However, the demand for solid fuel in Western Europe increased very little over that of 1951. Consumption of steam coals and coals for power production was lower in some countries, for example the United Kingdom, than it had been in the previous year, and increases were mainly in coking coals and coals for domestic consumption. The market saw very considerable changes during 1952. In the first quarter, the imports from the United States were at a record level of 9 million tons and by the end of the year they had fallen off very considerably. In the spring, stocks of steam coal and industrial coals began to accumulate, first at the pitheads in Belgium and later in France and in the United Kingdom. Industrial activity remained low and it was only towards the end of the year that consumption trends began to move in an upward direction again.

During the year, as the result of the accumulation of stocks, fears of a glut of coal were widely expressed and there was strong criticism of the continued import of coal from the United States. This led the Coal Committee, during the summer, to study urgently the causes of disorganization and fluctuation in the European coal market. It was clear from this study that, on the one hand, the main causes of fluctuation were situated in the chief producing countries but that, on the other hand, the most serious effects of fluctuations were to be seen either in the small importing countries or the small producing countries, in the latter case particularly Belgium. Following this survey, the Coal Committee decided that, in the future, one of its main tasks should be to attempt to bring greater stability to the European coal market.

The Committee was particularly interested in problems of stocking and de-stocking and in consumption trends studies—both in individual countries and on an international level—in problems of solid fuel qualities, and in prices.

The work of the Coal Committee was continued against a background of considerable change in the organization of the industry. Many participants in the Committee and their governments were seriously preoccupied with the setting up of the European Coal and Steel Community and this affected the Committee's work. However, the importance of the Committee's remaining the centre for a free exchange of views among interested countries on the problems facing the European coal industry as a whole was recognized during the meetings towards the end of the year.

Owing to the easing of the general supply situation, it was possible to reach agreement in the Coal Trade Sub-Committee at each of the quarterly meetings throughout the year on the recommended allocations of European export availabilities. However, owing to the shortage of coking coals, difficulty was experienced in meeting the requirements from European sources, including Western Germany.

The Classification Working Party met in July and December and drew up and adopted a report recommending unanimously an international scientific classification for hard coal by rank. Work was continued on a commercial classification for hard coal and on the classification of lignites and brown coal.

Work was also continued on a number of problems of utilization, in particular, the development of technical advisory services, the proper use of measuring instruments to improve results from existing plant, and development of a satisfactory system for exchanging technical experience.

During the year, the Monthly Bulletin of Coal Statistics was replaced by a Quarterly Bulletin of Coal Statistics for Europe. The Monthly Coal Statistical Summary continued to appear and a monthly News Sheet was circulated giving information on the main items of interest to the coal industry taking place each month.

(3) Committee on Electric Power

The Committee on Electric Power held its ninth session on 23 and 24 June. Following decisions taken at the session, detailed consideration was given to specific problems by a number of ad hoc groups of experts, various studies were undertaken by the secretariat and certain negotiations were conducted under its auspices (E/ECE/152-C and E/ECE/153-C).

In addition to a series of meetings on rural electrification, there were nine sessions of other expert groups throughout the year.

Thus legal questions concerning the hydro-electric development of rivers which cross common frontiers were the subject of study and proposals by a group of legal experts. Difficulties arising out of the harnessing and operation of the Drava River led to negotiations, through the secretariat, between Austria and Yugoslavia.

With the co-operation and financial support of the Technical Assistance Administration and FAO, a combined seminar and expert study group on rural electrification was held in Geneva over a period of two months. Sixteen European countries, the United States and Costa Rica sent participants and, as a result, a detailed study was prepared embodying recommendations on the electrification of rural communities. Proposals were also drafted for periodic examination of this question by experts.

A definitive study on Transfers of Electric Power across European Frontiers (E/ECE/151) was issued by the secretariat. This study, approved by the Committee, establishes the broad lines on which international trade in electricity might develop and defines the relatively few regions which are potentially suited to support large-scale exports over a number of years. In furtherance of its conclusions, preliminary discussions and negotiations were started between interested countries on the possibilities of systematic export of electric power from Yugoslavia.

Other studies issued by the secretariat included one on Prospects Opened up by Technical Progress in Electric Power Production (E/ECE/EP/127) and a second on Some Technical Aspects of the Transmission of Electric Power (E/ECE/EP/128). Another large-scale project carried to an advanced stage was a pioneer survey to determine how much electricity could be produced by Europe's rivers and lakes. The survey involves comparisons between different regions in respect of technical and economic limits to exploitable resources. A series of general studies of this type was carried out during the year and the first of the periodic surveys of the electric power situation in European countries was made in accordance with a decision taken at the Committee's ninth session.

The objectives and functions of the Electric Power Committee, as exemplified in these various activities, continued through the year to remain threefold in character. Both consumption of power and the natural sources for its production are very unevenly distributed in Europe, although demand everywhere has continued to show a rapid rate of increase. There has thus been a constant need to facilitate the efforts of different countries and to promote the optimum development of natural resources through co-operative measures. The Committee endeavoured to work towards this objective in three ways. It acted as a forum for the exchange of views on fundamental issues, maintaining in the process a close and constructive contact with other international bodies. In furtherance of this end the secretariat has at all times been available as a medium of contact between governments on specific issues for which they might wish to negotiate. Secondly, certain of the general studies of the Committee, including those of a statistical character, served the purpose of assembling documentation on subjects of current importance. Finally, a number of the year's results, including those in the field of rural problems, were obtained in areas of inquiry initiated by the Committee and now distinctively its own.

(4) Industry and Materials Committee

During 1952 most of the shortages in industry and materials experienced after the outbreak of the war in Korea eased, especially in the case of non-ferrous metals and sulphur. With a few exceptions, delivery periods for most types of engineering products had returned to normal in most European countries, while in the United Kingdom shortage of steel, especially of plates, limited the activities of certain industries, such as the ship-building industry. In various branches of industry, for example in the motor-vehicle industry, in continental European countries, capacity was not fully utilized.

The Industry and Materials Committee did not meet in 1952 (E/ECE/142-D and E/ECE/153-D). The activities of its subsidiary organs in the fields of engineering and materials continued to be governed by a programme of work drawn up towards the end of 1950 (E/ECE/IM/55).

The ad hoc Working Party on Contract Practices in Engineering met in January, May and December and agreed on the text of general conditions for the supply of plant and machinery for export. These general conditions embody a number of standard clauses for optional use in sales contracts for European engineering equipment and are available to interested parties. The ad hoc Working Party also decided to examine the possibility of preparing a set of permissive clauses for the setting up of plant, in view of the importance of that aspect in trade in engineering products with under-developed areas.

Work continued on a "pilot" machine-tool glossary designed, in the first instance, on a limited experimental basis to test out the possibility of enumerating terms used in the machine tool industry and their precise equivalents in several languages, according to methods devised by a UNESCO expert. The preparation of definitions and drawings for one thousand selected concepts to be embodied in the glossary was proceeding.

The state of supplies of engineering products for export overseas, especially to Latin America and to Asia and the Far East, was kept under review with the co-operation of the regional commissions concerned. Two appendices, one on exports of textile machinery from Europe to Latin America and the other on Latin American markets for tractors, were prepared for inclusion in A Study of Trade between Latin America and Europe.⁶⁴

Housing Sub-Committee

The Housing Sub-Committee, which met in September 1952 (E/ECE/IM/HOU/42) continued to develop work on housing and building in response to the wishes of the governments. Its work was also aimed at implementing, in Europe, the programme on housing and town and country planning recommended by the Social Commission and approved by the Economic and Social Council (E/ECE/142-D and E/ECE/153-D).

In most countries the number of dwellings under construction in 1952 was higher than in 1951 and in many countries greater than at any time since the war. This expansion was made possible by measures designed to encourage new building. In Western European countries such measures included lowering interest rates, relaxing licensing and granting credits and subsidies, as well as by the improvement in the supply of building materials. Despite progress in the rate of house construction in all European countries, most of these measures had failed to make any significant contribution in the backlog of unfulfilled needs.

The most important problems facing many countries were: the provision of finance for housing at low interest rates; the need for a long-term rent policy which would reduce the disparity between rents of pre-war and new housing; and the necessity of stemming and reducing the rising cost of building.

The Building Research Organizing Committee, one of the subsidiary organs of the Housing Sub-Committee, completed its task of formulating recommendations on the type of arrangements required for permanent systematic international collaboration in building research (E/ECE/IM/HOU/39). The close relationship between building research and documentation was especially stressed.

The solution which appeared to the Organizing Committee to offer the greatest degree of integration of efforts in these two fields, and greater economy than appeared possible if the work were to be divided between two separate organizations, was the amalgamation into a single organization of the International Council for Building Documentation (CIDB), established following a recommendation of the Housing Sub-Committee, with the organization envisaged for international collaboration in building research.

On the basis of recommendations of the Organizing Committee, the Housing Sub-Committee instructed its officers, in conjunction with the Executive Secretary, and in consultation with the representatives of interested governments and organizations, to take the necessary steps to organize international co-operation in building research on the general lines proposed. Preparations were made to bring the new arrangements into force by the middle of 1953.

The Sub-Committee also considered certain economic and technical studies prepared at its request by the secretariat and by rapporteurs in various countries, as well as progress reports on studies under way.

In the field of economic studies, the Sub-Committee drew to the attention of governments the completed study on "Methods and Techniques of Financing Housing in Europe" (E/ECE/IM/HOU/38), and in particular, to a number of points discussed in the study concerning the provision of finance for housing at low interest rates and the increasing responsibility of government institutions in the financing of housing. The Sub-Committee decided that current developments with regard to financing and investment in the field of housing should be treated in an annual report on housing policies pursued and results achieved, to be prepared as a basis for an annual examination by the Sub-Committee.

The Sub-Committee also examined a preliminary report on "European Rent Policies". The report analysed the problem of reducing the disparity between rents of old and new houses and providing adequate repairs and maintenance of the existing dwelling stock.

The Sub-Committee continued consideration of what further steps it could take to reduce the cost of building and, in particular, to increase the productivity of the industry. In this connexion it had before it a general study, entitled "Measures to Reduce the Cost of Building", containing recommendations for measures capable of yielding immediate or fairly short-term results. The Sub-Committee suggested that the final report should be examined, jointly, in each country by representatives of the government and the industry in the light of the particular problems and experiences in the country, and that the results of such studies and action taken should be regularly communicated to the ECE secretariat for transmission to other governments.

A series of specialized studies in the technical field were also in preparation, largely by rapporteurs. They concerned: productivity measurement; model building codes and regulations; contract practices; strength, stability and safety factors; more rational use of building materials; lifetime of a house; the role of the architect and the engineer; trends in mechanization; and the scale and continuity of demand.

A working Party on Housing and Building Statistics made detailed preparations for launching in 1953 a Quarterly Bulletin of Housing and Building Statistics for Europe.

(5) Inland Transport Committee

The Inland Transport Committee held two sessions during 1952, its first special session from 7 to 11 January and its ninth session from 15 to 19 July. The Committee's main attention continued to be directed towards problems relating to the formulation of a general transport policy designed to eliminate wastage and reduce transport cost. Questions such as co-ordination of transport and of development programmes, drawing up of international tariffs for Europe considered as a single economic unit, calculation of costs, and the establishment of internationally comparable transport statistics, were given priority (E/ECE/142-E and E/ECE/153-E).

Work continued on the economic studies necessary before any policy of international transport co-ordination can be examined. To enable the Committee to consider the co-ordination of capital expenditure programmes, the secretariat was asked to compile a list of such programmes in the various countries, and covering rail, road and inland waterway transport.

The Committee recommended that governments should set up special funds for the construction of roads as had already been done or was about to be done by certain countries, including France and Belgium. In collaboration with the International Road Federation (IRF), a first draft statute for a European Road Investment Fund was being prepared by the secretariat.

The Committee drew the attention of governments to the importance of using the same system of electrification in zones of heavy traffic for international services between neighbouring countries. It requested the International Railway Union (UIC) to keep it informed of bilateral conversations on this question and to submit to it a report analysing the economic advantages of the various possible solutions in the field of electrification. The UIC was also requested to lay down the basis for a future programme which would indicate the main lines, most advantageous from the economic standpoint, to be equipped so as to ensure the fullest possible efficiency of future electrification schemes.

The Committee attached particular importance to work on costs and tariffs, since there is a tendency in many countries to relate tariffs more closely to costs. The determination of costs and studies which would make it possible to compare costs as between the various means of transport are also essential for purposes of co-ordination.

The continuing work on rail tariffs has two main purposes:

(1) to bring harmony into the structure of these tariffs (the basis of which varies from country to country there being, for example, differences in the classification of goods, in the minimum tonnage needed before cheaper rates are applied, and in the way in which charges per kilometre fall as distance increases) and thereby considerably facilitate trade and simplify the work of consignors and consignees; and (2) to harmonize the presentation of tariffs by drawing up model internal and international tariffs. The possibility of establishing tariffs for road and waterway transport was also under study.

Although the Committee and its subsidiary bodies devoted special attention during the year to problems relating to the laying down of a general transport policy, the study of various operational or other short-term problems was also continued. For example, questions arising out of the application of the Customs conventions and the agreements removing restrictions on the freedom of road transport received attention. Efforts were made to co-ordinate regular international passenger services by road, operated by railways and by private companies, and to improve the standard of such services. Measures for the prevention of road traffic accidents and for increasing the degree of safety at level crossings were also being considered.

Work on the transport of perishable food-stuffs and dangerous goods continued and studies concerning containers and pallets got under way.

Two conventions, one to facilitate the crossing of frontiers for goods carried by rail and another to facilitate the crossing of frontiers for passengers and baggage, were signed by eight countries in January 1952. By the end of the year considerable improvements in the timetables of certain rail journeys had followed the signing of these conventions and the recommendations of the Committee's subsidiary body dealing with the simplification of frontier formalities.

Several governments had agreed to implement a resolution for the elimination of currency restrictions on the transfer of rail transport charges. As a result of another resolution, governments had granted facilities to privately owned railway wagons passing frontiers by rail.

With regard to road transport, a standard set of rules which governments propose to enforce through a general agreement, and which will be applicable to all international carriers, was prepared. The application of the TIR carnet scheme, which enables goods vehicles, after inspection and sealing in the country of departure, to proceed to a chosen point in the country of destination without detailed inspection and unloading at intervening frontier Customs stations, was brought up to date in the light of technical progress. This system also enables lorries to take their loads to a clearance point in the country of destination, thus avoiding disturbance of the load at the frontier.

A scheme for the introduction of an international insurance certificate covering third-party risks was prepared.⁶⁵

On a recommendation adopted by the Committee, an international non-governmental organization was set up to represent the interests of inland waterway carriers.

(6) Manpower Committee

No meetings of the Committee were held during 1952, its programme having been taken over, on the decisions of the governments, by ILO in April 1948.

⁶⁵ This entered into force in several countries during January 1953.

(7) Steel Committee

Meetings were held by the Committee and its Working Party on Scrap and Panel of Statistical Experts in February 1952 (E/ECE/142-F and E/ECE/153-F). During 1952 the problems before the Steel Committee were of a more varied nature than during the previous year. Supplies of raw materials, particularly ore coke and pig iron, had much improved. Scrap, however, still remained short. The Committee noted that, in response to earlier recommendations, the majority of European countries had substantially increased their scrap prices in 1951 and 1952 and many had organized scrap campaigns. Among other things, it approved the proposal of its Working Party on Scrap for the collection of statistics, through scrap merchants, of scrap deliveries according to types of consumers and origin of the scrap.

Despite the shortage of scrap, European steel production (excluding the USSR) rose still further to 73.9 million tons of crude steel as against 67.6 million tons in 1951.

The demand for steel products showed a tendency to slacken during the later part of the year, particularly in certain overseas areas so that some main European exporters, for want of orders, had difficulty in maintaining full production.

The secretariat of the ECE prepared and presented to the Steel Committee two major studies, one on trends in production and consumption of flat steel products and the other on Europe's position and prospects as an exporter of steel to other parts of the world.

The first study, entitled The European Steel Industry and the Wide-Strip Mill,⁶⁶ is concerned with the growth of demand for flat steel products and the potential results of the installation of continuous wide-strip mills in Western European countries. It analyses trends in production of flat products in the United States during the past 30 years, comparing them with the more recent developments in Western Europe. It reviews present and planned capacity for production of flat products in Western Europe, and the levels of output that might, on various assumptions, be attained by 1956, discussing, among other factors, the question of obsolescence. A chapter is devoted to production in the USSR and other countries of Eastern Europe, but sufficient details were not available to enable the analysis to be carried out as fully as that for Western Europe. The study examines the possible growth of the industries which are the principal consumers of flat products: the motor-vehicle, shipbuilding, containers, durable consumer goods and capital goods industries; it also makes a brief survey of Western Europe's export markets for flat products. It ends with a tentative assessment of future demand and draws a number of conclusions on the prospects of balancing production and consumption and on the measures which appear necessary if Europe is to derive the full potential benefit from the continuous wide-strip mill.

