation of a territory-wide legislative body, took note of the Visiting Mission's observation that the physical and cultural diversity and dispersion of the Territory and its inhabitants constituted formidable difficulties in the way of political unification, and supported the Mission's view that the most practicable approach to the establishment of a central legislature was by way of the development of regional and district organs and the grant to them of increasing legislative authority as their capabilities improved, until ultimately they might become fully responsible for local legislation affecting their districts.

As reorganized during the period covered by the annual report, the judiciary consists of:

(1) the appellate division of the high court, composed of three judges assigned by the chief justice from a panel of temporary judges designated by the Secretary of the Interior;

(2) the trial division of the high court (formerly the district court), consisting of the chief justice and/or the associate justice, appointed by and responsible to the Secretary of the Interior, together with special judges for each district in the trial of murder cases;

(3) a district court (formerly the justice court) for each administrative district, consisting of a presiding judge and one or more associate judges appointed by the High Commissioner upon recommendation of the chief justice; and

(4) a community court for each community consisting of a presiding judge and one or more associate judges appointed by the district administrator upon nominations by popular vote or otherwise.

The Administering Authority informed the Council at the twelfth session that Micronesians had been appointed to all judicial positions in the district courts. The only two permanent non-Micronesian judges were the two judges of the trial division of the high court. Twenty-one Micronesians had been appointed as special judges of the high court to assist in its work and there were in all 158 Micronesian judges, six Micronesian district clerks of courts, and 48 Micronesian clerks of community courts.

At its twelfth session, the Council noted that the judiciary had been reorganized in the year under review and welcomed the increasing participation granted to Micronesians in the judicial processes, in particular the appointment of 21 Micronesians as special judges of the High Court.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Economic life in the Territory was described by the Administering Authority in its report as chiefly a family endeavour, with each member contributing goods and services to the family and to the clan. Regular employment for wages exists only where there is a centre of non-indigenous population. The most important local products are copra, trochus shell and hand-made articles. The Territory's only other resources of note are phosphate deposits, which are mined for export on one island, and fisheries which, although once exploited thoroughly by the Japanese, remain little developed by the indigenous inhabitants. This general paucity of natural resources, combined with the difficulties of transportation, presents problems, the Visiting Mission considered, even greater than those which exist in the political field.

The Administering Authority, however, believed that an adequate subsistence for the people of the Territory was assured by existing potential resources. Its policy, it stated, had therefore been, by means of research, education, financial and technical assistance and government enterprise, first, to develop and improve the agricultural economy with the object of making the Territory self-sustaining, and, secondly, to improve and as far as possible diversify production for export. The Mission considered the policy as basically sound but drew attention to the fact that the basic agricultural economy could not be expected to produce the revenue necessary for ambitious programmes. A subsistence economy, the Mission felt, imposed definite limitations on the amount of services and luxuries with which the islanders should be provided.

The Mission expressed the view that, although income levels were very low in most areas, substantial progress had been made during the past three years, among the most noteworthy achievements being the continued increase in copra production and the progress made in the formation of indigenous trading concerns. It considered, however, that greater progress might be achieved in the development of agriculture, which, in its view, must remain the chief economic activity of the Territory.

The main features of its agricultural programme, the Administering Authority stated, were the replacement of crops and livestock destroyed during the war; the operation of agricultural stations on Saipan and Ponape for the improvement and diversification of subsistence crops; and the improvement of indigenous farming through direct assistance, agricultural education in the schools, youth farm clubs and adult extension courses. Special attention was being given to the development of cacao and, to a more limited extent, of coffee.

The Visiting Mission, while appreciating the soundness of this programme, felt that it met only minimum requirements. It saw a principal weakness in the fact that the agricultural advisers, being attached either to the education or island affairs services and having no separate funds, were restricted mainly to teaching. It urged the establishment of an integrated long-range programme of agricultural development on a scale greater than at present, and suggested the possibility of creating a separate department of agriculture.

The Administering Authority pointed out to the Council that it had created a field agricultural division. Under the chief agriculturist, who was stationed in the field, there were seven district and five inter-district agriculturists; the district staff spent the greater part of their time administering the district agricultural programmes and part of their time teaching and supervising indigenous teachers of agriculture. The combined expenditures on agricultural activities had totalled 90 per cent of all economic development expenditure in the past year, the Administering Authority stated, and drew attention to current research, training and agricultural education programmes, and to a long-term agricultural programme which had been approved since the visit of the Mission.

At its twelfth session, the Council endorsed the Mission's opinion that primary attention would be devoted to the development and improvement of agricultural production and welcomed the recent creation by the Administering Authority of a field agricultural division and the completion of plans for a long-term agricultural programme.

Trade is mostly carried on for the Micronesians by the trading arm of the Administration, the Island Trading Company, a non-profit corporation which buys the copra, handicraft and other products and sells them in the world markets, and imports trade goods into the Territory. Its net income has been used to repay the original financing of the Company by the United States Government and for the furtherance of the economic development of the Territory.

The Visiting Mission reported that the Company had performed an invaluable role in fostering indigenous enterprise and preventing exploitation. It had provided copra producers, even on remote islands, with a fair price and a regular market, had assured the equitable distribution of consumers goods and had provided a major source of territorial revenue.

The Mission stated that it was perturbed to learn of a decision of the United States Congress that the Island Trading Company should cease operation on 31 December 1953. Coupled with this decision was a directive to the effect that all funds remaining on liquidation of the Company should be paid into the Treasury of the United States. The Administering Authority subsequently informed the Council, however, that efforts were being made to clarify the decision of the Congress in the sense that the funds to be repaid should be limited to the balance of a loan of $1,800,000 which had been made to establish the Company, and of which $1,200,000 had already been repaid. The Mission also stated that additional provisions appeared to be designed to ensure that none of the former activities of the Company could be assumed by the Administration under a different organization structure.

It has always been intended that the Company should withdraw progressively as indigenous trading organizations capable of supplanting it become established. The Visiting Mission found, however, that the existing private joint stock companies varied considerably in terms of efficiency, and, except in the Saipan district where the Island Trading Company does not operate, only one company, in Truk, appeared to possess the necessary competence, business enterprise and capital to assume responsibility for the commerce of the district. The companies would need to be provided with government loans either free of interest or at very low rates and with adequate assistance by the Administration, the Mission considered. The majority of these companies, it thought, could not at their present stage of development undertake responsibility for foreign marketing of their products without further assistance.

The only practical connecting link between the Territory and world markets would thus be non-indigenous commercial concerns, but, even if profit margins proved adequate to attract them, the profits would be lost to the Territory. The cessation of the other functions of the Island Trading Company would, in the Mission's view, cause a serious economic loss to the Territory, and it thought that every effort should be made to expand the economic activities of the Administration and increase the staff.

The Administering Authority subsequently informed the Council that it would like to see the services of the Company replaced, if possible, by the activities of the Micronesians themselves, so that the greatest possible monetary return might accrue to them. This replacement might best be facilitated by temporarily extending the life of the Company, and this question was under consideration.

The value of the Territory's total exports fell from $2.21 million⁴⁸ in 1951 to $1.75 million in 1952, and imports from $2.22 million to $1.85 million. The principal item of export is copra, accounting in value for 62.9 per cent of the total. The entire crop is marketed through the Island Trading Company under a price stabilization system designed to give the producers reasonable protection against the fluctuation of world market rates. A stabilization fund was created out of part of the profits of the Company during 1950 and the early part of 1951, and it had to be drawn upon throughout the following year to support the price paid to the producers.

The Visiting Mission praised this policy, and considered it essential for the economic welfare of the indigenous population that a similar price support policy should be continued after the abolition of the Island Trading Company.

The Mission nevertheless heard several complaints about the copra price, together with requests for the abolition of the stabilization fund; it believed, however, that these complaints were due to lack of understanding, and that every effort should be made to explain to the people the reasons for price fluctuation and the purpose of the stabilization fund.

With regard to one of these petitions (T/Pet.10/19) the Council (resolution 857(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioner to the observations of the Administering Authority and in particular to the statement that if there had been no copra stabilization fund, the field buying price of copra would have fluctuated greatly. The Council also endorsed the view of the Visiting Mission that the Administering Authority was to be commended for the steps which it had taken to assure a fair and stable price to the producers of copra and that the Administering Authority should make every effort to explain to the people the reasons for price fluctuations and the purpose of the stabilization fund.

The Administering Authority pointed out to the Council that the stabilization principle had been explained repeatedly but stated that it was nevertheless aware of the need for continuing its campaign of explanation.

The Mission was gratified to note that the United States Government no longer (as from 12 June 1952) imposed a tax on coconut oil made from copra produced in the Territory.

One petition (T/Pet.10/18) on the subject of trade was forwarded to the Council by the Mission from Ponape. It requested the establishment of free trading channels with Japan because of the relatively higher price of United States goods. The Administering Authority commented that the Island Trading Company and Micronesian companies had traded with Japan for some years and a very considerable amount of goods had been purchased from Japan. The Company's policy had been to seek the export and import trade prices most advantageous to the Territory; the only barrier which existed was that of transportation. The Council (resolution 856(XII)) drew the petitioner's attention to these observations (T/Obs.10/1).

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council stated that it shared the concern expressed by the Visiting Mission at the prospect of the early liquidation of the Island Trading Company. The Council welcomed the further study being made by the Administering Authority as to a temporary extension of the life of the Company, and also welcomed the assurance given by the Administering Authority that the financing and control of the general economic development activities previously undertaken by the Company had already been transferred to the Territorial Government, and that the copra price stabilization system might be maintained under other arrangements. The Administering Authority was recommended to continue to assist the development of indigenous trading enterprises in order to enable them to assume the functions of the Company in the trading sphere.

The fullest possible development of land resources in the Territory is somewhat impeded, the Administering Authority stated in its report, by the traditional land tenure patterns, which generally meet the needs of subsistence living but discourage diversity and expansion, and by the settlement of land ownership problems.

These latter problems arose primarily from the former Japanese administration. All unoccupied land was then taken over as public domain, in contravention of indigenous usage, and ownership of much of this land is now disputed by the inhabitants. Other disputed lands were acquired for military and administrative purposes by the ⁴⁸ Throughout this section, $ = US dollars.

United States authorities during and after the military occupation.

All of this "public" land, totalling some 434 square miles out of a total land area of 687 square miles, the Administering Authority stated, is being held by the Administration for the benefit of the people while the claims are investigated. It estimated that most of the claims can be settled within about two years after two survey teams have been trained. The Visiting Mission found that most progress had been made in the Saipan district, where, out of 1,080 claims filed, 433 had been determined. Little had been done in the other districts beyond the acceptance and registration of claims, which totalled 91 in Palau, 64 in Ponape, 277 in the Marshalls and 48 in Truk.

The principal complaint heard by the Mission concerned the slowness of the Administration in acting upon the claims. In Saipan, a further source of grievance was that, in most cases where a preliminary determination had been made, land had been returned only on the basis of a revocable permit pending the outcome of further investigations; the people complained of the lack of security of tenure, but the Mission was assured by the Administration that in most cases their possession of the land would be confirmed. The Administering Authority subsequently explained further to the Council that these people, if they were not otherwise claiming title to particular lands, would be afforded the opportunity to remain permanently, on a "homesteading" basis, on the public domain presently under their cultivation.

The Mission, while realizing the difficulties involved, believed that the slowness in handling the question was irritating the population, and that all practical steps should be taken to hasten the settlement of claims and, wherever possible, to grant permanent titles. Every effort should be made to explain to the people the real aims of the Administration and to associate their representatives with the task of settling the problem. The Administering Authority assured the Council that the settlement of land problems was being given high priority and pointed out the difficulties occasioned by the fact that many land records and survey maps had been destroyed during the war and that such records as existed had to be translated from Japanese.

The Mission considered that the Administering Authority should give high priority to the settlement of claims against it for land destroyed or otherwise taken from the local inhabitants after United States occupation. The Administering Authority informed the Council that such claims were currently under consideration. Claims resulting from the use of public land by the Trust Territory administration would also be looked into; in one case discussions had been in progress for some months.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority told the Council at its twelfth session that a very large percentage of the public domain land was in forest reserves and steep slopes. All arable sections were being put to use by the Micronesians or by agricultural experiment stations for the Micronesians, and all Micronesians who so desired were supplied with land for their use.

A number of petitions on these matters were transmitted to the Council by the Visiting Mission. One such petition came from the representatives of the people of Saipan (T/Pet.10/8), five from persons in Ponape (T/Pet.10/13, 14, 16, 17 and 20), and one from Truk (T/Pet.10/10). From the Majuro Atoll, two petitions (T/Pet.10/22 and 23), bearing 94 and 304 signatures respectively, sought compensation for the use of land by the United States authorities.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council, recognizing the difficulties involved, welcomed the fact that the Administering Authority had defined policies to meet the interests of the Territory. The Council urged the Administering Authority to press forward with the disposal of claims, with due regard to a sound land utilization policy, and to implement its intention to explain the land policies to the inhabitants and to associate indigenous representatives with their administration.

With regard to the petition from the representatives of the people of Saipan, the Council (resolution 848(XII)) drew to the attention of the petitioners the oral and written observations (T/Obs.10/1) of the Administering Authority, and endorsed the views of the 1953 Visiting Mission that:

(1) although it was doubtful whether any equitable basis for compensation for trees and other possessions destroyed prior to or after United States occupation of the islands could be devised, the Administering Authority should give high priority to the settlement of claims against it for land destroyed or otherwise taken from the local inhabitants after the occupation;

(2) that the Administering Authority should hasten the settlement of land claims, wherever possible grant permanent titles, and should explain the aims of its land policy and associate indigenous representatives with the work of the Land Claims Office; and

(3) that in principle the homesteading plan was sound.

It adopted somewhat similar recommendations (resolutions 850, 852, 853, 855, 858, 860 and 861(XII)) in regard to the other petitions.

Minerals in the Trust Territory of known commercial value are phosphate in Angaur and bauxite in Babelthuap, two islands close together in the Palau district. The phosphate has been mined since 1949 by a Japanese company which sells the product in Japan and operates under contract with the Government of the Trust Territory and the people of Angaur. Approximately 102,290 long tons of phosphate, valued at $500,000, were exported in 1952, as against 143,738 tons, valued at $741,935, in 1951. The estimated reserves in February 1953 were 10,000 metric tons authorized under existing contracts and 300,000 tons as yet unauthorized.

A severance fee of $2 minimum per ton extracted is paid into a trust fund established for the benefit of the people of Angaur. The assets in the fund increased from $370,678.17 in June 1951 to $730,450.15 at the time of the Mission's visit, most of it being invested in United States Government securities yielding interest rates between 2.5 and 2.76 per cent. The fund provides an annual payment in perpetuity of $15,000 to the island community, which also derives benefits from rentals and permanent improvements, including electricity supply. The Government of the Trust Territory receives a severance tax of 15 per cent on the value of the ore extracted. The company is required to take precautions to preserve agricultural resources, including the covering over of all mined areas with earth.

The Visiting Mission noted that the trust fund had been established with the consent of the Angaurese and that the mining of phosphate had been of benefit to the indigenous population of the Palau District although the advantage had been derived mostly by one municipality. It nevertheless heard expressions of dissatisfaction with the management of the fund, primarily because the people did not know what sums had been invested in it and also because they felt that the payments of $15,000 per annum were insufficient. The Mission considered that a request which they made for periodic financial statements was a reasonable one.

It also suggested that careful consideration might be given to the possibility of exploiting the Babelthuap bauxite deposits, which have not hitherto been exploited.

The important commercial fishing industry conducted by the Japanese has not been restored by the indigenous inhabitants.

The Visiting Mission found substantial difficulties in the way of establishing such an industry, including: the lack by the indigenous inhabitants of the necessary temperament or the skills and techniques; the need for capital investments in ships and shore installations and for a highly competent and experienced foreign personnel to control and operate them; and the competition with other fisheries much nearer the world markets; and the general hazards connected with commercial fishing. The Mission considered that it would take many years of encouragement and training before the indigenous people could be prepared to play a dominant and effective role in deep-sea fishing.

The Administering Authority stated in its report that the transport facilities at the end of June 1952 compared favourably with those formerly provided under the Naval administration.

According to current plans, apart from the recent addition of a second large ship, the major change would be to replace the six existing district motor vessels with six auxiliary schooners. It was anticipated that these changes could enable twice the present number of administrative and trading visits to be made to outlying islands—previously visited every three months—at a cost less than half that of the motor vessels, and that the schooners could eventually be manned almost entirely by Micronesian crews. The Administration also hoped that commercial shipping might be induced to make regular calls within the Territory, thus obviating much of the high cost of the present necessity of transshipping cargoes at Guam. The Visiting Mission noted that an existing handicap was that, for security reasons, commercial shipping was restricted to United States flag vessels.

The Mission emphasized both the great difficulty and the importance of providing adequate communications. It felt that the facilities existing at the time of its visit were below the optimum level for efficient administration but was considerably impressed by the Administration's plans. It noted also with satisfaction that some progress, although not considerable, had been made in the past three years in encouraging indigenous shipping to enter trade within districts, especially in the Marshall district.

At its twelfth session, the Council commended the Administering Authority for its resolute approach to this problem and expressed the opinion that a satisfactory solution of the problem awaited only the securing of the full number of schooners required for the intra-district services.

The Territory continued to rely heavily upon contributions by the Administering Authority in the form of "appropriated funds" in order to meet its public expenditures. Local revenues totalled $346,326 in 1951 and $602,241 in 1952 and were estimated at $302,111 in 1953. The Visiting Mission noted that these figures included only general revenue and not that accruing from services and facilities provided by the Administration which, in 1952, brought the total local territorial revenue to $1,704,725. Expenditures, however, amounted to $7,557,109, $5,062,639 and $5,795,861 (estimated) in 1951, 1952 and 1953 respectively, the very large deficits being made up from specially and regularly appropriated funds.

The decline in expenditure from 1951 to 1952 was attributed by the Visiting Mission to the change in administration as the Department of the Interior, unlike the Navy, did not have at its disposal resources and funds in addition to those specifically appropriated by the Congress for the Trust Territory. It has thus been obliged to reduce staff and to curtail services and this, the Mission found, appeared to have had an adverse effect mainly in regard to transport facilities and building construction.

The chief local sources of revenue are various types of import and export taxes. Certain of these revenues, notably the tax on phosphates and, until 30 June 1952, the surpluses of the Island Trading Company, enter an economic conservation and welfare fund maintained as a separate account for the financing of economic projects. A head tax of $2 is levied by the municipalities from each male resident between the ages of 18 and 60 years for municipal expenditures, which are also financed by property and luxury and other taxes and fees. The Mission concluded that, owing to the low level of cash incomes, a more modern form of levy on income than the head tax would be impractical.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that sufficient budgetary appropriations would continue to be made available for the administration and development of the Territory so that the current level of public services could be maintained, especially educational services.

The Administering Authority reported that plans were under study to deal with the demands of the people of the Territory for reimbursement for Japanese yen held before the military occupation and for the settlement of Japanese postal savings and other types of claims. The Visiting Mission found that no conclusions had yet been reached, and that the problem was among those which were uppermost in the minds of the people.

A preliminary estimate secured by the Mission indicated that the amounts involved were approximately 3 million yen in currency and postal savings and 198,000 yen in contractual obligations, such as bonds, stocks and insurance.

A number of petitions (T/Pet.10/8, 13, 14, 15, 16) which the Mission transmitted to the Council, particularly from Ponape, contained complaints on this matter.

At its twelfth session, the Council supported the view of the Visiting Mission that, although the Administering Authority was not legally liable for these claims, some final action should be taken on them at the earliest opportunity. The Council noted that the Administering Authority was considering the types of claims which might be included in any special arrangements to be negotiated with Japan under the provisions of the Treaty of Peace and invited it to include in its next annual report an account of further progress in the matter.

With regard to the petition from representatives of the people of Saipan, the Council (resolution 848(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioners to the oral statement and observations of the Administering Authority (T/Obs.10/1), particularly:

(1) that it was currently giving consideration to the type of claims which might be included in the special arrangements to be negotiated with Japan on behalf of the residents of the Trust Territory;

(2) that it hoped that progress towards settling the question of the redemption of Japanese postal savings and bonds might be reported during the coming year, and

(3) that the Administering Authority was aware of the difficult situation resulting from the partial redemption of yen currency and hoped to find a satisfactory solution during the year.

The Council also expressed the hope that negotiations between the Administering Authority and Japan might result in an expeditious settlement of these questions within the coming year.

Concerning four petitions from persons in Ponape (T/Pet.13-16), the Council (resolutions 852-855(XII)) drew the petitioners' attention to the Administering Authority's observations (T/Obs.10/1) and to the above resolution (848(XII)).

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Visiting Mission found living conditions in the Territory to be generally good, because food was abundant and the essential needs of the people in such matters as medical and education services were provided by the Administration. In general, the people appeared well fed, healthy and happy.

New social legislation promulgated during the past year has been directed towards maintaining the established policy of fair employment in the government service; setting up new policies for pardoning or paroling of convicted persons; authorizing district administrators to perform marriage ceremonies; and governing residence.

The Visiting Mission learned that the Bikini people, who were removed from their island to make way for atomic fission tests and resettled on Kili in 1948, were gradually adjusting themselves to their new home, but that some difficulties still persisted and the Administration was studying the question of providing further assistance. The Council was subsequently informed that the Bikini people, since Kili is without a lagoon which they need for their fishing activities, now desired an island of the atoll type, and efforts were being made to find one and to determine whether the cost of a further move would be warranted. The Special Representative of the Administering Authority indicated that it was hoped to find a solution to the problems of the Bikini people before the next annual report was presented.

At its twelfth session, the Council noted with pleasure that, while certain problems remained of readjustment from the devastation of war, the living conditions of the inhabitants were generally good.

About 5,000 persons, less than one tenth of the population, are employed as wage-earners, some one third of them by the Administration itself and the remainder in small business enterprises, salvage operations, work for the military and private employment.

The Administration, during the period under examination, made a general review of classification and wages, aimed at correcting past inequities. The Mission found it to be the policy of the Administration to apply the principle of equal pay for equal work to all its employees regardless of race and to replace American personnel, wherever possible, by Micronesians. It received and transmitted to the Council a petition (T/Pet.10/16) in which the Chairman of the People's House of the Ponape Congress made a brief request that Ponapeans who had acquired skill in "foreign" jobs should be enabled to receive good wages. In amplifying its policy before the Council, the Administering Authority stated that salaries and wages paid to American officials were substantially higher than those paid to Micronesians in comparable positions. The Americans had to be paid at levels for which they would qualify in the United States; they had also had, in comparison with the Micronesians, long periods of training, and they carried out teaching and supervisory functions for which the Micronesians were not yet qualified. The Micronesians' wages were based, with their agreement, on other local incomes, particularly those of copra producers, so that the local economies should not be unduly disturbed and a wage structure not created which the Territory would be unable to support. The Administering Authority also stated that, since the establishment of new wage schedules in 1952, complaints about wages had subsided.

There were two labour disputes during 1951-52; a stoppage at Majuro and a walk-out of public works personnel at Palau. Settlements were reported to be based on the wage and classification survey mentioned above.

The Administering Authority stated that it had encouraged the entry of women into public life, and reported that the Marshallese Congress included five women and the Palau Congress two, while women had eagerly sought the chance for selection and training for the nursing and teaching services. The Visiting Mission observed that there appeared to be a noticeable improvement in the status accorded to women in some areas.

The Mission found at Koror a women's club whose members exercised an important voice in community affairs. This group asked (T/Pet.10/9) that women should be given a greater share in the formulation of local government policy, and asked, in particular, that women should be appointed as judges on the local courts. The Mission felt that due consideration should be given to this request. The Administering Authority informed the Council that there was no restriction on the participation of women in the courts, as in all other aspects of public life. The Council (resolution 849(XII)) expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would encourage in appropriate cases the election or appointment of women to the judiciary in Palau.

The Visiting Mission reported hearing at several places pressing requests that permission to enter the Territory should be granted to Japanese nationals married or otherwise related to citizens of the Trust Territory provided they renounced their Japanese nationality. It transmitted to the Trusteeship Council two petitions (T/Pet.10/11 and 12) on the subject.

The 1953 Mission reported that it had been informed that, in each case where a request to return to the Territory had been received from a Japanese, the Administration had forwarded it to the Department of the Navy for security clearance. Thus far, the Department had given only negative decisions and no permits for re-entry had been granted. The Administering Authority informed the Council that although the return en bloc of former Japanese or other foreign residents was undesirable for social and economic reasons, the Administration would be willing, subject to security clearance and favourable circumstances, to permit the return of Japanese spouses and children of mixed marriages.

The Council (resolution 851(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioner to this statement, as well as to the Administering Authority's statement that the petitioners' requests, as well as all other requests for repatriation, would be reviewed in the light of this policy, and decided, in the circumstances, that no recommendation was necessary.

The medical and health services were extended during the period under review. Expenditure on the services for the fiscal year 1952 totalled $648,368. New construction took place in the hospitals: a psychiatric unit at Saipan with two eight-bed wards for the Territory's mental cases, an addition to the Yap hospital, and a 20-bed tuberculosis ward at Ponape. The number of the more highly-trained personnel, both indigenous and non-indigenous, showed an increase. There were, for instance, seventeen non-indigenous medical and dental officers as against fourteen in the previous year, while the total of trained medical and dental Micronesian personnel increased from 37 in 1951 to 52 in 1952. Among the latter, the number of indigenous medical and dental practitioners and internes increased from fourteen to 22 and of graduate nurses from 23 to 30. In the lower categories, the number of Micronesian nurse aides increased from 43 to 92, while the number of health aides fell from 166 to 144. An event of the year was the award of a medical practitioner's license to the first Micronesian so trained under the present Administration.

As regards the training of new personnel, 50 students were studying medicine, dentistry and sanitation at the Central Medical School at Suva, Fiji; five students graduated from the X-ray school functioning on Saipan; and a school for nurses was established at Truk. The Visiting Mission, which noted with satisfaction the rapid increase in the number of trained Micronesians and the increasing replacement of American personnel, learned that in three years' time, when eighteen indigenous dental practitioners would have finished internships, it was planned to turn over all the dental work of the Territory to them under the direction of one American supervising dentist.

The Mission felt that the Administering Authority was to be commended for the provision of the health services, which were contributing much to the welfare of the inhabitants and which appeared to have won their full approval. It reported a marked improvement in the standard of health, which had been generally poor at the end of the war. It noted that the formerly widespread disease of yaws had been greatly reduced by highly successful treatment with penicillin, and that the most pernicious diseases at present appeared to be tuberculosis and leprosy, for which improved services were planned. The Mission found that an existing problem was to devise means of improving the provision of medical services to outlying islands, and that the situation would be improved by current plans to increase the frequency of multi-purpose administrative field trips and to establish radio equipment on remote islands, and by the acquisition of a schooner equipped with medical apparatus.

In the field of research in tropical diseases, the Administering Authority informed the Council of the start of a controlled pilot study on the island of Saipan of the use of a new drug (isonicotinic acid hydrazine) in tuberculosis treatment, and the continuation of an extensive investigation of the problem of filariasis.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council noted with satisfaction the further successful efforts of the Administering Authority to train indigenous medical and health personnel and to entrust them with increasingly higher responsibilities.

The Council shared the view of the Visiting Mission that the provision of medical services to the inhabitants of the outlying islands should be improved, and expressed the hope that this might be achieved by the present plans of the Administering Authority for better and more frequent means of transportation within the districts.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Approximately 90 per cent of the children of school age (normally eight to fourteen years) are, according to an estimate of the Administering Authority, enrolled in the public elementary schools, of which there were 139 in 1952, ten new ones having been built during the year, and 142 at the time of the Mission's visit, with 5,767 pupils. The elementary schools are primarily the responsibility of the municipalities, subject to over-all supervision by the Department of Education. They are staffed entirely by indigenous teachers. Instruction is primarily in the local vernacular, with English taught as a secondary language.

The intermediate schools, of which there continue to be six in the public system (with 835 pupils at the time of the Mission's visit) and five conducted by the Catholic and Protestant missions (with 368 pupils), complete a nine-year course consisting of six years of elementary and three years of intermediate schooling. The public intermediate schools are established at the headquarters of each district, are supported entirely by the Administration, and are administered by American principals with teaching staffs composed of about half American and half Micronesian teachers. English is the predominant language used. Entry is gained by various means of selection by a scholarship committee in each district. The Administration furnishes scholarships (505 in 1952) covering subsistence and costs of incidental requirements.

The one higher school, now known as the Pacific Islands Central School, was organized in order to offer four different fields of study, carrying the students two years beyond the intermediate level: namely, teacher education, general education, radio communications and agriculture. It has subsequently been reorganized on the basis of a general education curriculum. The Visiting Mission found the principal emphasis to be towards teacher training and preprofessional education. The school had at that time 135 students, selected from among the best graduates of the public intermediate schools. It has an American principal and five American teachers.

The Administering Authority reported that the entire educational programme of the Territory had been re-examined to ascertain its suitability to the needs and conditions of the people. In the elementary schools the curriculum had been reduced to the social studies and the correlation of English, science, health and hygiene with the experience and surroundings of the Micronesian people. In addition, such activities had been added as cultivation of crops, woodworking, handicrafts, fishing, and basic arithmetic. The curriculum of the intermediate schools had been devised as an extension of those subjects, while the Central School afforded training in them in addition to the specialized fields of teaching, agriculture and radio communications.

The Mission stated that it was favourably impressed by the development of the educational programme from a formal academic curriculum towards a functional programme in which teaching was directed primarily towards preparing students to assume an active role in community life.

Above the elementary level, the Mission felt that the high element of selectivity in the apportionment of vacancies in the intermediate schools and the Pacific Islands Central School was undoubtedly to be regretted, and that facilities at these levels should be expanded wherever possible. The Mission also felt that, in so far as resources permitted, attention should be given to the improvement of school buildings, which were not always adequate at the elementary schools visited by the Mission.

At its twelfth session, the Council noted with interest and satisfaction the reorganization of the educational programme of the Territory in order to broaden and otherwise adapt it more adequately to the particular needs of the inhabitants, and joined the Visiting Mission and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in approving this practical approach to the problem of education in the Territory.

The biggest problem of education in the Trust Territory, in the view of the Administering Authority, is the education of teachers themselves. There are still approximately 50 teachers, out of the total of 301 in all the public schools, who have not been educated beyond the five-year elementary schools of the former Japanese administration or the present six-year elementary schools.

The Administering Authority reported that greater effort was being made to provide in-service education of the teachers by employing a teacher trainer in each district. Students at the Central School would be selected as teachers while undertaking the general education course, and go back to their districts for a year of specialized education for teaching. An eight-week summer school programme is held each summer in each district for all indigenous teachers, and there have been additional programmes in Palau.

The Visiting Mission described as urgent the need to increase the numbers and qualifications of indigenous teachers. It remarked also that the fact that the elementary teachers' salaries were paid out of local municipal revenues meant that their salaries varied considerably according to the wealth of the community, and that in some cases lack of funds might be a factor affecting the amount of education provided. Subsidies paid to municipalities for this purpose increased to $9,090 in 1951, but the amount in the following year was $3,300. Micronesian teachers' salaries varied from $90 to $1,020 a year.

At its twelfth session, the Council, noting that the need to increase the numbers and qualifications of indigenous teachers constituted the most urgent problem in the educational field, welcomed the plans of the Administering Authority to provide more extensive in-service training for teachers in addition to the regular summer training courses.

There are at present no facilities within the Territory for advanced education and training beyond those provided at the Pacific Islands Central School and by apprentice training in the Administration. The Administering Authority has, however, sent medical and dental students to Fiji and also student nurses to Guam for training. In 1952, a total of 101 other students were attending schools outside the Trust Territory.

The Visiting Mission described as one of the principal problems the difficulty which graduates of the Territory's Central School faced in obtaining scholarships for advanced training overseas, including those under the United Nations technical assistance programme, due to the fact that the Central School did not as yet provide education up to the level of a senior secondary school. Consideration should be given, it felt, by both the Administering Authority and scholarship granting organizations to special provisions which would enable outstanding graduates of the school to bridge this gap. The Administering Authority commented that experience had suggested that the most practicable solution would be for the students to attend for one year at high schools in Hawaii or elsewhere before entering the universities.

F. CONDITIONS IN SOMALILAND UNDER ITALIAN ADMINISTRATION

During its twelfth session, held from 16 June to 21 July 1953, the Trusteeship Council examined the Administering Authority's annual report, for the year ending 1952, on the Trust Territory of Somaliland.⁴⁹ The Council also examined individually 119 petitions concerning the Territory.⁵⁰ In examining the annual report and petitions, the Council took into consideration the report of the Advisory Council for Somaliland for the year ending 31 March 1953 (T/1048) and the observations of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) on the annual report (T/1062 & Add.1) and on the draft five-year plan for educational development in Somaliland (T/1061 & Add.1).

A brief description of the conditions in the Trust Territory of Somaliland is given below, together with summaries of the conclusions and recommendations of the Council in connexion with its examination of the annual report and of petitions of a general nature. The General Assembly, at its eighth session, also considered the question during its examination of the annual report of the Trusteeship Council (A/2427).

The Territory consists of approximately 500,000 square kilometres. According to the annual report⁵¹ of the Administering Authority, its estimated population at the end of 1952 numbered 1,275,584 indigenous inhabitants, 23,000 Arabs and 1,000 Indians and Pakistanis; there were also 4,053 Italian residents, as compared with 4,744 at the end of 1951.

In its annual report for 1952, the Administering Authority stated that in view of the political development which had taken place it appeared that the time had arrived for the drafting of legislation defining the national status of the indigenous inhabitants and that a mixed committee of experts and representatives of the population might be established for this purpose.

The Council, at its twelfth session, was informed by the Special Representative of the Administering Authority that the question of the adoption of a national flag had been discussed in 1951 by the Reduced Committee of the Territorial Council, which considered that to a certain extent it was premature to discuss the matter at that time. However, it was stated, the Administrator of the Territory was favourably disposed to the early discussion and settlement of this question.

In its annual report for 1952, the Administering Authority stated that, despite the results achieved thus far in the political, social and economic fields, it was unable to formulate its development plans in their final form, particularly since the drafting of specific programmes would depend in large part on a thorough investigation of the economic aspect.

The representative of Italy informed the Council at its twelfth session that, assuming that progress in both the educational and political fields would maintain its current pace, there was ground for hoping that by the end of 1960 the minimum conditions required for an independent existence would be attained. On the other hand, the attainment of this objective was contingent on the substantial transformation of many aspects of the economic and social life of the Territory; this would be difficult in view of the time factor and considerations both of a material and psychological nature which the Administering Authority had yet to overcome.

The Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session noted the steps already taken by the Administering Authority in planning for the future independence of the Territory, particularly in the political and educational fields. It noted further that, as the time for the attainment of independence approached, the need for detailed plans in all fields in terms of a definite time schedule became urgent, and recommended that continued efforts be made by the Administering Authority to draw up and implement such plans.

The Council further suggested that henceforth the annual reports of the Administering Authority comment specifically on whether the rate of progress in training the Somalis for self-government was increasing rapidly enough in view of the objective of independence for Somaliland in 1960, and whether the Territory could maintain an adequate level of government services without continued outside aid.

1. United Nations Advisory Council

The United Nations Advisory Council,⁵² established under the Trusteeship Agreement to aid and advise the Administering Authority, reported (T/1048) on its activities during the year, 1 April 1952 to 31 March 1953. It stated that a total of 26 meetings had been held during the period and that it had replied to requests on the part of the Administration for advice on fourteen subjects.

The Advisory Council felt that its advice should have been sought on certain matters which were communicated to it for information only. Among these were a decree of the President of the Italian Republic defining the powers of the Administrator and of the fundamental organs of the Trusteeship Administration; ordinances establishing an Appeals Section at the Court of Assizes in the Territory, providing for the control of cotton cultivation, and covering private schools; and agreements between the Administering Authority and petroleum companies.

The Advisory Council stated that it had agreed with the Administering Authority on the majority of cases transmitted for its advice. In those cases where it had disagreed, its advice had been accepted, but in certain cases no action had as yet been taken by the Administering Authority on the advice given. With regard to those subjects transmitted for information, the Advisory Council stated that in the great majority of cases it had been in full agreement with the Administering Authority. In other instances, however, certain changes it had proposed had not yet been acted upon by the Administering Authority and in some cases administrative measures had been communicated to the Advisory Council only after having become law.

The Advisory Council reported that it would seek to reach an agreement with the Administering Authority as to which matters should be transmitted for advice and which for information only. Steps had already been taken to establish closer contact and to maintain a permanent liaison with the Administration.

The Advisory Council reported that it had continued to maintain contact with the population through conferences with individuals, groups and organizations as well as through field trips, and had continued to receive communications referring to conditions or problems in the Territory.

For its part, the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council that its relations with the Advisory Council had been marked by a close and cordial spirit of collaboration. The Special Representative of the Administering Authority had assured the members of the Advisory Council that the Administering Authority would be very happy to proceed to a friendly exchange of views concerning the provisions of article 8 of the Trusteeship Agreement, with the purpose of avoiding, in future, any doubts or misunderstandings.

The Trusteeship Council, noting with satisfaction the spirit of co-operation between the Advisory Council and the Administering Authority, and the atmosphere of harmony now existing within the Advisory Council, welcomed the measures taken and those contemplated to strengthen co-operation between the Advisory Council and the Administering Authority.

⁵² For members of the Council, see Appendix I.

2. Boundary between the Trust Territory and Ethiopia

The question of the provisional border between the Trust Territory and Ethiopia, which the 1951 Visiting Mission had described as an urgent matter and of which the Trusteeship Council at its eleventh session⁵³ had hoped for a satisfactory settlement by negotiation, was again raised at the Council's twelfth session.

Certain petitions and communications reiterated previous complaints in respect of the provisional boundary which, it was claimed, divided many Somali families and made certain water holes on the Ethiopian side inaccessible. One petition (T/Pet.11/338) contained requests, inter alia, for the return of grazing lands and water holes and on the posting of a medical officer at an out-station. Complaints (T/Com.11/L.11, L.36, T/Pet.-11/339) were also made of frequent raids across the frontier into the Trust Territory.

The Council in this connexion (resolutions 730 (XII), 731(XII), 752(XII)) reiterated the conclusion it had adopted at its eleventh session, concerning the question of the frontier with Ethiopia, in which it had expressed the hope that conversations between the Governments of Italy and Ethiopia would lead to a satisfactory settlement.

The Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council that conversations between the Ethiopian Government and itself had not progressed beyond the exploratory stage.

The Trusteeship Council, recalling its conclusions at its eleventh session, considered that the settlement of the boundary question remained an urgent matter in view of the objective of independence for Somaliland by 1960, noted that direct negotiations between the Governments of Italy and Ethiopia were continuing, and expressed the hope that a satisfactory settlement would be reached as quickly as possible.

3. Political Development

According to the annual report, there was no major change during 1952 in the structure of the administration, in which the Administrator, representing the Administering Authority, holds the executive and legislative powers. He administers the Territory through six Regional Commissioners and 28 Residents and with the assistance of a Secretary-General and seventeen administrative, financial and technical departments.

The role of the indigenous population in the administration of the Territory consists of representation on consultative bodies (the Territorial Council and Residency and Municipal Councils); the exercise by tribal chiefs of responsibilities for tribal matters; and employment in the administrative services, at present mainly on the lower levels, the Administering Authority reported.

During 1952, the number of political parties which the Administering Authority considered as active increased by two to a total of eight, the new groups being the Lega Nazionale Somala and the Lega Democratica Somala. The Somali Youth League was said by the Administering Authority to comprise 12,000 members and to continue to favour a rapid and radical change of the structure of the Territory, in particular the abolition of traditional institutions. The other active parties were estimated by the Administering Authority to include some 30,000 members and were said to favour a more gradual development and replacement of traditional institutions.

At its eleventh session, the Trusteeship Council had endorsed the view of the 1951 Visiting Mission that much of the political party activity lacked direction and purpose and had urged the Administering Authority to put into effect as soon as possible a new law concerning the establishment of political parties.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council considered a number of petitions and communications from branches or individual members of the Somali Youth League charging the Administration with misrule, ill-treatment and discrimination against and persecution of League members or persons affiliated with it.⁵⁴

Charges were made by the League that the Administration favoured and employed only members of pro-Italian parties, principally those of the Lega Progressista Somala.⁵⁵ The Administering Authority (T/Obs.11/3) replied that no person had been deprived of work for not joining the Lega Progressista Somala, and that no discriminatory practices existed. These observations were drawn to the attention of petitioners by the Trusteeship Council in resolutions 666(XII), 676(XII), 724(XII) and 753(XII).

In certain cases,⁵⁶ the Council⁵⁷ noted a statement by the Special Representative of the Administering Authority that there had been a considerable improvement in relations between the League and the Administration during recent months.

Charges of a similar nature were also made by a number of persons, members of political organizations other than the Somali Youth League who claimed that they had been threatened by the Administration with dismissal from their jobs unless they changed their party affiliation (T/Com.11/L.59; T/Pet.11/265, 335). The Administering Authority denied all such allegations of ill-treatment, persecution or discriminatory practices (T/Obs.11/7 & 17). The Council (resolutions 680(XII) & 727(XII)) drew the petitioners' attention to these observations.

On the other hand, petitions⁵⁸ emanating from various branches of four other political parties, the Hisbia Dighil and Mirifle, the Lega Progressista Somala, the Unione Africana della Somalia and the Unione Nazionale Somala, deplored the activities of the Somali Youth League and expressed solidarity with respect to an incident at Chisimaio when participants in a political demonstration had attacked a group of police.⁵⁹ Similar views were expressed by a number of persons or groups not identified with any particular political party.⁶⁰

With respect to these petitions, the Trusteeship Council (resolution 691(XII)) expressed profound regret over the incident, noted with satisfaction the statements by the Administering Authority that it had never considered suppressing any political party in the Territory and expressed the hope that the various political organizations would endeavour to maintain a harmonious relationship among themselves and with the Administering Authority.

In the course of the hearing of petitioners from the Territory, at the 465th meeting of the Trusteeship Council, the representative of the Somali Youth League, referring to complaints of political persecution against members of the League, stated that he had been informed that in recent months the political temperature of the Territory had dropped considerably and that relations between the Italian Administration and the Somali Youth League had improved.

At the twelfth session of the Council, the representative of Italy stated that, in order to carry out a far-reaching programme of development in the short period which remained, the Administering Authority must be able to rely upon the co-operation of the indigenous inhabitants. Fortunately, this co-operation existed in a very large measure and was a hopeful sign for the future. It would be more completely established if and when a handful of fanatical elements, evidently still swayed by the violent propaganda of past years, would refrain from irresponsible acts. The latest serious manifestation of lawlessness on the part of these elements had been the brutal assassination of a member of the Territorial Council, one of the best men in the Territory. This, however, did not affect the peaceful conditions which prevailed and he expressed the hope that the moral condemnation expressed in all quarters might induce those few individuals to desist from activities which were so damaging to their country.

The Trusteeship Council considered that the effectiveness of the Government of the independent State of Somaliland would depend largely on the constructive activities of the political parties from which would come the nucleus of the civil service and the Government. It noted that there had been a reduction of political tensions in the Territory and that relations among the political parties and between the parties and the Administering Authority had notably improved, urged the constructive co-operation of all political parties in achieving the objectives of the Trusteeship Agreement, and expressed the hope that the political parties and the Administering Authority would henceforth surmount together the many, difficult obstacles that remained to be overcome before the Territory could hope to stand by itself.

The Trusteeship Council noted the repeated assurances given by the Administering Authority concerning its determination to maintain the free activity of political groups in the Territory, and welcomed the increased representation given to political parties in the Territorial Council which, it said, should have the effect of increasing the concern of political parties with the many pressing problems which had to be faced.

The powers of the Territorial Council, the Administering Authority stated, had not been changed since the Trusteeship Council last examined conditions in the Territory⁶¹ but its numbers had been further increased to augment the representation of political parties.

Out of its 44 members, 21 are regional representatives who, the Administering Authority stated, are designated by secret ballot. Eleven others are representatives of political parties, seats being assigned to each of five parties in direct relation to the number of its branches; the nominations are made by the Administrator from lists containing twice as many names as the number of seats to be filled. Eight members are representatives of economic groups, one represents cultural groups, and there is one representative each of the Italian, Arab, Indian and Pakistani communities.

The Trusteeship Council, at its eleventh session, had recommended that the Administering Authority should proceed with its plans to hold direct elections in the towns and villages for members of the Territorial Council and also of the Municipal Councils and the Administering Authority reported that a decree had been issued increasing to a total of eighteen the number of seats allocated to political parties. The Special Representative of the Administering Authority also informed the Council at its twelfth session that an electoral law was being drafted.

As to the powers of the Territorial Council, both the Trusteeship Council and the 1951 Visiting Mission had emphasized the need for an early and progressive grant of legislative powers in order that the population might have the maximum period of experience in the operation of legislative systems during the short period of Trusteeship. The Trusteeship Council and the Mission also urged the development of the use of functional committees in the Territorial Council. One such committee, established by the Administering Authority in 1952, was to be replaced in 1953 by two committees, one concerned with economic and financial matters, the other with social and political matters. The election by members of the Territorial Council of two vice-presidents, who would alternate as presiding officers, was also to be initiated in 1953. These two measures were endorsed by the Advisory Council (T/1048) and were noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session. The Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the committee system would be further developed as rapidly as practicable, and urged the Administering Authority to take steps to grant progressively broader legislative powers to the Territorial Council.

Dissatisfaction with the method of nomination to the Territorial Council was brought to the attention of the Trusteeship Council in a petition (T/Pet.11/267) in which it was claimed that the two representatives of Mudugh in the Territorial Council had been nominated because of their membership in the Lega Progressista Somala. Other petitioners (T/Pet.11/279), however, supported the view of the Administering Authority (T/Obs.11/6) to the effect that these two representatives had been freely elected. In the circumstances, the Council considered (resolution 681(XII)) that no recommendation was necessary.

Approximately one half of the members of the Residency Councils in 1952 were chiefs, about one third were notables and one sixth were representatives of political parties. Each of the 28 Councils is convened by the Resident concerned and may express its opinions on all matters affecting the interests of the district.

The Municipal Councils, which form part of the municipal administrations, increased by two to a total of 35 during the year. They have an advisory relationship to the Residents, who are responsible for the administration of municipal services, and members are for the most part designated by the Residency Councils.

The Trusteeship Council had previously, in welcoming the establishment of these bodies, attached importance to increasing the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in them and to constantly extending their powers and competence.

The Administering Authority stated that, following the establishment of a census and civil registry system in each municipality in 1953, members of the Municipal Councils would be elected by direct suffrage.

As regards the indigenous political structure, one communication before the Council at its twelfth session was concerned with the alleged abuse of powers by the local chiefs (T/Com.11/L.38), while two petitions contained complaints against existing procedures governing the election or recall of chiefs (T/Pet.11/265, 328 & Add.1).

The Council (resolutions 680(XII) & 720(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioners to the observations and statements of the Administering Authority. In the first case, it called attention to the statement that the persons concerned did not constitute a sufficiently large proportion of the tribe to justify the convening of a shir, and in the second case it stated that it considered that in the circumstances no recommendation by the Council was called for.

⁶¹ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 624-25.

The Trusteeship Council had recognized in the course of past sessions the urgent nature of the task of ensuring that, within the relatively short period before the Territory achieves independence, a sufficient number of Somalis would be trained and otherwise equipped to occupy the responsible posts in the civil service.

Information before the Council at its twelfth session showed that, at the end of 1952, of a total of 4,921 persons in the service of the Administration, 4,082 were Somalis, 819 were Italians and 25 represented other nationalities. This indicated an increase of 352 Somalis and 69 Italians over the previous year. The increase in Italian personnel was attributed to the influx of teachers, doctors, agronomists and other technicians. Eleven Somalis had also been commissioned as officers in the Security Corps, several had been appointed section chiefs in the departments of the Administration, one had been designated Vice-Resident of Afgoi, and nine had been appointed heads of police posts. Somali Residents had been assigned to the communities of Dinsor and Uanle Uen and other selections and appointments of indigenous Residents were being made. During 1953, the Administering Authority intended to appoint Somalis to a number of positions of considerable responsibility.

The Trusteeship Council examined a number of petitions which contained complaints of arbitrary dismissals from the police force and other branches of the public service.⁶² The Administering Authority, however, contended that these dismissals were justified and the Council decided that no action was necessary in the circumstances.⁶³

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council at its twelfth session that the possibility of entrusting at least one of the Commissariats to indigenous administrators several years before 1960 was being considered.

The Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session noted that Somalis had been designated as vice-chairmen and as secretaries of the Territorial Council, as Residents and Vice-Residents, and as officers in the Security Corps; that over one half of the police posts of the Territory were entrusted to Somalis; and that the number of Somalis in the administrative services increased by 352 during 1952. It expressed the hope that this process of Somalization of the government would be intensified to the extent compatible with the efficiency of the services.

The Administering Authority stated in its annual report for 1952 that, in order to ensure the full independence of the judiciary, as previously recommended by the Council, new legislation would provide for Commissariat judges who would exercise the judicial functions previously carried out by Regional Commissioners and Residents. In presenting its advice on the draft law establishing Commissariat judges, the Advisory Council, by a majority of two votes to one, recommended, inter alia, the deletion of a provision reserving to the Regional Commissioners the chairmanship of the Regional Courts, which apply collective sanctions, on the ground that this was contrary to the principle of the absolute independence of the judiciary. The Administering Authority reported that, beginning in 1953, the Commissariat judges would replace the Commissioners in this role.

The Trusteeship Council noted the steps taken by the Administering Authority to separate further the judicial and administrative functions and expressed the hope that steps would be taken to complete this separation as rapidly as possible.

In regard to the period of detention before trial, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council at its twelfth session that, with the appointment of six judges to the Commissariats and the creation of a Court of Appeal for the judgments of the Court of Assizes, trials followed a far more rapid course and only in a very few instances, in which the gathering of evidence required a considerable period of investigation, were persons detained for the maximum period of detention allowed under the new law.

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council was informed that, under a new law adopted during 1952, the sentencing of persons to imprisonment without trial had been abolished, but the procedure had been retained for the imposition of fines not exceeding 400 somalos. The Advisory Council endorsed the abolition of imprisonment under this system and recommended that the imposition of fines without trial should also be abolished. The Administering Authority replied that it could not abolish fines by penal decree but that the matter would be reviewed when the new judicial regulations came into force; in the meantime, a person sentenced to such a fine could always appeal to a higher court.

The Trusteeship Council learned that a draft law abolishing capital punishment had been examined during the period under review. Both the Advisory Council and the Territorial Council expressed themselves in favour of the retention of this punishment, and the Administering Authority therefore postponed further action pending the consideration of the new judicial regulations.

The Trusteeship Council was informed also that the new judicial regulations, which had been presented to the Advisory Council and to the Territorial Council for their advice, were being re-examined and that new texts would be submitted. A Court of Appeal was established in 1952 and a law establishing a Supreme Court in the Territory was promulgated.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council that, with the impending establishment of the Supreme Court, the Territory would have all degrees of justice, including a Supreme Administrative Court.

In connexion with the administration of justice, the Somali Youth League reiterated earlier complaints that its members were subjected to arbitrary arrest, both mass and individual, alleging that numerous individuals had been held by the authorities without proper charges being made against them and had frequently suffered long periods of detention pending trial by the courts; that severe sentences had been imposed; and that prisoners had been subjected to ill-treatment.⁶⁴ The Administering Authority denied these allegations.⁶⁵

The Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session noted the steps thus far taken to reduce the period of detention before trial, that a Court of Appeals had been set up, that a Supreme Court had been provided for by law and that judicial regulations were being drafted, and it expressed the hope that the Supreme Court would soon begin to function and that the judicial regulations would be completed as soon as possible.

The Council also noted that collective sanctions were still applied in inter-tribal disputes and expressed the hope that they would be replaced as rapidly as practicable by other penalties based on the concept of individual responsibility.

The Administering Authority reported that the Somaliland Police Corps comprised 1,951 members, all Somalis. During the year under review, it stated, the number of Italian carabinieri was reduced from 363 to 297 as Somali replacements became available. A group of eight Somalis was undergoing advanced training in Italy and Somali non-commissioned officers had been placed in charge of 34 of the 64 police posts. As in the previous year, the number of Residency police, known as llalos, was 1,500.

The military forces comprised 759 Italian and 2,794 Somali personnel at the end of 1952, representing a reduction of 349 Italians and 326 Somalis. Eleven Somalis were commissioned as officers and 160 Italian specialists were replaced by Somalis.

As in 1950, armed conflict between various groups, notably the Saad and Soliman sub-divisions of the Averghidir tribe, the Averghidir and Merehan, and the Ghelidle and Dabarre, resulted in the loss of lives and of cattle. These incidents were attributed by the Administering Authority to the traditional animosity existing between certain groups, to inadequate water supplies and pasturage during periods of drought and to the fact that the provisional status of a sector of the frontier tended to debar certain groups from access to wells and pasture. The Administering Authority enumerated a series of steps which were being taken in an effort to solve this problem. These were the establishment of mobile police detachments and frontier posts and the improvement of their weapons, the encouragement of groups living along the frontier to enter into agreements with those across the line, the establishment of regulations governing transhumance and the use of water holes, and of neutral zones between groups most frequently in conflict, and the peaceful settlement of outstanding disputes.

Certain of these incidents were the subject of complaints placed before the Trusteeship Council.⁶⁶ In particular, the Somali Youth League branch of Galcaio alleged that, in the series of incidents between the Saad and Soliman groups, 127 persons had been killed between February and June of 1952, many of the wounded had died, and thousands of head of livestock had been lost (T/Pet.11/289/Add.1). The Administering Authority explained (T/Obs.11/4) that the Saad-Soliman incidents resulted from insufficient water and grazing during a period of drought as well as from the traditional enmity of the two groups. After efforts at conciliation had failed, and following an outbreak of hostilities in which 99 persons were killed, the Administering Authority had felt compelled to dismiss certain chiefs, to seize 2,000 camels from the Soliman and 1,500 from the Saad, and to establish police control over disputed water holes. After prolonged negotiations the Chiefs of the two groups signed a truce. Damages and compensation were to be assessed upon the completion of penal proceedings.

The Trusteeship Council (resolution 699 (XII)) drew the attention of the petitioners to the Administering Authority's observations, noted in particular the Administering Authority's statement that, due to tension in the area, it had been necessary to detain a few persons briefly to prevent an incident similar to that of Chisimaio, noted the duty of the Administering Authority to maintain law and order, and expressed the hope that relations with the Somali Youth League would continue to improve.

A serious incident of a different kind occurred at Chisimaio in August when participants in a political demonstration attacked a group of police, killing three and injuring eleven. The incident led to a complaint by the President of the Somali Youth League that over a thousand persons, including women and children, had been arrested and deprived of food for several days, that some had died of starvation and that at least one had been shot dead by the police (T/Pet.11/298 & Add.1).

In its observations on this petition (T/Obs.11/9), the Administering Authority described the incident as an outgrowth of a policy of intimidation on the part of the local branch of the Somali Youth League by which it had unsuccessfully sought to block the development of other political parties in the area. The rapid growth of other parties had led to strenuous and open opposition to the authorities by the League and a series of unfounded accusations and charges of persecution had been made against the Administering Authority with the intention of causing serious incidents for which the local authorities could afterwards be blamed. On the day of the incident, the Administration had disallowed a request by the League to stage a protest demonstration against the local authorities on the occasion of the visit of the Acting Administrator; the police had been attacked when they sought to disperse a crowd gathered near the League's headquarters, but they had used no weapons and no injuries were recorded amongst the aggressors. As a result of the investigation 118 persons were held for trial.

The Trusteeship Council (resolution 705 (XII)), inter alia, urged the Administering Authority to bring the accused to trial without delay in order that the harmonious relations existing between the parties would not be endangered. Certain petitions referring to the Chisimaio incident contained complaints against the Somali Youth League and requested that the activities of the League be stopped.⁶⁷

Another petition contained an allegation that 50 persons had been wounded in an incident at Bender Beila in February (T/Pet.11/250). In its observations (T/Obs.11/4), the Administering Authority stated that an armed crowd had attempted to unload several dhows without proper authorization and that when ordered to desist they had attacked the police, eight of whom had been injured. The police had eventually been forced to repel the attack by firing at the crowd, and three persons had been injured. In the investigation which followed 20 persons had been arrested and held for trial.

The Trusteeship Council (resolution 670 (XII)) expressed regret at the incident. Recognizing the paramount duty of the Administering Authority to maintain law and order, it hoped relations between the Administering Authority and the Somali Youth League would continue to improve.

In another petition (T/Pet.11/273), it was stated that, following an attempt on the life of the leader of the Unione Africana della Somalia, about 3,000 Somalis had been rounded up and detained for questioning. Those refusing to give their tribal affiliation were alleged to have been subjected to corporal punishment and humiliation. In its observations (T/Obs.11/7), the Administering Authority stated that the attack, as well as another made on a member of the Territorial Council, had produced panic and concern among the residents of Mogadiscio and that 234 persons had been detained overnight. Of these, 50 had been repatriated to their places of origin, and three had been detained on a charge of attempted homicide but had subsequently been found not guilty and released. It was further stated that those detained had not been subjected to ill-treatment or violence.

The Council, inter alia, urged (resolution 685 (XII)) the Administering Authority to continue to exercise the utmost circumspection in the arrest and detention of suspected offenders and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would make every effort to reduce the period between arrest and trial.

4. Economic Development

The known economic resources of the Territory are meagre. It is estimated that 90 per cent of the population is engaged in pastoral and agricultural activities within the traditional subsistence framework. Production for export is limited, the main products being bananas, hides and cotton. Almost no industrial development has taken place.

The Administering Authority had previously proposed to the Council that the economic advancement of the Territory would depend to a considerable extent on assistance from international financial organizations. In this connexion, the Council had expressed the view that the investment of capital in the Territory would be encouraged if a general plan for economic development were elaborated by the Administering Authority, taking into consideration the report of the United Nations Technical Assistance Mission which visited the Territory in 1951, and asked the Administering Authority to draw up such a plan.

The representative of Italy informed the Council at its twelfth session that, as soon as the report of the Technical Assistance Mission was received, the Government of Italy had assigned a leading expert in economic and financial matters to draft a general plan for the development of the Territory's resources. Hence, the Administering Authority would soon be in a position to evaluate more exactly the effective possibilities of improving substantially the economic conditions of the Territory, with the aid of international technical and financial organizations.

The Trusteeship Council expressed the opinion that the economic deficiencies of the Territory and the problems arising in connexion with economic development presented serious obstacles to the achievement of economic viability for the future independent State, and considered that it was essential that all economic resources and possibilities be carefully reviewed in the light of the conclusions and findings of the United Nations Technical Assistance Mission.

The Council noted the steps taken thus far by the Administering Authority to draw up an economic plan for the Territory, based on the report of the United Nations Technical Assistance Mission. It urged the Administering Authority to complete the elaboration of a comprehensive economic plan as a matter of highest priority, taking into account the recommendations of the Technical Assistance Mission, particularly with reference to the future needs of the Territory as an independent State, and requested the Administering Authority to report specifically on the plan and its implementation.

Several petitions before the Council raised questions bearing on economic advancement in the Territory. Complaints were voiced that the Administering Authority had not effected improvements in the economic field and that it had failed to provide financial assistance in order that living standards might be raised (T/Pet.11/256). The Council (resolution 672(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioners to the Administering Authority's observations (T/Obs.11/7) on the subject. It invited the Secretary-General to send the petitioners a copy of its latest recommendations concerning the Territory's economic and financial problems.

The Council was informed by the Administering Authority that the over-all receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year 1951-1952 were respectively 36.2 and 65.7 million somalos,⁶⁸ leaving an actual deficit of 29.5 million somalos, which was equivalent to 44.9 per cent of the total expenditure. As compared to 1950-1951, this represented an increase in revenue of 3.9 million somalos and a reduction of 3.7 million somalos in the deficit.

The increased revenue, the Administering Authority reported, was due in large part to the higher yields of customs duties and taxes on production, which exceeded those of the previous year by approximately 2 million somalos. Expenditure on civil personnel in all services rose from 30.1 to 33.4 million somalos, due in part to the increase of European staff in the fields of agriculture, public health and education.

The Administering Authority reported that it had covered the budget deficit of 1951-52 with a grant of 29.5 million somalos and envisaged granting 37.1 million somalos to cover the estimated deficit in 1952-53.

Military expenditures, which are outside the budget, were 39.2 million somalos in 1951-52, and a decrease to 28.5 million somalos was envisaged for the fiscal year 1952-53.

The Trusteeship Council, at its twelfth session, was informed that, in line with its earlier recommendation, a tax on all cultivated lands, previously tax-exempt, held by indigenous persons had been introduced. The tax varied between two and twelve somalos on each shamba. During 1952, certain additional taxes, earmarked for the use of the municipal administrations, were also imposed on exports and imports and on the manufacture and importation of sugar.

The Council, while noting that the revenues from the Territory during the year under review had increased substantially over the previous years, observed that nevertheless these constituted less than 40 per cent of the total budgetary requirements of the Territory, and reiterated its view that the only sound basis on which the independent State could be set up was one of self-support

The Council recalled the suggestion of the 1951 Visiting Mission that an initial study of the level of government services which the Territory could support from its own resources should be made no later than the date of the next visiting mission of the Council to the Territory, and requested the Administering Authority to make a preliminary investigation of this matter in preparation for the mission which is expected to visit the Territory in 1954.

Merchandise trade for the year 1952, the Administering Authority reported, showed an excess of imports over exports equivalent to 58.6 million somalos. Imports totalled 105.2 million somalos, representing an increase in value of more than 10 per cent over 1951; exports, totalling 46.6 million somalos, showed an increase of 55 per cent due, partially, to the fact that the successful cotton crop of 1951 was exported during 1952. The Administering Authority stated that, in terms of the real value of exports, the deficit was considerably lower. It informed the Council that certain difficulties were experienced by merchants during the year under review, largely as a result of the drop in price of cotton goods and of the decrease in purchasing power due to poor harvests and the feeble demand for raw cotton and hides. Nevertheless, an increasing number of Somalis, encouraged by the Administering Authority, were entering into the import-export trade, and steps had been taken to regulate the supply of cotton goods. Measures taken to increase the export trade and to stimulate trade with the dollar area included the relaxation of certain customs and exchange procedures.

The Council at its twelfth session expressed the hope that in further developing crops for export the Administering Authority would exercise caution in order that the production of food crops would be sufficient to meet the needs of the people of the Territory.

The 1951 Visiting Mission had been of the opinion that the road situation presented a serious obstacle to economic development and had suggested that the Administering Authority should study the possibility of establishing a regular coastal shipping service between the ports of the Territory. The Territory depended to a considerable extent on dhow traffic for transport between the different zones. An Italian firm was, however, expected to put into service a 600-ton ship, the Administering Authority reported, which would maintain service between the ports of the Territory and Aden and Mombasa.

Complaints were made about the state of roads and the inadequacy of communications in a number of petitions and communications before the Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session (T/Com.11/L.3, L.11; T/Pet.11/307 & Add.1, 340, 346; T/Pet.11/L.3, L.4). In its observation on two of these petitions, the Administering Authority stated that the roads had been repaired and were open to traffic (T/Obs.11/18). With respect to certain of these petitions, the Council (resolution 737(XII)) decided to inform the petitioners that the general questions of communications had been and would continue to be examined by the Council in connexion with its annual examination of conditions in the Territory. In the circumstances, no particular recommendation by the Council was considered necessary.

Under customary law, individual rights over land are limited and are based on the individual's membership in a community. In accordance with the pre-war legislation still in force, all lands occupied by indigenous groups are regarded as not disposable by the Administering Authority. Under the colonial regime before the Second World War, commissions were established to determine which lands not directly occupied or exploited were disposable for settlement.

In 1952, as in 1951, non-indigenous holdings were as follows: Arabs, 1,500 hectares; Indians, 5 hectares, and Italians, 72,842 hectares. The Administering Authority reported that no requests for concessions of land were considered during 1952, pending the drafting of new legislation by a committee comprising six officers of the Administration, two members of the Territorial Council and six Somalis designated by regional assemblies. A warning had also been issued to settlers who had entered into agreements with indigenous persons for the cultivation of their lands, to the effect that, lacking any legal rights over these lands, they incurred the risk of being dispossessed.

Some of the petitions before the Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session dealt with several aspects of the land question. One group requested that a survey should be made in order to determine what land was reserved for Italian farmers, and what land was available for Somalis. Although they indicated that they would not raise any objection to the continued occupation by Italian farmers of land of which they were legally possessed, they considered that many of these settlers had acquired lands which could be useful to the population (T/Com.11/L.38).

Specific complaints of disputed ownership of land and of land alienation were also made,⁶⁹ and in some instances it was asserted that the Administration had placed obstacles in the way when redress before the local authorities and the United Nations had been sought. With respect to these complaints, the Administering Authority explained (T/Obs.11/8, 10) that land disputes had arisen as a result of concessions which had been granted to settlers by the Italian Colonial Administration prior to 1941, and that, in some cases at least, settlers had stated recently that any Somali wishing to cultivate within the boundaries of concessions might do so undisturbed, within the limits set by the work and development programmes of the estates.

The Council drew the attention of the petitioners to these observations (resolutions 678(XII), 689(XII) and 698(XII)).

The Trusteeship Council noted that no new concessions of land had been considered during 1952, and noted with satisfaction the initiative taken by the Administering Authority in drafting land legislation and that the committee entrusted with this task included members of the Territorial Council and other Somalis.

On three petitions (T/Pet.11/259, 260, 274) relating to disputes between the Società Agricola Italo-Somala and members of the Walamoi and Sagalo tribes—disputes which had been before the Trusteeship Council at its eleventh session (T/Pet.11/65 & Addenda, 242)—the Council noted that a mutually satisfactory agreement had been entered into during August 1952, noted the assistance given by the Administering Authority and the Società Agricola Italo-Somala to the Walamoi and Sagalo people for the creation and encouragement of agricultural co-operative societies and expressed the hope that such assistance would continue to be given.

Eight petitions emanated from ex-servicemen of the former Colonial Administration. On seven⁷⁰ of them—of which the author of one sought restitution for sequestered property, and the authors of the others claimed arrears of military pay—the Council decided that no recommendation by it was necessary. On the eighth (T/Pet.11/283 & Add.1)—of which the author claimed restitution for war damage sustained during the Second World War—the Council, recalling its resolution 545(XI), expressed the hope (resolution 692(XII)) that the Administering Authority would arrange as soon as possible to deal with all claims for war damage.

The main wealth of the Territory is in the form of livestock, principally camels, cattle, sheep and goats. Agriculture is generally restricted to the vicinity of the rivers, certain coastal districts and the dry-farming area between the Giuba and Uebi Scebeli Rivers. The principal crops are sorghum, maize, beans, peanuts, bananas, sesame, sugar cane and cotton.

Frequent droughts are characteristic of the Territory. Abnormally dry weather had resulted in poor harvests throughout 1952 for indigenous farmers and crops such as cotton, sesame and grains had been seriously affected. Production of sorghum declined from 450,000 quintals in the previous year to 90,000 quintals, that of maize from 280,000 quintals to 80,000 quintals, sesame from 20,000 quintals to 13,000 quintals, and cotton from 18,000 quintals to 1,800 quintals. The production of bananas, on the other hand, increased from 400,000 quintals to 600,000 quintals. According to the Administering Authority, the effects of the drought would have been serious had there not been sufficient grain in storage. These supplies, held by merchants, the Administration and Somali farmers, were released on the market and were sufficient to meet the need and prevented an increase in prices. The shortage was also eased by the cultivation of grain on the irrigated lands of Italian farmers.

The Administering Authority reported that it was continuing its programme of building up stocks of grains and that plans had been drafted for large storage facilities in the producing centres. At the beginning of 1952, the reserves held by the Administration amounted to some 8,000 quintals of maize as against 15,000 quintals in 1951. An increase of storage capacity to 50,000 quintals was envisaged.

The Administering Authority had also continued to assist Somalis in the establishment of agricultural co-operatives, of which eleven were added in 1952 to the four already in existence. By the end of the year, 11 per cent, or 945 hectares, of the total area of these co-operatives was irrigable and cultivated. The Administration's expenditure in this field in 1952 was 750,000 somalos. Assistance had also been furnished to three groups of farmers to construct ditches for the controlled inundation of their individually cultivated lands, which totalled 800 hectares, and the Administering Authority was studying the problem of mechanizing indigenous farming in connexion with these developments. Experience had shown, however, that extensive use of machinery was not feasible and that, at the present stage, efforts should be limited to the use of heavy equipment in clearing land and in the construction of ditches and catchment basins.

The Administering Authority planned to establish 50 more co-operatives along the Uebi Scebeli River, and considered that this step might double agricultural production among the 60,000 inhabitants of the area.

Along the Giuba River, 20 more schemes for the controlled flooding of 5,400 hectares of farm land to aid 6,000 families were envisaged. In the dry farming area centring on Baidoa, two pilot projects which would affect 10,000 families had been set up to assist and encourage the population to construct catchment basins, use draught animals in farming, and construct storage bins and other facilities.

In relation to the system of co-participation, a form of co-operation between European settlers and indigenous farmers for the growing and marketing of cotton, a decree regulating the system was enacted during the year. In considering this legislation, the Advisory Council had recommended, inter alia, that the system should be modified so as to encourage the growth of a class of indigenous farmers with greater economic independence; in this connexion, it had suggested that certain clauses in the co-participation contracts should be altered to render the arrangement more equitable to both parties. The Council was informed by the Administering Authority that, in practice, the decree had increased risks borne by the contractor, thus leading to a reduction in the use of the system. Consequently, it would be necessary to consider the entire question once more.

The Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session noted the achievements of the Administering Authority in fostering the growth of farmers' co-operatives, and noted with satisfaction the plans to expand this programme so that it would affect 100,000 Somalis.

The Council was informed at its twelfth session that the first steps had been taken to develop the livestock industry by improving the quality of hides and ghee, improving methods of animal husbandry, and making more effective use of pasturage. In relation to this last aspect, the construction of new wells would play an important part since these would be located, in so far as possible, in the vicinity of the pastures.

The Council noted with interest the attention devoted by the United Nations Technical Assistance Mission to the development of agriculture and stock-raising and said that it awaited with interest the recommendations that would be made in this field in the comprehensive plan for the economic development of the Territory.

The Administering Authority informed the Council that fishing constituted a potentially important source of income for the Territory. Studies as well as practical measures were necessary to determine the best techniques and, in 1952, a mission was sent to the Territory for this purpose by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO).

The Council noted with satisfaction that a study of fisheries had been made by the Administering Authority with the co-operation of FAO, that a branch of the Maritime and Fishing School at Mogadiscio was being established at Bender Cassim and that the collaboration of FAO in the development of this school was being sought.

The problem of ensuring adequate supplies of water is one of the most difficult confronting the Territory, and both the 1951 Visiting Mission and the Trusteeship Council have encouraged the Administering Authority to continue its efforts and have urged the Somali population to give their full co-operation in the programme of improving water supplies.

The Administering Authority stated that, with the aid of the Mutual Security Agency of the United States Government, it was purchasing drilling equipment for the development of new supplies, and had received a grant of 135 million lire from the Agency for the construction of wells. At its twelfth session the Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council that the first group of 100 wells was under construction.

The Council expressed the opinion that improved water supplies were essential to the economic progress of the Territory, to the stabilization of the nomadic population, and to the elimination of the inter-tribal conflicts in certain sections of the Territory and noted the measures taken by the Administering Authority. It expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue these measures and urged it to give careful consideration to practicable measures for conservation of water for irrigation purposes, including the construction of surface catchment systems.

With regard to mining, the Administering Authority reported that, during 1952, it had granted concessions for the exploration and development of petroleum resources to the Sinclair Somal Corporation and the Societa Mineraria Somala, covering areas of 200,000 square kilometres and 28,000 square kilometres respectively. These agreements provide for a period of nine years for exploration and 40 years for production. The first well must be completed within four years and certain minimum annual expenditures in the Territory must be made.

In its report, the Advisory Council stated that copies of these agreements had been submitted for its information by the Administering Authority. It felt, however, that they should have been transmitted to it for advice and, consequently, it reserved the right to comment on them (T-1048).

5. Social Development

The Administering Authority informed the Council that drought in 1952 had resulted in the curtailment of the size of herds, thus reducing the food supply of the nomadic and semi-nomadic population. The production of sorghum and maize, which are staples, declined by approximately 80 and 72 per cent, respectively. The impact of this severe curtailment in production of food supplies was cushioned among some groups by the income received from the production of cotton and certain other commercial crops during 1951. Grain in storage was also released on the market.

Cost-of-living information gathered in 1952 on a typical Somali family showed an increase in the cost of food of approximately 18 per cent, a reduction of 3 per cent in the cost of clothing and a total increase of about 13 per cent in the cost of living between December 1951 and December 1952.

The total number of wage earners in the Territory, the Administering Authority reported, was 10,200 at the end of 1952.

Conditions of labour in the Territory and related questions, the Administering Authority stated, had been the subject of study by a mission of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), and the Administering Authority had undertaken to prepare a labour code, the various sections of which it would adopt progressively. The first steps were taken in 1951 by the establishment of wage scales, the eight-hour working day, compulsory insurance against industrial accidents, and the establishment of labour inspectorates and labour offices. As regards the position of women workers, the Administering Authority informed the Council that, under legislation currently in force, women workers received the same benefits and protection accorded to men and that special legislation for the protection of women workers was being prepared with the assistance of ILO. The principle of equal pay for equal work would also be incorporated in the labour code. Measures for the protection of child labour and also concerning illness incurred at work, standards of health and safety, and apprenticeship would also be embodied in forthcoming legislation.

As regards immigration, the Administering Authority reported that, of a total of 307 persons who had received immigration permits during 1952, 236 were Italians and 57 Arabs.

The retarding effect of poor health conditions on social and economic development had been stressed by the Trusteeship Council which had called for the expansion of medical and health services, the training of personnel and an increase in the number of physicians. The need for effective measures in the field of public health was also stressed by the 1951 Visiting Mission.

The Trusteeship Council was informed at its twelfth session by the Administering Authority that there were 54 doctors in the Territory, as compared with 47 in 1950 and over 50 in 1951; of these eight were military surgeons. Although the Administering Authority considered that this was sufficient to ensure satisfactory service, it stated that three or four more doctors would be added during 1953. There were three general or principal hospitals in Mogadiscio, and five regional and two secondary hospitals in the interior, sixteen infirmaries and 78 dispensaries. As in 1951, the number of beds was approximately 1,500. The Administering Authority informed the Council that it regarded these facilities as adequate and that, barring unforeseen circumstances, no substantial expansion was contemplated. The number of beds would be increased by 150 by the end of 1955 and the creation of mobile units was under consideration. Expenditures on medical and health services were approximately 9 million somalos, representing an increase of 1 million somalos over 1951.

The Administering Authority reported that, as requested, a study of the problem of chronic malnutrition and slow starvation had been carried out and the assistance of FAO had been requested. The programme envisaged would cover a minimum period of four or five years. The Administration, in the meantime, was continuing its efforts to alleviate this situation, both through economic measures and the distribution of vitamins.

At the Council's twelfth session, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed that the Medical Department was organizing an anti-tuberculosis campaign and was establishing soup kitchens for expectant mothers and delicate children.

The Council noted the development which had taken place in respect of the medical and health facilities and the increased attention being given to preventive health measures in collaboration with the World Health Organization (WHO) and expressed its interest in the campaign against malaria and tuberculosis to reduce the incidence of these two diseases.

The laws applied in the Territory, the Administering Authority stated, ensure the rights and freedoms of personal liberty, property, work, association and the Press; the presumption of innocence until proved guilty; and the inviolability of correspondence.

The Administration continued to publish the daily newspaper Il Corriere della Somalia and it was estimated that two-thirds of its readers were Somalis. A new journal, Somalia Nuova, which appeared during the year, was published by two Somalis and supports the programme of the Unione Africana della Somalia.

Daily radio broadcasts, the Administering Authority stated, are made from Mogadiscio. Six hours are devoted to Somali language programmes, prepared by indigenous persons, and an equal period to programmes in Italian. In keeping with its plan to establish receivers for public use in all the administrative centres, the Administration reported that such installations had been made in fourteen localities during 1952.

Petitions submitted by the Somali Youth League contained complaints that its members did not enjoy freedom of speech or association, that the police interfered in the activities of the League, and that the reading of newspapers was not permitted (T/Pet.11/342, 343 & Add.1, 344). The refusal of publication of a letter, based on the editor's view that certain passages in the letter would cause offence to the religious and judicial authorities, was the subject of a complaint by a group of petitioners (T/Com.11/71 & Add.1).

With respect to religious freedom three petitions contained complaints of interference by the Administering Authority in religious matters and of the arrest, imprisonment and deportation of a Scek (T/Pet.11/276, & Add.2, 313 & Add.1, 342). The Administering Authority replied that the Scek had been arrested because in sermons he had threatened those who co-operated with the Administration (T/Obs.11/3).

The Trusteeship Council considered that the questions were within the competence of the courts of the Territory and that no action was necessary (resolutions 686(XII), 709(XII), 734(XII)).

The Somali Youth League referred in a petition to three instances of the detention of members carrying League correspondence and the seizure of the correspondence (T/Pet.11/289/Add.1). In its observations (T/Obs.11/4) on this complaint, the Administering Authority stated that in all three instances the mail was either forwarded by it through postal channels or left in the possession of the individual.

The Council (resolution 689(XII)) noted particularly that the Administering Authority's statement that it had been necessary to detain a few persons briefly to prevent an incident similar to that of Chisimaio, and expressed the hope that relations between the Somali Youth League and the Administering Authority would continue to improve.

The Trusteeship Council was informed at its twelfth session that, during 1952, three prisons had been rebuilt and refurnished and two new ones completed. Three new prisons were planned, an institution for juvenile delinquents was under construction, and during 1953 a penal farm would be established. The Administering Authority added that these measures would complete the programme of expansion and modernization of prison facilities.

Under a law adopted during the year under review, prisoners serving sentences were no longer required to reimburse the Administration for the expenses of their upkeep in prison and new prison regulations were under study.

Several petitioners complained of bad prison conditions and of the need for new prisons (T/Pet.11/L.3; T/Pet.11/343 & Add.1, 348).

The Trusteeship Council (resolution 753(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioners to the Special Representative's statement that rations for prisoners at Gardo were adequate. In resolution 739(XII), it recommended that the Administering Authority improve the sanitary conditions in the prison at Eil.

Other petitions alleged that prisoners were ill-treated and tortured (T/Pet.11/307 & Add.1, 330, 342). With respect to the latter group, the Administering Authority denied the allegations (T/Obs.11/15).

The Council decided that no action by it on these petitions was called for since the matter was within the competence of the courts of the Territory (resolutions 708(XII) & 722(XII)).

The Council at its twelfth session noted with satisfaction the steps taken to repair and rebuild prisons and the assurance of the Administering Authority that juvenile delinquents and women offenders would be housed in separate quarters before the end of 1953.

6. Educational Development

The Administering Authority stated in its annual report that progress in the development of education could be seen in the increase in general expenditures, in the number of schools and textbooks available and in the opening of special schools.

The total expenditures on education in 1952 was 6.7 million somalos, as compared with 4.6 million somalos in 1951.

There were 82 elementary day schools of the Somali type in the Territory in 1952-53, as compared with 70 in 1951-52; these were staffed by 105 Italian, 102 Somali and nine Arab teachers, representing an increase of 36 teachers over 1951-52.

On the secondary and technical school level, there were nine schools in 1952-53 with a teaching staff of 53. An agricultural school which offers a three-year course and can accommodate 60 students, and a maritime and fishing school were established in 1952. In the latter, children follow a three-year course, whereas the course for adults is of two years' duration. The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session that an upper middle school of the Somali type was being established. An experimental school for nomads, planned for 1952, had not been established because of the lack of adequate teaching staff and difficulties of transport.

Under an Ordinance regulating private schools issued during the year, the authorization of the Administration must be sought by any person intending to open a school. Koranic schools are exempt from the provisions of the Ordinance.

The Advisory Council suggested that, since government schools were unable as yet to provide education for all, private schools which might not have attained the education standards set by the Administration, or which might not be interested in obtaining official recognition, should be allowed to operate provided that they met minimum health requirements and did not disseminate subversive ideas. The Administering Authority replied that government control of private schools did not place any limitation on private initiative in education but aimed rather at co-ordinating and directing it. Once a school had complied with the requirements of the Ordinance, permission to open it would be granted.

The Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council that the opening of four private schools had been authorized.

Replying to a petition from the Somali Youth League complaining that the local authorities had closed down one of the League's schools (T/Pet.-11/332 & Add.1) the Administering Authority stated that, under the law, the operation of the school required a licence and that such a licence had not been requested by the League (T/Obs.-11/15).

The Trusteeship Council (resolution 724(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioners to the Administering Authority's statements and decided that in the circumstances no recommendation was called for.

During the school year 1952-53, the enrolment in elementary schools had been 15,269 compared with 10,885 in 1951-52, in secondary schools 536 as against 537 and in technical and special schools 233 compared with 224 the previous year.

The Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council that between 22,000 and 23,000 students would be enrolled in the schools of the Territory during the forthcoming academic year.

Three Somalis had been enrolled in Italian-type middle schools in 1952. During the year, the third-year course was added in the Somali-type lower middle schools; graduates of this course will be able to enter the upper middle school for Somalis and the teacher-training school, both of which were to be established in 1953. Of 38 students studying in Italy under bursaries in 1952, one-half were teachers and the rest were primary and secondary school students.

The Council was further informed that in certain districts school attendance had declined to less than one-half of the number of pupils enrolled. School committees, comprising parents as well as other interested persons, had been established in fourteen localities as a means of overcoming parental indifference. In certain instances, chiefs and notables had been informed by the Administration that new schools would not be established in their districts unless attendance at those already in existence attained a certain minimum level.

A second textbook in Italian had been published for use in the schools of the Territory and a first textbook in Arabic was in preparation. In addition, 20,000 books in Italian and 18,000 in Arabic had been purchased abroad for use in the schools. The Administering Authority stated that parents of students in certain areas were unwilling to purchase textbooks for their children.

Rapid expansion of education, the Administering Authority stated, was impeded, in particular, by the problem of the languages of instruction, a dearth of trained indigenous teachers, and the necessity of recruiting Italian and other non-Somali teachers, who, in some instances, were handicapped initially by the lack of knowledge and understanding of the language and culture of their pupils.

The fact that Italian and Arabic are the languages taught in schools, although Somali is the sole language spoken throughout the Territory, has made the rapid spread of education difficult.

The Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session that differences of opinion continued to exist among the Somalis on the development of the Somali language. It drew the Council's attention to the existence of a Somali script known as "Osmani", and stated that its attitude in this matter, was to await the crystallization of public opinion and to encourage public discussion. An expert of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) was expected to visit the Territory and advise the Administering Authority on the question.

At the Council's twelfth session, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority referred to the steps that had been taken to reduce the Somali language to written form and stated that the Administering Authority would continue along these lines, trusting also in the collaboration of those Somalis who were interested in the matter.

The Trusteeship Council considered that the development of the Somali language in written form was a matter of great urgency and that an appropriate alphabet for this purpose should be decided upon as soon as possible.

In 1952, there were 197 indigenous teachers in service and, of these, 50 held a teacher's diploma, having completed a course of study on the lower middle school level. According to the Administering Authority, the recruiting of teachers and teacher training students had become a very serious problem; 45 teachers and 60 students had been sought in 1952 but only nineteen teachers and 21 students had been recruited. The Administering Authority stated that the demand for personnel with a minimal degree of formal education in government and private employment was in part responsible for the little interest displayed in a teaching career.

Due to the shortage of teachers and the absence of those who were continuing their studies in Italy, it was necessary to recruit 25 persons on a temporary basis as replacements. A three-year teacher-training programme on the higher secondary level was proposed for 1953 and the Special Representative of the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council that the establishment of this school was under way.

Italian teachers received in salary from 980 to 1,200 somalos per months, teachers of Arabic recruited abroad received 1,600 somalos, and Somalis received from 125 to 470 somalos, but could attain a maximum of 970 somalos.

As yet there are no institutions of higher education in the Territory. The Administering Authority informed the Council in this connexion that, although no Somalis were educationally qualified to pursue studies on this level, it was possible that two indigenous persons might undertake such studies upon the completion of their secondary education in 1953. The Administering Authority also stated that it was considering sending the first group of graduates of the school of political administration to Italy for further study in order that they might qualify for enrolment in the school when it was reorganized as an institution of higher education.

The Administering Authority also reported having continued its efforts in the field of adult education on the primary school level, 9,058 students being enrolled in the evening courses for adults. It drew the Trusteeship Council's attention to the lack of a written form of Somali, and to the lack of qualified indigenous staff, as factors which also seriously impeded progress in respect of mass education, and stated that it had requested the assistance of two UNESCO experts in 1953 for the study of the question and the formulation of a programme.

The Trusteeship Council noted that the assistance of UNESCO was being sought in developing a programme of mass education and expressed the opinion that a considerable expansion of this programme could be effected by the development of the Somali language in a written form. It hoped that the mass education campaign would be vigorously pursued, and, in this connexion, noted the increasing use that was being made of the system of public broadcasting.

On the basis of advice given by UNESCO, the Advisory Council and the Territorial Council, the five-year plan for education was revised in collaboration with UNESCO and submitted by the Administering Authority to the Trusteeship Council at its twelfth session. The following goals were envisaged for 1956-57 under the plan: 140 elementary schools; three lower middle schools and one upper middle school of Somali type; a three-year teacher-training course on the upper secondary level; and a broad programme of technical and vocational education.

The goals for 1952 of the original five-year plan had been achieved in respect of the number of schools, classes and teachers on the elementary level, and enrolment, teachers and classes in the middle schools, the Administering Authority reported. Primary school enrolment was below the level set for 1952. A school of Islamic studies had been established a year ahead of schedule, whereas the opening of a domestic school for girls, scheduled for 1952 had been postponed until 1953 for lack of adequate quarters.

The Advisory Council examined (T/1048) the original five-year plan and decided, inter alia, to await the conclusions of the experts of the Technical Assistance Mission and UNESCO, which had been consulted by the Administering Authority on the plan. It stated in its report that UNESCO had as yet been unable to forward its official comments to the Advisory Council.

At the Trusteeship Council's twelfth session, the Special Representative of the Administering Authority stated that in a period of three years the scholastic population had increased nearly tenfold; these were concrete results which, as UNESCO had pointed out, led the Administering Authority to feel confident that the five-year plan for education would be fully carried out. It was not possible to envisage the solution of the problem of mass education by means of a language different from the one that was spoken and understood by the entire population. The problem of the language of instruction, however, should be solved when the large-scale education of the nomadic population was initiated.

Certain petitions before the Trusteeship Council contained complaints that education in general was being neglected and that educational facilities were inadequate.

The Council in one instance (T/Pet.11/346) informed the Somali Youth League, Branch of Garoe (resolution 737(XII)), that it would continue to examine the general question of educational facilities and in reference to the other petitions (T/Pet.11/307, T/Pet.11/L.3) decided no recommendation was necessary.

Other complaints were more specific in nature, dealing with such questions as teacher training and the need for more evening schools (T/Pet.11/257, T/Pet.11/L.4). With reference to these complaints, the Administering Authority drew the Trusteeship Council's attention to the existing facilities and to the steps being taken to develop education in various districts. The Council noted the observations of the Administering Authority (resolution 674(XII)) and expressed the hope (resolution 754(XII)) that the population of Alula would co-operate with local authorities in ensuring better school attendance and in promoting better education facilities generally.

The Council welcomed the five-year plan for education as a significant contribution to educational advancement in the Trust Territory and noted the following statement of UNESCO appraising the plan:

"The most important point at present is that the Italian administration should be able to execute the five-year plan as set forth in the third draft. Successes achieved by the Administration since 1950 are a sure guarantee that it intends to make every effort to execute the plan in its entirety. Thus Somaliland will have a whole network of primary, secondary and vocational schools capable of raising the general standard of education and of improving economic and social conditions, and sufficiently numerous to meet the limited needs of the country with very meagre resources, where the main source of livelihood is cattle-rearing. This plan has the further advantage of not requiring the expenditure of large sums of money which the Somali State would be incapable of finding."

The Trusteeship Council congratulated UNESCO for its helpful collaboration with the Administering Authority. The Council said that it awaited with great interest information on the implementation of the five-year plan, and considered that the effective development of education in the Territory required the further expansion of the teacher-training programme and a continued increase in budgetary allocations.

7. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

At its 377th meeting on 23 November, the General Assembly's Fourth Committee acceded to the request of the Italian Observer to the United Nations, as representative of the Administering Authority for the Trust Territory of Somaliland, to be allowed to participate in the work of the Committee during its examination of the report of the Trusteeship Council (A/2427). The report of the Council contained a chapter on Somaliland under Italian Administration, together with an account of the Council's consideration of conditions in that Trust Territory (see above).

The Committee also decided, at its 319th meeting on 29 September, by 39 votes to 4, with 11 abstentions, to grant a request for an oral hearing made by the Somali Youth League (A/C.4/234) and, at its 349th meeting on 2 November without opposition, approved a similar request (A/C.4/244) from representatives of seven political organizations in Somaliland (Unione Nazionale Somala, Lega Progressista Somala, Unione Africani Somalia, Hisbia Dighil e Mirifle, Unione Giovani Benadir, Associazione Gioventu Abgal and Hidalet Schidle e Mobilen). By a telegram dated 21 November, however, these seven organizations informed the Committee that instead of sending a representative to give an oral presentation, they would submit a written memorandum. At its 385th meeting on 1 December, the Committee agreed to circulate the memorandum (A/C.4/256). While appealing for greater international aid, it outlined the progress made in the Territory in the political, economic, social and teaching fields, and expressed appreciation of the work of the Italian Administration.

Abdullahi Issa, representative of the Somali Youth League, made a statement (A/C.4/253) at the Committee's 377th meeting on 13 November, and at the two following meetings answered questions put to him by members of the Committee.

Mr. Issa urged that Italy should take further measures to prepare Somaliland for its independence in 1960. He said that there was a suggestion that Italian rule over the Territory of Somaliland might be prolonged and that the period until 1960, when Somaliland would be granted independence by the General Assembly, was dangerously short. The existing economic and social conditions in the Territory were presented to justify the prolongation of Italian rule, he claimed. It was also being said that the remaining period of Trusteeship was insufficient to encourage the investment of capital in the Territory. Mr. Issa contended that Administering Powers were seeking the extension of the period of Trusteeship as a trial case, as the outcome might affect other Territories under their control.

The political, economic, social and educational conditions in Somaliland were far from satisfactory, Mr. Issa stated. He asked that the General Assembly should urge Italy, as Administering Authority, to carry out reforms in all these fields to ensure the achievement of independence in 1960.

Among the measures which the Somali Youth League sought, he said, were:

- (1) repeal of proclamations and laws incompatible with the new status of Somaliland as a Trust Territory;
- (2) abolition of systems of imposing fines without trial and limitation to a period of 48 hours of the detention of persons awaiting trial;
- (3) establishment of legislative and executive organs through elections based on universal adult suffrage;
- (4) the grant to the people of Somaliland of early self-government, pending the achievement of full independence;
- (5) settlement of claims for land alienation;
- (6) the sending of a special Visiting Mission of the Trusteeship Council to the Territory;
- (7) budgetary reforms and completion of "the long overdue economic plan" for the Territory;
- (8) improvement of the basic economy of Somaliland;
- (9) improvement of communications;
- (10) removal of restrictions to enable Somalis to trade with neighbouring areas;
- (11) the use of technical assistance provided through the United Nations and the specialized agencies and the issue of an invitation to States to contribute toward the development of the country;
- (12) improvement of conditions in education, labour, employment, public health and the standard of living;
- (13) abolition of systems of collective punishment; and
- (14) diversion of military spending to schemes of economic, social and educational advancement.

Mr. Issa also told the Committee that he thought the necessary security should be given for capital investment covering the period beyond 1960, when the period of Trusteeship was to end. The Somali Government established at that time, he said, would approve concessions which it felt to be in the interest of the Territory.

No difficulties were placed in the way of Somalis who wished to travel abroad, Mr. Issa said, but difficulties were encountered in travelling between areas of what he called "Somaliland proper".

At the 379th meeting on 24 November, the representative of Italy said that impressions of prevailing conditions in Somaliland given by Mr. Issa were out of date.

In the political field, representation of political parties was being increased in the Territorial Council, a body organized by the Italian Administration when it assumed responsibility for the Trust Territory three years ago. The Territorial Council had also considered a bill for the organization of elections which would shortly be held in all the towns and villages of the Territory. Somalis were being trained for important posts in the Administration, he said, and four had already been entrusted with responsibility as heads of districts. In the last twelve months, there had not been a single political "incident".

In the economic field, the representative of Italy said, the Administration had shown initiative. Over 50,000 quintals of millet and maize were currently stored by the Wheat Pool and production was being encouraged by a price higher than that in the open market. The following spring, he said, a system of agricultural credit at short-term interest would be launched. Meanwhile the Administration was drafting a canal scheme for irrigation and had provided in the current budget a half million dollars for drilling oil wells, as part of an 800-well programme target for 1960.

Although a solution of all health problems could not be achieved in three years, four new hospitals had brought to over 100 the total number of hospitals, dispensaries and infirmaries covering the whole Territory. There were now 50 physicians at work, compared with 21 in 1950, and eleven schools were training 250 young Somalis as medical assistants.

Tensions in Somaliland when Italy assumed responsibility made necessary the presence of 5,000 troops and 1,000 police, he said. The numbers had now dropped to 600 troops and 200 police. The following year, there would be in Somaliland only sufficient non-commissioned officers necessary to train an army in accordance with the terms of the Trusteeship Agreement and one police officer to organize a police force.

Since 1950, stated the representative of Italy, the numbers of students had swelled from 2,500 to 21,000. Of the 1,000 students in secondary schools, 700 were Somalis. The over-all allocation for education in the budget comprised 10 per cent and a similar amount was being spent on public health. Seventy students were now qualifying in Italy, 70 in Egypt, and the number of teachers in Somaliland had risen from 70 to over 500 and the number of classes from 80 to 800.

Though financial restrictions were limiting the activity of the Administration, he stated, Italy was spending 10 million dollars yearly doing its duty. It was confident, he said, of the understanding and moral support of the nations who had entrusted it with that very difficult task.

At the 387th meeting of the Committee on 2 December, the representative of Italy made a further statement. He said that Somaliland would achieve independence in 1960, as determined by the General Assembly, and allegations of an intention to prolong the period of Trusteeship beyond that time were unsubstantiated. Although many delegations had emphasized that only seven years remained of the Trusteeship period for Somaliland, none of these representatives had recalled that Italy had been the Administering Authority for the Territory for only three years.

In those three years, he stated, Italy had completely fulfilled its duty under the Trusteeship Agreement. The tense political situation existing in Somaliland in 1950 had completely disappeared; Italy had organized the Territorial Council for Somaliland and had given it increased powers. Elections would take place the following year, and, when the Council had assumed legislative functions, the Administering Authority would organize executive powers for the Council to prepare its members to become Ministers of the new Somali State in 1960. Italy had done all it could in appointing Somalis to offices in the Administration. Progress was also being achieved in economic and social as well as in the political field. When the ten-year period of Trusteeship came to an end it would be seen that it had been impossible to have done more.

References to Somaliland were made during the general debate on the report of the Trusteeship Council by a number of representatives, among them those of Brazil, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, France, Guatemala, Lebanon, Poland, Syria, Uruguay and Yugoslavia.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Guatemala, Poland and Yugoslavia were among those who reminded the Committee that the decision of the General Assembly to grant independence to Somaliland in 1960 placed special obligations on the Administering Authority and on the Assembly; it was incumbent on both to do everything possible to ensure that Somaliland would be able to attain her independence at that time. The representatives of Egypt, Lebanon and Poland, among others, also pointed to the need for the implementation of plans for the economic development of the Territory.

The representatives of Lebanon and Uruguay expressed approval of the announcement by the Administering Authority that elections for the Municipal Councils were to take place soon; the representatives of Czechoslovakia and Guatemala, however, urged that the powers of these Councils be extended. The representatives of Brazil, the Dominican Republic, Egypt and Lebanon were among those who commented on the improved relations between the Advisory Council for Somaliland and the Administration. The need to solve frontier difficulties between Somaliland and Ethiopia was stressed by the representatives of the Dominican Republic, Guatemala and Lebanon. The representatives of Poland, the USSR and Yugoslavia, stated that the situation in Somaliland was far from satisfactory and they called for reforms in economic, social, educational and political fields which would promote the interests of the indigenous inhabitants.

The Fourth Committee had before it a joint draft resolution by Egypt, Haiti, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, and the Philippines (A/C.4/L.323), recommending specific action by the Administering Authority. A number of objections to the draft were expressed by, among others, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, France, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States. These representatives referred to what they regarded as inconsistencies in the joint draft and suggested a number of drafting amendments. The draft was described by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom as Utopian and unrealistic in concept. The representatives of Australia and New Zealand characterized it as unnecessarily mandatory in tone and considered that it might hinder progress through the stipulation of rigid rules. The representative of Colombia said that the draft might adversely affect the prestige and authority of the Advisory Council for Somaliland by making the General Assembly comment on matters more properly within the competence of the Advisory Council.

The sponsors subsequently revised (A/C.4/L.323/Rev.1) the joint draft, and were joined by Burma. The representatives of Brazil, Chile, Cuba, Ecuador, Israel, Peru and Venezuela expressed support of the revised text, the representatives of Brazil, Chile and Ecuador supporting the acknowledgment in the revision of the efforts by the Administering Authority. In its revised form, the draft provided that the General Assembly would:

(1) note with appreciation the efforts made by the Administering Authority to fulfil its obligations;

(2) outline a series of six steps which it would recommend the Administering Authority, in consultation with the Advisory Council, to take to prepare the Somali people progressively for the attainment of complete independence; and

(3) recommend that Italy and Ethiopia should intensify efforts to achieve a settlement of the question of the frontier between Ethiopia and the Trust Territory of Somaliland. (For text of the resolution, as adopted, see below.)

The sponsors accepted:

(1) A joint amendment by Pakistan and Saudi Arabia (A/C.4/L.328, subsequently revised as A/C.4/L.328/Rev.1) which provided for the addition of a subparagraph to state that review should be continued of all special legislation relating to Somaliland which had been enacted prior to the Trusteeship administration and which was still in effect, with a view to revising legislation found to be inconsistent with the letter or spirit of the Trusteeship Agreement; and

(2) A Brazilian amendment (A/C.4/L.329) which provided for the addition of a new paragraph to request the Advisory Council for Somaliland in its annual report to give precise information on the implementation of the resolution, together with its comments, observations and suggestions as to the means of carrying out the recommendations contained in the resolution.

They also accepted two oral drafting amendments by the United Kingdom and Venezuela.

At the 388th meeting of the Committee on 2 December, the representative of Ethiopia said that his country had not recognized the resolution of the General Assembly declaring Somaliland a Trust Territory under Italian Administration and its position remained unchanged. Accordingly, his delegation would not participate in the vote on the draft resolution. He added, however, that his delegation hoped that Somaliland would attain independence at a very early date.

At its 392nd meeting on 4 December, the Fourth Committee adopted the draft resolution first in parts and then as a whole. The first operative paragraph was adopted by 41 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions; sub-paragraph (g) of the second operative paragraph (the sub-paragraph proposed by Pakistan and Saudi Arabia) by 33 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions; the third operative paragraph by 38 votes to 1, with 11 abstentions; and the fourth operative paragraph (that proposed by Brazil) by 30 votes to 8, with 11 abstentions.

The joint draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 38 to 1, with 12 abstentions. For reasons given in the Fourth Committee, the Ethiopian representative did not take part in the voting in the Committee and in the plenary meeting.

The draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2608 E) was adopted by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December by 38 votes to none, with 12 abstentions, as resolution 755(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Taking into consideration the fact that, under General Assembly resolution 289 A (IV), adopted on 21 November 1949, the Trust Territory of Somaliland under Italian administration is to attain complete independence by 1960.

"Mindful that it is necessary for that purpose that the people of Somaliland shall be prepared for self-government,

"Considering that it is the duty of both the United Nations and the Administering Authority to take the necessary measures for the implementation of that decision.

"1. Notes with appreciation the efforts made by the Administering Authority in Somaliland to fulfil the obligations laid down in the Charter and in the Trusteeship Agreement;

"2. Recommends that the Administering Authority, in consultation with the Advisory Council, should continue to take the necessary steps to prepare the Somali people progressively for the attainment of complete independence, and to that end:

"(a) The Territorial Council should be granted the powers of a legislative organ and its members should be elected by the people on the basis of universal adult suffrage;

"(b) The administration of Somaliland should be progressively transferred to the indigenous inhabitants as a necessary preliminary to its assumption of independence;

"(c) A general economic plan for the Territory should be completed without delay, taking into account the recommendations of the United Nations Technical Assistance Mission to the Trust Territory of Somaliland under Italian administration, particular attention being paid to methods for developing basic economic resources such as agriculture and stock-breeding, and to possibilities for improving and expanding existing industries;

"(d) Efforts should be made to increase the revenue in order to balance the budget as soon as possible, and to that effect expenditures for military and police forces should be reduced to the indispensable minimum;

"(e) Use of technical assistance facilities provided by the United Nations and the specialized agencies to assist in economic development and the improvement of social and educational conditions in the Territory should be encouraged;

"(f) Efforts should be intensified to increase the number and improve the quality of public elementary and secondary schools; training for indigenous teachers should be expedited; a mass education programme should be instituted; attention should be devoted to vocational training, particularly in agricultural and veterinary science; and facilities for further studies should be expanded by granting an adequate number of scholarships to enable Somalis to take advanced training courses abroad;

"(g) Review should be continued of all special legislation relating to Somaliland which was enacted prior to the trusteeship administration and which is still in effect, with a view to revising legislation found to be inconsistent with the letter or the spirit of the Trusteeship Agreement;

"3. Recommends also to the Governments of Italy and Ethiopia that they should intensify their efforts to achieve a final, just, equitable and friendly settlement of the question of the frontier between the State of Ethiopia and the Trust Territory of Somaliland in order that this problem may be finally settled before the date appointed for the attainment of independence by Somaliland;

"4. Requests the Advisory Council, in its annual report, to give precise information on the implementation of the present resolution, together with its observations, comments or suggestions as to the means of carrying out the recommendations contained in the resolution."

G. PETITIONS DEALT WITH BY THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL DURING 1953⁷²

At its twelfth session, from 16 June to 21 July 1953, the Trusteeship Council had on its agenda 394 petitions. The Council subsequently granted three oral hearings not connected with written petitions on its agenda, and added one written petition to its agenda.

Of the three oral petitions, two related to general conditions in Somaliland under Italian administration, and the third related to a land question in Tanganyika. In addition, the Council received six requests for oral presentations in support of written petitions. Of these requests, two—which were submitted by the Assemblée traditionnelle du peuple Douala (Ngondo) and the Assemblée traditionnelle du peuple Bamiléké (Kumzse)—related to general questions in the Cameroons under French administration; at its

Of the written petitions, 36 concerned general problems to which the attention of the Council had already been called and on which it had taken decisions or made recommendations, or were anonymous petitions. Three hundred and fifty-nine petitions concerned particular questions. All the petitions were reported upon by the Standing Committee on Petitions.

In its 23rd report (T/L.337), which related to petitions circulated under rule 85, paragraph 2, of the Council's rules of procedure,⁷⁵ the Standing Committee recommended, inter alia, that, as a general rule, the petitions on general questions should be considered by the Council in connexion with its examination of the next annual report on the Territory concerned, or in connexion with particular agenda items to which they might be more closely related. As the result of the approval of this report by the Council, at its 462nd meeting on 17 June, nineteen of these petitions were taken into consideration by the Council during its twelfth session, while consideration of the remaining seventeen were deferred to the thirteenth session.

The remaining 359 written petitions all related to particular matters. On the recommendation of the Standing Committee, contained in its 46th report (T/L.391), the Council decided to postpone its examination of 101 of them until its thirteenth session. In ten cases, the postponement was due to the fact that the petitions had not been received by the Administering Authority concerned two months prior to the opening of the twelfth session; in 89 cases, the postponement was due to the absence of any written observations on the petitions by the Administering Authority concerned; and, in two cases, it was due to a request by the Committee for information supplementing the written observations of the Administering Authority—a request which could not be complied with at the time. There remained 258 written petitions concerning particular matters. All were examined and reported upon individually by the Standing Committee on Petitions in 26 separate reports.

The Committee presented two other reports. The first (T/L.375) was on special information on the implementation of resolutions previously adopted by the Council on petitions, of which the Council took note at its 483rd meeting on 21 July. The second report (T/L.392) concerned the operation of the new rules of procedure affecting the handling of petitions.⁷⁶

In all, the Standing Committee held 54 meetings prior to and during the twelfth session of the Council and submitted 31 reports at that session. 13 July—842(XII)	to 865(XII)
14 July—649(XII)	to 654(XII)
	787(XII) to 835(XII)
20 July—836(XII)	to 841(XII)
21 July—655(XII)	to 663(XII)
	755(XII) to 786(XII)

The Council, at its twelfth session, considered petitions from all the Territories, with the exception of petitions which concerned jointly the Cameroons administered by France and the Cameroons administered by the United Kingdom. Petitions examined in connexion with the annual reports on Somaliland under Italian administration, Nauru, New Guinea, Western Samoa and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands are considered under those Territories. Petitions from other Territories, for which the Council did not consider annual reports at this session, are discussed below.

1. Petitions Relating to Tanganyika, Administered by the United Kingdom

The Trusteeship Council, during 1953, dealt with one oral petition and six written petitions⁷⁷ concerning Tanganyika. The oral petition was presented to the Council at its 476th meeting on 8 July by Kirilo Japhet, on behalf of the Meru Citizens' Union. The petition related to the Wa-Meru land question and the Council took note of it. On three petitions, the Council (resolutions 649(XII), 650(XII) & 654(XII)) drew the attention of the petitioner to the observations of the Administering Authority and decided that no recommendation was necessary. One of these (T/Pet.2/157) contained a request from a German for re-entry into Tanganyika. Another (T/Pet.2/158) emanated from a former chief who complained of his removal from office, while the third (T/Pet.2/L.1) contained complaints concerning the procedure followed in electing a tribal chief.

⁷⁵ Rule 85, para. 2, states: "Petitions concerning general problems to which the attention of the Trusteeship Council has already been called and on which the Council has taken decisions or has made recommendations, as well as anonymous communications, shall be circulated by the Secretary-General in the manner provided for in rule 24."

On the three remaining petitions, the Council decided as follows. On the first (T/Pet.2/159), the case of a man involved in litigation over charges that he had deserted his wife, it made no recommendation because the matter was within the competence of the courts of the Territory (resolution 651(XII)). On the second petition (T/Pet.2/160 & Add.1), it made no recommendation on the petitioner's claim to be Sultan of a part of Tanganyika and his claim to be the owner of a certain piece of land (resolution 652(XII)). On the third petition (T/Pet.2/161 & Add.1), written on behalf of a person who claimed to be wrongfully excluded from the Territory as a German citizen on the grounds that he was in reality of Danzig nationality, the Council decided that, in the present state of complexity as to the application of the principles of international law involved, no recommendation was necessary (resolution 653(XII)).

2. Petitions Relating to Ruanda-Urundi, Administered by Belgium

The Council dealt with nine written petitions⁷⁸ concerning Ruanda-Urundi.

On one petition (T/Pet.3/59), complaining of an expulsion order against the petitioner, the Council noted that the order had been withdrawn and decided that, in the circumstances, no recommendation was necessary (resolution 655(XII)).

On two petitions (T/Pet.3/62 & Add.1 & 2; T/Pet.3/65 & Add.1 & 2) the Council took no action since they referred to matters dealt with by the local courts or with which the courts were competent to deal (resolutions 657(XII) & 660(XII)).

On four other petitions⁷⁹ the Council decided that no action was called for.⁸⁰

One petition (T/Pet.3/60 & Add.1-5) contained a number of complaints against the Administering Authority in connexion with an attack by an African on a Greek subject living at Usumbura. The Council drew the attention of the petitioner to the observations of the Administering Authority (T/Obs.3/2) on the question of the possible return of the petitioner to Greece, and decided to take no action on that part of the petition which related to complaints within the competence of the courts of the Territory (resolution 656(XII)).

One petition (T/Pet.3/67 & Add.1) contained a complaint that the Administering Authority was taking away from the petitioners lands on which they grazed their cattle in order to give them to indigenous peasant farmers. The Council, noting that the petition resulted from the policy of the Administering Authority of developing sparsely-inhabited parts of the Territory and reducing the number of cattle, and that this policy had been approved by the 1951 Visiting Mission, decided to make no recommendation (resolution 662(XII)).

3. Petitions Relating to the Cameroons, Administered by the United Kingdom

The Council dealt with fourteen petitions⁸¹ concerning the Cameroons under British administration.

On five petitions,⁸² either containing complaints by public servants or raising other political and administrative matters, the Council decided that no recommendation was necessary.⁸³

On another petition (T/Pet.4/95), calling to the attention of the Council the death of two youths on a climb organized by the Training Centre of the Man o' War Bay Scheme and asking for compensation for the dependants of the deceased, the Council, inter alia, expressed its regret at the unfortunate death of the two youths, drew the attention of the petitioners to the Administering Authority's statement (T/Obs.4/11) that the question of compensation for the deceased's dependants was one which should be taken up with the deceased's employers and endorsed the view of the 1952 Visiting Mission that every possible care should be employed in selecting training programmes suited to the physical capacities of the trainees (resolution 764(XII)).

On five petitions,⁸⁴ raising various economic and social matters, the Council decided that no recommendation was necessary.⁸⁵ On one petition (T/Pet.4/86), complaining of land alienation, the Council drew the attention of the petitioner to the observations of the Administering Authority, in particular that the Fon of Bikom and the Kom Council had argued that the land should be made available. It considered that the leper colony for which the land in question was expropriated was a project worthy of the support of the Council (resolution 757(XII)).

On one petition (T/Pet.4/97), requesting a grant-in-aid for a school, the Council viewed the petitioner's request with sympathy, suggested that he should proceed with all expedition to register the land on which the school stood, which would make him eligible to receive such a grant, and requested the Administering Authority to inform the Council of the result (resolution 766(XII)).

On another petition (T/Pet.4/99), which, inter alia, complained that the petitioner had been refused a scholarship by the Cameroons Development Corporation, the Council noted that the petitioner had subsequently, on the recommendation of the Administering Authority, been awarded a scholarship by the Government of India (resolution 768(XII)).

4. Petitions Relating to the Cameroons, Administered by France

The Council dealt with nineteen petitions⁸⁶ concerning the Cameroons under French administration.

Thirteen petitions referred to political and administrative questions. The Council decided⁸⁷ that no recommendation was necessary on ten of these.⁸⁸

On one petition (T/Pet.5/114), which contained a request for the establishment of regional councils in the Bamoun region, the Council, having noted that rural communes-mixtes were being established in the Cameroons, endorsed the view of the 1952 Visiting Mission that it would be appropriate to establish such communes-mixtes in other regions in the south and in the west of the Territory (including the Bamoun region) where the reform had not yet been introduced (resolution 774(XII)).

One petition (T/Pet.5/131 & Add.1) contained a complaint that the petitioner's grandson had been killed by a lorry driven by a European, and further contained complaints of ill-treatment at the hands of the police, of racial discrimination, and, finally, a request for the reopening of the petitioner's restaurant which the authorities had closed down while he was in prison. The Council decided that no action was necessary on the main issues raised in the petition, since they were within the competence of the courts of the Territory. It expressed regret at the tragic death of the petitioner's grandson, noted the statement of the representative of France (T/C.2/SR.91) that there was no question of racial discrimination in the Territory, and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would give sympathetic consideration to the reopening of the petitioner's restaurant (resolution 785(XII)).

On one petition (T/Pet.5/124), which contained a protest against the dismissal of a veteran, the Council noted the observations of the Administering Authority that other employment in the Administration was being sought for the person concerned (resolution 783(XII)).

Six of the petitions concerned land matters. On two of them (T/Pet.5/122, 151), concerning, inter alia, compensation requested by a community living near Edéa for land taken over for hydro-electric installations, the Council noted that the lower courts had ruled that the land was a part of the private property of the Territory, and that if this decision were upheld the Administering Authority would nevertheless allocate the remainder of the indemnity voted by the Representative Assembly to the improvement of social services in and around Edéa (resolutions 781(XII) and 786(XII)). On one of these two petitions (T/Pet.5/151), the Council also requested the Administering Authority to furnish information on the petitioners' losses due to destruction caused by wild elephants (resolution 786(XII)).

One petition (T/Pet.5/116) contained complaints that the petitioners' crops had been destroyed by the Administering Authority, which claimed that the land in question was classified as a forest in 1947 and that the petitioners had not cleared their land until 1951. On this petition, the Council drew the attention of the petitioners to the relevant paragraphs of the report of the 1952 Visiting Mission, which dealt with the need for forest reserves in the Territory (resolution 775(XII)).

On one petition (T/Pet.5/118), which complained of land expropriation and of damage to the crops and springs in the village, the Council noted that the land had been returned to the petitioners (resolution 777(XII)).

On two of the petitions (T/Pet.5/111, 112 & Add.1), the Council decided that no recommendation was necessary, since the matters had already been dealt with by the competent courts of the Territory (resolutions 771(XII) & 772(XII)).

5. Petitions Relating to Both Cameroons

At its seventh session, the General Assembly, having granted oral hearings to representatives of organizations in the Cameroons under French administration, decided (resolution 655(VII)), inter alia, to transmit these statements to the Council, with a request that the questions raised should be further investigated. The statements referred to raised the question of the unification of the Cameroons under French and under British administration, and a number of general questions concerning the Cameroons under French administration.

As regards a number of petitions concerning both the Cameroons under British administration and the Cameroons under French administration, the Council decided to take them into consideration in connexion with its consideration of General Assembly resolution 655(VII). As a result of the Council's decision at its 480th meeting on 14 July to postpone the item until the thirteenth session, no petitions concerning both these Territories were considered during 1953.

6. Petitions Relating to Togoland, Administered by the United Kingdom

The Council dealt with fifteen petitions concerning Togoland under British administration. Seven, which related to the Ewe and Togoland unification problem, were taken into consideration by the Council during its examination of that question.⁸⁹

Eight petitions⁹⁰ were examined individually. On three petitions (T/Pet.6/317, 318, 319), relating to aspects of the Ewe and Togoland unification problem, the Council noted that the subject matter had been discussed at length in the special report of the 1952 Visiting Mission on that question and was covered by General Assembly resolution 652(VII) of 20 December 1952⁹¹ (resolution 787(XII)).

On two petitions, one raising various political, economic and educational matters (T/Pet.6/323) and the other relating to land alienation (T/Pet.6/324) the Council decided that no further action was necessary (resolutions 791(XII) & 792(XII)).

On one petition (T/Pet.6/320), concerning a dispute over a chieftainship, the Council expressed the hope that the parties concerned would attempt to resolve the question at the earliest possible date to the benefit of all the persons concerned, and requested the Administering Authority to inform it at its next session of any progress made (resolution 788(XII)).

On another petition (T/Pet.6/321), relating to a land or boundary dispute and the cutting of timber in a forest, the Council suggested that, if the petitioner wished to pursue further the matters raised, he should avail himself of the opportunities open to him for doing so in the Territory (resolution 789(XII)).

On a request for scholarship aid (T/Pet.6/322), the Council expressed the hope that any applications for scholarships which might emanate from the Togo Academy would be given sympathetic consideration by the Administering Authority in the light of the opportunities which might be available (resolution 790(XII)).

7. Petitions Relating to Togoland, Administered by France

The Council dealt with 50 written petitions concerning Togoland under French administration.

Two of these (T/Pet.7/L.2, 3), which concerned the Ewe and Togoland unification problem, were taken into consideration by the Council during its examination of that question.⁹²

⁹¹ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 725-26.

⁹² See pp. 640-41.

The remaining 48 petitions were examined individually.⁹³

Eighteen petitions emanated from officers or members of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise or of the Mouvement de la jeunesse togolaise (Juvento) and concerned a succession of events beginning with the elections of 30 March 1952 to the Territorial Assembly and closing with the report of the arrest of the President of the Juvento and others in February 1953. Six of the petitions⁹⁴ concerned matters connected with the Ewe and Togoland unification problem which had been taken into consideration by the General Assembly in its examination of that question at its seventh session; the Council therefore decided that no further action was called for.⁹⁵ On another six of the petitions,⁹⁶ the Council noted the observations of the Administering Authority and decided that no further action was called for.⁹⁷ On three petitions (T/Pet.7/309, 326, 328), the Council decided to take no action, since they contained matters falling within the competence of the courts of the Territory (resolutions 797(XII), 814(XII) & 816(XII)).

On one petition (T/Pet.7/306), in which the Administering Authority was charged with acts of persecution against certain traditional chiefs and members of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise, the Council noted the observations of the Administering Authority (T/Obs.7/6) that the allegations were without foundation, but expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to take all necessary steps to prevent the illegal collection of taxes and that it would encourage the population to make full use of existing educational facilities (resolution 795(XII)).

Two petitions (T/Pet.7/314 & Add.1, 325) contained complaints against the Administering Authority for allegedly interfering with public meetings of Juvento and the Comité de l'Unité togolaise and for intimidating and arresting the leaders of these movements. The Council endorsed the suggestion of the 1952 Visiting Mission that the Administering Authority should take appropriate measures to ensure that the police detailed to maintain law and order did not over-step their authority, and expressed the hope that oral petitioners returning from the United Nations would have adequate opportunity, compatible with the maintenance of public order, to report to the persons on whose behalf they had spoken (resolutions 802(XII) and 813(XII)).

There were sixteen petitions relating to disputes over chieftainships and incidents arising therefrom. On eight of these,⁹⁸ the Council drew the attention of the petitioners to the observations of the Administering Authority and decided that no further action was called for.⁹⁹ On four petitions¹⁰⁰ the Council noted that the requests of the petitioners appeared to have been met and decided that no recommendation was necessary.¹⁰¹ On one petition (T/Pet.7/316), the Council decided to take no action since it related to a matter falling within the competence of the courts of the Territory (resolution 804(XII)).

On two petitions (T/Pet.7/315 & Add.1, 318 & Add.1), which related to a disputed chieftainship in the Canton of Litimé, the Council drew the attention of the petitioners to the statement of the representative of France (T/C.2/SR.66 & 67) enumerating the safeguards provided by the Administration to ensure that chiefs were chosen in accordance with custom and with the wishes of the people and declaring that the means for examining the disputes of chieftainships existed in the Territory in the customary courts and in the Conseil du Contentieux administratif (resolutions 803(XII) & 806(XII)).

One petition (T/Pet.7/320) contained a complaint that the Akposso area was suffering persecution since the departure of the 1952 Visiting Mission and that some persons were forced to remain in exile in the Gold Coast. The Council drew the attention of the petitioner to the observations of the Administering Authority (T/Obs.7/5) and, in particular, to the statement of the representative of France (T/C.2/SR.67) that no judicial proceedings would be instituted against the persons who had gone to the Gold Coast should they return to Togoland under French administration (resolution 808(XII)).

Fourteen petitions related to various problems of an economic and social nature. On eight¹⁰² of these petitions, the Council drew the attention of the petitioners to the observations of the Administering Authority and decided that no further action was called for.¹⁰³ Two petitions (T/

¹⁰¹ Resolutions 820(XII) & 821(XII).

¹⁰² T/Pet.7/321, 323, 324, 337, 338, 339, 344, 346.

¹⁰³ Resolutions 809(XII), 811(XII), 812(XII), 823(XII), 824(XII), 825(XII), 829(XII) & 831(XII).

Pet.7/330, 343) related to matters falling within the competence of the courts of the Territory and the Council therefore took no action thereon (resolutions 818(XII), & 828(XII)).

On one petition (T/Pet.7/322), which contained a protest against the classification of land as forest land, the Council requested the Administering Authority to investigate the petitioner's case to ascertain whether or not, in view of the needs of his large family, he should receive the grant of additional land, or other form of compensation from the Administration (resolution 810(XII)).

On another petition (T/Pet.7/329), requesting, among other things, that the Administering Authority should be urged to give priority to the question of water supplies, the Council expressed the hope that the programme of the Administering Authority for providing wells and pumping stations in the area in question would be carried out as soon as practicable (resolution 817(XII)).

One petition (T/Pet.7/331) contained a complaint against the Administering Authority for not compensating the petitioner for the use of a quarry on his land. The Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would explain the facts of the case to the petitioner (resolution 819(XII)). Another petition (T/Pet.7/348) mentioned, inter alia, the excessive importation of alcoholic beverages and perfumes and the difficulties encountered in importing other needed commodities. The Council recommended that the Administering Authority should give the question of alcoholism its most earnest consideration with a view to taking the necessary measures to curb the increased consumption of alcohol (resolution 833(XII)).

8. Petitions Relating to Both Togolands

The Council dealt with six petitions concerning Togoland under British and Togoland under French administration. Three of them related to the Ewe and Togoland unification problem and were taken into consideration by the Council during its examination of that question.¹⁰⁴

The Council examined three petitions (T/Pet.6 & 7/1, 2, 3)¹⁰⁵ which raised certain aspects of the question of the unification of the two Trust Territories, the first of which also raised the questions of the integration of the British-administered Territory into the Gold Coast and the development of the Volta River Basin.

The Council noted by resolution 793(XII) that the question of the unification of the two Trust Territories had been discussed at length in the special report on that question of the 1953 Visiting Mission, that it was covered by General Assembly resolution 652(VII) of 20 December 1952 and that the question of the development of the Volta River Basin was discussed in the report of the 1952 Visiting Mission on Togoland under British administration.

9. General Petitions

The Council dealt with two written petitions¹⁰⁶ concerning all or most of the Trust Territories.

The first of the petitions (T/Pet.General/21), from the International Abolitionist Federation, had as its object the application in Trust Territories of the provisions of the international instruments concerning the traffic in persons and the exploitation of the prostitution of others. The Council recommended that, in those Trust Territories where the international instruments in question were not in force, the provisions of the instruments should be reflected in the legislation of the Territory, in so far as might be appropriate to the circumstances of the Territory. It also requested the Administering Authorities which had not already done so to furnish it with information on the extent to which the provisions of the instruments were reflected in the legislation of the Territories (resolution 864(XII)).

On the second petition (T/Pet.General/22), from St. Joan's International Social and Political Alliance, which sought the progressive abolition in Trust Territories of the custom of violating the physical integrity of women, the Council decided to draw the attention of the Administering Authorities to the petition and to take up the question during its annual examination of conditions in those Trust Territories where the custom complained of might exist (resolution 865(XII)).

H. PETITION FROM THE NGOA-EKELE COMMUNITY, CAMEROONS UNDER FRENCH ADMINISTRATION, CONCERNING ADJUSTMENT OF THEIR LAND COMPLAINT

At the Assembly's eighth session, at the 318th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 28 September, the Committee decided, by 36 votes to 10, with 6 abstentions, to grant a request from the Ngoa-Ekéle Community, for an oral hearing. Joseph Ndzinga, representative of the Ngoa-Ekéle Community, accordingly made a statement (A/C.4/255) in the Committee at the 382nd meeting on 28 November. At the same meeting and at the 387th meeting on 2 December he answered questions put to him by members of the Committee.

Mr. Ndzinga asked for compensation in respect of certain lands which, he claimed, were expropriated by the French Administration in 1940. He said that his Community had petitioned the 1952 Trusteeship Council Visiting Mission and now looked to the Fourth Committee for a settlement of its problem.

He stated that in 1940 certain land belonging to his Community had been expropriated by the French Administration, and that this had been done without compensation. Members of his Community had received a sum of 299,187 francs, but this, he contended, was hardly equivalent to what was known in French law as damages to which the Community was entitled, to compensate them for the moral prejudice sustained. The authenticity of the rights of the people of the Community was well established both by custom and by French law and jurisprudence in overseas territories. He alleged that threats had been used against members of his Community to compel them to remove to other land, which was not arable and where the people were crowded. Crops and buildings on the expropriated land which were lost by expropriation had caused great suffering to his people.

The claims of the Ngoa-Ekéle Community had been made against the French Administration and had been decided by the Territorial Assembly, which had failed to accede to the request for compensation for the lands. The Community was merely asking for justice, he said.

Replying to questions, Mr. Ndzinga said that the area of the land involved was some 117 hectares, 30 of which had been given to the French Administration in 1935. The land had been alienated to provide installations for military purposes during the Second World War. Mr. Ndzinga also said that he was prepared to have the petition of his Community considered by the Trusteeship Council.

The representative of France said that the expropriation had taken place because of public need and that the procedure followed had been legal and regular. France had never challenged ownership of the land and it had been explained to the Community why the land was needed. The parties had accepted the settlement provided without opposition, he said. The land previously owned by the Community had subsequently become much more valuable with the development of a nearby town and very high prices now paid for similar land in the area had produced a feeling of regret among the Ngoa-Ekéle Community. This, he said, was the substance of the problem.

At the 389th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 3 December, Lebanon, Liberia and Pakistan submitted a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.327). They accepted and incorporated in a revised draft (A/C.4/L.327/Rev.1) two French oral amendments.

By 49 votes to none, with 1 abstention, the Committee adopted the amended joint draft resolution, and this resolution (A/2608) was adopted, in turn, by the General Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 1 December, by 47 votes to none, with 1 abstention, as resolution 757 (VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having heard the declaration and answers of the representative of the Ngoa-Ekéle Community, Cameroons under French administration,

"Bearing in mind the observations and explanations given by the Administering Authority,

"1. Notes the steps already taken by the Administering Authority to assist the Ngoa-Ekéle Community to settle on other lands;

"2. Suggests to the Administering Authority to take all necessary steps which can in a satisfactory manner alleviate the difficulties experienced by the Ngoa-Ekéle Community in the process of their re-establishment;

"3. Recommends that assistance be also given by the Administering Authority to the Ngoa-Ekéle Community for it to avail itself of whatever legal recourse remains open in connexion with the lands on which they were originally settled and whatever further compensation might be possible;

"4. Recommends to the Administering Authority to further its purpose of allotting to the Ngoa-Ekéle Community an adequate area of lands by delimiting these lands in accordance with the legal procedures obtaining in the Trust Territory;

"5. Invites the Trusteeship Council to examine this question in the light of the present resolution and to include in its next report to the General Assembly the results of its examination."

I. THE EWE AND TOGOLAND UNIFICATION PROBLEM

The unification problem was first brought to the attention of the United Nations in 1947, when the All-Ewe Conference petitioned for the unification of the Ewe people living in the British Gold Coast and the southern portions of Togoland under British administration and Togoland under French administration. The Comité de l'Unité togolaise associated itself with the objectives of the All-Ewe Conference, and both groups later joined in support of demands being made by the Togoland Union and the Togoland Congress for the unification and independence of the two Togolands, as distinguished from the unification of the Eweinhabited areas. Opposition to these unification movements was led by the Parti togolais du progrès and the Union des chefs et des populations du nord du Togo, in Togoland under French administration, and by groups in Togoland under United Kingdom administration desiring closer association with the Gold Coast.

After establishing two successive consultative commissions to ascertain the real wishes and interests of the peoples of the two Trust Territories, the Administering Authorities in 1951 proposed in a joint memorandum to the Trusteeship Council the establishment of a Joint Council for Togo-land Affairs to advise the Administering Authorities on matters of common concern to the two Togolands and to assist in harmonizing development in these Territories. This proposal was endorsed on 24 July 1951 by the Trusteeship Council, which recommended, however, that the scope of the Joint Council's functions be sufficiently broad to enable it to exercise its functions with respect to all questions of common concern to the people of the two Territories, including questions of political, economic, social, educational and cultural development. The Trusteeship Council also recommended that the Joint Council be so organized as to ensure, if possible, the participation of the major groups in both Territories (resolution 345(IX)).

By resolution 555(VI) of 18 January 1952, the Assembly urged the two Administering Authorities and the peoples involved to make every effort to reach a prompt, constructive and equitable settlement of the problem, taking fully into account the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned. It recommended that the Administering Authorities consult fully with the various parties and groups concerned with a view to devising satisfactory procedures for electing representatives to the Joint Council and that the Council's powers be extended to enable it to consider and make recommendations on all aspects of the Ewe and Togoland unification problem. The Trusteeship Council was asked, in view of the urgency of the problem, to devote more intensive attention to all its aspects.

The Trusteeship Council, on 3 March 1952, unanimously decided, by resolution 424(X), that its next Visiting Mission to Togoland under United Kingdom administration and Togoland under French administration should spend at least one month in these Territories, and that it should submit its report on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem in time for consideration by the Trusteeship Council at a second part of its eleventh session, to be convened not later than 7 November 1952.

On 25 October 1952, the Mission unanimously adopted its special report to the Council on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem.¹¹²

The special report (T/1034 & Add.1) was considered by the General Assembly at its seventh session. On 20 December 1952, the Assembly adopted resolution 652(VII),¹¹³ in which, among other things, it urged the Administering Authorities to take steps to bring about a prompt, constructive and equitable solution of the problem, and urged the re-establishment of the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs. The Assembly also noted that the Trusteeship Council had requested the Administering Authorities to report fully on steps taken by them pursuant to the report of the 1952 Visiting Mission. The Assembly further asked that such reports include an account of steps taken pursuant to resolution 652(VII), as well as an account of all factors affecting the unification question. The Trusteeship Council was asked to submit a special report to the eighth session of the General Assembly.

1. Consideration by the Trusteeship Council

At the twelfth session of the Trusteeship Council, France and the United Kingdom submitted the text (T/1067/Rev.1) of a public announcement made in both Trust Territories on 12 June 1953 concerning action to be taken in pursuance of certain paragraphs of the General Assembly resolution relating to the re-constitution of the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs. At the 481st meeting of the Council on 15 July 1953, the representatives of France and the United Kingdom, in oral statements, supplemented the information contained in the text of the announcement and gave additional information relating to other paragraphs of the Assembly's resolution. At the same meeting, the Council decided that the information given in this manner by the Administering Authorities should form the basis of its special report to the General Assembly on this matter (A/2424).

According to the special report, both Administering Authorities stressed the need for a settlement of the question. The public announcement of 12 June 1953 stated that the Administering Authorities were now inviting all sections of the population to make known their views concerning the principles on which the Joint Council should be reconstituted. A thorough exchange of views, it was stated, had taken place between the Administering Authorities before the announcement. With regard to the terms of reference of the Joint Council, the public announcement stated that the basic need was to evolve terms of reference which would enable the Joint Council to consider the common problems of both Territories. Moreover, the principal objective must be to ensure that the Joint Council was adequately representative of all sections of the population; constructive comment, it was stated by the Administering Authorities, could best be directed to the possibility of using existing electoral machinery to bring this about. The Administering Authorities had formulated two principles in this connexion: that the total number of seats in the Joint Council should be such as to ensure that the representatives of Togoland under British administration should be sufficient to enable them to discharge the tasks which they would have to assume; and that a voting rule should be established guaranteeing to these representatives that proposals which did not secure the approval of a majority of their number could not be adopted by the Joint Council as a whole.

In response to that part of resolution 652(VII) which urged the Administering Authorities to give increasing attention to the possibilities of promoting and expediting the general development of the Territories provided by the United Nations Expanded Programme of technical assistance, the Administering Authorities gave details of development currently taking place. On the question of frontier difficulties, the Administering Authorities stated that they were continuing, in collaboration, to take all practicable steps to alleviate the minor inconveniences which still arose from time to time as a result of the existence of an international frontier between the two Territories. They also stated that close contact was being maintained between the two Governments with a view to the promotion of common policies on political, economic and social matters of mutual concern.

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session

At its eighth session, the General Assembly considered the questions relating to the Ewe and Togoland unification problem, at the 318th, 319th, 343rd and 365th to 370th meetings of the Fourth Committee, on 28 and 29 September, 26 October and 13 to 23 November 1953, and at the 469th plenary meeting on 8 December.

Before discussing the special report of the Trusteeship Council on the Ewe and Togoland Unification Problem (A/2424), the Fourth Committee considered requests from organizations and political parties for their representatives to make oral statements before the Committee on the matter.

a. STATEMENTS BY REPRESENTATIVES OF PETITIONERS

The Fourth Committee decided to grant hearings to the following parties and organizations:

the All-Ewe Conference (A/C.4/232), at the 318th meeting; the Joint Togoland Congress (A/C.4/235), at the 319th meeting, by 41 votes to 1, with 11 abstentions; the Parti togolais du progrès (A/C.4/242), at the 343rd meeting. A similar request from the Buem-Krachi District Council was received on 14 November, when the Committee was nearing the end of its consideration of the item. It therefore decided, at its 368th meeting on 16 November, to inform the petitioners that this request had been received too late for consideration at the current session.

Representatives of the organization concerned accordingly appeared before the Fourth Committee. Two representatives of the Joint Togoland Congress, Senyo G. Antor and Alex K. Odame made statements at the 365th meeting of the Committee on 13 November; and a third, R. E. G. Armattoe, at the 367th meeting on 16 November. At this meeting, a statement was also made by Frederic Brenner, representative of the Parti togolais du progrès. Sylvanus Olympio, representative of the All-Ewe Conference made a statement at the 366th meeting on 13 November. After they had submitted general presentations, the petitioners answered questions put by members of the Committee, at the 365th to 370th meetings, from 13 to 17 November.

In his statement (A/C.4/247), Mr. Antor said, among other things, that membership of the Joint Togoland Congress was 176,593, of a total population of 383,563 in Togoland under British administration. He also alleged that there had been deliberate delays in establishing the Joint Togoland Council and that the Government of the United Kingdom was attempting to integrate the Trust Territory of Togoland under its administration into the Gold Coast. The United Kingdom, he said, was thus disregarding, not only the expressed wishes of the people of Togoland, but also the resolutions of the General Assembly. Mr. Antor asked for an immediate review of existing conditions in the Territory, the revision of the Trusteeship Agreement and the re-establishment of the Joint Council.

Mr. Odame asserted in his statement (A/C.4/248) that the United Kingdom and France had violated the basic principles of the Trusteeship Agreements for the two Trust Territories of Togoland. He charged that the Trusteeship Council and its Visiting Mission to the Territory had refused to perform their duty to the people and that they had joined with the Administering Powers in a concerted policy aimed at the defeat of the basic guarantees to the people of Togoland. A solution of the problem lay in a change of the terms of the Trusteeship Agreements. The goal of gradual development towards self-government or independence should be maintained, he stated. If the Trusteeship Council continued its present policy, however, progressive self-government would be defeated, and Togoland would be relegated to the status of a colony.

In his statement (A/C.4/252), Dr. Armattoe said that the people of Togoland were ready for self-government, which should be accorded them. The people of Togoland wanted the unification of the two Trust Territories and they believed it was within the competence of the General Assembly to bring about the realization of this aim. The two Trust Territories had a territorial integrity which should be respected. The Togolese did not want association with the Gold Coast unless it were as a result of their own negotiations, as would be the case in an agreed customs union.

Dr. Armattoe also warned that the effect of African problems was not confined to that continent. He added that United Nations Visiting Missions to Togoland were unable to report on all they had seen, as there was a feeling that adverse opinions should not be rendered by visiting missions. This, he said, weakened the faith of the people in the United Nations.

Mr. Brenner, in his statement (A/C.4/251), reminded the Committee that there were two questions involving unification. The first was the unification of the Ewe people, now living in areas of both Togolands and in the Gold Coast. The second was the question of the unification of the two Trust Territories of Togoland—the only question that concerned his organization. Claiming to represent a majority of the people of Togoland under French administration, Mr. Brenner said that his party sought the peaceful acceleration of internal self-government. The only problem of importance to the Territory was its economic, social, cultural and political development with a view to the attainment of internal self-government. In his opinion, it was a matter first of eliminating frontier difficulties and, if necessary, after a period of positive development, of allowing the two parties in Togoland to express themselves honestly and freely in order to ascertain whether unification of the two Togolands was possible or desirable. His party wanted education of the people accelerated so that it would be capable of deciding the question for itself.

Mr. Brenner contended that the immense majority of Togoland people rejected the re-establishment of the Joint Togoland Council.

They wanted a widening of the powers of the Territorial Assembly and the formation of an eight-member Council of Government designated by that Assembly. They did not want a unification of the Ewe people which would result in the partition and death of Togoland. Mr. Brenner said that the people of French Togoland wanted training to equip them for self-government. The Parti togolais du progrès wanted to accelerate development but it did not want precipitate action. Development of administrative talent was necessary as a means of averting disorder and providing a sound basis for independence; the goal of independence could be achieved only through reform and the exercise of responsibility.

In his statement (A/C.4/250), Mr. Olympio said that little was being done to implement the Assembly's request in resolution 652(VII), which called for, among other things, the re-establishment of the Joint Council. He alleged that in Togoland under French administration public meetings were disallowed and restrictive measures enforced to prevent public meetings arranged by the All-Ewe Conference to discuss this question. Meetings of the Parti togolais du progrès, an opposition party, were allowed by the Administering Authority, he claimed.

Mr. Olympio also stated that the establishment of self-government in the Gold Coast would have a far-reaching effect on the Ewe unification movement and would affect both the Togolands. The people of Togoland wanted a democratic Joint Council to represent its views. Greater responsibility should be given to the Togolese in Togoland under French administration and they should be allowed to qualify for posts in the administrative organization of that Territory, he said.

b. STATEMENTS BY THE ADMINISTERING AUTHORITIES AND CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE SPECIAL REPORT

The special report of the Trusteeship Council was considered by the Fourth Committee at its 365th to 377th meetings, from 13 to 23 November. At the 365th meeting and at the close of the general debate on this question, statements were made by the representatives of France and the United Kingdom.

The representative of France said that his Government had shown itself prepared to afford opportunities to bring the people of Togoland together to reduce their difficulties. The demand for the unification of the Ewe people, he argued, had no sound basis and the unification of the two Trust Territories of Togoland was not a practical possibility. The Fourth Committee should be concerned only with the evolution of the two Territories towards self-government.

France, he said, was preparing to widen the powers of the Territorial Assembly and legislation to this effect would probably be enacted the following year. Plans for the re-establishment of the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs had been categorically rejected by the people. There had been an increase in the number of local communities in Togoland under French Administration now controlling their own affairs; although suffrage was not universal, voting qualifications were reasonable and the registration of voters was under judicial control. Freedom of public meeting and freedom of the Press were guaranteed by France. There had been no deterioration in the frontier situation. In its schools, Togoland under French administration was one of the most advanced of the African areas. France was working for the gradual elimination of difficulties in the situation and any untimely or premature decision for a solution of the problem could compromise what France was trying to achieve.

The representative of the United Kingdom said that his Government was fully aware of its responsibilities regarding Togoland under British administration both to the people of the Territory and to the United Nations, in accordance with the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement. It was firm in its intention that the freely expressed wishes of the people should be ascertained in a manner which seemed best to meet their aspirations. Although his Government respected the role of the United Nations in this matter, it urged that the Assembly should not prejudge a solution based on the wishes of the people. The pace of progress in Africa had quickened in the last few years, but it was necessary to take a long-term view. Through consultation, his country was trying to evaluate the different views prevailing in the Territory and to devise a formula which would reconcile them. The United Kingdom wished to aid in the evolution of institutions of government which would give the people an ever-increasing interest and responsibility in the management of their own affairs. It had been developing a system of local government which would ensure that, at all levels of activity, the people of the locality would decide the trend of policy. The United Kingdom Government, he said, was anxious to secure the re-establishment of the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs and to find, in co-operation with the French authorities, a formula which would serve as a basis for the reconstitution of this Council and would secure majority support for it in the two Trust Territories. Both the United Kingdom Government and the Government of the Gold Coast, he added, fully recognized that the future of Togoland under British administration was a matter for the United Nations and the Administering Authorities in the light of the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned.

In the general debate, the representative of the United States maintained that the wishes of the inhabitants should be the most important element in determining whether all or parts of Togoland should be united, that the advocates of unification were not however in agreement on exactly what kind of unification they wanted, and that the second Visiting Mission pointed out that a large number of people were opposed to unification. The representative of India stressed that the destiny of Togoland lay with the people themselves and that the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly should not ignore the failure of the Administering Authorities to implement the resolutions on the subject of unification. The representatives of the USSR and the Byelorussian SSR felt that, not only had the Administering Authorities done nothing to promote unification, but had done everything to prevent it. The representatives of Brazil and Burma urged that constructive methods should be employed to give expression to the wishes of the people. The General Assembly should take action in this matter.

The Administering Authorities, in the opinion of the representatives of Poland, Syria, the USSR, and Yugoslavia, were contravening the terms of the Charter or the Trusteeship Agreements; in the opinion of the representatives of Indonesia and Brazil, they were failing or delaying to implement the terms of Assembly resolution 653(VII).

A number of representatives, among them those of Pakistan, Poland, the USSR and Yugoslavia, felt that the free expression of the will of the people of Togoland was being hampered. Some representatives, among them those of Cuba and Guatemala, considered the electoral laws in Togoland unjustifiable.

The representatives of Egypt and Pakistan called for a unification of policies of the Administering Authorities of both Trust Territories of Togoland. Attention was called to the difficulties being encountered on the frontier dividing the two Trust Territories by the representatives of Pakistan, the Philippines and Venezuela.

Urging the reconstitution of the Joint Council, the representatives of Argentina, China, Cuba, Indonesia, the Philippines and Venezuela either suggested that the Council should be enlarged and its powers increased or felt that the reconstitution of the Council would be an important step towards the establishment of independence for the Trust Territories.

The representative of Syria called attention to constitutional developments in the Gold Coast which directly and rightly concerned the people of both Togolands. Similar concern was expressed by the representatives of Yugoslavia and Venezuela.

Stressing the conflicting and evolving opinions of the peoples in the Togolands, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, Norway and the United States stated that the problems faced in the Territories as well as the suggested solutions were complex and demanded an unhurried approach. The representatives of Canada, Denmark and New Zealand stressed that the General Assembly should not attempt to prejudge the solution to such problems, nor should it attempt to impose on the Administering Authorities any solution of its own making. The representatives of Belgium and Denmark said that the reconstitution of the Joint Council had been opposed by the people of Togoland themselves and that no blame could therefore attach to the Administering Authorities for the failure of the Council. The representative of Belgium called attention to the opposition of the people of Togoland to elections for the reconstitution of the Joint Council.

c. RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY
THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The Fourth Committee had before it three draft resolutions with amendments:

(1) A joint draft resolution by Argentina, Egypt, Lebanon, Liberia, Pakistan, the Philippines and Venezuela (A/C.4/L.308) providing for the re-establishment of the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs. Amendments to this draft were proposed by Iraq (A/C.4 L.311), which was withdrawn in favour of an amendment submitted jointly by Egypt and Iraq (A/C.4/L.314), and an amendment by New Zealand (A/C.4/L.313).

(2) A joint draft resolution by Brazil, Cuba, India, Indonesia, the Philippines and Syria (A/C.4/L.309) providing for the introduction of universal suffrage in the two Trust Territories. An amendment to this draft was proposed by Denmark (A/C.4/L.315).

(3) A joint draft resolution by Brazil, India, Indonesia, Liberia, the Philippines and Syria (A/C.4/L.310 & Rev.1) concerning the relationship of the two Trust Territories of Togoland to the constitutional developments in the Gold Coast. Amendments to this draft were submitted by Chile and China jointly (A/C.4/L.312), by Colombia (A/C.4/L.316—a resubmission of part of the joint amendment which had been withdrawn) and by the United Kingdom (A/C.4/L.317).

The seven-Power joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.308) made recommendations among other things concerning: the re-establishment of the Joint Council; the expression by political parties in Togoland of views concerning unification; the dissemination in the Territories of the resolutions of the Assembly and the Trusteeship Council; and the adoption by the Administering Authorities of measures to promote common policies in the two Trust Territories. (For text of the resolution, as adopted, see below.)

The sponsors of this joint draft stressed the need for co-operation on the part of the Administering Authorities in bringing about unification, the need for uniform systems in the two Territories and the part that could be played by the Joint Council in matters of common concern to the two Territories, improving conditions in economic, social and educational fields and aiding achievement of the goal of independence. Support for the seven-Power draft, with or without reservations, was expressed by the representatives of Canada, Chile, China, Cuba, Guatemala, Syria, the United States and Uruguay.

The amendment by Egypt and Iraq (A/C.4/L.314) proposed to add to the seven-Power draft a recommendation that France and the United Kingdom take all steps to ensure freedom of speech, movement and assembly in all parts of the Territories in order to help political parties explain freely their views on unification. The joint amendment was adopted by 52 votes to none at the Committee's 370th meeting on 23 November.

The New Zealand amendment (A/C.4/L.313) would call for a redrafting of that part of the seven-Power proposal which expressed the hope that the political parties would co-operate to achieve an acceptable formula on unification. It was supported by the representatives of Denmark, France, Norway and the United States, but was rejected at the Committee's 370th meeting by 22 votes to 19, with 9 abstentions.

The Assembly considered the draft resolution proposed by the Committee (A/2605) at its 469th plenary meeting on 9 December. The representative of New Zealand asked for a separate vote on the words "which will facilitate the unification of the two Trust Territories" in paragraph 10 (see below). His Government, he said, could only vote for the resolution if it did not contain these words which, in his opinion, prejudged the issue. The paragraph was voted on in two parts and the phrase in question was adopted by 32 votes to 14, with 6 abstentions, the first part of the paragraph being adopted by 53 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 46 votes to none, with 9 abstentions, as resolution 750 A (VIII).

The French representative explained his abstention on the grounds that the premise that the unification of the two Togolands was the wish of the majority of the inhabitants was inaccurate.

Resolution 750 A (VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having examined the special report of the Trusteeship Council on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem,

"Taking into account the conclusion contained in the special report of the 1952 United Nations Visiting Mission (T/1034) that the people of the Trust Territories desire in principle unification of the two Trust Territories',

"Recalling that the General Assembly based its resolution 652 (VII) of 20 December 1952 upon the consideration, inter alia, that the unification of the two parts of Togoland is the manifest aspiration of the majority of the population of the two Trust Territories,

"Considering that the best means of achieving a form of unification acceptable to all groups of the population is through direct and continuous interchange of opinions among the representatives of those groups, and that such interchange of opinions could be realized in a reconstituted Joint Council for Togoland Affairs with ample powers to examine all aspects of the problem of unification of both Territories and to formulate pertinent recommendations,

"Having heard the declarations of the representatives of the All-Ewe Conference, of the Joint Togoland Congress and of the Parti togolais du progrès,

"Having heard also the declarations of the representatives of the Administering Authorities concerned,

"1. Regrets that the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs has not yet been re-established;

"2. Reaffirms the principles and aims of its resolutions 555 (VI) and 652 (VII) approved on 18 January and 20 December 1952 respectively;

"3. Recommends that, in order to ensure that the Joint Council will faithfully reflect the wishes of all sections of the population of the two Trust Territories, its members should be directly elected by universal adult suffrage and secret ballot;

"4. Recommends that the Administering Authorities establish, in consultation with the representatives of the different political parties, the rules concerning the structure which the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs should assume;

"5. Recommends that the Administering Authorities assist the representatives of the different political parties to explain freely throughout Togoland their views on the problem of unification and, to this effect, that they take all necessary measures to ensure freedom of speech, movement and assembly in all parts of the Territories;

"6. Recommends that the Administering Authorities disseminate throughout the two Trust Territories the complete texts of the pertinent resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Trusteeship Council in the main vernacular languages as well as in French or in English;

"7. Recommends to the Administering Authorities the re-establishment of the Joint Council with the power to consider and make recommendations on the question of unification, as well as on all political, economic, social and educational matters affecting the two Trust Territories, and to serve as a means of ascertaining the opinions of the inhabitants of the Territories concerning any proposed changes in the terms of the Trusteeship Agreement for either of the Territories;

"8. Re-emphasizes its recommendation that, through the Joint Council and in other ways, the Administering Authorities adopt measures to promote common policies on political, economic and social matters of mutual concern to the two Trust Territories, and expresses the opinion that the implementation of this recommendation requires that the Administering Authorities accord to each Territory simultaneously a large measure of progress towards the objectives of Article 76 of the Charter and harmonize in all major respects the political, economic, social and educational policies and systems applying in the two Trust Territories;

"9. Invites the Trusteeship Council to submit to the General Assembly at its ninth session a special report concerning the steps which have been taken towards the implementation of the present resolution;

"10. Expresses the hope that the different political parties of both Territories will co-operate to achieve a formula acceptable to all which will facilitate the unification of the two Trust Territories."