The second study, European Steel Exports and Steel Demand in non-European Countries (E/ECE/163) analyses the importance of trade in steel products both for European exporting countries and importing countries in other parts of the world. In particular, it discusses the main factors influencing steel demand in under-developed countries. Trends in consumption, and their probable development up to 1960, are also considered. The study reviews such factors as demand for particular steel products, the price policies of European steel exporters, and the relationship between the economic policies of industrialized countries and demand for steel in under-developed countries. This analysis is followed by statistics of production, consumption, imports and exports for more than 40 countries outside Europe and a brief factual account of steelmaking raw materials and sources of energy, the steel industries and any plans for development of these in each country considered.

During the year, collaboration between the secretariat of ECE and of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE) continued. Collaboration with the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA) also developed, particularly in connexion with the first meeting of the Expert Working Group on the Iron and Steel Industry in Latin America, sponsored jointly by ECLA and the Technical Assistance Administration of the United Nations, which was convened in October 1952 at Bogota.

The Quarterly Bulletin of Steel Statistics for Europe, the first issue of which appeared in December 1950, continued to be published. The Foreign Trade section was expanded in the course of the year so as to include data on finished steel products conforming to the Standard International Trade Classification, and new tables were added covering production and exports of raw materials in selected overseas countries. Data on the production and consumption of steelmaking raw materials and foreign trade in steel of the USSR were also added.

(8) Timber Committee

The Committee held two sessions in 1952, one in May and the other in October. At the May session, the Committee noted that since the end of 1951 the European market had undergone a complete change due to a sharp decline in the intensive demand for all types of timber. Estimates of prospective demand from Europe, the Middle East and other overseas countries for sawn softwood were established at 2.8 to 3 million standards for 1952, representing a reduction of 500,000 to 650,000 standards below actual imports in 1951. By the beginning of July, the downward price trend had been checked and buying had been resumed. By the end of September, a considerable amount of business had been done and the Committee's provisional estimates for the year 1952 essentially confirmed the forecasts made at its meeting in May (E/ECE/142-G and E/ECE/153-G).

The Committee considered that no difficulties should arise in obtaining supplies of pitprops for 1952 and this was borne out by events. Similarly, the supply situation for pulpwood had greatly improved.

A review of expected import requirements and export availabilities for sawn softwood, pitprops and pulpwood in 1953 indicated that the demand could be met.

At the May session the following progress reports were presented by the secretariat and noted by the Committee:

(a) timber price statistics and indices; (b) research on new methods for utilization of wood waste; (c) logging techniques; (d) other projects (definition of principles of the grading of commercial timber, study of problems in connexion with the use of wood in packaging, and the training of woodworking technicians).

At its October session, the Committee met with the European Forestry Commission of FAO to discuss the draft of a study of European Timber Trends and Prospects⁶⁷ prepared by the secretariats of FAO and ECE. The joint session recommended that, prior to publication, the study be revised in the light of observations made during the meeting and taking into account those observations which might be subsequently submitted by governments and experts. It further recommended the establishment of a Working Party composed of experts in the fields of forest policy, timber production, woodworking industry and the timber trade to consider proposals for future action so that the secretariat could make recommendations for submission to Member Governments well in advance of the next joint session.

(9) Committee on the Development of Trade

No meeting of the Committee on the Development of Trade was held in 1952, but work in this field was continued by the secretariat (E/ECE/142-H and E/ECE/153-H/Rev.1).

The secretariat received information from the governments concerned regarding the progress of relevant bilateral negotiation following the Consultation on Preparations for an Ad Hoc Meeting on Trade⁶⁸ and the views of governments on the question of a further ad hoc meeting. This information was communicated to governments in confidential communications and a consolidated statement summarizing the information to date was transmitted to governments on 20 February 1952.

Pursuant to the resolution concerning the Industry and Materials Committee, adopted at the seventh session of the Commission,⁶⁹ the Executive Secretary explored with governments the possibilities of calling a Consultation of Trade Experts and proposed that the Consultation be convened on 9 September 1952. Replies from fourteen governments indicated that they were, on the whole, favourable to the Consultation, including the date indicated, and a further three Governments, Ireland, the Netherlands and Switzerland, had no objection to the Consultation being held. No answer, however, was received from the Governments of Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Portugal, Romania and the USSR, in time for the convening of the Consultation contemplated for 9 September, and the Executive Secretary therefore considered that the Consultation could not take place.

In an Interim Report to governments on 18 August (E/ECE/153-H, Appendix B), he stated that, in view of the importance of the question of East-West trade, its current unsatisfactory state, and the unanimous decisions of the Commission expressing the willingness of governments to tackle this problem on a practical level utilizing the machinery of the Commission, he intended to continue his explorations with interested governments in order to examine the possibility of arranging a Consultation to take place later in the year, provided it could effectively help or supplement bilateral negotiations.

On 10 September 1952 the Executive Secretary conferred with the Minister of the USSR in Switzerland and explained why he wished, prior to approaching all ECE Governments anew, to consult the Government of the USSR as the major trading country in Eastern Europe concerning the desirability of holding a Consultation of trade experts in the latter part of December 1952 or early in January 1953. No reply was received from the Government of the USSR in time to convene a Consultation during these periods. But the Consultations were subsequently scheduled for the spring of 1953.

The Research and Planning Division of the secretariat prepared a detailed note on recent development in intra-European trade, published in Volume 4, No. 3, of the Economic Bulletin for Europe under the title: "Developments in Trade between Eastern and Western Europe from 1950 to mid-1952".

The secretariat was instrumental in bringing together, and arranging for, bilateral trade negotiations, with the consent of the Governments concerned, between the representatives of the Greek and Polish Chambers of Commerce. The talks took place from 1 September to 22 October 1952 in Geneva; and on 22 October a one-year trade agreement was signed for the exchange of goods totalling about $4 million in value each way.

b. ECONOMIC SURVEY OF EUROPE IN 1951

The Economic Survey of Europe in 1951 (E/ECE/140/Rev.1),⁷⁰ published in February 1952, was the fifth annual survey prepared by the secretariat of the Commission.

The Survey, based on official statistics and statistical estimates made by the secretariat, showed that in the sixth post-war year production in Europe (excluding the USSR) continued to expand, but, as in previous years, agriculture lagged behind industry. Agricultural production in Europe as a whole in 1951 had exceeded the level reached in the late 'thirties by only a few per cent, whereas industrial production was about 40 per cent higher. The increase in total industrial production in Europe as a whole during the war amounted to 12 per cent. In the USSR the index of gross industrial output rose by 16 per cent and was about twice as high as in 1940. By the third quarter of the year, production in Western Europe began to be noticeably affected by the recession in consumer demand. The European grain harvest in 1951 was bigger than that of 1950, but the potato crop was inferior.

The Survey pointed out that very considerably increased demands were placed on the engineering industries of Western Europe during the year.

The engineering industry of Western Europe, taken as a whole, was able to meet these increased demands for private investment and export without undue strain because: (1) that industry, especially in Western Germany, had been operating well below its 1950 capacity; and (2) in 1951 investment in plant and equipment was sharply reduced in national industries and non-nationalized industries mainly operated as public enterprises.

In the field of trade, the Survey indicated, two major changes were primarily responsible, along with speculative capital flows, for the abrupt reversal of the dollar fortunes of the United Kingdom in 1951. One of these was the great rise in imports in 1951, in turn attributable chiefly to the necessity of building up again its stocks of raw materials and foodstuffs after the reductions which had been made in 1950. The violent rise and fall in international raw material prices since the start of the Korean war was the second major cause of the new payments crisis. Mainly because of these two factors, the trade of the sterling area as a whole with dollar countries and with continental Europe took a sudden adverse turn equivalent to over $2 billion per year in the middle of 1951.

The Survey declared that no contribution to the solution of Western Europe's growing balance-of-payments problems, or to certain difficulties experienced in developing production in Eastern Europe, had come from revived trade between the two areas. On the contrary, trade between Eastern and Western Europe in 1951 declined further from the already abnormally low level it had reached by 1950.

From data available on trade among Eastern European countries during the period under review the Survey suggested that three main tendencies appeared to emerge:

(1) a very considerable increase in Eastern Germany's trade with the other countries of the area; (2) a further large increase in trade between the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries; and (3) a rather small increase, compared with previous years, in the volume of trade among the countries of the region other than the Soviet Union and Eastern Germany.

In addition to the review of general economic developments in Europe, the Survey contained two special chapters, one dealing with the European coal problem and the other with economic developments in the Soviet Union. The chapter about coal described production problems and investment plans in Belgium, France, Western

Germany, Poland and the United Kingdom, and coal consumption trends and policies. It described the coal shortage experienced during the year as both the most serious and the most unnecessary of Europe's post-war commodity shortages, and urged vigorous measures both to expand European production of coal and to economize in its use. The chapter about the Soviet Union discussed Soviet statistical sources, analysed the trend of industrial and agricultural production and the trend and allocation of the national income, and also dealt with the question of monetary stability.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FOURTEENTH SESSION

The Council considered the Fourth Annual Report of ECE (E/2187 and Add.1) at its 594th to 596th plenary meetings from 6 to 9 June. It also had before it the Economic Survey of Europe in 1951 and a note by the Secretary-General (E/2221) concerning the Commission's work programme and priorities for 1952-53.

In introducing the Annual Report, the Executive Secretary of the Commission stated that there were two basic problems, both of which arose from the division of Europe into two large political groups. The first problem was the lack of participation of certain European countries in the committees of ECE, and the second was that there had been little progress in utilizing the organization for promoting East-West trade.

Representatives in the Council expressed general satisfaction with the work of the Commission and commended its efforts towards promoting East-West trade. It was also generally agreed that growing co-operation between ECE, ECAFE and ECLA was a significant and beneficial development.

Several representatives, among them those of Belgium, France, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, expressed appreciation of the Survey and various studies undertaken by the Commission. The representatives of Belgium, France and Sweden emphasized that, while research and studies were very useful, the major objective of the Commission was to devise practical activities leading to concrete achievements. In this connexion, the representative of France cited the importance of the work of the Commission's subsidiary technical bodies, particularly the Coal and Inland Transport Committees.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR declared that the Survey had not given an accurate and objective picture of the European economy. The USSR representative felt that the Commission had been inadequate in promoting the export of capital equipment to under-developed countries.

The representative of the United States noted with regret that a number of Eastern European countries had not participated in several of the subsidiary bodies of the Commission. He felt that their continued absence was hard to reconcile with their professed interest in the problems of the region. The representative of the USSR stated that the USSR, itself, was in the best position to determine the subsidiary organs of ECE in which it could most usefully participate. He and the representatives of Czechoslovakia and Poland were of the opinion that the economic situation in Western Europe had deteriorated due to the influence exerted by the United States and its rearmament programme.

The Council at its 596th plenary meeting on 9 June 1952 rejected by 9 votes to 3, with 6 abstentions, a Czechoslovak draft resolution (E/L.354) which proposed that the Council grant voting rights in the Economic Commission for Europe to States non-members of the United Nations which participated in a consultative capacity in the work of the Commission.

The Council unanimously adopted as resolution 418 (XIV) the draft resolution proposed by the Commission (E/2187), taking note of the Annual Report of ECE and of the views expressed by the Commission during its seventh session.

2. Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE)

The Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE) held its eighth session⁷¹ in Rangoon, Burma, from 29 January to 8 February 1952 and reported (E/2171) to the Economic and Social Council at its fourteenth session, held from 20 May to 1 August 1952. An account of action taken by the Commission at its eighth session and of consideration by the Council of the Commission's report, covering the period 8 March 1951 to 8 February 1952, together with a description of other activities of the Commission during 1952, is given below.

a. PROBLEMS OF INDUSTRY AND TRADE

At its eighth session, the Commission approved (E/CN.11/343) the report of its Committee on ⁷¹ For a list of meetings of the Commission and its main subsidiary bodies, see p. 53.

Industry and Trade (E/CN.11/314), subject to minor amendments, thus approving a number of work projects, studies, conferences and surveys, as well as reports of other subsidiary bodies. Among the projects approved by the Commission were:

The convening of a regional conference on mineral resources development; a resolution requesting supplying countries to make increased efforts to assist countries of the region in the supply of pig iron, semi-finished and finished steel products; a group visit of experts to study methods and techniques of the iron and steel industry in Japan, with the assistance of the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration (TAA); work on small-scale industries and handicraft marketing, including a working party to be held in July 1952; dissemination of information on industrial organizations in the public sector and a seminar on the structure and management of such organizations; continued work on the supply position and availability of DDT and antibiotics; increased attention to building and housing materials, including an inter-secretariat working party with the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) and the World Health Organization (WHO); continued work on trade promotion; the convening of a second ECAFE Conference on Trade Promotion in the Philippines early in 1953; projects on trade analysis including marketing and distribution surveys, working of financial and trade agreements; the joint ECAFE/ECE/FAO study of trade between the ECAFE region and Europe; intensification of work on problems relating to financing economic development and mobilization of domestic capital, including a working party to be held in September 1952.

(1) Industrial Development

Electric power: The Sub-Committee on Electric Power held two sessions during 1952 (one in January and one in September to October) at which reports were considered concerning power projects and organizational problems; the relationship between industrial and power development; rural electrification; techniques of estimating future power demands; requirements of electric power plant and equipment; lignite resources of the region, their exploration and utilization (E/CN.11/EP/3, 5, and 13 to 16).

Iron and steel: The Sub-Committee on Iron and Steel did not meet in 1952. A group of iron and steel experts, however, visited Japan during September and October. The group, which included participants from most countries of the region, was organized in co-operation with TAA. Advisory services on iron and steel industries were provided for Ceylon and Burma. Work was continued during 1952 on the amplification of the Directory of Laboratory Facilities; the formulation of uniform statistical reporting methods; and on scrap classification. Information was collected on import requirements of pig iron, semi-finished and finished steel for 1952 and 1953, and forwarded to ECE, whose Steel Committee drew them to the attention of the supplying countries.

Mineral resources: During 1952, the secretariat's report on coal and iron ore resources of Asia and the Far East⁷² was published. Preparations were made for a mineral resources conference to be held in Tokyo in April 1953, with the co-operation of TAA. A secretariat study on activities in the field of mineral resources development (E/CN.11/I&T/75, Annexes A to E) was issued; its annexes included a report on the kaolin resources of the region and a paper on mining development in Asia and the Far East during 1951.

Cottage and small-scale industries: The second meeting of the Working Party on Small-Scale Industries and Handicraft Marketing was held in July 1952. The draft outline for a study of the economic aspects of cottage industries (E/CN.11/I&T/CIWP.2/6) was approved and a report on research and training facilities (E/CN.11/I&T/CIWP.2/2) was considered. The Working Party also considered problems of marketing the products of cottage and small-scale industries and handicrafts.

Production of DDT and medical supplies: In view of the improved supply situation, with emphasis shifting from procurement to distribution and utilization of available supplies, it was not felt necessary to convene during 1952 the joint ECAFE/UNICEF/WHO/FAO inter-secretariat Working Party on DDT and Medical Supplies.

Fields of economic development handicapped by lack of trained personnel: The joint ECAFE/ILO/UNESCO inter-secretariat Working Party, at its second session in October 1952, reviewed the progress made and the problems involved in meeting specific shortages of trained personnel, and recommended that seminars on management techniques be organized on a national basis. It emphasized the importance of large-scale training of workers, artisans and village craftsmen and of undertaking manpower surveys in the countries of the region.

Power alcohol: The seminar on production and use of power alcohol was held in October and November 1952, under the joint auspices of ECAFE and TAA, in co-operation with FAO. The seminar emphasized the imperative need for a supplementary source of fuel in the form of power alcohol pressed from raw materials available in the region. Recommendations included the organizing of a survey of raw materials, the increasing of the cultivation of heavy alcohol-yielding crops, investigations on the hydrolysis of cellulosic materials, storage of molasses, analytical control of production, and the need for the supply of gasoline of standard quality.

Housing and building materials: The first meeting of the inter-secretariat Working Party on Housing and Building Materials was held in November 1952, with a secretariat staff attending from FAO, ILO, UNESCO, WHO, the United Nations Department of Social Affairs and ECAFE. A preliminary report by ECAFE on housing and building materials in the ECAFE region (E/CN.11/I&T/HBWP/L.4) was considered and a work programme for ECAFE, FAO, ILO, UNESCO and WHO recommended. ECAFE was considered a suitable agency for regional co-ordination at the secretariat level of work carried out by the various agencies in the field. The Working Party welcomed: (1) action taken by the Government of India in organizing an international exhibition on low-cost housing; and (2) its assistance in connexion with a regional seminar on housing and building materials, to be held in New Delhi early in 1954, with the co-operation of TAA.

(2) Trade and Finance

In considering the report of the Committee on Industry and Trade (E/CN.11/314), the Commission also considered a report on capital goods and materials (E/CN.11/315), and adopted a resolution (E/CN.11/343) approving the report, the work undertaken by the secretariat and the recommendations contained in the report. The Commission made additional recommendations concerning the financing of electric power development, supplies of machinery and equipment, supplies of sulphur, capital goods and material requirements and the expansion of exports.