The joint draft resolution of Brazil, Cuba, India, Indonesia, the Philippines and Syria (A/C.4/L.309) would have the Assembly: (1) urgently invite the Administering Authorities "immediately" to revise the system of electoral qualifications in force in the Territories to provide for universal, direct and adult suffrage; and (2) recommend the co-operation of the political parties in the two Territories. (For text of resolution, as adopted, see below.)

The sponsors of the joint draft accepted the Danish amendment which called for the replacement of the word "immediately" in the first operative paragraph by "as rapidly as possible" and the amendment was withdrawn in favour of the revised text (A/C.4/L.309/Rev.1). The joint draft was supported by, among others, the representatives of Argentina, Syria, Uruguay and Venezuela, but opposed by the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom.

The sponsors of the joint draft resolution considered that the General Assembly should insist that more be done by the Administering Authorities to promote the unification of the two Territories and to ensure that the interests of the indigenous inhabitants were assisted by the introduction of universal suffrage. Good-will was essential to the achievement of this goal, they stated. Support for the revised joint draft was expressed by the representatives of Argentina, China, Cuba, Guatemala, Uruguay and the United States, among others. On the other hand, the representatives of Canada, France, New Zealand and the United Kingdom expressed their opposition.

The Committee, at its 376th meeting on 23 November, first adopted by 48 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, that part of the preamble which took note of part of the text of the announcement by the two Administering Authorities, and then adopted the draft resolution, as a whole, by 48 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

The draft resolution adopted by the Committee (A/2605) was, in turn, adopted by the General Assembly at its 469th plenary meeting on 8 December, by 52 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions, as resolution 750 B (VIII).

The representative of France stated that while his delegation approved the principle on which the resolution was based, he had abstained because of the close connexion between that resolution and the one just adopted.

Resolution 750 B (VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that there is an urgent need to develop fully in the two parts of Togoland a system of universal suffrage and that it is consequently essential to establish effective facilities for electoral registration, with a view to the formation of an electoral body truly representative of the population of each Territory as a whole,

"Noting paragraph (b) of the text of the announcement made by the two Administering Authorities on 12 June 1953 concerning the re-establishment of the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs,

"Noting further the observations made on this matter by the petitioners heard by the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly, as well as the statements made by the representatives of the Administering Authorities,

"1. Urgently invites the Administering Authorities to revise the system of electoral qualifications in force in the Territories and to put into effect a method of electoral registration based on personal identification which shall permit all adult persons to qualify for the right to vote and shall ensure that electoral consultations be carried out in accordance with the democratic principle of universal, direct and secret suffrage so as to reflect the opinion of the population as a whole;

"2. Recommends that the political parties in the two Territories collaborate closely with the respective Administering Authorities with a view to carrying out the identification of the adult persons for electoral purposes."

The joint draft resolution by Brazil, India, Indonesia, Liberia, the Philippines and Syria (A/C.4/L.310 & Rev.1) proposed that the Assembly should:

(1) express the opinion that further changes in the Constitution of the Gold Coast, with which Togoland under British administration was administered as an integral part, might, to the extent that they provided for an increased measure of self-government, necessitate revision of the existing Trusteeship Agreement in respect of the Trust Territory in so far as concerns the existing administrative union;

(2) consider that, in view of the manifest aspiration of the majority of the population of both the Trust Territories of Togoland for the unification of those Territories, any change in the Trusteeship Agreement for Togoland under British administration would necessarily affect the interests of the inhabitants of Togoland under French administration; and

(3) consider further that any revision of the Trusteeship Agreement for Togoland under British administration with a view to the integration or annexation of the Trust Territory, or any part of it, to the Gold Coast would be contrary to the principles and purposes of the International Trusteeship System.

The joint draft would further request the Trusteeship Council to re-examine and report on the problem of achieving in the two Trust Territories the basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System, having particular regard to the special circumstances created by the constitutional and political situation in the Gold Coast. (For text of resolution, as adopted, see below.)

The third operative paragraph was revised by the sponsors (A/C.4/L.310/Rev.1) to have the Assembly consider that the integration of Togoland under British administration, or any part of it, to the Gold Coast before both Territories had attained self-government or independence, would be contrary to the principles and purposes of the International Trusteeship System.

The first part of the joint amendment by Chile and China (A/C.4/L.312) proposed to re-draft the first paragraph of the draft resolution to have the General Assembly express the opinion that further changes in the Constitution of the Gold Coast, with which Togoland under British administration was administered as an integral part, might, to the extent that they provided for an increased measure of self-government, convert the existing administrative union into a political union and affect the status of the Trust Territory as a separate international entity in such a way as to necessitate revision of the existing Trusteeship Agreement.

The Committee rejected this amendment at its 376th meeting by 29 votes to 19, with 1 abstention.

The second part of the joint amendment proposed the deletion of the third operative paragraph. It was withdrawn by the sponsors but was re-introduced by Colombia (A/C.4/L.316). The representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States supported the Colombian amendment; Colombia, however, withdrew the amendment in favour of a United Kingdom amendment (A/C.4/L.317) which would replace the third operative paragraph by the following text:

"Considers further that the integration of Togoland under British administration, or any part of it, to the Gold Coast can only be accepted as a satisfactory termination of the Trusteeship Agreement if the prior agreement of the General Assembly is obtained by the Administering Authority in the light of the principles and purposes of the International Trusteeship System".

Introducing this amendment, the representative of the United Kingdom said that its purpose was to meet some of the anxieties expressed by members of the Committee.

Support for the United Kingdom amendment was expressed by the representatives of Belgium and the United States, but it was opposed by the representatives of Guatemala, India, the Philippines, Syria and Yugoslavia.

The amendment was, however, rejected at the Committee's 376th meeting by a roll-call vote of 30 to 15, with 8 abstentions.

The Committee adopted the draft resolution in parts, by votes ranging from 31 to 7, with 14 abstentions, to 49 to 1, with 4 abstentions. It adopted the draft, as a whole, by a roll-call vote of 33 to 8, with 12 abstentions.

The resolution adopted by the Committee (A/2605) was considered by the General Assembly at its 469th plenary meeting on 8 December. The United Kingdom representative, in opposing the third paragraph, on which he requested a separate vote, expressed the view that the proposition stated therein was not in accordance with the letter or spirit of the Charter and would limit the application of the principle of the self-determination of peoples. The Indian representative, on the other hand, stated that the resolution as a whole conformed to the Charter and nothing in it militated against the future of the Territory being determined in accordance with the wishes of the inhabitants.

The third paragraph, which was voted on separately, would have the Assembly state that the integration of Togoland under British administration, or any part thereof, with the Gold Coast before both had attained self-government or independence would be contrary to the principles and purposes of the Trusteeship System. On this paragraph, 28 votes were cast in favour, 17 against, and 3 abstentions and, failing to secure the necessary two-thirds majority, the paragraph was accordingly rejected. In separate votes, the remaining parts were adopted by votes of 40 to 5, with 11 abstentions, and 40 to none, with 12 abstentions.

The Assembly adopted the amended resolution, as a whole, by 37 votes to 3, with 12 abstentions, as resolution 750 C (VIII).

The representative of France stated that the rejection of the third paragraph had made it possible for him to reconsider his negative vote in the Fourth Committee and to abstain on the resolution.

Resolution 750 C (VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting that Togoland under British administration is administered as an integral part of the Gold Coast, the Government of which has published a series of proposals for constitutional changes designed to effect a further transfer of executive and legislative powers from the Administering Authority to the Gold Coast Government and to serve as an interim measure leading towards full self-government for the Gold Coast within the British Commonwealth of Nations,

"Noting that in the course of these proposals the Government of the Gold Coast expressed confidence that the United Nations Organization will not fail to give satisfaction to the frequently reiterated and unanimous demand of the people of the Northern Section for their area to become part of the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast and stated further that 'there is a growing opinion in Southern Togoland in favour of integration with the Gold Coast',

"Noting also that, in anticipation of further constitutional changes in the Gold Coast, the 1952 United Nations Visiting Mission, in its report on Togoland under British administration, raised with some urgency the question of the compatibility of the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement with any further appreciable transfer of executive and legislative authority to the Government of the Gold Coast, and expressed the opinion that the prospect of a further constitutional advance in the Gold Coast may require the position of the Trust Territory to be reviewed with particular care within a relatively short period of time,

"Recalling further that the Visiting Missions of 1949 and 1952 and the Trusteeship Council at its eleventh session have recognized that the question of the future constitutional association of Togoland with the Gold Coast depends to a large extent upon the settlement of the unification problem,

"1. Expresses the opinion that further changes in the Constitution of the Gold Coast, with which Togoland under British administration is administered as an integral part, may, to the extent that they provide for an increased measure of self-government, necessitate revision of the existing Trusteeship Agreement in respect of the Trust Territory in so far as concerns the existing administrative union;

"2. Considers that, in view of the manifest aspiration of the majority of the population of both the Trust Territories of Togoland for the unification of those Territories, any change in the Trusteeship Agreement for Togoland under British administration will necessarily affect the interests of the inhabitants of Togoland under French administration;

"3. Requests the Trusteeship Council, at its thirteenth session, to re-examine in all aspects the problem of achieving in the two Trust Territories the basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System as set forth in Article 76 of the Charter and, in particular, the progressive development of the inhabitants towards self-government or independence as may be appropriate to the particular circumstances of the Territories and their peoples and their freely expressed wishes, having particular regard to the special circumstances created by the constitutional and political situation in the Gold Coast as it affects both Togoland under British administration and Togoland under French administration;

"4. Requests the Trusteeship Council to submit to the General Assembly at its ninth session a special report on this problem."

J. ADMINISTRATIVE UNIONS AFFECTING TRUST TERRITORIES

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 649(VII),¹¹⁴ the Trusteeship Council, at its 477th plenary meeting on 9 July 1953, authorized (resolution 645(XII)) its Standing Committee on Administrative Unions to continue its regular examination of each administrative union affecting a Trust Territory, and to study the administrative unions, not only with regard to the four safeguards¹¹⁵ enumerated in Trusteeship Council resolution 293(VII), but also with regard to the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory and the terms of the Charter and of the Trusteeship Agreements, as well as any other matters which it might deem appropriate.

The Standing Committee accordingly examined the operation of the administrative union affecting New Guinea and submitted its report (T/L.388), which was considered by the Council during its twelfth session, at its 482nd meeting on 20 July. The Council decided that the conclusions contained in the report of the Standing Committee should be included as the Council's own conclusions.

With regard to the safeguard enumerated in sub-paragraph 7 (a) of Council resolution 293 (VII), recommending that the Administering Authorities furnish clear and precise separate financial, statistical and other data, the Council noted that the annual report on the administration of New Guinea for the year 1951-52 contained such data relating to the Trust Territory of New Guinea. It further noted that, with regard to the Council's wish that future reports should indicate which of the classified posts in the Public Service of the Territory of Papua and New Guinea applied to the administration of the Trust Territory, the annual report for 1951-52 showed the positions of the Public Service of Papua and New Guinea at 30 June 1952, partly as common to the Trust Territory of New Guinea, partly separately for the Trust Territory of New Guinea and for the Territory of Papua. The table showing the positions separately for the Trust Territory of New Guinea indicated which classified positions were held by staff members in the Trust Territory; their respective salaries were set out in table 3 of appendix II of the annual report for 1951-52 showing the classified positions and salaries of the Public Service of Papua and New Guinea. The Council also noted that the annual report for 1951-52 contained more statistical data than the report for 1950-51, especially concerning production and communications. In this connexion, the Council noted that the representative of Australia in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly had stated, on 5 December 1952, that separate statistical and other information was submitted.

With regard to the safeguard enumerated in sub-paragraph 7 (b) of resolution 293(VII), namely that the Administering Authorities facilitate the access of visiting missions to such information as might enable them to report fully, the Council noted that the second Visiting Mission to the Trust Territories in the Pacific, 1953, upon the invitation of the Government of Australia, visited the headquarters of the central administration of Papua and New Guinea at Port Moresby from 9 to 13 April 1953, and that the Mission was invited to visit institutions common to both Territories.

With regard to the safeguard enumerated in sub-paragraph 7 (c) of resolution 293(VII), recommending that the Administering Authorities continue to maintain the boundaries, separate status and identity of Trust Territories participating in administrative unions, the Council noted that no information existed which would suggest that the boundaries between Papua and the Trust

¹¹⁵ The four safeguards are listed in Y.U.N., 1950, p. 795.

Territory had not been maintained, and that the annual report on the administration of the Territory of New Guinea for 1951-52 stated that the separate territorial boundaries of the Territory of Papua and the Territory of New Guinea were maintained.

The Council further noted that, under the Administrative Districts Ordinance, 1951, the Administration is authorized to divide the Territory into Districts, declare their names and define their boundaries and, from time to time, to alter the names and boundaries of the Districts, and that during 1951-52 the number of Districts of New Guinea was increased from eight to nine by the division of the Central Highlands District into two Districts known as Eastern Highlands and Western Highlands. According to the annual report on New Guinea for 1951-52, the boundaries of all nine Districts are within the territorial boundary of the Trust Territory.

The Council noted the statement of the representative of Australia, made in the 44th meeting of the Standing Committee on 14 July 1953, that the Administering Authority had no intention of establishing Districts which would stretch across the international boundary between Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea.

The Council also noted that the second Visiting Mission to the Trust Territories in the Pacific, 1953, stated in its report on New Guinea (T/1056) that it had gained the impression that the status of New Guinea as a Trust Territory was preserved and that, except for purposes of administrative organization and the Legislative Council, it constituted a distinct entity. At Port Moresby, the Mission was informed by the Administrator that the distinction made in the administration of the Territory was that the identity and status of the Territory of New Guinea as a Trust Territory would continue to be maintained.

With regard to the safeguard enumerated in sub-paragraph 7 (d) of resolution 293(VII), to the effect that the Administering Authorities should ensure that expenditures for the benefit of any Trust Territory should not, in any given year, be less than the amount of public revenue derived from that Territory, the Council noted that, according to information contained in the annual report for 1951-52, internal revenue totalled £1,480,875, that a grant of £3,126,059 was made by the Administering Authority, and that the expenditure amounted to £4,612,434. Therefore, expenditure in the Territory for 1951-52 has not been less than the total amount of revenue derived from the Territory.

The Council further noted that the Administrator of the Territory informed the second Visiting Mission to the Trust Territories in the Pacific, 1953, that the Papua and New Guinea Act provided that each year there should be expended upon the administration, welfare and development of the Territory of New Guinea an amount which was not less than the total amount of public revenue raised in that year in respect of the Territory of New Guinea.

The Council observed that, in considering questions relating to the administrative union affecting the Trust Territory of New Guinea, it had no information which might indicate that this union was, at this stage of development, not in the interests of the inhabitants of the Trust Territory and it remained its opinion, expressed in the special report of the Council on administrative unions (A/2151), that common customs, fiscal and administrative services organized on an inter-territorial basis might have advantages for the individual Territories participating in such arrangements, particularly under economic and social conditions prevailing in Territories like Papua and New Guinea.

No other matters regarding the administrative union under consideration were brought to the attention of the Council at its twelfth session.

K. ATTAINMENT BY THE TRUST TERRITORIES OF THE OBJECTIVE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT OR INDEPENDENCE

At the General Assembly's eighth session, the Fourth Committee discussed a draft resolution on this question at its 388th to 392nd meetings from 2 to 4 December. The draft resolution (A/C.4/L.320), which was submitted by Egypt, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, the Philippines, Yemen and Yugoslavia would, inter alia, have the Assembly:

(1) recall and reaffirm its resolution 558(VI)¹⁶ of 18 January 1952 inviting the Administering Authorities to submit information on measures taken towards self-government and the estimated period of time for such measures; and

(2) request the Council to include in its next and succeeding reports separate sections dealing with the implementation of resolution 558(VI) and the present resolution, specifying in particular certain measures taken in respect of constitutional development of the Territories. (For complete text, which was adopted without change, see below.)

The representative of France stated that it was impossible to fix a time limit for the attainment of self-government or independence; such development could not be planned. Furthermore, any plan might well come to nothing because of events quite independent of the wishes of the inhabitants and beyond the control of the Administering Authorities. He could not endorse the measures recommended in the draft resolution, he stated; though admittedly well-intentioned they were out of place. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada and the United Kingdom also supported, in general, this point of view. The New Zealand representative said that, while he appreciated the motives of the sponsors in drawing attention to Western Samoa (see text of resolution below) and was grateful for the recognition given to the New Zealand Government, he nevertheless felt it neither useful nor possible for the Administering Authorities to set a time limit for the attainment of self-government. The United States representative said that he would have to abstain on the resolution unless the paragraph reaffirming resolution 558(VI) were deleted, since he also considered the setting of a time limit impractical. The representative of Cuba held that it was premature to invite the Administering Authorities to set a time limit at this critical period and would therefore abstain.

The representatives of Ecuador and Peru agreed that there were practical difficulties in determining time limits, but they stated that they would nevertheless support the resolution. The representatives of Burma and Indonesia stressed the value of target dates for independence. A time limit, the representative of Indonesia said, would show the inhabitants the efforts they still had to make before they were ready to govern themselves.

The representative of the Dominican Republic stated that he would have to abstain since the third operative paragraph (see below), regarding the implementation of certain measures related to constitutional development, was, in his view, inconsistent with the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreements. The Swedish representative also opposed this paragraph on the ground that it was impossible to apply all of these measures in each Territory automatically and uniformly.

The representative of Venezuela, speaking in support of the resolution, said that, in the last analysis, the responsibility for the Trust Territories lay with the United Nations and that the Organization should have some indication of when the Territories were likely to be ready for self-government or independence.

At its 392nd meeting on 4 December, the Committee voted on the draft resolution. In a series of six votes, ranging from 28 to 10, with 14 abstentions, to 40 to none, with 11 abstentions, it adopted the resolution in parts and then, as a whole, by 35 votes to 9, with 7 abstentions.

The draft resolution (A/2608 B) was in turn adopted by the General Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December, without discussion, by 46 votes to 9, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 752(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolution 558 (VI) of 18 January 1952 by which it invited the Administering Authority of each Trust Territory other than Somaliland under Italian administration to include in each annual report information concerning measures taken or contemplated towards self-government or independence and, inter alia, the estimated period of time required for such measures and for the attainment of the ultimate objective,

"Having received from the Administering Authorities concerned annual reports covering periods subsequent to 18 January 1952 in respect of all except one of the Trust Territories, namely, the Territories of Western Samoa, New Guinea, Nauru, Tanganyika, Ruanda-Urundi, Togoland under British administration, Togoland under French administration and the Cameroons under French administration,

"Noting that the Administering Authorities have not provided in these annual reports the information requested in resolution 558 (VI),

"Noting, however, that the Administering Authority of Western Samoa has declared its intention to initiate in 1954 consultations among the representatives of the inhabitants leading to the establishment of a self-governing State,

"1. Reaffirms resolution 558 (VI) of 18 January 1952;

"2. Commends to the Administering Authorities of the other Trust Territories the example provided by the Administering Authority of Western Samoa in inviting the inhabitants themselves in 1954 to formulate proposals for the establishment of a self-governing State;

"3. Requests the Trusteeship Council to include in its next and succeeding reports to the General Assembly a separate section dealing with the implementation of resolution 558 (VI) and the present resolution, specifying in particular the measures taken in respect of:

"(a) Consultations with the inhabitants of each Trust Territory in regard to the measures taken or contemplated towards self-government;

"(b) The development in each Trust Territory of representative, executive and legislative organs and the extension of their powers;

"(c) The development in each Trust Territory of universal adult suffrage and direct elections;

"(d) The training and appointment of indigenous persons in each Trust Territory for positions of responsibility in the administration;

"(e) The development of adequate public revenue; and stating in each case its conclusions and recommendations in the light of resolution 558 (VI) and the present resolution."

L. EDUCATIONAL ADVANCEMENT IN TRUST TERRITORIES

At its twelfth session, the Trusteeship Council had before it, at its 480th meeting on 14 July, a report by the Secretary-General (T/1065 & Add.1 & 2) reviewing since its inception the programme of fellowships, scholarships and internships offered under Assembly resolution 557 (VI)¹¹⁷ to qualified students from Trust Territories.

As of 31 July 1953, the report stated, six Member States had offered 28 specific fellowships, scholarships and internships, together with a number of other openings for which Trust Territory students might qualify. Candidates had been finally or provisionally selected for seven scholarships.

The Government of India, in June 1952, had offered four scholarships for the academic year 1952-53, one to be allotted to an African from Tanganyika, one to an African from Ruanda-Urundi, a third preferably to a student from Somaliland and a fourth to a student from any other Trust Territory. In July 1952, the Italian Observer to the United Nations had asked for further information on the educational requirements involved, stating that the Administration of Somaliland would be unable to provide a sufficiently qualified student. In January 1953 India renewed for the academic year 1953-54 its offer of two scholarships to one student each from Tanganyika and from Togoland and offered two other scholarships to students from any of the Trust Territories. By 1 July 1953, the United Kingdom Government had provided three candidates from Tanganyika, the Cameroons and Togoland under British administration.

The United States Government had offered for the academic year 1953-54 five grants to qualified students from Trust Territories. In addition, various territories in Africa, including the Trust Territories, were eligible for aid under the Technical Assistance Programme of the Mutual Security Agency, and under the Fulbright Programme of Educational Exchange. Privately sponsored scholarships and fellowships were also made available. Four of the grants were subsequently awarded to one student each from Tanganyika, the Cameroons and Togoland under British administration and Western Samoa. The Philippine Government, in December 1952, had made available eleven fellowships, scholarships and internships in five Philippine institutions of higher learning and an unspecified number of scholarships at a sixth institution. In connexion with this offer and the offer by the United States, Australia had advised that there were no qualified students in the Territories under its administration.

Two scholarships were offered by the Government of Turkey in January 1953, one fellowship for the fiscal year 1953-54 by the Government of Norway in February and six fellowships for the academic year 1953-54 by the Government of Indonesia in June. The Government of Yugoslavia, in February, renewed its offer, made in April 1952 for the current academic year, of five fellowships and five university scholarships to candidates from Trust Territories in Africa.

The United Kingdom Government, the report continued, had made some observations on the general application of the programme. Despite its efforts to encourage suitable candidates from the Trust Territories under its administration to put themselves forward, the response had inevitably been slight for several reasons. First, the number of inhabitants currently qualified for courses of higher education was still small and they were largely absorbed by the expanding local institutions. Secondly, the obstacles to profitable study overseas were increased where instruction was given in a language other than the student's own, and where he had to devote a large proportion of what might be only a year's study to learning it. Lastly, most of the offers of scholarships did not include provision for the cost of travel to the country concerned, and before the local administrations could make grants for the purpose, they must be quite sure that the facilities offered were not more profitably available elsewhere.

The Council had before it a Syrian draft resolution (T/L.379) which was subsequently adopted with minor amendment. The representatives of the United Kingdom and Australia stated that, although they had no objection to the draft resolution, it was not really necessary. While expressing appreciation of the offers of fellowships, scholarships and internships, they pointed out that there were obvious limitations, such as language difficulties, to the use which could be made of the offers. The Australian representative therefore proposed that the Administering Authorities be requested to take active publicity measures, where considered appropriate, regarding the offers. The Syrian representative accepted this amendment as well as a United Kingdom drafting amendment.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Council by 7 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions, as resolution 646(XII).

The Belgian representative stated that he had voted against the resolution because its tone implied criticism of those Administering Authorities which had not proposed any candidates for the scholarships which had been offered. The representative of France, he stated, had pointed out that none of the countries offering scholarships were French-speaking. Similarly, none of the scholarships offered would provide instruction in Swahili, Urundi, Kirundi, French and Dutch—the only languages understood by the people of Ruanda-Urundi.

Resolution 646(XII) read:

"The Trusteeship Council,

"Having received the report of the Secretary-General (T/1065 and Add.1 and 2) on the progress of the administration of fellowships, scholarships and internships offered by Member States of the United Nations to students in the Trust Territories in response to the invitation contained in General Assembly resolution 557(VI),

"Noting from the report of the Secretary-General that a total of twenty-eight specific fellowships, scholarships and internships, together with a number of other openings for which Trust Territory students may qualify, have been offered by seven Member States thus far,

"Noting, however, that candidates have to date been provided by only two Administering Authorities for only eight of the scholarships specifically offered,

"Noting further that a number of the fellowships and scholarships offered for the academic year 1952-1953 went unfilled through the absence of any candidates,

"1. Expresses gratification at the generous response of Member States to the invitation contained in the above-mentioned General Assembly resolution;

"2. Requests the Administering Authorities, where considered appropriate, to take active measures to give the fullest publicity in the Trust Territories concerning the existing and all future offers of facilities; to establish, where they have not yet done so, suitable procedures for the receipt of applications and the selection of candidates; and to take all other measures necessary to ensure that full advantage be taken of the offers of Member States;

"3. Requests the Administering Authorities further to include in their annual reports information concerning the measures taken and the results accomplished."

At the Assembly's eighth session, the Fourth Committee, at its 388th to 392nd meetings from 2 to 4 December, had before it a draft resolution by Egypt, India, Indonesia, Lebanon and Syria (A/C.4/L.321 & Add.1) concerning offers from Member States of study and training facilities for students from Trust Territories. The representative of Egypt, in introducing the draft resolution, said that his delegation and the other co-sponsors had understood from the Trusteeship Council report (A/2427) that it had been impossible to take full advantage in the Trust Territories of the scholarships offered by certain Member States because: (1) they often related to a field of study higher than the prevailing level of education; (2) language difficulties had not been sufficiently taken into account; and (3) there had been inadequate publicity. The purpose of the draft resolution was to suggest certain ways in which the Administering Authorities and the students from the Trust Territories could overcome those difficulties.

The majority of representatives indicated that they would support the resolution. Several, including the representatives of Australia, France, Israel and New Zealand, objected to the paragraph which would permit candidates for fellowships to apply directly to the Secretary-General. The representatives of India and Lebanon explained that the Administering Authorities would have the final choice of candidates. The paragraph in question, the Indian representative continued, had been included because statements by petitioners had shown that scholarship offers to students from the Trust Territories had been given inadequate publicity and it had proved difficult to find candidates. The sponsors of the resolution had considered that some of the difficulties might be overcome if candidates could apply directly to the Secretary-General as well as to the Administering Authorities. The United Kingdom representative thought that, in view of the fact that prospective students might reside outside a Trust Territory, it might be convenient for them to approach the Secretary-General, providing that it was understood that the Secretary-General would consult the Administering Authority on the application.

As a result of the discussion, a revised draft resolution (A/C.4/L.321/Rev.1) was submitted to provide that applications for scholarships submitted to the Secretary-General would be simultaneously transmitted to the Administering Authorities and the offering States concerned, who could then apply to each other for any further information that might be necessary.

The Belgian representative, opposing the draft resolution, stated that it was both useless and unreasonable to provide scholarships for sending young children abroad for post-primary and technical education in a language which they would perhaps never again use. Such education should be provided in the Territory itself or in a neighbouring country, he said.

At its 392nd meeting on 4 December, the Committee adopted (A/2608C) the revised draft resolution in parts, in votes ranging from 49 to none, with 3 abstentions, to 36 votes to none, with 16 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by the Committee by 48 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions, and by the General Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December, without discussion, by 48 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

Resolution 753(VIII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting from the report of the Trusteeship Council the results to date of the project of fellowships, scholarships and internships offered by Member States to students from the Trust Territories pursuant to General Assembly resolution 557(VI) of 18 January 1952,

"Considering that the offers thus far made by Member States relate to study and training of university standard and that the inability of the Administering Authorities of the Trust Territories to provide a sufficient number of candidates is due in part to the generally low levels of education prevailing in the Territories and, in particular, to the inadequacy of facilities for post-primary education,

"Considering further that the relatively small number of students qualified to take up such fellowships and scholarships requires that the most effective measures be taken to ensure that all potential candidates be given the opportunity to apply and that their applications be duly considered,

"1. Endorses the tribute paid by the Trusteeship Council to the generosity of those Member States which have offered facilities, and expresses the hope that additional offers will be forthcoming;

"2. Expresses regret that, in the absence of a sufficient number of qualified candidates, only a small proportion of the fellowships and scholarships offered have been utilized;

"3. Invites Member States, in renewing or initiating offers of facilities, to take into account the special needs of the Trust Territories arising from their generally low levels of education, and to contemplate the provision of facilities not only for university study but also for post-primary and technical education and training of kinds which may most effectively further the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the Territories;

"4. Invites Member States offering facilities, in cases where the languages of instruction differ from the languages of the Trust Territories, to consider the possibility of extending the duration of the facilities offered by a preliminary period of language training and other adjustment to the country of study or training;

"5. Recommends that all Administering Authorities which have not done so give the fullest publicity in the Trust Territories under their administration to all offers of study and training facilities and take such other measures as will ensure that the greatest possible advantage is taken of the offers;

"6. Requests the Trusteeship Council to undertake such amendment of its procedure for the administration of the project as may be necessary to permit applications to be made through the Secretary-General as well as through the territorial authorities, it being understood that upon receipt of any such applications the Secretary-General will transmit them simultaneously to the Administering Authorities and the offering States concerned;

"7. Requests the Secretary-General to include in United Nations information material prepared for dissemination in the Trust Territories details of all such offers and of the procedures to be followed in submitting applications."

M. PARTICIPATION OF THE INDIGENOUS INHABITANTS OF THE TRUST TERRITORIES IN THE GOVERNMENT OF THOSE TERRITORIES AND IN THE WORK OF THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

In resolution 653(VII) of 21 December 1952, the General Assembly, inter alia, expressed the opinion that the objects of its resolution 554(VI), inviting the Trusteeship Council to examine the possibility of associating the inhabitants of the Trust Territories more closely in its work, would be better achieved through the active participation of members of the indigenous population of the Trust Territories in the government of those Territories and in the work of the Trusteeship Council. The Assembly stated that it shared the hope expressed by the Council in its resolution 466(XI) that the Administering Authority would find it appropriate to associate suitably qualified indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the work of the Council as part of their delegations, or in any other manner which they deemed desirable and invited the Administering Authorities to give careful attention to this resolution and to the Assembly's resolution with the view to giving effect to the suggestions contained therein. The Trusteeship Council was requested to include in its reports to the Assembly information on action taken pursuant to Council resolution 466(XI) and Assembly resolution 653(VII).

The Council considered the Assembly's resolution at its 480th and 481st meetings on 14 and 15 July 1953. The representative of Syria considered that it was necessary to find a procedure that would result in active participation of indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the Council's work and proposed (T/L.381) that a committee be appointed to examine the question further.

The Syrian draft resolution was supported by the representatives of China, El Salvador, Thailand and the United States, who considered that further study might be useful. The representative of France stated that he had no objection to such a committee, but thought that its appointment would be useless. The positions of delegations were already well known; his Government, for one thing, would never accept a solution which it considered would infringe the principle of unity of representation.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium and New Zealand indicated that they would not support the draft resolution. The representatives of Australia and Belgium held that the Administering Authorities and not the Council had been invited to study the question, and that it was the right of the Administering Authorities to decide the manner in which suitably qualified inhabitants of the Trust Territories might be associated in the Council's work. The Council, they and the New Zealand representative said, had been asked by the Assembly merely to report on action taken pursuant to resolution 466(XI). The representative of Belgium stated further that the Trusteeship Agreements were treaties between the parties concerned; those Agreements could not be extended against the wishes of one of the contracting parties.

The representative of the Dominican Republic considered that a committee equally made up of representatives of Administering and non-Administering members would not bring to light any new aspects, but if such a committee were appointed, he suggested that it might study the nature of the Trusteeship Agreement and its relationship to the Administering Authority and to the inhabitants of the Trust Territory. It should consider the reaffirmation of the principle that sovereignty in a Trust Territory was not in question and remained with the people of the Trust Territory and the conflict of authority resulting from this sovereignty and the authority residing in an Administering Authority as it affects the inhabitants of the Trust Territories.

The Council, at its 481st meeting on 15 July, by 6 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions, adopted the Syrian draft resolution as revised (T/L.381/-Rev.1) to include an oral amendment by Thailand to refer to Assembly resolution 653(VII).

By its resolution (647(XII)), the Council established a committee composed of the representatives of El Salvador, Syria, the United Kingdom and the United States to examine in the light of Assembly resolution 653(VII) the question of the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the work of the Council and to report to the Council at its next session. By the same resolution the Council noted that the question of the participation of indigenous inhabitants in the government of the Territories was regularly examined by it in connexion with its examination of the annual reports, reports of the visiting missions and petitions concerning political development.

N. REVISION OF THE QUESTIONNAIRE

At the Assembly's eighth session, at the 388th to 392nd meetings of its Fourth Committee from 2 to 4 December 1953, Burma, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Uruguay resubmitted (A/C.4/L.319) a draft resolution by El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Syria (A/C.4/L.253) on which the Assembly at its seventh session had postponed consideration. By this draft resolution, the Assembly would invite the Trusteeship Council to undertake the preparation of separate questionnaires adapted to the particular circumstances of each Trust Territory.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium and Canada considered the questionnaire sufficiently comprehensive. The Belgian representative pointed out that the Trusteeship Council had been unable to adapt it to every Territory and had also considered it superfluous to do so. While he would vote against the draft resolution, he stated, he was submitting an amendment (A/C.4/L.325/-Rev.1); because among the sponsors of the draft resolution there were four members of the Trusteeship Council who considered separate questionnaires necessary, it seemed natural to entrust them with that study. The Belgian amendment would provide for a sub-committee, consisting of the representatives of El Salvador, Haiti, India and Syria, to examine the questionnaire and study such changes as might be necessary to adapt it to the special conditions of each Territory and to submit its conclusions to the Trusteeship Council. On the basis of the work of this sub-committee, the Council would then be invited to undertake the preparation of separate questionnaires.

The representatives of France and the United Kingdom opposed the draft resolution, with or without the Belgian amendments. The French representative considered that the questionnaire was sufficiently comprehensive to cover all problems which might arise and that, in addition, further revision would divert the Council, which was already overworked, from other essential tasks. The representative of the United Kingdom, while somewhat attracted to the idea of separate questionnaires, stated that it would be too difficult and too expensive to change the system again; a more reasonable solution, in his opinion, would be for the Administering Authorities not to answer those questions which did not apply.

The Indian representative explained that the sponsors of the draft resolution had found the questionnaire too comprehensive rather than inadequate. It was because of its general nature that it was not entirely applicable to conditions prevailing in each Trust Territory.

The representatives of Brazil, Chile, China, Indonesia, Israel, Peru, the United States, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, among others, supported the resolution for, inter alia, the following reasons: (1) no general questionnaire could adequately cover all Territories; (2) information could best be obtained on the basis of precise questions; (3) a separate questionnaire would make for more thorough study of conditions; and (4) the revision of the questionnaire would consist largely of deleting certain questions in the case of each Territory.

The New Zealand representative stated that the preparation of the questionnaire had been a formidable task and the time and energy involved in further revision would far outweigh any possible advantages. He would, however, support the draft resolution if the Belgian amendments were adopted. If the countries suggested as members of the sub-committee were unwilling to implement their own proposal, he stated, they should withdraw the resolution they had sponsored. The representative of the Dominican Republic also stated he would support the resolution if the Belgian amendment were adopted. Others supporting the Belgian amendment included the representatives of Chile, India, Israel, Peru and Yugoslavia who considered, inter alia, that the amendment would make the resolution more acceptable to the Administering Authorities. The representatives of Guatemala and Venezuela suggested that several of the Administering Authorities might be included in the sub-committee.

The representatives of Burma, Haiti, Indonesia, Lebanon, Mexico, Syria, the United States and Uruguay stated that they would either oppose or abstain on the Belgian amendment. Among the reasons some of them gave were that the preparation and drawing up of the questionnaire was a matter for the Trusteeship Council, not for a sub-committee of the Assembly; the fact that the Council already had numerous tasks to carry out was not an adequate reason for not giving it new work which it should normally assume under the Charter.

The Belgian amendments (A/C.4/L.325/Rev.1) were adopted by a roll-call vote of 32 to 3, with 17 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by the Fourth Committee (A/2608 A) at its 392nd meeting on 4 December, by 43 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions. It was adopted, without discussion, at the Assembly's 471st plenary meeting on 9 December 1953, by 41 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 751 (VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting that the Trusteeship Council has adopted the revised Questionnaire,

"Considering that, under Article 88 of the Charter, the Administering Authorities shall make an annual report to the General Assembly, upon the basis of a questionnaire formulated by the Trusteeship Council, on the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of each Trust Territory,

"Considering that, in approving the Provisional Questionnaire, the Trusteeship Council emphasized that it would be adapted, if necessary, to specific Trust Territories,

"Considering that the revised Questionnaire is not applicable in its entirety to all Trust Territories,

"1. Instructs a Sub-Committee, consisting of representatives of El Salvador, Haiti, India and Syria, to examine the Questionnaire formulated by the Trusteeship Council, to study such changes as may be necessary to adapt it to the special conditions of each Territory, and to submit its conclusions to the Trusteeship Council;

"2. Invites the Trusteeship Council to undertake, on the basis of the work of the Sub-Committee established under the preceding paragraph, the preparation of separate questionnaires adapted to the particular circumstances of each Trust Territory."

O. MEANS TOWARD IMPROVING THE FUNCTIONING OF THE INTERNATIONAL TRUSTEESHIP SYSTEM

At the Assembly's eighth session, during the general discussion by the Fourth Committee of the Ewe and Togoland Unification Problem,¹¹⁸ the representative of Pakistan made an informal suggestion that the President of the General Assembly should appoint a United Nations representative to act as mediator, reconcile the opposing points of view, aid in the re-establishment of the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs and help to bring about the essential co-operation between the Administering Authorities of the two Trust Territories, France and the United Kingdom. If this suggestion were favoured, the representative of Pakistan said, he would submit a formal proposal to that effect. Although the representatives of Guatemala and Syria expressed approval of the suggestion in principle, no formal proposal was put forward in this connexion.

At the 389th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 3 December, however, during the Committee's consideration of proposals put forward under the agenda item "report of the Trusteeship Council" (A/2427), Afghanistan, Brazil, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia submitted a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.324) in which the General Assembly would recommend that the Trusteeship Council should undertake a study of ways and means of improving the functioning of the International Trusteeship System and particularly of the possibility and desirability of designating one or more United Nations representatives for the Trust Territories for an initial period of two years. The draft resolution set forth certain specific means, including liaison and good offices, by which such a representative or representatives might effectively function. Commenting at the 391st meeting on the draft resolution, the representative of Pakistan said that the appointment of United Nations representatives to Trust Territories would increase the mutual confidence and co-operation which should prevail among the three principal parties—the United Nations, the Administering Authorities and the peoples of the Territories themselves. Because this spirit was lacking, it was not surprising that the people of the Trust Territories had begun to wonder whether the United Nations could do anything substantial for them.

At present, the United Nations had no source of direct information beyond the reports of the periodic visiting missions, he said. The veracity of the findings of the visiting missions was sometimes disputed by the Administering Authorities.

The Committee was faced with the alternative of accepting either the verdict of the visiting mission or that of the Administering Authority.

Urging the appointment of a United Nations representative as a means of bringing about better understanding between the Administering Authorities and the indigenous inhabitants, as well as aiding the General Assembly in its appraisal of conditions in the Trust Territories, the representative of Pakistan said that the activities of such a representative could be limited for the present to the Territories in Africa which gave rise to the greatest concern on the part of the United Nations.

The appointee, he said, would represent the President of the General Assembly, to whom he would report regularly. He could be appointed for a period of five years and his presence in the Territories would result in a tremendous decrease of the number of petitions submitted to the United Nations. The appointment of such a representative would not be incompatible with the terms of the Charter or of the Trusteeship Agreements.

The proposal was supported by the representatives of Guatemala, Iran, Lebanon, Peru, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yugoslavia. They considered that the suggestion by the representative of Pakistan would aid the United Nations in its consideration of the problems of dependent peoples. It was a constructive suggestion, they felt, which could bring about a closer understanding of the problems involved. It would also provide an additional source of information and might materially assist in the solution of local problems.

On the other hand, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada, Chile, the Dominican Republic, France, Indonesia, Israel, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the proposal, maintaining that it could not reasonably be expected to bring about profitable results. These representatives did not doubt the sincerity of the motives of the sponsors in proposing the appointment of a United Nations representative but considered that the General Assembly or the Trusteeship Council in designating such a representative would be exceeding their powers. The representatives of Burma, China, India and Indonesia, who said that they would abstain from voting on the proposal, felt that the function which the representative would perform was already being performed by the visiting missions.

At its 392nd meeting on 4 December, by a roll-call vote of 28 to 11, with 13 abstentions, the Committee adopted the draft resolution. It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Seeking to improve the functioning of the International Trusteeship System, and

"Desiring particularly to achieve a closer liaison and a more understanding and harmonious working relationship between the Trust Territories and their peoples and the Administering Authorities, on the one hand, and the interested organs of the United Nations, on the other;

"1. Recommends that the Trusteeship Council undertake a study of ways and means of achieving these ends, with particular attention to the possibility and desirability, in pursuance of Article 87 of the Charter and without prejudice to the existing practice of regular visiting missions to the Trust Territories, of designating one or more United Nations Representatives for the Trust Territories for an initial period of two years, who might, inter alia,

"(a) Act in an observatory and advisory capacity on all matters affecting the operation of the International Trusteeship System;

"(b) Perform a liaison function in the relations between the United Nations, the Administering Authorities, and the peoples of the Trust Territories;

"(c) Offer good offices, when and where required, in matters relating to the Trusteeship System;

"(d) Assist in the appropriate dissemination in the Trust Territories of information about the United Nations;

"(e) Make periodic visits to each Trust Territory in the area to which he is assigned, devoting to each such Territory a period of time appropriate to the conditions and problems prevailing therein;

"(f) Report annually to the Secretary-General on his observations and his work, with particular reference to the objectives of the International Trusteeship System and the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreements;

"2. Requests the Trusteeship Council to report on the results of this study to the ninth session of the General Assembly."

The draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2608 F) was considered by the General Assembly at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December. The Belgian representative urged the rejection of the draft resolution, stating that it would only waste the time of the Trusteeship Council since it could only have a negative response from the Administering Authorities, which had undertaken obligations under the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement providing for periodic visiting missions but not for permanent United Nations representation in the Trust Territories. On being put to the vote, the resolution received 29 votes in favour, 16 against and 14 abstentions. As it did not gain the two-thirds majority required under the rules of procedure, it was accordingly not adopted.

Voting, which was by roll-call, was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, France, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Chile, China, Denmark, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Greece, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru.

P. DISSEMINATION IN TRUST TERRITORIES OF INFORMATION ON THE UNITED NATIONS AND ON THE INTERNATIONAL TRUSTEESHIP SYSTEM

The Trusteeship Council, at its twelfth session, had before it a report (E/1073) by the Secretary-General giving an account of the action taken by him and by the various Administering Authorities since the Council's eleventh session, in implementation of Council resolution 36(III) on the provision of information to the peoples of Trust Territories.

With regard to the dispatch of material, the Secretary-General stated that 577 copies of official records were currently being supplied at the request of the Administering Authorities to 239 addresses in or for the Trust Territories. Other suitable material—booklets, background papers, posters, "UN Day" material and photographs—had been supplied. Recorded talks had been made during sessions of the Trusteeship Council by Special Representatives of the Administering Authorities and had been broadcast in the respective Trust Territories. As yet, the report stated, no Administering Authority had made any specific suggestion in accordance with Council resolution 36(III) as to the appropriate channels through which information concerning the aims and activities of the United Nations might be communicated to the general public.

The report reviewed the information furnished by the Administering Authorities and visiting missions on the developments in this field in the various Trust Territories. For example, courses on the United Nations had been introduced in the schools; special seminars had been conducted; posters and photographs had been displayed in schools, hospitals and public buildings; feature material had been broadcast in vernacular languages; United Nations films had been shown; articles had been printed in local newspapers; conferences of non-governmental associations had been held; and all types of information media had been distributed to various institutions, associations and political parties. In addition, the United Nations flag had been flown on special occasions and special United Nations Day celebrations had been arranged.

The Secretary-General stated that the dissemination of information on the United Nations to the peoples of the Trust Territories was still in nearly all cases far from adequate because the quantity of information material reaching the peoples was insufficient and the material was seldom in a form readily comprehensible to the majority of the indigenous inhabitants. The Secretary-General therefore suggested that the Special Representatives of the Administering Authorities on their visits to United Nations Headquarters might advise the Department of Public Information of the special requirements of their respective Trust Territories so that the Department might be in a position to begin the preparation of special material.

The Council, at its 482nd meeting on 20 July, took note of the report.

At the Assembly's eighth session, the Fourth Committee, at its 388th to 392nd meetings from 2 to 4 December, had before it a draft resolution by the Dominican Republic (A/C.4/L.322) on the dissemination in Trust Territories of information concerning the United Nations. The representative of the Dominican Republic, introducing the draft resolution, stated that he considered it vitally important for the inhabitants of the Trust Territories to have information about the United Nations and to understand the International Trusteeship System. The wider dissemination of information, he considered, would eliminate many elements of confusion that existed, principally as a result of ignorance. The draft resolution was intended, he stated, to emphasize again the importance of the flow of information to the general public.

The majority spoke in support of the draft resolution. The representatives of Belgium and France stressed that where any modification had occurred in the character of the supervision exercised over a Territory, the change should be explained in such a way as to avoid the appearance, which would be highly detrimental to the Territory's development, of conflict between the Administering Authority and the United Nations.

The representative of Australia thought that the third operative paragraph of the draft resolution, which would request the Secretary-General to initiate a direct flow of information to the general public in the Trust Territories, would be difficult to apply. It would be simpler, he thought, if the Administering Authority itself undertook to transmit the material to the inhabitants directly on the understanding that this would be recorded in its annual report.

The representative of Yugoslavia, referring to the same paragraph, proposed that the Secretary-General should be requested to initiate a direct flow of information on the basis of suggestions furnished by the Administering Authorities or (not and) his own knowledge of appropriate channels or by making use of both of these sources together.

Following the adoption of the Yugoslav amendment by 29 votes to 16, with 6 abstentions, the Fourth Committee adopted (A/2608 D) the draft resolution, as amended, by 43 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, at its 392nd meeting on 4 December.

The General Assembly, at its 471st plenary meeting on 9 December, adopted the draft resolution proposed by the Fourth Committee. It voted separately on that part of the draft which had been amended by Yugoslavia and adopted it by 30 votes to 13, with 3 abstentions. The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 52 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 754 (VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Reaffirming the opinion expressed in its resolution 556 (VI) of 18 January 1952 that it is essential that the peoples of Trust Territories should receive adequate information concerning the United Nations,

"Observing that the existing arrangements for the supply of such information are based on Trusteeship Council resolution 36 (III) of 8 July 1948, which invites the Administering Authorities to furnish the Secretary-General (a) with the names and addresses of officials in the Trust Territories to whom suitable material should be sent for information, and (b) with suggestions as to the appropriate channels through which information concerning the United Nations may be communicated to the general public,

"Noting, however, from the most recent report submitted to the Council by the Secretary-General on the implementation of the above-mentioned resolution, that while the Administering Authorities have submitted lists of names and addresses in accordance with the first part of the resolution, they have in no case made any specific suggestions concerning the dissemination of information to the inhabitants of the Trust Territories and to the general public,

"Noting from the report that, as the Secretary-General had pointed out in his previous reports on the subject, and as had been emphasized by the observations of the Visiting Missions to West Africa and to the Pacific, which are summarized in the report, the dissemination of information on the United Nations to the peoples of the Trust Territories is still far from satisfactory,

"1. Expresses the opinion that the existing arrangements for the dissemination in the Trust Territories of information on the United Nations are, in general, inadequate and of limited effectiveness;

"2. Invites the Administering Authorities to furnish the Secretary-General, in accordance with Trusteeship Council resolution 36 (HI) of 8 July 1948, with suggestions as to the appropriate channels through which information on the United Nations and on the International Trusteeship System may be communicated to the general public in the Trust Territories (e.g., Press, radio, non-governmental organizations, trade unions, libraries, cultural, educational and religious institutions, teachers, missionaries, etc.);

"3. Requests the Secretary-General to initiate at the earliest possible date, on the basis of the suggestions furnished by the Administering Authorities or his own knowledge of appropriate information channels, or by making use of both of these sources together, a direct flow of information material addressed to the general public in the Trust Territories;

"4. Requests the Secretary-General to include in his periodic reports on this matter to the Trusteeship Council lists of the channels of dissemination which he has established in pursuance of the present resolution."

V. Legal Questions

A. THE AMBATIELOS CASE (GREECE VS. THE UNITED KINGDOM)

On 19 May 1953, the International Court of Justice delivered its Judgment in the Ambatielos case (Merits: Obligation to Arbitrate), between Greece and the United Kingdom.

These proceedings had been instituted by an Application by the Hellenic Government, which, having taken up the case of one of its nationals, the shipowner Nicolas Ambatielos, had prayed the Court to declare that the claim which the latter had made against the Government of the United Kingdom should be submitted to arbitration in accordance with Anglo-Greek Agreements concluded in 1886 (Treaty and Protocol) and in 1926 (Declaration). Following a preliminary objection lodged by the United Kingdom, the Court found that it had jurisdiction to adjudicate on the question by a Judgment delivered on 1 July 1952.¹

The Court, which was presided over by the Vice-President, held public sittings from 23 to 28 and on 30 March 1953. It included on the Bench Professor Jean Spiropoulos, appointed by the Hellenic Government to sit as judge ad hoc. The Court heard, on behalf of the Hellenic Government, Henri Rolin and Sir Frank Soskice, Counsel, and on behalf of the United Kingdom Government, G. G. Fitzmaurice, Assistant Agent and Counsel, J. E. S. Fawcett, Counsel, and W. V. J. Evans, Agent.

1. Judgment of the Court

In its Judgment,² the Court defined the question before it as follows: was the United Kingdom under an obligation to accept arbitration of the difference between that Government and the Hellenic Government concerning the validity of the Ambatielos claim, in so far as this claim was based on the Treaty of 1886? The distinctive character of the case, the Court stated, was that, quite unlike the Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions, decided by the Permanent Court of International Justice in 1924,³ the Court was called upon to decide, not its own jurisdiction, but whether the dispute should be referred to another tribunal for arbitration. The Court said that both the United Kingdom and Greece had rested their cases on the Declaration of 1926 which reads as follows:

"It is well understood that the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great Britain and Greece of to-day's date does not prejudice claims on behalf of private persons based on the provisions of the Anglo-Greek Commercial Treaty of 1886, and that any differences which may arise between our two Governments as to the validity of such claims shall, at the request of either Government, be referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of the Protocol of November 10th, 1886, annexed to the said Treaty."

The Protocol of 1886 referred to in the Declaration of 1926 contains, inter alia, the following provision:

"Any controversies which may arise respecting the interpretation or the execution of the present Treaty, or the consequences of any violation thereof, shall be submitted, when the means of settling them directly by amicable agreement are exhausted, to the decisions of Commissions of Arbitration, and the result of such arbitration shall be binding upon both Governments."

The Court stated that the Declaration of 1926 was agreed upon for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of the parties with respect to claims on behalf of private persons based on the Treaty of 1886, for which, on the termination of that Treaty, there would have been no remedy in the event of the failure of the parties to reach amicable settlements. The Agreement of 1926, the Court further stated, related to a limited category of differences which the Agreement of 1886 provided should be settled by arbitration, namely differences as to the validity of claims on behalf of private persons based on the Treaty of 1886. But in both cases the parties had been prompted by the same motives and had adopted the same method of arbitration.

Referring to its Judgment of 1 July 1952, the Court stated that in that Judgment the merits of the Ambatielos claim were found to be outside the Court's jurisdiction, which consisted only of deciding whether the United Kingdom was under an obligation to accept arbitration. The limited jurisdiction of the Court was to be clearly distinguished from the jurisdiction of the Commission of Arbitration, the Court said. The Court, therefore, must refrain from pronouncing final judgment on any question of law or fact falling within the merits; its task would have been completed when it had decided whether the difference with regard to the Ambatielos claim was a difference as to the validity of a claim on behalf of a private person based on the provisions of the Treaty of 1886 and whether, in consequence, there was an obligation binding on the United Kingdom to accept arbitration.

The Court said that the words "based on the Treaty of 1886" indicated the character which the Ambatielos claim had to possess in order that it might be the subject of arbitration in accordance with the Declaration of 1926. They did not mean, the Court held, that the Ambatielos claim had to be found to be validly based on the Treaty of 1886. If such a meaning had been intended by the Court, it would not have decided that it was without jurisdiction to pass on the merits of the claim.

The Hellenic Government had contended that the Ambatielos claim did not "prima facie appear to be unconnected with the provisions of the Treaty of 1886". In the view of the United Kingdom, it was necessary for the Court to determine, as a substantive issue, whether the claim was actually or genuinely based on the Treaty. The Court was unable to accept either of those contentions. The first, it declared, would constitute an insufficient reason for the obligation to accept arbitration; the second would lead to the substitution of the Court for the Commission of Arbitration in passing on a point which constituted one of the principal elements of the claim. The Court held that the Commission of Arbitration alone had jurisdiction to adjudicate on the merits; and it could not be assumed that the Agreement of 1926 contemplated that the verification of the allegations of fact should be the duty of the Commission, while the determination of the question whether the facts alleged constituted a violation of the Treaty of 1886 should form the task of another tribunal.

At the time of the signature of the Declaration of 1926, the Judgment of the Court stated, the British and Greek Governments had never intended that one of them alone or some other organ should decide whether a claim was genuinely based on the Treaty of 1886; it must have been their intention that the genuineness of the treaty basis of any claim, if contested, should be authoritatively decided by the Commission of Arbitration, together with any other questions relating to the merits.

The Court considered that, for the purpose of determining the obligation of the United Kingdom to accept arbitration, the expression "claims based on the Treaty of 1886" could not be understood as meaning claims actually supportable under the Treaty. Of course, the Court declared, it was not enough that a claim should have a remote connexion with the Treaty for it to be based on it; on the other hand it was not necessary that an unassailable legal basis should be shown for an alleged treaty violation. In its context, the expression meant claims depending for support on the provisions of the Treaty of 1886, so that the claims would eventually stand or fall according as the provisions of the Treaty were construed in one way or another. Consequently, the Court stated, in respect of the Ambatielos claim, it was not necessary for the Court to find that the Hellenic Government's interpretation of the Treaty was the only correct interpretation; it was enough to determine whether the arguments advanced by the Hellenic Government in support of its interpretation were of a sufficiently plausible character to warrant a conclusion that the claim was based on the Treaty. In other words, if an interpretation appeared to be an arguable one, whether or not it ultimately prevailed, then there were reasonable grounds for concluding that the claim was based on the Treaty. The validity of the respective arguments would, the Court held, be determined by the Commission of Arbitration in passing on the merits of the difference.

The Court then proceeded to deal with two of the contentions of the Greek Government which were contested by the United Kingdom. One was based on the most-favoured-nation clause in article X of the Treaty of 1886 which would permit Greece to invoke the benefits of treaties concluded by the United Kingdom with third States and thus obtain redress for a denial of justice to Mr. Ambatielos—if the facts alleged were true.

The other contention rested on an interpretation of the provision in article XV of the same Treaty which states, inter alia, that "the subjects of each of the two Contracting Parties in the dominions of the other shall have free access to the Courts of Justice..." The Greek Government contended that Mr. Ambatielos did not enjoy "free access" to the Courts because of the "withholding" by the executive branch of the United Kingdom Government of evidence considered to be vital to his case.

With regard to the first contention, the United Kingdom contended that article X of the Treaty of 1886, dealing with matters of navigation and commerce, could not be invoked to claim the benefits of provisions in other treaties concerning judicial proceedings, which, in the Treaty of 1886, formed the subject of a separate article. The United Kingdom also advanced a number of other arguments designed to show that the facts alleged by the Hellenic Government, if true, would amount to a denial of justice, and that an allegation of denial of justice must be based on general principles of international law and could not be premised on article X of the Treaty of 1886 dealing with commerce and navigation.

As regards the second contention of the Greek Government based on article XV of the 1886 Treaty (see above), the United Kingdom Government insisted on a limited interpretation of the term "free access" and maintained that Mr. Ambatielos must be considered as having been fully accorded that right when he was permitted to appear in the English courts for the prosecution and defence of his rights on an equal footing with British subjects.

Having regard to the contentions of the parties with respect to the scope and effect of the most-favoured-nation clause in article X of the Treaty of 1886, as well as the divergence of views concerning the meaning of the expression "free access to the Courts of Justice" contained in article XV; and bearing in mind especially the interpretations of these provisions contended for by the Hellenic Government, the Court concluded that this was a case in which the Hellenic Government was presenting a claim on behalf of a private person "based on the provisions of the Anglo-Greek Commercial Treaty of 1886" and that the difference between the parties was the kind of difference which, according to the Declaration of 1926, should be submitted to arbitration.

Accordingly, by 10 votes to 4, the Court found that the United Kingdom was under an obligation to co-operate with Greece in constituting a Commission of Arbitration, in accordance with the Protocol of 1886, as provided in the Declaration of 1926.

2. Dissenting Opinion

Sir Arnold McNair, President, Judges Basdevant, Klaestad and Read, availing themselves of the right conferred on them by Article 57 of the Statute, appended to the Judgment a statement of their dissenting opinion. A summary of the statement follows.

Before declaring a State to be bound to submit a dispute to the decision of an international tribunal, the Permanent Court of International Justice and the present Court had always considered it necessary to establish positively, and not merely on prima facie or provisional grounds, that the State in question had in some form given its consent to that procedure, the dissenting opinion stated. Since there was nothing in the Declaration of 1926 to indicate an intention that prima facie considerations should be regarded as sufficient, it was the opinion of the dissenting judges, based on the principle referred to above, that the United Kingdom could only be held to be under an obligation to accept the arbitral procedure by application of the Declaration of 1926 if it could be established to the satisfaction of the Court that the difference as to the validity of the Ambatielos claim fell within the category of differences in respect of which the United Kingdom had consented to arbitration.

The claims referred to by the Declaration of 1926 were claims "based on the provisions of the Treaty of 1886". These words, it was stated, should be construed in their natural and ordinary meaning, as had been said over and over again and, in particular, in the advisory opinion of the Court on the competence of the General Assembly for the admission of a State to the United Nations.⁴ In the opinion of the dissenting judges, the natural and ordinary meaning of those words was limited to claims whose legal support was found in the provisions of the Treaty; that is, claims whose validity should be appraised in the light of these provisions. It excluded claims whose support had to be found elsewhere.

Thus, and by virtue of the express reference made by the Declaration of 1926 to the Treaty of 1886, a difference concerning a claim on behalf of a private person came within the scope of the arbitration clause of the Declaration only if the examination of the claim demonstrated that it fell within the framework of the Treaty.

Examining the origin of the claim, the dissenting judges noted that it had arisen from a contract between Mr. Ambatielos and the British Ministry of Shipping for the sale of nine ships then under construction. Mr. Ambatielos had contended that the contract was not properly carried out by the seller, but this question of the breach of contract was not one which had to be decided by international arbitration. It was submitted to English courts by common accord of the parties. The Admiralty Court gave judgment against Mr. Ambatielos, who appealed to the Court of Appeal, but subsequently abandoned his appeal.

The present claim, it was stated, as formulated by the Hellenic Government, related to the way in which justice was administered in the proceedings in the English courts between Mr. Ambatielos and the Board of Trade, as the successor to the Ministry of Shipping. It had been alleged, on behalf of the Hellenic Government, that officials of the Board of Trade wrongly failed to produce in the Admiralty Court all the evidence available and that this resulted in damage to Mr. Ambatielos. The Hellenic Government also complained of the refusal by the Court of Appeal of leave to Mr. Ambatielos to adduce new evidence. The difference now existing between the parties, it was argued, was therefore concerned with a claim based on alleged improper administration of justice, in particular with regard to the production of evidence in the English courts. The question before the present Court, therefore, was to decide whether the matter of the complaint thus relied upon fell within the provisions of the Treaty of 1886.

The relevant article of the Treaty of 1886 (article XV) promised free access to the courts; it said nothing with regard to the production of evidence, the dissenting judges stated. Questions as to the production of evidence were, it was maintained, by their very nature, within the province of the law of the Court dealing with the case. The Treaty could have laid down certain requirements in this connexion, but it did not do so. The free access clause in the Treaty was designed to ensure access to the courts, not to regulate the different question of the production of evidence.

The free access clause, the dissenting judges considered, did no more than provide for free access and for "national treatment" as regards conditions, restrictions, taxes and the employment of Counsel. The complaint, as put before the Court in this case, did not allege that Mr. Ambatielos was refused access to English courts, or that he was denied "national treatment" as regards conditions, restrictions, taxes and the employment of Counsel. The Hellenic Government merely alleged that the production of evidence was effected in a manner which, in its opinion, was defective and detrimental to its national. Article XV of the Treaty, it was stated, was unconnected with that complaint. If any legal rule had been broken, it was not a rule contained in that article.

As regards the most-favoured-nation clause contained in article X of the Treaty, the dissenting judges held that it could not be extended to matters other than those in respect of which it was stipulated, that is commerce and navigation.

For these reasons, the dissenting judges considered that the Ambatielos claim did not fall within the category of claims in respect of which the United Kingdom had agreed to arbitration by the Declaration of 1926. Consequently, in their opinion, the United Kingdom was not under an obligation to submit the claim to the arbitral procedure provided for in that Declaration.

B. THE MINQUIERS AND ECREHOS CASE (FRANCE VS. THE UNITED KINGDOM)

On 17 November 1953, the International Court of Justice delivered judgment in the Minquiers and Ecrehos case between France and the United Kingdom. Under a Special Agreement concluded between France and the United Kingdom on 29 December 1950, the Court was requested to "determine whether the sovereignty over the islets and rocks (in so far as they are capable of appropriation; of the Minquiers and Ecrehos groups belongs to the United Kingdom or the French Republic".

The pleadings were filed within the time limits fixed⁵ and subsequently twice extended at the request of the parties.⁶ Public hearings were held between 17 September and 8 October 1953. The Court, presided over by the Vice-President, heard Sir Lionel Heald, G. G. Fitzmaurice, E. C. S. Wade, and C. S. Harrison, appearing for the United Kingdom, and André Gros for France

The case concerned two groups of islets lying between the British Channel Island of Jersey and the coast of France. The Ecrehos lies 3.9 sea miles from the former and 6.6 sea miles from the latter. The Minquiers group lies 9.8 sea miles from Jersey and eight miles away from the Chausey Islands, which belong to France.

1. Judgment of the Court

In its Judgment,⁷ the Court defined its task as one of determining which of the parties had produced the more convincing proof of title to one or the other group, or to both of them.

Both parties claimed an ancient or original title to both groups, which had always been maintained and never lost. Examining the titles invoked by both parties, the Court stated that the United Kingdom derived its title from the conquest of England in 1066 by William, Duke of Normandy. This conquest united England with Normandy, including the Channel Islands, and this union lasted until 1204 when King Philip Augustus of France drove the Anglo-Norman forces out of continental Normandy. But his attempts to occupy the Islands were not successful, except for brief periods when some of them were taken by French forces. On this ground, the Court said, the United Kingdom argued that all of the Channel Islands, including the Ecrehos and Minquiers, remained, as before, united with England and that this situation of fact was placed on a legal basis by subsequent treaties concluded between English and French Kings. The French Government contended, for its part, that, after 1204, the King of France held the Minquiers and the Ecrehos, together with some other islands close to the continent, and it referred to the same mediaeval treaties as those invoked by the United Kingdom.

The Court found that none of those treaties (Treaty of Paris of 1295, Treaty of Calais of 1360 and Treaty of Troyes of 1420) specified which islands were held by the King of England or by the King of France. There were other documents, however, which, the Court stated, provided some indications as to the possession of the islets in dispute. The Court then referred to the Charter of 14 January 1200, by which King John of England granted to one of his Barons, Piers des Préaux, the Islands of Jersey, Guernsey and Alderney "to have and hold of us by service of three knights' fees". The Court also referred to the Charter of 1203 by which Piers des Préaux granted to the Abbey of Val-Richer "the island of Ecrehou in entirety", stating that the King of England "gave me the islands" (insulas mihi dedit). That, the Court held, showed that he treated the Ecrehos as an integral part of the fief of the Islands which he had received from the King. The Court further stated that, in an Order from the English

King of 5 July 1258, the Sub-Warden of the Islands was ordered "to guard the islands of Gernere and Gerese, and the king's other islands in his keeping". In Letters Patent of the English King, dated 28 June 1360, it was provided that the "keeper of the islands of Gernese, Jereseye, Serk and Aurneye, and other islands adjacent thereto" might have the keeping for a further period. The Court also referred to the Truce of London of 1471, which provided, in article 3, that the King of France would not make any hostile act against the Kingdom of England and other islands specially mentioned, including the Islands "of guernsey, Jersey and alderney [and] other territories, islands and lordships, which are, or will be, held and possessed by the said lord King of England or by his subjects". Reference was also made to a Papal Bull of 20 January 1500, transferring the Channel Islands from the Diocese of Coutances to the Diocese of Winchester, which mentioned "the islands of Jersey and Guernsey, Chausey, Alderney, Herm and Sark". Two commercial Treaties of 1606 and 1655 mentioned only Jersey and Guernsey, the Court stated.

Basing itself on facts such as these, the Judgment of the Court said, the United Kingdom Government submitted the view that the Channel Islands were in the Middle Ages considered an entity, physically distinct from continental Normandy, and that any failure to mention by name any particular island in any relevant document, while enumerating other Channel islands, did not imply that any such island lay outside that entity. The Court considered that, having regard to the above-mentioned documents, and particularly to the Charters of 1200 and 1203, and in view of the undisputed fact that the whole of Normandy, including all the Channel Islands, was held by the English King in his capacity as Duke of Normandy from 1066 until 1204, there appeared to be a strong presumption in favour of the British view. If, the Court continued, the Ecrehos and the Minquiers were never specifically mentioned in such enumerations, this was probably due to their slight importance. The Court, however, felt that it could not draw from these considerations alone any definitive conclusion as to the sovereignty over the Ecrehos and the Minquiers since that question ultimately depended on the evidence of direct possession.

The French Government, the Court stated, saw a presumption in favour of French sovereignty in the feudal link between the King of France, overlord of the whole of Normandy, and the King of England, his vassal for those territories. In that connexion, it relied on a Judgment of the Court of France of 1202, which condemned King John of England to forfeit all the lands which he held in fee of the King of France, including the whole of Normandy. But the United Kingdom Government contended that the feudal title of the French Kings in respect of Normandy was merely nominal. It denied that the Channel Islands were received in fee of the King of France by the Duke of Normandy and contested the validity, and even the existence, of the Judgment of 1202. The Court considered that, without solving those historical controversies, it was sufficient to state that even if the Kings of France had an original feudal title to the Channel Islands, such a title must have lapsed, and could today produce no legal effect unless it had been replaced by another title valid according to the law of the time of replacement; and that the legal effects attached to the dismemberment of the Duchy of Normandy in 1204, when Normandy was occupied by the French, had been superseded by the numerous events which occurred in the following centuries such as the many wars and peace settlements between the two countries. In the opinion of the Court, what was of decisive importance was not indirect presumption deduced from events in the Middle Ages, but the evidence which related directly to the possession of the groups of islets.

Before considering that evidence, the Court examined certain questions concerning both groups. The French Government contended that a convention on fishery, concluded in 1839, although it did not settle the question of sovereignty, did, however, affect that question. It was said that the groups in dispute were included in the common fishery zone created by the convention. It was also said that the conclusion of that convention precluded the parties from relying on subsequent acts as manifestations of sovereignty. The Court said that it was unable to accept these contentions because the convention dealt with waters only, and not the common user of the territory of the islets. In the special circumstances of the case, and in view of the difference of opinion of the parties concerning the "critical date" for allowing evidence, the Court decided to consider all the acts of the parties, even those subsequent to 1886 and 1888 when a dispute as to sovereignty over the groups first arose, unless any measure had been taken with a view to improving the legal position of the party concerned.

The Court then examined the situation of each group of islets. With regard to Ecrehos, it referred to the Charter of 1200 of the English King, whereby he granted the fief of the Channel Islands to Piers des Préaux, and the Charter of 1203, whereby the latter in turn granted the Ecrehos to the Abbey of Val-Richer. The Court considered that the Charter of 1203 showed that the Ecrehos were treated by Piers des Préaux as an integral part of his fief.

The Court then dealt with the French contention that the grant of the Ecrehos, being in a special form of feudal tenure called frankalmoin,⁸ had the effect of severing the feudal link between Piers des Préaux and the Abbey, so that the Ecrehos no longer formed part of the fief of the Channel Islands. The view submitted by the French Government was that the Ecrehos remained subject to the Duke of Normandy through the intermediary of the Abbey of Val-Richer, which was situated on the French mainland, and that, when the King of France succeeded to the rights of the Duke after the occupation of continental Normandy in 1204, the Abbey "passed under his protection, as did the Ecrehos, whose overlord he became".

The Court quoted mediaeval documents and the Charter of 1203 to show that the grant in frankalmoin to an ecclesiastical institution did not have the effect of severing feudal ties. It held that the grantor continued to hold the Ecrehos as a part of his fief of the Channel Islands, with the Abbot of Val-Richer as his vassal and the King of England as his overlord, and that the King continued to exercise his justice and levy his rights in the land "so put in alms". The relevant mediaeval documents also showed, the Court held, that there was at that time a close relationship between the Ecrehos and Jersey. From the beginning of the nineteenth century the connexion became closer again because of the growing importance of oyster fishery. The Court attached probative value to various acts relating to the exercise by Jersey of jurisdiction and local administration and to legislation. It instanced criminal proceedings concerning the Ecrehos, the levying of taxes on habitable houses or huts built on the islets since 1889 and the registration in Jersey of contracts dealing with real estate on the Ecrehos.

The Court then dealt with the fact invoked by the French Government that in 1646 the States of Jersey prohibited fishing at the Ecrehos and the Chausey, and restricted visits to the Ecrehos in 1692. It mentioned diplomatic exchanges between the two Governments, in the beginning of the nineteenth century, to which charts were attached showing part of the Ecrehos as marked outside Jersey waters and treated as res nullius.⁹ These acts showed, it was contended, that the Ecrehos were not considered as British territory. The Court, however, did not consider that this was the necessary or the natural inference to be drawn from those facts. It referred to French documents of the nineteenth century to show that on several occasions the French Government had not claimed sovereignty over the Ecrehos but had treated them as res nullius. It was in 1886, the Court stated, that the French Government for the first time claimed sovereignty over the Ecrehos.

Appraising the relative strength of the opposing claims in the light of these facts, the Court found that sovereignty over the Ecrehos belonged to the United Kingdom.

With regard to the Minquiers, the Court noted that in 1615, 1616, 1617 and 1692, the Manorial Court of the fief of Noirmont in Jersey exercised jurisdiction in the case of wrecks found at the Minquiers. This exercise of jurisdiction had a territorial character, and showed that the Minquiers were considered to be a part of the manor. Other evidence, deriving from the end of the eighteenth century and the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, concerned inquests on corpses found at the Minquiers, the erection on the islets of habitable houses or huts by persons from Jersey, who paid all property taxes on that account, and the registration in Jersey of contracts of sale relating to real property in the Minquiers. These various facts, the Court said, showed that the Jersey authorities had, in several ways, exercised ordinary local administration in respect of the Minquiers during a long period of time and that, for a considerable part of the nineteenth century and the twentieth century, British authorities had exercised State functions in respect of that group.

The Court then dealt with the French contention that the Minquiers had been a dependency of the Chausey Islands, which, according to the view held by the Government of France, had always belonged to France, and which in 1022 were granted by the Duke of Normandy to the Abbey of Mont-Saint-Michel. The French Government had referred to a Papal Bull of 1179 which confirmed that Abbey in all its possessions, among which the Bull mentioned "totam insulam de cause cum pertinentiis suis".¹⁰ But, the Court held, no deduction could be made from this general clause about appurtenances to the Chausey Islands with regard to the status of the Minquiers.

The United Kingdom Government had, on the other hand, contended that the Chausey Islands belonged to England until about 1764. The Court, however, did not consider it necessary for deciding the present case to determine at what time the Chausey Islands became a French possession.

It referred to a correspondence which took place in 1784 between French authorities concerning an application for a concession in respect of the Minquiers made by a French national. The Court held the view that this correspondence did not disclose anything which could support the present French claim to sovereignty, but that it revealed certain fears of creating difficulties with the English Crown. The French Government further contended that, since 1861, it had assumed the sole charge of the lighting and buoing of the Minquiers, without encountering any objection from the United Kingdom. The Court found that the buoys placed by the French Government at the Minquiers were placed outside the reefs of the group and purported to aid navigation to and from French ports and protect shipping against the dangerous reef of the Minquiers. The French Government also relied on various official visits to the Minquiers and the erection in 1939 of a house on one of the islets with a subsidy from the Mayor of Granville, in continental Normandy. The Court did not find that the facts invoked by the French Government were sufficient to show that France had a valid title to the Minquiers.

As to the above-mentioned evidence from the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the Court stated that such acts could hardly be considered as sufficient evidence of the intention of that Government to act as sovereign over the islets.

The Court referred to diplomatic exchanges between the two Governments from the beginning of the nineteenth century which, it considered, confirmed that view. Thus, by his Note of 12 June 1820 to the British Foreign Office, the French Ambassador in London transmitted a letter from the French Minister of Marine of 14 September 1819 to the French Foreign Minister, in which the Minquiers were stated to be "possédés par l'Angleterre"; in one of the charts enclosed the Minquiers group was indicated as being British.

In such circumstances and having regard to the view expressed above with regard to the evidence produced by the United Kingdom Government, the Court was of the opinion that the sovereignty over the Minquiers belonged to the United Kingdom.

The Court unanimously found that the sovereignty over the islets and rocks of the Ecrehos and Minquiers group, in so far as they were capable of appropriation, belonged to the United Kingdom.

Judges Basdevant and Carneiro, while concurring in the decision of the Court for different reasons, appended to the Judgment statements of their individual opinions. Judge Alvarez, while also concurring in the decision of the Court, made a declaration expressing regret that the Parties had attributed excessive importance to mediaeval evidence and had not sufficiently taken into account the state of international law or its present tendencies in regard to territorial sovereignty.

2. Individual Opinion of Judge Basdevant

In the statement of his individual opinion, Judge Basdevant said that the Judgment of the Court of France of 1202 on which the French Government had relied (see above) could not be validly invoked because the forfeiture which resulted from it affected the King of England only in his capacity as Duke of Normandy and not in his capacity as King of England. As King of England, he gained possession of the Channel Islands and acquired title *jure belli*¹¹ over them on his own behalf—a title which was later confirmed by certain treaties. As regards the question whether that title extended specifically to the Ecrehos and the Minquiers, Judge Basdevant expressed the view that the closeness of the islets to Jersey confirmed the probability of the English King exercising sovereignty over them by virtue of his naval power.

With regard to the letter of the French Minister of Marine of 1819 (see above) indicating that the Minquiers were in British possession, Judge Basdevant considered that the words of the Minister of Marine did not amount to an admission and that he was not entitled to make such an admission. Judge Basdevant also expressed hesitation in accepting the contention that the jurisdiction assumed by Jersey authorities in Ecrehos and Minquiers amounted by itself to an assumption of "territorial jurisdiction". However, because of the absence of similar competing action on the part of the French authorities, he considered, the hypothesis seemed reasonable that the King of England had "held" the disputed islets within the meaning of the Treaty of Calais of 1360, by which there was agreement between France and England that the King of England should have the islands which he "now holds".

In the light of these facts, Judge Basdevant considered that the decision of the Court was justified.

3. Individual Opinion of Judge Carneiro

Judge Levi Carneiro stated that his observations related to circumstances of a general character which, in his view, explained, confirmed, coordinated and lent value to the acts of occupation which occurred at irregular intervals throughout the centuries and were not all sufficiently significant if taken individually. In his Opinion, he declared, he had taken as the criterion for the decision the following rules which were laid down by the Permanent Court of International Justice in the case concerning the Legal Status of Eastern Greenland:¹²

"(a) the elements necessary to establish a valid title to sovereignty are 'the intention and will to exercise such sovereignty and the manifestation of State activity' (pp. 46 and 63);

"(b) in many cases international jurisprudence 'has been satisfied with very little in the way of the actual exercise of sovereign rights, provided that the other State could not make out a superior claim. This is particularly true in the case of claims to sovereignty over areas in thinly populated or unsettled countries' (p. 46);

"(c) it is the criterion of the Court in each individual case which decides whether sovereign rights have been displayed and exercised 'to an extent sufficient to constitute a valid title to sovereignty' (pp. 63-64)".

Applying these criteria, Judge Carneiro examined, first, the fief of the Channel Islands. He was unable to accept the view that the Duke of Normandy, having become the King of England, and having retained the Channel Islands when the King of France drove him out of continental Normandy, "humbly remained subject to the suzerainty of his adversary". The same considerations, he said, made it impossible for him to suppose that the suzerainty of the King of France extended to the Channel Islands, all the more so since he did not conquer them at the beginning of the thirteenth century when he conquered continental Normandy.

Another factor in the present case, Judge Carneiro stated, was the continuous and keen interest shown by England in the Channel Islands, in contrast to a "certain indifference or a much less lively and assiduous interest shown by France".

Judge Carneiro also referred to a secret agreement signed by King John the Good of France when the latter was taken prisoner by England after the battle of Poitiers in 1356. The agreement, he said, provided for the restoration to the English Crown of all the Duchy of Normandy "with all the cities, castles, dioceses, lands, regions and places lying within the Duchy itself". In his Opinion, Judge Carneiro held that the absence of any express reference to the islands confirmed, in general terms, that the islands were already in the possession of England. If this had not been so, England would not have lost the opportunity to have them included in the secret agreement.

The individual Opinion also took account of the natural unity of the archipelago known as the "Anglo-Norman Islands" or the Channel Islands and concluded that "This archipelago which still bears this name today, with its natural unity, is indisputably English."

With regard to historical facts, Judge Carneiro concluded that the military victories of the English and their naval power allowed them to secure the domination of the Channel Islands generally. It seemed "inconceivable" to him that England, having an important interest in the Channel Islands and full domination over the sea, and possessing all the principal islands, should not, without some special reason, have conquered and retained the Ecrehos and the Minquiers or, rather, that it would have left them to France.

The Opinion then referred to acts of occupation and other circumstances leading to the decision by the Court with which Judge Carneiro concurred.

C. THE NOTTEBOHM CASE (LIECHTENSTEIN VS. GUATEMALA)

The International Court of Justice on 18 November 1953 handed down a Judgment¹³ on a Preliminary Objection of the Guatemalan Government in the Nottebohm Case.¹⁴ In its Judgment, the Court stated that, in a communication signed by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Guatemala, dated 9 September 1952, and addressed to the President of the Court, Guatemala contended that the Court had no jurisdiction in the present case. Guatemala stated that it had recognized the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court, which it had accepted on 27 January 1947, but not in an absolute and general form, since this would have implied an indefinite submission to the detriment of its sovereignty. Guatemala stated further that the time limit provided for in its declaration had expired on 26 January 1952, and from that moment the International Court "has no jurisdiction to treat, elucidate or decide cases which would affect Guatemala", unless Guatemala prolonged its duration of its declaration with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, or signed a special protocol of submission with any other interested State. In the absence of these conditions, Guatemala was unable to appear before the Court in any given case.

Guatemala went on to state that it had taken note of the claim presented by Liechtenstein on supposed official acts to the alleged detriment of F. Nottebohm, and that the Guatemalan Ministry of Foreign Affairs was quite willing to begin negotiations with Liechtenstein, with a view to arriving at an amicable solution, either by way of a direct settlement, by arbitration or by judicial settlement. In the present circumstances, however, since the jurisdiction of the International Court in relation to Guatemala "has terminated and because it would be contrary to the domestic laws of that country", Guatemala was unable to appear and to contest the claim which had been made.

By Order of 21 March 1953,¹⁵ the Court fixed a time limit for the presentation by Liechtenstein of a written statement of its observations in regard to the communication of Guatemala. In a statement filed on 21 May 1953, within the time limit fixed by the Court, Liechtenstein requested the Court to assume jurisdiction over the case and to reject the contrary contentions of Guatemala. Liechtenstein argued that the terms of the declaration made by Guatemala on 27 January 1947, submitting to the jurisdiction of the Court for a period of five years, were sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the Court to hear and determine any case in which proceedings were instituted prior to midnight, 26 January 1952.

The Court, having taken into account the declared intention of the parties to seek a settlement of their dispute by negotiation, but not having been informed that such negotiation had achieved any result, fixed a hearing for 10 November 1953. Guatemala was not represented at the hearing.

In its Judgment, the Court declared that it has been generally recognized that, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, an international tribunal has the right to decide as to its own jurisdiction, and has the power to interpret for this purpose the instruments which govern that jurisdiction. The judicial character of the Court and the rule of general international law, the Court stated, were sufficient to establish that it was competent to adjudicate on its own jurisdiction in the present case. Consequently, it had to ascertain and decide whether the expiry on 26 January 1952 of the declaration by which Guatemala accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court had the effect of depriving the Court of its jurisdiction to adjudicate on the claim stated in the Application, of which it was seized on 17 December 1951 by Liechtenstein.

At the time Liechtenstein filed its Application, the declarations by Guatemala and Liechtenstein accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court were both in force. Article 36 of the Court's Statute and these declarations, said the Court, determined the law governing the Application.

The Court held that, in accordance with these declarations, the Application was filed in sufficient time validly to effect the seisin of the Court. Guatemala's declaration of 27 January 1947 made it clear, said the Court, that it was to last for five years. There could be no doubt that an Application filed after the expiry of this period would not have the effect of legally seizing the Court. But neither in its declaration nor in any other way did Guatemala then indicate that the time limit provided for in its declaration meant that the expiry of the period would deprive the Court of jurisdiction to deal with cases of which it had been previously seized. The Court could not therefore accept the conclusion of Guatemala in its communication of 9 September 1952 that, since Guatemala had accepted the jurisdiction of the Court for a period ending on 26 January 1952, the Court, after that date, no longer had the power of administering justice with reference to Guatemala.

Once the Court has been regularly seized, the Judgment declared, it must exercise its powers, as defined in its Statute, and the regularity of the seizing of the Court by this Application was not disputed.

When an Application is filed at a time when the law in force between the parties entails the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court—which was the case between Guatemala and Liechtenstein on 17 December 1951—the filing of the Application is merely the condition required to enable the clause of compulsory jurisdiction to produce its effects in respect of the claim advanced in the Application. Once this condition has been satisfied, the Court must deal with the claim; it has jurisdiction to deal with all its aspects, whether they relate to jurisdiction, to admissibility or to the merits. An extrinsic fact such as the subsequent lapse of the declaration, by reason of the expiry of the period or by denunciation, cannot, the Court declared, deprive the Court of the jurisdiction already established.

The Court therefore concluded that the expiry on 26 January 1952 of the five-year period for which Guatemala subscribed to a declaration accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court did not affect any jurisdiction which the Court might have to deal with the claim presented in the Application of which it was seized on 17 December 1951 by Liechtenstein.

For the above reasons, the Court on 18 November 1953 unanimously rejected the Preliminary Objection presented by Guatemala and resumed the proceedings on the merits. The Court fixed the following time limits for the rest of the procedure: 20 January 1954 for the filing of the Counter-Memorial of Guatemala; 25 February 1954 for the filing of the Reply by Liechtenstein; and 10 April 1954 for the filing of the Rejoinder by Guatemala.

D. OTHER CASES BEFORE THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

1. Case of the Monetary Gold Removed from Rome in 1943 (Italy vs. France, the United Kingdom and the United States)

Italy on 19 May 1953 filed an Application with the International Court of Justice asking the Court to adjudge and declare that France, the United Kingdom and the United States should deliver to Italy any share of the monetary gold (removed from Rome in 1943 by the Germans) that might be due to Albania, in partial satisfaction for the damage caused to Italy by an Albanian law of confiscation of 13 January 1945. The Court was also asked to adjudge and declare that Italy's right to receive the said share of monetary gold must have priority over the claim of the United Kingdom to receive the gold in partial satisfaction of the Court's 1949 judgment in the Corfu Channel case.

Italy on 19 May 1953 deposited with the Registry of the International Court of Justice a declaration accepting the jurisdiction of the Court in respect of the dispute concerned.

By an Order¹⁶ of 1 July 1953, the Court fixed the following time limits for the filing of Pleadings: 2 November 1953 for a Memorial by Italy; and 2 March 1954 for Counter-Memorials by France, the United Kingdom and the United States.

On 30 October 1953, Italy filed with the Court's Registry a document requesting the Court to adjudicate on the preliminary question of its jurisdiction to deal with the merits of the claim set forth in Italy's Application to the Court.

By an Order¹⁷ of 3 November 1953, the Court suspended the proceedings on the merits of the case in order to give Italy an opportunity to present a written statement defining its position, together with documents in support. The Court fixed 15 December 1953 as the time limit within which Italy was to present the statement and documents. It fixed 15 February 1954 as the time limit within which France, the United Kingdom and the United States might present written statements of their observations and submissions.

E. THE INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMISSION

The International Law Commission (ILC) held its fifth session at Geneva from 1 June to 14 August 1953. It elected for a term of one year the following officers: Chairman—J.P.A. François; First Vice-Chairman—Gilberto Amado; Second Vice-Chairman—F.I. Kozhevnikov; Rapporteur—H. Lauterpacht.¹⁹

The General Assembly at its eighth session discussed the Commission's report (A/2456) at the 381st to 389th meetings and 392nd to 394th meetings of the Sixth Committee, from 5 to 18 and from 25 to 28 November 1953, and at the 468th plenary meeting on 7 December.

2. "Electricité de Beyrouth" Company Case (France vs. Lebanon)

France on 15 August 1953 filed with the Registry of the International Court of Justice an Application instituting proceedings against Lebanon regarding a dispute between France and Lebanon concerning certain concessions for the exploitation of public services in Lebanon, granted by Lebanon to the "Electricité de Beyrouth" Company.

In its Application, France asked the Court to adjudge and declare:

(1) that the alterations of the situation of the "Société Electricité de Beyrouth" made unilaterally by Lebanon were contrary to the undertaking given in an Agreement of 24 January 1948 between France and Lebanon;

(2) that Lebanon had accordingly failed to carry out the obligation to negotiate with the concessionary company which it assumed under that agreement; and

(3) that Lebanon was under an obligation to enter into negotiations with the "Société Electricité de Beyrouth" in respect of any modifications of its situation and to make good the damage suffered until the date of the Court's decision as the result of the measures which had prevented the "Société Electricité de Beyrouth" from operating according to the rules which Lebanon was under an obligation to observe.

By an Order¹⁸ of 20 October 1953, the Court fixed the following time limits for the filing of Pleadings: 18 January 1954 for the Memorial of France, and 28 April 1954 for the Counter-Memorial of Lebanon.

1. Arbitral Procedure

a. DRAFT PREPARED BY THE COMMISSION

In reviewing the draft on arbitral procedure drawn up at its previous session²⁰ the Commission had before it comments received from the Governments of the following countries: Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, India, the Netherlands,

Norway, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.²¹

In its report, the Commission stated that, in the light of the comments of governments and of the study of the provisional draft by its members in the intervening period between the fourth and fifth sessions, it had adopted a number of substantial changes. The Commission also had before it a detailed commentary prepared by the Secretariat in accordance with a decision taken at its fourth session.

The Commission explained that the term "arbitral procedure" as used in the title of the draft referred to arbitral procedure in its wider sense, i.e., provisions for safeguarding the effectiveness of arbitration engagements accepted by the parties, as well as clauses relating to the constitution and powers of the tribunal, the general rules of evidence and procedure, and the award of arbitrators. It had not considered it necessary to frame detailed rules of arbitral procedure, which were liable to vary according to the circumstances of each arbitration.

The Commission emphasized that the present draft on arbitral procedure had a dual aspect, representing, on the one hand, a codification of existing law on international arbitration, and, on the other, a formulation of what the Commission considered to be desirable developments in the field. Thus the Commission had preserved all the traditional features of arbitral procedure, such as those provided for in article 1, relating to the undertaking to arbitrate, in article 3, relating to the constitution of the tribunal, in articles 9 and 10, relating to powers and procedure of the tribunal, and in other articles.

At the same time, the Commission had also provided certain procedural safeguards for securing the effectiveness, in accordance with the original common intention of the parties, of the undertaking to arbitrate. For example, to prevent one of the parties to an undertaking to arbitrate from avoiding arbitration by claiming that the dispute in question was not covered by the undertaking, article 2 provided for a binding decision by the International Court of Justice as to the arbitrability of the dispute. Similarly, in order to avoid the frustration that might be caused by one government withdrawing its arbitrator, articles 5 to 8 provided for the immutability of the tribunal once it had been formed, except in specified cases. The article also created the requisite machinery for the filling of vacancies regardless of whether they arose in contingencies authorized in the draft or whether they were due to action taken in violation of its provisions. Similarly article 10 of the draft included detailed provisions for the drawing up of the compromis by the arbitral tribunal in cases in which the parties had failed to reach agreement on the subject. Article 13 conferred upon the tribunal the power to formulate its rules of procedure whenever the compromis, or its equivalent, failed to cover the matter wholly or in part.

After giving several other examples of similar provisions designed to ensure the effectiveness of the undertaking to arbitrate, the Commission remarked that, while the provisions of the draft constituted procedural innovations and while, to that extent, they fell within the orbit of development of international law, they were not otherwise innovations at all.

Dealing with the alterations which it made in the draft in the course of its fifth session, the Commission stated that in many cases they had been prompted by the observations of various governments. Apart from the changes in drafting, these alterations were aimed, in some cases, at simplifying the procedure previously formulated. In other cases, further study had revealed certain gaps which the Commission had now thought it desirable to fill. For example, in article 3, which was concerned with the constitution of the arbitral tribunal, it was thought desirable to simplify the procedure previously formulated and to shorten the delays by eliminating recourse to third States for assistance in the constitution of the tribunal. The present draft, it was stated, completed the scheme by making provision for the determination of the composition of the tribunal by the President of the International Court of Justice, or the judge acting in his place, in case the compromis was silent on the matter or if no agreement could be reached between the parties on the subject. Similarly, it was stated, the draft now made provision for the designation of the president of the tribunal in cases in which the arbitrators appointed by the parties failed to agree on his appointment or if his appointment had not materialized for some other reason.

With regard to the autonomy of the parties, the report of the Commission stated that, both at the fifth and at preceding sessions, the Commission was anxious to preserve what it considered to be the essential feature of international arbitration as distinguished from the more institutionalized procedure of international judicial settlement. That essential feature, the Commission said, was the autonomy of the will of the parties both with regard to the choice of the arbitrators, the law to be applied and the procedure of the arbitral tribunal. That freedom, it said, was limited only by the following basic considerations: first, that the procedure adopted must not be such as to frustrate the common intention of the parties, as expressed in the original undertaking to arbitrate and, secondly, that there must be no impairment of the binding character of the award. Apart from these fundamental considerations, the procedure as formulated in the draft, the Commission stated, was, in general, of an optional character.

To illustrate this feature of the draft, the Commission referred to a number of its provisions. For example, in article 2, providing for a determination of the arbitrability of a dispute by the International Court of Justice, that procedure was made obligatory only "in the absence of agreement between the parties upon another procedure". Similarly, article 12 provided what would be the law to be applied by the arbitral tribunal; but this was so only "in the absence of any agreement between the parties concerning the law to be applied". Such optional clauses, the Commission said, had been included in a number of articles to ensure the autonomy of the parties.

The draft Convention submitted by the Commission read as follows:

CHAPTER I

The undertaking to arbitrate

Article 1

1. An undertaking to have recourse to arbitration may apply to existing disputes or to disputes arising in the future.

2. The undertaking shall result from a written instrument, whatever the form of the instrument may be.

3. The undertaking constitutes a legal obligation which must be carried out in good faith.

Article 2

1. If, prior to the constitution of an arbitral tribunal, the parties to an undertaking to arbitrate disagree as to the existence of a dispute, or as to whether an existing dispute is within the scope of the obligation to have recourse to arbitration, such preliminary question may, in the absence of agreement between the parties upon another procedure, be brought before the International Court of Justice by application of either party. The decision rendered by the Court shall be final.

2. In its decision on the question, the Court may prescribe the provisional measures to be taken for the protection of the respective interests of the parties pending the constitution of the arbitral tribunal.

CHAPTER II

Constitution of the tribunal

Article 3

1. Within three months from the date of the request made for the submission of the dispute to arbitration, or from the date of the decision of the International Court of Justice in pursuance of article 2, paragraph 1, the parties to an undertaking to arbitrate shall proceed to constitute the arbitral tribunal by appointing a sole arbitrator or several arbitrators in accordance with the compromis referred to in article 9 or with any other instrument embodying the undertaking to arbitrate.

2. If a party fails to make the necessary appointments under the preceding paragraph within three months, the appointment shall be made by the President of the International Court of Justice at the request of the other party. If the President is prevented from acting or is a national of one of the parties, the appointments shall be made by the Vice-President. If the Vice-President is prevented from acting or is a national of one of the parties, the appointments shall be made by the oldest member of the Court who is not a national of either party.

3. The appointments referred to in paragraph 2 shall be made in accordance with the provisions of the compromis or of any other instrument embodying the undertaking to arbitrate. In the absence of such provisions the composition of the tribunal shall be determined, after consultation with the parties, by the President of the International Court of Justice or the judge acting in his place.

4. In cases where provision is made for the choice of a president of the tribunal by the other arbitrators, the tribunal shall be deemed constituted when the president is selected. If the president has not been chosen within two months of the appointment of the other arbitrators, he shall be designated in the manner prescribed in paragraph 2.

Article 4

1. The parties having recourse to arbitration shall constitute a tribunal which may consist of one or more arbitrators.

2. Subject to the circumstances of the case, the arbitrators should be chosen from among persons of recognized competence in international law.

Article 5

1. Once the tribunal has been constituted, its composition shall remain unchanged until the award has been rendered.

2. A party may, however, replace an arbitrator appointed by it, provided that the tribunal has not yet begun its proceedings. An arbitrator may not be replaced during the proceedings before the tribunal except by agreement between the parties.

3. The proceedings are deemed to have begun when the President or sole arbitrator has made the first order concerning written or oral proceedings.

Article 6

Should a vacancy occur on account of death or incapacity of an arbitrator or, prior to the commencement of proceedings, the resignation of an arbitrator, the vacancy shall be filled by the method laid down for the original appointment.

Article 7

1. Once the proceedings before the tribunal have begun, an arbitrator may withdraw only with the consent of the tribunal. The resulting vacancy shall be filled by the method laid down for the original appointment.

2. Should the withdrawal take place without the consent of the tribunal, the resulting vacancy shall be filled, at the request of the tribunal in the manner provided for in paragraph 2 of article 3.

Article 8

1. A party may propose the disqualification of one of the arbitrators on account of a fact arising subsequently to the constitution of the tribunal. It may propose the disqualification of one of the arbitrators on account of a fact arising prior to the constitution of the tribunal only if it can show that the appointment was made without knowledge of that fact or as a result of fraud. In either case, the decision shall be taken by the other members of the tribunal.

2. In the case of a sole arbitrator the question of disqualification shall be decided by the International Court of Justice on the application of either party.

3. The resulting vacancies shall be filled, at the request of the tribunal in the manner provided for in paragraph 2 of article 3.

CHAPTER III

The compromis

Article 9

Unless there are prior agreements which suffice for the purpose, the parties having recourse to arbitration shall conclude a compromis which shall specify:

- (a) The subject matter of the dispute;
- (b) The method of constituting the tribunal and the number of arbitrators;
- (c) The place where the tribunal shall meet.

In addition to any other provisions deemed desirable by the parties, the compromis may also specify the following:

- (1) The law to be applied by the tribunal, and the power, if any, to adjudicate ex aequo et bono;
- (2) The power, if any, of the tribunal to make recommendations to the parties;
- (3) The procedure to be followed by the tribunal;
- (4) The number of members constituting a quorum for the conduct of the proceedings;
- (5) The majority required for the award;
- (6) The time limit within which the award shall be rendered;
- (7) The right of members of the tribunal to attach dissenting opinions to the award;
- (8) The appointment of agents and counsel;
- (9) The languages to be employed in the proceedings before the tribunal; and
- (10) The manner in which the costs and expenses shall be divided.

Article 10

1. When the undertaking to arbitrate contains provisions which seem sufficient for the purpose of a compromis and the tribunal has been constituted, either party may submit the dispute to the tribunal by application. If the other party refuses to answer the application on the ground that the provisions above referred to are insufficient, the tribunal shall decide whether there is already sufficient agreement between the parties on the essential elements of a compromis as set forth in article 9 to enable it to proceed with the case. In the case of an affirmative decision the tribunal shall prescribe the necessary measures for the continuation of the proceedings. In the contrary case the tribunal shall order the parties to conclude a compromis within such time limit as the tribunal will consider reasonable.

2. If the parties fail to agree on a compromis within the time limit fixed in accordance with the preceding paragraph, the tribunal shall draw up the compromis.

3. If neither party claims that the provisions of the undertaking to arbitrate are sufficient for the purposes of a compromis and the parties fail to agree on a compromis within three months after the date on which one of the parties has notified the other of its readiness to conclude the compromis, the tribunal, at the request of the said party, shall draw up the compromis.

CHAPTER IV

Powers of the tribunal

Article 11

The tribunal, which is the judge of its own competence, possesses the widest powers to interpret the compromis.

Article 12

1. In the absence of any agreement between the parties concerning the law to be applied, the tribunal shall be guided by Article 38, paragraph 1, of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.

2. The tribunal may not bring in a finding of non liquet on the ground of the silence or obscurity of international law or of the compromis.

Article 13

1. All questions shall be decided by a majority of the tribunal.

2. In the absence of any agreement between the parties concerning the procedure of the tribunal, the tribunal shall be competent to formulate its rules of procedure.

Article 14

The parties are equal in any proceedings before the tribunal.

Article 15

1. The tribunal shall be the judge of the admissibility and the weight of the evidence presented to it.

2. The parties shall co-operate with the tribunal in the production of evidence and shall comply with the measures ordered by the tribunal for this purpose. The tribunal shall take note of the failure of any party to comply with its obligations under this paragraph.

3. The tribunal shall have the power at any stage of the proceedings to call for such evidence as it may deem necessary.

4. At the request of either party, the tribunal may visit the scene with which the case before it is connected, provided that the requesting party offers to pay the costs.

Article 16

The tribunal shall decide on any incidental or additional claims or counter-claims arising directly out of the subject-matter of the dispute.

Article 17

The tribunal, or in case of urgency its president subject to confirmation by the tribunal, shall have the power to prescribe, at the request of one of the parties and if circumstances so require, any provisional measures to be taken for the protection of the respective interests of the parties.

Article 18

When, subject to the control of the tribunal, the agents and counsel have completed their presentation of the case, the proceedings shall be formally declared closed.

Article 19

The deliberations of the tribunal, which should be attended by all of its members, shall remain secret.

Article 20

1. Whenever one of the parties does not appear before the tribunal, or fails to defend its case, the other party may call upon the tribunal to decide in favour of its claim.

2. In such case, the tribunal may render an award if it is satisfied that it has jurisdiction and that the claim is well-founded in fact and in law.

Article 21

1. Discontinuance of proceedings by the claimant party may not be accepted by the tribunal without the consent of the respondent.

2. If the case is discontinued by agreement between the parties, the tribunal shall take note of the fact.

Article 22

The tribunal may take note of a settlement reached by the parties. At the request of the parties, it may embody the settlement in an award.

CHAPTER V

The award

Article 23

The award shall be rendered within the period fixed by the compromis unless the tribunal, with the consent of either party, decides to extend the period fixed in the compromis.

Article 24

1. The award shall be drawn up in writing. It shall contain the names of the arbitrators and shall be signed by the president and the members of the tribunal who have voted for it.

2. The award shall state the reasons on which it is based.

3. The award is rendered by being read in open court, the agents of the parties being present or duly summoned to appear.

4. The award shall immediately be communicated to the parties.

Article 25

Subject to any contrary provision in the compromis, any member of the tribunal may attach to the award his separate or dissenting opinion.

Article 26

The award is binding upon the parties when it is rendered. It must be carried out in good faith.

Article 27

Within a month after the award has been tendered and communicated to the parties, the tribunal, either of its own accord or at the request of either party, shall be entitled to rectify any clerical, typographical or arithmetical error or errors of the same nature apparent* on the face of the award.

Article 28

1. Any dispute between the parties as to the meaning and scope of the award may, at the request of either party and within one month of the rendering of the award, be submitted to the tribunal which rendered the award. A request for interpretation shall stay execution of the award pending the decision of the tribunal on the request.

2. If, for any reason, it is impossible to submit the dispute to the tribunal which rendered the award, and if the parties have not agreed otherwise within three months, the dispute may be referred to the International Court of Justice at the request of either party.

CHAPTER VI

Revision

Article 29

1. An application for the revision of the award may be made by either party on the ground of the discovery of some fact of such a nature as to have a decisive influence on the award, provided that when the award was rendered that fact was unknown to the tribunal and to the party requesting revision and that such ignorance was not due to the negligence of the party requesting revision.

2. The application for revision must be made within six months of the discovery of the new fact and in any case within ten years of the rendering of the award.

3. In the proceedings for revision the tribunal shall, in the first instance, make a finding as to the existence of the alleged new fact and rule on the admissibility of the application. If the tribunal finds the application admissible it shall then decide on the merits of the dispute.

4. The application for revision shall be made to the tribunal which rendered the award. If, for any reason, it is not possible to make the application to that tribunal, the application may, unless the parties agree otherwise, be made to the International Court of Justice, by either party.

CHAPTER VII

Annulment of the award

Article 30

The validity of an award may be challenged by either party on one or more of the following grounds:

- (a) That the tribunal has exceeded its powers;
- (b) That there was corruption on the part of a member of the tribunal;
- (c) That there has been a serious departure from a fundamental rule of procedure, including failure to state the reasons for the award.

Article 31

1. The International Court of Justice shall be competent, on the application of either party, to declare the nullity of the award on any of the grounds set out in the preceding article.

2. In cases covered by paragraphs (a) and (f) of article 30 the application must be made within sixty days of the rendering of the award and in the case covered by paragraph (b) within six months.

3. The application shall stay execution unless otherwise decided by the Court.

Article 32

If the award is declared invalid by the International Court of Justice, the dispute shall be submitted to a new tribunal to be constituted by agreement of the parties, or, failing such agreement, in the manner provided in article 3.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The Assembly's Sixth Committee decided to consider first chapter II of the report of the International Law Commission (A/2456), the chapter dealing with arbitral procedure. It dealt with this chapter at its 382nd to 389th meetings from 9 to 18 November.

The Committee heard a statement by the Chairman of the Commission, J.P.A. François, who said that there was some degree of misunderstanding on the draft, which was merely a draft on arbitral procedure and not a draft convention on arbitration. Some delegations, he said, seemed to be willing to accept the obligations suggested in the draft in particular cases or in bilateral agreements, but were reluctant to conclude a general convention. By subscribing to a convention, he continued, a State would not assume an obligation to submit disputes to arbitration but only to follow a certain procedure for the implementation of such an obligation when undertaken. He considered that a general convention on arbitral procedure was needed in addition to bilateral treaties, and that it was illogical to accept procedures for arbitration in bilateral treaties but not in such a general convention.

During the debate in the Committee, the representatives of Afghanistan, Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, France, Guatemala, India, Iran, Poland, Syria and the USSR expressed the view that the draft presented by the International Law Commission was unsatisfactory in view of its sharp deviation from the accepted norms of international arbitration. The procedure envisaged in the draft tended to convert arbitration into adjudication, it was maintained. Most of the criticism by these representatives of the draft centred on articles 2, 3, 7, 8, 12, 28, 31 and 32, in which provision was made for referral to the International Court of Justice of various questions connected with the arbitration proceedings. It was argued that the procedure, if followed, would introduce the International Court of Justice as a court of revision and thereby detract from the efficacy of arbitration, an essential feature of which was the finality of the award. The procedure proposed, it was argued, would also discourage States from entering into arbitration agreements and would thus close an important means for the peaceful settlement of disputes. Some of these representatives, in particular the representative of Poland, emphasized that the draft, if accepted, would restrict the sovereignty of States by compelling them to appear before the International Court of Justice against their will.

On the other hand, the representatives of Canada, China, Cuba, Greece, Mexico, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Sweden and Uruguay, among others, expressed general support of the Commission's draft, which, they maintained, was aimed at making arbitration effective and at preventing future failures to fulfil the undertaking to arbitrate. Although, it was said, the draft convention would bring arbitration closer to permanent jurisdiction, it would not bind parties to enter into undertakings to arbitrate. As regards clauses providing for the intervention of the International Court of Justice, it was argued that many agreements to arbitrate already contained a voluntary undertaking providing for such intervention. Further, the idea of arbitration did not exclude the possibility of leaving to an impartial body acting independently of the wishes of the parties the decision of such questions as whether or not a dispute came within the obligation to arbitrate, according to the terms of a particular arbitration treaty.

The representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States, while paying tribute to the draft prepared by the Commission, reserved the position of their Governments as regards a draft convention on arbitral procedure and as regards the holding of a conference to conclude such a convention. The representatives of Israel and the United States expressed the view that the greatest usefulness of the draft would be as a model for procedural provisions in future arbitration agreements.

In reply to some of the points raised during the debate, the Chairman of the International Law Commission, Mr. François, issued an explanatory statement (A/C.6/L.320). He conceded that a State in accepting article 2 of the draft providing for the submission to the International Court of Justice of the question of the arbitrability of the dispute, would be accepting a new restriction of its sovereign rights, but he maintained that that was the price it paid for the certainty that an undertaking to arbitrate would not be nullified by a disagreement between the parties on that preliminary question. As regards the provisions in articles 2, 28, 29, and 31 for the intervention of the International Court of Justice, Mr. François stated that in none of the cases contemplated was the Court envisaged as entering into the merits of a case or as rendering an arbitral award.

If a final decision could not be taken by the General Assembly at its present session, he asked the Committee, in the interests of advancing the work of codification, to consider resuming discussion of the draft at the next session.

Two draft resolutions were introduced in the Committee, one by Sweden (A/C.6/L.315) and the other jointly by Argentina, Egypt, France, India and Syria (A/C.6/L.316). Since both were similar in content, they were consolidated, by agreement of the sponsors, into a single draft resolution sponsored by Argentina, Canada, Chile, Egypt, France, India, Sweden and Syria (A/C.6/L.317).

Under this draft resolution, the General Assembly noting the final draft of the International Law Commission on arbitral procedure would:

(1) decide to transmit it to Member States together with the observations made on the draft in the Sixth Committee with a view to the submission by governments of whatever comments they might deem appropriate, if possible, before 1 January 1955; and

(2) request the Secretary-General to circulate to Member States any comments he might receive and to include the question in the provisional agenda of the Assembly's tenth session.

At its 388th meeting on 17 November 1953, the Committee by 23 votes to 13, with 10 abstentions, adopted an oral Philippine amendment to delete the word "final" from the preamble. By a roll-call vote of 35 to 8, it adopted a Cuban oral amendment to state that the draft included certain important elements with respect to the progressive development of international law on arbitral procedure.

The draft resolution, thus amended, was then voted on by paragraphs, which were adopted in votes ranging from 48 to none, with 2 abstentions, to 43 to 5, with 3 abstentions. The draft resolution was adopted, as a whole, by the Committee by 42 votes to none, with 9 abstentions.

The Sixth Committee's report (A/2589) was considered by the General Assembly at its 468th plenary meeting on 7 December 1953. The Assembly adopted the Committee's draft resolution, without discussion, by 45 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 797(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting the draft on arbitral procedure prepared by the International Law Commission at its fifth session,

"Considering that the said draft includes certain important elements with respect to the progressive development of international law on arbitral procedure,

"Considering that, having regard to the importance of the topic, the governments of Member States should have an opportunity of making known their views on the draft on arbitral procedure in the light of the discussion which has taken place at the current session of the General Assembly,

"1. Decides to transmit to Member States the draft on arbitral procedure prepared by the International Law Commission together with the observations made thereon in the Sixth Committee at the current session of the General Assembly, with a view to the submission by governments of whatever comments they may deem appropriate, if possible, before 1 January 1955;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to circulate to Member States any comments he may receive, and to include the question in the provisional agenda of the tenth session of the General Assembly."

2. Regime of the High Seas

a. DRAFTS PREPARED BY THE COMMISSION

In connexion with its study of the topic "regime of the high seas", the Commission examined once more, in the light of comments received from governments, the provisional draft articles adopted at its third session.²² It invited J.P.A. François, special rapporteur on the regime of the high seas, to undertake a further study of this topic and to prepare a report on subjects within this field which were not covered in his third and fifth reports (A/CN.4/51 & A/CN.4/69).

It adopted draft articles on the following subjects:

(1) The Continental Shelf

In considering the subject of the continental shelf, the Commission had before it a further report from the special rapporteur Mr. J.P.A. François (A/CN.4/60) prepared after re-examination in the light of observations from the Governments of the following countries: Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, France, Iceland, Israel, the Netherlands, Norway, the Philippines, Sweden, Syria, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia. The Commission adopted eight draft articles on the continental shelf which, it recommended, the General Assembly should adopt by resolution. The text of the draft articles follows:

Article 1

As used in these articles, the term "continental shelf" refers to the sea-bed and subsoil of the submarine areas contiguous to the coast, but outside the area of the territorial sea, to a depth of two hundred metres.

Article 2

The coastal State exercises over the continental shelf sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring and exploiting its natural resources.

Article 3

The rights of the coastal State over the continental shelf do not affect the legal status of the superjacent waters as high seas.

Article 4

The rights of the coastal State over the continental shelf do not affect the legal status of the airspace above the superjacent waters.

Article 5

Subject to its right to take reasonable measures for the exploration of the continental shelf and the exploitation of its natural resources, the coastal State may not prevent the establishment or maintenance of submarine cables.

Article 6

1. The exploration of the continental shelf and the exploitation of its natural resources must not result in any unjustifiable interference with navigation, fishing or fish production.

2. Subject to the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 5 of this article, the coastal State is entitled to construct and maintain on the continental shelf installations necessary for the exploration and exploitation of its natural resources and to establish safety zones at a reasonable distance around such installations and to take in those zones measures necessary for their protection.

3. Such installations, though under the jurisdiction of the coastal State, do not possess the status of islands. They have no territorial sea of their own and their presence does not affect the delimitation of the territorial sea of the coastal State.

4. Due notice must be given of any such installations constructed, and due means of warning of the presence of such installations must be maintained.

5. Neither the installations themselves, nor the said safety zones around them may be established in narrow channels or on recognized sea lanes essential to international navigation.

Article 7

1. Where the same continental shelf is contiguous to the territories of two or more States whose coasts are opposite to each other, the boundary of the continental shelf appertaining to such States is, in the absence of agreement between those States or unless another boundary line is justified by special circumstances, the median line every point of which is equidistant from the base lines from which the width of the territorial sea of each country is measured.

2. Where the same continental shelf is contiguous to the territories of two adjacent States, the boundary of the continental shelf appertaining to such States is, in the absence of agreement between those States or unless another boundary line is justified by special circumstances, determined by application of the principle of equidistance from the base lines from which the width of the territorial sea of each of the two countries is measured.

Article 8

Any disputes which may arise between States concerning the interpretation or application of these articles should be submitted to arbitration at the request of any of the parties.

(2) Fisheries

The Commission reconsidered in the light of the observations of governments, articles on the resources of the sea provisionally adopted at its third session. It had before it the observations of the Governments of the following countries: Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Denmark, Ecuador, France, Iceland, the Netherlands, Norway, the Philippines, Sweden, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia. It adopted three draft articles on fisheries covering the basic aspects of an international regulation of fisheries. The Commission recommended that the Assembly adopt the articles by resolution and enter into consultation with the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations with a view to the preparation of a draft convention incorporating the principles adopted by the Commission. The text of the draft articles on fisheries follows:

Article 1

A State whose nationals are engaged in fishing in any area of the high seas where the nationals of other States are not thus engaged, may regulate and control fishing activities in such areas for the purpose of protecting fisheries against waste or extermination. If the nationals of two or more States are engaged in fishing in any area of the high seas, the States concerned shall prescribe the necessary measures by agreement. If, subsequent to the adoption of such measures, nationals of other States engage in fishing in the area and those States do not accept the measures adopted, the question shall, at the request of one of the interested parties, be referred to the international body envisaged in article 3.

Article 2

In any area situated within one hundred miles from the territorial sea, the coastal State or States are entitled to take part on an equal footing in any system of regulation, even though their nationals do not carry on fishing in the area.

Article 3

States shall be under a duty to accept, as binding upon their nationals, any system of regulation of fisheries in any area of the high seas which an international authority, to be created within the framework of the United Nations, shall prescribe as being essential for the purpose of protecting the fishing resources of that area against waste or extermination. Such international authority shall act at the request of any interested State.

(3) Contiguous Zone

The Commission adopted a single article on contiguous zone. It stated that the article was identical to the one adopted at the Commission's third session except for the words reproduced in italics. Apart from some qualifications and reservations, the principle underlying the article encountered no opposition from governments, the Commission stated. The Commission did not recommend any Assembly action in respect of this article. Its text follows:

"On the high seas adjacent to its territorial sea, the coastal State may exercise the control necessary to prevent and punish the infringement, within its territory or territorial sea, of its customs, immigration, fiscal or sanitary regulations. Such control may not be exercised at a distance beyond twelve miles from the base line from which the width of the territorial sea is measured."

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The Assembly's Sixth Committee considered chapter III of the Commission's report (A/2456) containing these drafts at its 389th, 392nd and 393rd meetings on 18 and 25 November 1953.

It had before it three draft resolutions:

(1) A draft resolution by Iceland (A/C.6/L.314) which provided, inter alia, that the General Assembly, considering that at its fourth session it had recommended that the International Law Commission study simultaneously the regime of the high seas and the regime of territorial waters, and, having regard to the fact that the problems relating to the high seas, territorial waters, contiguous zones, the continental shelf and the superjacent waters were closely linked together juridically as well as physically, would decide not to deal with any aspect of the regime of the high seas or the regime of the territorial waters until all the problems involved had been studied by the International Law Commission and reported upon by it to the General Assembly.

(2) A draft resolution by Panama (A/C.6/L.319) which was superseded by a revised text (A/C.6/L.319/Rev.1), according to which the General Assembly would request the International Law Commission "to continue its study of the drafts relating to the territorial sea and to the régime of the high seas with a view to the harmonious co-ordination of these drafts and their inclusion in the agenda of the tenth session of the General Assembly".

(3) A joint draft resolution by Canada, Egypt, France, Syria and the United Kingdom (A/C.6/L.318), providing that the General Assembly, desiring to give governments sufficient time to study the draft articles on the continental shelf and those on fisheries and the implications of the draft articles, would decide to postpone consideration of the parts of the report of the International Law Commission dealing with those subjects and to include them in the provisional agenda of the Assembly's tenth session.

To this joint draft resolution, the United States proposed an amendment (A/C.6/L.325), envisaging the inclusion in the provisional agenda of the ninth session of the subject of the continental shelf and in that of the tenth session of the subject of fisheries.

The representative of Iceland, supported by, among others, the representatives of Norway, Poland, Sweden and the USSR, stated that the regime of the high seas and that of the territorial sea were closely related and should be considered together. Furthermore, the draft articles on the continental shelf and those on fisheries could not be studied before certain aspects of the regime of the high seas, such as contiguous zones, and certain aspects of the regime of the territorial sea, such as the delimitation of that sea, were settled.

The sponsors of the five-Power draft resolution, supported by the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Greece, India, the Netherlands, and New Zealand, among others, said that the adoption of the Icelandic draft resolution would postpone indefinitely the consideration of the question. They shared the view, expressed by the Chairman of the International Law Commission, that the subjects of the continental shelf and fisheries were susceptible of independent solution.

The representative of the United States said that the question of the continental shelf was quite distinct from that of fisheries and from other problems relating to the high seas. The question could be considered without affecting the claims of States with regard to the limit of territorial waters.

In a statement (A/C.6/L.324) circulated to the Committee, the Chairman of the International Law Commission, said that it was undesirable to postpone for such a long period consideration of the question of the continental shelf, since a number of States were already considering unilateral legislation to regulate their rights in the continental shelf. Such unilateral laws, he stated, were expected to display considerable divergencies and, once they were enacted, it would be more difficult to reach agreement among States on a generally accepted body of rules.

At the 393rd meeting of the Sixth Committee on 25 November, the Icelandic draft resolution was voted on by roll-call and was adopted by 19 votes to 14, with 18 abstentions.

In view of the adoption of this draft resolution, the joint draft resolution submitted by Canada, Egypt, France, Syria and the United Kingdom and the United States amendment to it and the draft resolution submitted by Panama were not put to the vote.

The Sixth Committee's report (A/2589) was considered by the General Assembly at its 468th plenary meeting on 7 December 1953.

The representative of the Netherlands submitted an amendment (A/L.170) to the draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee. The amendment would refer to General Assembly resolution 374(IV) and would provide, in the operative part, that, instead of postponing consideration of the question "until all the problems involved had been studied by the International Law Commission", the Assembly would postpone consideration of the articles on the continental shelf and on fisheries only to the tenth session.

Explaining his amendment, the representative of the Netherlands said that the preamble of the draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee did not represent exactly the contents of Assembly resolution 374(IV). The word "simultaneously" did not occur in that resolution. Furthermore the amendment would bring the draft resolution into line with the view of the International Law Commission as expressed in the Sixth Committee by its Chairman. Supporting the amendment, the representative of the United Kingdom said that the draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee was negative in character and would indefinitely postpone the consideration of the Commission's work on fisheries and the continental shelf—subjects whose importance was increasing every day. He would vote against the Sixth Committee's draft resolution if the amendment proposed by the Netherlands were not carried, he said.

Opposing the amendment, the representative of Iceland said that its substance had already been rejected by the Sixth Committee. Instead of reaching a quick decision on the question, it would be far better if the question was thoroughly investigated by the Commission. He would therefore vote against the amendment.

The Netherlands amendments were rejected by 19 votes to 17, with 14 abstentions.

The draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee was adopted by the Assembly by 30 votes to 9, with 11 abstentions, as resolution 798(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that at its fourth session the General Assembly recommended that the International Law

Commission study simultaneously the regime of the high seas and the regime of territorial waters,

"Having regard to the fact that the problems relating to the high seas, territorial waters, contiguous zones, the continental shelf and the superjacent waters are closely linked together juridically as well as physically,

"Decides not to deal with any aspect of the regime of the high seas or of the regime of territorial waters until all the problems involved have been studied by the International Law Commission and reported upon by it to the General Assembly."

3. State Responsibility

At its 393rd and 394th meetings on 25 and 28 November, the Assembly's Sixth Committee considered a draft resolution submitted by Cuba (A/C.6/L.311), providing that the General Assembly "request the International Law Commission, as soon as it considers it possible, to undertake the codification of the principles of international law governing State responsibility and to include it among topics to which it accords priority".

Some representatives expressed the view that, since the item was not on the agenda of the General Assembly, it could not be considered by the Sixth Committee. The Committee, however, decided, by 16 votes to 5, with 24 abstentions, to consider the question.

In explaining the draft resolution, the representative of Cuba pointed out that "State responsibility" was one of the fourteen topics of international law which the Commission, at its first session in 1949, had provisionally selected for codification. In his view, the topic was now ripe for codification. He emphasized that many disputes between States arose out of claims based on real or alleged infringements of international obligations involving the responsibility of the State. A systematic formulation of the relevant principles would, he considered, facilitate the establishment of peaceful and friendly relations between States. The representative of Cuba added that the adoption of his draft resolution would not compel the Commission to undertake such codification immediately.

In the course of the Committee's consideration of the question, the representative of Cuba accepted the suggestion of the Chairman of the International Law Commission to substitute for the word "possible" the word "advisable" in the operative part. He also accepted an oral amendment by New Zealand to delete the words "and to include it among the topics to which it [the Commission] accords priority".

The Cuban draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Committee, by 30 votes to none, with 16 abstentions, and, on the Committee's recommendation (A/2589), by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 468th plenary meeting on 7 December 1953, by 36 votes to none, with 16 abstentions. The resolution (799(VIII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that it is desirable for the maintenance and development of peaceful relations between States that the principles of international law governing State responsibility be codified,

"Noting that the International Law Commission at its first session included the topic 'State responsibility' in its provisional list of topics of international law selected for codification,

"Requests the International Law Commission, as soon as it considers it advisable, to undertake the codification of the principles of international law governing State responsibility."

4. Others Matters Considered by the Commission

a. NATIONALITY INCLUDING STATELESSNESS

At the end of its fourth session, the Commissioner appointed Roberto Cordova (Mexico) to replace Manley O. Hudson (United States) as special rapporteur on the topic of "Nationality including statelessness". It also appointed Ivan Kerno as an expert to assist the special rapporteur. The special rapporteur presented a report (A/CN.4/64) to the Commission's fifth session, containing articles accompanied by detailed comment, for two draft conventions: one on the elimination of future statelessness and the other on the reduction of future statelessness. The Commission also had before it a "Report on Nationality including Statelessness" (A/CN.4/50) presented by Mr. Hudson to its fourth session, a memorandum prepared by Mr. Kerno on national legislation concerning grounds for the deprivation of nationality (A/CN.4/66) and two reports of the Secretary-General, namely, "A Study of Statelessness" (E/1112 & Add.1) and "The Problem of Statelessness" (A/CN.4/56 & Add.1).

The Commission adopted both draft conventions and decided to request the Secretary-General to issue them as a Commission document. It also decided to invite governments to submit their comments on the draft conventions as formulated by it. The Commission would then, it stated, consider whether and in what form it should submit to the General Assembly one or more final draft conventions and what course of action it should recommend.

During the fifth session, the special rapporteur prepared an interim report and drafts of conventions bearing upon the problem of elimination or reduction of existing statelessness (A/CN.4/75). The Commission asked the special rapporteur to devote further study to the matter and to prepare a report for the next session.

b. OTHER DECISIONS

(1) The Commission rejected a proposal whereby a dissenting member of the Commission might attach a statement of his opinion to any decision by the Commission on draft rules of international law. It also rejected a proposal whereby, in cases other than those covered by the previous decision, a dissenting member might briefly explain his views in a footnote if a decision had been taken on a question of principle affecting the work of the Commission. During the discussion, it was proposed that members should be entitled to record, in an annex to the final report, their dissent from all or part of a report adopted by the Commission and to append a brief statement of the reason for their dissenting opinion. This proposal, also, was not accepted by the Commission, the vote being equally divided. Instead the Commission confirmed the rule adopted at its third session that detailed explanations of dissenting opinions should not be inserted in the report, but merely a statement to the effect that, for the reasons given in the summary records, a member was opposed to the adoption of a particular passage of the report.

(2) The Commission requested its special rapporteur on the law of treaties, H. Lauterpacht, to continue his work on the subject and to present a further report to the next session.

(3) The Commission requested Jean Spiropoulos, special rapporteur on the Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind, to undertake a further study of the question and to submit a report to the Commission's next session.

(4) In view of the forthcoming periodical election of its members,²³ the Commission decided to postpone a decision on General Assembly resolution 685(VII)²⁴ by which the Commission was asked to undertake the codification of the topic "diplomatic intercourse and immunities" and to accord it priority.

F. THE QUESTION OF DEFINING AGGRESSION

By resolution 688(VII)²⁵ of 20 December 1952, the General Assembly established a Special Committee of fifteen members²⁶ and requested it to submit to the Assembly's ninth session draft definitions of aggression or draft statements of the notion of aggression and to study on the assumption of a definition being adopted by a resolution of the General Assembly:

- (1) the various forms of aggression;
- (2) the connexion between a definition of aggression and the maintenance of international peace and security;
- (3) the problems raised by the inclusion of a definition of aggression in the Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind" and by its application within the framework of international criminal jurisdiction;
- (4) the effect of a definition of aggression on the exercise of the jurisdiction of the various organs of the United Nations;
- (5) any other problem which might be raised by a definition of aggression.

The Special Committee on the Question of Defining Aggression met at United Nations Headquarters, New York, from 24 August to 21 September 1953.

It elected Enrique de Marchena (Dominican Republic) as Chairman, B. V. A. Rolling (Netherlands) as Vice-Chairman and S. Tarazi (Syria) as Rapporteur.

To facilitate the Special Committee's work, the Secretary-General submitted a memorandum (A/AC.66/1) entitled "Some Aspects of the Definition of Aggression" containing an analysis of the views expressed at the seventh session²⁸ of the General Assembly on the question of defining aggression together with the comments of Governments on the draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind and on the question of aggression.

In addition, the following texts were submitted to the Committee by members: (1) a draft definition of aggression submitted by the USSR (A/AC.66/L.2/Rev.1); (2) two working papers submitted by China (A/AC.66/L.4/Rev.3 and A/AC.66/L.7/Rev.2); (3) a working paper submitted by Mexico (A/AC.66/L.8); and (4) a working paper submitted by Bolivia (A/AC.66/L.9).

The USSR definition was in the form of a draft resolution (A/AC.66/L.2)²⁹ by which the General Assembly would formulate "directives" with a view to determining which party, in an international conflict, was guilty of aggression. The text specified acts which when first committed by a State would constitute attack. Such acts would include: declaration of war; invasion by armed forces even without such a declaration; bombardment; landing or leading of armed forces into the boundaries of another State without the permission of its government; violation of conditions of such permission; naval blockade and support of armed bands organized in its own territories which invaded the territory of another State.

The USSR proposal would also include definitions of "indirect" aggression such as: promotion of civil war in another State; economic aggression, such as exercising economic pressure violating a State's sovereignty and threatening its economic independence; and ideological aggression, such as encouraging war propaganda or propaganda in favour of using atomic, bacterial, chemical and other weapons of mass destruction. The proposal also stated that an act other than those specified might constitute aggression if, in a particular case, the Security Council so resolved.

The Soviet proposal then listed considerations which might not be used as justifications for an attack or for acts of indirect, economic or ideological aggression. These included "arguments" of a political, strategic or economic nature, such as the amount of capital invested in the State attacked or other particular interests in the territory. The proposal stated, in particular, that the internal position of any acts, legislation or orders of any State might not be used as a justification.

The two working papers submitted by China (A/AC.66/L.3 & A/AC.66/L.7/Rev.2) stated that aggression consists of the employment of force, open or covert, armed or unarmed, by a State for the violation, impairment or destruction of the territorial integrity or political independence of another State, or for the subversion of its political or social order, or, in a case of dispute with another State, for the coercion of that State in place of pacific settlement. Among other acts included in the definition of aggression were: waging war; arming organized bands or third States for offensive action against a State; planting fifth columnists or subversive agents; inciting civil strife; and imposing a naval or economic blockade.

²⁷ See Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 841-42.

²⁸ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 785-91.

²⁹ For the text submitted by the USSR to the sixth session of the General Assembly, see Y.U.N., 1951, p. 837.

The Chinese text characterized as legitimate the employment of force in self-defence or reprisal, subject to the conditions laid down in international law and in carrying out a decision or recommendation of a competent organ of the United Nations.

The working paper submitted by Mexico (A/AC.66/L.8), stated that the proposed USSR definition could be improved and would be acceptable to the Mexican delegation if certain changes were incorporated. Among the changes suggested were the insertion in the preamble of a provision to the effect that aggression was the direct or indirect use of force by the authorities of one State against the territory or political independence of another State or for any purpose other than legitimate individual or collective defence or in compliance with a decision or recommendation of a competent organ of the United Nations.

It stated further that acts constituting "so-called" indirect, economic or ideological aggression should be regarded as aggression only if they involved or were accompanied by the use of force. However, it was stated, such acts, even if they did not constitute aggression, might justify enforcement measures by the Security Council in the same manner as if aggression had been committed, if by their effect on the victim State or for any other reason, they constituted a threat to peace. This point, the Mexican representative considered, should be particularly stressed in the Assembly's report.

The working paper submitted by Bolivia (A/AC.66/L.9) was in the form of a draft resolution, whereby the General Assembly would resolve that independently of acts of aggression designated as such by the competent organs of the United Nations, the following would constitute acts of aggression: invasion across the frontiers established by treaties or judicial or arbitral decisions or, in the absence of marked frontiers, an invasion affecting territories under the effective jurisdiction of a State; declaration of war, armed attack against the territory, ships or aircraft of another State; support given to armed bands for purposes of invasion; incitement to rebellion; the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State or in any other manner incompatible with the purposes of the United Nations, including unilateral action whereby a State was deprived of economic resources or its basic economy was endangered.

In its report (A/2638) to the ninth session of the General Assembly, the Special Committee noted the different points of view which had emerged during its discussion on: the various types of definitions of aggression; the Charter concept of aggression; the notions of indirect, economic and ideological aggression; the connexion between a definition of aggression and the maintenance of international peace and security; the effect of a definition of aggression on the exercise of the jurisdiction of the various organs of the United Nations; and the problems raised by the inclusion of a definition of aggression in the Draft Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind.

As regards the various types of definitions, the report stated that some representatives favoured a general definition which, instead of listing acts of aggression, would contain general formulae applicable to all the cases contemplated. This type of definition, however, was criticized by other members. The representative of Poland, for example, maintained that it would be useless to have a general definition as it would not refer to the elements constituting the crime.

The representatives of China and the United Kingdom, in particular, the report said, criticized the enumerative or "analytical" type of definition which, they maintained, was incomplete and capable of being circumvented, a point to which the USSR representative replied by stating that his proposed definition (see above) was both analytical and synthetic and included a provision whereby the Security Council would be enabled to decide that an act not listed would, in a particular case, constitute aggression.

The United States representative held that instead of trying to establish a general formula which would probably be incomplete, it would be better to offer the competent United Nations organs, particularly the Security Council, a list of factors to be taken into account in deciding a given case.

A majority of members, the report stated, agreed that it was the duty of the Committee to define aggression in the sense of the Charter. However, the relevant Articles of the Charter were interpreted differently by them. Some members, including the representatives of France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, were of the opinion that the notion of aggression in the sense of the Charter was limited solely to armed aggression. The representatives of Bolivia, China, Iran, Mexico, Poland and the USSR maintained that it extended to other forms of aggression not necessarily involving the actual use of armed force. Yet other members expressed views that could not be identified with either of the two positions.

As regards the connexion between a definition of aggression and the maintenance of international peace and security, the report noted the following points of view which had emerged during discussions.

The representatives of Bolivia, the Dominican Republic, France, Iran, Mexico, Poland, Syria and the USSR expressed themselves in favour of defining aggression, maintaining that such a definition was possible and would be desirable for the maintenance of peace and security. Others took the view that such a definition would not only not be useful, but would in fact be dangerous to the maintenance of peace. The absence of such a definition had never been felt, the members opposing a definition stated. Some of these representatives asserted that a definition of aggression would actually assist an aggressor by enabling him to circumvent it.

The report stated that the representative of France favoured the inclusion of a definition of aggression in the Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind and its application within the framework of international criminal jurisdiction. However, pending final decisions on those questions, his delegation, believing that a definition of aggression would serve a useful purpose in United Nations activities, was prepared to collaborate in the Committee's work to that end.

The representative of the Netherlands stated that the objections that could be raised to a definition of aggression intended to be applied under a system of collective security would not all apply to a definition to be used in the more restricted field of international criminal jurisdiction. He stressed, however, that two problems might arise from the application by an international criminal court of a definition of aggression: first, a decision by such a court bearing on a case of aggression might hamper the Security Council in its essential function, which was to maintain peace and security; it might hinder its action in the peaceful settlement of a dispute. Secondly, the Security Council and the international criminal court might pronounce two contradictory decisions on a case of aggression brought simultaneously before both of them. He suggested that, to obviate that difficulty, the text of the definition of aggression should include a provision under which the international court would be bound by the Security Council's decisions, which would be taken on the basis of that definition. It might, however, well be that the crime of aggression would be considered, for the time being, less comprehensive than the concept of aggression in the sense of Article 39³⁰ of the Charter. If that were the case, the representative of the Netherlands said, an international criminal court might find an act, considered as aggression by the Security Council, not criminal in the sense of a code of international criminal law.

In its observations on the draft Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind and on the question of defining aggression, the Netherlands Government proposed that the concept of aggression should be defined as follows:

"Aggression is the threat or use of force by a State or government against the territorial integrity or political independence of another State or against a territory under international regime in any manner, whatever the weapons employed and whether openly, or otherwise, for any reason or for any purpose other than individual or collective self-defence against such a threat or use of force or in pursuance of a decision or recommendation by a competent organ of the United Nations".

As to the effect of a definition of aggression on the exercise of the jurisdiction of the various organs of the United Nations, the report of the Special Committee stated that members were agreed that any definition of aggression included in a General Assembly resolution would merely have the status of a recommendation. It would not have a binding character. However, the report said, some members stressed that such a definition would exercise great moral authority over the international organs called upon to pronounce on a case of aggression.

The Special Committee decided unanimously not to put the various draft definitions of aggression to a vote but to transmit them as they stood to Member States and to the General Assembly.

G. INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL JURISDICTION

The 1953 Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction established by General Assembly resolution 687(VII)³¹ to make a further study of problems relating to an international criminal jurisdiction met at United Nations Headquarters from 27 July to 20 August 1953. In accordance with resolution 687(VII), the Committee's report

(A/2645) was to be considered at the Assembly's ninth session.

³⁰ Article 39 states that the Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken to maintain or restore peace and security.

³¹ See Y.U.N., 1952, p. 806.

The Committee elected George Maurice Morris (United States) as Chairman, Víctor Perez Perozo (Venezuela) as Vice-Chairman and B.V.A. Röling (Netherlands) as Rapporteur³². It also elected a standing drafting sub-committee, consisting of the Chairman and the Rapporteur of the Committee and the representatives of Argentina, Australia, Belgium and the Philippines. The sub-committee held two meetings and, on the basis of decisions of principle taken by the full Committee, prepared drafts for the Committee's consideration.

The Committee had before it the following documents:

(1) the report (A/2136) of the Geneva Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction established by the General Assembly at its fifth session³³ and the draft statute for an international criminal court prepared by that Committee and annexed to its report;

(2) a "Compilation of Comments and Suggestions relating to the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court" (A/AC.65/1) prepared by the Secretariat on the basis of comments and suggestions on the Geneva Committee's report by eleven governments (A/2186 and Add.1);

(3) comments on the subject by the Belgian Government (A/AC.65/3) placed before the Committee in the course of its meetings; and

(4) a memorandum entitled "Historical Survey of the Question of International Criminal Jurisdiction" (A/CN.4/7/Rev.1) originally prepared by the Secretary-General for the International Law Commission.

The Committee dealt with the main problems relating to the establishment of an international criminal court and re-examined the Geneva draft statute.

During its discussions, the Committee's report said, some members expressed the view that the establishment of an international criminal court was inadvisable at the present stage in the development of international organization. Such a court would not enjoy the general support of the international community and its establishment was impracticable since States were not prepared to recognize its jurisdiction. In the present international situation States could not be expected to accept the limitations on their sovereignty which the establishment of such a court would involve.

Other members expressed the view that the idea of international criminal jurisdiction was gaining ground, as was evidenced by the establishment of ad hoc tribunals such as those of Nürnberg and Tokyo. The tendency to judge an international activity by common standards of morality would be strengthened by the existence of an international criminal court, these members believed. They held that the unanimously affirmed principles of Nürnberg, for example, made international criminal jurisdiction desirable, and the institution of such jurisdiction should be promoted by establishing its possibility as far as present inter-State relations would permit. Consequently these members favoured the establishment of a court, the jurisdiction of which, they said, would depend on voluntary submission to that jurisdiction by States which were willing so to submit.

As to the kind of court to be established, some members believed it necessary that it should be stable, permanent, independent, effective and universal. They considered that it would be better not to have any court at all than to have one of inferior quality. Other members considered, however, that it was unrealistic to insist on perfection at the outset and that it was better to have a court with limited powers than to have none at all. All members agreed that there should be some degree of sponsorship by the United Nations for the creation of the court, if it were ultimately found desirable and possible to have one. However, some expressed the view that the court and the United Nations should operate as separately as possible. Most of the members recognized international criminal justice as a positive factor in the maintenance of peace.

As regards the methods by which an international criminal court might be established members agreed that various combinations among the following three methods were possible: (1) the establishment of the court through the amendment of the United Nations Charter; (2) establishment by a multilateral convention; and (3) establishment by a resolution of the General Assembly. The Committee also discussed in some detail the method of creating the court by a General Assembly resolution, followed by multilateral conventions conferring jurisdiction. The Committee voted, as follows, on the best method of establishing the court.

By 8 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions, it decided that the best method of establishing an international criminal court would be by means of a convention prepared by an international diplomatic conference convened under the auspices of the United Nations.

By 6 votes to 1, with 8 abstentions, it decided to recommend to the General Assembly that the court should not come into existence until jurisdiction had been conferred upon it by a certain number of States (the precise number to be decided later).

By 5 votes to 4, with 6 abstentions, it decided to recommend to the General Assembly that the court should not come into existence until a certain number of States (the precise number to be determined later) had ratified the convention containing the statute of the court.

The Committee then drew up a revised draft statute for an international criminal court the main features of which were as follows.

Under the revised draft statute, a permanent international criminal court would be established to try natural persons, whether constitutionally responsible rulers, public officials or private individuals accused of crimes generally recognized under international law. The court would apply international law and, where appropriate, national law. It would consist of fifteen independent judges, elected regardless of nationality, no two of whom might be nationals of the same State. Stateless persons might be elected as judges. Judges would be elected by the States which conferred jurisdiction on the court. An alternative text provided that the judges would be elected by the Members of the United Nations and those non-member States which conferred jurisdiction on the court. The term of office of the judges would be nine years and they would be eligible for re-election.

Jurisdiction of the court was not to be presumed. A State might confer jurisdiction on the court by convention, special agreement or unilateral declaration. No person, however, might be tried before the court unless jurisdiction had been conferred on it by the State or States of which he was a national and by the State or States in which the crime was alleged to have been committed. States which conferred jurisdiction on the court would jointly bear the expenses necessary for its operation. A State might withdraw its conferment of jurisdiction.

Proceedings before the court might be instituted by a State which had conferred jurisdiction upon the court over such offences as were involved in those proceedings; an alternative text provided that, in the interest of the maintenance of peace, a United Nations organ to be designated by the United Nations might stop the presentation or prosecution of a particular case before the court. Penalties imposed by the court were to be subject to limitations in the instrument conferring jurisdiction.

The proceedings of the court might be initiated only by States. A State initiating proceedings would present evidence of international crime to a Committing Chamber of five judges, appointed annually for one year by the court. A judge who had dealt with a case in the Chamber might not try it in the full court. The Chamber would give the accused reasonable opportunity to be heard and, if necessary, might order further inquiry or investigation. If the Chamber was satisfied that the evidence was sufficient to support the complaint, the Chamber was so to certify to the court and to the complainant. A prosecuting attorney, appointed by the complainant State, would then file with the court an indictment based on the findings of the Committing Chamber and he would be responsible for conducting the prosecution.

The indictment would contain a concise statement of the facts which constituted each alleged offence and a specific reference to the law under which the accused was charged. It would be served upon the accused and brought to the notice of the State or States of which he was a national, of the State where the crime was alleged to have been committed and, as far as possible, of the States of which the victims were nationals.

Trials would be without jury, except where otherwise provided in the instrument by which jurisdiction had been conferred upon the court. The accused would be presumed to be innocent until proved guilty and would have all guarantees for a fair trial.

The accused would have the right to be heard but would not be compelled to speak. If the court considered it impossible to ensure a fair trial, it might suspend proceedings. If proceedings were not resumed within a time limit determined by the court, it would dismiss the case and the accused would be automatically released. The court was not to proceed with the trial unless satisfied that the accused had had the indictment and any amendment thereof served upon him and had had sufficient time to prepare his defence.

The court would sit in public unless there were exceptional circumstances in which it found that public sittings might prejudice the interests of justice. Its deliberations would be in private and were not to be disclosed. The court would have the power to issue warrants of arrest relating to crimes over which it had jurisdiction to determine the provisional liberty of the accused. It would have the authority necessary for the proper conduct of a trial. If the complainant State withdrew its case, the court alone was to decide whether the accused should be discharged.

The court would be constituted by seven judges and decisions would be by a majority of judges participating in the trial. The judgment would set forth the reasons for the findings and contain the names of the judges who took part in the decision and any separate opinion of individual judges. The judgment of the court would be final and without appeal.

No person who had been tried and acquitted or convicted before the court, might be subsequently tried for the same offence in any court within the jurisdiction of any State which had conferred jurisdiction upon the court with respect to that offence. Sentence would be executed in accordance with relevant conventions; it might, however, be subject to revision if a fact were subsequently discovered which was of such a nature as to be a decisive factor and which was unknown to the court and the applicant. The draft statute made provision for granting clemency, which included pardon and reduction of sentence, and parole to convicted persons. This power was to be exercised by a Board of Clemency and Parole which would be independent of the court. The Board, consisting of five persons, would be elected by the States conferring jurisdiction on the court. An alternative text provided that the Board should be elected by Members of the United Nations and those non-member States which had conferred jurisdiction upon the court.

The draft statute finally provided that nothing contained in it would prejudice the right of two or more States which had conferred jurisdiction on the court jointly to set up special tribunals to try the perpetrators of crimes over which each of those States had jurisdiction according to the general rules of international law.

H. CONTINUATION OF THE FUNCTIONS OF THE UNITED NATIONS TRIBUNAL IN LIBYA

By its resolution 388(V) of 15 December 1950, the General Assembly set up a United Nations Tribunal in Libya composed of three persons selected by the Secretary-General to: (1) give, upon request, to the Administering Powers, the Libyan Government and the Italian Government such instructions as might be required to give effect to the economic and financial provisions set out in the resolution; and (2) to decide all disputes arising between the authorities concerning the interpretation and application of those provisions.

Sub-Committee 1 of the Ad Hoc Political Committee which studied the question at the Assembly's fifth session recommended (A/AC.38/L.70) that the question of the continuation of the Tribunal be considered by the Assembly at its seventh or eighth session. Accordingly it was placed on the agenda of the eighth session and was considered at the 368th meeting of the Sixth Committee on 10 October and at the 453rd plenary meeting on 23 October 1953.

In considering the question, the Sixth Committee had before it a memorandum (A/2459) by the Secretary-General which contained replies from the Governments of Italy and Libya to his letter requesting their views on the subject. Both Governments considered that the Tribunal should continue for a further period of time. The Government of Libya also expressed the view that the expenses of the Tribunal should continue to be borne by the United Nations.

The memorandum also referred to a communication from the President of the Tribunal informing the Secretary-General that a considerable part of the Tribunal's time in 1954 would be taken up by the consideration of a request for instructions made by the Government of Italy, and that both the Government of Italy and that of Libya had under consideration a large number of requests by their nationals for the submission of cases to the Tribunal. The memorandum further stated that it was also likely that both Governments might require consultation with the Tribunal on the interpretation of various agreements provided for under Assembly resolution 388(V).

A joint draft resolution was submitted by Argentina and Egypt (A/C.6/L.294), recommending that the Assembly continue the Tribunal and request the Secretary-General to report on its continuation to the tenth session of the General Assembly. The United Kingdom submitted an amendment (A/C.6/L.301) to request the Secretary-General to report to the ninth rather than the tenth session of the Assembly. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his amendment was not aimed at preventing the continuation of the Tribunal beyond the ninth session if this was necessary. But it was expected that the Tribunal would complete its work in about twelve to fourteen months and therefore, he considered, it would be better if the Assembly reviewed the question at its ninth session.

The representative of France as well as the sponsors of the draft resolution opposed the United Kingdom amendment on the ground that the Secretary-General could be expected to make a comprehensive report only after the Tribunal had completed its work.

The United Kingdom amendment was rejected by 20 votes to 10, with 16 abstentions. The joint draft resolution was adopted, with textual amendments, by 43 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

When the Sixth Committee's report (A/2513) was considered by the General Assembly at its 453rd plenary meeting, the President stated that the Secretary-General would continue to make financial provision for the United Nations Tribunal in Libya in his estimate for Section 5 of the budget and would submit a detailed 1954 budget for the Tribunal to the Fifth Committee for its review and approval during the session. The requirements would be generally the same as those for which funds were appropriated in 1953, she added.

The draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee was adopted, without discussion, by 51 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 792(VIII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolution 388(V) of 15 December 1950 on the economic and financial provisions relating to Libya, article X of which set up a United Nations Tribunal in Libya and defined its functions,

"Noting that the Governments of Italy and Libya are conducting negotiations for the conclusion of the various agreements provided for in resolution 388(V),

"Noting that both those Governments, in their replies to a letter from the Secretary-General, state that they consider that the Tribunal should be continued for a further period,

"Having noted the explanatory memorandum by the Secretary-General concerning the continuation of the functions of the Tribunal,

"1. Resolves that the United Nations Tribunal in Libya shall continue its existence;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General, after consultation with the Governments concerned regarding the future of the Tribunal, to report to the General Assembly at its tenth session."

I. ACCELERATION OF RATIFICATION OF THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

The Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities at its fourth session in October 1951 had submitted (E/CN.4/461) to the Commission on Human Rights a draft resolution concerning the Genocide Convention. The Commission on Human Rights, at its ninth session, from 7 April to 30 May 1953, decided (E/2447) not to take action on the second part of the resolution, which would have requested the General Assembly to give effect to the wish of the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction, established by the General Assembly in December 1950, to have drawn up, together with the instrument establishing an international penal tribunal, a protocol empowering the tribunal to deal with the issue of genocide. The Commission, however, approved the first part of the proposal, by which it expressed the opinion that genocide, one of the gravest forms of discrimination, constituted a crime under international law and that widespread knowledge of the nature and importance of the Convention would further its humanitarian and civilizing purpose. It recommended to the Economic and Social Council a draft resolution (E/2447 E) to request Assembly action.

The Council at its sixteenth session discussed the question during its consideration of the subject of prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities,³⁴ at the 250th to 256th meetings of its Social Committee from 24 to 31 July and at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August 1953. A Turkish oral amendment, to replace the word "Governments" by the word "States", on the ground that it was States, not Governments, that ratified conventions, was adopted by 13 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. The draft resolution, proposed by the Commission, as amended, was adopted by the Social Committee (E/2449 E) at its 255th meeting on 30 July, by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, and by the Council at its 746th plenary meeting on 3 August 1953 by the same vote. The representatives of India and Argentina indicated that they had abstained primarily because their Governments had not yet been able to ratify the Convention.

In this resolution (502 E (XVI)), the Council drew the Assembly's attention to the resolution adopted by the Commission on Human Rights and requested the General Assembly to reiterate its appeal to States to accelerate their ratifications or adherences to the Convention and to undertake all necessary measures to assure the widest possible diffusion of its nature, contents and purposes, in particular the list of States which had voted for, signed, ratified or adhered to the Convention.