The Commission recommended, among other things, that special consideration be given by the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and the International Bank to the urgent need of the under-developed countries for financial assistance for electric power projects. It urged countries producing electric power plant and machinery for the iron and steel industry to give high priority to the requirements of under-developed countries. It recommended that supplying countries also give priority to import requirements of the countries of the ECAFE region for projects already under way. The Commission further recommended exchange of information concerning the need for and supply of capital and essential goods and that the regional conference on trade promotion in 1953 make proposals for a programme of work in regard to measures for increasing exports and the proceeds therefrom from countries of the region.

Mobilization of domestic capital: ECAFE's Working Party on the Mobilization of Domestic Capital held its second session in Bangkok in September 1952. It surveyed the experience of countries in mobilizing domestic capital, discussed development and finance corporations, examined the relationship between foreign capital and the mobilization of domestic capital, and made recommendations in all these fields. A progress report on the analysis of financial aspects of development plans (E/CN.11/I&T/82) was issued, outlining a scheme for the classification of development expenditures to facilitate analysis of development plans and methods for the estimation of foreign exchange requirements of development programmes.

Trade between ECAFE countries and Europe: Work on the study of trade between ECAFE countries and Europe, jointly undertaken by the secretariats of ECAFE, ECE and FAO, continued in 1952. A preliminary report (E/CN.11/TP/8) was nearing completion at the end of the year.

Supply of capital goods and materials: A report indicating the progress of work regarding the supply of capital goods and materials (E/CN.11/I&T/79) was issued in 1952. It showed the secretariat's activities in collecting information about urgent requirements of ECAFE countries in certain capital goods and materials. This information was transmitted to ECE and through ECE brought to the attention of the supplying countries.

Advisory services concerning better postal savings facilities and related matters to assist in the mobilization of domestic capital were rendered in 1952 to Pakistan.

Trade promotion: Preparations were made during 1952 for the second ECAFE conference on trade promotion to be held in Manila in February and March 1953. Papers prepared for the conference covered implementation of recommendations of the first ECAFE conference on trade promotion (E/CN.11/TP/6); technical and marketing research as an aid to trade (E/CN.11/TP/7); preliminary report on trade between the ECAFE region and Europe (E/CN.11/TP/8) (in co-operation with the secretariats of ECE and FAO); regional organization of trade associations (E/CN.11/TP/4); suggested form and content of market reports by trade representatives abroad (E/CN.11/TP/3); training in trade promotion techniques (E/CN.11/TP/5; and selected import needs and export availabilities (E/CN.11/TP/10).

The ECAFE secretariat, in co-operation with TAA, during 1952 continued to assist governments in the improvement of their trade-promotion machinery and in the provision of facilities for the training of trade-promotion personnel. The form and content of Trade Promotion News was revised and issues published every two months. A "Glossary of Commercial Terms", first prepared in 1951, was circulated to governments and was to be published for wider circulation.

An exhibition of handloom textiles from the countries of the region was organized in connexion with the Working Party on Small-Scale Industries and Handicrafts Marketing, with exhibits from ten countries on display. In the deliberations of the working party, considerable attention was paid to marketing problems and TAA experts in marketing and design examined and analyzed the exhibited handicrafts for their export suitability. A Japanese spinning machine was also demonstrated.

Travel: In the field of travel promotion, ECAFE transferred its activities as from 1 August 1952 to the newly established Asian and Far Eastern Travel Commission of the International Union of Official Travel Organizations, including the publication of Asian Travelways and the compilation of Travel Formalities.

b. INLAND TRANSPORT

At its eighth session, the Commission considered the report of the first session of the Inland Transport Committee (E/CN.11/312), held at Bangkok from 17 to 22 December 1951, and adopted a resolution (E/CN.11/340) approving the report and the general lines of the work set out in it. The Committee was due to hold its second session in January 1953.

The Highway Sub-Committee of the Inland Transport Committee met during August 1952; meetings of the Railway Sub-Committee and Inland Waterway Sub-Committee were scheduled for January 1953. Quarterly publication of the Transport Bulletin and the Railway Statistical Bulletin continued.

Co-ordination of transport: The secretariat continued studies on this subject during 1952. A preliminary document (E/CN.11/TRANS/88) analysing and summarizing basic information supplied by governments was prepared.

Highways: During 1952, the Highway Sub-Committee considered the standard highways maintenance register (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.2/3), as finalized by the secretariat; standard forms for recording data on cement concrete road pavements (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.2/4); highway bridge register (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.2/5); highway project schemes (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.2/6); vehicle maintenance and repair, and training of mechanics (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.2/7); and reclamation of worn automotive equipment (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.2/8).

Inland waterways: A draft was prepared during 1952 for the final report of the Expert Working Group on Inland Water Transport from Asia and the Far East; the chapter of this report containing recommendations for various countries of the region was revised (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.3/3 and Add.1, 2 and 3). Preparations continued, in co-operation with TAA, for the establishment of two demonstration/pilot projects in India and Pakistan on improved design and operation of craft.

The following studies were undertaken during 1952: uniform craft measurement (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.3/5); current inland waterway development (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.3/7) and inclusion of coastal shipping in the terms of reference of the Inland Transport Committee (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.3/6).

Railways: During 1952, preparations continued, in co-operation with TAA, for the establishment of a regional railway training centre to be opened in 1953 for operating and signalling officers at Lahore, Pakistan. A group of sixteen senior Asian railway officials made a study trip to Europe, North America and Japan to observe modern systems of train working and signalling and to make detailed recommendations for the curriculum and demonstration equipment for the new regional training centre.

The following studies were undertaken during 1952: economic use of firewood in steam locomotives (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.1/5, 19 and 19/Add.1); use of low grade coal as locomotive fuel (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.1/1); techniques of burning fuel oil (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.1/2); best types of Diesel locomotives and railcars for the region (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.1/6 and Add.1 and 16); productivity of labour in railway workshops (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.1/9L.1 and L.2); improved methods of track construction and maintenance (ECAFE/TRANS/Sub.1/1); and standardization of railway rolling stock (E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.1/3 and E/CN.11/TRANS/Sub.1/20).

c. FLOOD CONTROL

At its eighth session, the Commission considered the annual report of its Bureau of Flood Control (E/CN.11/311) and commended the work of the Bureau. In particular, it welcomed the shift of emphasis of the Bureau's work from flood control to the wider aspects of water resources development, and expressed the view that the study on methods and problems of flood control prepared by the Bureau was a valuable work of reference for flood control engineers in the region. A resolution was adopted (E/CN.11/338), approving the programme of work of the Bureau and requesting TAA to give favourable consideration to the organization of a training centre on water resources development for engineers of the region.

Multiple-purpose river basin development: In response to the Commission's resolution, the Bureau of Flood Control in 1952 formulated a work programme aiming at the promotion of multiple-purpose river basin development. It comprised the following main projects:

(1) A country-by-country survey of water resources, present status and future plans of development, and a study and analysis of problems and difficulties encountered in water resources development. (Surveys for Burma, Ceylon, China (Taiwan), India, Japan and the Philippines have since been completed, and surveys for Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Pakistan, Thailand and Vietnam are under way.)

(2) A manual giving the general principles and detailed methods of planning multiple-purpose river basin development for the use of engineers of the region.

(3) Organization of a training centre on water resources development, in co-operation with TAA, to open in 1954.

(4) Regional technical conference on water resources development, to be held in 1954.

Flood control methods: Work continued during 1952 on flood control problems of common interest to the region, such as silting, bank protection and river training. A study on the silt problem was being conducted jointly with the East Punjab Irrigation Research Institute of India and the Hydraulic Laboratory of the Royal Irrigation Department of Thailand. A preliminary report on bank protection and river training (FLOOD/9) was prepared.

Technical advice and assistance to governments: Services rendered to governments in 1952 included: (1) field investigations and advice to the State Government of Orissa, India, on flood control and extension of irrigation in the delta area of the Mahanadi River; and (2) a report to the State Government of Pepsu, India, on flood control of the Patiala and East Punjab States Union.

Flood control of international rivers: A technical study of the lower Mekong river basin was undertaken during 1952 in co-operation with the governments of Cambodia, Laos, Thailand and Vietnam, and a preliminary report on technical problems relating to flood control and water resources development of the Mekong (FLOOD/-8) was issued. Further detailed field investigations were conducted to ascertain the technical feasibility of developing irrigation, water power and navigation on an 800 km. stretch where the river forms a common border between Laos and Thailand.

Hydraulic research stations: Information on the personnel, essential equipment and problems under investigation in the various hydraulic laboratories of the region was published in the Bureau's Flood Control Journal.

Dissemination of technical reports: In co-operation with TAA, a considerable volume of technical handbooks, standard works, research publications and technical reports were made available during 1952 to technical organizations of the region.

d. RESEARCH AND STATISTICS

At its eighth session, the Commission had before it a note by the Executive Secretary on the annual Economic Survey of Asia and the Far East and the quarterly Economic Bulletin (E/CN.11/316). The Commission expressed general commendation of both these publications as valuable works of reference; it was suggested, however, that a more analytical approach would be useful, especially in the Survey. It was generally agreed that it would be valuable for future sessions of the Commission to open with a discussion on the economic situation of the region, such discussion to be based on the most recent Survey and the half-yearly review published in the quarterly Bulletin. A proposal to shorten the Survey, by concentrating on the developments of the year under review and by the inclusion of articles of a more general character in the Bulletin instead of in the Survey, was welcomed. Various suggestions were made regarding the timing, scope and structure of future Surveys, and the Executive Secretary, while pointing out certain difficulties, assured the Commission that he would give careful consideration to those suggestions.

Economic Survey of Asia and the Far East: Work was completed during 1952 on two editions of the Economic Survey of Asia and the Far East: that for 1951 was published in the latter half of 1952 and the publication date of the 1952 edition was advanced so that printed copies would be available early in 1953, when the Commission and the Economic and Social Council were expected to discuss the regional and world economic situations respectively.

The 1951 Survey consisted of three parts (production; international trade and payments; money, prices and finance). Chapters of a general background character were omitted, making the edition appreciably shorter.

The 1952 Survey described and analysed economic developments, mainly during the first half of that year, though later developments were noted where data was available. Subsequent Surveys would cover the period from mid-year to mid-year.

The 1952 Survey stated that strongly conflicting tendencies had marked economic developments in the Asian region up to the autumn of 1952. Production had continued to increase although the per capita volume in agriculture had remained below the pre-war level. Raw material production had expanded and industrial production benefited from the supply of new equipment, the Survey stated. The advance was uneven, however, and there were signs of a slowing down of the pace of economic activities in India and Japan. Foreign trade had been adversely affected by a decline in demand, and the drop in export prices had made deep inroads into export earnings. The Survey showed a sharp worsening in the terms of trade of all but the rice-producing countries; adding that progress in production had failed to bring about a corresponding increase in real income. The decline in export incomes had affected purchasing power, which had not kept pace with the increase in home supplies, the Survey said. Inflationary pressures had been gradually neutralized and had finally given way to a tendency for prices to weaken.

As a result of the collapse of the export boom many governments had begun to suffer loss in revenue and, to make up for this decline, were trying to tap new sources of income and achieve savings in expenditure, the Survey said.

At the same time, foreign exchange reserves had decreased and gains in reserves made during the boom had, in some cases, been practically wiped out. The Survey observed that these changes were very rapid and had once again proved the great economic vulnerability of countries of the region which depended heavily on the exports of a small range of commodities.

The trade recession had turned the financing of imports into an acute problem, the Survey stated. The decline in foreign exchange reflected to no small extent the subsiding of abnormal demands caused by the war in Korea. It was pointed out, however, that at the same time the world supply of raw materials had increased and that this factor might assume increasing significance in the future as a restraint on prices.

The Survey noticed evidences of a change in the composition of primary production, with expansion continuing in the case of many commodities—not only food. The prices of many commodities were still attractive to producing countries.

The Survey expected import requirements in the developing countries to grow, causing heavy pressure on foreign exchange. In this situation consumption and development would compete strongly for import finance, the Survey stated.

Quarterly Economic Bulletin: Publication of the Economic Bulletin for Asia and the Far East continued in 1952. Governments of the region co-operated in the regular supply of current statistical data for the preparation of the semi-annual review of economic developments in the region and the quarterly sections on Asian statistics of production, transport, trade, prices, money and banking. The Bulletin, which is intended to provide a regular review of economic conditions in the area during the intervals between publication of the annual Economic Survey, also contained a number of special articles on economic problems of the region.

Standard international trade classification: The Commission, at its eighth session, had before it the report of the Working Party on the Standard International Trade Classification (SITC), conducted jointly by the ECAFE Secretariat and the Statistical Office of the United Nations (E/CN.11/317). The report was generally commended. A resolution (E/CN.11/336) was adopted, requesting the Executive Secretary, in collaboration with the United Nations Statistical Office, to discuss with governments the application of the SITC in the light of the Working Party's report and of any subsequent action by the United Nations Statistical Commission.

Statistical conferences and secretariat activities in the field of statistics: At its eighth session, the Commission considered a note by the Executive Secretary on the secretariat's activities in the field of statistics (E/CN.11/318), a report on Statistical Organization and Activities (E/CN.11/322 and Annexes A-K), and a report on Methods of National Income Estimation (E/CN.11/323 and Add.1 and Annexes A-C). These reports were generally commended, several delegations expressing the view that the secretariat's activities in the field of statistics constituted one of its most important contributions to Asian economic development. A resolution (E/CN.11/337) was adopted, which, inter alia, requested the Executive Secretary, subject to the concurrence of the second regional conference of statisticians and in co-operation with the Statistical Office and TAA, to convene a third regional conference in 1953-54 to consider the adaptation, to the special conditions of the region, of standard practices for the estimation of national income.

During 1952, work continued on the compilation of files on basic statistical series on production, transport, trade, finance and prices. The index of economic statistics was expected to be ready for publication towards the end of 1953.

The second regional conference of statisticians was held in September 1952 by ECAFE in collaboration with the United Nations Statistical Office, FAO and TAA, in response to the Commission's request. Main items were agricultural production statistics, industrial production statistics, and wholesale price statistics. The Conference concurred with the Commission's recommendation to hold a third regional conference of statisticians in the ECAFE area in 1953 or 1954 to consider the application and promotion of international standards in the estimation of national income.

At its eighth session, the Commission, noting the analysis of food and agricultural conditions in Asia and the Far East contained in a report by FAO (E/CN.11/320) and a statement by the representative of FAO, gave special attention to the fact that production was falling behind the rate of population increase. It noted with approval the recommendation of the FAO General Conference that countries should intensify work on agricultural development plans, with a view to expanding production by means of improved agricultural techniques, price stabilization and agrarian reforms, including land tenure changes. It emphasized the desirability of further developing paper and pulp production in the region.

The Commission adopted a resolution on land reform (E/CN.11/341). It also recommended that increased attention should be given to agricultural problems in the region, and urged still closer working relations between the secretariats of the Commission and FAO. In this connexion, the Commission noted the forthcoming discussions between the Director-General of FAO and the Executive Secretary regarding the possibility of establishing an agricultural division in the secretariat, on a joint basis with FAO, similar to the divisions established in the secretariats of ECE and ECLA. The Commission supported this development in principle.

A joint ECAFE/FAO agriculture division was set up during 1952 and located at the temporary headquarters of the Commission, with staff jointly provided by the two organizations. A work programme of the joint division was established; it included a continuing review of economic developments in the fields of food and agriculture, agricultural development planning, agrarian reform, supplying of regional information on marketing and assistance to FAO headquarters in the preparation of the regional FAO conference on the agricultural situation.

f. RELATIONS WITH TAA AND ILO

At its eighth session, the Commission noted with satisfaction various aspects of closer co-operation with TAA as well as increasingly close working relations between the ECAFE secretariat and ILO.

During 1952, close co-operation was maintained between ECAFE and TAA. The ECAFE secretariat brought to the notice of TAA many regional needs for technical assistance and TAA, in turn, sought the secretariat's advice in the preparation of its own operational programmes and in the implementation of requests from countries. The secretariat continued to comment on fellowship and scholarship applications, in accordance with the Commission's request, and on requests by governments to TAA for technical assistance.

During 1952, TAA co-operated with ECAFE in the following activities: study trip of Asian railway experts to Europe, America and Japan; study trip of Asian iron and steel experts to Japan; seminar on the production and utilization of power alcohol; second regional conference of statisticians; and distribution of technical documentation.

g. REPRESENTATION, MEMBERSHIP AND AMENDMENTS OF THE RULES OF PROCEDURE

At its eighth session, the Commission considered two proposals by the USSR calling for: (1) the exclusion of the "representative of the Kuomintang" and the invitation of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to participate in the work of the Commission; and (2) the exclusion of the "representatives of South Korea and of Bao-Dai Vietnam" on the ground that they did not represent Korea and Vietnam respectively. The Commission adopted a motion for adjournment of the debate on the first motion, on the ground that it was inappropriate for the Commission to deal with this question while it was under consideration by the General Assembly, and the second proposal was ruled out of order by the Chairman on the ground that these countries had been elected associate members of the Commission.⁷³

The recommendation of the Commission to admit Japan as an associate member of the Commission (E/2171) was considered by the Economic and Social Council at its 597th plenary meeting on 10 June 1952. The Council also had before it a draft resolution by Pakistan (E/L.306), consideration of which had been postponed at the Council's resumed thirteenth session in December 1951.

The representative of Pakistan withdrew his draft resolution, which also sought the admission of Japan as an associate member, in favour of the text recommended by the Commission. He moved an amendment, however, according to which the Council would amend (instead of resolve to amend) the terms of reference of the Commission, on the ground that this would enable the Commission to invite representatives of Japan to participate forthwith in the work of the Commission. After support for the Commission's draft resolution had been expressed by the representatives of China, Egypt, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, the Council adopted, by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention, both the amendment and the draft resolution as amended and incorporated it in resolution 419 (XIV). By this resolution it amended the Commission's terms of reference to include Japan in the geographical scope of the Commission and among its associate members.

Amendments to the rules of procedure were also adopted (E/CN.11/339/Rev.1) by the Commission at its eighth session, on the basis of a note by the Executive Secretary (E/CN.11/329) regarding the recommendations of the Economic and Social Council at its thirteenth session (resolution 414 (XIII)).⁷⁴ The Council's recommendations related to the date and place of sessions of regional economic commissions and consultative arrangements between regional economic commissions and non-governmental organizations.⁷⁵

h. INVITATIONS CONCERNING ECAFE HEADQUARTERS AND THE NINTH SESSION OF THE COMMISSION

At its eighth session, the Commission had before it an invitation from the Government of the Philippines for it to establish its headquarters in Manila (E/CN.11/330). The representative of the Philippines suggested that closer relations could be developed between the countries and peoples of the region if the temporary headquarters of the Commission were established in a different part of the region every three or four years. The representative of Ceylon stated that his Government was equally anxious to act as host to the Commission. As regards the permanent headquarters, however, this was a matter for the General Assembly to decide.

The Commission agreed to consider the question further at its ninth session.

It unanimously recommended the acceptance of an invitation from the Government of Indonesia to hold the ninth session, and the meetings immediately preceding it, in Bandung (E/CN.11/L.46).

i. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FOURTEENTH SESSION

At its fourteenth session, held from 20 May to 1 August 1952, the Economic and Social Council considered, at its 597th meeting on 10 June, the report of ECAFE on its eighth session (E/2171), held from 29 January to 8 February 1952.

The Council had before it a draft resolution in two parts, recommended by the Commission for adoption by the Council. The first part would have the Council take formal note of the report and the programme of work and priorities it contained. The second part concerned the admission of Japan as an associate member of the Commission and amendment of the Commission's terms of reference accordingly.

The representatives of France, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States commended the report and the work achieved by the Commission. Generally speaking, these representatives felt that the Commission had made progress in wide fields under difficult circumstances; that it was helping the countries of the ECAFE region to draw greater benefit from their relations with each other and with countries outside the area; and that it was helping to hasten economic development and to reduce poverty, hunger and disease.

The Council, by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention, adopted as a whole a resolution (resolution 419(XIV)) in which it took note of the report.

3. Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA)

The Economic Commission for Latin America, established by the Economic and Social Council at its sixth session in March 1948 (106(VI)), had held four sessions up to 1 January 1952. At this time it was committed to a work programme laid down at the fourth session, involving several continuing projects as well as new activities.

The Committee of the Whole met in Santiago from 11 to 14 February 1952, when it reviewed and approved the Commission's programme of work for 1952, which was divided into the following broad categories: economic development; economic problems of agriculture; international trade; the Economic Survey of Latin America. The Committee also noted proposals for seminars, meetings of experts and round-table discussions which had been envisaged in implementation of the Commission's programme. The programme of work and the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole are fully described in the Commission's fourth annual report to the Economic and Social Council (E/2185).

Close co-ordination between ECLA and other United Nations organs and agencies continued, as well as between ECLA and the Inter-American Economic and Social Council. A new feature was the joint work undertaken by ECLA and the Technical Assistance Administration (TAA) both in the field of industrial studies and the Training Centre for Economic Development.

The practical work of the Commission became more pronounced during 1952. The following is an account of its principal activities.

a. RESEARCH PROGRAMME

During the year, the ECLA secretariat was engaged in a large-scale programme of research, which the Commission at its fourth session had asked should be furnished to the fifth session at Rio de Janeiro in 1953. This research programme may be classified broadly under the following headings:

(a) Economic development, including the Economic Survey of Latin America 1951-1952, problems of the technique of programming, the economic integration of Central America and a special study on Ecuador;

(b) Industry, including special studies on iron and steel, and on paper and pulp;

(c) Trade, covering both intra-regional trade and trade between Europe and Latin America;

(d) Agriculture, including an analysis of factors hampering increased agricultural production, and country studies (Brazil, Peru, Ecuador).

While most of these projects were scheduled for completion in 1953, the secretariat in 1952 completed the studies on the iron and steel industry in Latin America, on economic integration and reciprocity in Central America, and on economic development in Ecuador. In view of the fact that ECLA did not hold a regular session in 1952, it was decided not to issue separately during the year the Economic Survey for 1951 but to cover both 1951 and 1952 in one issue. In accordance with the recommendation of the Commission at its fourth session, work was also undertaken on technological research and training.

Many of the projects described below also involved research, as, for example, the transportation survey in Central America, which was conducted on the basis of active research in the field.

b. ECONOMIC INTEGRATION AND RECIPROCITY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(1) Meeting of Ministers of Economy

The Commission at its fourth session had requested the Secretariat to study means and plans for the progressive attainment of economic integration in Central America. Five Central American countries—Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua—were primarily concerned, while the Government of Panama also expressed interest.

The first session of the ECLA Committee of the Ministers of Economy of Central America on the subject of economic integration and reciprocity, met in Tegucigalpa at the invitation of the Government of Honduras, from 23 to 28 August (see E/CN.12/296).

The basic objective of the Committee is to promote the economic development of Central America. The Central American Republics have inadequate local markets, and the Committee felt that the gradual development of an integrated regional market would raise productivity and real income, stabilize economic activities at higher levels, strengthen the balance-of-payments position and contribute to the economic development of the region as a whole.

At the initial meeting in August, the Committee on Economic Co-operation was established as a standing committee of ECLA, and two resolutions were adopted defining its functions and laying down measures for internal co-ordination between the governments and with ECLA. The Republic of Panama was officially invited to become a member. A sub-committee was set up to study the question of standardizing customs tariff nomenclature for Central American countries. The sub-committee was to begin work in December 1952.

Later, an Inter-Secretariat Working Group which had been set up in November 1952, met to analyse the resolutions adopted and to determine the part to be played by the various United Nations organizations participating in the project. The group was presided over by a member of ECLA. One representative each from TAA, FAO and ILO participated.

In agreement with the Committee, the Inter-secretariat Working Group also laid down a system of priorities for technical assistance requests. It was decided, in principle, that no more than one mission should be working in a given country at any one time. In view of their urgency, however, three projects were excluded from this proviso. These were: for an institute for industrial technological research; for a senior school of public administration; and for technical training in the industrial and administrative fields.

The Working Group, in its report to the Technical Assistance Board, recommended priority in 1953 for five missions covering: electric power; livestock and dairy products; cotton and the textile industry; forest products, pulp and paper; and vegetable oils and fats.

(2) ECLA/TAA Mission on Transport in Central America

This Mission, which forms an integral part of the programme for economic integration and reciprocity, resulted from specific requests for technical assistance from the Governments of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Panama in May and June 1952. The Mission began its field work on 31 August 1952, returning to Mexico on 18 December after visiting the five Central American Republics and Panama. It included experts on railways, civil aviation, roads, ports and sea transport, and the economics of transportation.

The Mission investigated the various means of transport and compiled direct information concerning transport problems from the offices of the Governments concerned and from other sources.

On the basis of its findings, the Mission is to prepare a report to be submitted to the ECLA/TAA Seminar on Transportation in Central America and subsequently to the Committee on Economic Co-operation of Ministers of Economy in Central America.

c. ECLA/TAA MEETING ON IRON AND STEEL INDUSTRY

A meeting of the Expert Working Group on Iron and Steel Industry in Latin America was held in Bogota at the invitation of the Government of Colombia from 13 to 31 October 1952. A total of 117 experts participated in the meeting, and 82 background papers were contributed. The participants and the authors of the papers were chosen from nineteen different countries, and included European and North American experts. The agenda covered: fuel problems; iron ore reduction problems; steelmaking problems; and economic problems.

The economic section of the meeting studied four papers prepared by the ECLA Secretariat. The papers analysed conditions in seven countries of the region, in which either an integrated steel-making industry existed or which possessed, according to a preliminary investigation, the best possibilities for the establishment of such an industry. These countries were: Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Mexico, Peru and Venezuela. Research was directed towards five main objectives:

- (1) analysis of the evolution of consumption and supply of iron and steel products;
- (2) study of the hypothetical costs of steel production in selected Latin American countries;
- (3) approximate investments necessary for establishing integrated steel plants, appropriate to the size of the respective markets in selected Latin American countries;
- (4) technical problems hindering the development of the steelmaking industry in the region; and
- (5) structure of the existing metallurgical industry and its relation to manufacturing activity in general.

The main results of the study may be summarized briefly as follows: Analysis of consumption in Argentina, Brazil, Colombia, Cuba, Chile and Mexico showed that their supply of steel products had fallen short of their requirements because of their limited capacity to import from abroad.

The size of the plant was found to be the most important single influence bearing on costs. If the scale of operation was small, the costs and the investment per unit of production were high and productivity was low.

The consumption rates of even those Latin American countries using the largest amount of steel, were too small to justify the installation of modern specialized plants.

A detailed analysis of the most important factors affecting costs in Latin American steel industry showed that costs compared favourably with plants of the same sizes located at Sparrows Point, in the United States. However, generally speaking, plant sizes in the United States and Europe were much larger, and therefore costs were lower. This advantage, however, was offset by transportation costs from the industrialized countries to Latin American countries, except in the cases of Peru and Venezuela.

In all cases analysed, even in those which would result in high costs, and after allowing for the cost of imported materials and equipment, Latin American local steel production would result in a saving of foreign exchange per unit of steel manufactured.

Objections against establishing steel industries in Latin America had been based in the past on the fact that they required a high investment per unit of production. However, since iron and steelmaking are basic to many other transforming industries, the question of whether the establishment of iron and steel industries would not prove more economic in the long run needed to be studied.

Not every problem of interest to the Latin American steel industry was included in the agenda of the Bogota meeting; the basic objective was to discuss thoroughly the different problems involved rather than to reach specific agreements or recommendations.

A full report on the findings of the meeting is to be submitted to the fifth session of ECLA (E/CN.12/293).

d. ECLA/TAA ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT TRAINING PROGRAMME

At the fourth session of the Commission, a resolution was passed requesting the Secretariat to consider means of establishing a training programme for Latin American economists in the field of economic development, and, in agreement with the Director General of TAA, to adopt administrative and financial measures for putting the programme into effect.

The participants had the opportunity of working in close contact with ECLA's economists, who had the requisite practical experience. Since this type of training cannot be imparted on a large scale, it was decided to limit the trainees to ten or twelve Latin American economists.

Ten fellowships were therefore granted for the programme, distributed as follows: Brazil, three; Chile, two; Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Mexico and Paraguay, one each.

The first programme was due to end in February 1953.

e. OTHER ACTIVITIES

Pursuing the policy initiated in 1951, the Executive Secretary during the course of 1952, accompanied by the Deputy Executive Secretary and the Chief of Economic Studies in the Mexico Office, visited the Central American countries. The purpose of the visit was to discuss problems related to the project for economic integration in Central America, prior to the meeting of the Ministers of Economy in Tegucigalpa. The round-table discussions held in each country also included major internal economic problems.

An agricultural credit seminar met in Guatemala City from 15 September to 15 October, under the joint auspices of ECLA, FAO and the Government of Guatemala, for the purpose of exchanging ideas and experiences on this subject and improving agricultural credit services in the participating countries. For a month, delegates from nine countries in the northern part of Latin America and credit experts from other parts of the world thoroughly discussed all aspects of agricultural credit in the nine countries concerned. The means for increasing agricultural production through improvements in credit facilities were studied. A summary of the proceedings and a report is being prepared.

In addition to the projects undertaken jointly by ECLA and TAA, which are mentioned above, the following are examples of specific co-operative undertakings carried out during the year by ECLA and other United Nations bodies and agencies.⁷⁶

As part of the programme for the economic development of Latin American agriculture, a special study was undertaken with FAO on incentives for agricultural production. The information gathered covered the size of farms, managerial ability, the use of farm machinery and fertilizers, the adequacy of power (mechanical or otherwise), the quality of seeds, the extensiveness of irrigation, the level of prices and the availability of markets. In addition, separate studies were undertaken of agriculture in different countries, the first studies covering Chile, Brazil, Peru and Ecuador, the last being a condensation and synthesis of the broader economic study made earlier in the year by ECLA.

A joint ECLA/FAO study on development of paper and pulp industry in Latin America was undertaken by the Industry and Mining Division as part of its studies on industry. The study covered Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Mexico and Peru. The report was to discuss the following factors: 1) location, accessibility and size of natural resources; 2) an evaluation of the physical and chemical characteristics of the raw materials; and 3) demand trends and estimates of future requirements for the consumer goods to be produced, such as paper, newsprint and rayon.

A joint ECLA/ECE/FAO study of trade between Latin America and Europe was brought up-to-date during the year and published as a printed document.⁷⁷

The Fiscal Division of the United Nations collaborated with ECLA and the Inter-American Economic and Social Council in preparing a joint study on the incidence and effects of taxation on the sugar industry in the Central American and Caribbean countries.

At its fourth session, the Commission recommended that the Executive Secretary should consult with the executive heads of other international organizations concerned on immigration problems with a view to establishing an Inter-Agency Regional Co-ordination Committee on Migration. This Committee was duly set up, consisting of representatives of ECLA, ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO, as well as of the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, and has held three meetings.

The second meeting of the Inter-Secretariat Co-ordination Committee of ECLA and the Inter-American Economic and Social Council was held in Santiago on 8, 9 and 11 February and the third meeting in Washington, D. C., on 12 and 27 June 1952. They discussed in particular the financing of economic development and monetary and fiscal problems and agreed on the preparation of a joint study on the incidence and effects of taxation on the sugar industry in Central American and Caribbean countries (see above).

Plans for the participation of the Inter-American Economic and Social Council in the Monetary and Fiscal Seminar to be held at the end of 1953 were also discussed.

f. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FOURTEENTH SESSION

The Council considered the Fourth Annual Report of ECLA (E/2185 and Add.1/Corr.1) at its 596th plenary meeting on 9 June 1952. The majority of the Council commended the Commission for the valuable contribution it was making in furthering the objectives of economic development in the ECLA region, and for the practical measures of assistance which were being evolved.

Several representatives, among them those of Latin American countries and of France and the United States, commented on the importance of the studies designed to work out techniques for the programming of economic development, which would help to define the needs for capital investment in the process of development of Latin American countries. The study of monetary and fiscal policies, the representative of France considered, would be particularly valuable and would help each of the Latin American countries to decide for itself to what extent and under what conditions the expansion of bank credits could contribute to the financing of development plans. The representative of Belgium drew attention to the part of the report which dealt with the monetary difficulties hindering trade with Latin American countries and hoped that ECLA's work in that connexion would make it possible to resume the traditional flow of trade between Europe and Latin America. The United States representative also stressed the importance of the study undertaken by ECLA on the problems of trade within the region.

The representatives of France and the United States also expressed their satisfaction that the Commission, at the request of the countries concerned, had taken up studies of the economic integration of the countries of Central America, and observed that these countries were approaching the problem of integration at the early stages of their industrialization. The representative of Pakistan praised the valuable work ECLA was doing in training economists in the South American countries. He also stressed the value of monographs such as the Study of Labour Productivity of the Cotton Textile Industry in Five Latin-American Countries.⁷⁸ The representative of Uruguay expressed satisfaction that the Commission had devoted some time to the urgent problem of the shortage of pulp and paper.

The Council adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, the draft resolution proposed by the Commission (E/2185). By this resolution (420(XIV)) the Council took note of ECLA's annual report, and, considering the 1952-53 work programme of primary importance, endorsed the priorities allocated by ECLA's Committee of the Whole to the individual work projects.

The Council also had before it a recommendation by ECLA to study the possibility of adopting Portuguese as an official and working language of the Commission. The Council felt that the issue was largely financial and that the decision had to be made by the General Assembly and its Fifth Committee. However, members of the Council saw no objection to the use of Portuguese as an official and working language during the Commission's next session at Rio de Janeiro, a course which involved no additional cost to the United Nations.

4. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

The General Assembly considered the activities of the regional economic commissions during the Second Committee's general debate on economic development at its 195th to 209th meetings from 23 October to 12 November and specifically at its 239th and 240th meetings on 12 and 13 December, and at its 411th plenary meeting on 21 December 1952.