The question was placed on the agenda of the eighth session of the General Assembly and was discussed by the Sixth Committee at its 368th meeting. The Committee had before it a note by the Secretary-General (A/2458) giving the text of the Council resolution, some background information on the Convention on Genocide and the steps leading to the adoption of the Council resolution.

The representatives of Cuba, France, Haiti, Liberia, Panama and Uruguay submitted a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.300), by which the Assembly would reiterate its appeal to States to accelerate their ratifications of or accessions to the Genocide Convention. It would also request the Secretary-General to undertake all necessary measures to ensure the widest possible diffusion of the nature, contents and purposes of the Convention.

Statements in support of the joint draft resolution and of the Council resolution were made by the representatives of Brazil, Canada, Cuba, Egypt, Ethiopia, France, Lebanon, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Poland, Syria, Uruguay and the USSR.

The representative of Canada said that his Government had not only ratified the Convention but had also adopted the necessary legislation for its implementation.

The representative of France said that the Convention on Genocide represented an important advance in the matter of the definition of international offences, since it had dispelled the vagueness surrounding the concept of genocide and had made it a punishable crime. He said that France had been among the first 20 States to ratify the Convention and had therefore helped to bring it into force. As French legislation contained the provisions necessary for the application of the Convention, France was complying fully with the obligations it had assumed under the Convention.

The representative of Uruguay said that, although his country had not yet ratified the Convention, the necessary action had been initiated. His delegation had therefore co-sponsored the joint draft resolution.

Referring to the second paragraph of the draft resolution which would request the Secretary-General to undertake all necessary measures for the diffusion of the Convention, the representative of Yugoslavia said that the Secretary-General had already given considerable publicity to it through information media and other publications. He suggested that some acknowledgment should be made of that fact in the draft resolution. He therefore proposed orally that in its second paragraph the draft resolution should request the Secretary-General "to continue to take" all necessary measures. The suggestion was adopted by the Committee without vote.

The representative of India said that his delegation would abstain in the vote on the draft resolution, not because his Government in any way disagreed with the principles set forth in the Convention, but because it had not yet been able to ratify the instrument.

The draft resolution was adopted by the Sixth Committee by 44 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the General Assembly's resolution 260(III) approving the Convention for signature and ratification. However, technical and constitutional difficulties had thus far prevented its ratification, and he had therefore abstained on the voting on the draft resolution. A similar statement was made by the representative of New Zealand.

The Sixth Committee's report (A/2507) was considered by the General Assembly at its 455th plenary meeting on 3 November 1953.

In explanation of his abstention, the representative of the Netherlands reaffirmed his country's traditional interest in the development and codification of international law which had led his Government to take an active part in the final drafting of the Genocide Convention. He stated that his Government had always advocated the institution of an international criminal court. However, the provision for the punishment of political genocide had been deleted from article II by an amendment which the Netherlands had strongly opposed. This, as well as the reservations of several States in regard to the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in disputes relating to the Convention, had weakened that instrument. His Government had therefore not ratified the Convention on Genocide and could not join in inviting others to do so.

The draft resolution recommended by the Committee was adopted by 50 votes to none, with 8 abstentions (resolution 795(VIII)). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering its resolution 260 A (III) of 9 December 1948, by which it approved the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, and believing that the Convention represents a valuable contribution to the development of international law,

"1. Reiterates its appeal to States to accelerate their ratifications of, or accessions to, the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to take all necessary measures designed to ensure the widest possible diffusion of the nature, contents and purposes of the Convention."

J. ACCESSIONS TO THE CONVENTION ON THE DECLARATION OF DEATH OF MISSING PERSONS

The Government of Italy, on 20 and 26 March 1953, in notes (E/2350/Add.5) addressed to the Secretary-General, expressed its desire to accede to the Convention on the Declaration of Death of Missing Persons,³⁵ which was opened for accession, at Lake Success, on 6 April 1950. Article 13 of the Convention provides that States which are neither Members of the United Nations nor parties to the Statute of the International Court of Justice may accede to the Convention if they are invited by the Economic and Social Council passing upon the request of the State concerned. Accordingly, the Secretary-General proposed that this item be placed on the agenda of the fifteenth session of the Council.

On the basis of a joint draft resolution by Argentina, Uruguay and Venezuela (E/L.490), the Council, at its 681st plenary meeting on 10 April, without discussion, unanimously adopted resolution 479(XV), inviting the Government of Italy to accede to the Convention.

During the Council's sixteenth session, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, by communications dated 8 July 1953 and 21 July 1953 addressed to the Secretary-General, expressed its desire to accede to the Convention on the Declaration of Death of Missing Persons at the earliest possible date, in order to be able to issue declarations of death having general effect even in cases where this was impossible at the moment under current German law.

The Council, at its 750th plenary meeting on 5 August 1953, considered a memorandum by the Secretary-General (E/2495), in which he transmitted the texts of the communications, referred to article 13 of the Convention and proposed that the item be added to the Council's agenda.

The Council decided, by 15 votes to 2, with 1 abstention, to include the additional item in the agenda. During the discussion of the substance of the question, a number of representatives, including those of Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Cuba, Turkey and the United States, favoured the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany to the Convention, stressing, inter alia, the humanitarian aspects of the question. The representatives of Poland and the USSR, however, held that only a government representing a unified Germany would have the right to accede to an international convention and that it would be wrong for the Council to deal with only one part of the whole problem of unification. Moreover, the Polish representative stated, it would be a mockery for a government largely composed of people responsible for the slaughter of the victims to be allowed to accede to the relevant convention. The representative of India emphasized that he would support the joint draft resolution by Argentina and Cuba (E/L.569), inviting the Federal Government to accede to the Convention, only on the understanding that the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany to the Convention was authorized on purely humanitarian grounds, and would not establish on behalf of that Government any claim to have jurisdiction over the whole of Germany. He also emphasized that adoption of the draft resolution would have no relevance to the future four-Power negotiations on the problem of Germany.

The joint draft resolution was adopted by 15 votes to 2, with 1 abstention. By this resolution (508(XVI)), the Council invited the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany to accede to the Convention on the Declaration of Death of Missing Persons.

N. STATUS OF CLAIMS FOR INJURIES INCURRED IN THE SERVICE OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The following action in respect of such claims occurred during 1953.

On 11 September 1952, the Secretary-General wrote to the Government of Israel requesting payment to the United Nations of the sum of $US 25,233.00 as reparation for the monetary damage borne by the Organization as a consequence of the death of the United Nations military observer Colonel André Sérot, who was assassinated with the United Nations Mediator Count Folke Bernadotte in Jerusalem on 17 September 1948. Subsequently, the Secretary-General was requested by Colonel Sérot's father to present a claim on his behalf for the payment of 200,000 French francs for the monetary damage caused to him by the death of Colonel Sérot. The Secretary-General, by a letter of 9 December 1952, submitted the additional claim to the Government of Israel.

In reply to the Secretary-General's communications, the Permanent Representative of Israel to the United Nations, by a note verbale dated 2 April 1953, remitted the sum of $US 25,233.00 in payment of the claim for damage to the United Nations, and $575.00 (equivalent to 200,000 French francs) in payment of the claim for damage to Colonel Sérot's father.

Negotiations with Jordan for the death of Ole Helge Bakke and with Egypt for the deaths of Lt. Col. Joseph Quéru and Captain Pierre Jeannel were still pending at the end of the year.

Part Two: The Specialized Agencies

A. The International Labour Organisation (ILO)¹

1. Introduction

The International Labour Organisation was established on 11 April 1919 as an autonomous institution associated with the League of Nations. Its original Constitution was adopted as part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles and formed part of other treaties of peace.

The preamble of the ILO Constitution stated that peace could be established only if based upon social justice and that it was necessary to improve labour conditions, for example: by the regulation of the hours of work and of the labour supply; the prevention of unemployment; the provision of an adequate living wage; the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment; the protection of children, young persons and women; provision for old age and injury; protection of the interests of workers when employed outside their own country; recognition of the principles of equal pay for equal work and freedom of association; and the organization of vocational and technical education and other measures.

Throughout the years between its establishment and the outbreak of the Second World War, ILO, with headquarters in Geneva, played a leading role in promoting the improvement of labour conditions throughout the world.

In 1940, in order to ensure that the International Labour Office should be able to continue to function freely, a working centre was established at Montreal. The transfer back to Geneva of the services temporarily located in Canada was completed in 1948.

During the war years, ILO devoted its energies to assisting the cause of the United Nations. Regular sessions of the General Conference were resumed in 1944, after a five-year interval, with the 26th session, held in Philadelphia. At this session, ILO considered its post-war status, policy and programme, and adopted the Declaration of Philadelphia, which redefined the aims and purposes of ILO.²

It reaffirmed the fundamental principles on which ILO is based, and affirmed that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity", and that the central aim of national and international policy must be to attain conditions making this possible. It recognized ILO's obligation to promote programmes to achieve full employment, the raising of standards of living, the recognition of the right of collective bargaining, the extension of social security, etc.

An Agreement bringing ILO into relationship with the United Nations, approved by the 29th session of the General Conference on 2 October 1946, came into force on 14 December 1946 upon its approval by the General Assembly of the United Nations.³

ILO gradually brought its activities back to their pre-war level; it again began working towards the improvement of the working conditions of seafarers, agricultural and industrial workers, salaried employees and professional workers and towards the improvement of conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. ILO also found it necessary to extend its activities to meet regional needs. It began to hold regional conferences to deal with the special problems of the American continent, and especially of Latin America, as early as 1936 and in 1947 began to develop its regional activities in Asia and the Far East and in the Near and Middle East.

ILO recognized the need for new machinery to deal with the specific labour and social problems of individual industries of great international importance. It decided in 1945 to set up industrial committees for the world's leading industries. The committees bring together representatives of governments, management and labour to discuss the specific problems of these industries.

Since 1948 considerably greater emphasis has been placed on the operational activities of ILO, especially in the field of migration and in the development of manpower resources through vocational training and the organization of employment services.

ILO has carried on many of these activities from its early days, but their importance has been greatly increased by the Expanded Programme of technical assistance for economic development and other special programmes.

2. Organization⁴

The organs of ILO are the General Conference of representatives of the Members, the Governing Body and the International Labour Office, which is controlled by the Governing Body.

The General Conference meets at least once a year. It is composed of four representatives of each Member State, of whom two are government delegates and the other two are delegates representing, respectively, the employers and the workers of each Member. The non-government delegates are appointed in agreement with the organizations which are most representative of employers and workers.

New Members are admitted into ILO, if they are Members of the United Nations, by communicating to the Director-General of ILO their formal acceptance of the obligations of the ILO Constitution. Other States, to become Members of ILO, require, in addition, a two-thirds vote of the delegates to the Conference, including two thirds of the votes cast by the government delegates.

Each delegate has one vote in the Conference. Except as otherwise provided by the ILO Constitution, the Conference makes decisions by a simple majority of the votes cast. Its decisions mainly take the form of Conventions and Recommendations, which require a two-thirds majority of the Conference for adoption. Under the ILO Constitution, a Member is required to bring a Convention adopted by the Conference to the attention of its competent national authority for ratification. If a country ratifies a Convention it assumes an obligation to apply the provisions of that Convention to all the territories under its administration, including Non-Self-Governing Territories; it also assumes an obligation to report annually on the measures it has taken to bring its legislation into line with these provisions. Supervisory machinery available within ILO provides not only for measures to promote the ratification of Conventions, but also for a complaint procedure in the event of violations of a Convention. With regard to Recommendations, Members of ILO are under the obligation to consider them with a view to giving effect to their provisions by legislation or other action. Member States are further required to report periodically on the position of their law and practice in relation to unratified Conventions and Recommendations. Collectively, the Conventions and Recommendations form an International Labour Code,⁵ which embodies international standards of policy.

The Governing Body is composed of 32 members—sixteen representing governments, eight the employers and eight the workers. Eight of the sixteen government representatives are appointed by the eight Member States of chief industrial importance, and eight are appointed by Member States chosen by the other government delegates to the Conference in an election held every three years. The employer and worker members are elected, respectively, by the employer and worker delegates to the Conference. The Governing Body's responsibilities include the selection of items for the agenda of the Conference, the appointment of the Director-General of the International Labour Office, the general supervision of the Office and of the various committees and commissions of ILO, and the consideration of proposals for ILO's budget.

The International Labour Office provides the secretariat of the Conference and of the Governing Body, prepares documents on the items of the agenda of the Conference and of the Governing Body, and collects and distributes information on all subjects within ILO's competence. It assists governments in the drafting of legislation and regulations, provides technical assistance to governments in fields within ILO's competence, conducts such special investigations as may be ordered by the Conference or by the Governing Body, and provides machinery to assist in ensuring the effective application of Conventions. It issues a variety of periodical and other publications dealing with problems of industry and employment.

A number of commissions and committees exists to further the work of ILO in specific fields, ⁴ For a somewhat fuller statement of the organization of ILO, see Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 820-21. A list of ILO's branch offices is annexed to this chapter.

as well as industrial committees for the following eight industries: coal mines; textiles; building, civil engineering and public works; metal trades; iron and steel production; inland transport; petroleum production and refining; and chemicals.

3. Activities during 1953

The activities pursued by ILO during 1953 may be grouped under three main headings:

(1) The compilation and analysis of information on social questions and the widespread distribution of the results of its research as an aid to the solution of social problems.

(2) The development of labour and social standards and measures to promote their acceptance.

(3) Operational action giving countries direct assistance in improving the living standards of their peoples.

Activities in these three areas were interrelated. The collection of information and the product of research provided a basis for the setting of standards and for operational work. At the same time, the experience acquired in operational activity had an increasing effect on the direction given to research and "legislative" programmes.

The subjects dealt with during the year covered a wide field of social policy and ranged from efforts to increase productivity to the problem of land reform. Activities covered unemployment and under-employment, the safeguarding of trade union rights, manpower questions, wages, social security, industrial relations, welfare facilities and social services, occupational safety and health, and co-operation and handicrafts.

In carrying out its programmes, ILO relied on three main instruments: (1) its permanent secretariat, (2) such "legislative" or social policy-making bodies as the General Conference, regional conferences and industrial and expert committees, and (3) the staff of experts and the activities which are made possible under ILO's share of the Expanded Programme of technical assistance.

The programmes were financed by ILO's ordinary budget of $6,223,368 and by more than $2,000,000 allotted under the Expanded Programme of technical assistance.

a. OPERATIONAL ACTIVITIES

The 1953 technical assistance programme of ILO was in part an extension of the work carried out in the previous year. A number of continuing projects were supplemented by new undertakings which in many cases were initiated as a result of field work performed in 1952.

During 1953, ILO had 213 experts in the field. Of this number, 125 were assigned during the year, and 110 were still on assignment at the end of the year. Fellowships awarded during the year under the Expanded Programme totalled 136, and 171 worker-trainees were sent abroad for training in industrial establishments. In addition, nine fellowships and nine internships for study of ILO were awarded under the regular budget.

The greatest attention was paid to developing a pattern of activity by which ILO could make the maximum contribution toward the economic and social development of the under-developed countries. ILO field offices in Asia, Latin America and the Middle East were fully engaged in programme planning and in supervising and guiding the work of experts in the field.

The projects actually implemented in 1953 contributed to economic development in three different ways.

Certain projects helped in the task of development planning by assisting governments in carrying out manpower surveys, and surveys of labour conditions and of handicraft problems.

Other projects had a direct impact on production either by assisting in new development or by helping to raise the productive efficiency of the existing economy. In the first group fell a large number of projects designed to fill existing or foreseen gaps in technical and handicraft skills, involving the establishment of new training centres and the strengthening of existing ones. Projects in the second group were aimed at a more immediate increase in production, and included projects concerning work study and methods, Training Within Industry (T.W.I.) and other forms of supervisory training, and organization and rationalization of cottage industries and handicrafts. Projects for improving industrial relations and preventing accidents and occupational diseases also came within this group, as did those for better organization of the employment market and those concerning producers' and marketing co-operatives. Projects for the training of maintenance men were intended to help in increasing efficiency and in prolonging the life of expensive equipment.

Projects in the third category contributed indirectly to economic development. They helped to create the labour and social conditions which are essential prerequisites to economic progress. Such projects included missions to advise on the improvement of working conditions in industry and agriculture and on the promotion of industrial hygiene and welfare. Some of the co-operative and handicrafts projects also came within this category.

Another significant group of projects concerned social security which the governments of under-developed countries have considered an essential part of their social policy. Certain projects were designed to improve labour administration, e.g., the training of specialized personnel (inspectors, conciliation officers, welfare officers, employment exchange managers and the staff of social security institutions) and the improvement of co-ordination between different departments dealing with labour and related matters.

Forty-seven per cent of the funds allotted under the Expanded Programme was devoted to vocational training projects, and 17 per cent went into projects in the field of co-operatives and handicrafts. Other major areas of technical assistance activity were productivity, social security, employment services and labour inspection, safety and health.

An important feature of 1953 operations was the attention devoted to the practical training of nationals of under-developed countries.

The ILO-sponsored Technical and Clerical Training Centre in Libya, which supplies skilled personnel for the country's administrative services and development projects, was further strengthened by the provision of additional equipment and the inauguration of new courses. A training centre planned by ILO, in collaboration with the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees, started functioning with ILO expert assistance toward the end of the year at Lakandia, Jordan. Two regional training courses were organized for Latin America with the help of the Brazilian National Industrial Apprenticeship Service (SENAI). The first was concerned with the training of instructors from fourteen countries in various trades; the second was attended by directors and administrators of vocational schools and training programmes from fifteen countries.

ILO experts in the Training Within Industry (T.W.I.) method of supervisory training trained some 4,100 supervisors and future trainers in India, Israel, Italy and Pakistan.

The worker-trainee programme of ILO, which has been in operation since 1952 for Yugoslavia, was extended to Bolivia, Ecuador and Israel. Training of a similar kind was arranged for personnel from a power station in Turkey. By the end of the year, more than 350 workers and foremen had been trained under the worker-trainee programme.

In India and Israel, productivity teams carried out work studies and demonstrations of improved organization and methods. Following the work of the experts, a National Productivity Institute was established in Israel. Assistance in the setting up of a similar centre was requested by India.

Handicrafts projects in Ceylon, Haiti and Mexico were responsible for the training of a large number of local handicraftsmen in improved methods and organization. In Ceylon, the training was conducted at 25 village centres with the help of 26 demonstrators provided by the Government. Co-operative leaders and officials were trained in a series of courses conducted by a team of experts in Burma. Two regional courses for co-operative organizers from Asia were conducted, one at Lahore and the other in Denmark, where the participants were enabled to study the application of co-operative techniques in Europe.

In Peru, an ILO expert helped to organize a pilot employment service and to train personnel to run and develop it. In Pakistan, an ILO expert in labour administration conducted a five-month training course for the benefit of labour officers from the central and provincial administrations and from government undertakings.

A comprehensive project for raising the standard of living of the Indians of the Andean High Plateau reached the active stage with the establishment of a regional field office at Lima and the appointment of some of the experts required. The field office finalized details for the implementation of pilot schemes in Bolivia, Ecuador and Peru. The project is being implemented by ILO in co-operation with the United Nations, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the World Health Organization (WHO).

The year 1953 was a year of consolidation of ILO's work under the Expanded Programme. The pace at which operations grew in 1952 could not be wholly maintained mainly on account of financial difficulties. But—and partly for this very reason—increased attention was paid to qualitative analysis of results in an effort to maximize the effectiveness of the assistance provided. In programme planning and implementation, the self-liquidating character of technical assistance was re-emphasized and to this end the training of local personnel remained a key feature of most ILO projects.

b. STANDARDS OF SOCIAL POLICY

The ILO's "legislative" organ, the General Conference, held its 36th session at Geneva from 4 to 25 June. It adopted two new international instruments—both of them Recommendations—in the field of social policy. One of these established sixteen as the minimum age for employment in underground coal mining. The other laid down a series of measures to protect the health of workers in their places of employment.

In addition, the session adopted a series of "observations and conclusions" regarding the organization and working of national labour departments. It also approved, for consideration at the 1954 Conference, a list of conclusions designed to provide the basis for a Recommendation on holidays with pay.

The two Recommendations adopted by the session raised to 97 the total of such instruments approved since ILO's establishment.

Among its other actions, the Conference examined, and adopted a report on, the manner in which Member countries were observing their obligations in regard to the 103 Conventions and 95 Recommendations adopted at previous sessions. This report said there was "evidence of continuing concrete progress" in the implementation of ILO standards.

A large number of governments continued to deposit instruments of ratification of the Conventions at ILO headquarters. During the year, 67 such ratifications were registered, bringing the total of ratifications by 31 December to 1,413.

In addition to the General Conference, the year's programme of meetings included an Asian Regional Conference, held at Tokyo, and an Asian Maritime Conference, which took place at Nuwara Eliya, Ceylon. Three Industrial Committees—those for textiles, the construction industry, and coal mining—also held meetings, and there were sessions of the Committee on Work on Plantations, the Permanent Agriculture Committee, and the Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories. The calendar also included meetings of a Committee of Statistical Experts, a meeting of a group of experts on systems of payment by results in the building industry, and a session of the Asian Advisory Committee.

The questions considered by the Asian Regional Conference were wages, workers' housing, and the protection and vocational preparation of young workers. Resolutions recommending action by governments were adopted on each of these questions. In addition, the Conference called for "a speedy and substantial increase" in the flow of foreign capital to Asian countries to make possible an improvement in living standards.

The Asian Maritime Conference, attended by representatives of twelve countries, embodied its conclusions in five resolutions, four of which were approved unanimously. One of these suggested action by Asian governments to improve welfare facilities in ports. Another urged governments to keep under review the progress of their maritime law and practice, using ILO's Conventions and Recommendations as a guide. A third urged the fostering and recognition of representative organizations of shipowners and seafarers. In a fourth resolution, governments were urged to consult representatives of shipowners and seafarers with a view, where necessary, to setting up adequate machinery for the recruitment of seafarers. A further resolution suggested the form that this machinery might take.

Recommendations covering a wide variety of subjects were made by the Industrial Committees and the Committee on Work on Plantations.

The Textiles Committee considered the problem of the effect of international competition on the workers in the industry, and declared that it was essential that this competition should not lead to a worsening of conditions of employment or a lowering of living standards, "and in particular that it should not lead to an abandonment of social policies considered as basic". The meeting also approved recommendations designed to improve the conditions of women workers in the industry and adopted a memorandum on the subject of the guaranteed wage.

A memorandum on the guaranteed wage was also approved by the Building, Civil Engineering and Public Works Committee. This Committee also discussed factors affecting productivity in the construction industry and adopted a number of resolutions suggesting action to increase productivity.

The Permanent Agriculture Committee considered three questions: (1) vocational training in agriculture, (2) the employment of children and young persons in agriculture, and (3) the contribution of ILO to international action in respect of land reform. The Committee agreed that it was highly desirable that ILO take full part, along with FAO, in the current concerted programme of international action on agrarian reform.

The meeting of the Plantations Committee was held at Havana and was the Committee's second session. The questions considered were health and social services and the regulation of plantation wages. Recommendations for action by governments, workers' or employers' organizations, or by ILO were embodied in a large number of resolutions.

The Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories, which met in Lisbon, adopted recommendations on technical and vocational training and on workers' housing. The Committee also made preliminary suggestions as to how problems of low labour productivity might be tackled in dependent areas.

The Governing Body, which functions as ILO's executive council, held three sessions during the year to review the progress of the organization's programme and to plan future activities: its 121st from 3 to 6 March; its 122nd from 29 to 30 March and 19 and 26 June; and its 123rd from 24 to 27 November.

At its mid-year meeting it considered the report made in June by the United Nations-ILO Ad hoc Committee on Forced Labour.⁶ As that meeting was held very shortly after the report was presented, the Governing Body was not able to study and discuss it thoroughly at that session. It was nevertheless agreed:

(1) To support the recommendation contained in the report that an appeal be addressed to all the governments which in one form or another maintain or might maintain a system of forced labour of a political type to the effect that they re-examine their laws and administrative practices in the light of present conditions and the increasing desire of the peoples of the world "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights [and] in the dignity and worth of the human person".

(2) To place on record the intention of ILO to give sympathetic consideration to the recommendations made in the report and to invite its Director-General to put before the Governing Body at its autumn session appropriate proposals relating to these recommendations.

In response to this request, the Director-General laid a number of proposals before the Governing Body when it met again in November, and these were approved. They were:

(1) To appeal to governments which have not yet ratified the four ILO Conventions which deal with forced labour or indigenous workers, urging them to give prompt consideration to ratification.

(2) To invite Metropolitan governments to consider applying the four Conventions without modification to all their non-Metropolitan territories.

(3) To consider, as soon as possible, the desirability of revising the 1930 Forced Labour Convention to make it provide for the complete suppression in all its forms of forced or compulsory labour.

(4) To affirm ILO's willingness to intensify its efforts toward the abolition of forced labour practices of an economic character.

c. FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION

At each of its three meetings, the Governing Body was called upon to consider reports dealing with complaints alleging the violation of trade union rights. These reports were submitted by the Governing Body's standing Committee on Freedom of Association, which was established to make a preliminary examination of the allegations that are submitted to ILO with a view to their reference to the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association which was set up in 1951. The Commission operates on behalf of the United Nations as well as ILO.

The reports dealt with a large number of complaints. The Committee recommended that the majority of these be dismissed as not calling for further examination, but in several cases the Committee made suggestions to the governments concerned.

d. INFORMATION AND RESEARCH

A major share of ILO's information gathering and research resources was devoted to the preparation of reports for various conferences and meetings of other kinds. In many cases these reports constituted studies in themselves.

The Director-General presented three reports during the year. One, entitled World Labour Report 1953, was presented to the General Conference and served as the basis for a general debate. It singled out the problem of productivity for special attention and also surveyed economic and social developments and ILO's activities. Similar reports were presented to the Asian Regional Conference and to the Asian Maritime Conference.

Other reports prepared for the General Conference dealt with the organization and working of national labour departments, holidays with pay, the protection of the health of workers in their places of employment, and the minimum age of admission to work underground in coal mines.

Four reports were issued in preparation for the 37th session of the General Conference in 1954. These concerned the vocational rehabilitation of the disabled, migrant workers in under-developed countries, penal sanctions for breaches of contract of employment, and holidays with pay.

Annual volumes published during 1953 were the Seventh Report of the ILO to the United Nations and the Year Book of Labour Statistics, 1953.

Studies published included the first of a two-volume work on Safety in Coal Mines and a 700-page study entitled Indigenous Populations. The report of the United Nations-ILO Ad hoc Committee on Forced Labour was published by ILO on behalf of both organizations.

Information covering a wide range of social and labour problems continued to be made available in ILO's regular periodicals—the monthly International Labour Review, published in English, French and Spanish editions; the semi-monthly Industry and Labour, and its Statistical and Migration Supplements; the bi-monthly Legislative Series; the quarterly Occupational Safety and Health; and the Official Bulletin, published irregularly.

B. The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO)¹

1. Introduction

The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations was the first of the permanent United Nations organizations to be launched after the war. At the United Nations Conference on Food and agriculture, in May 1943, at Hot Springs, Virginia, 44 nations agreed to work together to Danish hunger and establish a stable world agriculture. At the recommendation of the Conference, the United Nations Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture was set up in July 1943 to plan a permanent organization concerned with food and agriculture, and forestry and fisheries as well. The Commission prepared a Constitution² for FAO and submitted it to governments.

FAO officially came into being with the signing of its Constitution on 16 October 1945, at the first session of its Conference, at Quebec. On 14 December 1946, FAO was formally brought into relationship with the United Nations as a specialized agency, with the approval of an Agreement³ between the two organizations by the United Nations General Assembly.

The preamble to the Constitution of FAO states that the aim of the nations accepting the Constitution is to promote the common welfare by furthering separate and collective action for the purposes of:

"raising levels of nutrition and standards of living of the peoples under their respective jurisdictions,

"securing improvements in the efficiency of the production and distribution of all food and agricultural products,

"bettering the condition of rural populations,

"and thus contributing toward an expanding world economy."

In so far as its detailed functions are concerned, FAO is first charged, in article 1 of its Constitution,⁴ with the collection, analysis, interpretation and dissemination of information relating to nutrition, food and agriculture. FAO further promotes and recommends national and international action which it considers necessary to attain: the increase of production in agriculture, fisheries and forestry; the improvement of education and administration in those fields; the improvement of processing, marketing and distribution of the products of agriculture, fisheries and forestry; the conservation of natural resources; the adoption of policies for the provision of adequate agricultural credit and of international policies with respect to agricultural commodity arrangements.

Finally, on request, FAO furnishes technical assistance to Members to help them bring new land under cultivation, improve the yields of lands already cultivated, reduce the costs of production, improve the efficiency of international distribution, raise levels of consumption, and better the living conditions in rural areas.

2. Organization

The governing bodies of FAO are the Conference and the Council. The staff is headed by a Director-General.

The Conference, composed of one representative from each Member nation, is the policy-making body of FAO, in which each nation has one vote. At its annual session in 1949, the Conference decided that in the future it would normally meet once every two years. The Conference reviews FAO's work, determines its policy and approves the budget; it reviews the food and agriculture situation and the programmes and plans of Member Governments, and recommends national and international action. Decisions of the Conference are taken by a simple majority vote, except in instances such as the admission of new Members, when a two-thirds majority of all Members of the organization is required.

Between sessions of the Conference, the Council of FAO, comprising representatives of 24 Member nations and an independent chairman elected by the Conference, exercises powers delegated to it. Normally meeting twice a year, the Council keeps the world food and agriculture situation under constant review and makes recommendations to Member Governments, international commodity authorities and other international agencies.

The Director-General of FAO, elected by the Conference, has full power and authority to direct the work of the organization, guided by the general recommendations of the Conference and the Council.

FAO has, in addition, panels of experts and certain advisory committees.⁵ National FAO

Committees, established in 51 Member countries, serve as contacts between FAO and governmental and non-governmental agencies.

3. Activities during 1953

The Conference held its seventh session in Rome from 23 November to 11 December, raising the organization's budget from $5¼ million in 1953 to $6 million annually in 1954-55. Libya, Iran and Yemen joined FAO, bringing the organization's membership to 71. The Council was increased from 18 to 24 members. The Conference elected Dr. Philip Vincent Cardon (United States) to a four-year term as Director-General beginning February 1954 to succeed Norris E. Dodd (United States) who has served since 1948.

The Conference noted that world food production had returned to the pre-war per capita level, now related to a considerably larger population. But the major production increases contributing to this return had taken place in areas where nutritional standards were already good. In ill-fed areas nutritional levels were still below even the unsatisfactory pre-war levels. The Conference also noted the reappearance of surpluses of certain commodities within some major producing countries and set up a working party to meet in Washington in February 1954 to consider problems of surplus disposals. Governments were urged to plan for selective production of the foods and other agricultural products most needed in areas where nutritional levels must be raised.

To continue FAO's co-ordination of control measures in countries affected by the continuing grave threat from the desert locust in the Near East, the Conference voted $150,000 to match contributions by governments in the region.

The Conference approved a constitution for a European Foot-and-Mouth Disease Commission; at the end of the year it appeared likely that enough countries would soon join the Commission to bring it into early operation.

The Council of FAO held its seventeenth session from 15 to 24 June, and its eighteenth and nineteenth sessions immediately before and immediately after the Conference, from 18 to 20 November and on 12 December respectively.

During the year, FAO continued to co-operate with other United Nations specialized agencies and subsidiary organs, for example, on a number of training centres and seminars, such as those dealing with dairy hygiene and milk production in which FAO worked closely with the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) and with local international organizations such as the Inter-American Institute of Agricultural Sciences (IIAS) and Servicio Co-operativo Inter-Americano de Producción de Alimentos (SCIPA). A number of technical assistance projects in this field were operated jointly by FAO and UNICEF, FAO advising on the production of good clean milk in sufficient quantity to run milk processing plants and UNICEF equipping the plants.

FAO co-operated closely with the World Health Organization (WHO) on nutrition work in the field, the Nutrition Committee in South and East Asia meeting for the first time in 1953 as a joint committee of the two agencies. Similarly, field work on protein malnutrition and work on nutritional surveys was generally carried on jointly.

Problems in land tenure and settlement also led to co-operation with other agencies, more especially with the International Labour Organisation (ILO) and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and there was close collaboration on a number of economic studies with the United Nations regional economic commissions for Asia and the Far East and for Latin America (ECAFE and ECLA).

FAO also co-operated on economic studies with the Organization for European Economic Co-operation (OEEC) and on technical assistance programmes with the Foreign Operations Administration (FOA) of the United States and the British Commonwealth Colombo Plan. For example, it worked with FOA and with the Desert Locust Control Organization in combating the current desert locust plague and with the Colombo Plan on the mechanization of agriculture and fisheries in Pakistan and Ceylon.

During the year the organization also continued its collaboration with the United Nations in the social field, for example, on a survey of social services in Burma and surveys of children's needs and services in El Salvador and Syria. It participated in meetings on the training of auxiliary community workers in Colombia and Lebanon and in a conference on international definition and measurements of standards of living in New York.

a. ACTIVITIES UNDER THE EXPANDED PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

FAO's share of the funds in the Special Account under the Expanded Programme in 1953 was $6.2 million. During the year, the number of experts in the field under this Programme rose from 313 to 334 in July, when financial restrictions began to operate, reducing the number to 224 at the end of the year. At the end of 1953, experts were working in 44 countries as well as in seven regional programmes. Their work is described below under the appropriate headings.

The FAO Conference proposed that particular attention should be given to the continuation and extension of projects designed to benefit groups of countries, such as training centres for participants from groups of countries with similar problems, and projects for control of diseases and pests which recognize no national boundaries.

In a series of resolutions dealing with the Programme's financial limitations, the Conference regretted the necessity for the temporary curtailment of FAO's programme at a time of increasing requests for assistance, noted the willingness of certain recipient governments to meet a greater proportion of the costs of assistance and recommended that, as far as possible, the allocation of funds to FAO should be made on the basis of an expanding programme.

b. AGRICULTURE

The third meeting of the Working Party on Fertilizers of the FAO International Rice Commission and the fourth meeting of the Working Party on Rice Breeding of the same Commission were held concurrently during 1953. The latter Working Party discussed the results obtained so far and plans for the continuation of the co-operative rice hybridization project and national rice breeding programmes in the Far East. The Working Party on Fertilizers particularly recommended the collection and compilation of experimental data on fertilizer application, to permit the construction of response curves relating additional paddy produced to the amounts of nutrients applied. It also made recommendations for a co-operative soil analysis programme, the provision of a second training centre on soil fertility, problems of paddy and the desirability of promoting soil fertility programmes through a regional soils specialist devoted to paddy problems.

FAO also gave a considerable amount of technical assistance, particularly to countries in the Near East, on soil classification and improvement, and published technical studies entitled Soil Surveys for Land Development (FAO Agricultural Study No. 20) and Land Classification for Agricultural Development (FAO Development Paper No. 18). Technical assistance was also given in water utilization, in which approximately 40 FAO experts served in various countries, particularly in the Near and Far East, on such projects as irrigation schemes and tube-well development programmes. Publications on water development included Community Organization for Irrigation in the United States (FAO Development Paper No. 19), Some Aspects of Surface Water Development in Arid Regions (FAO Development Paper No. 21) and Water Laws in Italy (FAO Development Paper No. 22).

In co-operation with the Italian Government, FAO established an International Small Implements Centre, at which the most useful types of several hundred samples of small agricultural tools and implements donated by manufacturers and institutions in various countries were selected and tested for introduction to other countries. In particular, technical assistance experts helped introduce improved small tools into Afghanistan and Ethiopia. A publication entitled Small Farm Implements was issued (FAO Development Paper No. 32).

FAO collaborated with the United Nations in the preparation of reports on land reform⁶ and on co-operatives. It also organized and conducted, in co-operation with ECLA, the Inter-American Institute of Agricultural Sciences and the International Bank, a Land Problems Seminar in Brazil which was attended by 122 people from fifteen countries. This Seminar discussed land tenure and land use problems in Latin America. Publications issued in connexion with problems concerning land reform were Communal Land Tenure (Agricultural Study No. 17), Cadastral Surveys and Records of Rights in Land (Agricultural Study No. 18), Inter-relations between Agrarian Reform and Agricultural Development (Agricultural Study No. 26) and Agricultural Development and Rural Reform in Denmark (Agricultural Study No. 22).

FAO continued its activities on its three major plant breeding projects: the hybrid maize programme in Europe, the rice breeding and hybridization scheme in the Far East (see above), and the development of wheat and barley breeding programmes in the Near East. In the latter region, the Wheat and Barley Committee, at its third meeting, worked out the plans for the establishment of over 80 co-operative wheat and barley nurseries in the region for the identification of rust and bunt-resistant stocks. The exchange of seeds for this project was arranged by the seed distribution service of FAO. A rust survey was initiated to study the incidence and development of rust epidemics and to determine the races concerned on the basis of which a breeding programme will be established.

Three supplements were issued to the World Catalogues of Genetic Stocks of wheat and of rice, and the List of Plant Breeders in Canada and the United States of America was followed by a World List of Plant Breeders covering all other countries from which information has been received.

To spread knowledge of the use of legumes and their importance to agriculture, FAO published Legumes in Agriculture (Agriculture Study No. 21), which covers especially sub-tropical and tropical areas. The publication of a monthly FAO Plant Protection Bulletin, started in September 1952, was continued as one of the aspects of the work of FAO in connexion with the International Plant Protection Convention.

Co-ordination of international and national efforts in the Near East to combat the desert locust plague was continued, and its importance was especially emphasized by the seventh session of the FAO Conference by appropriating funds to match up to a certain limit contributions of interested governments towards co-ordinated action.

Technical assistance was provided to Austria and Yugoslavia where the fall webworm, accidentally introduced from North America, threatens to develop into a major pest for other countries in Europe.

A technical meeting on the control of the olive fly was held in Italy, at which representatives from Mediterranean countries recommended a programme of experiments so as to arrive at the best control method. In this programme FAO acts in a co-ordinating and liaison capacity.

Animal disease problems continued to receive emphasis. Technical advisory assistance on animal disease control, including field control activities and the manufacture of biologics, was given by FAO experts to 20 countries. A training centre on the manufacture of rinderpest and other virus vaccines was held in India; 32 trainees participated. Work continued on the preparation of a constitution for the proposed European Foot-and-Mouth Disease Commission, the establishment of which was approved by the seventh session of the FAO Conference. A serious outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Syria led to the calling of an emergency meeting of representatives of eight countries at which plans for co-ordinated action were agreed upon. An Animal Health Meeting was held in Cyprus and recommended the establishment, under the auspices of FAO, of an Animal Health Commission for the Near East.

⁶ See also Co-ordinated Action for Increased Food Production, pp. 344-46.

FAO co-operated with UNICEF in the improvement and expansion of dairy production and processing facilities, particularly in the Near East and in Central and Latin American countries. Surveys were carried out in those regions to advise various Member Governments on their plans for milk conservation projects. A training centre was held in Costa Rica and a seminar on the latest developments in milk quality control was held in Rome. In co-operation with the International Dairy Federation, a meeting on cheese-making was held in France at which recent technical developments in this branch of the dairy industry were discussed.

FAO co-operated with the Inter-American Institute of Agricultural Sciences in a Range Management Training Centre, which was held on haciendas in Argentina for two months and was attended by over 30 participants from Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay and Uruguay.

Technical assistance in dairy production was given to ten countries; in range management to eight countries and in breeding and other phases of animal production to nine countries.

Zebu Cattle of India and Pakistan (Agricultural Study No. 19) was issued as part of a world-wide survey of the adaptability and productivity of breeds and types of cattle. Milk Pasteurization (Agricultural Study No. 28) was issued in co-operation with WHO.

To assist Member Governments in strengthening their extension services, an agricultural extension development centre was organized and conducted in Beirut in which representatives of ten Near East countries participated. Recommendations were made for regional co-operation in the training of personnel and the preparation of extension material. Eighteen junior extension workers of different Latin American countries received training at an Andean agricultural extension centre. An in-service training centre for young extension workers in Europe and nearby countries was held in the Netherlands in co-operation with the Netherlands Government and the United States Mutual Security Administration (MSA). Technical assistance was given by extension specialists in seven countries.

Work continued on the compilation of information on agricultural research institutions and projects in European countries. An index of animal husbandry research institutions and projects was completed and distributed to the governments involved.

Preliminary work was done to organize a technical meeting on co-operatives for Asia and the Far East, to be held in Ceylon in February 1954.

A panel of experts on supervised agricultural credit, jointly sponsored by FAO, the Institute of Inter-American Affairs and the American International Association, was convened in the Latin American region.

A number of countries received technical assistance from FAO experts in the development of small rural industries, such as the flaying and curing of hides and skins and the processing of dates. In addition, a number of papers on processing, as guides for the rural leaders concerned with small industries, were issued under the titles: Equipment for the Ginning of Cotton (FAO Development Paper No. 25), Equipment for the Processing of Rice (FAO Development Paper No. 27), and Equipment for the Processing of Long Vegetable Fibers (FAO Development Paper No. 26).

c. ECONOMICS

During 1953, FAO's field work in economics and statistics under the Expanded Programme included the operation of three training centres, while sixteen experts in conducting economic surveys in marketing and agricultural statistics completed assignments in the field. A sampling demonstration centre was held in Bangkok for South East Asia from September 1952 to March 1953; another statistical centre was undertaken in Nigeria for African territories south of the Sahara from July to September 1953; and a national training centre on the grading and inspection of rice and the economics of rice storage operations was held in Thailand from February to April 1953.

FAO continued to issue its series of Agricultural Statistical Yearbooks, covering trade and production of agricultural commodities, and in The State of Food and Agriculture 1953 reviewed the whole field against the background of the general world economic situation. This was for the first time divided into two parts, the second dealing with longer-term prospects to encourage governments to examine national agricultural programmes against this world background. Publication of the FAO Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Economics and Statistics was also continued.

The shift from technical to economic preoccupations in the formulation of national food and agricultural policies, stimulated by the appearance of surpluses, especially in North America but also in other regions, was reflected in the discussions at the seventh session of the FAO Conference and at regional meetings in the Near and Far East. With a view to developing a more selective approach to the problem of expanding production and consumption, the Conference recommended that periodic regional consultations be held to review national policies and programmes along these lines and to further their co-ordination. Such meetings will be convened in 1954 in Latin America and the Near and Far East.

The programme of work on the improvement of agricultural statistics was intensified, with special emphasis on the role of sampling. A manual on Methods of Collecting Agricultural Statistics in Different Countries was completed for Europe; a book on Theory of Sample Surveys and its Applications was completed and published, giving a systematic account of sampling survey techniques in different fields such as crop acreage, crop yields and livestock numbers; and studies were started on the role of sampling in improving special sectors of agricultural statistics.

As part of the improvement of agricultural statistics the work on censuses was further intensified. A total of 95 countries and territories had, by the end of 1953, taken agricultural censuses within the framework of the 1950 World Census of Agriculture. The publication of these results has been planned in three volumes, the first dealing with concepts and methodology, the second with country results and the third with international comparison. In the meantime, results for 57 countries were published in a condensed form in the FAO Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Economics and Statistics.

The Committee on Commodity Problems held two meetings in 1953. It reviewed developments in connexion with a number of commodities and paid particular attention to dollar trading in agricultural products. It continued to look for ways of stimulating consumption of milk and milk solids and to keep commodity trade under review, as well as to study the broader problems affecting agricultural commodities, such as obstacles to trade, national price policies and international stabilization techniques. At the request of the Conference in November 1953, the Committee set up a special working party of eight countries to study the most suitable means of disposing of agricultural surpluses and the principles which should be observed in such disposal. The working party was to meet in Washington in February 1954.

d. FISHERIES

As part of its work on fisheries, FAO continued to issue the quarterly FAO Fisheries Bulletin, the bi-monthly World Fisheries Abstracts, and the biennial Yearbook of Fisheries Statistics, which contains data on such matters as fishing craft, catches and landings, production of processed commodities, and external trade statistics, and a number of other studies.

It also continued to provide a secretariat for both the General Fisheries Council for the Mediterranean and the Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council, which are concerned with organizing consultation and co-operation between member nations in their regions on fisheries resources, techniques and organization.

Three of the working groups of the FAO Interim Committee on Fish Handling and Processing held meetings during the year: the Group on Fisheries Products for Tropical Consumption met in Hull, England, in May; the Group on Pre-packaged Fishery Products, in Göteborg, Sweden, in November; and the Group on Chilling of Fish, in Rome in September. A special group met in Rome to discuss the feasibility of forming a Working Group on Freshness Tests for Fish.

An International Training Centre for Fishery Biology was held in Turkey in September and October. The objective of the Centre was to give training in practical fisheries biology and oceanography and in the investigation and development of marine resources.

The first International Fishing Boat Congress was organized and held in two sessions; the Paris, France, meeting in October having 200 participants from 24 countries, and the Miami, United States, meeting in November having 114 participants from seventeen countries. The same papers—68 in all—were presented at both meetings and covered the fields of boat types, hull shapes, sea behaviour, stability, safety at sea, engines, propellers, deck gear, economics, research vessels and factory ships. Each of the sessions appointed a committee to further international collaboration on fish boat design.

The second plenary session of the General Fisheries Council for the Mediterranean was held in Rome in October 1953, when 52 papers were presented. A precise programme of work was decided upon and special rapporteurs appointed for each of the main subjects included in the programme in order to channelize the papers and discussions for the next meeting which is planned to take place in Monaco in October 1954.

Many countries continued to require technical assistance in developing their marine fisheries and in organizing fish farming. Under the FAO programme, considerable progress has been made in fish pond development in, for example, Haiti, Thailand and the Dominican Republic, where the experimental techniques of FAO experts have been applied commercially. Thus, in Haiti some 30 per cent of the commercial catch of fish from inland waters now consists of a species introduced by FAO since 1951. The development of sea fisheries in several parts of the world was being aided by increasing mechanization of small fishing craft, making it possible for fishing to be carried out over a wider area with less dependence on the weather. Increasing interest was also being shown by governments in improved fishing methods, introducing with FAO assistance types of gear which have proved effective in other countries. Some fifteen countries were being assisted in the development of their fresh and salt water fisheries by the end of 1953, and results of such projects were being seen in Liberia, where fishing enterprises were established to follow up the work of the FAO expert, in Ceylon, where the Government was importing considerable numbers of engines to install in local craft, and in Saudi Arabia, where a company was formed to apply commercially the findings of the FAO exploratory team.

e. FORESTRY

Technical assistance missions were active during 1953 helping to elaborate forest policies, drafting legislation and organizing administrative and technical services in nearly a dozen countries—in particular in Brazil, Mexico and Chile.

An important publication was the study of European Timber Trends and Prospects, which examined European timber production, consumption and trade since the beginning of the century to provide a guide to government officials and the timber industry for future policy. This study, prepared jointly with the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE), was discussed by a special working party of experts from fourteen countries, including the Soviet Union, at Geneva in June. Their findings were considered by a joint meeting of the Timber Committee of ECE and the FAO European Forestry Commission at Rome, in October, when a considerable degree of agreement was reached on Europe's future timber policies.

Improved sawing and machining practices, and basic principles of structural grading of timber were discussed at a meeting of members of the Technical Panel on Wood Technology at Geneva in September. There was a substantial interchange of information among members of the Technical Panel on Wood Chemistry, at Stockholm in July, on chemical utilization, especially wood saccharification. The report of the meeting was published.

A revised catalogue of tractors manufactured throughout the world was prepared and the compilation of catalogues of other forestry equipment was continued. As a regular service, descriptions of new equipment developed for forest industries were published in the FAO quarterly Unasylva. FAO's Committee on Logging Techniques and Training of Forest Workers, which met in Finland in February, carried out further research aimed at increasing forest productivity, and participated in the preparation of studies on forest tractor specifications and use of tractors in forestry operations, to be published later.

Compilation of a World Forest Planting Manual was continued and special consultants prepared sections dealing with seed collection, storage and exchange; major sources of forest seed and plants for exchange; seed characteristics of important tree species; and nursery and planting practices in tropical areas. A consultant was also engaged to prepare a monograph on the introduction and use of the genus eucalyptus.

An important part of FAO's programme is to help increase world production of pulp and paper, a task confided to the organization by the United Nations Economic and Social Council. Technical assistance missions visited 24 countries to make preliminary surveys of the possibility of increasing pulp and paper output from unconventional materials or in countries at present without paper manufacturing industries. FAO participated with ECLA in an economic survey of Latin America. A survey of world-wide pulp and paper possibilities was prepared for consideration by the FAO Conference and the Economic and Social Council. In March a published report, Raw Materials for More Paper, summarized the conclusions of consultations by experts on recent technical advances in the manufacture of pulp and paper and the feasibility and cost of making pulp and paper from a number of unconventional materials, such as tropical woods, bagasse and other agricultural residues.

Processing of tropical hardwoods into chipboards was investigated in Burma. Boards made on an experimental scale from these timbers have been used to build test houses in Rangoon.

Specialized training courses arranged by FAO included a six-month Mechanical Logging Training Course in the Philippines which ended in March.

In Chile, besides helping in the establishment of a new forestry school, an FAO forestry mission was assisting the Government to implement forest programmes and policy drawn up by FAO and endorsed by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Research in Forestry and Forest Products, a compilation of research at leading institutions throughout the world was published; it will serve as a basis for the co-ordination of research programmes, revealing duplication of effort that can be avoided and gaps that need to be filled.

Measures against pests and diseases in two important species of trees were discussed by meetings of the International Poplar Commission in Germany, in May, and of the Chestnut Commission in Spain and Portugal, in June.

A Directory of Forest Schools, published during the year, provides a provisional guide to the courses of study of most of the world's important schools.

Elements of Forest Fire Control, also published in 1953, summarizes the experience and knowledge of countries with advanced forest fire control services with the aim of assisting countries less developed in this field to plan and organize similar services.

f. NUTRITION

FAO's nutrition programme in 1953 was essentially a further development of work already undertaken. As before, there was close collaboration with WHO and UNICEF.

Two regional nutrition conferences were held in Indonesia and Caracas, at which problems of nutrition in the Far East and Latin America, respectively, were considered. A conference on protein malnutrition was convened in Jamaica in November, jointly with WHO and the Josiah Macy Jr. Foundation. Special attention was given to measures for improving the nutrition of the vulnerable groups, particularly children, and a publication entitled School Feeding: Its Contribution to Child Nutrition was issued. A school-feeding seminar was organized in Costa Rica in August, in collaboration with UNICEF, the Government of Costa Rica, and the Institute of Nutrition for Central America and Panama (INCAP). This was attended by representatives from countries in Central America who are directly concerned with organizing school lunch programmes, its purpose being to iron out difficulties and to lay plans for future developments. A survey of the incidence of protein malnutrition in Brazil was made, jointly with WHO. This showed that syndromes due to protein malnutrition are prevalent in this part of the world and indicated measures for prevention. In the field of food technology, priority was given to methods of processing cheap protein-rich foods in order to make these available and suitable for child feeding. A project for the manufacture of soyabean milk was initiated in Indonesia by FAO and UNICEF.

In Chile, assistance was given in improved baking and milling of flour and in India the Government of Uttar Pradesh was assisted in the establishment of fruit preservation centres to deal with the seasonal surplus.

Home economics continued to play an important part in the development programme of the Middle East, and assistance in this field was extended to the Caribbean, where a three-month training course in home economics for workers from the area was arranged from October to December. A Home Economics Information Exchange, which will help countries to obtain suitable materials on home economics and its teaching, was initiated.

g. PUBLICATIONS⁷

Probably the most important FAO general publication of 1953 was the Second World Food Survey, which brought the first survey of 1946 up to date and set nutritional targets for Member Governments to reach by 1960.

In addition to the various publications mentioned above under subject headings, FAO issued a manual of Cereal Breeding Procedures in the Agricultural Development Paper Series and, in the forestry studies, Grazing and Forest Economy, as well as a monograph on Eucalypts for Planting, which began a series on various tree species.

It continued its regular statistical services, including its yearbooks of food and agricultural statistics, of forestry and fisheries, bringing the previous yearbooks up to date. It also continued to issue its quarterly and monthly publications (referred to above). In addition, the newly established legislative branch, with its quarterly Food and Agricultural Legislation, offered a developing service of legislative information to governments.

4. Budget

The seventh session of the Conference adopted a budget of $US6,000,000 ($5,925,500 to be contributed by Member Governments and $74,500 to come from miscellaneous income) to meet the expenses of FAO during 1954, as follows:

⁷ All FAO publications appear in English, French and Spanish and are available from sales agents, many of which are the same as those of the United Nations. Sample copies of all periodicals are available on request. A 1954 catalogue is available, and a regular service of bulletins of new publications is available from sales agents or direct from FAO in Rome.

C. The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO)¹

1. Introduction

The Conference for the establishment of an Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization of the United Nations, convened by the Government of the United Kingdom in association with the Government of France, met in London from 1 to 16 November 1945. It was attended by representatives of 44 governments and by observers from a number of international organizations. The Conference drew up the Constitution of UNESCO.² It also established a Preparatory Educational, Scientific and Cultural Commission to function until UNESCO came into being.

The Preparatory Commission, during its one year of existence, prepared a programme for submission to the first session of the General Conference of UNESCO. It also took steps to meet some of the most urgent needs of educational, scientific and cultural reconstruction in war-devastated areas.

UNESCO came into being on 4 November 1946, when the Instrument of Acceptance of 20 signatories of its Constitution had been deposited with the Government of the United Kingdom.

The first session of the General Conference was held in Paris in November 1946. The Conference approved the Agreement establishing the relationship between the United Nations and UNESCO. This Agreement came into force on 14 December 1946, with its approval by the General Assembly of the United Nations.³

The purpose of UNESCO, as stated in its Constitution is:

"to contribute to peace and security by promoting collaboration among the nations through education, science and culture in order to further universal respect for justice, for the rule of law and for the human rights and fundamental freedoms which are affirmed for the peoples of the world, without distinction of race, sex, language or religion, by the Charter of the United Nations."

To achieve its purpose, UNESCO is:

- (1) to collaborate in advancing the mutual knowledge and understanding of peoples through all means of mass communication;
- (2) to give fresh impulse to popular education and to the spread of culture; and
- (3) to maintain, increase and diffuse knowledge.⁴

During the first three years of work, in order to carry out the purposes of its Constitution, the programme of UNESCO became stabilized in seven main areas of activity: education, natural sciences, social sciences, cultural activities, exchange of persons, mass communication and relief assistance services. In 1950, an eighth area was added: technical assistance.

Up to the end of 1950, the relief assistance services worked to help rebuild education, science and culture in devastated countries by assembling information on the nature and extent of needs and by co-ordinating the efforts of voluntary organizations working in this field. Since then, this work has been focused on supplying educational and scientific materials to specific groups in certain countries.

⁴ A fuller statement of the purposes and functions of UNESCO is given in Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 883-84.

UNESCO is concerned primarily with education. The programme has three main objectives: the extension of education, the improvement of education, and education for living in a world community.

In its fundamental education activities, UNESCO aims at providing people who do not have the advantages of formal education with the minimum knowledge and skills that are essential for them to improve their standard of living and to take part in the social and economic development of their country. In this field, it is establishing a network of regional and national teacher-training centres throughout the world and has established an information network for the exchange of experience and ideas on techniques among national projects of this nature.

By means of studies, conferences and missions of technical workers, UNESCO seeks to promote in all countries the development of free and compulsory education for all and to improve the quality of education everywhere.

Activities designed to promote education for living in a world community aim at the healthy social and mental development of children. UNESCO tries to assist this through the improvement of educational programmes, textbooks and other teaching materials, through teaching about the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and through the association of young people with its work.

UNESCO also seeks, for example by making available travel grants for study abroad and by giving information concerning opportunities for study in various countries, to widen and increase the international movement of persons for educational, scientific and cultural purposes and thus contribute to better understanding among peoples.

In the field of natural sciences, UNESCO endeavours to facilitate the work of scientists and to develop co-operation between them, as well as to promote the work of international scientific organizations. It encourages scientific research and the teaching and popularization of science. To help the dissemination of scientific information, science co-operation offices have been set up in Montevideo, for Latin America; Cairo and Istanbul for the Middle East; New Delhi, for South Asia; and Djakarta and Manila, for South East and Eastern Asia.⁵

A number of international scientific organizations have been set up by UNESCO—such as the Union of International Engineering Associations, the Co-ordinating Council for International Medical Congresses, the International Union for the Protection of Nature—which co-operate in the implementation of the programme.

In the social sciences, UNESCO seeks to apply scientific knowledge to human relationships within and between nations. Its studies of social tensions have revealed the social and psychological factors which affect the achievement of mutual understanding and peace. To facilitate the work of social scientists, UNESCO has set up or encouraged international bodies concerned with this field. The activities of these associations are now co-ordinated by an International Social Science Council.

UNESCO aids in the struggle against racial discrimination by conducting a campaign based on modern scientific findings. A Declaration on Race drawn up by experts and a statement by physical anthropologists and geneticists have disproved the pseudo-scientific justifications of racial discrimination and theories of racial superiority. A study of factors influencing race relations has also been made in Brazil.

Through its cultural activities programmes, UNESCO seeks to promote cultural exchanges between peoples and to create favourable conditions for co-operation among artists, musicians, philosophers and men of letters. UNESCO also helps in the development of museums and libraries and in the dissemination of reproductions of great works of art and translations of the literary masterpieces of the world. It endeavours to protect creative work and its authors and to this end drew up an International Copyright Convention, which was signed by 41 countries by the end of 1953.

In its mass communication work, UNESCO's efforts are designed to increase the scope and quality of Press, film and radio services throughout the world. It studies the barriers which obstruct the free flow of ideas and initiates recommendations and international agreements to remove these barriers. Thus, two international agreements have been drafted by UNESCO to promote the free circulation of educational, scientific and cultural materials, including newspapers and books. In addition, UNESCO has developed a system of coupons which allows people in soft-currency countries to buy with their own monies books, scientific equipment and educational materials from hard-currency countries.

Among its measures to further the exchange of ideas and experience, UNESCO has

(1) set up a clearing house of educational, scientific and cultural information;

⁵ See list annexed to this chapter.

(2) established several international professional organizations;

(3) called seminars and meetings of experts to deal with technical problems and to prepare programmes of work;

(4) sent missions of specialists to Member States to study their educational and other problems;

(5) conducted pilot projects in individual Member States designed to experiment in methods for solving problems;

(6) used exhibitions to show the organization's programmes and activities; and

(7) promoted international action in the form of agreements.

2. Organization

UNESCO consists of a General Conference, an Executive Board and a Secretariat.

The General Conference, which meets at least every two years, is composed of representatives of the Member States of UNESCO. It determines the policy of the organization, lays down the main lines of the programme of work for the following two years and votes the budget.

Each Member has one vote in the Conference. Decisions of the Conference are made by a majority of the Members present and voting except in certain cases, such as the adoption of international conventions or of amendments to the Constitution, which, under the Constitution, require a two-thirds majority vote.

New Members may be admitted into UNESCO, if they are Members of the United Nations, by signing the Constitution and depositing an instrument of acceptance. Other States require, in addition, a favourable recommendation of the Executive Board and a two-thirds majority vote of the General Conference, and their applications for admission are subject to the approval of the United Nations.

The Executive Board, consisting of 20 members elected for four-year terms by and among the delegates to the General Conference, meets periodically to deal with problems arising during the year, to draft the programme and to supervise its execution by the Secretariat. The members of the Board act in a private capacity and not as representatives of their governments. They are selected for their competence in the fields of education, science or culture.

The Secretariat consists of the Director-General and the staff. The Director-General, appointed by the General Conference on the nomination of the Executive Board, is the chief administrative officer of UNESCO.

Under article 7 of UNESCO's Constitution, each Member State is required to make arrangements for the establishment of a National Commission or Co-operating Body. These National Commissions, numbering 64 at the end of 1953, serve as a link between UNESCO and the government departments, other bodies and individuals concerned with education, science and culture in each country. Their function is to carry out within each Member State the programme of UNESCO and to contribute to the attainment of its purposes.

3. Activities during 1953

During the year, the number of Member States rose to 69 with the admission of Chile, Libya, Nepal and Spain.

UNESCO's activities, particularly in the fields of education and science, developed considerably. The following were among the major projects undertaken:

a. EDUCATION

The outstanding event of the year in the education programme was the opening of the international fundamental education centre for the Arab States at Sirs el Layyan, Egypt. Designed to train teachers in the techniques of fundamental education and produce teaching material, it is the second such centre to be set up by UNESCO as part of its world campaign against ignorance, poverty and disease, the first being at Patzcuaro, Mexico, in 1951. Fifty students from Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, Iraq, Saudi Arabia and the Palestine Arab Refugees were the first group to join the centre, where they are trained in theoretical and practical work. A second course for some 50 more students was due to start early in 1954.

The centre is a co-operative enterprise between the Egyptian Government and UNESCO, as well as the United Nations, the World Health Organization (WHO), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) and the International Labour Organisation (ILO). It is composed of three divisions—training, production and research, with a library and regional clearing house—which aim at training leaders for fundamental education in the Arab world, producing educational material and carrying out a research programme of rural problems in the Arab States.

At Patzcuaro, 55 new students from seven Latin American Member States were enrolled during the year. With the co-operation of the Mexican Indian Institute, a small industries project in ceramics and weaving was established near the centre for the purpose of improving techniques of production and the quality of output while retaining the original designs and motifs of the locality. The centre also aims at showing how local industries can be organized and encouraged and put on a sound economic basis. The 63 students who were enrolled in 1952 completed their 19-months training course and returned to their home countries, where most of them have been placed in significant jobs in fundamental education.

In response to the invitation of the General Conference, more national committees for fundamental education were established in Member States; the number rose to 28 during the year. Their object is to stimulate fundamental education in their own countries, keep UNESCO informed of such activities and help supply experts whenever necessary.

The members of the Associated Projects system rose during the year to 53 in eighteen countries. The aim of this system is to encourage the international exchange of information and materials and to carry out field experiments for developing and testing new methods and materials for use in fundamental education programmes. Two short seminars on the production and use of visual aids in such programmes took place in India.

A seminar on the problems of international understanding was held in July in France. Various study groups examined the difficulties in such teaching within the workers' international movement, and considered the problems raised by the needs of under-developed countries.

A second seminar took place, also in France, in July on the teaching of citizenship in workers' education. Its object was to consider the methods and content of teaching in the workers' educational movement best adapted to foster a common conception of civic responsibilities in accordance with the principles of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Regarding the education of women, UNESCO published a survey of educational opportunities for women in Chile, India and Yugoslavia. Similar surveys were made during the year in Japan and the Philippines, with special attention to the social conditions bearing upon the access of women to education.

In the Arab refugees camps in the Middle East,⁶ the number of children receiving formal schooling by 31 December 1953, due to the combined efforts of UNESCO and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) totalled some 150,000. The number of pupils in UNRWA-UNESCO primary schools was approximately 92,000 and in secondary schools 4,000, and there were some 55,000 pupils in private and government schools. Vocational training was also introduced by UNESCO and UNRWA. A large number of classrooms were built, and it is hoped that by the end of 1954 there will be no more tent schools. The pupil-teacher ratio was reduced to an average of 45 pupils in a class, and teachers' salaries were brought to the approximate level of those paid to teachers in the schools of host countries.

In view of the success of an experiment in fundamental education started in a refugee camp near Beirut, a new centre was opened at another camp in Jordan in October 1953. It was planned to spread this work to about 20 camps in the course of the 1953-54 school year.

In Korea, after a stay of six months in the country, the educational planning mission, sponsored jointly by UNESCO and the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, completed its task of surveying Korea's educational needs and drawing up a long-term plan for the reconstruction of education.

An international seminar on the contribution of the teaching of modern languages toward education for living in a world community was organized by UNESCO at Nuwara Eliya, Ceylon, in August 1953, and was attended by representatives from eighteen Member States. Round table discussions were held on such topics as: the cultural aspect of modern language teaching; language teaching as an aid to understanding foreign peoples and civilizations; psychological problems of language teaching and language learning; and the training of modern language teachers. In addition, specially urgent problems confronting certain countries in Asia and certain territories in Africa were discussed. The seminar was particularly interested in: (1) experiments currently being carried out in certain Member States with a view to starting language teaching at a much earlier stage; (2) methods used to teach languages rapidly to adult immigrants; (3) the need for revision of language-teaching textbooks; and (4) new methods of language teaching, such as the simplification method and the linguistic method.

A seminar on the production and use of visual aids in fundamental education was held at Messina, Sicily. The first world seminar of its kind, it was designed to bring together the experiences of educators and technicians from all continents and from international organizations actively concerned with fundamental education. Twenty-eight countries and territories from all parts of the world were represented. The seminar examined films, filmstrips and other visual aids already produced under the auspices of Member States of UNESCO and in such UNESCO projects as those under way at Patzcuaro, in Haiti and at Beirut. It also studied means of improving and increasing the effectiveness of visual aids in fundamental education programmes.

UNESCO organized the second regional study and information seminar for leaders of youth movements which took place in Tokyo from 6 to 27 October. Fourteen Member States of the Asian Continent and Australasia were represented by 34 youth leaders. Practical suggestions for the action of youth organizations were made in the fields of fundamental education, housing and family life, work and recreation. The specific needs of youth organizations in the area, and new techniques for work with youth were studied.

In 1953, UNESCO provided over 100 youth groups in 65 countries with study kits containing materials on some of the problems facing the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

The UNESCO Youth Institute in Munich called a seminar on the role and organization of youth centres as well as a conference of government officials responsible for youth questions in sixteen countries. The purpose of this conference was to study the situation of youth in general and of youth organizations in particular, the contributions being made by governments to youth activities, particularly on an international level; and, finally, to determine what particular studies and inquiries with reference to youth were most urgently required.

During the year, UNESCO continued to maintain close contact with, and give financial assistance to, international organizations in the field of education whose activities were of particular importance to its programme. The UNESCO Clearing House service was extended to cover all parts of the education programme; it prepared and published reports on various educational subjects. Assistance was also provided to Member States in studying particular problems by educational experts sent by UNESCO.

b. NATURAL SCIENCES

In 1953, UNESCO continued to foster international relations between scientists, directly and through the various professional bodies with which it co-operates.

During the year the European Organization for Nuclear Research, originally planned by UNESCO,⁷ came into being. The purpose of this body is to proceed with the construction of a modern laboratory for nuclear research and to develop co-operation between existing laboratories in theoretical studies already in progress in various countries. The research will be of a non-military character, and the laboratory will serve to train scientists in this field.

The Convention establishing the organization on a permanent basis was approved in July by representatives of Belgium, Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia, all of which signed it by the end of the year. It will enter into force when ratified by seven states whose contributions total 75 per cent of the budget. The headquarters of the organization will be near Geneva. Two study groups, composed of specialists from participating countries, were working on the designs of the two main machines of the international laboratory: a synchro-cyclotron for 600 MeV and a proton synchrotron for 25 GeV.

UNESCO's efforts to help improve the living conditions of mankind in the world's arid and semi-arid zones, inaugurated in 1951 when the Advisory Committee on Arid Zone Research was created, were intensified in 1953. Each year the Committee holds two meetings to consider research on one of the major aspects of the arid zone problems, and the following year an international symposium on this subject is held. The subject in 1953 was energy sources.⁸ Meetings were held in May in Paris, and in November at Montpellier, France, in conjunction with an international symposium of plant ecology, organized by UNESCO, with the participation of experts from fifteen Member States. Reviews of Research on Arid Zone Hydrology was published in May, and a directory of institutions engaged in arid zone research was issued in November. UNESCO was invited to organize a symposium on wind and solar energy of the arid zones in India in the autumn of 1954.

To provide the general public with up-to-date information on progress in the sciences, a travelling exhibition of "Our Senses and the Knowledge of the World" was circulated in Eastern Asia early in 1953 and was seen in the Philippines and Japan by some 200,000 people; an exhibition on "New Materials" was circulated in Yugoslavia, Turkey and Egypt; and, at the request of the Government of Israel, an exhibition on the arid zone was prepared by UNESCO in co-operation with FAO, WHO and ILO and shown in Jerusalem.

The Kalinga Prize for 1953 was awarded to Dr. Julian Huxley. This Prize, of 1,000 pounds sterling, was established in 1951 as a gift to UNESCO from Mr. Patnaik, an Indian industrialist. It is awarded annually by UNESCO for outstanding and continued achievement in the dissemination and interpretation of science to the general public in books, articles, radio programmes or films.

The science co-operation offices continued to facilitate the task of scientists by supplying information and materials on a variety of subjects in response to several hundred requests. In addition, these offices undertook specific activities, such as organizing or assisting in convening international training courses on scientific questions, arranging lecture tours by prominent scientists and publishing information and documentation.

c. SOCIAL SCIENCES

A new phase in UNESCO's work in the social sciences opened in 1953 with the formation of the International Social Science Council, set up to combine the resources of all the social sciences for a joint study of the main social problems of our time. In addition, UNESCO continued, through subventions and services, to assist ten non-governmental organizations which contribute to the implementation of its programme.

During the year, social science field officers—in the Middle East, South Asia and the Western Hemisphere—endeavoured, inter alia, to develop and set up national co-ordination and research bodies. Thus, national sections of the International Committee of Comparative Law were set up in Egypt, Lebanon and Turkey and a political science association was established in Turkey.

The UNESCO Institute for Social Sciences in Cologne was engaged in a study of social integration and social participation throughout the Federal Republic of Germany. This is based on a representative sample of the whole population between 18 and 79. The Institute also studied the pattern of integration of foreign ethnic groups in the country. In September, representatives of research institutes active in the study of the labour management problems of industry met in Dortmund to plan a multi-national project. Social scientists from Finland, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States attended. An International Committee for Social Research in Industry was formed on a permanent basis and a joint project for the study of labour management relations and related problems in the steel industry was agreed upon.

A conference, arranged jointly by the United Nations and UNESCO, held at New York in April 1953, dealt with the social problems raised by the application of technical assistance programmes for the economic development of under-developed countries. It clarified some of the chief sociological and economic problems raised by the execution of these programmes.

In 1953, UNESCO also undertook a number of regional social studies. The research work, conducted under the auspices of the International African Institute, on the social effects of industrialization in Stanleyville (Belgian Congo) was completed, and several similar research undertakings were carried out in South Asia. Their object was not only to collect first-hand data on the social consequences of technological development in the countries concerned, but also to familiarize research workers in the area with the most up-to-date analytical methods.

UNESCO also arranged with three international non-governmental organizations to carry out studies of certain social aspects of land reform in various regions affected thereby, of the legal problems bound up with the implementation of such reform and of the co-operative movement in agriculture.

The educational campaign started by UNESCO in 1949 to remove what is commonly known as racial prejudice continued in 1953. The campaign involved the dissemination of scientific data on race questions and a study in various countries of the positive contributions made towards the solution of race problems. The Race Concept—Results of an Enquiry and The Catholic Church and the Race Question were issued.

Since 1951, UNESCO has been investigating the positive aspects of relations between human groups with a view to drawing constructive conclusions. Two volumes containing the initial results of the survey conducted in Brazil were issued in 1953. In addition, a survey was completed of the action taken by government departments and private associations in six countries (Brazil, French West Indies, the Federal Republic of Germany, Mexico, United States and Yugoslavia) to speed up the integration of ethnic or cultural minorities.

At the suggestion of the United Nations, and, more especially, of its Commission on the Status of Women, UNESCO, in a selected number of countries, carried out a study on the political role of women, the way in which women participate as citizens and the factors which promote or hinder their participation in public life. It was decided, in agreement with the Governments of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Norway and Yugoslavia, to carry out more intensive research in these four countries, where women have secured equal political rights at different stages in economic and social development. Meanwhile, the over-all study, based upon information gathered from fifteen countries, reviewed such factors as the influence of age, social and educational background, rural or urban environment, family ties, professional status, etc. on the political interest and participation of both men and women. In addition, a public opinion poll on the subject was conducted in France in June 1953 by the Institut français d'Opinion publique.

A second International Statistical Congress was opened at Beirut under the auspices of UNESCO and the International Statistical Institute.

d. CULTURAL ACTIVITIES

The cultural activities of UNESCO continued to develop in 1953 in the four following spheres: international cultural co-operation; dissemination of culture; protection of writers, artists and scientists; and preservation of the cultural heritage of mankind.

In these activities, UNESCO had the co-operation of international non-governmental organizations, for example, the International Council for Philosophy and Humanistic Studies, the International Theatre Institute, the International Music Council, the International Association of Plastic Arts, the International PEN Club, the International Association of Art Critics, the International Union of Architects and the International Council of Museums.

The international studies and discussions on cultural subjects organized in 1953 and the publications issued during the year were designed to strengthen the intellectual and moral ties between countries and individuals belonging to different civilizations. A new series of UNESCO publications, entitled Unity and Diversity of Cultures, was started, and the first issue on the Inter-relations of Cultures published.

The draft International Convention for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict⁹ was circulated by UNESCO to its Member Governments in 1953 prior to its consideration at an intergovernmental conference due to be held in 1954. Meanwhile, the Governments of Cambodia, the Dominican Republic, Greece, Iraq, Italy, Laos, Norway and the Philippines have, by unilateral declarations, bound themselves to take precautions to spare cultural treasures in the course of military operations, and to abstain from using immovable cultural property and its surroundings for purposes likely to expose it to attack.

At the request of the Yugoslav Government, UNESCO sent an expert to that country to direct the restoration of the Church of Saint Sophia at Ochrida and its valuable mural paintings. The work was carried out with the help of a group of Italian and Yugoslav experts. In addition, an exchange of architects with specialized knowledge of historical monuments was arranged between the French and Yugoslav Governments.

UNESCO also organized, at the invitation of the Lebanese Government, a mission to report on the general conditions of the monuments of the city of Tripoli (Lebanon) and on the measures to be taken to safeguard such of these monuments as should be preserved. The mission also submitted a plan for laying out the area surrounding the Baalbeck ruins. The same mission proceeded to Syria, where it examined the condition of the monuments and archeological and historical sites of that country as well as the measures to be adopted for their preservation.