The representative of Chile, presenting a draft resolution on the activities of the regional economic commissions and economic development (A/C.2/L.155), emphasized that economic development should be considered from an inter-regional or inter-continental angle. Only international co-ordination of economic development programmes would make it possible to utilize the resources of each of the Latin American States, for example, in a suitable way. Such co-ordination would provide a remedy for excessive division of the market, competition between the various economic development programmes and excessive exploitation of the standard of living of the population in certain countries. The regional economic commissions, he stressed, were in a very good position to bring about international co-ordination by studying objectively the individual needs of each country and were thus able to address appropriate recommendations to the Economic and Social Council.

The representative of Ecuador thought the scope of the Chilean draft resolution should be enlarged and proposed (A/C.2/L.192), inter alia, the addition of two new paragraphs. The first of these would have the Assembly recommend that the already established economic commissions, individually and collectively, pay attention to promoting trade between the countries of their respective regions and those of the Middle and Near East. The second would recommend that ECLA continue certain studies on a larger scale.

However, he subsequently withdrew the proposal to add these paragraphs in favour of an oral United States proposal to add a statement that the collaboration of the regional economic commissions in promoting trade between countries of their respective regions should be furthered not only among these countries but also with those of other regions.

The representative of Chile at the 240th meeting presented a revised text (A/C.2/L.155/Rev.1) which incorporated the above amendment, the substance of drafting amendments by the United States (A/C.2/L.190) and the United Kingdom (A/C.2/L.191) and an amendment by France (A/C.2/L.193) which would add a paragraph on the contribution of ECE to the economic development of under-developed countries.

The representative of Ecuador considered that it was particularly important to mention ECLA's activities in the matter of basic industries and therefore he maintained a further amendment (A/C.2/L.190) which he had proposed to the original draft resolution. This would commend ECLA's initiation of integrated studies of the economic potentialities and development of various Latin American countries and the meetings of experts in basic industries, such as the meeting of the Expert Working Group on the Iron and Steel Industry in Latin America, held in Bogota.

A number of representatives, among them those of India, Indonesia, Peru and the Philippines, thought that this proposal would make the resolution unbalanced; either all three commissions should be mentioned in detail or the amendment specifically singling out ECLA should be deleted. An oral amendment by Saudi Arabia, as amended by India, to add a reference to the work of ECAFE was accepted by the representative of Ecuador who also agreed to accept a French oral amendment to delete the specific reference to the meeting of the Expert Working Group in Bogota. The Chilean representative accepted the revised amendment as well as a United States drafting amendment.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Committee (A/2332 (VII)) at its 240th meeting on 13 December by 37 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, and by the General Assembly at its 411th plenary meeting on 21 December by 52 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 627 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that the report of the Economic and Social Council (chapter III, section V) gives an account of the interesting activities of the Economic Commissions for Latin America and for Asia and the Far East in the field of economic development of under-developed countries.

"Considering the important contribution which the Economic Commission for Europe can make to the economic development of the under-developed countries, not only by its action on behalf of the less-developed regions of Europe, but also by the collaboration it has established with the other regional economic commissions in carrying out joint studies,

"Bearing in mind that the economic development of under-developed countries, consistent with the objectives set forth in Article 55 of the Charter, namely, the promotion of "higher standards of living, full employment and conditions of economic and social progress and development", can best be carried out through co-ordination among the countries of a region and among the various regions,

"Bearing in mind that the regional economic commissions have become effective instruments of international economic co-operation, and, for that reason, should continue to play an important part in the work of stimulating co-ordinated economic development in their respective regions and should co-operate in the efforts of the countries to that end as well as in the work of resolving other problems connected with world economic stability,

"1. Notes with satisfaction that the Economic Commissions for Latin America and for Asia and the Far East have been especially active in promoting the acceleration of economic development of the countries in their respective regions, in accordance with the instructions of the General Assembly and of the Economic and Social Council, and believes that this activity should be further intensified;

"2. Commends in particular:

"(a) The collaboration established between the Economic Commissions for Europe, for Latin America and for Asia and the Far East in promoting more trade between the countries of their respective regions, and declares that this collaboration should be furthered not only among these countries but also with countries of other regions, bearing in mind the objectives mentioned in General Assembly resolution 523 (VI) of 12 January 1952 and in particular its paragraph 1 (b), relevant policy decisions of the Economic and Social Council and the terms of reference of the Commissions;

"(b) The way in which the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, through its integrated studies, meetings of experts, specialized conferences and training centres on various aspects of economic development, is promoting trade and exerting efforts to develop the natural resources and industries of the countries of the region;

"(c) The activities of the Economic Commission for Latin America in the matter of the economic development of the countries of the region, and especially:

"(i) Its initiative in inviting the governments of the Central-American Republics to carry out a joint programme of great potential significance with a view to the economic integration of these countries, and believes it would be useful to explore the possibility of similar initiatives;

"(ii) The integrated studies it has initiated of the economic potentialities and development of various Latin-American countries;

"(iii) The meetings of experts on basic industries;

"(d) The improvements brought about by the Commissions in the inland transport of their respective regions."

K. HUMAN RIGHTS

1. The Right of Peoples and Nations to Self-Determination

The General Assembly, at its sixth session, decided (resolution 545 (VI)) that, in reaffirmation of the principle enunciated in the United Nations Charter, an article on the right of all peoples and all nations to self-determination should be included in the covenant or covenants on human rights. The article would, it declared, be drafted in the following terms: "All peoples shall have the right of self-determination" and would stipulate that all States, including those having responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, should promote, in relation to the peoples of such States and Territories, the realization of that right, in conformity with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations. By the same resolution the Assembly asked the Commission on Human Rights to prepare recommendations concerning international respect for the self-determination of peoples and in another resolution (549 (VI)) asked the Economic and Social Council to instruct the Commission to give priority to this question.

Both resolutions were formally transmitted to the Commission by the Economic and Social Council at a special session, held on 24 March 1952 (415 (S-1)).⁷⁹

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

At its eighth session, held from 14 April to 14 June 1952 (E/2256), the Commission considered the question of the right of peoples and nations to self-determination as the first substantive item on its agenda.

It adopted the text of an article which it decided to include as article 1 both in the draft covenant on civil and political rights and in the draft covenant on economic, social and cultural rights. The article proclaimed the right of all peoples and nations to self-determination, namely, the right freely to determine their political, economic, social and cultural status. It declared that all States, including those having responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories and those controlling in whatsoever manner the exercise of that right by another people, should promote the realization of that right in all their Territories, and respect its maintenance in other States in conformity with the provisions of the Charter. The right of peoples to self-determination, it further stated, should include permanent sovereignty over their natural wealth and resources and in no case could a people be deprived of its means of subsistence on the grounds of any right claimed by other States.

The Commission also adopted two resolutions containing recommendations concerning international respect for the self-determination of peoples and nations, and asked the Council to transmit these to the Assembly.

The first would have the Assembly recommend (E/2256 A) that States Members of the United Nations:

(1) uphold the principle of self-determination of peoples and nations and respect their independence; (2) recognize and promote the realization of the right of self-determination of the people of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories under their administration; and (3) grant this right on a demand for self-government on the part of these people, the popular wish being ascertained, in particular, through a plebiscite held under the auspices of the United Nations.

In its second resolution (E/2256 B) the Commission proposed that the Council request the General Assembly to recommend that States Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories voluntarily include in the information transmitted by them under Article 73e⁸⁰ of the Charter "details regarding the extent to which the right of peoples to self-determination is exercised by the peoples of these territories, and in particular regarding their political progress and the measures taken to develop their capacity for self-administration, to satisfy their political aspirations and to promote the progressive development of their free political institutions."

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FOURTEENTH SESSION

The Council, at its 666th to 668th plenary meetings on 30 and 31 July 1952, considered the two draft resolutions A and B recommended by the Commission concerning international respect for the self-determination of peoples and nations.⁸¹

Those States administering dependent territories opposed the recommendations on various grounds.⁸² Among these were that they were an attempt to amend the Charter, that certain terms, such as "peoples" or "self-determination of peoples" had not been defined; that various interpretations could result which might give rise to separatist or subversive movements; that the conditions, precautions, and obligations necessary for the effective realization of the right of self-determination had not been outlined; that the relationship between the Administering Powers and the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories might be adversely affected; and that the recommendations drew distinctions between States, and were therefore discriminatory.

On the other hand, the representatives of Egypt, India, Lebanon, Pakistan, the Philippines, Poland and Uruguay disagreed with those opposing the recommendations. Among other things, they considered that the Commission's recommendations were in keeping with the spirit of the Charter; that the availability of accurate information by the Administering Powers on Non-Self-Governing Territories was essential to guarantee respect for the self-determination of peoples; that the provisions of the Charter itself justified the distinction between Member States administering dependent territories and other Member States; and that the Commission's recommendations had been adopted by a substantial majority, despite the arguments against them.

The United States representative said that he would vote for draft resolution A since he considered that its basic purpose was to encourage the Metropolitan Powers to improve their methods of ascertaining the political aspirations of the peoples under their administration. However, he pointed out, it was generally recognized that self-determination was a long-term problem to be resolved in stages. Further, he did not agree that a plebiscite was the only means of determining the wishes of the people, nor could he subscribe to certain provisions in the preamble to the draft resolution which referred to the existence of slavery where an alien people hold power over the destiny of a people, and he therefore submitted an amendment (E/L.445/Rev.1) to cover these points.

A number of representatives, among them those of Argentina, Canada, India, Pakistan, Poland, the USSR and Uruguay, expressed the view that, since the Assembly had requested the Commission to submit to it directly recommendations concerning international respect for the self-determination of peoples, any Council discussion should be confined to the procedure for transmitting the recommendations to the Assembly.

⁸⁰ For text of this Article, see pp. 16-17.

⁸² For fuller explanation of views, see under General Assembly.

The majority agreed and the United States' amendment was therefore not voted on.

An oral Philippine amendment to forward to the Assembly the records of the Council's discussion was rejected by 8 votes to 8, with 2 abstentions.

The Polish representative had submitted a draft resolution (E/L.462) which would refer both draft resolutions to the General Assembly. He agreed to amend his draft resolution to add the words "without comment" as proposed by Cuba (E/L.464). The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted at the Council's 668th plenary meeting on 31 July 1952 by a roll-call vote of 14 to 3, with 1 abstention, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Canada, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Iran, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, USSR, United States, Uruguay.

Against: Belgium, France, United Kingdom.

Abstaining: Sweden.

The representatives of Iran and the United States explained that their votes signified neither approval nor disapproval of the Commission's recommendations. The representative of Sweden had abstained because, although he thought the Commission's work excellent, he considered the material inadequately prepared for consideration by the Assembly at this stage.

By this resolution (440 B (XIV)) the Council transmitted without comment the two draft resolutions prepared by the Commission for the Assembly's consideration at its seventh session.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS SEVENTH SESSION

The General Assembly discussed the recommendations of the Commission on Human Rights concerning international respect for the self-determination of peoples at the 443rd to 464th meetings of its Third Committee from 12 November to 3 December and its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December 1952.

It had before it the relevant section of the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2172) and a memorandum by the Secretary-General outlining the previous action taken on the question (A/2165).

(1) Views Expressed in the Third Committee

While supporting the principle of self-determination, representatives of States administering dependent territories opposed the Commission's recommendations. The majority of the Committee, however, expressed general support of the proposals.

Those opposing the recommendations held that they would do more to retard than advance the exercise of the right of self-determination. Moreover, the exercise of the right must be subordinated to the maintenance of world peace. The recommendations, they held, were not in accordance with the Charter, but attempted to amend and extend its scope. In particular it was argued that they discriminated against certain States, which was contrary to the principle of equality contained in Articles 1 and 2⁸³ of the Charter of the United Nations; that they sought to impose on certain States obligations which were not laid down in Chapters XI and XII⁸³ of the Charter; that the transmission of political information by States responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories had been deliberately excluded from Article 73e and was now being requested under draft resolution B; that the Charter imposed a "sacred trust" on States responsible for administering Non-Self-Governing Territories to assist the inhabitants to govern themselves but recognized the need to take into account a people's capacity for full self-government, which was ignored under draft resolution A; that no attention had been paid to the "particular circumstances of each territory" mentioned in Articles 73 and 76⁸³ of the Charter; that the administration of a territory fell within the domestic jurisdiction of the State responsible; and that the recommendations were discriminatory since they applied only to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The representatives of Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States pointed out that no definition of terms such as "peoples", "nations" and "the right of self-determination" had been established and the conditions of the exercise of the right of self-determination had not been clearly laid down. It was emphasized that the word "peoples" was open to different interpretations, each giving rise to extremely complex problems which had not been sufficiently studied. In this connexion the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United Kingdom mentioned the question of minorities claiming the right of self-determination, the duties of the various States concerned in such cases, and the criteria to be regarded as applying in any particular interpretation of the word "peoples". The exercise of the right of self-determination without any limitations or safeguards might be a cause of friction and disturb the friendly relations between nations and might lead to anarchy, the French and New Zealand representatives, among others, maintained.

The representatives of France and New Zealand also thought that the recommendations should be studied in their relation to the article on the right of self-determination included in the draft covenants on human rights. It was argued that the purpose of the two draft resolutions was to implement that article and, since the covenants themselves were not yet in final form, the General Assembly could not effectively consider the application of any single article. The representative of China said that it would perhaps be wiser to draft a third covenant on the right of peoples to self-determination.

Among the arguments advanced in support of the recommendations, emphasis was given to the urgency of taking some action immediately. It was argued that the recommendations were in keeping with the principles of the Charter; that since the transmission of political information was not included in Article 73e, the States concerned had been asked to supply such information voluntarily; that Chapter XI provided that Non-Self-Governing Territories would be held "in sacred trust" by the States responsible for their administration until they were able to govern themselves, but not that they would be owned by such States; that the provisions relating to Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories must be interpreted in the light of Article 1, paragraph 2, and Article 55 of the Charter. The representative of Iraq expressed the view that Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter, relating to domestic jurisdiction, could not be applied in respect of territories geographically removed from the sovereign States responsible for their administration. Moreover, the Yugoslav representative stated that the question was not one of domestic jurisdiction, because the right of self-determination, as a principle enshrined in the Charter, prevailed.

Some representatives, among them those of India, Indonesia, Israel, Lebanon and Pakistan, pointed out that precise definitions of legal concepts were not a prerequisite for the inclusion of those concepts in a legal instrument. Examples from the Charter and from the covenants on human rights were given to illustrate the fact that fundamental concepts which had not yet been ultimately defined and appeared incapable of definition had nevertheless been included in those instruments. The representative of Pakistan further stressed that to attempt to draw up precise legal definitions would mean unwarranted delay in implementing the right of peoples to self-determination. Problems which became the concern of the international community could not be solved by a purely technical juridical approach since they were not exclusively legal in character but were indivisibly linked with the economic, social and political elements. Moreover, some latitude of interpretation to fit particular circumstances and situations had to be allowed in the case of all the rights included in the covenants on human rights.

With regard to draft resolution B, the representatives of Guatemala, India and Norway pointed out that its recommendation that information should be provided on the exercise of the right of people to self-determination would make it possible for the United Nations to have before it authentic information from official sources on which to base its decisions.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Ecuador, Honduras, New Zealand, Norway, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela, among others, criticized the reference to slavery contained in the preamble to draft resolution A and said that the use of the word was unjustified. The representatives of India and Poland argued that those paragraphs of the preamble should be considered from the point of view of the principle it proclaimed, which was respect for human dignity, and that to the dependent peoples a state of subjugation to another Power was little better than slavery. It was generally agreed, however, that slavery in that context was not used in the sense of the definition contained in article I of the International Slavery Convention of 1926, namely, ownership of one human being by another.

Several representatives, among them the Belgian and United States representatives, commented on the fact that a plebiscite might not be the only method nor necessarily the best method of ascertaining the will of the people. As an illustration of methods other than plebiscites, reference was made to the fact that the will of the people was in many countries expressed by means of general elections. It was emphasized, however, that such other methods must be recognized democratic methods and therefore have an electoral character and have generally demonstrated their validity. The representative of Honduras thought that it should be clearly stated that a plebiscite would be held only when emancipation took place by peaceful means.

(2) Draft Resolutions Considered and Resolutions Adopted

(a) DRAFT RESOLUTION A

Draft resolution A, submitted by the Commission in the form of a draft resolution (E/2256 A) for adoption by the General Assembly, recommended that Member States should:

(1) uphold the principle of self-determination of peoples and nations and respect their independence; and (2) recognize and promote the realization of the right of self-determination of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories who were under their administration and grant that right on a demand for self-government on the part of those peoples, the popular wish being ascertained in particular through a plebiscite held under the auspices of the United Nations.

Amendments to this draft resolution were submitted by the United States (A/C.3/L.294 and Rev. 1), jointly by Costa Rica, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras and Nicaragua (A/C.3/L.295), by Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.296) and by Syria (A/C.3/L.298 and Rev. 1).

Sub-amendments to the United States amendment were submitted by India (A/C.3/L.297 and Rev. 1), by Ethiopia (A/G3/L.301), by Greece (A/C.3/L.303) and by Afghanistan (A/C.3/L.307).

Sub-amendments to the amendment proposed by India were submitted by Greece (A/C.3/L.302), jointly by Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Uruguay and Venezuela (A/C.3/L.304), by Argentina (A/C.3/L.306), by Afghanistan (A/C.3/L.308) and jointly by Iraq and Pakistan (A/C.3/L.309 and Rev.1).

Alternative draft resolutions were submitted by the United Kingdom (A/C.3/L.299) and by Lebanon (A/C.3/L.305).

The following decisions on the draft resolution and amendments were taken by the Committee.

(1) It adopted by a roll-call vote of 34 to 12, with 6 abstentions, a new first paragraph to the preamble (for text, see resolution adopted below) proposed by Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.296).

(2) By 31 votes to 11, with 5 abstentions, the Committee adopted a United States proposal (A/C.3/L.294/Rev.1) to delete two paragraphs of the preamble which would have the Assembly declare it essential to abolish slavery and that it exists where an alien people hold power over the destiny of a people.

(3) It adopted by 26 votes to none, with 24 abstentions, two new paragraphs (see the third and fourth paragraphs of the preamble) proposed by the United States (A/C.3/L.294 and Rev.1). The statement that the Charter "affirms the principles which should guide them" was first adopted in a separate vote of 14 to 6, with 30 abstentions.

(4) An Ethiopian sub-amendment (A/C.3/L.301), to add a phrase expressing recognition of the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of non-self-governing territories are paramount, was withdrawn.

(5) As regards the operative part of the draft resolution, the Committee adopted by 33 votes to 6, with 11 abstentions, a United States amendment (A/C.3/L.294/Rev.1), as amended by India, to delete the words "and respect their independence" at the end of the first operative paragraph. The United States representative had originally proposed to substitute the phrase "and respect the independence of all States" but had agreed to the Indian proposal (A/C.3/L.297) to refrain from any reference to independence.

(6) A sub-amendment by fifteen Latin American delegations (see above) (A/C.3/L.304) to rephrase paragraph 1 to refer to the upholding of the principle of "the equality of rights" and the self-determination of all peoples and nations was withdrawn.

(7) On the basis of an Indian sub-amendment (A/C.3/L.297 and Rev. 1) to a United States amendment (A/C.3/L.294/Rev.1),⁸⁴ the Committee adopted the second operative paragraph, as a whole, by a roll-call vote of 31 to 15, with 7 abstentions (for text, see resolution adopted below).

Prior to this the Committee adopted the following changes to the Indian sub-amendment.

(i) By 33 votes to 5, with 16 abstentions, a proposal by the fifteen Latin-American delegations (A/C.3/L.304) to replace the phrase "shall grant this right to the people of such territories" with the words "shall facilitate the exercise of this right by the peoples of such Territories."

(ii) By a roll-call vote of 21 to 9, with 23 abstentions, an Afghanistan sub-amendment (A/C.3/L.308)⁸⁵ to replace the words "particular circumstances of" with the phrase "principles and spirit of the Charter of the United Nations in regard to."

(iii) Following India's acceptance of a sub-amendment (A/C.3/L.304) by the fifteen Latin American delegations replacing the words "a plebiscite under the auspices of the United Nations or other recognized democratic means with "plebiscites or other recognized democratic means, preferably under the auspices of the United Nations," the Committee adopted the word "preferably" by 18 votes to 11, with 20 abstentions.

The Committee rejected by a roll-call vote of 24 to 11, with 18 abstentions, an amendment by Iraq and Pakistan (A/C.3/L.309/Rev.1) to replace the last phrase of the second operative paragraph by "The wishes of the peoples concerned shall be ascertained through a plebiscite or other recognized democratic means when necessary under the auspices of the United Nations".

⁸⁴ The United States proposal for a new operative paragraph 2 differed from the Indian sub-amendment in that it would refer to people in all territories, including the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was not voted on as a result of the adoption of the amended Indian sub-amendment.

The following sub-amendments were withdrawn as a result of the voting on paragraph 2 of the operative part of the resolution.

(i) By Greece (A/C.3/L.302) to the Indian sub-amendment and (A/C.3/L.302) to the United States amendment to add, as orally amended by the Greek representative, the words "consistent with the principles contained in this resolution" after the words "democratic means."

(ii) By Argentina (A/C.3/L.306) to replace the Indian text with a new paragraph the principal difference of which was that it would call for recognition and promotion of the right of self-determination of all people and would call on States administering dependent territories to grant this right.

(iii) By Costa Rica, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras and Nicaragua (A/C.3/L.295) to amend the Commission's draft resolution (E/2556 A) by replacing the word "grant" with "acquiesce" and the last phrase with a provision for a plebiscite under United Nations auspices if it became necessary to ascertain the popular wish.

(iv) By Ethiopia (A/C.3/L.301) to replace the United States text with one introducing, in particular, the idea of the wishes of the people and their ability to exercise the right of self-determination being ascertained by the United Nations through recognized and established procedures.

(8) The Committee adopted by 29 votes to 9, with 15 abstentions, a new third paragraph as proposed (A/C.3/L.298/Rev.1) and orally amended by Syria (for text, see resolution adopted below).

The draft resolution proposed by the Commission, as amended, was adopted by the Third Committee, as a whole, at its 460th meeting on 1 December by a roll-call vote of 34 to 13, with 6 abstentions. (See below for text.)

The General Assembly considered the Third Committee's recommendation (A/2309 and Corr.1) at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December. The representative of the United States reintroduced two amendments (A/L.132) to the second operative paragraph. The first, which was rejected by 28 votes to 22, with 5 abstentions, would have called for the recognition and promotion of the realization of the right of self-determination of the peoples of all territories, including those of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories. . . . The second, which was rejected by 30 votes to 13, with 12 abstentions, would have provided for the ascertainment of the wishes of the people through plebiscites under the auspices of the United Nations or other recognized democratic means. In view of the rejection of the second amendment, a Greek amendment, accepted by the United States, to add the words "consistent with the principles contained in this resolution", was not voted on.

The Assembly voted separately on the first paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution and on paragraph 3 of the operative part, as follows (for texts, see below):

First paragraph of the preamble: Adopted by a roll-call vote of 38 to 13, with 9 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Panama, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Iceland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: China, Ecuador, Israel, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Peru, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey.

Paragraph 3 of the operative part: Adopted by a roll-call vote of 39 to 3, with 17 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Panama, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Belgium, France, Union of South Africa.

Abstaining: Australia, Canada, Denmark, Greece, Iceland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Paraguay, Peru, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States.

The draft resolution, as recommended by the Third Committee (A/2309 and Corr.1) was adopted, as a whole, by a roll-call vote of 40 to 14, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 637 A (VII). The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Iceland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Ecuador, Israel, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Thailand, Turkey.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, the Byelorussian SSR, France, Poland, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States explained their votes on the basis of reasons given in the debates.

Resolution 637 A (VII) read:

"Whereas the right of peoples and nations to self-determination is a prerequisite to the full enjoyment of all fundamental human rights,

"Whereas the Charter of the United Nations, under Articles 1 and 55, aims to develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the equal rights and self-determination of peoples in order to strengthen universal peace,

"Whereas the Charter of the United Nations recognizes that certain Members of the United Nations are responsible for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government, and affirms the principles which should guide them,

"Whereas every Member of the United Nations, in conformity with the Charter, should respect the maintenance of the right of self-determination in other States,

"The General Assembly recommends that:

"1. The States Members of the United Nations shall uphold the principle of self-determination of all peoples and nations;

"2. The States Members of the United Nations shall recognize and promote the realization of the right of self-determination of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories who are under their administration and shall facilitate the exercise of this right by the peoples of such Territories according to the principles and spirit of the Charter of the United Nations in regard to each Territory and to the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned, the wishes of the people being ascertained through plebiscites or other recognized democratic means, preferably under the auspices of the United Nations;

"3. The States Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories shall take practical steps, pending the realization of the right of self-determination and in preparation thereof, to ensure the direct participation of the indigenous populations in the legislative and executive organs of government of those Territories, and to prepare them for complete self-government or independence."

(b) DRAFT RESOLUTION SUBMITTED BY THE UNITED KINGDOM

The alternative draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom (A/C.3/L.299) proposed that self-determination be defined as a principle rather than as a right. Inter alia, it would call on Member States to uphold and recognize this principle and to promote its application in relation to peoples of all territories and nations under their control, in a manner appropriate to the particular circumstances.

Saudi Arabia moved, as an amendment (A/C.3/L.296) to this draft resolution, the amendment it had submitted to the preamble of draft resolution A. Afghanistan submitted, as an amendment (A/C.3/L.310) to the United Kingdom text, the amendments (A/C.3/L.307 and A/C.3/L.308) it had submitted as sub-amendments to the United States amendment to draft resolution A and the Indian sub-amendment thereto.

However, following the adoption of draft resolution A, as amended, the United Kingdom withdrew the alternative proposal.

(c) DRAFT RESOLUTION SUBMITTED BY LEBANON

Lebanon also submitted an alternative text (A/C.3/L.305) to which the same amendments were moved by Afghanistan (A/C.3/L.311) and Saudi Arabia. This text, inter alia, would recommend that Members, resorting where necessary to the use of plebiscites or other recognized democratic means under the auspices of the United Nations to ascertain the wishes of the peoples concerned, should: (1) ensure the free exercise of the right of self-determination to people having capacity for self-government; and (2) prepare for the exercise of this right those peoples in the Non-Self-Governing Territories which have not yet achieved the capacity for self-administration.

The Committee, however, at its 461st meeting on 2 December, by 21 votes to none, with 26 abstentions, adopted an oral proposal by Saudi Arabia not to vote on the Lebanese proposal in view of the adoption of draft resolution A, as amended.

(d) DRAFT RESOLUTION B

The representative of Lebanon submitted a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.293/Rev.1) the text of which differed only in form from draft resolution B recommended by the Commission on Human Rights. The latter had been in the form of a recommendation to the Council. As altered, the draft resolution would have the Assembly recommend States Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories voluntarily to include in the information transmitted by them under Article 73e of the Charter details regarding the extent to which the right of peoples to self-determination is exercised by the peoples of those territories. It was also proposed that this information should include details, in particular, regarding the political progress of the peoples of those territories and the measures taken to develop their capacity for self-administration, to satisfy their political aspirations and to promote the progressive development of their free political institutions.

The representative of Lebanon accepted amendments by Haiti (A/C.3/L.314) adding the words "and nations" after "peoples" in the preamble and in the operative paragraph. He also accepted, after it had been revised and orally amended, an amendment by India (A/C.3/L.315/Rev.1) calling for the addition of a second operative paragraph, under which the General Assembly would decide to place the resolution on the agenda of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories at its next session in 1953. In view of the revision of the Indian amendment, Saudi Arabia withdrew amendments (A/C.3/L.316) to the original Indian text (A/C.3/L.315) which would have addressed the recommendations to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and not directly to Member States.

The representative of Afghanistan withdrew an oral amendment to the revised Indian text which would have called on the Committee on Information to consider the resolution in the light of the discussions in the Third Committee. He also withdrew an oral amendment proposing the "regular" rather than "voluntary" transmission of information.

The revised Indian amendment was adopted by 30 votes to 8, with 12 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Third Committee (A/2309 and Corr.1) at its 464th meeting on 3 December by a roll-call vote of 38 to 10, with 4 abstentions, and by the General Assembly at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December 1952 by 39 votes to 12, with 5 abstentions.

In the plenary meeting, the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Poland and the USSR explained their votes in favour and the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom their votes against the resolution, on the same grounds as given during the debates.

The resolution (637 B (VII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that one of the conditions necessary to facilitate United Nations action to promote respect for the right of self-determination of peoples and nations, in particular with regard to the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories, is that the competent organs of the United Nations should be in possession of official information on the government of these Territories,

"Recalling its resolution 144(II) of 3 November 1947 in which it declared that the voluntary transmission of such information was entirely in conformity with the spirit of Article 73 of the Charter, and should therefore be encouraged,

"Recalling its resolution 327(IV) of 2 December 1949 in which it expressed the hope that such of the Members of the United Nations as had not done so might voluntarily include details on the government of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the information transmitted by them under Article 73 e of the Charter,

"Considering that at the present time such information has not yet been furnished in respect of a large number of Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"1. Recommends States Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories voluntarily to include in the information transmitted by them under Article 73 e of the Charter details regarding the extent to which the right of peoples and nations to self-determination is exercised by the peoples of those Territories, and in particular regarding their political progress and the measures taken to develop their capacity for self-administration, to satisfy their political aspirations and to promote the progressive development of their free political institutions;

"2. Decides to place the present resolution on the agenda of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories for its next session in 1953."

(e) EIGHT-POWER DRAFT RESOLUTION

Afghanistan, Argentina, Chile, Guatemala, Iraq, Lebanon, Mexico and Pakistan submitted a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.317) under which the Commission on Human Rights would be instructed to continue preparing recommendations concerning international respect for the right of self-determination of peoples and particularly steps which might be taken by the various organs of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and to submit its recommendations to the General Assembly. Oral amendments proposed by the representative of the United States, according to which the General Assembly's request and the Commission's recommendations would be transmitted through the Economic and Social Council, were accepted by the sponsors.

The Committee rejected by 22 votes to 16, with 14 abstentions, an amendment (A/C.3/L.318) by the Ukrainian SSR calling for the addition, at the end of the first operative paragraph 1, of the words "including the peoples of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories" (see below).

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Third Committee (A/2309 and Corr.1) by a roll-call vote of 38 to 7, with 8 abstentions.

Following the rejection by 30 votes to 17, with 12 abstentions, of the same Ukrainian amendment (A/L.133), the General Assembly at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December 1952 adopted the resolution proposed by the Third Committee by 42 votes to 7, with 8 abstentions.

In the plenary meeting, the representative of the United Kingdom opposed the resolution on the ground that the Commission was not the proper organ for a discussion of the question of self-determination. The representatives of Poland and the USSR stated that they might have voted for the resolution if the Ukrainian amendment had been adopted.

The resolution (637 C (VII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that it is necessary to continue the study of ways and means of ensuring international respect for the right of peoples to self-determination,

"Considering that the recommendations it has adopted at its seventh session do not represent the only steps that can be taken to promote respect for such right,

"1. Requests the Economic and Social Council to ask the Commission on Human Rights to continue preparing recommendations concerning international respect for the right of peoples to self-determination, and particularly recommendations relating to the steps which might be taken, within the limits of their resources and competence, by the various organs of the United Nations and the specialized agencies to develop international respect for the right of peoples to self-determination;

"2. Requests the Commission on Human Rights to submit through the Economic and Social Council its recommendations to the General Assembly."

2. Draft International Covenants on Human Rights and Measures of Implementation

At its sixth session the General Assembly had discussed, in detail, the report of the seventh session of the Commission on Human Rights (E/1992) and had adopted a series of resolutions.⁸⁶ These, inter alia, recommended that:

(1) the Commission draft two covenants—one to contain civil and political rights and the other economic, social and cultural rights; (2) when revising the draft articles on economic, social and cultural rights, the Commission take into consideration the views expressed during the discussion of the covenants and also any views which Member States, the specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations might advance; (3) an article on the right of peoples and nations to self-determination be included in one or both covenants and that the Commission should prepare recommendations concerning international respect for that right;⁸⁷ (4) the Commission prepare for inclusion in both covenants one or more clauses relating to the admissibility or non-admissibility of reservations and to the effect to be attributed to them; (5) the words derechos humanos instead of derechos del hombre be used in all United Nations working documents and publications in Spanish; and (6) the Council forward certain documents on measures of implementation to the Commission as basic working papers for its consideration in connexion with the drafting of provisions on measures of implementation.

As further instructed by the General Assembly (resolution 549(VI)) the Council held a special session on 24 March 1952 and by 14 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, transmitted all the above recommendations to the Commission so that it might complete its work in connexion with the draft covenants in time to allow the Council, at its fourteenth session, to transmit the draft covenants and recommendations thereon to the Assembly at its seventh session (415 S.1).⁸⁸

The Commission on Human Rights held its eighth session from 14 April to 14 June 1952 (E/2256) and considered the draft covenants on human rights in the light of the General Assembly's resolutions. On the basis of the preliminary work undertaken at its seventh session (E/1992) it adopted articles on economic, social and cultural rights and on civil and political rights. It also adopted an article on the right of peoples and nations to self-determination.⁸⁹ The Commission was not able, in the period of time available, to carry out the other instructions of the General Assembly and did not discuss the existing provisions or proposals relating to measures of implementation or proposals for additional articles on civil and political rights. Nor was it able to consider the question of reservations, the problem of the federal State clause, or the other final clauses of the draft covenants.

The Commission recommended to the Council that it be authorized to complete its work on the two covenants in 1953, so that they might then be submitted simultaneously to the Council and the General Assembly.