During the year, an International Study Centre for the Preservation and Restoration of Cultural Property was formed to:

- (1) assemble and disseminate information concerning the preservation and restoration of cultural property;
- (2) co-ordinate and extend research in this field;
- (3) act as consultant; and
- (4) assist in the training of research workers and technicians.

Three conferences were convened by UNESCO in 1953 in order to foster the knowledge of the arts: "Theatre and Youth", "The Role and Place of Music in the Education of Youth and Adults" and "The Professional Training of Musicians". At the last two, problems of musical education were reviewed by music teachers from all over the world. The first of these two meetings studied all aspects of music teaching and called for an international inquiry into musical education and decided that an International Society for Music Education should be created. The second considered the exchange of pupils and teachers, the foundation of secondary schools for musicians and the establishment of an international competition for conservatory graduates.

Three new albums of colour reproductions were compiled, covering the Ajanta frescoes (Hyderabad, India), the tomb and temple paintings in the Valley of the Kings (Egypt) and Australian Aborigine Art. The number of UNESCO touring exhibitions of colour reproductions increased to 89 by the end of the year.

The fifth volume of Index Translationum was issued, covering over 16,000 translations published in 47 countries.

UNESCO's main activity in the field of libraries, documentation and archives is designed to make books and publications more readily available. A new problem engaging its attention was that of the specialized training of librarians, since many countries lack librarians sufficiently qualified to meet present day demands.

The Delhi Public Library, a pilot project organized by the Government of India and UNESCO, developed greatly in 1953. It served 70,000 men, women and children from all strata of life each month and lent 1,000 books a day. The Library's film showings, discussions, lectures and story hours for children drew several thousand people a month. Small collections of books were set up in literacy centres as part of the Library's programme for new literates and a mobile unit carrying 3,000 volumes took service to outlying sections of Delhi and nearby villages during the year.

A seminar, held in July and August at Ibadan, Nigeria, on the development of public library services in Africa considered the professional training of librarians, and the organization of stationary libraries and of a network of free public libraries equipped with mobile units.

Through the UNESCO Bulletin for Libraries, over 8,000 books were offered for free distribution during 1953 by libraries in 27 countries, and 10,000 were offered for exchange in 36 countries.

e. MASS COMMUNICATION

One of the major activities of the 1953 programme in this field was the organization of the seminar on the use of visual aids in fundamental education which was held at Messina, Sicily, during the summer.¹⁰

A report on the present stage of development of television in the world, covering 45 countries and territories, was published. Details are given for each country of the history, structure and financing of the television services, the technical facilities available and the programming policy with special reference to educational programmes.

During the year, a number of additional countries decided to apply the UNESCO Agreement on the Importation of Educational, Scientific and Cultural Materials, bringing the total of participating countries to seventeen by the end of the year.

The Agreement for Facilitating the International Circulation of Visual and Auditory Materials of an educational, scientific and cultural character had, by the end of 1953, been signed by 21 countries and ratified by nine. It will come into force when ratified by ten countries.¹¹

Two alternate drafts of an international instrument for the removal of obstacles to the movement of persons travelling for educational purposes were circulated to Member States.

The International Air Transport Association (IATA), which establishes international air transport rates, was requested by UNESCO to consider granting reductions in air freight rates for educational materials. The Association decided to reduce by 50 per cent the air freight rates for books in the European region, to take effect in April 1954.

A joint UNESCO/WHO/UNICEF reportage mission was sent to four Eastern Mediterranean countries to cover all the important activities of the three agencies in the field.

A UNESCO film "World Without End", a one-hour study of the creative work undertaken by the United Nations and the specialized agencies in the social and economic fields, was produced. The film was shot in Thailand and Mexico, two countries which illustrate effectively the co-operation of national governments and international agencies in social and economic activities. The film, which was directed by Basil Wright and Paul Rotha, was first released in English at the Edinburgh Festival in August 1953 and was then televised throughout the United Kingdom. French and Spanish versions of the film were also prepared.

UNESCO's coupons programme, introduced in 1948 as the Book Coupon Scheme with only five participating countries, was extended in 1950 to cover payment for educational films and scientific material and, by the end of 1953, was operating in over 30 Member States. During the year, $1,600,000 worth of coupons were issued, bringing to over $4,500,000 the amount of coupons so far put into circulation.

¹⁰ See pp. 746-47.

¹¹ The Agreement came into force on 12 August 1954.

The Gift Coupon programme, introduced in 1951, was in operation in eleven participating countries, which were actively promoting and publicizing it and collecting funds for UNESCO assistance projects. During the year, more than 160 institutions in 37 countries and territories received gift coupons.

f. EXCHANGE OF PERSONS

The activities of UNESCO in this programme were carried out along three main lines in 1953: the development of research and world-wide dissemination of information on the international exchange of persons programme; the promotion of educational exchanges; and the administration of international fellowships.

The clearing house for the collection of information on international exchange of persons programmes answered a large number of individual inquiries concerning foreign study opportunities. Several surveys, one of which concerned the number of foreign students enrolled in universities and institutions of higher learning, were published. They included: Volume V of Study Abroad, showing the distribution of some 45,000 scholarships and fellowships offered by donating countries, beneficiary countries and subjects of study; Volume V of the Vacation Study Supplement, containing information about some 500 vacation courses, study tours and work camps; a revised edition of Travel Abroad, giving information on visa and currency regulations, reductions granted to students and other persons travelling abroad on educational tours, in 150 countries and territories; and the first volume of Teaching Abroad, containing particulars of university professors and lecturers wishing to find teaching posts abroad.

The Workers' Study Tours programme, initiated by UNESCO in 1952, was repeated in 1953. Grants were made to 48 different groups covering 900 manual and non-manual workers from twelve European countries. The grants enabled these groups to study social conditions and cultural activities in another European country and brought them into direct touch with workers in their own trades and occupations.

Grants were also made to four non-governmental organizations to set up summer schools for workers in France.

Under the Youth Travel Grant Scheme, UNESCO allocated $33,000 to cover travel costs of young people participating in international activities of an educational character. Forty-one grants were awarded to persons from 36 different countries.

UNESCO university courses, consisting of international teams of teachers, were organized in 1952-53 in the University of Dacca, Pakistan, and in the University of Caracas, Venezuela.

A scheme was started for the reciprocal exchange of secondary school teachers in the Middle East and Latin America for the academic year 1952-53 or 1953.

The fellowship programme financed by UNESCO provided for 71 fellowships, which were allocated to 46 Member States during the year, while six different schemes of UNESCO-sponsored fellowships were administered by the organization.

g. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

UNESCO's technical assistance activities in 1953 included an increasingly high proportion of long-term projects. The range of fields of work in which they were carried out (fundamental education, primary and secondary teaching, special educational services, technical instruction, scientific instruction, scientific research, documentation services and advisory services in the scientific fields) reflects the effort that was made to adapt this assistance to the variety of situations and needs in the different countries. By the end of the year, UNESCO had 130 experts working in 36 countries on 71 projects. Its share of the funds from the Special Account of the Expanded Programme of technical assistance totalled $3,035,000.

In volume, fundamental education projects continued during 1953 to be the most important form of technical assistance. A certain number of missions have been in the field for several years. Their work has resulted, in some cases, in the creation of truly national fundamental education centres where local experience is placed at the disposal of the country as a whole. This was achieved in the Minneriya Centre, in Ceylon, and the Dujaila Centre, in Iraq. In Liberia, the Klay Centre also made promising progress. In Haiti, national staff was trained at the Marbial Centre and also through the fellowships awarded by the Patzcuaro Centre; as a result it was possible for the UNESCO mission in Haiti to be brought to an end in the course of the year.

In certain comprehensive experiments, assistance in fundamental education is linked with other types of assistance. For example, in the province of Chachoengsao, in Thailand, assistance in fundamental and adult education is helping to improve education at all levels. There, organization of primary and secondary schools of a practical nature was combined with teacher training.

Teacher training remained one of UNESCO's priority projects throughout the year. In countries where the number of qualified teachers is not sufficient to meet school needs, certain special forms of assistance have been rendered. In Pakistan, school broadcasts were organized and all middle schools of the Karachi region were receiving sets. In Colombia, in the Sutatenza region, the education of a whole area was made possible through the creation of a network of "radio schools".

In Libya, trained teachers and textbooks had to be sent for from other countries. With the assistance of UNESCO, an educational and production centre was set up in Tripoli. UNESCO also provided experts in child psychology, physical education, and in the production of textbooks; specialists in teaching methods and manual training; and a lecturer in geography. The activities of the mission were co-ordinated with the Libyan American Technical Assistance Service, which provided a large amount of equipment. New syllabi were prepared by the educational authorities. Sixty men teachers and 21 women teachers in the teachers' college passed the third-year examination before the 1953 summer vacation.

Teacher training is also one of the major activities of the educational organization mission sent by UNESCO to Costa Rica. This is a comprehensive project and includes rural education, primary education, vocational education, teacher training and school administration. After a survey of the general situation, two pilot projects were carried out in the fields of rural and fundamental education. Teachers were trained in the techniques of rural education.

Elsewhere, the improvement of primary and secondary education took on more classical forms, such as in Peru and Indonesia where science teachers were being trained. Technical education, at a more modest level, remains, however, the outstanding need of many countries. At the Afghan Institute of Technology and in Laos, at the Vietiane technical school, specialists were being trained for immediate practical purposes.

Another example of assistance in the field of practical science teaching is provided by the Indian Institute of Technology at Kharagpur. The teaching of theoretical science in India was adequate, but the students who were trained needed guidance in order to apply their knowledge to industrial and other practical problems. UNESCO sent experts in mechanical engineering, civil engineering and hydraulics. Equipment came from UNESCO, the United Kingdom and Australia, through the Colombo Plan, the American Point Four Program and from the United States Technical Co-operation Administration. Undergraduate and post-graduate instruction in production technology was given during the year. The Institute achieved such satisfactory results that it is to be incorporated in the machinery set up for implementing the Five-Year Development Plan for India.

The year also saw the development of the scientific and technical documentation centres started with UNESCO's help in Mexico City, Belgrade, New Delhi and Ankara. New centres were planned in Uruguay and Egypt.

4. Budget

The seventh session of the General Conference, meeting in November-December 1952, approved a budget of $18,712,964 to carry out the programme of activities for 1953 and 1954. The estimates for 1953 were $9,017,849 and for 1954 $9,695,115. The estimated distribution of funds for 1954 is as follows (in U.S. dollars):

D. The International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO)¹

1. Introduction

At the International Civil Aviation Conference, which met in Chicago from 1 November to 7 December 1944, representatives of 52 States adopted a Convention providing for the establishment of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO).² The Conference also drew up an Interim Agreement providing for a Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization (PICAO) to operate until the formal establishment of the permanent organization.

The aims and objectives of ICAO, as stated in the Convention, are:

"to develop the principles and techniques of international air navigation and to foster the planning and development of international air transport" so as, among other things, to: ensure the safe and orderly growth of international civil aviation; encourage aircraft design and operation and the development of airways, airports and air navigation facilities; ensure that the rights of contracting States are fully respected; promote safety of flight in international air navigation; and promote generally the development of all aspects of international civil aeronautics.

PICAO came into being on 6 June 1945, after 26 States had adhered to the Interim Agreement. ICAO came formally into existence on 4 April 1947, 30 days after the Convention on International Civil Aviation had been ratified by the required 26 States. The Convention superseded, as between contracting States, the provisions of two earlier agreements: the Paris Convention of 1919, establishing the International Commission for Air Navigation, and the Pan-American Convention on Commercial Aviation, drawn up in Havana in 1928.

An agreement establishing the relationship between the United Nations and ICAO came into force on 13 May 1947 with its approval by the Assembly of ICAO.³ It had previously been approved by the United Nations General Assembly on 14 December 1946.

From 15 August 1945, when the PICAO Interim Council met for the first time, until the formal establishment of ICAO, the provisional organization secured concerted action from its members to provide and maintain the facilities and services necessary for air transport across national borders. Patterns for meteorological services, traffic control, communications, radio beacons and ranges, search and rescue organizations and other facilities required for safe international flight were developed. Much of PICAO's work involved the drafting of recommendations for standards, practices and procedures, designed to ensure the safety, regularity and efficiency of international air transport. One of the most important activities of the permanent organization in the technical field was the review of these recommendations with a view to the adoption by the ICAO Council of international standards and recommended practices to regulate civil aviation in Member States. By the end of 1952, fourteen sets of standards⁴ and recommended practices⁵ had been approved by the Council.

As required by article 38 of the Convention, contracting States notified ICAO of the differences between their national regulations or practices and the international standards contained in the annexes adopted by the Council. The differences filed were communicated to all contracting States and their implications were studied by ICAO's Air Navigation Commission.

PICAO and, later, ICAO held regional air navigation meetings to examine the air navigation requirements and specify particular procedures to be followed in each of the eight regions of the world in which a particular type of flying operation predominates.

ICAO arranged for the co-operative maintenance of other air transport, navigation and meteorological facilities required by aircraft flying over sparsely populated regions or regions of uncertain sovereignty. Accordingly, ocean weather stations have been maintained in the North Atlantic, Loran (long-range radio aid to navigation) stations at Vik, Iceland and the Faeroe Islands, weather reporting and forecasting stations, area traffic control and telecommunication networks in Iceland, and meteorological stations and communications facilities in Greenland.

The principal achievement of ICAO in the legal field up to the end of 1952 was the adoption by the Assembly of a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft, opened for signature on 19 June 1948, and the adoption by a plenipotentiary conference of a Convention on Damage Caused by Foreign Aircraft to Third Parties on the Surface, opened for signature on 7 October 1952.

Among other activities, ICAO began a number of long-term studies related to air transport and air navigation, as directed by various sessions of the ICAO Assembly.

2. Organization⁶

The governing bodies of ICAO are the Assembly and the Council.

The Assembly, comprising representatives of Member States, is convened by the Council and meets annually. The Assembly is responsible for the financial arrangements of the organization, including the approval of an annual budget. It examines and takes action on matters referred to it by the Council and may refer to the Council specific matters for the consideration of the latter body. The Assembly also deals with such other matters as come within the sphere of action of the organization but are not specifically assigned to the Council.

Each Member State is entitled to one vote in the Assembly. Decisions of the Assembly and the Council are made, with few exceptions, by a simple majority of the votes cast. Exceptions include adoption by the Assembly of amendments to the Convention, and the adoption by the Council of international standards and recommended practices regulating air navigation, both of which require a two-thirds majority vote.

Members may be admitted into the organization, provided they are signatories to the Convention. Members of the United Nations or Allied States or States which remained neutral during the Second World War must notify adherence or deposit an instrument of ratification of the Convention. To become Members of ICAO, former Axis States require an affirmative four-fifths vote by the ICAO Assembly, the assent of any State invaded or attacked by the State seeking admission, and approval by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

The Council, which meets in virtually continuous session, is the executive body of the organization and derives its powers and authority from the Assembly and from the Convention itself. It is composed of 21 Member States elected by the Assembly for a period of three years. In electing these

⁵ A recommended practice, by definition of the first Assembly, is "any specification for physical characteristics, configuration, material, performance, personnel or procedure, the uniform application of which is recognized as desirable in the interest of safety, regularity or efficiency of international air navigation, and to which Member States will endeavour to conform in accordance with the Convention".

⁶ For a fuller statement of the organization of ICAO, see Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 850-51. A list of ICAO's regional offices is annexed to this chapter.

States, the Assembly must give adequate representation to:

- (1) those Member States of major importance in air transport;
- (2) those Member States not otherwise included which make the largest contribution to the provision of facilities for international civil air navigation; and
- (3) those Member States not otherwise included, the election of which will ensure that all major geographical areas of the world are represented.

The Council adopts standards for international air navigation and collects, examines and publishes information concerning air navigation. It administers the finances of the organization and carries out the directives of the Assembly. It may conduct research into all aspects of air transport and air navigation which are of international importance. The Council may act as an arbiter between two or more Members of ICAO in any dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention and its annexes and, when expressly requested by all the parties concerned, as an arbitral body in any dispute arising among Members relating to international civil aviation.

Among other duties, the Council is charged with providing for the establishment of subsidiary bodies and with supervising and co-ordinating their work. Three main bodies have been established: the Air Navigation Commission, the Air Transport Committee and the Legal Committee. The Council elects its President and appoints the Secretary-General of ICAO.

By 31 December 1953, the membership of ICAO had increased to 61, with the addition of Honduras, Libya and Japan.

In January, the successful conclusion of an agreement between India and Pakistan concerning a dispute which had been submitted to the Council of ICAO in April of 1952 was announced. This dispute concerned the refusal of Pakistan to permit Indian aircraft engaged in commercial air services between India and Afghanistan to fly over West Pakistani territory without landing or to land there for non-traffic purposes. During 1953, working groups of the ICAO Council considered the matter and requested the States concerned to resume negotiations; the settlement involved the opening of two corridors through which Indian aircraft could fly on their way to Afghanistan and the supply by Pakistan to Afghanistan of aviation gasoline for refueling purposes.

The seventh session of the Assembly of ICAO was held in Brighton, England, from 16 June to 6 July 1953. The first full-scale session which had been held since 1950 (ICAO full-scale assemblies are held every three years), it reviewed the work which ICAO has done in the economic, technical and legal fields and laid down the pattern of work for the next three years.

a. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

During 1953, ICAO was faced with a lack of sufficient funds to carry out fully its projected technical assistance programme. In December 1952, the ICAO Council had approved a technical assistance budget of $1,477,000; because of shortage of funds, this amount was reduced by the Technical Assistance Board, first to $1,052,000 and later to $972,800. As a result of these cuts, requirements could not be met for additional experts, equipment and fellowships in some countries that were receiving assistance; other countries, which had been urgently requesting assistance for some time, were informed that the organization could do nothing for them at present.

Requests for assistance were received during the year from fifteen countries, nine of which (Brazil, Colombia, Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, Libya, Panama, Paraguay and Syria) had not previously applied. Technical assistance missions continued their work in fifteen States (Afghanistan, Egypt, Ethiopia, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Mexico, Pakistan, Thailand, Turkey and Yugoslavia), completing it in two of them—Iceland and India. Missions began work in El Salvador and Syria, and an expert paid a short visit to Burma. Two fellowships and 20 scholarships were awarded to nationals of seven countries (Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras and Panama), these countries receiving assistance only in this form. Technical assistance agreements, supplementary agreements and annexes to existing agreements were signed with the Governments of twelve States (Afghanistan, Burma, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Iran, Lebanon, Libya, Pakistan, the Philippines, Syria, Thailand and Yugoslavia). At the beginning of the year, 68 experts were in the field; at the end, 75 were either on mission or about to leave for their duty stations. Seventeen fellowship holders were studying abroad by the beginning of 1953. In the course of the year, eighteen fellowships granted in 1952 were taken up and 25 new ones awarded, of which 22 were taken up; ten fellows were studying at the end of the year.

In 1953, as in the two previous years, technical assistance by ICAO took two forms—expert advice, and training either in the assisted country or abroad. In many countries both forms went hand in hand. Expert advice in the organization and operation of aeronautical services in States was accompanied by basic, on-the-spot training in schools set up for the purpose, some of which it was expected would be permanent, and by advanced training in other countries of personnel who would return to take up senior posts in the national administration or carry on the training begun by ICAO missions. It is hoped that this will lead not only to an improvement in aeronautical services while a mission is in the country, but also to their efficient and economical operation by nationals of that country after the mission has left.

In the first phase of the technical assistance programme of ICAO, much planning was required before the assistance could be fully geared to the development of a country's aviation. Plans had to be made for the recruitment of suitably qualified pupils in appropriate numbers, for the provision of accommodation and for the acquisition and installation of training equipment. To determine the proper number of pupils it was necessary to have a master plan of the development of the country's aeronautical services. In some countries, where relatively large missions were early in the field, this first phase was almost over by the end of 1953 and these countries were embarked on well-established training programmes, although the need for advice on special problems continued and the installation of equipment would have to be carried on for some time under the guidance of experts. In others, missions recently sent out were beginning the process described above. In still others, where no large programme had been undertaken, assistance in 1953 consisted of fellowships and of expert advice, ranging from a regional survey of air transport to advice on the improvement of an airport.

Fellowships awarded during the year covered a wide variety of subjects—administration and regulation of civil aviation, legal and economic aspects of civil aviation, facilitation of air transport, communications, aeronautical meteorology, air traffic services, aircraft maintenance, advanced flying training, flight testing of airline pilots, flight navigation, flight operation, airport construction and maintenance, and airport management.

A new development in 1953 was the granting of scholarships to nationals of certain Latin American States for training in air traffic control, aeronautical meteorology, aircraft maintenance, radio maintenance, radio operation and airline operations at the training centre in Mexico City. In this way, basic training was being made available to several States whose individual requirements were not large enough to justify the establishment of training centres in their own territory.

In countries where training has been the main activity, for example, Ethiopia, Indonesia, Iran and Mexico, schools were established and functioning by the end of the year. In Indonesia and Iran, nationals had begun to play a part in the instruction. In Mexico, nationals have formed a large part of the instructional staff from the beginning. Action by governments on the advice of ICAO missions had resulted by the end of 1953 in the setting up of a meteorological network in Ethiopia, the reorganization of meteorological services in Iraq, the installation of a great deal of equipment for communication facilities and radio aids in Indonesia, the establishment of a civil aviation authority in Afghanistan, and the improvement of air traffic services in many countries. At the Assembly in June, representatives of many States stressed the contribution that civil aviation could make to the development of under-developed countries and expressed great concern at the prospect of a curtailment of the programme.

b. AIR NAVIGATION QUESTIONS

An important feature of the year's work in air navigation was the consideration by the Assembly of the orientation and methods of work followed by the organization in recent years, both in the development of standards, recommended practices and procedures, and in the regional planning of air navigation facilities and services. It was recognized that much work remained to be done on the former, particularly in airworthiness, but it was believed that the pace could be more deliberate and that the proposed agenda for Divisions and air navigation conferences should be very critically examined to ensure that the convening of the meeting was justified by the existence of a sufficient number of specific problems, international in character and mature enough for discussion with a view to solution. At the same time, it was agreed that the primary emphasis should be placed on implementation and that the training resources of the organization should be used to their fullest extent to assist and encourage States in this work.

The programme of technical meetings in 1953 comprised three sessions of the Air Navigation Commission, of a total duration of 24 weeks, one air navigation conference, two full-scale regional air navigation meetings and two special meetings of limited scope.

The fifteenth series of the international standards and recommended practices (annexes to the Convention on International Civil Aviation) was approved by the ICAO Council during 1953, setting a pattern for aeronautical information services. This Annex was to come into effect on 1 April 1954. Amendments to five of the other annexes were also adopted by the Council during the year, involving such subjects as: Annex 2 (Rules of the Air) concerning the cruising level to be maintained under instrument flights rules by an aircraft experiencing a communications failure; Annex 6 (Operation of Aircraft) providing that each life jacket or floatation device must be equipped with a means of electric illumination to facilitate the location of survivors by search and rescue parties; Annex 10 (Aeronautical Telecommunications) providing for the relaying of messages to an aircraft when the latter is not within the range of the ground station and changing the specifications of certain instrument landing system installations; and Annex 14 (Aerodromes) introducing an integrated system of visual aids for approach and landing including a standard approach landing system.

The first Air Navigation Conference, which met in Montreal from 24 February to 24 March, had as its main task the determination of operational requirements and the development of standard procedures on a variety of subjects impinging on more than one technical field. These subjects included:

- (1) the measurement of visibility and height of cloud base on and in the vicinity of aerodromes;
- (2) the reporting of position, operational and meteorological data by aircraft in flight with particular reference to the use of radiotelephony;
- (3) the use of meteorological broadcasts and other meteorological transmissions to aircraft in flight;
- (4) the co-ordination of instrument approach-to-land facilities and procedures; and
- (5) the use of radar as an air traffic control aid.

The Second South East Asia and Limited South Pacific Regional Air Navigation Meeting was held in Melbourne, Australia, from 13 January to 9 February. The Meeting substantially revised the regional plans that had been prepared at the first meetings (for South East Asia in November 1948 and for the South Pacific in February 1947) and recommended a detailed plan for the implementation of the frequencies assigned to the Aeronautical Mobile Service by the ITU Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference. Other important recommendations concerned the adoption of standard-pressure altimeter setting procedures in the southern part of the Pacific Ocean, a new aerodrome facilities plan, a final plan for the Aeronautical Fixed Telecommunications Network, to be implemented by 1 January 1954 in the South Pacific and by 1 January 1956 in South East Asia, an increase in the number and coverage of non-directional radio beacons, a plan for VHF (very high frequency) omni-directional radio ranges in the South East Asia Region, and a revised plan for meteorological reporting stations and forecasting offices. The Meeting noted the existence in some areas of deficiencies in the provision of meteorological reports. To meet the problem posed by the high cost of establishing and maintaining stations in remote places in the Pacific Region, the provision of automatic weather stations and stations for the remote detection of thunderstorm areas ("SFERICS" stations) and the collection of more weather information from merchant ships were recommended. Only minor modifications were proposed in the existing boundaries of flight information regions, but new regions were recommended for Biak, Taipei and Cocos Island. Air traffic advisory services were proposed for a number of routes. The need for close liaison between civil and military authorities to ensure the safety of civil air navigation formed the basis of several other recommendations.

The Second African Indian Ocean Regional Air Navigation Meeting was held in Santa Cruz de Tenerife, Canary Islands, from 17 November to 12 December. Here again, the regional plan prepared at the first meeting for the region (in March—April 1949) was substantially revised. In recognition of the extensive programme of aerodrome development carried out since that meeting, the revised aerodrome plan called for only a limited amount of major construction. The revised air traffic services plan reflected a general tendency to have flight information regions conform to national boundaries and included a new region (Canaries) embracing the Spanish Sahara and the Canary Islands, with its centre at Gando. In the revised search and rescue plan, also, the boundaries of the Search and Rescue (SAR) areas were generally drawn to coincide with national boundaries, as it was considered that the efficiency of search and rescue operations, particularly by ground units, would suffer if the boundaries differed.

At its fourth and final meeting in Paris, from 6 May to 19 June, the Standing Committee on Performance of Aeroplanes prepared a report on the whole of its work. The report contained proposals for new international standards for the performance of aeroplanes, with a detailed explanation of how they were developed. It was hoped that an air navigation conference or a divisional type meeting in 1954 or 1955 would find it possible to endorse the work of the Committee with relatively few changes and make firm proposals for amendments to Annexes 6 (Operation of Aircraft) and 8 (Airworthiness of Aircraft).

Recognizing the administrative burden imposed on contracting States by the frequent amendment of international standards, recommended practices and procedures, the ICAO Assembly directed that amendments should be limited to those significant to the safety, regularity or efficiency of international air navigation and that a programme for their application should be established so that national aeronautical regulations would not require amending more frequently than once a year. Although the resolution referred primarily to amendments to annex material of a regulatory nature, the Council, whenever practicable, has established the same date of applicability for all amendments to international standards, recommended practices and procedures made since its adoption.⁷

The rather unsatisfactory situation in regard to the reporting of differences between national regulations and practices and ICAO Standards, and the consequent lack of positive evidence as to the degree of implementation of the Standards, prompted another Assembly resolution. In this resolution, the Council was directed: (1) to evolve a more effective and simplified programme for determining and notifying reportable differences; (2) to give more emphasis to the monitoring of differences with the object of encouraging the elimination of those that are important for the safety of air navigation or inconsistent with the objectives of the international standards; and (3) in fixing dates for the application of international standards, recommended practices and procedures, to allow sufficient time to enable States to complete their arrangements for implementation. The last directive was taken into account in establishing the dates of applicability of the amendments to annexes and PANS (Procedures for Air Navigation Services) made by the Council during its twentieth session. At the end of the year, means of giving effect to the other two were under study by the Air Navigation Commission.

The programme for the isolation and elimination of serious deficiencies in air navigation facilities and services continued to receive emphasis. The third review of deficiencies in the nine ICAO air navigation regions, with the object of deciding which were the most serious and should be the subject of consultation with the State or States concerned, was completed by the Air Navigation Commission during 1953, and the fourth was begun. The periodic reports submitted by the Secretary-General of ICAO on the progress made in eliminating these deficiencies have revealed that approximately half of the deficiencies listed as serious have been, or were well on the way to being, rectified. Special attention was being directed to those remaining and it was expected that only a few of them would require Council action.

c. AIR TRANSPORT QUESTIONS

The seventh session of the Assembly of ICAO afforded an opportunity for a review of the work done on air transport questions since the last full-scale Assembly in 1950. The Assembly noted with approval the criteria approved by the Council for the selection of subjects for study in the economic field, criteria which emphasized practical problems and the likelihood of producing results of practical use or substantial value to contracting States within a reasonable period. It decided that during the next three years the work of ICAO in the economic field should be concentrated primarily on commercial rights in international air transport and charges for airports and air navigation facilities, with first priority being given to the latter.

One new project was undertaken during the year. On 19 March, the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe adopted a resolution inviting ICAO to convene a conference of European States to consider methods of improving commercial and technical co-operation among the airlines of participating States and the possibility of securing closer co-operation by the exchange of commercial rights among these States. With the approval of the Committee of Ministers, the ICAO Council established a Preparatory Committee of nine Western European States to examine the problems that might be considered by such a conference and to elaborate the broad agenda proposed by the Council of Europe. This Committee met in Paris during the first two weeks of November and drew up a detailed agenda for the conference, including items on the exchange of commercial rights, facilitation and technical problems. After considering the Committee's report, the ICAO Council decided to convene the conference in Strasbourg on 21 April 1954 and to propose for its approval the agenda recommended by the Preparatory Committee.

⁷ Amendment 2 to Annex 2, Amendment 38 to Annex 3, and the amendments to the MET Specifications, PANS-RAC, PANS-HAL, Radiotelephony Procedures and Communication Codes and Abbreviations, mentioned earlier, were all made applicable on 1 September 1954. Amendment 135 to Annex 6 was made applicable on 1 November 1954 because it involved re-equipment. Amendment 14 to Annex 10 was made applicable on 1 May 1954 because it represented a relaxation of existing standards.

In March, the Council reached the conclusion that there was no immediate prospect of progress towards a universal multilateral agreement and that the possible partial solutions that had been suggested had not reached a sufficiently advanced stage to justify action by ICAO. The Assembly endorsed the Council's conclusion on the prospects of achieving a universal multilateral agreement, and requested the Council to keep under review the possibilities of partial solutions and to study any that seemed likely to produce results of practical value.

In the documentation presented to the Assembly, the Council examined the prospects of and methods for further international agreement on the granting of operating rights and privileges to international non-scheduled air transport. It concluded that there was a need for international action to standardize and liberalize governmental regulations relating to international non-scheduled air services if this type of operation was to make its full contribution to civil aviation, and invited an exchange of views at the Assembly on whether a sufficient basis of agreement existed to justify calling a conference on the subject in 1954. The Assembly believed that there was still considerable disagreement among contracting States and that there was little prospect that a meeting in 1954 would be able to make much progress, particularly in view of the difficulties that many States seemed to have with the definition of a "scheduled international air service" adopted by the Council in 1952.⁸ The Council was therefore directed to seek the views of contracting States on the usefulness of the definition and, in addition, information on the difficulties they had experienced in the operation of international non-scheduled services and their suggestions as to the practical steps that might be taken to eliminate or reduce these difficulties.

The second edition of Annex 9 (International Standards and Recommended Practices—Facilitation), incorporating Amendment No. 1, came into force on 1 July 1953. By the end of the year, differences had been notified by eighteen States, but most of them were of a minor character and did not vitiate any of the fundamental concepts on which the Annex is based.

As a result of recommendations made by the second session of the Statistics Division in 1952, revised air transport reporting forms were prepared and issued for use in 1953. Care was taken to ensure comparability between the forms, and the seven new forms were more integrated than the eleven forms they replaced. While eliminating some data not at present considered essential to have filed on a recurrent basis, they provided for the reporting of statistics on two items not previously required—aircraft accidents, and total traffic carried on scheduled services by all airlines registered in each contracting State. The filing of origin-destination statistics was discontinued in 1953, as recommended by the Statistics Division.

The continued efforts of the ICAO secretariat to achieve satisfactory statistical reporting by contracting States, in fulfilment of their obligations under Article 67 of the Convention, have resulted in further improvement in the filing of air transport reporting forms. In 1953, statistics were filed on behalf of sixteen airlines for which no data had previously been submitted, and reports on some others were more complete than hitherto. Basic traffic data reported (e.g. passenger-kilometres performed) now represent 80-85 per cent of the estimated total for international and domestic scheduled operations by all contracting States.

During the year, eight digests of statistics were published on Financial Data 1951 and 1952, Fleet and Personnel 1951 and 1952, Taxes and Subsidies 1951 and 1952, Scheduled Airline Operations to June 1953 and Traffic Flow Statistics for March 1952.

d. JOINT SUPPORT QUESTIONS

In this field, ICAO's work was concerned mainly with the administration of the three North Atlantic joint financing arrangements, the most important development being the failure of the third North Atlantic Ocean Stations Conference to achieve its objective and the consequent decision to convene a fourth conference in February 1954. Two proposals for the international financing of two other facilities—an air traffic co-ordination centre in the Eastern Mediterranean and an upper air station at Tegucigalpa, Honduras—were considered, but did not produce any concrete results.

The third ICAO Conference on North Atlantic Ocean Stations met in Brighton, England, from

8 to 15 July, with representatives in attendance from all signatories to the 1949 Agreement with the exception of Portugal, which had indicated its intention to withdraw from the Agreement, and from Israel and Venezuela. It soon became apparent that, for various reasons, sufficient commitments, either in kind or in cash, to maintain the existing network of ten stations served by 25 vessels could not be obtained from the participants, and the agenda, being limited to administrative and financial questions, did not permit consideration of a reduced network. The Conference was therefore unable to extend or revise the 1949 Agreement, and recommended that another conference be convened at the earliest practicable date, preferably before the end of 1953, to review the whole problem. It also proposed that, in preparation for this conference, all States concerned should be asked to re-examine their positions, particularly in regard to the technical aspects of the network, and to communicate their views to ICAO by 15 October.

In general, the replies received favoured the maintenance of the existing network from the technical point of view, but recognized that other considerations might make some reduction in the number of stations necessary. In the light of this consensus on the part of other participants, the United States, which in October had notified ICAO of its intention to withdraw from the programme when the present Agreement expired (1 June 1954) because the services provided by the ocean stations were no longer required by United States civil aviation, announced in December that it would expect to co-operate in the maintenance of a modified programme if the fourth conference decided that this was the best means of satisfying all the interests involved.

In July, two protocols were signed, modifying the Agreement between the Government of Iceland and the Council of ICAO on air navigation services in Iceland. The first was to permit more rapid amortization of the capital expenditure for the construction of a new transmitter building at Rjupnahaed, since the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development required its loan to Iceland for this purpose to be amortized in a much shorter period than would be possible under the original terms of the financing agreement. The second was to incorporate in the Agreement the arrangement for the financing of the Loran Station at Vik, the Provisional Arrangement concluded in 1947 having been revised in 1952 to bring it into line with that covering the air traffic control, communications and meteorological services in Iceland.

e. LEGAL QUESTIONS

During the year two States—Australia (20 October) and the United Kingdom (22 April)—signed the Convention on Damage Caused by Foreign Aircraft to Third Parties on the Surface, bringing the number of signatories to 20.⁹ The Convention will remain open for signature until it comes into force, i.e., 90 days after the deposit of the fifth instrument of ratification. No State had ratified it by the end of 1953.

On 10 February the Council accepted the two responsibilities placed upon ICAO by the Convention—the responsibility of the Council, on the request of a State, to act as an arbitral tribunal in any dispute over the adequacy of evidence of the financial responsibility of an insurer, and the responsibility of the Secretary-General to communicate with the contracting States on behalf of the organization as depositary of the Convention.

The number of signatories of the Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft remained unchanged at 27.¹⁰ Instruments of ratification (without reservation) were deposited by Brazil (3 July) and Pakistan (19 June) and, in accordance with the Convention, took effect on the 90th day after deposit (1 October and 17 September, respectively).

The revision of the Warsaw Convention, on which a rapporteur and sub-committee of the Legal Committee had been working for some years, was the principal subject on the agenda of the Legal Committee's ninth session. At that meeting, in view of the extensive acceptance of the Convention, the Committee abandoned the idea of a complete redraft and decided instead to draw up a draft protocol containing only such amendments as it deemed necessary to overcome difficulties of a practical or legal nature encountered in the application of certain provisions and to bring the Instruments of ratification have been deposited by the United States (6 September 1949) without reservation, and by Mexico (5 April 1950) and Chile (20 November 1951) with reservations concerning the priority to be granted to fiscal claims and other claims arising out of work contracts or salaries and wages of crew.

Convention into line with economic and political developments during the last quarter of a century. It prepared a draft that it considered suitable for presentation to States as a final draft, and transmitted it, with a covering report, to the Council. Early in November, the Council directed that the draft Protocol and the report should be circulated to all Members of ICAO and non-members, parties to the Warsaw Convention, with a request that comments be submitted within four months. In the light of the comments received, the Council is to decide whether a conference should be convened to consider the Protocol with a view to its approval.

The main amendments embodied in the draft Protocol relate to the limits of liability in respect of death or injury to passengers. The Air Transport Committee, after a detailed study, had recommended that they be raised by 50 per cent i.e. from 125,000 to 187,500 Poincaré francs, and that in the event that it should be decided to retain the limit of liability for death unchanged at 125,000 Poincaré francs, the limit of liability for non-fatal injury should be established at a somewhat higher figure. In the Legal Committee, several proposals for higher increases were made, the highest being 200 per cent, but the Committee finally decided, by majority vote, to propose a limit of 200,000 Poincaré francs, which represented an increase of 60 per cent. No change was proposed in the limits of liability in respect of baggage and cargo, a position according with the views expressed by the Air Transport Committee. For the provision of the Convention making liability unlimited in the case of wilful misconduct ("dol") of the carrier—a provision that has given rise to much difficulty—the Protocol proposed a substitute text making liability unlimited if it is proved that the damage resulted from a deliberate act or omission of the carrier, his servants or agents, done with intent to cause damage, provided that, in the case of a deliberate act or omission of a servant or agent, it is also proved that the individual was acting in the course of his employment.

f. PUBLICATIONS

ICAO publishes complete documentation on its work.¹¹

Public Information material on ICAO available in English, French, and Spanish include: Memorandum on ICAO, a complete summary of the aims, history, and work of the organization and the ICAO Bulletin, a precise account of the activities of the organization with the addition of information of general interest to Contracting States and the aeronautical world.

4. Budget

A budget of $3,259,384 (Canadian) for the calendar year 1953 was approved by the sixth Assembly of ICAO, held in Montreal in June 1952. The seventh Assembly of ICAO approved a budget of $3,200,000 (Canadian) for the calendar year 1954 as follows:

PART I	Meetings	$ 67,000
PART II	Secretariat	2,646,150
PART III	General services	446,850
PART IV	Equipment	36,000
PART V	Other budgetary provisions ..	4,000
		3,200,000
	Less: Casual revenue	469,690
	TOTAL	$2,730,310

In apportioning the expenses of ICAO among Member States, the Assembly takes into consideration their relative capacity to pay, relative interest in international civil aviation and the war damage suffered. It follows the principle that in no case should contributions fall below a minimum or exceed a maximum percentage of the total budget. The sixth Assembly, with the agreement of the States concerned, fixed the scale of contributions for the 1953 budget in units as follows:

Member	Units
Austria ¹²	—
Bolivia, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Jordan, Republic of Korea, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Luxembourg, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Syria ..	2

E. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (Bank)¹

1. Introduction

The Articles of Agreement establishing the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (Bank) were drawn up at the United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference, held at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, in July 1944. The Bank came into existence on 27 December 1945 when its Articles of Agreement were signed by 28 governments in Washington, D. C.²

At the inaugural meeting of the Bank's Board of Governors, held at Savannah, Georgia, in March 1946, the first Executive Directors were elected. The Bank officially began operations in Washington on 25 June 1946. The Agreement³ establishing the relationship between the Bank and the United Nations became effective on 15 November 1947, when it was approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

The Bank was established for the following purposes:⁴

(1) to assist in the reconstruction and development of its Member countries by facilitating the investment of capital for productive purposes, and thereby to promote the long-range growth of international trade and the improvement of standards of living;

(2) to promote private foreign investment by guarantees of and participation in loans and investments made by private investors; and

(3) to make loans for productive purposes out of its own resources or funds borrowed by it when private capital is not available on reasonable terms.

The Bank's first loans were made in 1947 and helped finance the post-war reconstruction of France, the Netherlands, Denmark and Luxembourg. These loans were made before the European Recovery Programme was in operation and they assisted in the earlier phase of reconstruction in these countries. Since 1948, the Bank's financial and technical resources have been devoted primarily to the economic development of its Member countries. Loans have been made for: the development of electric power; transportation—railroads, roads, ports; communications; irrigation and flood control; grain storage; agriculture and forestry; industry; and in support of broad programmes of development covering an entire country or region.

By the end of 1952, the Bank had made 74 loans, totalling $1,524,266,464, for reconstruction and development in 28 countries and territories. These loans were made in Australia, Belgium, Belgian Congo, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Iceland, India, Iraq, Italy, Luxembourg, Mexico, the Netherlands, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Pakistan, Peru, the Union of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, Thailand, Turkey, Uruguay and Yugoslavia.

A loan is made by the Bank only after a thorough investigation of all factors bearing on it. These factors include: the economic and financial condition of the country concerned, with emphasis on foreign exchange earnings from which service on the loan will be made; the technical feasibility of the project or projects to be financed; the ability of the borrower to complete, operate and manage the project, and to raise the local capital to meet local costs; and the urgency and value of the project in relation to the economic needs of the country where the project is located. Proceeds of Bank loans are disbursed when the borrower presents evidence, such as invoices and bills-of-lading, that the funds will be used in accordance with the loan agreement. The Bank also receives periodic reports from its borrowers and sends members of its staff to visit loan projects from time to time to see whether satisfactory progress is being made.

As a normal part of its lending operations, the Bank assists its Members in the preparation and execution of loan projects. In addition, at the request of Member countries, the Bank furnishes a wide variety of technical aid and assistance unrelated to immediate financial operations. The purpose of this assistance is to help Member countries in assessing their own resources, in working out long-range programmes for raising productivity and standards of living, in setting up priorities for projects within these programmes, and in dealing with development problems in particular fields.

The principal way in which the Bank has assisted Member countries in planning their development is through the general survey mission—a group of experts specially organized to make a first-hand study of a country's resources and to formulate recommendations designed to serve as the basis of a long-term development programme. By the end of 1952, the Bank had sent general survey missions to Colombia, Guatemala, Turkey, Cuba, Iraq, Ceylon, Surinam and Jamaica. The reports of these general survey missions had been completed by the end of 1952 and presented to the Governments concerned.

In size and composition, these missions vary according to the needs of the individual country. Usually, they include advisers on public finance and general economics, industry, power transportation, and agriculture. Members of the mission have been recruited internationally: some have been drawn from the Bank's staff; the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) has provided agricultural experts; specialists have been nominated by the World Health Organization (WHO) and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO); and other specialists have come from public and private organizations in various parts of the world.

A similar type of assistance is the special survey mission organized to make a first-hand study of a particular sector of a country's economy and to make recommendations for its development. The Bank and FAO jointly sponsored special agricultural missions sent to Chile and Uruguay in 1951 to study and to make recommendations for the agricultural development of these countries.

In addition to the general and special survey missions, the Bank has rendered assistance by providing staff members and nominating experts to advise on programming development and in working out specific development problems in agriculture, transportation, irrigation and flood control, telecommunications, fishing, textile production, power, fiscal policy, marketing, coal production and banking.

2. Organization

The administrative organization of the Bank consists of a Board of Governors, Executive Directors, a President and a staff.

The Articles of Agreement of the Bank stipulate that all powers of the Bank be vested in the Board of Governors, consisting of one governor and one alternate appointed by each Member country. A new Member may be admitted to the Bank by approval of the Board of Governors, provided that it accepts the conditions laid down by the Board and that it first becomes a Member of the International Monetary Fund.

The Board of Governors meet annually to review the Bank's operations and to adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to the conduct of the Bank's business.

The Board of Governors has delegated most of its powers to the Executive Directors, who are responsible for the conduct of the general operations of the Bank. There are sixteen Executive Directors, each of whom is entitled to appoint an alternate. Normally the Executive Directors meet once a month at the Bank's headquarters in Washington. Five of the Executive Directors are appointed by the five Members having the largest number of shares of stock (United States, United Kingdom, China, France and India), and eleven are elected by the Governors of the remaining Members. Each appointed Executive Director has the same total number of votes as the countries that appointed him, and each elected Executive Director has the same total number of votes as the countries that elected him. The votes of each Executive Director must be cast as a unit.

Decisions of the Bank are made by a majority vote, except where otherwise provided by the Articles of Agreement.

The President of the Bank is selected by the Executive Directors and is the chief executive officer of the Bank. He is ex officio Chairman of the Executive Directors. Subject to their general direction, he is responsible for the conduct of the ordinary business of the Bank and for the organization of its staff. A loan is made after the amount, terms and conditions of the loan have been recommended by the President to the Executive Directors and his recommendations have been approved by them.

3. Activities during 1953

The Board of Governors of the Bank held its eighth annual meeting in Washington, D. C., from 9 to 12 September 1953. Membership increased during the year to 55, with the admission of Haiti on 8 September.

a. LENDING OPERATIONS

During 1953, the Bank made 22 loans, totalling $256,900,000 in thirteen countries, bringing to $1,781,158,464 the total lent by the Bank at the end of the year. A brief description of the loans made in 1953 is given below.

Four loans totalling $32,800,000 were made in Brazil. A $3 million loan was made on 30 April to the Government to help finance a highway construction and maintenance programme essential to the continued development of the important agricultural and industrial State of Rio de Janeiro. On 17 July, a loan of $7.3 million was made to the Centrais Eletricas de Minas Gerais and one of its operating subsidiaries, Companhia de Eletricidade do Alto Rio Grande, and was guaranteed by the Government. It was for financing a new electric power plant in the State of Minas Gerais to increase the State's power supply for manufacturing and mining industries. Two other loans were made on 18 December. The first of $12.5 million to the Government was to help finance imports of passenger train units to maintain the suburban service of the Central do Brasil Railroad in Rio de Janeiro. The second of $10 million, guaranteed by the Government, was made to the Usinas Eletricas do Parana-panema S.A. (USINAS), a corporation owned almost entirely by the State of Sao Paulo, to help finance the import of equipment for construction of a hydro-electric plant and distribution facilities in the States of Sao Paulo and Parana.

On 10 September, $20 million was lent in Chile. The loan, guaranteed by the Chilean Government, was to help finance the construction of a chemical pulp mill and a newsprint paper mill. The joint borrowers were the Cia. Manufacturera de Papeles y Cartones S.A., a privately owned corporation, and the Corporación de Fomento de la Production (Fomento), an agency of the Chilean Government. It is expected that the new plants will eliminate the need to import paper pulp and newsprint and will also produce a surplus of these products for export.

A loan of $14,350,000 was made to Colombia on 10 September to help the Government continue a programme started in 1951 to improve the national highway system and to aid a road maintenance programme being undertaken for the first time in Colombia.

Two loans in European currencies were made to Iceland on 4 September. One, in various European currencies equivalent to $1,350,000, was for financing imported equipment and materials to continue an agricultural development programme started in 1951. The second, of £90,000 ($252,000), was for financing construction of a building to house radio transmitter equipment operated by the Icelandic Post and Telegraph Administration for the safety and convenience of civilian aircraft flying over the North Atlantic.

A $19,500,000 loan was made on 23 January to India for the further development of the Damodar River Valley. This loan was to help finance projects for flood control, expansion of electric power capacity and construction of canals for irrigation and transportation, which are key projects in a general plan for the development of the Damodar Valley.

In Italy, a $10 million loan was made to the Cassa per il Mezzogiorno, a government agency, which is carrying out Italy's plan for the economic and social development of the south. It was to help pay for dollar imports needed because of greater economic activity and employment resulting from the Cassa's development programme.

The Bank made three loans totalling $40,200,000 in Japan on 15 October. The loans, the first made in Japan by the Bank, were made to the Japan Development Bank, a government agency established in 1951 to supply long-term credit for industrial development and economic reconstruction. The Development Bank will re-lend the proceeds of the loans to three private companies: $21,500,000 to the Kansai Electric Power Company, Inc.; $11,200,000 to the Kyushu Electric Power Company, Inc.; and $7,500,000 to the Chubu Electric Power Company, Inc. The loans were to finance the construction of three thermal electric power stations in central and south Japan to increase supplies of power for industrial plants manufacturing metals, machinery, textiles, chemicals and of coal mines and shipyards.

Two loans, totalling $3,950,000, were made to Nicaragua on 4 September: a $3,500,000 loan to help continue a highway construction programme to develop an adequate road system and a $450,000 loan to finance a 3,000 kilowatt generating unit to increase the supply of electric power for the Managua area.

The Bank made its first two loans in Panama on 25 September, totalling $1,490,000. They were made to the Instituto de Fomento Económico (IFE), an autonomous government agency, and were guaranteed by the Panamanian Government. A $1,200,000 loan was for the purchase of tractors, ploughs, harvesters and combines for agricultural machinery pools to be operated by the IFE; these will serve medium-sized farms which are not large enough to justify the purchase of expensive machinery and where agricultural output is low because of lack of equipment. The loan also provides for funds to import agricultural machinery and equipment to be sold to farmers who will retain credits from the IFE and for funds to purchase hand tools for small farms. Another loan of $290,000 was for the import of materials and services needed by IFE to build a 4,000-ton grain storage plant in Panama City. This will provide the first modern plant for drying and storing corn and beans in Panama and, it is expected, will eliminate losses, which have been as high as 30 per cent of the annual production of these crops.

Two loans, totalling $60 million, were made in the Union of South Africa on 28 August. One, of $30 million to the Union Government, was for financing the import of equipment needed to enlarge the transport capacity and to extend the services of South African railways. The other loan, also of $30 million, was made to the Electricity Supply Commission (ESCOM), an autonomous State corporation, to help finance imports needed to increase the power-generating capacity of the Commission by 80 per cent during the period from 1952-1958.

On 10 September, the Bank made a $9 million loan to the Industrial Development Bank of Turkey, a privately owned institution which helps finance the establishment or expansion of private industrial enterprises. The Industrial Development Bank relends funds from the International Bank's loan for projects requiring imports of equipment from abroad.

On 11 March, a loan of $14 million, guaranteed by the United Kingdom, was made to Northern Rhodesia to help finance a three-year development programme, undertaken by the Rhodesia Railways, including the purchase of new equipment and the construction of a new rail connexion to the sea to accommodate the growing international trade of both Northern and Southern Rhodesia.

On 11 February, a Bank loan in ten European currencies, equivalent to $30 million, was made to Yugoslavia to help finance the completion of key projects in seven sectors of the Yugoslav economy: electric power generation and distribution; coal mining; extraction and processing of non-ferrous metals; iron and steel production; other manufacturing industries; forestry and transportation. The loan will be disbursed in the following currencies: Austrian schillings, Belgian francs, British pounds sterling, French francs, German marks, Italian lire, Netherlands guilders, Norwegian kroner, Swedish kronor, and Swiss francs.

b. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

During 1953, the report of a general survey mission to British Guiana was completed and presented to the Governor of the Territory. A general survey mission visited Nigeria from September to December, at the request of the Governments of Nigeria and the United Kingdom; at the end of the year the mission was preparing its report. Requests were received and preparations undertaken for a survey mission to go to Singapore and the Federation of Malaya, and another to Syria early in 1954.

A special report, prepared by a combined working party of Mexican and International Bank economists, entitled The Economic Development of Mexico, was published in May.

The Bank continued to provide advice and assistance to Member countries in various ways. The post of special representative was continued in Nicaragua to assist the Government in carrying out development activities and a representative was stationed in Panama for the same purpose. As an outgrowth of an earlier Bank study and with the assistance of the Banco Nacional of Costa Rica, the Instituto de Fomento Económico was created in Panama early in 1953 by the consolidation of three existing credit institutions. Also, as a result of the earlier Bank study and a joint mission of the Bank and the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration (TAA) to Panama, a TAA expert has been working on the reorganization of the operations of the internal revenue system.

At the request of the Government of Ecuador, the Bank sent a staff member to assist in establishing an organization for the planning and co-ordination of economic development. A specialist, recruited with the Bank's help, assisted the Government of El Salvador in a study of rates for electric power. A Bank expert visited Lebanon in August and submitted to the Government proposals for the establishment of an industrial development bank and for mobilizing local funds for its capital. In response to a joint request by the Governments of Jordan and Syria, a refinery specialist was engaged by the Bank to study the economic implications and investment requirements of an oil refinery to meet the needs of either of the two countries together or one of them alone; his report was presented to the Governments in May. During the summer, the Bank's Director of Marketing visited Pakistan and the Philippines to discuss the development of a government market for bonds.

The Bank assisted a number of Member countries in recruiting experts for assignments related to economic development. These included: Colombia, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Iraq, Nicaragua, Panama and Thailand.

In 1952, the Governments of India and Pakistan, acting on an invitation from the President of the Bank, began to study jointly possible technical measures to increase the supplies of water available from the Indus River system. Early in 1953, the engineers of the two countries, together with engineers of the Bank, visited the area concerned and met in Delhi to exchange information. They met again in Washington in September to begin the preparation of a comprehensive plan for the development of the Indus Basin. These meetings were still in progress at the end of the year.

The Bank provides training each year for a limited number of persons from Member countries who are pursuing careers related to the work of the Bank. This training is designed to enable the participants to become familiar with the organization, functions and operating methods of the Bank and to have the benefit of the Bank's experience in dealing with problems of economic development. The eight trainees in 1953 came from Ceylon, China (Taiwan), the Dominican Republic, Iraq, Nicaragua, Pakistan, the Philippines and Thailand.

In addition, the Bank arranged special training in public finance problems for ten officials from Greece, Japan, Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand and Turkey.

c. RESOURCES OF THE BANK AND MARKETING OPERATIONS

The authorized capital of the Bank is $10,000 million. This capital stock is divided into shares of $100,000 each, purchasable only by Members and transferable only to the Bank. As of 31 December 1953, the total subscribed capital amounted to the equivalent of $9,038,500,000. Of this amount, 20 per cent is paid-in capital which is divided as follows: 2 per cent in gold or United States dollars which is immediately available for lending; and 18 per cent in the currencies of the various Member countries which can be used for lending only with the consent of the particular country. The remaining 80 per cent of subscribed capital is in the nature of a guarantee and may be called only when needed to meet the Bank's own obligations for funds borrowed or on loans guaranteed by it.

To augment its supply of loanable funds, the Bank depends on the sale of its own bonds in the money markets of the world and on the sale to private investors of securities held in its loan portfolio. During the year the Bank sold three issues of its bonds: one issue in the United States amounting to $75 million and two issues in Switzerland in the total amount of Sw. Fr. 100 million (the equivalent of approximately $23.3 million). On 31 December 1953, the Bank's direct obligations outstanding as a result of sale of its own bonds in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom and Switzerland totalled the equivalent of $653.5 million.

Sales of the obligations of the Bank's borrowers continued to increase. During the year, the Bank sold the equivalent of $18,383,130 principal amount of borrowers' obligations, of which $8,398,443 carried the Bank's unconditional guarantee and $9,984,687 were sold without recourse to the Bank. Obligations of 28 borrowers were sold either with or without the Bank's guarantee. Cumulative sales of the securities of borrowers from the Bank's portfolio to 31 December 1953, expressed in United States dollars, amounted to $84,053,038.

During the year there was an encouraging broadening of the market for the Bank's obligations, with more general acceptance of the bonds by large institutional investors in the United States and individual investors in other countries.

1. Introduction

The Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund were drawn up at the United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference held at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, from 1 to 22 July 1944. The Fund came into existence on 27 December 1945 when 29 governments representing 80 per cent of the quotas accepted at Bretton Woods, signed the Articles of Agreement in Washington, D. C.²

The purpose and functions of the Fund, as stated in the Articles of Agreement are, in brief:

to promote international monetary co-operation and the expansion of international trade;

to promote exchange stability, maintain orderly exchange arrangements among Members, and avoid competitive exchange depreciation;

to assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between Members and in the elimination of foreign exchange restrictions which hamper world trade.³

The inaugural meeting of the Fund's Board of Governors opened at Savannah, Georgia, on 8 March 1946 to adopt by-laws, select a headquarters site and elect a Board of Executive Directors. The Fund's Executive Board held its first meeting on 6 May 1946. The Agreement establishing the relationship between the Fund and the United Nations became effective on 15 November 1947,⁴ with its approval by the United Nations General Assembly.

On 18 December 1946, the Fund announced its agreement to the establishment of par values in gold and U. S. dollars for the currencies of 32 Member countries. At the same time, the Fund indicated that these parities might require changes, but that this could be done in an orderly way through Fund procedures. It cautioned that premature revisions in response to abnormal conditions might stimulate further inflation.

In a first annual report, released in September 1947, the Fund saw inflation already undermining some par values. As post-war payments deficits persisted, the Fund in 1948 and 1949 advocated strong governmental efforts to increase exports to dollar markets, urging, in September 1949, that deficit countries should face the risks and difficulties of rate changes.

Up to this time only three countries—France, Colombia and Mexico—had proposed changes in their exchange parities. There began on 18 September 1949 a wave of devaluations that involved within a few months the currencies of 22 Fund Members and eight other countries. In a co-operative procedure, which had not existed prior to the Fund's establishment, the Members' proposals were submitted for approval to the Fund's Executive Board, which discussed them against the background of earlier studies and in the light of their relationship to one another. Some further revisions have taken place in consultation with the Fund as Members have adjusted their exchange systems to changing conditions.

In numerous instances, the Fund has sent missions to confer with individual governments, or, upon request, to extend technical co-operation.

In fulfilling its responsibilities, the Executive Board has been called upon to make decisions on the use of the Fund, and on changes in currency par values, discriminatory exchange restrictions, multiple exchange rates and other problems important to harmonious international monetary relations.

Foreign exchange transactions of the Fund are governed by the relevant provisions of the Articles of Agreement, as applied by the Executive Board.

It was agreed in April 1948 that Members receiving aid from the Economic Cooperation Administration of the United States should request a purchase of U.S. dollars only in exceptional or unforeseen circumstances. The agreement lapsed with the end of the E.C.A. programme in January 1952. At that time, the Fund's currency sales totalled the equivalent of $814,033,000.

At the end of 1952, 22 Member countries had purchased from the Fund a total of $896,908,000. Approximately $851,455,000 of this represented sales of U.S. dollars, $11,408,000 sales of Belgian francs and $34,045,000 sales of British pounds sterling. By the end of 1952, sixteen Members had paid $192,693,000 in gold and U.S. dollars to the Fund in repurchasing amounts of their own currencies.

2. Organization⁵

The Fund consists of a Board of Governors, Executive Directors and a Managing Director and staff.

All powers of the Fund are vested in the Board of Governors, consisting of one Governor and one alternate appointed by each Member. The Board of Governors has delegated most of its powers to the Executive Directors, retaining, as required by article XII, section 2, of the Articles of Agreement, certain specific powers.⁶

Each Member of the Fund has 250 votes plus one additional vote for each $100,000 of its quota.⁷ Each Governor casts as a unit all votes allotted to that Member State which he represents; a quorum of the Board of Governors consists of a majority of the Governors exercising at least two thirds of the total voting power.

Decisions of the Fund are made by a simple majority of the votes cast, except as otherwise provided by the Articles of Agreement.

The Executive Directors, meeting in continuous session, are responsible for the conduct of the general operations of the Fund and exercise powers delegated to them by the Board of Governors.

The Managing Director of the Fund, who may not be a Governor or an Executive Director, is elected by the Executive Directors, and under their direction is responsible for the conduct of the ordinary business of the Fund, and for the organization, appointment and dismissal of its officers and staff. He also serves as Chairman of the Executive Directors, without the right to vote except in the case of a tie.

⁶ For the text of this article, see Y.U.N., 1946-47, pp. 779-81. A list of the reserved powers is also given in Y.U.N., 1950, p. 957.

⁷ For Members, their quotas and voting power, as of 31 December 1953, see p. 776.

3. Resources of the Fund

To carry out its operations, the Fund uses the resources subscribed by its Member Governments. The quotas of those Members which attended the Bretton Woods Conference were fixed by the Articles of Agreement, but may be revised by the Fund. The quotas of other Members are fixed by the Board of Governors at the time of approval of their membership applications. Each of the original Members must pay in gold 25 per cent of its quota or 10 per cent of its net official gold and dollar holdings, whichever is the smaller; the gold contribution of new Members is fixed by the Board of Governors. The balance is paid in the Member's own currency, normally after the establishment of the par value for that currency. Non-negotiable, non-interest-bearing demand notes may be accepted from any Member whose currency is not needed for the Fund's operations in place of that Member's currency.

Total quotas in the Fund, as of 31 December 1953, amounted to $8,731,000,000. The Fund's assets included $1,702,000,000 in gold and $6,230,000,000 in various national currencies, with $1,385,000,000 in U.S. dollars and $225,000,000 in Canadian dollars. Most of the balance in currencies was not yet due from Members whose par values had still to be agreed upon.

4. Activities during 1953

On 8 September 1953, Haiti joined the Fund with a quota of $2 million. This brought the membership of the Fund to 55 countries with total quotas equivalent to $8,738.5 million. The eighth annual meeting of the Fund's Board of Governors was held in Washington from 9 to 12 September.

Transactions of the Fund increased during 1953 to a total of $1,126,448,000 since the Fund began operations in March 1947. Purchases of pounds sterling, which amounted to $129,640,000 in 1953, were higher than the purchases of any other currency from the Fund during the year. In all previous years, the bulk of the Fund's transactions was in U.S. dollars. At the end of the year, 24 Member countries had purchased from the Fund a total of $918,955,000 in U.S. dollars, $191,685,000 in British pounds sterling, $11,408,000 in Belgian francs and $4,400,000 in West German Deutsche Marks. By December 1953, Member countries had paid $360,224,000 to the Fund in gold and U.S. dollars in repurchasing amounts of their own currencies.

During 1953, the Fund continued its work in the field of international consultation and cooperation on the monetary and exchange problems of its Member countries. It conferred on questions of exchange rates, multiple currency practices and exchange restrictions and discrimination, as well as on the use of the Fund's resources. The staff collected and analysed statistical information on international trade and payments and monetary reserves. Training programmes on the work of the Fund, balance of payments techniques and general monetary and economic problems were conducted for staff members of central banks and ministries of finance.

The Fund's Articles of Agreement provide that five years after the date (1 March 1947) when the Fund began operations, and in each year thereafter, any Member still retaining any restrictions inconsistent with the Agreement should consult the Fund as to their further retention. The first series of consultations on the Members' restrictive practices started in March 1952, and a second round of consultations followed.

During 1953, the Fund concurred in the establishment of initial par values for the Austrian schilling, Burmese kyat, West German Deutsche Mark, Japanese yen and Jordanian dinar. Changes were agreed in the par values of Bolivia's boliviano, the Chilean peso and Paraguayan peso. The Fund was also consulted regarding the unification of Greece's exchange rates.

Fund transactions in 1953 consisted of sales of U.S. $2,500,000 to Bolivia; 10,000,000 pounds sterling and U.S. $37,500,000 to Brazil; U.S. $12,500,000 to Chile; U.S. $5,000,000 to Finland; 44,300,000 pounds sterling to Japan; and 2,000,000 pounds sterling, U.S. $10,000,000 and 18,480,000 Deutsche Marks to Turkey—a total of U.S. $294,100,000. The Fund received payments of U.S. dollars during the year in the following repurchases by Members of amounts of their own currencies held by the Fund: Australia, $12,000,000; Brazil, $18,750,000; Finland, $2,000,000; Japan, $61,600,000; the Netherlands, $48,028,947; and Syria, $1,036,000. The total of repurchase payments was $143,414,947.

During December 1953, the Executive Board reviewed certain policy decisions on the use of the Fund's resources. The Board continued in effect, subject to review as circumstances might warrant, its decision of 13 February 1952 that a country's use of foreign exchange drawn from the Fund should be confined to three to five years. The Board also redefined its policy with regard to standby arrangements as follows:

"Standby arrangements will be limited to periods of not more than six months. They can be renewed by a new decision of the Executive Board. If a Member believes that the payments problem it anticipates (for example, in connexion with positive programmes for achieving convertibility) can be adequately provided for only by a standby arrangement of more than six months, the Fund will give sympathetic consideration to a request for a longer standby arrangement in the light of the problems facing the Member and the measures being taken to deal with them. With respect to standby arrangements for periods of more than six months, the Fund and the Member might find it appropriate to reach understandings additional to those set forth in this decision."

In addition to its annual reports, of which there have been eight (1946-53), the Fund has published four annual reports on exchange restrictions (1950-53). Other publications include International financial Statistics, a monthly statistical bulletin, International Financial News Survey (distributed weekly), Staff Papers (published two or three times a year) and a Balance of Payments Yearbook.

G. The World Health Organization (WHO)¹

1. Introduction

The Constitution providing for the establishment of a World Health Organization (WHO)² was adopted on 22 July 1946 by the International Health Conference, called for the purpose by the Economic and Social Council. There were 64 States, the Allied Control Authorities for Germany, Japan and Korea, respectively, and ten international organizations represented at the Conference, which met in New York from 19 June to 22 July 1946.

An Interim Commission, established by the Conference, held its first regular meeting on 23 July 1946 and for almost two years carried out preparatory work for the permanent World Health Organization, at the same time continuing the functions of former intergovernmental health agencies and rendering assistance to individual countries (especially the war-ravaged countries of Europe and the Far East) in the solution of their most urgent health problems.

The permanent World Health Organization came officially into being on 7 April 1948 (now observed annually in most Member countries as World Health Day), when 26 States Members of the United Nations had accepted its Constitution. The Interim Commission continued to function, however, until 31 August 1948, when it was dissolved in accordance with a resolution of the first World Health Assembly. WHO itself assumed the functions and assets of the Interim Commission and began operating on 1 September.

Among the decisions of the first World Health Assembly, held in Geneva from 24 June to 24 July 1948, was the approval, on 10 July, of the Agreement establishing WHO's relationship with the United Nations. This action brought the Agreement into force, since it had previously been approved by the United Nations General Assembly.³

The objective of WHO, as stated in article 1 of its Constitution, is "the attainment by all peoples of the highest possible level of health." Health is defined in the preamble to the Constitution as a "state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity". The functions of the organization necessary to attain this objective are enumerated in article 2 of the Constitution and include:

that WHO should act as the directing and coordinating authority on international health work;

that, on request, it should assist governments in strengthening health services and furnish them with appropriate technical assistance and also with aid in emergencies; that it should maintain the necessary administrative and technical services; and that it should promote the improvement of health in its various aspects, research in the field of health, and the development of health education and information.⁴

In the activities of the Interim Commission and, at first, of WHO itself, particular emphasis was placed on a group of priority subjects which included malaria, tuberculosis, venereal infections, maternal and child health, nutrition and environmental sanitation. Work begun by earlier international health agencies (for example, the League of Nations Health Organization, the Office international d'hygiène publique, and the health services of UNRRA) was continued and, in many instances, considerably expanded.

With the growth of WHO and the application of its fundamental policy of decentralization to meet the differing health needs of different areas throughout the world, there has been a gradual shift in emphasis away from the so-called "priorities" in regard to the direct assistance which WHO renders to Member countries. Its aim has become that of providing for each country that type or those types of assistance which will help that country to take the next appropriate steps in the orderly development of its own medical and health services within the context of prevailing circumstances—cultural, social and economic.

2. Organization⁵

The main organs of WHO, as provided in its Constitution, are the World Health Assembly, the Executive Board and the Secretariat.

The World Health Assembly, in which all Members may be represented, meets annually. It determines the broad policies of the organization, fixes the annual budget, reviews the work already carried out and the details of programmes proposed for the future and instructs the Executive Board.

Among its other functions, the Assembly is empowered to adopt regulations, binding on Members except under certain clearly defined circumstances, with regard to international quarantine and sanitary measures, uniform standards and nomenclatures, and various other questions of international importance in relation to health.

Countries may be admitted to WHO, if they are Members of the United Nations, by formally accepting the Constitution. For other States to become Members, the approval of their membership applications by a simple majority vote of the Health Assembly is required. The Constitution also provides that territories or groups of territories not responsible for the conduct of their international relations may be admitted as Associate Members by the Health Assembly upon application by the appropriate authority.

The Executive Board consists of eighteen technically qualified persons designated by eighteen Member States elected by the Health Assembly. In electing them, the Assembly takes into account an equitable geographical distribution. States entitled to designate members of the Board are elected for a three-year period, and meetings of the Board take place at least twice a year. Its chief function is to implement decisions and policies of the Assembly, but it may also take emergency measures within the functions and financial resources of WHO in order to deal with urgent situations requiring immediate international action.

The Secretariat is headed by the Director-General, who is appointed by the Health Assembly on the nomination of the Executive Board.

There are also a number of panels of experts who may be asked for technical advice by correspondence. From the panels, appropriate specialists are drawn for each session of various expert committees, for which the membership varies according to the agenda of the session. Expert committees on the following subjects were convened during 1953: Alcohol, Biological Standardization, Drugs Liable to Produce Addiction, Environmental Sanitation, Health Education of the Public, the International Pharmacopoeia, Malaria, Onchocerciasis, Poliomyelitis, Public-Health Administration, Rabies, Rheumatic Diseases, Vaccination against Tuberculosis, Venereal Infections and Treponematoses—Sub-Committee on Serology and Laboratory Aspects, Yellow Fever, a joint UNESCO/WHO Expert Committee on the Mentally Subnormal Child, and a Committee on International Quarantine.

The primary functions of WHO headquarters are to co-ordinate, to channel expert advice and opinion to the points where they are needed, and to carry out services (such as epidemiological intelligence or biological standardization) which can only, or most effectively, be performed on a world-wide basis.

Regional Organizations, each consisting of a Regional Committee and a Regional Office, have been established to serve the special needs of six areas throughout the world as delineated by the World Health Assembly.⁶

3. Activities during 1953

During 1953, the membership of the World Health Organization was increased to 84 (81 full Members and three Associate Members) by the addition of Nepal and Yemen as full Members.

The sixth World Health Assembly was held at Geneva from 5 to 22 May. Sessions of the Executive Board took place during January and June.

The shortage of funds for WHO's part of the Expanded Programme of technical assistance in 1953 seriously affected WHO's total programme. In December 1953, there were 121 WHO-assisted projects in operation under the Expanded Programme as compared with 167 at the end of 1952. In 1953, 34 projects were completed and nine new ones started, including those developed with governments as part of the effort to use contributions made in certain non-convertible currencies. WHO recruited 150 experts from 32 countries for service under the Expanded Programme, as against 220 in 1952. In December 1953, altogether 239 experts from 36 countries were engaged in technical assistance projects, as against 247 in 1952. In 1953, 238 fellowships were awarded to candidates from 69 countries and territories, as compared with 369 fellowships in 1952.

A notable undertaking during the year was the survey carried out by the Regional Office for South East Asia at the request of the Government of Burma for a complete reorganization of its Central Health Directorate. The recommendations submitted to the Government were accepted without delay. In the same region, for the first time, a certificated course was organized in public-health nursing.

Generally through all regions, and most particularly in the Americas and the Eastern Mediterranean, integrated health projects (for example in El Salvador, Egypt and Peru) were beginning to have beneficial effects on the development of local health administrations. By demonstrating both the possibility and the value of co-ordination, such projects are stimulating governments to undertake better advance planning of their programmes and are also encouraging countries, in which systems of public-health administration are still at the formative stage, to build up sound and integrated health services.

At the first Asian malaria conference, held in September at Bangkok, representatives of countries of the South East Asia and Western Pacific Regions and of Pakistan considered the problem of merging into a connected whole the existing scattered control zones. The conference also helped to show how WHO could more effectively assist the countries of that part of the world in a malaria control programme covering the entire sub-continent.

The Committee on International Quarantine, which met at Geneva in the autumn, noted with satisfaction that the operative phase of the new comprehensive Sanitary Regulations had been implemented with a surprising absence of difficulties throughout the world, no single international quarantine dispute requiring reference to the Committee having occurred during the year.

WHO's efforts towards the improvement and uniformity of presentation of statistics were advanced by the conference of National Committees on Vital and Health Statistics, held at London with the co-operation of the United Nations.

During the year, WHO continued to direct and assist the programmes for medical relief and health protection of the Palestine refugees in Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and the Gaza area through the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.⁷

a. CONTROL OF COMMUNICABLE DISEASES

(1) Malaria

At the beginning of 1953, malaria control projects were in operation in 20 countries. In the Terai area in India and in Vietnam, WHO personnel was withdrawn during the year and the work handed over to the Governments, which are now developing expanded programmes, and new projects were started in Brunei, the French Cameroons and Liberia. At the close of the year, WHO was assisting in malaria control in 21 countries.

Plans were drawn up for controlling malaria throughout the Philippines. In Lebanon, where the WHO team completed its work at the end of 1953, the Government, with technical advice and assistance in co-ordination from WHO, was extending malaria control to all affected parts of the country.

The Expert Committee on Malaria, which held its fifth session at Istanbul in September, advised that administrations should give careful consideration to discontinuing residual spraying, with proper safeguards, after several years of malaria control. The Committee strongly supported the co-ordination of malaria-control programmes between countries, pointing out that, without such co-ordination, those countries that have eradicated malaria from their own territories would remain exposed to the danger of their neighbours' malaria and would have to maintain active malaria control at least on their borders.

During the year, WHO published a monograph on malaria terminology and encouraged and assisted internationally co-ordinated research on: (1) the susceptibility of anophelines to insecticides, with a view to determining any development of resistance; and (2) the sorption of insecticides on mud walls.

(2) Tuberculosis

In 1953, assistance in starting or extending services for the control of tuberculosis was given to 24 countries, primarily in the tropical or sub-tropical zones. Some 37 projects of two main types were developed: 21 BCG vaccination projects, in which assistance was given jointly with the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF); and sixteen teaching and training centres, in some of which UNICEF also assisted. The main emphasis in WHO projects is on the protection of the healthy people in the community.