The Council considered the Commission's report (E/2256) at its 665th and 666th plenary meetings on 30 July 1952. It had before it a draft resolution (E/L.457) by the USSR which would invite the Assembly to reconsider its decision to draft two covenants (resolution 543 (VI)), with a view to instructing the Commission to prepare a single draft covenant at its next session. Those supporting this resolution, among them the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Mexico and Poland, stressed, as did the USSR representative, that the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights was so closely linked with that of civil and political rights that to separate the two groups into two covenants would create an artificial division. It was argued, moreover, that the two categories of rights had been linked in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and, further, that the decision to prepare two covenants represented a retrograde step compared with the recommendations which the General Assembly had adopted at its fifth session. They also pointed out that the Assembly had only decided by a small majority, and after long debate, to reverse its decision and request the preparation of two covenants.

Some representatives, among them those of Argentina, Cuba and Pakistan, while favouring a single covenant rather than two covenants in principle, were of the opinion that the Council was not the appropriate organ to recommend a change in the decision of the Assembly at this stage. It was also stressed by the representatives of Canada, France, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States, among others, that any attempt to change the decisions of the General Assembly at this time would cause delay and confusion, since the Commission on Human Rights had already done considerable work on the preparation of two covenants. In this connexion, the representatives of Argentina and Pakistan pointed out that the two covenants could be merged into one at a later stage if the General Assembly wished to reverse its decision.

The representatives of France and the United Kingdom, among others, expressed the view that nothing had happened since the adoption of Assembly resolution 543 (VI) to justify a recommendation that its decision be reversed and that the interdependence of economic, social and cultural rights and civil and political rights was not a strong enough argument in favour of having only one covenant.

At its 666th plenary meeting on 30 July 1952 the Council rejected the USSR draft resolution by 10 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions. On the basis of a proposal by the Philippines, Sweden and the United States (E/L.449), it decided (resolution 440 A (XIV)) by 11 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions, to instruct the Commission to complete its work on the two covenants at its next session in 1953 and to submit them simultaneously to the Council.

3. Communications Concerning Human Rights

The Commission on Human Rights held its eighth session from 14 April to 14 June 1952. A non-confidential list (E/CN.4/CR.21) of communications on human rights prepared by the Secretary-General and dealing with principles involved in the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights was circulated to members of the Commission. A confidential list, summarizing other communications concerning human rights, was presented to the Commission, as at previous sessions, in a private meeting, together with fifteen replies from governments.

The Commission decided, for the first time, to include in its report a statement on the lists of communications dealt with during the period 3 April 1951 to 7 May 1952. The statement revealed, inter alia, that of a total of 25,279 communications, the great majority (24,194) dealt with alleged persecution on political grounds; other communications principally alleged genocide (305), violation of the right of freedom of assembly and association (119), discrimination and violation of rights of minorities (64), violation of trade union rights (83) and 478 communications alleged various violations. Of the total, 36 dealt with principles involved in the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and were distributed in the non-confidential lists.

The Commission discussed a proposal that it should request the Council to reconsider resolution 75(V), as amended,⁹⁰ and authorize the Commission to make reports and recommendations to the Council on communications regarding human rights. That part of the proposal requesting the Council to reconsider resolution 75 (V) was rejected and the remainder of the draft resolution withdrawn.

The question of communications concerning human rights was discussed by the Economic and Social Council at its 656th plenary meeting on 23 July. The General Assembly in resolution 542 (VI)⁹¹ had invited the Council to instruct the Commission on Human Rights for its ninth session with regard to such communications, and to request the Commission to formulate its recommendations on them.

The Council had before it two proposals:

(1) a joint draft resolution (E/L.447) by Egypt and Uruguay by which the Council would: (a) request the Commission to report or make recommendations to it on communications alleging violations of human rights which, in the Commission's opinion, merited the attention of the Council; (b) suggest certain criteria to the Commission in deciding which communications merited the Council's attention; and (c) request that such communications be transmitted to the Council together with any relevant replies or observations by governments. The Commission would further be asked, under the resolution, to recommend any modifications to resolution 75(V), as amended, which might be necessary to give effect to this resolution.

(2) a draft resolution (E/L.445) by Canada under which the Council, considering that the Commission on

Human Rights at its eighth session had rejected a proposal to request the Council to reconsider resolution 75(V), would decide not to take action on this matter at this time and to inform the General Assembly of this decision.

In support of their draft resolution, the representatives of Egypt and Uruguay maintained that the procedure set up by resolution 75(V) was unsatisfactory. The Commission's inability to act on those communications not only diminished its prestige but also damaged the reputation of the United Nations. If the Council decided to wait until machinery was set up under the covenants on human rights to deal with alleged violations, there would be considerable delay, since, after drafting and adoption, the covenants would still require ratification by 27 States before coming into force. Moreover, it was said, the machinery at present proposed in the covenants provided for action only in cases of complaints by States. It was also argued that, under the Charter, Member States had undertaken to promote respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and that the Commission's terms of reference would allow it to make recommendations concerning any questions relating to human rights, including communications.

The representatives of Belgium, Canada, China, France, Poland and the United Kingdom, however, felt that a real solution could be found only within the framework of the covenants on human rights, which would have the necessary legal force to enable the United Nations to ensure their execution.

Since the Canadian draft resolution had been submitted first, it was put to the vote first and was adopted by 11 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions, as resolution 441 (XIV). A vote was not taken on the joint draft resolution by Egypt and Uruguay.

4. Yearbook on Human Rights

The Yearbook on Human Rights for 1950, the English edition of which was published in 1952, introduced several new features in response to resolution 303 H (XI)⁹² of the Economic and Social Council.

Part I contains all new constitutional provisions on human rights promulgated throughout the world and legislative texts enacted during 1950, with explanatory notes. In addition, pursuant to the above mentioned resolution, for the first time, summaries of, or references to decisions of national courts were included in this part. A total of 71 sovereign States (among them 53

Member States) are represented with twelve constitutions, 272 statutory texts (or summaries of texts) and summaries of 98 decisions given by national courts. Part II contains laws and other texts on human rights in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. (The previous Yearbook was limited to the reproduction of basic laws in such territories.) Part III contains agreements concluded under the auspices of specialized agencies, and other multilateral treaties and agreements, including the Rome Convention for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, as well as bilateral treaties. Part IV records the activities of the United Nations in the field of human rights. For the first time, summaries of judgments and advisory opinions of the International Court of Justice were published in the Yearbook.

The Commission on Human Rights did not have time, during its eighth session, to consider the plan for the Yearbook on Human Rights prepared by the Secretary-General (E/CN.4/522).⁹³

5. Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The Commission on Human Rights, at its eighth session, held from 14 April to 14 June 1952, had before it the report (E/CN.4/641 and Corr.1) of the fourth session of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, held in October 1951.⁹⁴ The Sub-Commission had revised the definition of minorities and the draft resolution on interim measures to be taken for their protection. It had also recommended various provisions and amendments for the draft covenants on human rights.

The Sub-Commission also recommended that the Commission include in its agenda two items: (1) definition of and measures for the protection of political groups; and (2) redress of injuries suffered by groups through the total or partial destruction of their media of culture and their historical monuments.

The Sub-Commission also requested the Commission to recommend that the Council reconsider its decision to discontinue the Sub-Commission.

Owing to lack of time, the Commission on Human Rights did not consider the report of the Sub-Commission. However, it discussed a number of recommendations put forward by the Sub-Commission, especially those relating to the draft international covenants on human rights,⁹⁵ and included, inter alia, a general article on non-discrimination in both covenants. It also dealt with certain other matters in the field of prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities, that is the right of peoples and nations to self-determination, and communications.⁹⁶

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FOURTEENTH SESSION

The Council considered the question at the 220th and 221st meetings of its Social Committee on 20 June and at its 620th and 621st plenary meetings on 26 June 1952. It had before it a report by the Secretary-General (E/2229), prepared in accordance with resolution 414 B.II (XIII),⁹⁷ on future work concerning the prevention of discrimination and the protection of minorities. The report summarized the results of an inquiry among Member States concerning:

(1) items relating to the prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities which should be placed on the agenda of forthcoming Council sessions; (2) procedures for the preliminary study of these items and for the preparation of reports to provide a basis for discussion by the Council; and (3) the lines along which the Council might be called upon to continue its task in this field. The Secretary-General, in the report, also reviewed the Sub-Commission's recommendations on future work and made supplementary suggestions.

The Council at its fourteenth session decided not to discuss the substance of the Secretary-General's report. The debate centred instead in procedural questions arising from the General Assembly's invitation (resolution 532 B (VI))⁹⁸ that the Council authorize the Sub-Commission to continue its work and especially to convene a session of the Sub-Commission in 1952, while also taking any practical steps that might be necessary for the continuance within the framework of the United Nations of the work on prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities.

Members of the Council were agreed that the problem of discrimination against minority groups was of the utmost importance, but differed with regard to the procedure to be followed in dealing with the problem. The Swedish representative held that the Sub-Commission had not achieved practical results and he said he would have preferred a new approach emphasizing UNESCO's work. The majority, however, were of the opinion that the Sub-Commission should be revived, though differences arose as to whether it should hold its fifth session in 1952 or in 1953. Some representatives, among them those of Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Mexico, Poland and the USSR, considered the Assembly's invitation mandatory. Others, among them the representatives of Belgium, Canada, China, Pakistan, the United Kingdom and the United States, stressed that the Assembly had invited, not recommended, the Council to convene a 1952 session. They urged that the Sub-Commission should not be convened until after the Commission on Human Rights had discussed the report on the work so far accomplished and had set out new terms of reference.

A joint draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.120) to this effect was submitted by France and the United Kingdom and amendments to it were submitted by Sweden (E/AC.7/L.121) to stress the importance of UNESCO's work in this field and by the United States (E/AC.7/L.122) to clarify the text.

The joint draft resolution and the amendments to it were withdrawn following the adoption by the Social Committee of a draft resolution, submitted by Poland (E/AC.7/L.119) as amended by Mexico (E/AC.7/L.123) and, orally, by Argentina and Egypt.

The Mexican amendment, which was accepted by the representative of Poland, substituted for an enumeration of the forms of discrimination a request to the Sub-Commission to take up in 1952 its work at the point at which it had been suspended, with special emphasis on the prevention of discrimination of any kind. The amendments by Argentina and Egypt, which the Polish representative also accepted, indicated that the work undertaken should be within the terms of reference of the Sub-Commission and that it should report to the Commission on Human Rights on its future work.

After rejecting by 41 votes to 1, with 11 abstentions, an oral Egyptian proposal which would have the Sub-Commission also report on its terms of reference, the Social Committee adopted the Polish draft resolution, as amended, by 9 votes to 8, with 1 abstention, on 20 June. The operative part of the draft resolution adopted by the Committee (E/2264) proposed that the Council authorize the Sub-Commission to continue its work and convene the fifth session in 1952, taking up its work where it had left off, with special emphasis on the prevention of discrimination of any kind within its terms of reference. The Commission on Human Rights, it proposed, should be invited to consider at its ninth session the reports of the fourth and fifth sessions of the Sub-Commission.

During the discussion in plenary session, the representatives of France and the United Kingdom presented a joint amendment (E/L.375) to substitute for the operative part of the draft resolution a request to the Commission on Human Rights to study as soon as possible, in the light of work already undertaken by the United Nations, the Sub-Commission's recommendations and the extent to which it had fulfilled its task and to make recommendations concerning the terms of reference and future work of the Sub-Commission in sufficient time for a further session of the Sub-Commission to be convened in 1953. The amendment would also invite UNESCO, as a matter of high priority, to continue its work on discrimination.

With the exception of the invitation referring to UNESCO, which was retained by Sweden, the joint amendment was withdrawn in favour of a compromise amendment by Sweden (E/L.377/Rev.1) authorizing the Sub-Commission to meet in 1952 but to devote its session to considering a future plan of work which might then be approved by the Commission on Human Rights.

On the suggestion of the representatives of Canada and Pakistan, the Swedish proposal was amended to make it clear that the Council intended that the Sub-Commission should continue its work. This point was further emphasized by the adoption, by a roll-call vote of 10 to 5, with 3 abstentions, of a Philippines proposal, as amended by Poland, to the effect that the Sub-Commission continue its work for the prevention of discrimination and the protection of minorities in accordance with General Assembly resolution 532 B (VI).⁹⁹

Voting was as follows:

In favour: Canada, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Iran, Mexico, Philippines, Poland, USSR, Uruguay.

Against: Belgium, France, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Argentina, China, Pakistan.

The Swedish amendment, as amended, was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, and the amended draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 16 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, at the Council's 621st plenary meeting on 26 June.

The resolution (443 (XIV)) read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Noting that at its sixth session the General Assembly, in its resolution 532 B (VI), invited the Council:

"(a) To authorize the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities to continue its work so that it may fulfil its mission, and especially to convene a session in 1952,

"(b) To take any practical steps that may be necessary for the continuance within the framework of the United Nations of the work on prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities.

"1. Decides to convene a session of the Sub-Commission in 1952;

"2. Requests the Sub-Commission to continue its work for the prevention of discrimination and the protection of minorities in accordance with General Assembly resolution 532 B (VI) and, in the light of a descriptive list presented by the Secretary-General of the various research projects and action programmes on discrimination and minority problems already initiated or being planned by various United Nations organs and bodies and specialized agencies, to prepare, during its fifth session in 1952, for submission to the Commission on Human Rights, a report on future work in the field of the prevention of discrimination and the protection of minorities;

"3. Invites the Commission on Human Rights at its ninth session to consider the reports of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities on its fourth and fifth sessions and to report to the Council; and

"4. Invites the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, as a matter of high priority, to continue its studies and work on educational methods and projects best designed to overcome prejudice and discriminatory attitudes and measures, and to report thereon to the Council in 1953."

c. REPORT OF THE FIFTH SESSION OF THE SUB-COMMISSION

The Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities held its fifth session in New York from 22 September to 10 October 1952 (E/CN.4/670). Its recommendations concerned the prevention of discrimination, the protection of minorities, the relevant work of UNESCO, technical assistance, and publications. It also drew up a programme of work for approval by the Commission on Human Rights.

(1) Prevention of Discrimination

The Sub-Commission recommended that the Secretary-General arrange for the collection of all anti-discrimination provisions formulated by the League of Nations or by the United Nations. This information, it considered, should be kept up to date and made available to serve as a body of suitable precedents for use in elaborating constitutional or statutory provisions, particularly in the case of new States.

It recommended that the Council appeal to non-governmental organizations for co-ordinated efforts to eradicate prejudice and discrimination and asked the Secretary-General to consult these organizations and the specialized agencies concerned on the advisability of holding periodic conferences to exchange views and co-ordinate work in this field.

The Sub-Commission suggested that UNESCO, on the basis of a thorough study of views contributing to discrimination against certain religious groups, to inter-religious hostility and to tensions in general, should prepare a series of suggestions explaining and clarifying the misrepresentations, misinterpretations and misunderstandings of any religion by the adherents of any other religion.

It proposed that Member States be recommended to review their national legislation and administrative practices with a view to abolishing all discrimination and to taking effective measures for the protection of minorities.

The Commission on Human Rights was asked to approve the Sub-Commission's proposal to study, among other measures to combat discrimination, those in the fields of education, employment and occupation, political rights, religious rights and practices, residence and movement, immigration and travel, the enjoyment of family rights and the right to choose a spouse. The Sub-Commission decided to begin the study of discrimination in education immediately and appointed a special rapporteur to draw up a provisional plan of work.

(2) Protection of Minorities

Emphasizing that an approved definition of minorities was required if further work were to be undertaken for their protection, the Sub-Commission asked that the Commission on Human Rights record its precise views on the definition submitted by the Sub-Commission at its fourth session. It called to the Commission's attention, in particular, the importance of the use of minority languages in courts and schools.

The Sub-Commission proposed that the Council should recommend that special attention be given to the protection of minorities in the preparation of international treaties, decisions of international organs, or other acts establishing new States or new boundary lines between States. To provide a body of precedents for use in drafting minorities clauses in such instruments, it recommended that the Secretary-General arrange for a complete up-to-date collection of provisions for the protection of minorities.

As regards its work programme, the Sub-Commission asked that the Commission on Human Rights approve its study, at its sixth session, of the variety and scope of measures for the protection of all minority rights through legislative measures, judicial decisions and administrative practices.

(3) Other Recommendations

UNESCO, the Sub-Commission recommended, should be invited to prepare a special report each year, reviewing the activities undertaken to eradicate prejudice and discrimination and to protect minorities.

It proposed that the Council recommend that organizations participating in technical assistance programmes consider sympathetically the requests of governments for technical assistance to eradicate prejudice or discrimination or to protect minorities, and that the Secretary-General be authorized to render expert technical advice and other services to Member States, at their request, in this field. Such services, it decided, should include, but need not be restricted to, technical expert advice on drafting legislation and in establishing administrative and judicial machinery and should also extend to educational programmes designed to combat prejudice and discrimination.

The Sub-Commission further requested the Secretary-General to produce a popular booklet on its work and to publish a pamphlet on the work of the United Nations regarding prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities. He was also asked to publish, for the general public, a printed booklet containing an up-to-date analysis of information supplied by Members and non-members of the United Nations concerning (1) legislation and judicial decisions and other types of action which they had found useful in the prevention of discrimination and (2) legislative measures they had taken to protect minorities within their jurisdiction.