In BCG vaccination, WHO is using methods that can be widely applied at relatively small expense and by auxiliary personnel. In the BCG project in India, for example, over ten million children and young adults were tuberculin-tested in 1953, and over four million non-reactors to tuberculin vaccinated by about 65 teams, each consisting of one doctor and six BCG technicians. For this project the total expenditure was about US $350,000 (three and a half cents per person tested and ten cents per person vaccinated), of which US $50,000, or one seventh of the total, came from international assistance.

An Expert Committee on Vaccination against Tuberculosis met early in December. Recent experience and research on different vaccines and their modes of administration were reviewed. In general, the Committee approved the use of BCG vaccine and endorsed the methods and techniques used in the mass vaccination programmes assisted by UNICEF and WHO.

(3) Venereal Diseases and Treponematoses

By the end of the year, a total of over fifteen million persons had been examined and over four million had been treated with penicillin. Four programmes—the yaws-control projects in Haiti and the Philippines and those for controlling endemic syphilis in Yugoslavia and bejel in Iraq—reached the phase of consolidation; the WHO advisers were withdrawn from the bejel project in Iraq, leaving trained national personnel and a strengthened health service to develop the programme further. Progress also continued in the yaws-control projects in India, Indonesia and Thailand. New campaigns against this disease were started during the year in Bechuanaland, Laos and Liberia, and planned in Nigeria. In the last two countries it is estimated that there are a million and a half active cases of yaws.

The mass campaigns have demonstrated that, by a carefully planned and systematically carried out project, infectiousness can be completely suppressed and the incidence of treponemal disease reduced practically to the point of eradication. This is notably true of endemic syphilis in Yugoslavia and of yaws in Haiti. Further, techniques for mass treponematoses control have been developed which can be widely applied at a miniimum cost and with maximum use of lay technicians. The cost per person examined in the mass campaigns has been approximately 25 US cents, and per person treated with penicillin about US $1.50, including personnel, drugs, transport and administration and all other expenditure by health administrations, WHO and UNICEF.

Demonstration, survey and training projects, to assist governments to develop their programmes for the control of venereal diseases, went forward during the year in ten countries. In Egypt and India, such projects were completed, the teams leaving behind them much information on the extent and nature of the venereal-disease problem, a wider appreciation of modern diagnostic and therapeutic procedures, cadres of trained national personnel and strengthened health services.

WHO has organized an international evaluation of new, long-acting diamine penicillin salts for the treatment of syphilis, yaws, bejel and pinta, which may make it possible to simplify therapy in the future.

The International Treponematoses Laboratory Center at Baltimore (United States) continued its investigations into the fundamental biology of the treponemal diseases. The pathological material available in a number of WHO-assisted field projects has permitted the Center to isolate various species and strains of treponemal organisms.

The sub-committee on serology and laboratory aspects of venereal infections and treponematoses held its third session in Copenhagen, Denmark, in the summer of 1953.

Continuing its special interest in venereal-disease control among seafarers, WHO assisted in a port demonstration project in Rotterdam, in which five national study groups completed their work on various aspects of maritime venereal-disease control. Their reports and information which they collected were used as supporting material for an international training course completed during the year, the first of several such courses planned.

Two monographs—a report on the campaign of mass treatment of endemic syphilis in Bosnia and a collection of papers read at the first international symposium on yaws control, held at Bangkok—were published during the year.

(4) Virus and Rickettsial Diseases

WHO's efforts to extend and improve its network of influenza laboratories were greatly assisted by the experience gained during the widespread influenza epidemic in the northern hemisphere in the early part of 1953. Its programme, which had begun with the establishment of this network of centres, had, by 1953, reached a stage at which its scope could be gradually broadened to cover other virus diseases for which international co-ordination research is needed.

As recommended by the Expert Committee on Poliomyelitis, certain laboratories within the network were asked in 1953 to co-operate in work on poliomyelitis. Plans were also under way to encourage selected laboratories to co-operate, either for diagnosis or for research, on other diseases, including smallpox, diseases caused by the lymphogranuloma-psittacosis-trachoma group, diseases caused by viruses found in the stools such as the Coxsackie group, and virus hepatitis.

The Expert Committee on Poliomyelitis held its first session at Rome in September, primarily to consider current views on the essential nature of this disease and the recent advances that have been made, especially in methods of diagnosis and the possibility of prevention. The Committee outlined preventive measures which might help to limit the spread of the infection and reduce the incidence of paralysis. Passive immunization with gamma globulin for specific prevention was held to be of limited public-health value, but much was hoped from the vaccines currently being developed, though it was emphasized that they were still in the experimental stage. The tissue-culture method of cultivating poliomyelitis virus has revolutionized the study of the disease, and the Committee recommended that many more laboratories should undertake this work, as it might eventually be practicable to trace poliomyelitis virus infection in the same way as typhoid infections can now be traced.

The immunity survey undertaken by WHO in order to delineate the southern boundary of the zone in Africa in which yellow fever is endemic was completed during the year. In this survey, some 12,000 samples of human blood were collected in Angola, Bechuanaland, the Belgian Congo, Mozambique, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Southern Rhodesia, Tanganyika and the Union of South Africa, and tested for antibodies to yellow-fever virus by the Virus Research Institute for Medical Research at Johannesburg. The results of the surveys were considered by the Expert Committee on Yellow Fever, which devoted its second session at Kampala (Uganda) in September mainly to delineations required under the International Sanitary Regulations.

Campaigns against Aedes aegypti and other insect vectors of disease were carried out in Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Panama.

The laboratory investigation of four dried smallpox vaccines to determine the rate of loss of potency was continued during the year. Regional committees, panel members and other experts were consulted on technical questions which might influence the conduct of a small-pox campaign such as was envisaged by the sixth World Health Assembly.

The report of the first session of the Expert Committee on Hepatitis, held in 1952, was published. An investigation into the possibility of collecting infectious material from different parts of the world was begun in the hope of finding a strain of virus that could be studied in the laboratory.

A study of typhus in northern India was made with a view to planning control measures. Projects for controlling typhus were continued in Afghanistan and Peru.

WHO consultants carried out a series of important surveys on trachoma in Iran, Morocco (French Zone), Taiwan and Yugoslavia, and a consultant sent to Taiwan also made preliminary surveys in other countries of the Western Pacific Region: Brunei, Cambodia, Hong Kong, Malaya, North Borneo, the Philippines, Sarawak, Singapore and Vietnam. Pilot control projects were started in collaboration with UNICEF. An exchange of research workers was begun between Tunisia, Morocco (French Zone), Japan, Egypt and Iran.

(5) Other Communicable Diseases

With the support of WHO and UNICEF, immunization campaigns were continued in Brazil, Chile, and Colombia, and a campaign against pertussis was started in Mauritius.

Vaccination against the enteric fevers presents a number of unsolved problems, some of which were considered during the technical discussions at the sixth World Health Assembly. A request from the Government of Yugoslavia for assistance in a field trial of typhoid vaccine provided an opportunity for starting work on these problems, and two consultants visited Yugoslavia to plan the field trial, to be carried out in co-operation with the local authorities.

WHO began its work on the control of onchocerciasis by convening the first session of an expert committee in Mexico from 23 November to 1 December. This led to an agreement on standard techniques for surveys of the disease, which would evaluate local problems and assess the results of projects for control.

During the year, WHO assisted the Governments of Burma and Ethiopia with leprosy surveys followed by pilot projects of mass treatment, on the lines recommended by the Expert Committee on Leprosy. At the request of the Governments of Turkey and Thailand, WHO consultants also undertook surveys in those two countries and made recommendations on organization and methods of control. The Executive Board of UNICEF accepted in principle, in 1953, that UNICEF's aid should be extended to large-scale modern methods for leprosy control, to be undertaken in collaboration with WHO.

(6) Veterinary Public Health and Zoonoses

Work on several projects concerned with animal diseases communicable to man was completed and work in food hygiene was extended to include, besides meat, milk and milk products and food additives. WHO carried out several of these activities in close co-operation with the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), and maintained collaboration with the Office international des Epizooties and the permanent committees of the International Veterinary Congress and the International Congress for Microbiology.

The report of the second session of the Joint FAO/WHO Expert Committee on Brucellosis was widely circulated, and has further stimulated the activities of the FAO/WHO brucellosis centres. An additional centre was established during the year at the Indian Veterinary Research Institute, Mukteswar, bringing the total number of centres to thirteen.

WHO collaborated with FAO in the technical aspects of a field trial of various Brucella vaccines to determine their effectiveness on sheep and goats.

The Expert Committee on Rabies held its second session at Rome in September. At this session, the results of several WHO-assisted projects were analysed, and recommendations based on them were formulated. The results obtained in both Israel and Malaya succeeded in bringing the incidence of rabies in these countries to the lowest levels experienced in the past 25 years.

WHO completed its work on the preliminary examination of an international standard Q fever serum for veterinary and medical use. This serum was established as an international standard at the seventh session of the WHO Expert Committee on Biological Standardization. Epidemiological surveys to detect the presence of Q fever were continued in 28 countries. WHO made a small grant to the University of Cambridge to assist in work on producing cheaper antigens for diagnosis. Co-ordination of research into natural reservoirs of the micro-organism was started.

In collaboration with FAO, WHO began a study to determine the importance of extra-human sources of tuberculosis infection in various countries of the Eastern Mediterranean Region, where WHO tuberculosis teams are operating.

WHO sent consultants to Burma, Ceylon, India and Costa Rica, to advise on problems of meat hygiene.

In addition to advising on the zoonoses mentioned above, WHO supplied information to several countries on histoplasmosis, toxoplasmosis, trichinosis and tularaemia. Tularaemia was diagnosed for the first time in Yugoslavia with WHO's assistance.

b. MATERNAL AND CHILD HEALTH

The aim of WHO has been to build up national training programmes in maternal and child health for doctors, nurses, midwives and others concerned with the health of mothers and children in the community. International teams of doctors and nurses have been working with national staff in maternal and child health demonstration centres in 20 countries. Most of the work has been undertaken in collaboration with UNICEF.

In Pakistan, for example, the Government, with international aid, has established four training centres of this type. The first of these, at Lahore, was, by the end of the year, continuing its work under national supervision, the WHO team having been withdrawn after working there for two and a half years.

Projects in environmental sanitation, the control of communicable diseases, the improvement of nutrition, and health education, factors which have great influence on childhood mortality and morbidity have been combined with services for mothers and children, particularly in the health work in rural areas being undertaken in Ceylon, El Salvador, India, Taiwan and Thailand.

During 1953, a WHO consultant visited Japan and the Philippines to advise on the care of premature infants, and a meeting of experts was called jointly by the United Nations, WHO, the International Labour Organisation (ILO) and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) to discuss the mentally sub-normal child.

During the year, WHO, together with the United Nations and the other specialized agencies represented on the Technical Working Group on Long-Range Activities for Children, took part in an assessment of services for children in several countries.

c. ENVIRONMENTAL SANITATION

The organization's environmental sanitation work widened in scope during the year, much of the work being done in collaboration with United Nations agencies and other organizations.

Activities during 1953 included:

(1) The study of sanitation problems of rural areas and small communities.

(2) Preparations for the establishment of international standards of water quality and standard methods of water examination.

(3) Preparatory work, in collaboration with the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), for a manual of sanitation practices at airports.

(4) Susceptibility of lice to insecticides—a study undertaken in close collaboration with Member Governments to develop reliable methods for the control of louse-borne diseases.

(5) The effect of storage under tropical conditions on various water-dispersible insecticides.

(6) Problems of housefly control in the countries of the Eastern Mediterranean.

(7) Participation in preparations for the symposium on insect control, held at Rome in October under the sponsorship of the Regional Office for Europe and the Istituto Superiore di Sanità.

(8) Help in planning and organizing a group-training course, at Rome, on the control of milk quality and on milk processing. This course, planned in detail by the FAO/UNICEF/WHO Inter-Agency Working Group on Milk and Milk Products, was attended by 40 milk officials and milk-plant managers from eleven countries of the European and Eastern Mediterranean Regions.

(9) The training of all kinds of national workers in sanitation. Altogether, in 1953, WHO assisted with 35 projects in which 42 sanitation specialists were working in 37 countries.

d. MENTAL HEALTH

Visiting short-term consultants helped to select the nationals to receive WHO fellowships in this field in Guatemala, Japan, Lebanon, the Sudan and Syria.

There was also an increase in regional seminars on mental-health projects. A South American seminar on alcoholism was held in Argentina; one on the mental-health problems of childhood was held in Australia for countries of the Western Pacific Region; the Lebanese Government acted as host to a WHO seminar on the development of psychiatric services for the Eastern Mediterranean Region; and, in the Netherlands, there was a seminar for European countries on the mental-health aspects of public-health practice.

The following reports were published during the year: the report of the joint United Nations/WHO meeting on the mental-health aspects of adoption; Mental Hygiene in the Nursery School, the report of a meeting of experts held jointly by WHO and UNESCO; the third report of the WHO Expert Committee on Mental Health, and a monograph entitled The African Mind in Health and Disease.

A considerable amount of material was collected on alcoholism, in preparation for a series of national studies. Preliminary work was begun on a study of electrophysiological and psychological changes in children suffering from kwashiorkor, a condition which produces marked psychological retardation at a critical period of a child's development.

e. SOCIAL AND OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH

The second report of the Joint ILO/WHO Committee on Occupational Health was submitted to the Executive Board of WHO and the Governing Body of ILO, and was published.

Plans for assisting Egypt, Finland, Iran, Turkey and Yugoslavia to follow up industrial surveys made in 1952 had to be considerably curtailed during 1953 owing to the financial difficulties. In some cases, there could be no follow-up at all; in others, the projects could be only partially carried out. For the occupational health programme planned for Egypt, for example, it was not possible to do more than provide three fellowships.

With ILO, WHO prepared a draft report on medical criteria for the selection of migrants for ordinary and heavy work and for work requiring special physical ability. In December, the two organizations called a meeting of experts to put the report into final form, for submission to their governing bodies.

WHO continued to collaborate with the United Nations and other specialized agencies on questions of medical rehabilitation. The organization participated in the fourth session of the ad hoc Technical Working Party on the Rehabilitation of the Physically Handicapped, set up by the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination. Projects in medical rehabilitation were continued in India, Japan, Greece and Yugoslavia—the last two jointly with UNICEF, which also provided supplies and equipment for the project for the rehabilitation of physically-handicapped children started in Israel.

WHO began studies of rheumatic diseases with the assistance of the International League against Rheumatism. The Expert Committee on Rheumatic Diseases was convened for the first time at the end of August.

Several countries have asked WHO for assistance on questions of medical care and hospital administration, but the project in Turkey dealing with hospital construction and administration was the only one of its kind to be started with technical assistance funds during the year. The project for reorganizing medical store management in Ceylon continued according to plan; in Peru, the programme of assistance to medical records libraries was completed. A study on rural hospitals as community health centres was undertaken by a WHO consultant, in order to ascertain what medical services are required in rural areas, particularly in under-developed countries, and how they might be provided or improved.

f. NUTRITION

In 1953, WHO participated with FAO in two regional conferences—one at Bandung, Indonesia, attended by delegations from countries of South East Asia, and the other at Caracas, Venezuela, to which countries in both the Western Pacific and the Americas sent delegates. At both regional conferences much interest was shown in the problem of protein malnutrition.

In line with its work in collaboration with UNICEF to improve maternal and child health services (see above) WHO seeks to further the proper feeding of infants and young children. To this end, a consultant with wide experience in paediatric practice in tropical countries visited the Eastern Mediterranean, South East Asia and the Western Pacific Regions and reported on questions relating to infant feeding.

To enable assistance to be given to rural communities in making the best use of available food-stuffs, WHO has undertaken a summary of the existing literature on nutrition problems and dietary customs in different regions of the world. A consultant who had worked in Africa for a number of years compiled a manual on dietary practices and customs in Africa south of the Sahara.

At the request of the Chief Medical Officer of UNRWA an expert from WHO headquarters visited the Eastern Mediterranean Region to survey the state of nutrition of the Arab refugees. This is the third such survey which WHO had made.

g. HEALTH EDUCATION OF THE PUBLIC

The first two regional conferences on this subject to be organized by WHO, in Europe and the Americas, took place during the year.

The European conference was held at London in April, eighteen countries being represented by leaders in medical administration, nursing, health education, general education and the social sciences. Representatives of voluntary health organizations also attended.

The conference for the Americas was held at Mexico City in September. The participants, from eleven countries, represented many fields of work: public-health administration, health education of the public, nursing, environmental sanitation, cultural anthropology, general education, psychology, and teaching of agriculture.

Throughout the year, the organization again provided the services of a full-time lecturer at the University of Malaya in Singapore to assist in developing training courses in health education. Consultants were also appointed to help to start similar courses at the school of public health in Ankara, Turkey. Two Arab-speaking workers in health education were assigned to assist with the maternal and child health programmes in Libya.

WHO continued to co-operate in the fundamental education training programmes in Mexico and Ceylon and assigned an international public-health administrator and a health education specialist to the fundamental education centre for Arab States in Egypt. It also took part in the international seminar in Sicily on visual aids in fundamental education.⁸

With help from short-term consultants, it assisted some Member countries in making plans for the preparation and production of illustrative and audio-visual material and for its use in educational programmes for the general public.

b. NURSING

During the year, WHO assisted the Governments of Burma, Iran, Libya, Pakistan, Syria and Thailand to establish or extend the nursing divisions in their health administrations and to study their countries' immediate and long-term needs for nursing services.

In Burma, India, Malaya, Mexico, Thailand and Turkey, courses, lasting from three to twelve months, were organized for local nurses with the assistance of WHO nursing instructors; in Israel, a WHO nurse-teaching mission gave a six-week course to 137 selected nurses. The medical faculty of the University of Alexandria, with the assistance of WHO, developed plans for a regional college for the preparation of teachers and administrators, to be opened in 1954.

WHO has started to train instructors in certain countries where they are not available locally—Brunei, Ceylon, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Pakistan, Paraguay, Peru, Taiwan and Thailand.

WHO teams assigned to demonstration and training centres in maternal and child health and in the control of tuberculosis and venereal diseases were also helping to train "on-the-job" local nursing personnel for auxiliary services with the centres.

Of the 144 international nurses employed in WHO field programmes during 1953, 54 were working in schools of nursing and 90 in field demonstration and training centres.

In 1953, WHO helped to organize conferences on nursing in the American, European and African Regions. In Rio de Janeiro, 272 nurses from sixteen North, Central and South American countries met to discuss two problems of major concern to them—legislation for nursing and education for nurses. Nursing education was also discussed by representatives from 21 European countries at a conference held in Switzerland in October. This group of 47 nurses from the hospital and public-health services was particularly concerned with methods of co-ordinating those two services, of strengthening team-work and of providing staff education. At the regional nursing conference at Kampala, Uganda, in September and October, the development of nursing education in the African Region was studied by representatives from 20 States and territories.

One of the most acute difficulties encountered by governments in extending and improving their schools of nursing is the lack of qualified teachers and WHO undertook various programmes in 1953 to help meet the immediate shortage. The fellowship programme was widely used to give the experienced nurse an opportunity to train for teaching and administration.

The regional nursing conference at Rio de Janeiro devoted much of its time to the study of nursing legislation. Advice on the drafting of new laws was given to countries in the Americas and in the Eastern Mediterranean Region. On the recommendation of the Expert Committee on Nursing at its second session, a survey was made of recent legislation in 22 countries.

The study of the functions of the "assistante sociale" in France and the "health visitor" in England was completed during the year.

⁸ See under The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, pp. 746-47.

i. EDUCATION AND TRAINING

The First World Conference on Medical Education was held at London in August under the auspices of the World Medical Association with the support and participation of WHO. WHO staff and some members of the Expert Advisory Panel on Professional and Technical Education of Medical and Auxiliary Personnel helped to plan and organize the programme of the Conference and took part in the proceedings.

WHO continued to organize conferences and discussions for the study of regional and national problems of medical education. A European conference on postgraduate training in preventive and social medicine was held at Göteborg in July. In the South East Asia Region, during the visits of WHO's teams of medical scientists to the Universities of Madras and Bombay (India) and of Jakarta (Indonesia), informal discussions on medical education were organized.

WHO has helped to establish advanced training institutions in some countries where they were lacking or insufficient. In other countries, particularly those without facilities for training in medicine, nursing or sanitation, it has helped to prepare long-term plans to increase the nucleus of trained personnel and granted fellowships for undergraduates in medical or related subjects. During the year, 51 such fellowships were given to undergraduates of Bolivia, Ethiopia, Laos, Liberia, Libya and Saudi Arabia.

(1) Fellowships

The number of WHO fellowships, which rose from 199 in 1947 to 1,147 in 1952, was only 894 in 1953. This was partly due to restrictions in funds and also to the fact that those participating in conferences, seminars and similar educational meetings (where no distinction is made between teachers and trainees) are no longer reported as Fellows. The number of persons in this category was 287.

(2) Exchange of Scientific Information

The work of the teams of medical scientists sent to India and Indonesia in 1953 provided a practical demonstration of the principles advocated by the Expert Committee on Professional and Technical Education of Medical and Auxiliary Personnel. These teams were composed of specialists in the basic medical sciences, the clinical disciplines and the public-health specialties. The team normally concludes its work in each centre by holding a conference on medical education, mainly to discuss how the methods it has demonstrated can best be applied to local conditions.

The scientific proceedings of the teams are usually published as a volume by a government agency or professional organization (as in Indonesia); otherwise they are printed in the medical periodicals of the country (as in India). Lectures given by the team that visited Iran in 1951 were published in 1953 in Persian by the University of Teheran.

In February, a group of six professors of ophthalmology, from five countries, went to Cairo, where most of the ophthalmologists of the region were attending the Jubilee Congress of the Ophthalmological Society of Egypt. An advisory group on public-health education and training composed of three professors (in public-health administration, epidemiology and environmental sanitation, respectively) also visited Egypt for a month.

The Regional Office for the Americas started an information bureau on medical education.

j. EPIDEMIOLOGICAL AND STATISTICAL SERVICES

All but six of the active Member States of the organization were by the end of 1953 parties to the International Sanitary Regulations. The position of several overseas and outlying territories with regard to the Regulations remained to be defined. The first year of virtually world-wide application of the Regulations was completed on 1 October 1953.

Matters which required interpretation of the Regulations, or amendments to their text, were considered by the Committee on International Quarantine, which met at Geneva from 19 October to 4 November. The Committee considered the first report of the Director-General on the working of the Regulations and a series of observations submitted by Member States on difficulties experienced in their application, with requests for clarification or amendments. The Committee had the benefit of technical advice given by the expert committees on plague, cholera and yellow fever.

The Committee recommended that the validity of the yellow-fever vaccination certificate should be extended from six to nine years; that no certificate of vaccination against cholera should be required of children under one year; and that, in notifications of rodent plague, "sylvatic rodent plague", which involves little risk to international traffic, should be distinguished from "domestic rodent plague".

k. BIOLOGICAL STANDARDIZATION

A list of the few therapeutic and prophylactic substances for which international standards or reference preparations have been established during the year—aureomycin, bacitracin, cloramphenicol and dihydrostreptomycin—does not give a complete picture of the work done in this field; arrangements were well advanced at the end of the year for the establishment of a number of other standards—those for aluminium-hydroxide adsorbed diphtheria toxoid, purified protein derivative (PPD) of avian tuberculin, thyrotrophin, growth hormone, vitamin B12, dextran sulphate and oxytetracycline.

During the year, an international standard for Q-fever serum was established and an international unit for Q-fever complement-fixing activity is to be defined in terms of a specified weight of this standard. An international unit for anti-Brucella abortus agglutinating activity was defined, in terms of a specified weight of the international standard for anti-Brucella abortus serum established in 1952.

During the year, also, international reference preparations were established for cholera sera and antigens and for cholera vaccines.

l. DRUGS LIABLE TO PRODUCE ADDICTION

The Expert Committee on Drugs Liable to Produce Addiction held its fourth session at Geneva in June. The Committee again discussed the draft of the single convention on narcotic drugs⁹, which is being prepared by the United Nations, and the advice which WHO should give on it to the Commission on Narcotic Drugs.

Co-operation was maintained with the Permanent Central Opium Board and Drug Supervisory Body of the United Nations, and WHO was represented at the eighth session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, held in New York in April.

Other work in this field undertaken by WHO includes compilation of information on the scientific aspects of synthetic drugs and investigations into the effect of khat and its addiction-producing character.

m. PHARMACEUTICAL SPECIFICATIONS AND NOMENCLATURE

In 1953, much work was done towards completing and publishing, in English and French, the text for Volume II of the Pharmacopoea Internationalis. Arrangements were made for a second impression of 1,200 copies of Volume I in French.

The Expert Committee on the International Pharmacopoeia held its twelfth session from 29 June to 4 July and considered comments on the monographs for Volume II which had been requested from members of the expert advisory panel, other experts in various countries and members of other WHO expert panels.

Volume II, with the already published Volume I and the addendum in preparation, will complete the first edition of the Pharmacopoea Internationalis.

The Spanish translation of Volume I, which was undertaken by the WHO Regional Office for the Americas, has been revised by a member of the expert advisory panel. The translation of Volume I into German, under the supervision of another member of the panel, was well advanced by the end of the year.

A list of 299 proposed international non-proprietary names was prepared and published in the October issue of the Chronicle of the World Health Organization.

n. PUBLICATIONS

Who participated in a joint CIOMS/UNESCO/WHO meeting, convened by CIOMS (Council for International Organizations of Medical Sciences) at Geneva from 31 July to 1 August, with the object of reviewing previous attempts to organize medical documentation internationally.

During the year, a loose-leaf Manual of Specifications for Insecticides, CODEPID and the first edition of the World Directory of Medical Schools were published. The Bulletin of the World Health Organization and the Chronicle were issued regularly. An annotated list of "Current Indexing and Abstracting Periodicals in the Medical and Biological Sciences" was issued as a supplement to Library News. This list, containing 179 entries, represents a first step towards making more widely known some of the information and resources available in the WHO library.

WHO was represented at the First International Congress of Medical Librarianship, held in London in July.

4. Budget

The fifth World Health Assembly approved the 1953 budget at $9,832,754, giving an effective working budget of $8,485,095, to be financed by casual income available for 1953, and assessments against active Members.

The sixth World Health Assembly authorized the withdrawal from the Working Capital Fund of the amount required to purchase an annuity of $5,000 for Dr. Brock Chisholm, upon relinquishing his post as Director-General. The reimbursement of the amount to the Working Capital Fund from savings in the 1953 appropriation was also authorized by the sixth World Health Assembly.

⁹ See under Narcotic Drugs.

For 1954, a budget of $9,838,000 was approved by the sixth World Health Assembly under the various appropriation parts and sections. The Director-General was instructed to limit the obligations to be incurred to parts I, II and III of this appropriation, giving an effective working budget of $8,497,700. Details of the appropriation, taking into account certain transfers between sections effected with the concurrence of the Executive Board, are given below:

H. The Universal Postal Union (UPU)¹

1. Introduction

The Postal Union was founded in 1874 by the first International Postal Congress held at Berne, before which international exchanges of mail had been regulated by numerous special agreements concluded between countries or groups of countries.

This first International Postal Treaty, which entered into force in July 1875, considerably changed and simplified the existing state of affairs. It declared that the countries concluding the Treaty formed a single postal territory for the reciprocal exchange of mail between their post offices. This formulation of the aims of the Union remained substantially the same through successive revisions of the Treaty although it was somewhat elaborated by the Stockholm Congress of 1924 and the Paris Congress of 1947. The former added that it was also the aim of the Union "to provide for the organisation and improvement of the various international postal services" and the latter that it was "to promote the development of international collaboration in this sphere". For well-defined classes of mail (such as letters, postcards and printed matter) addressed to any part of the territory of the Postal Union, the Berne Treaty provided that each country was to charge uniform rates and all apportionment of charges between sender and receiver countries was abolished. Freedom of transit was guaranteed throughout the territory of the Union.

A congress of plenipotentiaries of the participating countries was to meet periodically with a view to perfecting the machinery of the Union, introducing necessary improvements and discussing matters of common interest. Thirteen such congresses met up to the end of 1953. These congresses drew up the Acts by which the functions of the Union were determined. These Acts comprise:

(1) a main Convention laying down (a) the statute of the Union and (b) provisions governing the letter-post, which includes letters, postcards, printed matter, literature for the blind, samples, commercial papers, small packets and phonopost articles (for example, phonograph records);

(2) seven accessory agreements covering insured letters and boxes, parcel post, money orders, transfers to and from postal cheque accounts, cash-on-delivery articles, collection orders and subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals. (Special provisions annexed to the main Convention govern the optional transport of letters, etc. by air. Similarly, a supplement to the money order agreement regulates the optional exchange of travellers' orders and a supplement to the postal transfers agreement regulates the postal transfers of sums deposited in postal cheque offices.)

Accession to the main Convention is obligatory for all Members, but accession to the other agreements is optional. The performance of certain special services referred to in the Convention is also limited to arrangements between countries which have agreed to undertake them. The provisions of these Acts of the Union acquire the status of law in each country which ratifies them, and it is therefore the responsibility of each party to the Convention or to one of the agreements to ensure the application of the respective provisions. Each of these Acts is accompanied by executive regulations, which have also been adopted by the Congress but signed by representatives in the name of their respective postal administrations and not, as in the case of the Convention and the Agreements, in their capacity as plenipotentiaries of their governments.

In addition to the congresses, several conferences or committees of representatives of Postal Administrations met, under the Union's auspices, to examine and discuss special technical questions referred to them by congresses or to prepare for congresses.

Provisions for the admission of new Members were eased by the Paris Congress of 1878, which laid down that countries would be admitted to membership at their request without prior consultation among Members being required. The name of the Union was changed from General Postal Union to Universal Postal Union.

On 1 July 1948, the Universal Postal Convention as revised by the Paris Congress in 1947 entered into force. This Congress introduced a new article into the Convention providing that the Union would be brought into relationship with the United Nations in accordance with the terms of an Agreement, the text of which was annexed to the Convention.² As a result of this Agreement, and because of circumstances arising from the Second World War, the article relating to accession to the Convention was modified. Under the new terms, the Swiss Government has been required, since 1 July 1948, to submit each new request for admission to the Members of the Union, and the country concerned is considered admitted only if its request is approved by at least two thirds of the Members constituting the Union.

The Convention was further revised by the 13th Universal Postal Congress held at Brussels from 14 May to 11 July 1952.³ The revised Convention, it was provided, would enter into force on 1 July 1953.

2. Organization

UPU is composed of the Universal Postal Congress, the Executive and Liaison Committee, and the International Bureau of the UPU. Special sessions of the Congress may be called at the request of at least two thirds of the Members of the Union. Committees of a temporary character may be established by the Congress to study particular questions.

The Universal Postal Congress meets at the latest within five years from the date of entry into force of the Acts of the preceding Congress in order to revise these Acts or to complete them, if necessary. Each Member is represented at the Congress by one or more plenipotentiary representatives, who are given the necessary powers by their governments. A Member may also be represented by the delegation of another Member, although no delegation may represent more than one country other than its own. Each Member has one vote in the Congress. Every Congress is convened, after consultation with the International Bureau, by the government of the country in which it is to meet. This government is also responsible for notifying all other Members of the Union of the decisions taken by the Congress.

³ For a summary of the principal changes, see Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 889-90. For text, see Annex II.

The Executive and Liaison Committee is composed of twenty Member States elected by the Congress to function during the period between Congresses. At least half of the members of the Committee must be re-elected at each Congress, but no country can be elected by three successive Congresses. The Committee normally holds one session a year; it meets in principle at Berne, its functions include:

(1) the maintenance of close relations with Members of the Union, with a view to improving the international postal service;

(2) the study of technical questions affecting that service and the transmission of the results of such studies to the Members of the Union;

(3) the establishment and maintenance of working relations with the United Nations, specialized agencies and other international organizations;

(4) the control of activities of the International Bureau.

The Committee elects from among its own members its President and four Vice-Presidents, and appoints, on the recommendation of the Swiss Government, the Director and other top-ranking personnel of the International Bureau.

The International Bureau of the UPU, operating at Berne under the supervision of the Swiss Supervisory Authority, serves as the organ of liaison, information and consultation for Members of the Union. In particular, it:

(1) assembles, publishes and distributes information of all kinds which Administrations have to communicate to one another in order to carry on the various international postal services;

(2) gives opinions, at the request of the interested parties, on questions in dispute;

(3) notifies Members of requests for amendments to the Acts of the Congress and of changes adopted;

(4) makes the necessary preparations for congresses and conferences; and

(5) in general, undertakes studies, consultations and other matters as requested by Members of the Union.

The Bureau also serves Postal Administrations as a clearing house for the settlement of postal accounts, especially those relating to transit payments and reply coupons.

3. Activities during 1953

In 1953, the total number of Members of the Union remained at 93, excluding Germany, which is temporarily prevented by the Brussels Convention of 1952 from exercising its membership under the Convention and the Agreements of the Union.

The Union continued during the year to pursue its aim of assuring the organization and improvement of the various international postal services and of promoting the development of international collaboration in this sphere.

On 9 May, the new building of UPU was officially inaugurated. More than 300 people took part in the ceremony, including representatives of the Swiss authorities, diplomatic missions of the countries of the Union accredited to Berne, the United Nations and some of the specialized agencies, other international organizations and UPU's Executive and Liaison Committee, as well as the Postal Administrations not represented on this Committee. Representatives of the Press, the radio and the cinema were also invited to this celebration which was a memorable event in the history of the organization.⁴ The building cost 1,160,000 Swiss francs.

The Executive and Liaison Committee (ELC), elected by the 1952 Brussels Congress, met at Berne from 4 to 15 May.

Following the death of its President, E. G. Pineux, Director General of the Belgian postal administration, the Committee confirmed the allocation of the presidency to Belgium in designating J. B. L. Lemmens, Mr. Pineux's successor, as the new President.

After approving the report on the work of the International Bureau, the ELC, among other things, discussed the relations with the United Nations and various specialized agencies.

The Committee examined the documentation furnished by the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) on the problem of the variations of basic costs for air transport in relation to returns and asked ICAO to bring up to date the information already given to the 1952 Brussels Congress, accompanying it by an indication of the charges made by the airlines for passengers and goods in 1952 and subsequent years over one hundred routes to be selected by ICAO. A sub-committee was then charged with studying this information.

ICAO informed the Committee that it was pursuing the study requested by the Brussels Congress of the air transport of dangerous goods.

The ELC examined at length certain questions put by the International Air Transport Association (IATA) on the interpretation to be given to the provisions of the Brussels Convention concerning the basic rates for air transport. This problem was further the object of an exchange of views between the President of IATA and the Director of the International Bureau, in the course of which it was suggested, among other things, that a joint ad hoc IATA-UPU committee should study the question and report on it to both organizations.

The Committee also dealt with technical studies and the form to be given to them.

It decided that (1) new monographs should be prepared on: (a) the origin, structure, mechanism and development of postal cheque offices; and (b) organization of social services; (2) that articles should be prepared for publication in the review Union Postale on: (a) automobile post offices; and (b) use of light metal or plastic seals for closing bags for ordinary or registered mail; and (3) that inquiries be made by circular concerning: (a) purification of air in service stations not provided with air conditioning; and (b) occupational maladies of postal employees and preventive measures.

The following sub-committees were established to study particular problems:

1. The Sub-Committee on the Cinema (Australia, Denmark, Italy, Switzerland, United States)
2. Sub-Committee on the Universal Decimal Classification (Italy, Switzerland)
3. Sub-Committee on the Editorial Revision of the Brussels Convention (Airmail Correspondence) (Belgium, Denmark, Egypt, France, Poland, Switzerland)
4. Sub-Committee on the Editorial Revision of the Acts Concerning Money Articles⁵ (Belgium, Denmark, Egypt, France, Poland, Switzerland)
5. Sub-Committee on Post Office Savings Banks (Belgium, France, Italy, Japan)

All these Sub-Committees held one constituent meeting on 12 May.

With the approval of the Executive and Liaison Committee, the position of the personnel of the International Bureau was regularized; it was decided to proceed by stages with the confirmation of the eleven auxiliary officers already in the service of the Bureau for some time, and to nominate four new officers chosen from the nationals of Chile, India, Belgium and Luxembourg. With this, the number of permanent officials of the International Bureau rose from seventeen at the end of 1952 to 32 on 1 January 1954.

Independently of its specialized activities, UPU, through the medium of its International Bureau and in accordance with the terms of article 17 of the Brussels Convention, has served as the organ of liaison, information and consultation of its Member countries. Thus, the Bureau published and sent to the Administrations a total of 321 circulars, sixteen circular letters, 93 bulletins, 14,808,700 international reply coupons and 685,740 postal identity cards.

It also edited, or re-edited, and transmitted to the Administrations records, lists, documents, etc. including the following: the documents of the Congress of Brussels 1952, in three volumes, namely, Volume I—proposals and reports, Volume II—delegations and discussions, Volume III—definitive acts; documents of the Executive and Liaison Committee 1952-1953; report of the work of the International Bureau for the year 1952; equivalents in national currencies of the prices and charges expressed in gold francs in the Convention and the Arrangements; official compilation of information of general interest concerning the execution of the Convention and its Regulations; compilation of information concerning the execution of the Arrangement concerning insured letters and boxes; compilation of information concerning the execution of the Arrangement concerning parcel post; compilation of information concerning the execution of the Arrangements concerning money articles; compilation of information concerning the execution of the Arrangement concerning subscriptions to newspapers and written periodicals; list of kilometeric distances relating to land sectors; compilation of reduced prices; abridged statistics of postal services for 1951; the monthly review Union Postale; and lists of heads and higher officers of the Postal Administrations.

Further, basing itself on a decision of the Congress of Brussels 1952, the International Bureau drew up specimens of the forms of the Convention and the Arrangements which were collected into a new publication called Formulaire de l'UPU, also distributed to the Administrations.

In addition, the International Bureau distributed 2,928 kinds of postage stamps and printed and embossed stamps, comprising 1,958 postage stamps of all kinds, 14 blocks, 909 articles of stamped stationery and 47 printed and embossed stamps, bringing to 1,068,393 the total number of stamps distributed to the Administrations during 1953.

4. Budget

Each Congress fixes the maximum figure for the ordinary annual expense of the International Bureau. These expenses, as well as extraordinary charges resulting from sessions of the Congress, conferences or committees, and the charges which arise from special work entrusted to the Bureau, are met in common by all the Members of the Union. These are divided, for this purpose, into seven classes, of which each contributes to the expenditures in the following proportion:

First class: 25 units, Second class: 20 units, Third class: 15 units, Fourth class: 10 units, Fifth class: 5 units, Sixth class: 3 units, Seventh class: 1 unit.

In case of a new accession to the Convention, the Government of the Swiss Confederation determines, in agreement with the Government of the Member concerned, the class to which it will belong from the point of view of contributing to the expenses of the Bureau.

Having regard to the fact that the Universal Postal Convention of Paris remained in effect until 30 June 1953 and that the new Brussels Convention entered into effect on 1 July 1953, the International Bureau had at its disposal, to cover the ordinary expenses of the Union for the year 1953, a credit of 950,000 gold francs (equivalent to 1,357,143 Swiss francs) corresponding to half the amount authorized annually, on the one hand, by article 18, paragraph 8, of the Paris Convention and by article 183, paragraph 1, of its Regulations and, on the other hand, by article 110, paragraph 1, of the Regulations of the Brussels Convention.

The Swiss Administration supervises the expenses of the International Bureau and advances the necessary funds. These sums must be repaid by the debtor Administrations as quickly as possible and, at the latest, before the end of the year on which the account is rendered. If this time is exceeded, the sums due are charged interest at the rate of 5 per cent per year, from the date of the expiration of the period.

As of 31 December 1953, countries were classified as follows for the apportionment of contributions:

1st class: Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, France, Germany,⁶ India, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Pakistan, Spain, Union of South Africa, USSR, United Kingdom, United States.

Article 5

APPLICATION OF THE CONVENTION TO COLONIES, PROTECTORATES, &c.

1. Any member-Country may declare, either at the time of signature, ratification or application for admission, or later, that its acceptance of the present Convention and where appropriate of the Agreements includes all its Colonies, all its overseas Territories, Protectorates or Territories under suzerainty, mandate or trusteeship, or certain of them only. This declaration, unless made at the time of signature or ratification of the Convention, is to be addressed to the Government of the Swiss Confederation.

2. The Convention will apply only to those Colonies, overseas Territories, Protectorates or Territories under suzerainty, mandate or trusteeship in respect of which declarations have been made under § 1.

3. Any member-Country may at any time address to the Government of the Swiss Confederation a notification designed to cancel the application of the Convention to any Colony, overseas Territory, Protectorate or Territory under suzerainty, mandate or trusteeship on behalf of which that Country has made a declaration under § 1. This notification will take effect one year from the date of its receipt by the Government of the Swiss Confederation.

4. The Government of the Swiss Confederation will communicate to every member-Country a copy of each declaration or notification received under §§ 1 to 3.

5. The provisions of this Article do not apply to any Colony, overseas Territory, Protectorate or Territory under suzerainty, mandate or trusteeship which figures in the preamble to the Convention.

Article 6

JURISDICTION OF THE UNION

The following are considered as belonging to the Universal Postal Union:

- (a) post offices set up by member-Countries in territories not included in the Union;
- (b) other territories which, without being members of the Union, are included in it because from the postal point of view they are subordinate to member-Countries.

Article 7

LANGUAGES

1. The official language of the Universal Postal Union is French.

2. For the debates of Congresses, of Conferences and of their committees, the French, English, Spanish and Russian languages are admitted, by means of a system of interpretation—with or without electronic equipment—the choice of which is left to the judgment of the organisers of the meeting after consultation with the Director of the International Bureau and the member-Countries concerned. The same applies as regards meetings of the Universal Postal Union which are held in the intervals between Congresses.

3. Other languages are likewise admissible for the debates and meetings mentioned in § 2.

4. (a) The cost of installing and maintaining the system of simultaneous interpretation for French, English, Spanish and Russian is borne by the Union;

- (b) the cost of the interpretation services for the same languages is borne by the member-Countries which use English, Spanish or Russian. It is divided into three equal parts each of which is apportioned among the Countries of the group to which they belong in proportion to their contributions to the general expenses of the Union.

5. Delegations using other languages provide for simultaneous interpretation into one of the languages mentioned in § 2, either by the system therein indicated, when the necessary technical modifications can be made, or by individual interpreters.

6. The cost of using other languages, including the cost of any technical alterations, described in § 5 that may be made to the system mentioned in § 2, are apportioned among the member-Countries using those languages on the same basis as in § 4 (b).

7. Postal Administrations may come to an understanding about the language to be used for official correspondence in their relations with one another.

Article 8

EXCEPTIONAL RELATIONS

Administrations which provide a service with territories not included in the Union are bound to act as intermediaries for other Administrations. The provisions of the Convention and its Detailed Regulations apply to these exceptional relations.

Article 9

RESTRICTED UNIONS. SPECIAL AGREEMENTS

1. Member-Countries of the Union, or their postal Administrations if the legislation of the Countries permits, may establish restricted Unions and make special Agreements concerning the international postal service provided always that they do not introduce provisions less favourable to the public than those laid down in the Acts to which they are parties.

2. Restricted Unions may send observers to Congresses, Conferences and meetings of the Union and to the Executive and Liaison Committee.

Article 10

WITHDRAWAL FROM THE UNION

1. Each member-Country is free to withdraw from the Union by notice given through the diplomatic channel to the Government of the Swiss Confederation and by that Government to the Governments of the member-Countries.

2. Withdrawal from the Union becomes effective on the expiry of a period of one year from the day on which the notice is received by the Government of the Swiss Confederation.

CHAPTER II.—ORGANISATION OF THE UNION

CONGRESS

1. Delegates of the Countries of the Union meet in Congress not later than five years after the date of the entry into force of the Acts of the preceding Congress in order to revise or complete those Acts, as required.

2. Each Country arranges for its representation at Congress by one or more plenipotentiary delegates furnished with the necessary powers by their Government. It may, if necessary, arrange for its representation by the delegation of another Country. It is understood, nevertheless, that a delegation may represent only one Country other than its own.

3. In the debates each Country is entitled to one vote only.

4. Each Congress fixes the place of assembly for the next Congress. The Countries of the Union are convened, directly or through the intermediary of a third Country, by the good offices of the Government of the Country in which the Congress is to take place, in agreement with the International Bureau. Article 12

EXTRAORDINARY CONGRESSES

1. An extraordinary Congress may be assembled at the request or with the consent of at least two-thirds of the member-Countries.

4. The representative of each of the member-Countries of the Committee is appointed by the postal Administration of his Country. This representative shall be a qualified official of the postal Administration.

5. The office of Committee member is unpaid. The working expenses of the Committee are borne by the Union.

6. The functions of the Committee are as follows:—

(e) to examine at a Country's request any proposal which that Country forwards to the International Bureau under the provisions of Articles 26 and 27, to prepare observations on it and to charge the International Bureau with annexing these observations to the said proposal before submitting it for approval to the member-Countries of the Union;

(f) within the framework of the Convention and its Detailed Regulations—

(i) to ensure the control of the activities of the International Bureau of which it appoints, when the need arises, and on the proposal of the Government of the Swiss Confederation, the Director and other higher officials;

(ii) to approve, on the proposal of the Director of the International Bureau, the appointments of officials of the 1st and 2nd salary grades after examining the professional qualifications of the candidates sponsored by the Administrations of the Union, taking into account an equitable geographical distribution with respect to continents and language and all other relevant considerations, due regard being had to the Bureau's own internal promotion arrangements;

(iii) to approve the annual report on the Union's activities drawn up by the International Bureau and where appropriate to furnish observations upon it.

Article 16

This expenditure, together with the extraordinary expenses occasioned by the meeting of a Congress, Conference or special Committee and the expenses which may result from special tasks entrusted to the International Bureau, is borne in common by all the Countries of the Union.

2. To this end, these are grouped in 7 classes each contributing to the payment of the expenditure in the following proportion:—

1st class, 25 units	5th class, 5 units
2nd class, 20 units	6th class, 3 units

1. The Convention is the constitutive Act of the Union.

2. The letter post service is regulated by the provisions of the Convention.

3. The other services are regulated by the following Agreements:—

5. Accession by member-Countries to one or more of these Agreements is notified in accordance with the provisions of Article 3, § 2.

1. The Acts adopted by a Congress are ratified as soon as possible by the signatory Countries; the ratifications are communicated to the Government of the Country where the Congress was held and by that Government to the Governments of the signatory Countries.

2. These Acts come into force simultaneously and are current for the same period.

3. As from the date fixed for the entry into force of the Acts adopted by a Congress all the Acts of the previous Congress are rescinded.

4. If one or more of the Countries do not ratify one or other of the Acts signed by them, those Acts shall be none the less valid for the Countries that have ratified them.

Article 24

NATIONAL LEGISLATION

The stipulations of the Convention and the Agreements of the Union and of their Final Protocols do not override the legislation of any Country as regards anything for which they do not expressly provide.

CHAPTER V.—PROPOSALS DESIGNED TO AMEND OR INTERPRET THE ACTS OF THE UNION

Article 25

PRESENTATION OF PROPOSALS

1. In the interval between Congresses, any Administration of a member-Country has the right to address to the other Administrations through the intermediary of the International Bureau proposals relating to the Acts of the Union to which that Country is a party.

2. To be eligible for consideration all proposals presented by an Administration in the interval between Congresses shall be supported by at least two other Administrations. Such proposals lapse when the International Bureau does not receive, at the same time, the necessary number of declarations of support.

Article 26

EXAMINATION OF PROPOSALS

1. Every proposal is subjected to the following procedure:—

A period of two months is allowed to Administrations to examine the proposal circulated by the International Bureau and to forward their observations if any to the Bureau. Amendments are not admitted. The replies are collected by the International Bureau and communicated to Administrations with an invitation to pronounce for or against the proposal. Those that have not notified their vote within a period of two months are considered as abstaining. The periods quoted are reckoned from the date of the International Bureau circulars.

2. If the proposal relates to an Agreement, its Detailed Regulations or their Final Protocols, only the Administrations which are parties to that Agreement may take part in the procedure laid down in § 1.

Article 27

CONDITIONS OF APPROVAL

1. To become effective, a proposal shall obtain—

- (a) the unanimity of the votes if it involves amendment of the provisions of Articles 1 to 46 (Part I), Articles 47, 48, 51, 54, 67, 68, 70 to 73 and 75 to 82 (Part II) and Article 83 (Part III) of the Convention, of any of the Articles of its Final Protocol and of Articles 101, 102, 104, § § 2 to 4, 110, § 1, 114, 115, 117, 131, 166, 170, 177, 181 and 187 of its Detailed Regulations;
- (b) two-thirds of the votes if it involves an amendment of principle of provisions other than those mentioned under (a);
- (c) the majority of the votes if it is a question of—
 - (i) editorial amendments of the provisions of the Convention and its Detailed Regulations other than those mentioned under (a);
 - (ii) an interpretation of the provisions of the Convention, its Final Protocol and its Detailed Regulations, except in the case of a disagreement to be submitted to arbitration as provided for in Article 31.

2. The conditions to be fulfilled for the approval of proposals concerning the Agreements are fixed by the Agreements themselves.

Article 28

PROMULGATION OF DECISIONS

1. Amendments made to the Convention, the Agreements, the Final Protocols and the Annexes to those Acts are sanctioned by a diplomatic declaration which the Government of the Swiss Confederation is charged with preparing and conveying at the request of the International Bureau to the Governments of the member-Countries.

2. Amendments made to the Detailed Regulations and their Final Protocols are recorded and notified to Administrations by the International Bureau. The same applies to the interpretations referred to in Article 27, § 1, (c), (ii).

Article 29

IMPLEMENTATION OF DECISIONS

Any amendment which has been adopted does not take effect until at least three months after its promulgation.

Article 30

The procedure envisaged in Article 27, § 1, (a) applies also to proposals designed to modify the Agreement concluded between the Universal Postal Union and the United Nations to the extent that that Agreement does not lay down conditions for the amendment of the provisions contained in it.

CHAPTER VI.—ARBITRATION

Article 31

ARBITRATION

1. In the event of disagreement between two or more member-Countries as to the interpretation of the Convention and the Agreements or their Detailed Regulations or as to the responsibility imposed on a postal Administration by the application of these Acts, the question at issue is settled by arbitration.

2. To this end, each of the Administrations in the case selects a member of the Union not directly interested in the dispute. When several Administrations make common cause, they count as a single Administration for the purposes of this provision.

3. If one of the Administrations in disagreement does not act on a proposal for arbitration within a period of six months, or nine months in the case of distant Countries, the International Bureau, if requested, calls on the defaulting Administrations to appoint an arbitrator or itself appoints one ex officio.

4. The parties in the case may agree to appoint a single arbitrator which may be the International Bureau.

5. The decision of the arbitrators is taken on an absolute majority of the votes.

6. If the voting is equal the arbitrators select another postal Administration also disinterested in the question at issue to settle the difference. Should they fail to agree on the choice, this Administration is appointed by the International Bureau from among members of the Union not proposed by the arbitrators.

7. If the dispute concerns one of the Agreements, the arbitrators may only be appointed from among the Administrations giving effect to that Agreement.

Items whose weights exceed the maximum limits laid down § 1 may be charged according to their actual weight.

PREPAYMENT OF POSTAGE

1. As a general rule, all the items mentioned in Article 47 are to be fully prepaid by the sender.

2. Unpaid or underpaid items other than letters and single postcards are not forwarded, nor are reply-paid postcards of which the two halves are not fully prepaid at the time of posting.

3. When unpaid or underpaid letters or single postcards are posted in great number, the Administration of the Country of origin is at liberty to return them to the sender.

Article 52

METHODS OF PREPAYING POSTAGE

1. Prepayment of postage is effected either by means of postage stamps printed on or affixed to the items and valid in the Country of origin for the correspondence of private individuals or by means of impressions of postal franking machines officially adopted and working under the immediate control of the Administration or, in the case of printed papers, by means of impressions by a printing press or by any other process when such a system is authorised by the internal regulations of the Administration of origin.

2. The following are considered as duly prepaid: reply postcards bearing postage stamps, printed or affixed, of the Country of issue, items properly prepaid for their first transmission and on which the complementary charge has been paid before their redirection, as well as newspapers or packets of newspapers and periodicals which bear on the address side the indication "Abonnements-poste" and which are sent under the Agreement concerning Subscriptions to Newspapers and Periodicals.

PREPAYMENT OF POSTAGE ON BOARD SHIP

1. In the absence of other arrangements between the Administrations concerned, the postage on correspondence posted on board ship on the high seas may be prepaid by means of the postage stamps and according to the tariff of the Country to which the ship belongs or by which it is maintained.

2. If the posting on board takes place during the stay at one of the two terminal points of the voyage or at any intermediate port of call, prepayment of postage is valid only if it is effected by means of the postage stamps and according to the tariff of the Country in whose waters the ship is lying.

Article 54

CHARGE ON UNPAID OR UNDERPAID CORRESPONDENCE

1. Apart from the exceptions laid down in Article 67, § 6 for registered items and in Article 150, §§ 3, 4 and 5 of the Detailed Regulations for certain classes of redirected items, unpaid or underpaid letters and single postcards are liable to a charge equal to double the amount of the deficient postage, to be paid by the addressees; but that charge may not be less than 5 centimes.

2. The same treatment may be applied in similar circumstances to other items of correspondence which have been incorrectly forwarded to the Country of destination.

Article 55

INTERNATIONAL REPLY COUPONS

1. International reply coupons are placed on sale in the Countries of the Union.

2. Their selling price is fixed by the Administrations concerned; but it may not be less than 32 centimes or the equivalent in the currency of the Country of sale.

3. Each coupon is exchangeable in any Country for a stamp or stamps representing the postage prepayable on an unregistered single-rate letter for abroad from that Country. On presentation of a sufficient number of reply coupons Administrations shall supply the postage stamps necessary for prepaying an unregistered letter weighing not more than 20 grammes for despatch by air.

4. Furthermore, each Country reserves the right to demand that the coupons and the items of correspondence to be prepaid by the exchange of coupons shall be presented at the same time.

Article 56

EXPRESS ITEMS

1. At the sender's request items of correspondence are sent out for delivery to an address by special messenger immediately after arrival in those Countries where the Administration agrees to undertake the service.

2. These items called "express" are subject, in addition to the ordinary postage, to a special charge which may not be less than the amount of postage prepayable on an unregistered single-rate letter and not more than 60 centimes or the amount of the charge applied by the Country of origin in its internal service, if this is higher. This charge is to be fully paid in advance.

3. When the address of the addressee is situated outside the local delivery area of the office of destination, express delivery may give rise to the collection by the Administration of destination of an additional charge not greater than that fixed for items of the same kind in the internal service. Express delivery is, however, not obligatory in this case.

4. Express items on which the total amount of the charges payable in advance has not been prepaid are delivered in the ordinary way unless they have been treated as express by the office of origin. In that case, they are charged in accordance with the provisions of Article 54.

5. Administrations are at liberty to consider themselves bound to make not more than one attempt at express delivery. If that attempt fails, the item may be treated as an ordinary item.

6. If the regulations of the Country of destination permit, addressees may ask the delivery office to deliver to them by express any registered or other items which come to hand for them. In that case the Administration of destination is authorised to collect, at the time of delivery, the charge that applies in its internal service.

Article 57

WITHDRAWAL FROM THE POST. ALTERATION OF ADDRESS

1. The sender of an item of correspondence may have it withdrawn from the post or have its address altered, so long as the item has not been delivered to the addressee, does not happen to fall within the provisions of Article 59, or Customs intervention does not bring to light any irregularity.

2. The request to be made to this effect is forwarded by post or by telegraph at the expense of the sender, who should pay, for each request, a charge not exceeding 40 centimes. If the request is to be forwarded by air or by telegraph, the sender shall pay in addition the air-mail surcharge or the charge for the telegram.

3. Only one of the charges or surcharges prescribed in § 2 is levied in respect of a request for withdrawal from the post or alteration of address concerning several items posted at the same time at the same office by the same sender to the same addressee.

4. A request for simple correction of address (without alteration of the name or status of the addressee) may be addressed directly to the office of destination by the sender, that is to say, without compliance with the formalities and without payment of the charges prescribed in §§ 2 and 3.

REDIRECTION. UNDELIVERABLE ITEMS

1. If an addressee changes his address, items of correspondence are redirected to him forthwith unless the sender has forbidden redirection by means of a note to that effect on the address side in a language known in the Country of destination. Nevertheless, redirection from one Country to another is effected only if the items satisfy the conditions required for the further conveyance.

2. Undeliverable correspondence should be returned forthwith to the Country of origin.

3. The period of retention for correspondence retained at the disposal of the addressees or addressed poste restante is fixed by the regulations of the Country of destination. As a general rule, however, this period must not exceed one month, except in particular cases when the Administration of destination considers it necessary to prolong it up to a maximum of two months. Return to the Country of origin should take place within a shorter period if the sender has requested it by a note on the address side in a language known in the Country of destination.

4. Printed papers of no value are not returned, unless the sender has asked for their return by means of a note on the outside of the item in a language known in the Country of destination. Registered printed papers ought always to be returned.

5. Except as provided in the Detailed Regulations, the redirection of items of correspondence from Country to Country or their return to the Country of origin does not give rise to the collection of any supplementary charge.

6. Redirected or undeliverable correspondence is delivered to the addressees or senders against payment of the charges raised on departure, on arrival, or in course of transmission due to redirection after the first transmission, without prejudice to the payment of Customs duty or other special charges which the Country of destination does not cancel.

7. In the event of redirection to another Country or of non-delivery, the poste restante fee, the Customs clearance fee, the commission fee, the additional express charge and the special fee for delivery of small packets to the addressees are cancelled.

Article 59

PROHIBITIONS

1. The forwarding of the following articles is prohibited:—

- (a) articles which, by their nature or their packing, may expose officials to danger, or soil or damage correspondence;
- (b) articles subject to Customs duty (apart from the exceptions mentioned in Article 60) and samples sent in quantities with the intention of avoiding payment of this duty;
- (c) opium, morphine, cocaine and other narcotics;
- (d) articles of which the importation or the circulation is prohibited in the Country of destination;
- (e) living animals, except—
 - (i) bees, leeches and silkworms;
 - (ii) parasites and destroyers of noxious insects intended for the control of those insects and exchanged between officially recognised institutions;
- (f) explosive, inflammable or dangerous substances;
- (g) obscene or immoral articles.

2. Items containing articles mentioned in § 1 which have been wrongly admitted to the post are dealt with in accordance with the internal legislation of the Country of the Administration establishing their presence.

3. Nevertheless, the articles referred to in § 1, (c), (f) and (g) are in no circumstances forwarded to their destination, delivered to the addressees or returned to origin.

4. In cases where items wrongly admitted to the post are neither returned to origin nor sent on to the addressee, the Administration of origin shall be informed exactly how they have been dealt with.

5. Moreover, every Country reserves the right to deny conveyance to items in transit à découvert over its territory, other than letters and postcards, which do not satisfy the legal requirements governing the conditions of their publication or circulation in that Country. Such items should be returned to the Administration of the Country of origin.

Article 60

ARTICLES SUBJECT TO CUSTOMS DUTY

1. Small packets and printed papers subject to Customs duty are admitted.

2. The same applies to letters and samples of merchandise containing articles subject to Customs duty where the Country of destination has given its consent.

Nevertheless, each Administration has the right to restrict to the registered letter service letters containing articles subject to Customs duty.

3. Consignments of serums and vaccines and also of medicines urgently required and difficult to obtain, which benefit by the exception laid down in Article 136 of the Detailed Regulations, are admitted in every case.

Article 61

CUSTOMS CONTROL

The Administration of the Country of destination is authorised to submit to Customs control the items mentioned in Article 60, and, if necessary, to open them as a matter of course.

Article 62

CUSTOMS CLEARANCE FEE

Items submitted to Customs control in the Country of destination may be subjected on this account to a Customs clearance fee not exceeding 40 centimes per item as a postal charge.

Article 63

CUSTOMS DUTY AND OTHER NON-POSTAL FEES

Administrations are authorised to collect from the addressees of the items the Customs duties and all other non-postal fees which may be due.

Article 64

ITEMS FOR DELIVERY FREE OF CHARGES

1. In the service between those Countries which have notified their agreement to that effect, the senders may by means of a previous declaration at the office of origin undertake to pay the whole of the postal and non-postal charges to which the items are subject on delivery. So long as an item has not been delivered to the addressee the sender may ask, after posting and on payment of a charge not exceeding 40 centimes, that the item be delivered free of charges. If the request is to be forwarded by air or by telegraph, the sender shall pay in addition the appropriate air-mail surcharge or the charge for the telegram.

2. In the cases provided for in § 1, senders shall undertake to pay the amounts which may be claimed by the office of destination and, if necessary, to pay a sufficient deposit.

3. The Administration of destination is authorised to collect a commission fee not exceeding 40 centimes per item. This fee is independent of that prescribed in Article 62.

4. Every Administration has the right to restrict the service of delivery free of charges to registered items.

Article 65

CANCELLATION OF CUSTOMS DUTY AND OTHER NON-POSTAL FEES

Administrations undertake to use their good offices with the appropriate services in their Country with a view to the cancellation of the Customs duty and other non-postal fees on items returned to origin, destroyed because of complete damage of the contents or redirected to a third Country.

Article 66

ENQUIRIES AND REQUESTS FOR INFORMATION

1. Enquiries are entertained within a period of a year from the day after that on which the item was posted.

2. Enquiries initiated by an Administration after that period are in order and must be dealt with, provided only that they relate to items posted less than two years before.

3. Each Administration is bound to accept enquiries and requests for information relating to any item posted in the service of another Administration.

4. Unless the sender has already paid the special fee for an advice of delivery, each enquiry or request for information may be subject to payment of a fee not exceeding 40 centimes. When at the request of the interested party an enquiry or a request for information is to be forwarded by air it is subject to the payment of the same fee plus the appropriate air-mail surcharge or double that surcharge if the reply is to be returned by the same means. If a request is made for transmission by telegraph, the cost of the telegram and, where appropriate, of the reply is collected in addition to the enquiry fee.

5. If the enquiry or request for information relates to several items posted at the same time by the same sender addressed to the same addressee and sent by the same means, only one fee or surcharge is levied. If, however, the matter is one of registered items which were at the sender's request to have been forwarded by different means, a separate fee or surcharge is levied for each of the means used.

6. If an enquiry or request for information has been occasioned by a service error, the fee collected for it is refunded.

CHAPTER II.—REGISTERED ITEMS

Article 67

CHARGES

1. The items of correspondence specified in Article 47 may be sent as registered items.

2. The charge on every registered item shall be paid in advance. It is made up of—

(a) the ordinary postage according to the category of the item;

(b) a fixed registration fee not exceeding 40 centimes.

3. The fixed registration fee on the reply half of a postcard can be validly paid only by the sender of that half.

4. A receipt shall be handed over free of charge to the sender of a registered item at the time of posting.

5. Countries prepared to cover risks arising from causes beyond control are authorised to levy a special charge not exceeding 40 centimes for each registered item.

6. Unpaid or underpaid registered items which have been incorrectly forwarded to the Country of destination are liable to a charge, to be paid by the addressee, equal in amount to the deficient postage.

Article 68

ADVICE OF DELIVERY

1. The sender of a registered item may apply for an advice of delivery on payment at the time of posting of a fixed fee not exceeding 30 centimes. This advice is sent to him by air if he pays the relative charges.

2. An advice of delivery may be applied for after posting within the period of one year and under the conditions laid down in Article 66.

3. When the sender enquires about an advice of delivery which he has not received within a reasonable time, neither a second advice of delivery fee nor the fee of 40 centimes prescribed in Article 66 for enquiries and requests for information is charged.

Article 69

REGISTERED ITEMS FOR DELIVERY TO THE ADDRESSEE IN PERSON

1. In the service between those Administrations which have given their consent registered items of correspondence that are accompanied by an advice of delivery are, at the sender's request, delivered to the addressee in person.

2. Administrations are bound to make two attempts to deliver such items.

RESPONSIBILITY

1. Administrations are answerable for the loss of registered items.

2. The sender is entitled on this account to an indemnity the amount of which is fixed at 25 francs per item.

Article 71

NON-RESPONSIBILITY

Postal Administrations are not responsible—

(i) for the loss of registered items—

(a) in circumstances beyond control. The Country in whose service the loss occurs should decide in the light of its internal legislation whether the loss is due to circumstances attributable to a cause beyond control; these are notified to the Country of origin. Nevertheless responsibility still rests with the despatching Administration if it has undertaken to cover risks arising from causes beyond control (Article 67, § 5);

(b) when they cannot account for items owing to the destruction of official records through a cause beyond control, provided that proof of their responsibility has not been otherwise established;

(c) where it is a question of items whose contents fall within the prohibitions specified in Articles 48, §§ 6 and 8 (c), and 59, § 1;

(d) when the sender has made no enquiry within the period of one year prescribed in Article 66;

(ii) for registered items which they have delivered according either to the conditions laid down for items of the same kind in their internal regulations or to those set out in Article 45, § 3;

(iii) for items confiscated under the internal legislation of the Country of destination.

Article 72

APPORTIONMENT OF RESPONSIBILITY BETWEEN ADMINISTRATIONS

1. Until the contrary is proved, responsibility for the loss of a registered item rests with the Administration which, having received it without comment and being furnished with all the prescribed means of enquiry, cannot prove either delivery to the addressee or, where appropriate, regular transfer to the next Administration.

2. Until the contrary is proved and subject to the provisions of § 3, an intermediate Administration or the Administration of destination is relieved of all responsibility—

(a) when it has observed the provisions of Article 34 of the Convention and Articles 162, § 2, and 163, § 4, of the Detailed Regulations;

(b) when it can prove that it was not informed of the enquiry until after the destruction of the official records relating to the item in question, the period of retention prescribed in Article 119 of the Detailed Regulations having expired; this reservation does not prejudice the rights of the enquirer.

3. If, however, the loss occurs in course of conveyance and it is impossible to establish in which Country's territory or service the loss took place, the Administrations concerned bear the loss equally.

4. When a registered item has been lost in circumstances beyond control, the Administration in whose territory or service the loss occurred is not responsible to the despatching Administration unless the two Countries undertake to cover risks arising out of causes beyond control.

5. The Customs duty and other charges of which it has not been possible to secure cancellation are borne by the Administrations responsible for the loss.

6. An Administration which has paid the indemnity takes over the rights, up to the amount of the indemnity, of the person who has received it in any action which may be taken against the addressee, the sender or third parties.

Article 73

PAYMENT OF INDEMNITY

Subject to its right to make a claim on the Administration which is responsible, the Administration to which the office of posting belongs must pay the indemnity.

Article 74

PERIOD FOR PAYMENT OF THE INDEMNITY

1. The indemnity shall be paid as soon as possible and at the latest within a period of six months from the day following the date of the enquiry.

2. If the Administration of origin does not undertake to cover risks arising out of causes beyond control it may postpone settlement of the indemnity beyond the period prescribed in § 1, when the question whether the loss of the item is due to such causes has not been decided.

3. The Administration of origin is authorised to settle with the sender at the expense of the Administration, whether intermediate or of destination, which duly informed has allowed six months to pass without settling the matter. A longer period is permitted if the loss appears to be due to a cause beyond control; this fact is, in any case, to be communicated to the Administration of origin.

Article 75

REIMBURSEMENT OF THE INDEMNITY TO THE DESPATCHING ADMINISTRATION

1. The Administration which is responsible or on whose account payment is made in accordance with Article 74 is bound to reimburse the despatching Administration for the amount of the indemnity actually paid to the sender, within four months from the date of despatch of the notice of payment.

2. If the indemnity is to be borne by several Administrations in accordance with Article 72, the whole of the indemnity due shall be paid to the despatching Administration within the period mentioned in § 1 by the first Administration which, having duly received the item under enquiry, is unable to prove its regular transfer to the next service. It rests with this Administration to recover from the other Administrations responsible the share falling to each one of them of the indemnity paid to the entitled person.

3. The Administration making payment is reimbursed in accordance with the rules for payment prescribed in Article 41.

4. When responsibility is admitted, as well as in the case provided for in Article 74, § 3, the amount of indemnity may also be recovered as a matter of course from the Country responsible by means of an account, either directly or through the intermediary of an Administration which exchanges accounts regularly with the Administration responsible.

5. The Administration of origin may only claim reimbursement from the Administration responsible within one year from the date of despatch of the notice of payment to the sender.

6. The Administration whose responsibility is duly proved and which has at first declined to pay the indemnity shall assume all additional costs resulting from the unwarranted delay in payment.

7. Administrations may agree to settle periodically for the indemnities which they have paid to the senders and which they have accepted as justified.

Article 76

SUBSEQUENT DISCOVERY OF A REGISTERED ITEM CONSIDERED AS LOST

1. In the event of the subsequent discovery of a registered item or part of the item considered as lost, the sender and the addressee are informed of the fact.

2. The sender is further informed that he may take delivery of it within a period of three months on repayment of the amount of the indemnity received. If by the end of that period the sender has not claimed the item, the addressee is notified that he may take delivery of it within a similar period on payment of the sum paid to the sender.

3. If the sender or the addressee takes delivery of the item after repayment of the amount of the indemnity, that sum is refunded to the Administration or where appropriate the Administrations which bore the loss.

4. If the sender and the addressee refuse to take delivery of the item, it becomes the property of the Administration or where appropriate the Administrations which paid the indemnity.

CHAPTER III.—ALLOCATION OF CHARGES. TRANSIT CHARGES

Article 77

ALLOCATION OF CHARGES

Except where expressly provided by the Convention and the Agreements each Administration retains the whole of the charges which it has collected.

Article 78

TRANSIT CHARGES

1. Subject to the provisions of Article 79, dosed mails exchanged between two Administrations or between two offices of the same Country by means of the services of one or more other Administrations (third party services) are subject, in favour of each of the Countries across whose territory or by whose services they are carried, to the transit charges indicated in the table below. These charges are payable by the Administration of the Country of origin of the mail.

2. In the absence of other arrangements direct sea conveyance between two Countries by the ships of one of them is regarded as a third party service.

3. So far as the payment of transit charges is concerned, missent mails are considered to have followed their normal route.

4. Sea transit begins when the mails are put under the hoist and ends when they have been unloaded on to the quay.

5. It follows from § 3 that Administrations concerned in the conveyance of missent mails are not entitled on that account to demand a payment from the despatching Administration, but the latter remain liable for the appropriate transit charges to the Countries whose services they normally use.

Article 79

EXEMPTION FROM TRANSIT CHARGES

Correspondence exempted from postage under Articles 36 to 38 is exempted from all land or sea transit charges.

Article 80

EXTRAORDINARY SERVICES

The transit charges specified in Article 78 are not applicable to conveyance by extraordinary services specially established or maintained by an Administration at the request of one or more other Administrations. The conditions of this class of conveyance are regulated by mutual consent between the Administrations concerned.

Article 81

ACCOUNTING FOR TRANSIT CHARGES

1. The general accounting for transit charges is based on data from statistical returns taken once in every three years during a period of 14 days. This period is extended to 28 days for mails exchanged less than six times a week by the services of any one Country. The Detailed Regulations fix the incidence of the statistics and the duration of their application.

2. When the annual balance between two Administrations does not exceed 25 francs, the debtor Administration is exempted from any payment.

3. Every Administration is authorised to submit for the consideration of a committee of arbitrators the results of statistics which in its opinion differ too much from reality. The arbitration is arranged as laid down in Article 31.

4. The arbitrators are empowered to fix in a fair and reasonable manner the transit charges proper to be paid.

Article 82

EXCHANGE OF CLOSED MAILS WITH SHIPS OF WAR

1. Closed mails may be exchanged between the post offices of any one of the member-Countries and the commanding officers of naval divisions or ships of war of the same Country stationed abroad or between the commanding officer of one of those naval divisions or of one of those ships of war and the commanding officer of another division or of another ship of the same Country, through the intermediary of the land or sea services of other Countries.

2. Correspondence of every kind enclosed in these mails shall be confined to that addressed to or sent by the officers and crews of the ships to or from which the mails are forwarded; the rates and conditions of despatch applicable to them are fixed, according to its internal regulations, by the postal Administration of the Country to which the ships belong.

3. In the absence of other arrangements, the postal Administration of the Country to which the ships of war belong is accountable to the intermediate Administrations for the transit charges for the mails calculated in accordance with the provisions of Article 78.

PART III.—FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 83

ENTRY INTO FORCE AND DURATION OF THE CONVENTION

The present Convention shall come into force on the 1st of July, 1953, and shall remain in operation for an indefinite period.

In faith whereof, the Plenipotentiaries of the Governments of the above-named Countries have signed the present Convention in a single copy which shall lie in the Archives of the Government of Belgium and of which a copy shall be delivered to each Party.

Done at Brussels, the 11th of July, 1952.

FINAL PROTOCOL TO THE UNIVERSAL POSTAL CONVENTION

At the moment of proceeding to sign the Universal Postal Convention concluded this day the undersigned Plenipotentiaries have agreed the following:—

Article I

EXCEPTION TO THE FREEDOM OF TRANSIT OF SMALL PACKETS

In derogation of the provisions of Article 32 the Postal Administration of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is authorised not to admit small packets in transit through its territories, on the understanding that this restriction is applied without distinction to every Country of the Union.

Article II

EXCEPTION TO FREE POSTAGE FOR LITERATURE FOR THE BLIND

In derogation of the provisions of Articles 38 and 48 those Countries which do not concede free postage to literature for the blind in their internal service have the option of making a charge which must not in any event exceed the one in their internal service.

Article III

EQUIVALENTS. MAXIMUM AND MINIMUM LIMITS

1. Each Country has the option of increasing by 60% or reducing by 20%, at most, the charges prescribed in Article 48, § 1, in accordance with the following table: {See p. 812.}

2. The charges adopted are, as far as possible, to bear the same proportions to one another as the basic charges, each Administration being free to round its charges up or down as the case may be according to the characteristics of its monetary system.

3. The tariff adopted by a Country applies to the charges to be collected on arrival in cases of non-payment or underpayment of postage.

4. Nevertheless Administrations which take advantage of the increase provided for in § 1 may fix the charges to be collected in cases of non-payment or underpayment of postage in accordance with the equivalent of the basic charges indicated in Article 48, § 1, and not with their increased outward charges.

Article IV

EXCEPTIONS TO THE APPLICATION OF THE TARIFF FOR COMMERCIAL PAPERS, PRINTED PAPERS AND SAMPLES OF MERCHANDISE

1. In derogation of the provisions of Article 48 Countries have the right not to apply to commercial papers, printed papers and samples of merchandise the charge fixed for the first weight step, and to maintain for that step the charge of 4 centimes with a minimum of 8 centimes for samples of merchandise. In the case of grouped categories, the charge paid shall be the minimum charge for samples if the item consists of printed papers and samples.

2. Exceptionally, Countries are authorised to bring their international rates for commercial papers, printed papers and samples of merchandise up to those laid down by their internal legislation for similar items in their internal service.

Article V

OUNCE AVOIRDUPOIS

As an exceptional measure, Countries which by reason of their internal regulations are unable to adopt the metric-decimal system of weight, are permitted the right to substitute for it the ounce avoirdupois (28.3465 grammes) taking one ounce as equivalent to 20 grammes for letters and "Phonopost" items and two ounces as equivalent to 50 grammes for commercial papers, printed papers, literature for the blind, samples of merchandise and small packets.

Article VI

SIZE OF LETTERS

Countries which would not be in a position to bring into operation the minimum limits of size of 10 X 7

cms. laid down for letters in Article 48, § 1 (column 5 of the table) are allowed a period of two years dating from the entry into force of the present Convention for applying these limits.

Article VII

POSTING OF CORRESPONDENCE ABROAD

A Country is not bound to forward or deliver to the addressees items which senders resident in its territory post or cause to be posted in a foreign Country with the object of profiting by the lower charges in force there. The rule is applied without distinction both to correspondence made up in the Country where the sender resides and then carried across the frontier and to correspondence made up in a foreign Country. The Administration concerned may either return the items in question to origin or tax them at its internal rates. The method by which the charges are collected is left to its discretion.

Article VIII

INTERNATIONAL REPLY COUPONS

Administrations are permitted not to undertake the sale of international reply coupons or to limit their sale.

Article IX

WITHDRAWAL FROM THE POST. ALTERATION OF

Done at Brussels, the 11th of July, 1952.

DECLARATION MADE AT THE MOMENT OF SIGNATURE
OF THE FINAL PROTOCOL TO THE CONVENTION

At the moment of proceeding to sign the Final Protocol to the Universal Postal Convention, the delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the delegation of the Soviet Socialist Republic of Ukraine and the delegation of the Soviet Socialist Republic of Byelorussia declare:—

1. The delegations of the U.S.S.R., of the S.S.R. of Ukraine and of the S.S.R. of Byelorussia regard as illegal the fact that the XIIIth Universal Postal Congress has accorded to the representatives of the Kuomintang the right to sign the Universal Postal Convention in the name of China.

The delegations of the U.S.S.R., of the S.S.R. of Ukraine and of the S.S.R. of Byelorussia consider that the Central Government of the Chinese People's Republic is the only legal Government representing China and that questions concerning international postal exchanges cannot be equitably resolved without the participation of the Chinese People's Republic which maintains extensive postal services. Consequently, only the representatives of that Government may sign the Universal Postal Convention in the name of China.

2. The delegations of the U.S.S.R., of the S.S.R. of Ukraine and of the S.S.R. of Byelorussia regard as wholly unjustified the fact that the German Democratic Republic and the People's Democratic Republic of Korea, which had fulfilled the conditions of Article XVII of the Final Protocol regarding accession to the Universal Postal Convention of 1947 and should consequently be regarded as parties to that Convention, have without any reason not been allowed to take part in the work of the Congress and to sign the Universal Postal Convention and the documents annexed thereto.

The delegations of the U.S.S.R., of the S.S.R. of Ukraine and of the S.S.R. of Byelorussia also regard as illegal the fact that the Congress has accorded to the representatives of the "Government" of Sig Man Rhee of South Korea the right to sign in the name of Korea inasmuch as they do not represent Korea and are not entitled to sign the Convention in the name of Korea.

3. The delegations of the U.S.S.R., of the S.S.R. of Ukraine and of the S.S.R. of Byelorussia draw attention to the fact that "Allemagne" [Germany] in the Preamble to the Convention and in the Final Protocol is understood to mean the unified Germany with a Government for the whole of Germany.

DECLARATION MADE AT THE MOMENT OF SIGNATURE,
UNDER ARTICLE 5 OF THE CONVENTION CONCERNING
THE APPLICATION OF THE SAID CONVENTION TO COLONIES, PROTECTORATES, &c.

The delegation of Italy declares that its acceptance of the present Convention and of the Agreements relating thereto includes the Territory of Somalia under the trusteeship of Italy.

Brussels, the 11th of July, 1952.

I. The International Telecommunication Union (ITU)¹

1. Introduction

The Convention establishing an International Telegraph Union was signed at Paris on 17 May 1865 by the plenipotentiaries of 20 founding States. In 1885, at Berlin, the first regulations relating to international telephone services were inserted in the Telegraph Regulations annexed to the Convention.

At the first International Radiotelegraph Conference, held at Berlin, 27 States signed the International Radiotelegraph Convention of 3 November 1906 establishing the principle of compulsory inter-communication between vessels at sea and the land.

In 1932, the International Telegraph Convention and the International Radiotelegraph Convention were merged to form the International Telecommunication Convention, which was signed at Madrid on 9 December 1932. Under this Convention, which came into force on 1 January 1934, the International Telecommunication Union replaced the International Telegraph Union.

From the outset, ITU was an agency which, by means of conferences meeting normally every five years (except during the two world wars), revised and kept up to date the basic Convention and the regulations governing international telegraph, telephone and radiocommunications. By means of a permanent secretariat, known as the Bureau of the Union, it circulated information furnished by Member countries as necessary for the smooth functioning of the international telecommunication services, and published a monthly journal. After the Second World War, in view of post-war political changes and of scientific advances, it became necessary to expand the structure of the organization. The Plenipotentiary Conference, held at Atlantic City in 1947, drafted a new Convention,² which was signed in October

1947 by 72 of the 78 States, territories or groups of territories which, according to Annex I of this Convention, can become Members of the Union with full rights upon signature and ratification of or accession to the Convention. The new Convention reorganized the Union and established new permanent organs, including the Administrative Council and the International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB).

The Atlantic City Convention came into effect on 1 January 1949 but certain of its provisions were applied beginning 1 January 1948. This Convention remained in force until the end of 1953.

An Agreement establishing the relationship between ITU and the United Nations was also approved by the Atlantic City Plenipotentiary Conference and later approved, on 15 November 1947, by the United Nations General Assembly. The Agreement, annexed to the revised Convention, came into force on 1 January 1949 at the same time as the Convention.³

The Administrative Radio Conference, held concurrently with the Plenipotentiary Conference at Atlantic City in 1947, established a new table of frequency allocations, allocating the revised frequency bands to the various services, such as fixed, maritime, aeronautical and broadcasting. The Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference, held in Geneva in 1951, examined the work of the various Radio Conferences held since Atlantic City. The outcome was an Agreement signed by 63 Members of the Union—which represents a major step in implementing the new table of frequency allocations.

The International Telegraph and Telephone Regulations, revised at Cairo in 1938, were amended by the International Administrative Telegraph and Telephone Conference, held in Paris from 20 May to 5 August 1949.

The Plenipotentiary Conference of Buenos Aires (1952) revised the Atlantic City Convention of 1947 but made no radical change in the organization of the Union.⁴

The main purpose of ITU is "to maintain and extend international cooperation for the improvement and rational use of telecommunication..." This term is defined in the revised Convention adopted in 1952 as "any transmission, emission and reception of signs, signals, writing images and sounds or intelligence of any nature by wire, radio, visual or other electromagnetic systems." ITU also promotes the development and most efficient operation of technical facilities. It allocates the radio frequency spectrum and registers radio frequency assignments to avoid harmful interference between radio stations of different countries, encourages the establishment of as low rates as possible and promotes the adoption of measures for ensuring safety of life through the co-operation of telecommunication service.⁵

2. Organization⁶

As provided by the Atlantic City Convention, the structure of ITU consists of a Plenipotentiary Conference, Administrative Conferences and the permanent organs of the Union: the Administrative Council, the General Secretariat, the International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB), the International Telegraph Consultative Committee (CCIT), the International Telephone Consultative Committee (CCIF) and the International Radio Consultative Committee (CCIR).⁷

The supreme organ of the Union is the Plenipotentiary Conference, at which all Members and Associate Members of the Union may be represented. It considers the report of the Administrative Council on the activities of the Union; establishes the basis for the ITU budget for a five-year period; approves the accounts; elects the Members whose representatives constitute the Administrative Council; revises the Convention if it considers this necessary; enters into and revises formal agreements with other international bodies; and deals with such telecommunication questions as may be necessary. This Conference normally meets once every five years, at a place and date fixed by the preceding Conference. Each Member has one vote in the Union. Decisions on the admission of a new Member to ITU require a two-thirds majority vote. All other decisions of ITU are taken by a majority vote.

Administrative Conferences, at which all Members and Associate Members may be represented, meet preferably at the same time and place as the Plenipotentiary Conference. The Administrative Telegraph and Telephone Conference and the ⁴ The new Convention entered into force on 1 January 1954.

⁵ For fuller statements on purposes and functions of ITU, see Y.U.N., 1951, p. 943.

⁶ A somewhat fuller description of the organization of ITU is given in Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 894-95.

⁷ The official abbreviations, CCIT, CCIF and CCIR, derive from the French titles of these consultative committees: Comité consultatif international télégraphique, Comité consultatif international téléphonique and Comité consultatif international des radiocommunications.

Administrative Radio Conference revise the Administrative Regulations with which they are respectively concerned. The Administrative Radio Conference, moreover, elects the members of the IFRB and reviews its activities. Extraordinary administrative conferences and regional administrative and special international administrative conferences, to deal with special telecommunications questions, may also be convened.

The Administrative Council is composed of representatives of eighteen Members of the ITU elected by the Plenipotentiary Conference. The Council supervises the Union's administrative functions between sessions of the Plenipotentiary Conference; reviews and approves the annual budget; appoints the Secretary-General of the Union and the two Assistant Secretaries-General; and co-ordinates the work of ITU with that of other international organizations. The Council normally meets at the seat of the Union once a year and at such other times as it thinks necessary, or at the request of six of its Members. The Secretary-General of the Union acts as Secretary of the Administrative Council.

Under the direction of the Secretary-General of ITU, the General Secretariat carries out the secretariat work preparatory to and following conferences of the Union; publishes official documents of the Union and general information and documentation concerning telecommunications; and prepares an annual budget.

The International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB) consists of eleven persons, appointed by as many Members of the ITU elected on a regional basis by the Administrative Radio Conference. Each regular session of the Administrative Radio Conference determines the number of persons of the IFRB. The first persons were elected by the Atlantic City Administrative Radio Conference and were confirmed in their duties by the Plenipotentiary Conference of Buenos Aires, 1952. Members serve, as stated in article 6 of the Convention, not as representatives of their countries, or of a region, but "as custodians of an international public trust." The IFRB records all frequency assignments and furnishes advice to Members and Associate Members of ITU with a view to the operation of the maximum practicable number of radio channels in those portions of the spectrum where harmful interference may occur.

The International Telegraph Consultative Committee (CCIT) studies technical, operating and tariff questions relating to telegraphy and facsimile,⁸ and issues recommendations on them. The International Telephone Consultative Committee (CCIF) has the same duties in relation to telephony. The International Radio Consultative Committee (CCIR) studies and issues recommendations concerning technical and operating questions relating to radio, the solution of which depends principally on considerations of a technical radio character. The work of each consultative committee is reviewed by its Plenary Assembly, which normally meets once every two years. The Plenary Assembly appoints the director of the consultative committee concerned and establishes study groups to deal with particular questions.

3. Activities during 1953

According to article 1 of the Atlantic City Convention, the 72 signatories listed in Annex I to the Convention could become Members of ITU upon ratification of the Convention; the other six countries listed in Annex I, being non-signatories, could become Members upon accession to the Convention. States not listed in Annex I could become Members, by acceding to the Convention, if they were Members of the United Nations or if their applications were approved by two thirds of the Members of ITU.

During 1953, no signatory deposited its instrument of ratification of the Convention. Libya, which was not included in Annex I, became a Member by acceding to the Convention. In addition, Malaya-British Borneo Group and the Trust Territory of Somaliland under Italian Administration became Associate Members.

Certain countries or territories listed in Annex I had not ratified the Convention or acceded to it by the time of the Administrative Council's fifth session. In the interest of the universality of the telecommunication services, the Council resolved that, pending a decision by the forthcoming Plenipotentiary Conference, all countries and territories listed in Annex I, whether Members or not, could participate on equal terms in administrative conferences or consultative committee meetings and in reaching decisions on any questions, with one exception—that only Members, i.e., parties to the Convention by ratification or accession, could vote on the admission of new Members.

The eighth session of the Administrative Council was held from 2 May to 1 June 1953. It was the first ordinary session of the new Council elected by the Buenos Aires Plenipotentiary Conference. The Council elected as new Secretary-General, from 1 January 1954, Dr. Marco Aurelio Andrada, Secretary-General of Argentine PTT. It decided, with the assent of the Union Members, that the Administrative Telegraph and Telephone Conference would not be held in 1954, and that the question of the next meeting of that Conference and also of the Administrative Radio Conference would be considered at its ninth session. Among other questions considered were the question of traffic to be routed over the aeronautical telecommunication network, the question of bringing into service the frequency bands allocated to ship radiotelegraph stations in the Atlantic City Radio Regulations, and the question of preparation by the IFRB of draft high-frequency broadcasting plans.

⁸As defined in the Radio Regulations, art. 1, 10, facsimile is a "system of telecommunication for the transmission of fixed images with a view to their reception in a permanent form."

The Council reclassified a series of posts in the various organs and decided that the Union should be affiliated to the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation (ILO). It also drew up the budgets of 1953 and 1954, and reviewed the activities of the permanent organs of ITU and its relations with the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other international organizations.

a. INTERNATIONAL CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEES

(1) International Telegraph Consultative Committee (CCIT)

The CCIT VIIth Plenary Assembly met at Arnhem, Netherlands, from 26 May to 13 June. Thirty Administrations were represented. The most important results obtained were as follows:

- drafting of basic definitions in connexion with telegraph transmission and distortion;
- standardization of 24-frequency voice-frequency telegraphy;
- standardization of regenerative repeaters;
- protection of voice-frequency telegraph channels;
- standardization of the minimum duration of the stop element in start-stop signals;
- international telex signalling;
- improvement in the lay-out of statistics showing telegram transmission times;
- new rates for phototelegrams;
- drawing up of telex statistics;
- preparation of diagrammatic symbols for telegraphy.

Among the major questions set for study or still under study at the end of the year were:

- standardization of frequency modulation in voice-frequency telegraphy;
- protection of telegraph channels against disturbances;
- procedure for signalling and detective breakdowns;
- use of figure-shift 32 in Alphabet No. 2;
- interwork of synchronous and start-stop systems;
- standardization of facsimile devices for documents;

- telegraphy definitions and vocabulary;
- public switching network;
- unification of service codes;
- reform of telegraph statistics;
- study of metering;
- transit circuits for public correspondence;
- telex rates and circuit rentals; and
- improvement in telex facilities.

For the study of these questions the VIIth Plenary Assembly set up ten Study Groups on: General Telegraphy, Transmission, Apparatus, Phototelegraphy, Vocabulary, Switching, European Network, Operations, Tariffs and Telex. The Chairmen of these Study Groups are officials from the Administrations of the following countries: Italy, Netherlands, France, United Kingdom, France, United Kingdom, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, Netherlands.

In accordance with a resolution adopted at the Buenos Aires Plenipotentiary Conference, one of the items on the agenda of the VIIth Plenary Assembly of CCIT was the detailed study of the advisability of amalgamating the CCIT and the CCIF and the drawing up of a recommendation on that point for the next Administrative Telegraph and Telephone Conference. The Plenary Assembly, by 16 votes to 11, adopted a resolution which stated that amalgamation was not in the best interests of the Union but laid down the precautions to be taken with a view to safeguarding telegraphy interests if, despite the opinion of the CCIT, such amalgamation were decided on.

(2) International Telephone Consultative Committee (CCIF)

During 1953, Study Groups met on two different occasions to prepare draft recommendations for discussion at the XVIIth Plenary Assembly of the CCIF, to be held at Geneva in October 1954.

(a) Study Groups on operation and tariffs: Study Groups 6 and 7 met at Geneva from 12 to 21 March and gave particular attention to the following points:

- operation and tariffs for inter-continental radio-telephone services (priority, report charge, compensation charge);
- use of circuits for broadcast relays: conditions for the lease of special circuits for music transmission, and need for an auxiliary control circuit during a broadcast relay;
- use by third parties of leased telephone circuits.

The Sub-Group on Rapid Operating Methods met at Geneva from 9 to 11 March 1953, and considered tables for the calculation of semi-automatic telephone circuit groups, together with the routing of automatic telephone calls over secondary routes.

(b) Technical Study Groups: Study Group 1 met at Geneva from 3 to 11 November and considered, among other things:

danger to telecommunication staff from electric induction between neighbouring power lines and telecommunication lines; devices to protect telecommunication staff and equipment in case of faults in neighbouring power lines; devices for the protection of telephone operators and subscribers against acoustic shocks; regulations to ensure the safety of workmen engaged on the maintenance of telephone lines;

definition of high-reliability power lines capable of being brought into closer proximity to telecommunication lines than currently possible.

Study Group 2 met at Geneva from 12 to 18 November and considered, among other things:

use of organic material for cable sheaths;

use of new methods for detection and localization of faults in cable sheaths by means of radio-active tracer gas introduced under pressure into one end of the cable, its progress being followed at ground level by means of a Geiger counter.

Study Group 3 met from 12 to 31 October and studied a great many questions in connexion with the specifications of international circuits for transmission of telephone calls, transmission of telegrams or phototelegrams, or relay of broadcast and television transmissions by metallic line. These studies were made in conjunction with the CCIT, the CCIR, the European Broadcasting Union (EBU), and the International Broadcasting Organization (IBO).

The Permanent Maintenance Sub-Committee met at Geneva from 30 September to 7 October and drew up a programme for the periodical maintenance of European international circuits during 1954, which shows certain agreed dates for each circuit when the control stations and sub-control stations in the various countries involved are to co-operate in making electrical measurements on several frequencies, to ensure that the circuit is operating properly.

Study Group 4 met at Geneva from 1 to 8 October and devoted most of its attention to a new standard of telephone transmission performance, namely, the articulation reference equivalent (AEN), which is a more reliable indication of the quality of speech received than the old 'reference equivalent' criterion, which merely assessed its volume.

Study Group 5 met at Geneva from 8 to 10 October and studied the co-ordination of radio and metallic-line telephony in the international service, with particular reference to the incorporation in the general telephone network of radio relay links, i.e., radio equipment relaying speech, music, or pictures from one hill to another.

Study Group 8 met at Geneva from 26 to 31 October and considered various matters connected with international switching in semi-automatic operation, especially mutual interference between national signalling systems, through the international circuit. It also considered the influence of line conditions on the operation of signal receivers and apparatus for signal measurement.

The Study Group for field trials of semi-automatic international telephone operation likewise met at Geneva in October to consider the first series of results obtained from semi-automatic field trials in Europe which were made on 80 international circuits in Western Europe and Scandinavia. The trials were very closely followed by a permanent working group which meets in each of the centres of the international semi-automatic field trial network. For instance, it met at The Hague (Netherlands) in June, at Paris (France) in October, and in 1954 was scheduled to meet at London (United Kingdom), Brussels (Belgium), and Zurich (Switzerland). Its task is to settle any difficulties that may arise during the trials, take note of all the faults recorded and of operating statistics, and undertake detailed studies on questions such as the price of equipment for the two signalling systems under comparison with a view to a final choice by the CCIF XVIIth Plenary Assembly at Geneva in October 1954.

The Sub-Committee for the Middle East and South Asia (which comes under the CCIF Joint Committee for the General Trunk Switching Programme) met at Lahore (Pakistan) from 1 to 14 December. It drew up a list of all telecommunication requirements for countries in the Middle East and Southern Asia, not only as regards public telegraphy and telephony, but also for civil aviation and meteorology. The telecommunication Administrations of these countries, together with the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) and the World Meteorological Organization (WMO), were first consulted, and, as a result, it was possible to prepare maps showing the existing means of telecommunication which might be used to carry international traffic, and to assess how much additional traffic there will be for which new telecommunication arteries must be laid down or for which, at any rate, the capacity of existing arteries will have to be substantially increased by the use of modern multiplex carrier transmission systems. At the Lahore meeting consideration was given to the possibility of using various systems (open overhead wires, underground cables, submarine cables, radio relay links) for the new arteries, in the light of local characteristics.

(3) International Radio Consultative Committee (CCIR)

The activities of the CCIR in 1953 were almost exclusively devoted to its VIIth Plenary Assembly, which took place at London from 3 September to 7 October, and to the preparation for this Assembly. The London Assembly considered a wide field of technical subjects relating to radio communication, ranging from matters concerning the safety of human life at sea, to the recording of television pictures. On these many subjects it drew up 58 recommendations, 22 reports and ten resolutions, while it set 39 questions and 40 study programmes for study by its fourteen study groups. Among the subjects studied was that of the propagation of radio waves in a very wide sense, taking into account such influences as the soil, troposphere, ionosphere, sunspot activity. The international use of wide band radio relay systems on metric, decimetric and centimetric wavelengths was also discussed, as well as questions concerning broadcasting, with special attention to tropical regions.⁹

The general interest in the work of the CCIR may be seen from the fact that the VIIth Plenary Assembly of the CCIR was attended by some 350 representatives from 40 countries throughout the world, who presented some 500 papers on various radio technical subjects. The CCIR, in London, accepted the invitation of the Polish Administration to hold its VIIIth Plenary Assembly at Warsaw in 1956.

b. INTERNATIONAL FREQUENCY REGISTRATION BOARD (IFRB)

Among the duties assigned to the IFRB in the Atlantic City Convention and Radio Regulations and in the Agreement of the Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference (EARC) held at Geneva in 1951 were the establishment and maintenance of the Master Radio Frequency Record and the Supplementary Information to the Record, which together form a compendium of the radio communications of the entire world. Although the first edition of this compendium was published late in 1952,¹⁰ the continual development of the use of radio frequencies requires that the Record be kept up to date, and consequently its maintenance remains a part of the Board's work, which developed to a considerable degree.

Since 1952, there has been a gradual transition from the initial task of establishing the Record to the continuing tasks of maintaining it and of assisting the Administrations of Members towards the bringing into force of the Atlantic City Table of Frequency Allocations.

Both these tasks call for the application of technical examinations of frequency assignments, to assess whether their operation will be likely to interfere with the operation of other assignments already in service or to be brought into use in accordance with plans adopted by the EARC, or to determine whether the later assignments comply with the technical provisions of the plans. In all, some tens of thousands of individual assignments have undergone technical examination in the course of the year.

As a result of a consultation of Administrations and a study by the IFRB as to the possibility of ensuring that the frequency bands concerned should be made available, the ship radiotelegraph calling frequency bands and the 22 Mc/s ship radiotelegraph working bands were brought into use by ship stations on 1 September 1953. This marked the first stage in the implementation of the plans adopted by the EARC for the Maritime Mobile Service. Studies and consultations with Administrations in relation to the bringing into force, in 1954, of the working bands allocated to cargo ship radiotelegraph stations were in train at the end of 1953.

Under the global plan adopted by the EARC for the Aeronautical Mobile "R" Service (i.e., for communications with civil aircraft flying along national or international air routes), the world is divided into a number of areas. A series of frequencies, capable of enabling aircraft in flight in these areas to communicate by radiotelegraphy or radiotelephony with ground stations, and vice versa, throughout the 24 hours of each day, was allotted to each area. Other frequencies were designated for the dissemination of weather information and other special purposes. During 1953, sections of the plan covering the North Atlantic and European/Mediterranean areas were successfully brought into operation, after the facilities had been approved by ICAO as meeting current operational requirements, and the IFRB had negotiated with Administrations for the clearance of the frequencies.

⁹ Full details on these various technical subjects may be found in Volume I of the findings of the VIIth Plenary Assembly of the CCIR (London, 1953), available from ITU.

¹⁰ See Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 897-98.

The new frequencies were brought into use, by stages, throughout the year and this resulted in a considerable improvement in the two areas in communications to and from aircraft. Similar sectional plans have been developed by ICAO for the improvement of aeronautical communications in the Middle East, South East Asia, Caribbean, South American/South Atlantic and African/Indian Ocean areas. The IFRB was in consultation with Administrations in regard to these plans, which, it was hoped, would be brought into effect, by stages, during 1954.

From a detailed analysis of the requirements submitted by Administrations for their High Frequency Broadcasting services, the Board found that the total of these requirements was so far above the total which had been accommodated in the Mexico City Plan that the preparation of the plan envisaged by the EARC for this broadcasting service was precluded. An approach to Administrations through the Administrative Council resulted in a slight reduction in requirements which, however, was not, in itself, sufficient to improve the position appreciably. Nevertheless, from other studies in progress, it appeared that if certain suggestions under consideration were accepted, there was some prospect of preparing a technically acceptable plan.

The assembly and recording of monitoring information became well established during the year, and the regular issue of quarterly summaries was in hand. A considerable proportion of the data was supplied in response to requests for monitoring information relating to frequencies in the plans to be brought into use by the Aeronautical Mobile and the Maritime Mobile Services. This information proved to be of considerable value in the studies made by the Board in connexion with the implementation of these plans.

The year 1953 was a year of substantial progress in the application by Administrations and by the IFRB of the provisions of the EARC Agreement; progress was also made in implementing the plans for the Aeronautical Mobile and the Maritime Mobile Services. As a result, a very considerable number of assignments were brought into the appropriate bands, thus marking an important early step towards the final implementation of the Atlantic City Table of Frequency Allocations.

c. PUBLICATIONS

During 1953, in addition to the Secretary-General's annual report and the documentation of conferences and meetings held by the Union, including the eighth session of the Administrative Council, the secretariat issued, generally in separate English, French and Spanish editions, a large number of publications. These included:

One document issued by the CCIF: Instructions for the Protection of Telecommunication Lines against the Harmful Effects of Electric Power Lines. Two documents issued by the CCIR: Bibliography on Communication Theory; Collection of Antenna Diagrams. One document issued by the IFRB: Summary of Monitoring Information. The ITU also publishes regularly a trilingual monthly Telecommunication Journal containing general information and documentation on telecommunication.

4. Budget

The ordinary expenses of the Union, which are borne by all Members and Associate Members, include the expenses pertaining to: the meetings of the Administrative Council; the salaries of the staff; and other ordinary expenses of the General Secretariat, the International Frequency Registration Board, the international consultative committees, and the laboratories and technical installations created by the Union.

The extraordinary expenses include all expenses pertaining to plenipotentiary conferences, administrative conferences, and meetings of the international consultative committees. These are borne by the Members and Associate Members which have agreed to participate in these conferences and meetings. Private operating agencies and international organizations contribute to the extraordinary expenses of the administrative conferences and the meetings of the international consultative committees in which they participate, in proportion to the number of units corresponding to the class chosen by them. The Administrative Council may, nevertheless, excuse certain international organizations from contributing to these expenses.

The Buenos Aires Plenipotentiary Conference authorized the Administrative Council to approve for 1953 provisions for ordinary expenses up to 5,707,355 Swiss francs.

At its eighth session, the Council adopted for 1953 the following revised budget (in Swiss francs):

Ordinary budget	Swiss francs
Administrative Council	200,000

Extraordinary budget
CCIF Meetings	72,000
CCIT Meetings	270,050
CCIR Meetings	505,000
TOTAL	847,050

Each Member or Associate Member chooses the class of contribution in which it wishes to be included and pays in advance its annual contributory share to the ordinary budget calculated on the basis of the budgetary provisions. Members and Associate Members of ITU have chosen for the year 1953 the following classes of contribution:

J. The World Meteorological Organization (WMO)

1. Introduction

The World Meteorological Organization (WMO) came formally into being on 4 April 1951 as an international body, the Members of which are States or territories.¹

The new organization has the benefit of over 70 years of experience which its predecessor, the International Meteorological Organization (IMO),² had gleaned in the field of international co-operation in meteorology and its application throughout the world.

As early as 1853, an international conference held in Brussels dealt with a programme for collecting meteorological observations made by ships at sea. During the next 25 years additional conferences on other meteorological subjects were convened at Leipzig, Vienna, Utrecht and London, and, in 1878, at a conference at Utrecht, the Netherlands, the International Meteorological Organization was established. Its members were the directors of the meteorological services of the various countries and territories throughout the world; as such it did not have the full official backing of governments but, nevertheless, pursued ambitious programmes of perfecting and standardizing meteorological activities, especially the services to maritime navigation, agriculture, and, increasingly, to aviation.

IMO expanded its plans for technical improvements and services in these fields and, at its Conference of Directors held at Washington, D. C., in September to October 1947, drew up the World Meteorological Convention, which provided for the transformation of the IMO into the World Meteorological Organization.

On 23 March 1950—30 days after the 30th instrument of ratification or accession had been deposited with the United States Secretary of State—the Convention of WMO came into force.

The Convention stated the purposes of WMO as:

"(a) To facilitate worldwide co-operation in the establishment of networks of stations for the making of meteorological observations or other geophysical observations related to meteorology and to promote the establishment and maintenance of meteorological centers charged with the provision of meteorological services;

"(b) To promote the establishment and maintenance of systems for the rapid exchange of weather information;

"(c) To promote standardization of meteorological observations and to ensure the uniform publication of observations and statistics;

"(d) To further the application of meteorology to aviation, shipping, agriculture, and other human activities; and

"(e) To encourage research and training in meteorology and to assist in coordinating the international aspects of such research and training."

One year later, in March 1951, the last Conference of Directors met in Paris, where it transferred the functions, activities, assets and obligations of the IMO to WMO and completed arrangements for both the opening of the first Congress of WMO and for its own dissolution.

The Agreement establishing the relationship between the United Nations and WMO was approved by the first session of the WMO Congress in March and April 1951 and by the United Nations General Assembly on 20 December 1951. It came into force on that day.³

The First Congress also adopted the budget of WMO for the first financial period, namely, until 31 December 1955.⁴

2. Organization⁵

As provided by the Convention, WMO consists of a World Meteorological Congress, an Executive Committee, Regional Associations and Technical Commissions set up by the Congress, and a permanent Secretariat under the direction of a Secretary-General.

The World Meteorological Congress, in which all Members are represented, meets at least once every four years. Each Member designates as its principal delegate to the Congress the director of its meteorological service. The Congress is the policy-making body of the organization. It adopts technical regulations covering meteorological practices and procedures, and determines the general policies for the fulfilment of the organization's purposes. Decisions of the Congress are taken by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast, except that in the election of officers of the organization a simple majority is sufficient. Only Members which are States are entitled to vote on certain categories of questions.

⁵ For a fuller summary of the organization, see Y.U.N., 1952, pp. 901-902.

The Executive Committee is composed of the presidents of Regional Associations and an equal number of directors of the meteorological services of Members, in addition to the President and two Vice-Presidents of WMO. It meets at least once a year. As the executive body of the organization, the Committee supervises the carrying out of Congress resolutions. Among its duties, the Executive Committee makes studies and recommendations and provides Members with technical information, counsel and assistance in the field of meteorology. It has established two consultative committees, on administrative and financial questions, and programme and technical questions.

The Regional Associations, established by the Congress, are composed of Members of WMO whose networks lie in or extend into the respective regions. The geographic limits of the various regions are defined by the Congress. Meeting as often as necessary, the Regional Associations promote the execution of Congress and Executive Committee resolutions, make recommendations to these bodies and co-ordinate meteorological and associated activities in their respective regions. There are six Regional Associations⁶ which differ slightly from the former six regional commissions of IMO in that they now include ocean as well as land areas.

Eight Technical Commissions⁶ were established by the Congress and are composed of experts throughout the world who handle specific technical problems, making recommendations in their respective fields to the Congress and the Executive Committee.

The WMO Secretariat is located in Geneva and consists of two divisions, one administrative and the other technical. It serves as the administrative, documentary and information centre of the organization, carries out technical studies and organizes and performs secretariat duties at sessions of the Congress and the Executive Committee.

3. Activities during 1953

At the end of 1953, WMO had 82 Members, of which 58 were States and 24 territories.⁷ During the year, Japan, Ethiopia and the British Caribbean Territories became Members, and applications for membership were received from Spain on behalf of the Spanish Guinea Territories and the Spanish Morocco Territories, the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic. The applications from Spain and from the Federal Republic of Germany were approved by the necessary majority and the Governments concerned have been authorized to accede to the World Meteorological Convention.

No meeting of the Congress of WMO took place during 1953 but the following sessions of WMO's constituent bodies were held: the fourth session of the Executive Committee, in Geneva, from 6 to 27 October; the first session of Regional Association I (Africa), in Tananarive, Madagascar, from 19 to 30 January; the first session of the Commission for Climatology, in Washington, D. C., from 12 to 25 March; the first session of the Commission for Synoptic Meteorology, in Washington, from 2 to 29 April; the first session of Regional Association IV (North and Central America) in Toronto, Canada, from 3 to 7 August; the first session of the Commission for Instruments and Methods of Observation and the first session of the Commission for Aerology, in Toronto, from 10 August to 5 September; the first session of the Commission for Agricultural Meteorology, in Paris, from 3 to 20 November; the first session of the Commission for Bibliography and Publications, in Paris, from 24 November to 14 December.

a. TECHNICAL ACTIVITIES

(1) Technical Regulations

The preparation of Draft Technical Regulations progressed during 1953. The six Commissions which met in 1953 all submitted their draft technical regulations to the secretariat, and the Executive Committee at its fourth session decided that the secretariat should proceed with the editing of a consolidated draft of these regulations to be distributed to the permanent representatives for comments as soon as possible.

The Committee further decided that the Draft Technical Regulations prepared by the secretariat would include both "standard practices", which are of an obligatory nature, and certain "recommended practices", which are in the category of guides or manuals.

(2) International Cloud Atlas

During a session immediately prior to the first session of the Commission for Synoptic Meteorology (CSM), the Committee for Clouds and Hydrometeors reviewed the comments received from various CSM members on the proposed new Cloud Atlas, and the Commission studied the different volumes of the Atlas in the light of the results of this meeting. At its fourth session, the Executive Committee considered the recommendations of the CSM and of a working group, which met in June concerning the printing of the Atlas, and decided how it would be published.

⁶ A list of regional associations and technical commissions is annexed to this chapter.

⁷ For list see Annex.

(3) World Maps of Thunderstorm Activity

In accordance with resolutions adopted by the Executive Committee at its third session, the secretariat collected statistics of thunderstorm activity for land stations from all parts of the globe and published tables containing mean monthly, seasonal and annual numbers of thunderstorm days.

The preparation of thunderstorm maps for the globe, the major project with which the secretariat was charged by the Executive Committee, presents special difficulties, due to the sparseness and irregular distribution of data from the oceans. However, the International Radio Consultative Committee has asked for the preparation of world maps of thunderstorm activity based on the latest available information. Inquiries were accordingly made with Meteorological Services possessing punch card marine data with a view to the possibility of extracting the necessary figures of thunderstorm distribution over the oceans. These figures would be combined with those concerning thunderstorm activity for land stations to provide the basis for world maps.

(4) Arid Zone Research and Development

The Executive Committee at its fourth session approved a programme for the Arid Zone Panel of Experts, under which the Panel would:

- (1) arrange for the preparation of technical studies;
- (2) promote, within WMO, activities on scientific or technical problems concerning the Arid Zone;
- (3) collect and distribute to all Members of WMO and to appropriate specialized agencies information on research work being carried out on meteorological and hydrological problems of the Arid Zone, as well as on the institutions and experts engaged in that type of work;
- (4) keep in close contact with the work undertaken by individual Members of WMO; and
- (5) call attention to any meteorological research work on Arid Zone problems which it considered should be undertaken but which could not be carried out or sponsored by WMO, with a view to seeking the assistance of another specialized agency or international organization.

Artificial Inducement of Precipitation—Following a request from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), a report was prepared by the secretariat on the artificial inducement of precipitation with special reference to the arid and semi-arid regions of the world. This report was based on material supplied by experts in different parts of the world as published in the new series of WMO Technical Notes. The report concluded that while operations hitherto have produced results that can be termed at best inconclusive, and while present-day techniques have very little value, if any, in augmenting the precipitation in areas of very low rainfall or during dry periods in areas of normally medium rainfall, there is need for further scientifically designed and rigorously checked experiments in all regions where there is a possibility of success.

The whole problem of the modification and control of clouds and hydrometeors with special reference to the artificial production of precipitation and to the prevention of hail was being studied by a working group of the Commission for Aerology.

Studies of Sources and Utilization of Wind Energy—A study was begun of the possibility of utilizing wind energy as a possible solution to the energy problem in areas with little or no hydroelectric power or other resources.

The Advisory Committee on Arid Zone Research of UNESCO, at its fourth session, recommended that a series of reports be commissioned on energy sources and their use in the Arid Zone. Two of these would relate to the practicability of using wind energy, especially the distribution of suitable winds and sites. One would cover work done in Africa and Asia, and the other that done in the Americas and Australia. The reports would be conceived as providing the background of facts and figures concerning wind regimes at heights appropriate for utilization by wind machines in the different arid areas of the continents mentioned. Reports already submitted on the design of wind machines and on the economic and practical aspects of utilizing wind energy in arid areas could then be related to the existence of suitable wind regimes and sites.

The WMO secretariat undertook the preparation of these two reports in response to a request received from UNESCO late in 1953.

(5) International Geophysical Year

A special working group submitted to the Executive Committee proposals for the meteorological programme for the International Geophysical Year to be held in 1957-58 under the auspices of the International Council of Scientific Unions (ICSU).⁸ The Executive Committee approved the broad principles of the plan and re-requested the working group to establish a detailed programme and to report to its next session.

The various proposals were also discussed at the first session of the Commission for Aerology, which selected certain items for special consideration. Chief emphasis was placed on the establishment of a number of new upper air stations to provide data along certain lines of longitude and latitude.

The WMO proposals were approved by the ICSU Special Committee on the International Geophysical Year, at its meeting in Brussels in June 1953.

(6) International Meteorological Institute

In accordance with a resolution of the WMO Congress, a working group considered the practicability of establishing an International Meteorological Institute, which had been suggested by UNESCO. It concluded that the difficulties were too great for the establishment of such an institute in the immediate future. The Executive Committee set up a new working group to consider the desirability and advisability of creating the Institute. Members were invited to submit their comments and suggestions.

(7) CLIMAT Publication

CLIMAT data consists of mean values of the temperature, pressure and certain other meteorological elements which are normally broadcast during the first week of the month and which refer to the previous month. The Executive Committee at its fourth session directed the secretariat to undertake an inquiry to determine the purpose and value of a monthly publication containing these data and the extent of the network of stations for which the data should be included.

(8) Aircraft Icing

Following a proposal from the Commission for Aerology, based on a recommendation of the fifth session of the former IMO Commission for Aeronautical Meteorology, the Executive Committee directed the secretariat to prepare a report on experimental research on the icing of aircraft and other exposed surfaces in clouds and its relation with cloud characteristics, such as water and ice content and particle size distribution.

(9) Meteorological Bibliography and Publications

The Commission for Bibliography and Publications (CBP) held its first session in Paris from 24 November to 12 December 1953. However, a quorum was not obtained and the decisions taken at the session therefore had to be submitted to the Members represented on the Commission for a final vote by correspondence. The finally approved recommendations will be considered by the Executive Committee at its fifth session.

The Commission approved its part of the Technical Regulations and decided to establish one working group dealing with the meteorological vocabulary and the lexicon.

A summary of some of the more important subjects dealt with is given below.

Guide to Meteorological Library Practice—It was recommended that the Guide should be published in two volumes—one dealing with the Universal Decimal Classification. It was decided that no endeavour should be made to lay down too strict rules in the Guide, except with regard to the Universal Decimal Classification, but that the aim should be to state what is generally advocated, under ideal conditions. So far as standardization was concerned, it would indicate the most desirable standards but would not make application for them compulsory.

Universal Decimal Classification—A new version of the Universal Decimal Classification: 551.5 (Section Meteorology) was drafted; and it was recommended that the use of the UDC should be compulsory in all fields. Approval of the revised text of Section 551.5 is to be sought from the International Federation for Documentation.

Lexicon and Polyglot Vocabulary—It was decided that a working group on terminology should be set up to study the questions of terminology and a polyglot vocabulary. Terms were to be listed in the order of the Universal Decimal Classification. Definitions would reflect the scientific aspect of each point studied, "popular" terms being excluded. Explanatory preambles and alphabetical indexes were to be added. The endeavour would be to give, as far as possible, a simple, precise definition which admits of no ambiguity. The "lexicon" after each term of meteorological expression was to give the corresponding definition, with an explanatory comment, if necessary. The "vocabulary" was to give the equivalent term for each word in the different languages, without any definition.

Exchange of Documents—It was recommended, in the interests of economy, that instead of the publication of a "Manual for the Exchange of Meteorological Publications" an existing WMO publication⁹ should be extended so as to include information on the exchange of meteorological publications from all countries.

(10) Instruments and Methods of Observation

The Commission for Instruments and Methods of Observation (CIMO) held its first session in the autumn of 1953. Some of the preparatory work for the session was carried out by working groups, and Regional Associations showed great interest in the problems involved. The following were some of the matters dealt with:

Barometry—A proposal for an international barometer convention to secure uniformity in the use of standard temperature and gravity values and to define the various pressure scales used in barometry was put forward to the CIMO by the Working Group on Barometry. The Commission recommended the adoption of the Convention and it was adopted by the Executive Committee at its meeting in October. Among other things, the Convention, which will come into force on 1 January 1955, lays down that the standard temperature to which mercury barometer readings are reduced shall be 0° Celsius and that the standard gravity shall be 980.665 cm/sec².

Radiation—A network of stations for radiation measures was being progressively established in Region I (Africa) and arrangements were being made for regular calibration by some specified radiation centres of instruments used at these stations. CIMO also studied the requirements for the measurement of radiation, and stressed that it was essential that radiation instruments should be calibrated and checked regularly against absolute standards at properly equipped radiation centres. It laid down a detailed programme for the work to be carried out at specialized radiation stations, and set up a working group to make further studies in the whole field of meteorological radiation measurement.

The Executive Committee noted the decisions taken by the Commission and Regional Association I on this subject, and recommended that Members should consider establishing radiation networks on the lines suggested by CIMO.

Comparison of radiosondes—A radiosonde is an instrument equipped with elements for determining one or more properties (pressure, temperature, etc.) of the air as it is carried through it, and from which this information is transmitted to a distant station by radio-electric devices. It is considered important to compare the various types of radiosonde in use in order to determine their accuracy. The first international comparison of radiosondes was carried out at Payerne, Switzerland, in 1950, and a second world-wide comparison is envisaged within a few years. The Executive Committee studied recommendations made by CIMO on this matter, and recommended that, before the next international comparison of radiosondes takes place at Payerne, comparisons of radiosondes used in two or more neighbouring countries should be made, especially if these instruments have not previously been compared. CIMO established a working group to make arrangements for the second international trials.

Reduction of pressure to mean sea level—When drawing up a chart of the pressure distribution at sea level, the meteorologist has to base it on observations of pressure actually made by a network of meteorological stations, not all of which are situated at sea level. The meteorologist must therefore "reduce" the observed pressure to what it would be if the station was at sea level and the methods used for so doing vary greatly from country to country. The Commission for Instruments and Methods of Observation devoted considerable time to this question, but was only able to reach agreement on a method for reduction of pressure at low-level stations. This method was accepted by the Executive Committee.

The secretariat collected information, which is to be issued in a Technical Note, concerning the methods of pressure reduction used by meteorological services throughout the world. The Note will also include a report, prepared during the first session of CIMO by the Chairman of a Committee for Barometry, concerning the difficulties involved in pressure reduction and putting forward suggestions as to relevant formulae and methods which might have some chance of being generally adopted.

(11) Aerology

During 1953, the Commission for Aerology (CAe), which is charged with promoting and co-ordinating meteorological research, held its first session in Toronto from 10 August to 5 September. In the earlier part of the year, effort was concentrated on preparing the working papers for the session, and subsequently emphasis was placed on setting in motion the various working groups established during the session.

Publication of aerological data—A survey carried out by the secretariat showed that many meteorological services are not publishing the results of their upper air observations and that there is a marked diversity in the layout of the material in the existing publications. This question was carefully considered by the Commission for Aerology, which recommended that all services should make available checked data of aerological observations together with their monthly means and extremes. Two different formats for the tables were suggested. This recommendation was approved by the Executive Committee, which also directed the Secretary-General of WMO to carry out an annual inquiry to ascertain how far this recommendation was implemented.

Constants, tables and definitions—The tasks of the Commission for Aerology include the standardization of physical functions and constants and the provision of aerological tables.

The Commission adopted a new definition for relative humidity and established two working groups: one to prepare a revision of the publication of the former International Meteorological Organization entitled Values of some Physical Functions and Constants used in Meteorology; and the other to prepare a report on definitions and values of radiation functions and constants, and proposals for tables which might be used by meteorologists in the application of the laws of solar, atmospheric and terrestrial radiation.

Sferics—The Chairman of the Working Group on Radio-electric Meteorology organized a "World Symposium on Sferics" which was held in the Meteorological Institute at Zurich from 17 to 24 March 1953. The chief subjects discussed were recent developments in sferics techniques (i.e., methods of locating thunderstorms by observing the direction of arrival of atmospherics originating from the storms) and the application of these techniques to meteorological practice. The International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) had earlier expressed interest in the accuracy of existing techniques and it was recommended that a comparison of the different techniques might be organized by certain meteorological services.

Information was being obtained from meteorological services with a view to the preparation of a publication describing briefly the various techniques used for locating atmospherics.

Aerological diagrams—Specimens of most of the aerological diagrams in current use were received by the secretariat in response to an inquiry initiated in 1952. These diagrams, which are used for the analysis of upper air observations, formed the subject of a study by the Commission for Aerology, which set up a working group to prepare a report surveying the principal types of diagrams and assessing their respective advantages for various uses.

(12) Climatology

The first session of the Commission for Climatology (CCI) was held in Washington, D.C., in March. Its recommendations were approved by the Executive Committee in October. The following were some of the principal items dealt with:

Policy and organization—The main problems considered by CCI under this heading were a revision of the Commission's terms of reference, relations with other constituent bodies of WMO and with other specialized agencies, and the formulation of a satisfactory procedure by which CCI could be represented on and have representation from other Technical Commissions of WMO.

The Executive Committee decided that the general question of the terms of reference of Technical Commissions should be referred to the WMO Congress for critical examination.

A number of recommendations were made relating to the relationship between WMO and other specialized agencies. Among these were several suggestions regarding certain aspects of the UNESCO Arid Zone Programme, particularly the preparation of the Arid Zone handbook, climatological studies of arid regions and the selection of climatology as the central theme for one year under the UNESCO Programme.

The Executive Committee directed the WMO secretariat to prepare a report on the meteorological aspects of the Humid Tropics and referred the question of the climate section of the Arid Zone handbook to the WMO Arid Zone Panel. It approved the invitation by the secretariat of a representative of the World Health Organization (WHO) to participate in a WMO Working Group for Climate and Health.

Methods and requirements—The Commission studied in detail the problems of observational and recording procedures, including networks of climatological and hydrological stations, elements to be observed, classification and outfit of stations, the accuracy, frequency and timing of observations, forms of record and processing of data, including the establishment of an international processing centre. Statistical and machine methods, threshold values, frequency evaluations, pentades and normals were also discussed.

The Executive Committee decided that the various recommendations should, for the most part, be incorporated in the draft Provisional Technical Regulations or in a suitable guide to climatological practices and procedures which it was envisaged would be published by the secretariat.

Other activities—The Commission decided to establish seven working groups for continued study of the most important problems. These working groups were active during the year, investigating various problems within their fields of reference with a view to the formulation of programmes and recommendations for consideration by the Commission.

The main questions dealt with were: the relation between climate and health; a survey of the state of knowledge in microclimatology and dynamic climatology; the formulation of standard rules and practices in the field of international climatology; and a study of punch card layout and statistical methods in climatology.

(13) Agricultural Meteorology

The first session of the Commission for Agricultural Meteorology (CAgM) was held in Paris in November 1953. It approved the draft Provisional Technical Regulations as pertaining to the field of agricultural meteorology and decided to establish five working groups for continued study of the main questions within its field of competence. The Commission's recommendations were to be considered by the fifth session of the Executive Committee in 1954. The following were some of the most important subjects dealt with by the Commission:

Agro-meteorological observations, instruments and stations—To obtain the background knowledge for the establishment of scientific relationships between weather and climate conditions, on the one hand, and plant growth and crop yield, on the other, both atmospheric and biological phenomena should be observed.

Meteorological factors which are particularly significant to plant and animal life include, for example, evaporation and actual evapotranspiration, components of biological significance, fine structure of wind in the lower air layers and water vapour diffusion, in addition to elements currently observed at synoptic and climatological stations. Those special observations need further developments in instrument techniques, and the location of stations and the exposure of instruments have to be particularly adapted to agro-meteorological purposes. A working group was set up to survey the use in agriculture of the above-mentioned observations and to examine the need for new observational programmes. A working group was also established to study the meteorological aspects of problems affecting animal life, with particular reference to collaboration of meteorologists with research workers in the field of animal breeding and husbandry.

Climatic information for agriculture—Regarding the presentation of data on this subject, it was agreed that climatological information should be presented in such a form that it would give an accurate picture to its recipients and would be directly applicable to the agricultural problem involved. In consequence, meteorological and climatological bulletins for agriculture should contain statistical data (averages, frequencies, deviations, etc.) concerning items such as: frost free periods, dates of first and last frost, degree-days (or related indices) as measured from different datum levels, soil temperature at various levels, soil moisture data, intensity of precipitation, frequency of periods of drought, amount and frequency of dew, evaporation and evapotranspiration, frequency of occurrence of hail.

After thorough examination of existing climatic classifications, the Commission reached the conclusion that agro-climatic classifications should be made with respect to specific crops or animals, taking into consideration the climatological criteria already agreed upon for different crop or animal phases, and also the topography and other geographical features of the area under study. If the classification was to be presented in some kind of pictorial form, the scale of the representation should be chosen in accordance with the available data and the purposes of the classification.

Forecasts for agriculture—The CAgM was also concerned with the problem of improving systems of forecasts and warnings especially designed for agricultural purposes. To provide suitable information to forecasters, "crop-weather calendars" have been established, which present, for specific crops and each district of the country, the normal dates of major farming operations side by side with the significant weather factors. The necessity for medium and long-range weather forecasts for agriculture was also stressed.

Prevention of weather damage—It was stressed that advice concerning adverse weather conditions should provide information on such questions as protection against frost damages, meteorological effects of shelter belts and wind breaks, weather factors affecting plant diseases, preservation of stored and packed food against unfavourable weather.

Meteorological aspects of locust control—The CAgM set up a working group to make a survey of current knowledge concerning weather conditions affecting the breeding and migration of locusts and those influencing the successful use of combating agents. The Commission also recommended that research in the field of locust bioclimatology should be promoted at national, regional and world-wide levels.

Regional Associations I (Africa) and III (South America), at their first sessions, paid much attention to co-ordinating on a regional basis the provision of meteorological services, mostly in the fields of synoptic climatology and special weather forecasts, to aid in locust control.

Collaboration with agriculturists—Recognizing the need for close collaboration between meteorologists and agriculturists, the CAgM recommended that suitable arrangements be made at the national level for liaison between meteorological services and official and private agricultural institutions. It also drew up a comprehensive programme for technical co-operation between the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) and WMO.

A working group was established to study the most suitable means for widening the knowledge of agricultural meteorology in the universities as well as among farmers, growers and foresters. The publication of a manual and of an extended bibliography in agricultural meteorology for the mutual benefit of agriculturists and meteorologists was also recommended.

(14) Maritime Meteorology

Important questions considered during the year by the four working groups established by the Commission for Maritime Meteorology (CMM) at its first session in 1952 included the meteorological factors affecting the safe carriage of cargo at sea and international accord in the preparation of marine climatological atlases.

Scheme for the collection and transmission of weather reports from whaling ships—Arrangements by which radio weather reports were collected from whaling ships in the southern hemisphere and transmitted in a collective message were reviewed on the basis of the success of the plan during the 1952-53 whaling season. Some improvements were made to the scheme, which has also been in operation during the 1953-54 whaling season.

International Ice Nomenclature—Several interested countries made criticisms of the international ice nomenclature as adopted at the first session of CMM. The Executive Committee accordingly referred the nomenclature back to the CMM for further study, and it is being considered again by a CMM working group.

(15) Synoptic Meteorology

The first session of the Commission for Synoptic Meteorology (CSM) was held in Washington, D.C., in April. Its recommendations were approved by the Executive Committee.

Forms of message and codes—One of the main items considered by CSM was the reconciliation of the different existing practices with regard to the basic synoptic code (SYNOP) for exchanging basic weather information. With regard to the aeronautical meteorological codes, it was considered impossible to alter the weather reports for aviation without making changes in the SYNOP and SHIP reports. A new logical form of message was, however, worked out for forecasts, which will greatly simplify the work of aviation forecasters and pilots.

A new form for weather reports from transport aircraft was adopted but the question of a form for high-altitude flight forecasts was referred to the Commission for Aeronautical Meteorology.

A new code form (TEMP) for upper air observations was agreed upon; it leaves some latitude and can also be used for aircraft soundings. A new form for reconnaissance flights was also recommended. Following a proposal from the Commission for Aerology, a form for reporting atmospheric observations was approved.

Various other questions concerning codes and forms of messages were discussed, including the decoding table proposed by ICAO for air-ground reports.

The Executive Committee adopted the recommendation of the Commission on coding questions.

Times and frequency of observations—In view of the existing confusion on the subject, the Commission defined the expressions "actual time of observation", "standard time", "filing time" and "official time".

The question of the number of synoptic observations per 24 hours was discussed. The Commission also discussed the most useful and practicable times for making upper air observations, and decided to make no major changes in times of observation for the time being.

Meteorological telecommunications—Although there are several deficiencies in the present telecommunications arrangements, it was felt that the time was not yet ripe for making any radical changes. The Commission stressed the responsibilities of the regional associations in these matters and invited them to submit their proposals to CSM. A CSM working group was set up, primarily to ensure co-ordination between the various regional telecommunications working groups. A list of questions for study was drawn up. With regard to facsimile transmissions, it was considered undesirable to bind the engineers by laying down too rigid specifications which might hinder further developments in facsimile apparatus. Members were invited to send progress reports to the Secretary-General who would make an annual collective report.

The Commission recommended a procedure for ensuring that WMO was kept up to date on matters of meteorological significance appearing on the agenda of sessions of the International Telecommunication Union (ITU). It also stressed the necessity for directors of meteorological services to keep in close contact with their national representatives at ITU conferences.

Station networks—The very important problem of establishing objective criteria for the spatial distribution of surface and upper air stations and for the frequency of observations proved to be too complex for study during a session and an appropriate working group was therefore set up.

Other activities—Following the code modifications approved by the Executive Committee, the secretariat began the preparation of a new edition of the WMO publication on codes and code specifications.

It initiated inquiries regarding: hours of upper air observations; usefulness and quality of the NMH broadcast of North Atlantic Ocean Stations; national methods of reporting visibility; and units used in coded messages for international exchange.

(16) Aeronautical Meteorology

Recommendations were being developed with regard to the qualifications and training of meteorological personnel employed in aeronautical meteorology. Steps were taken to draft a master curriculum in basic knowledge (particularly physics and mathematics) and in meteorological knowledge, covering all grades of personnel, with specifications of the level of knowledge required by each grade. Consideration was also given to the utility, for training purposes, of WMO manuals on recommended technical practices.

(17) WMO Publications in 1953

The WMO Bulletin, which contains reports of the activities of the organization and articles dealing with the progress of meteorology, continued to be published quarterly in separate English and French editions. Beginning with the July 1953 issue, advertisements of interest to meteorologists were included.

Following a suggestion made by the secretariat, the Executive Committee decided that the secretariat should publish a new series of papers entitled WMO Technical Notes.

The work on Volume A of Publication No. 9 Nomenclature of Stations, containing details of approximately 7,000 stations, was completed and two supplements, bringing the information up to date, were issued.

Publication No. 8, The Guide, was enlarged by the introduction of two new chapters: chapter 11 "Pilot and Sounding Balloon Technique" and chapter 12 "Measurement of Upper Wind".

The Executive Committee decided that the secretariat should be responsible for the printing of the 1952 volumes of the International Meteorological Bibliography. Due to shortage of staff, only two volumes could be finished in 1953. Volumes III and IV of the International Meteorological Bibliography for 1952 are to be printed in 1954.

At the end of 1953, a new technical publication, World Distribution of Thunderstorm Days—Part I: Tables, was issued.

b. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

The First Congress allocated $1,000 for WMO's regular technical assistance programme in the first financial period, and the Executive Committee included this sum in WMO's budget for 1954.

As regards the Expanded Programme of technical assistance, the working arrangement between WMO and the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration remained, with minor modifications, the same as in 1952. Under this WMO receives 1 per cent from the United Nations appropriation from the Special Account, with a minimum of U.S.$200,000. The Technical Assistance Administration is responsible for the non-technical aspects of the projects and the WMO secretariat for the technical aspects.

During 1953, under the Expanded Programme, WMO gave assistance to eight countries. Experts were sent to the Dominican Republic, Israel, Jordan, Libya and Yugoslavia; a scholarship was awarded to a national of China and fellowships to nationals of Israel, Southern Rhodesia, Thailand and Yugoslavia. Subjects on which advice was given included: indoor climate, hydrology, weather forecasting, agro-meteorology, and climatology.

Commencement of a project in Bolivia was postponed until 1954 pending availability of the expert desired by the Government. Likewise, projects in China and the Dominican Republic could not be fully implemented pending the conclusion of formalities in connexion with the appointment of United States experts. A WMO Technical Assistance Mission to Libya entered the field in October 1953.

In addition to the countries listed above, discussions on technical assistance took place with or concerning the following countries and territories: Afghanistan, Brazil, the Caribbean Territories, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, the Gold Coast, Greece, Guatemala, Hong Kong, Indonesia, Jamaica, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, Macao, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Venezuela.

By 31 December 1953, WMO had received applications from 240 experts from 34 countries for employment on its projects, and was maintaining a panel of experts.

During 1953, WMO maintained close relations with the United Nations, UNESCO, FAO and ICAO on meteorological projects. The United Nations was concerned with hydrology and has initiated discussions with WMO on the follow-up of certain recommendations in Ecuador and Jamaica. UNESCO was concerned with projects of meteorological research in Mexico and Pakistan. FAO sent an expert to India to prepare a programme for research on the effects of particular climates on particular types of cattle and livestock, and turned over to WMO for implementation requests for technical assistance in meteorology received from Bolivia and Iran. FAO likewise expressed great interest in the locust control project. ICAO operates a number of meteorological projects and WMO has awarded two fellowships at the request of that organization.

c. EXTERNAL RELATIONS OF WMO

Working arrangements, effective 1 January 1954, were adopted during 1953 between WMO and ICAO. The arrangements are of an interim character and are intended to secure close co-operation, including an understanding regarding the allocation to one organization or the other of primary responsibility for certain sectors within the field of common interest.

Negotiations with the International Union of Geodesy and Geophysics, a non-governmental international organization of scientific character, led to the conclusion of a special working arrangement for collaboration and consultation.

In implementation of the provisions of the Convention of WMO, a Consultative Status for International Non-Governmental Organizations was established in 1953 to facilitate collaboration with such organizations.

4. Budget

A maximum figure of $1,273,000 was adopted for the expenditures of WMO during the first financial period, 4 April 1951 to 31 December 1955. A working capital fund was established with the maximum limited to 10 per cent of the expenditures voted. The scale of contributions as per 31 December 1953 is given below.

At its fourth session in October 1953, the Executive Committee approved the budget given below (in U.S. dollars) in the amount of $363,000 for the fourth financial year (1 January to 31 December 1954). The budgets for the previous years were: 1951: $190,000; 1952: $272,379; 1953: $359,881.

K. The Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO)¹

(Not Yet Established)

The United Nations Maritime Conference, called at the request of the Economic and Social Council, met in Geneva from 19 February to 6 March 1948. It drew up and opened for signature and acceptance on 6 March 1948 the Convention on the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO).²

As provided by the Convention, Members of the United Nations and other States invited to the Conference may become Members of IMCO by becoming parties to the Convention. States other than these may become Members, subject to the prior approval of their application by two thirds of the States Members of IMCO. Territories or groups of territories may, under certain conditions, become associate Members of the Organization.

IMCO will come into being when 21 States, of which seven must each have a total tonnage of at least one million gross tons of shipping, have become parties to the Convention. As of 31 December 1953, fourteen³ acceptances of the Convention had been received from Australia, Argentina, Belgium, Burma, Canada, the Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Haiti, Ireland, Israel, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, and the United States. Seven of these States have at least one million tons of shipping.

As provided by its Convention, IMCO will comprise an Assembly, a Council, a Maritime Safety Committee, such subsidiary organs as are considered necessary and a Secretariat.

To make the necessary preparations for the first session of the Assembly of IMCO, the Conference established a Preparatory Committee, which will cease to exist upon resolution of the first session of that Assembly.

The Preparatory Committee of IMCO held its first session on 6 March 1948 and its second on 30 November and 1 December 1948. It drew up a provisional agenda for the first session of the IMCO Assembly and prepared a proposed budget for the first two years of IMCO.

An agreement to establish the relationship between the United Nations and IMCO was approved by the General Assembly on 18 November 1948; to become effective it now requires the approval of the IMCO Assembly.⁴

The purposes and functions of IMCO are laid down in parts I and II of the Convention. Briefly, the organization is to:

(1) provide machinery for co-operation among governments in the field of the governmental regulation and practices relating to technical matters, including those concerning safety at sea;

(2) encourage the removal of discriminatory action and of unnecessary restrictions by governments;

(3) consider matters concerning unfair restrictive practices by shipping concerns;

(4) consider any matters concerning shipping that might be referred to it by any organ or specialized agency of the United Nations;

(5) provide for the exchange of information among governments on matters under consideration by the organization.

IMCO is also to provide for the drafting of conventions and agreements, to recommend these to governments and to intergovernmental organizations, and to convene such conferences as may be necessary. The organization is to function in a consultative and advisory capacity.

L. The International Trade Organization (ITO) and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT)

1. The International Trade Organization (ITO)

(Not Yet Established)

On 18 February 1946, the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations resolved to convene an International Conference on Trade and Employment to devise ways and means for the expansion of the production, exchange and consumption of goods. The Council, at the same time, established a Preparatory Committee to prepare for the consideration of the Conference an agenda and a draft convention for an international trade organization.

The Preparatory Committee held its first session in London from 15 October to 26 November 1946, and prepared a first draft Charter for an International Trade Organization (ITO).

Following further work on the draft by a drafting committee and by the Preparatory Committee at its second session, held in Geneva from 10 April to 22 August 1947, a draft Charter was adopted by the Preparatory Committee. This draft formed the basis for the work of the United Nations Conference on Trade Employment (Havana Conference). The Conference, which met in Havana from 21 November 1947 to 24 March 1948, drew up a Charter for an International Trade Organization (to be officially known as the Havana Charter) to be submitted to the 56 governments represented, authenticated the text of the Charter in a Final Act, and adopted a resolution establishing an Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization.

The Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization (ICITO), composed of 52 countries which approved the resolution establishing it, held its first meeting in Havana on 20 March 1948 and elected and delegated its powers to an Executive Committee of eighteen members. The Executive Committee met in Havana on 24 March 1948, and again, at its seat in Geneva, from 25 August to 15 September 1948.

The main task of the Interim Commission was to prepare the ground for the first session of ITO, including a plan of work for the first year of the organization, the budget, the site for ITO headquarters, relations with the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations. The bulk of this task—so far as events could be foreseen—was completed in 1949, and, since that time, the secretariat of ICITO has been almost entirely occupied with the performance of duties for the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT).

In view of the delay in receiving acceptances of the Havana Charter, the Executive Committee, at a special session held at Annecy, France, in August 1949, agreed to postpone its third meeting, scheduled for September 1949, until a date when the entry into force of the Charter and the holding of the first ITO Conference were more imminent. At that meeting, a proposal was made by the United Kingdom to bring into operation chapter VI of the Havana Charter in advance of the Charter as a whole. This proposal was referred to the fourth session of the Contracting Parties to GATT, but found no support and was withdrawn.

By the end of 1950, the Havana Charter had been accepted by Liberia and—conditional upon acceptances by the United Kingdom and the United States—by Australia. The Swedish Riksdag authorized Sweden's adherence at the discretion of the Foreign Minister. No acceptances had been deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations. On 6 December 1950, the United States Department of State issued a statement of policy indicating that the Havana Charter would not be submitted again to the United States Congress. It subsequently became evident that the establishment of ITO would be indefinitely postponed. There were no further developments in 1953.

On 13 September 1951, at its thirteenth session, the Economic and Social Council established an Ad hoc Committee on Restrictive Business Practices to prepare proposals on methods for implementing the principles set forth in chapter V of the Havana Charter. The Committee presented its report to the sixteenth session of the Council in July 1953.¹ The Council decided to transmit the report to governments for study and to reconsider the matter not later than its nineteenth session.

2. The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT)

While the Charter for ITO was in course of preparation, the members of the Preparatory Committee decided to proceed with tariff negotiations among themselves instead of waiting for the organization to come into existence, thereby promoting one of the most important objectives of ITO. The Preparatory Committee also sponsored the discussions which led to the formulation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). The tariff negotiations were held at Geneva from 10 April to 30 October 1947, when the 23 participating countries signed a Final Act which authenticated the text of GATT.

The countries which completed tariff negotiations at Geneva in 1947 and subsequently became Contracting Parties to GATT were: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Ceylon, Chile, China,² Cuba, Czechoslovakia, France, India, Lebanon,³ Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Southern Rhodesia, Syria, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States. Although Pakistan, Syria,⁴ Burma, Ceylon and Southern Rhodesia were not members of the Preparatory Committee, these countries participated in the tariff negotiations owing to their close economic connexion with certain members of the Committee. In the tariff negotiations, Benelux (Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg) took part as a Customs Union, as did also Lebanon-Syria. (During 1950 Indonesia became a Contracting Party in its own right.)

The Geneva tariff conference was the first of three, the two others taking place in 1949 at Annecey, France, and in 1950-51 at Torquay, England.

a. TARIFF CONFERENCES AND ACCESSIONS TO GATT

In the first series of tariff negotiations at Geneva in 1947, a total of 123 bilateral sets of negotiations were completed among the 23 participating countries. They covered more than 45,000 tariff items. The second series of tariff negotiations, held at Annecey from 11 April to 27 August 1949, was on a smaller scale and resulted in the completion of 147 bilateral agreements covering some 5,000 items and the accession to GATT during 1950 of a further nine countries: Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Finland, Greece, Haiti, Italy, Liberia,⁵ Nicaragua and Sweden. Uruguay, which negotiated at Annecey but did not subsequently accede, became a Contracting Party to GATT in December 1953.

The third series of tariff negotiations, held at Torquay from 28 September 1950 to 21 April 1951, followed the same pattern, except that, in addition to negotiations between the Contracting Parties and the following six governments: Austria, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Republic of Korea, Peru, the Philippines and Turkey, there were also renewed negotiations among the Contracting Parties for additional concessions. Some 8,700 concessions were negotiated at Torquay. By the end of 1952, the above countries had acceded except the Republic of Korea and the Philippines.

b. STRUCTURE AND FUNCTIONS OF GATT

GATT is an international trade agreement. The tariff concessions resulting from the three tariff conferences are incorporated in the Schedules of GATT. The Agreement contains provisions to protect the tariff concessions: that is, for preventing them from being nullified by trade restrictions imposed by governments to protect their national trade and payments. These provisions include rules regulating the use by the parties to the Agreement of quantitative import and export restrictions, internal taxes and so on, as well as arrangements for consultation and for joint discussion and settlement of differences arising out of the administration of the Agree-

¹ See under Restrictive Business Practices, pp. 337-41.

² The National Government of China withdrew from GATT in May 1950.

³ Lebanon withdrew from GATT in February 1951.

⁴ Syria withdrew from GATT in August 1951.

⁵ Liberia withdrew from GATT effective June 1953.

mem. The obligations accepted by the Contracting Parties to the Agreement provide an agreed set of rules governing their commercial relations, and the sessions attended by their representatives provide a forum for the discussion and settlement of complaints and other problems in the commercial field.

The governments which have become Contracting Parties are applying the Agreement provisionally either under the Protocol of Provisional Application or under the Annecy or Torquay Protocols. These legal instruments have enabled the Contracting Parties to bring the new tariff rates into effect, to establish most-favored-nation treatment among themselves, and to follow the commercial policy rules laid down in the general provisions of the Agreement. Contracting Parties which apply the Agreement provisionally are not required to amend existing legislation or to promulgate new legislation in order to adhere more closely to the Agreement. They are expected, however, not to enact any new legislation that is inconsistent with it. In signing the Protocol of Provisional Application, or the Annecy or Torquay Protocols, a Contracting Party accepts a commitment to apply Part II of the Agreement (which represents approximately the commercial policy chapter of the Havana Charter) "to the fullest extent not inconsistent with existing legislation" and, in addition, undertakes to observe the principles of the Havana Charter "to the fullest extent of its executive authority".

From time to time, the Contracting Parties have amended GATT by means of Protocols, designed primarily to bring the commercial policy and economic development articles of the Agreement into line with the text of the Havana Charter. The Contracting Parties have also adopted Protocols of Rectifications, containing detailed changes in the Schedules of tariff rates necessitated by such factors as inaccurate descriptions of products or inadvertent errors, and Protocols of Modifications, comprising renegotiations among certain Contracting Parties.

c. SESSIONS OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES

The Agreement requires representatives of the Contracting Parties to meet from time to time to give effect to those provisions which require joint action. Eight sessions of the Contracting Parties had been held up to the end of 1953. The first session took place at Havana in March 1948, during the closing weeks of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment;

the second at Geneva from 16 August to 14 September 1948; the third at Annecy from 8 April to 13 August 1949; the fourth at Geneva from 23 February to 3 April 1950; the fifth at Torquay from 2 November to 16 December 1950; the sixth at Geneva from 17 September to 26 October 1951; the seventh at Geneva from 2 October to 10 November 1952; and the eighth at Geneva from 17 September to 24 October 1953.

In addition to their regular annual sessions, the Contracting Parties have made inter-sessional arrangements by which committees can be convened to consider urgent questions, to prepare the business of the sessions or to undertake specific tasks, such as the study of schemes for the general reduction of tariff levels.

The main work of the Contracting Parties to GATT during 1953 was undertaken during the eighth session, held at Geneva from 17 September to 24 October. A major accomplishment of the session was a decision that the assured life of the whole body of tariff concessions, resulting from the tariff conferences in 1947, 1949 and 1950-51, would be extended until June 1955, thus providing continuing stability of tariffs for a substantial part of world trade. By another important decision, Japan was invited to participate in the work of the Contracting Parties, pending the time when tariff negotiations can be held. In addition, many Member countries agreed that their commercial relations with Japan would be governed by GATT provisions.

As part of the regular operation of GATT, consultations were held with a number of countries maintaining quantitative restrictions to safeguard their balance of payments and monetary reserves. During the session, the Netherlands and the Union of South Africa announced relaxations in their discriminatory balance-of-payments restrictions.

The settlement of several disputes which had arisen under GATT provisions was announced during the session and one long-standing complaint concerning Belgian "family allowances" was settled early in 1954. The most important complaint that remained unsolved concerned the United States restrictions on imports of dairy products; as in 1952, the Netherlands was authorized to retaliate by reducing in 1954 her purchases of wheat flour from the United States. The business of the session also included a review of actions taken by governments under waivers previously granted; in particular, that granted to the European Coal-Steel Community. The technical work which had been undertaken on the French plan⁶ for reducing tariff levels reached a definitive stage and the plan was referred to governments. Finally, the Contracting Parties decided to begin a review of the provisions of GATT late in 1954.

d. PUBLICATIONS

In 1953, the secretariat of GATT published International Trade 1952, a report which presents the work of GATT against a comprehensive account of the main developments in international trade since the War, with extensive statistical material (GATT/1953-2). A New Proposal for the Reduction of Customs Tariffs was issued as a popular explanation of the French plan for tariff reduction, which was completed at the eighth session. Two Supplements to Basic Instruments and Selected Documents were issued, the first (GATT/1953-1) containing important decisions, resolutions, recommendations and working party reports, adopted by the Contracting Parties between May and October 1952, and the second (GATT/1954-1) containing similar material for the period November 1952 to December 1953.

e. FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

The Interim Commission for ITO (ICITO) was financed from 1948 through 1950 by advances from the Working Capital Fund of the United Nations. These advances, which were authorized from time to time by resolutions of the General Assembly, amounted to $346,490. During 1953 ICITO repaid to the United Nations the final instalment of $216,773.

In accordance with the arrangements made with the Contracting Parties to GATT, the secretariat of ICITO is acting as a secretariat of this group of governments on a reimbursable basis. The governments parties to GATT participate in the repayment of ICITO in accordance with a scale of contributions which is assessed on their share of foreign trade. The scale of contributions is divided into seven categories:

The scale of contributions for 1953 was as follows (in U.S. dollars):

Category A	United Kingdom, United States each	$60,000