6. Trade Union Rights

At its fourteenth session the Economic and Social Council had before it several communications (E/2154 and Add.1 to 48) alleging that trade union rights were being infringed in various countries. They were submitted in accordance with resolution 277(X)¹⁰⁰ by which the Council had requested the Secretary-General to bring any allegations received from governments or trade union or employers' organizations to its attention. The Council also had before it a note (E/2222) submitted by the Secretary-General on pending allegations regarding infringements of trade union rights under Council resolution 351 (XII).¹⁰¹

In this note, the Secretary-General stated that he had no further information to add to the report he had made to the Council at its thirteenth session apart from the observations of the Government of Japan (E/2175/Add.1 and Add.1/Corr.1) and his report (E/2202) on the applicability of resolution 277(X) to allegations regarding infringements in Japan. In addition to the observations of the Government of Japan, the Council had before it replies of the Government of Bolivia (E/2175 and Corr.1 and Add.2).

At the 571st plenary meeting of the Council, during the discussion of the provisional agenda, the representative of the United States made the following proposals:

(1) That in accordance with rule 15(a)¹⁰² of the Council's rules of procedure and in keeping with Council resolution 277(X), all new allegations regarding infringements of trade union rights which related to States that were members of the ILO should be transmitted to that body for consideration.

(2) That allegations concerning States that were not members of ILO should be discussed by the Council at the appropriate time, preferably after the discussion of the report of ILO.

(3) That the Secretary-General's note (E/2222) should be included in documentation for the discussion of the item on allegations regarding infringements of trade union rights at the Council's current session.

The United States proposals were opposed by the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR who stated that these proposals were designed to shelve the question of infringements of trade union rights which the Council, under the Charter, was bound to consider. They held that the aim of the proposals was to avoid discussion of several complaints against the United States of infringements. The membership and political trends in ILO were such that the questions would never be decided by that body, these representatives maintained.

The representative of the United States replied that rule 15(a) of the rules of procedure provided that the specialized agency, in this case ILO, would report to the Council on its work. That meant that the Council would review the agency's findings. The proposal aimed only at putting into effect the Council's rules of procedure.

The first United States proposal was adopted by 14 votes to 3, the second by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, and the third by 14 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. As a result of these decisions, the replies of Japan and Bolivia, both members of ILO, were referred to that organization.

At its 648th and 649th plenary meetings on 17 and 18 July, the Council considered the sections of the sixth report of ILO (E/2240) dealing with the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association and with the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Commission had been established by ILO on its own behalf and on behalf of the United Nations to deal with allegations of infringements of trade union rights. The Committee on Freedom of Association¹⁰³ had been established by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office for preliminary examinations of the allegations and their reference to the Commission. The section of the report dealing with the Commission outlined the procedure followed by the Commission under which allegations of infringements are first examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

During the debate in the Council, the representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions contended that the transfer of complaints to ILO without prior discussion in the Council was an abdication of the Council's responsibility and stated that all future allegations addressed to the Council should be placed on its agenda at each session. She stated that all complaints submitted to the eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth sessions of the Council had been rejected at the preliminary stage of examination after receipt by ILO of statements from the governments concerned, and maintained that ILO was in reality working in the interests of governments rather than of the workers. This point of view was also expressed by the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR.

Other representatives, including those of Belgium, Canada, France and Sweden, and the United States considered that the procedure devised by ILO had proved reliable. It provided, said the United States representative, for careful examination of allegations; cases were studied impartially and, when the information provided was incomplete, every effort was made to obtain more detailed and accurate data. Appreciation was expressed of the valuable work which the Committee of the Governing Body and the Commission had done within a short time.

The Council, at its 649th meeting on 18 July, rejected, by 15 votes to 3, a Polish draft resolution (E/L/420) which proposed that it decide to place all allegations regarding infringement of trade union freedom addressed to it on its agenda at each session.

At the same meeting, it also rejected, by 12 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions, a draft resolution (E/L.393/Rev.1) by Czechoslovakia which would request the President of the Council to approach the Spanish authorities with a view to invalidating the sentences of 27 convicted Spanish trade unionists and/or obtaining their acquittal and release.

At its 649th meeting the Council also considered the alleged failure of Romania, Spain and the USSR, to reply to communications addressed to them under Council resolution 351 (XII)¹⁰⁴ regarding infringements of trade union rights, and the question of infringements of trade union rights in Spain, Trieste and the Saar.

The representatives of Canada and the United States submitted a draft resolution (E/L.422) under which the Governments of Romania, Spain and the USSR would again be invited to reply to the communications and the attention of the governments concerned would be called to the alleged infringements in the Saar, Spain and Trieste.

The representative of the USSR opposed the joint draft resolution, stating that, without adducing any proof, it sought to discredit the Soviet trade unions. While freedom of association was guaranteed by the Soviet Constitution, he said, no similar provision existed in the United States Constitution and he spoke of the "semi-fascist reactionary Taft-Hartley Act" which, he said, regulated labour and management relations in the United States.

The representative of the United States said that in view of the glowing accounts of the trade union situation in the USSR given by its representative, it was surprising that the USSR was not willing to submit documents to the Fact-Finding Commission which would confirm those accounts. It appeared to him that the USSR was afraid of an impartial and careful analysis of trade union rights in the Soviet Union.

The joint draft resolution was voted on in paragraphs, which were all adopted by votes ranging from 11 to 4, with 3 abstentions, to 13 to 4, with 1 abstention. The draft resolution was adopted as a whole by 11 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 444(XIV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Having noted that no replies have been received to the communications sent, pursuant to Council resolutions 277 (X) and 351(XII), to the Governments of Romania, Spain and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, regarding allegations of infringements of trade-union rights in those countries (E/1882, section I, E/1882/Add.1 and E/1882, section IV, respectively), and

"Having taken note of the allegations regarding infringements of trade-union rights transmitted by the Secretary-General contained in documents E/2154/Add. 18, 20, 21, 30, 34, 41, 43 and 48,

"1. Requests the Secretary-General again to invite the Governments of Romania, Spain and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to reply to the requests previously addressed to them under resolution 351 (XII);

"2. Requests the Secretary-General, in consequence of the communications received from the Norwegian Trade Union Federation (E/2154/Add.18), representatives of trade unions of the state of Nuevo Leon, Mexico (E/2154/Add.21), the Confederade dos Trabalhadores do Brasil (E/2154/Add.30, second paragraph), the World Federation of Trade Unions (E/2154/Add.34 and 41) and the Union internationale des Syndicats des travailleurs du bâtiment, du bois et des matériaux de construction (E/2154/Add.48), to bring to the attention of the Government of Spain the allegations regarding infringements of trade-union rights in Spain, as well as the provisions of resolution 277 (X) under which allegations regarding infringements of trade-union rights may be referred for examination to the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association, and to invite that Government to submit its observations on the matter;

"3. Requests the Secretary-General, in consequence of the communication from the Trade Unions International of Land and Air Transport Workers (E/2154/Add.20) to bring to the attention of the Allied Military Government of Trieste the allegations regarding infringement of trade-union rights in Trieste, as well as the provisions of resolution 277(X), under which allegations regarding infringement of trade-union rights may be referred for examination to the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association, and to invite that government to submit its observations on the matter; and

"4. Requests the Secretary-General, in consequence of the communications from the Unity Trade Union Workers, Employees and Officials of the Saar (E/2154/Add.43) to bring to the attention of the competent authorities of the Saar, through the appropriate channels, the allegations regarding infringement of trade-union rights in the Saar, as well as the provisions of resolution 277 (X), under which allegations regarding infringement of trade-union rights may be referred for examination to the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commissions on Freedom of Association, and to invite those authorities to submit their observations on the matter."

7. Forced Labour

The Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labour,¹⁰⁵ appointed by the Secretary-General and the Director-General of ILO in accordance with the Economic and Social Council's resolution 350 (XII), held its second and third sessions, respectively, from 2 June to 1 July and from 14 October to 22 November 1952.

The Committee devoted its second session to the study of the documentation submitted to it, and to hearing representatives of non-governmental organizations and other witnesses invited by the Committee. It also had before it replies from 42 governments to a questionnaire (E/2153) circulated by the Committee to all governments concerning (1) punitive, educational or corrective labour; and (2) other cases of compulsion to work.

The Committee also examined documents transmitted at its first session by the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States (E/AC.36/4), and supplementary information transmitted by the United States Government (E/AC36/4/Add.1). It further studied documentation relating to over 50 countries and territories assembled by the Secretariat as requested, on the basis of the allegations made in Council debates as well as a number of communications relating to forced labour which had been received by the United Nations or ILO.

Memoranda from various non-governmental organizations and individuals were received by the Committee. These contained requests to be heard or to submit documentary evidence in accordance with the procedure laid down by the Committee. The Committee heard nine non-governmental organizations and a number of private individuals and invited several non-governmental organizations and private individuals to submit documentary evidence referred to in their memoranda.

The Committee decided to renew the Chairman's authority to arrange for the appointment and to define the duties of regional consultants to collect information and relevant documentary evidence, such as laws and regulations on the existence of systems of forced labour. It discussed the possibility of informing governments of the specific allegations made and the evidence submitted, and of dispatching communications to that effect after its third session for comment by the governments concerned. It decided to postpone until its third session further consideration of the question of on-the-spot inquiries. Finally, it gave specific instructions concerning the Secretariat's programme of work.

On 1 July 1952, the Committee adopted its second progress report (E/2276) to the Economic and Social Council and to the Governing Body of the International Labour Office.

At its third session the Committee heard the representatives of several other non-governmental organizations as well as two private individuals. The main task of the Committee at this session was, however, to prepare a summary of allegations of forced labour and of the material available to the Committee for transmittal to the governments concerned. Documents containing these summaries were prepared by the members of the Committee in a series of informal discussions covering the major part of the session.

The Committee emphasized that at the current stage of its work it had come to no conclusions, either on the relevancy of the allegations or on the value as evidence of the information and documentary material summarized in these documents, and that the documents were being communicated confidentially only to the governments concerned for comment.

Other business discussed by the Committee at its third session included a request to the Chairman to prepare a draft for the Committee's final report after considering the allegations, documentary materials and replies of governments and the assignment of further work to the Secretariat.

This included work in connexion with the implementation of the Committee's decisions and the preparation of its fourth session, summarizing replies to the questionnaire received from governments after the third session together with research concerning legal and other texts quoted in these replies, and assistance in the drafting of the Committee's report. On 22 November 1952 the Committee adopted its third progress report (E/2341) to the Economic and Social Council and to the Governing Body of the International Labour Office.

The question of forced labour was not considered by the Economic and Social Council during 1952.

8. Plight of Survivors of Nazi Concentration Camps

The Secretary-General presented to the Council, at its fourteenth session, a third progress report (E/2259) on the plight of survivors of so-called scientific experiments in Nazi concentration camps. It stated that in accordance with resolution 386(XIII)¹⁰⁶ of the Economic and Social Council, the Secretary-General had transmitted to the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany the information in his possession concerning the number and nature of the various cases. As of 20 June 1952, information had been transmitted on 225 cases.

On 29 February 1952, the report said, the Secretary-General, after consultation with the Director-General of the World Health Organization, had made certain suggestions to the Government of the Federal German Republic concerning the investigation and certification of requests for indemnification.

On 23 April the Federal Government had sent a note which stated that, up to 1 April 1952, a total of 521 applications had been received from persons claiming welfare benefits under the decision of the Cabinet of 26 July 1951. Of these, 268 had originated abroad and 253 in Germany itself. The Federal Government, it was stated, noted with satisfaction the active support given to it by the United Nations, the specialized agencies, governments and private groups concerned in collecting and sifting individual cases. The note stated that the Federal Government welcomed the suggestions made to it by the Secretary-General on 29 February concerning the assistance of experts in clarifying cases which were open to dispute, and that it might wish to refer to these suggestions again. The note said further that, although all applications were in the course of being dealt with, it had not been possible to avoid some delay in the necessary examination of cases. However, the first decisions on the granting of welfare benefits were to be made soon. In those cases where a claim was recognized as justified, the payments were to be made without delay since sufficient funds had already been made available for the purpose.

Regarding the administration of allocations from the Paris Reparation Fund,¹⁰⁷ the Secretary-General's report said that the total available for allocation amounted to $125,000. This amount was channelled through two voluntary agencies participating in the administration of the Reparation Fund as follows:

(1) National Catholic Welfare Conference (for Polish and non-German and non-Austrian victims of non-Jewish religion).

(2) International Rescue Committee, Inc. (for Austrian and German victims of non-Jewish religion).

These two organizations, the report said, had been left free to work out the most suitable arrangements, the only stipulation being that quarterly financial returns and periodic audited statements of accounts were to be rendered, and that the names and addresses of victims, together with the amount of assistance granted to each, were to be furnished to the Reparations Office of the Committee for the Movement of Migrants. The agencies had been requested to take all possible action to facilitate the earliest distribution of funds to needy victims.

The National Catholic Welfare Conference had dealt with approximately 100 cases in thirteen different countries. The procedure set up had been for "field committees" to make an official evaluation of each applicant's claim that he was the subject of experiments, taking into account certain specified factors as corroborating evidence. Field committees were authorized to make an immediate payment of a lump sum as soon as eligibility was established, after which each case history was submitted to the headquarters of the National Catholic Welfare Conference in order to decide whether additional payments should be made in the light of the claimant's current physical condition or family needs.

The International Rescue Committee, it was stated, had handled approximately 30 cases. Early payments were made in fifteen cases whose authenticity had been established. In other urgent pending cases, advance relief was granted.

The Provisional Inter-Governmental Committee for the Movement of Migrants from Europe, which had taken over certain operations of The International Refugee Organization after the cessation of the activities of that organization, had informed the Secretary-General that there was some hope that additional payments into the Reparation Fund might permit further grants to be made to victims. The report concluded by stating that the Secretary-General had maintained contact with the National Catholic Welfare Council and the International Rescue Committee.

As requested by the Council's resolution 386 (XIII), the Secretary-General continued to collect material on individual cases and, since June 1952, transmitted to the Federal Government information concerning an additional 243 cases. Altogether, as of 31 December 1952, the Secretary-General had transmitted 468 claims to the Federal Government.

Supplementing its communication of 23 April, the Federal Government, on 10 July 1952, informed the Secretary-General of the measures taken by it to compensate victims up to that date. It stated that on 6 May 1952, the first meeting of an inter-ministerial committee took place entrusted with the examination of application for welfare measures by virtue of the Federal Government's decision of 26 July 1951. In the view of the committee, all persons, who were proved to have been victims of so-called scientific experiments in Nazi concentration camps and who had not yet received any other compensation, had a claim, in principle, to welfare benefits. The Committee decided to dispatch a commission of government delegates to the Netherlands and Belgium to expedite work by a preliminary examination on the spot. Applicants domiciled abroad, the note stated, would be informed by the Commission through the diplomatic representatives of the Federal Republic. The payment of welfare benefits would also be effected by the diplomatic representatives, and would be made in the currency of the country in which the applicant had permanent residence.

The Secretary-General addressed a note to the Federal Government seeking information on the situation as of 1 September 1952 regarding measures for compensating survivors, including particulars regarding each claim for compensation. In reply, the Federal Government stated that as of that date, payments amounting in all to 351,673.20 Deutsche marks had been made to 108 applicants, while 48 claims had been rejected. The 108 successful claimants had received sums ranging from 25,000 DM for sulfonamide experiments to 2,000 DM, or less, for sterilization.

The 108 cases were divided as follows: sterilization—87; malaria—nine; injections—two; hormone transplantation—one; typhus—two; low temperature—one; serum—one; X-rays—two; sulfonamide—one; phlegmon—two.

The 48 rejections were made on the following grounds: in 27 cases, the applicants were not victims of so-called scientific experiments; in fifteen cases, the applicants were not in need of assistance; in four cases, the applicants had received compensation previously; and in two cases, the applicants did not suffer impairment of health.

A number of claimants, in letters addressed to the Secretariat, paid tribute to the efforts which the United Nations had made on their behalf. On the other hand, a large number of claimants complained of the inadequacy of the compensation they had received, of the rejection of their claims, of the method of investigation employed by representatives of the Federal Authorities, and of delay on the part of the Federal Government in reaching a decision in their case. The Secretary-General transmitted the substance of a number of such communications to the Federal Government.

9. Prisoners of War

The Ad Hoc Commission on Prisoners of War¹⁰⁸ was established (427(V)) by the General Assembly in 1950 to seek a settlement of the question of prisoners taken in the Second World War and not yet repatriated or otherwise accounted for.

The Commission held its first session in New York from 30 July to 15 August 1951,¹⁰⁹ and its second and third sessions from 22 January to 9 February and from 26 August to 13 September 1952 respectively, in Geneva. In view of the special character of the work entrusted to it, the majority of meetings were held in private.

In order to establish direct consultations with the governments most concerned in the problem of prisoners of war, the Commission invited the Governments of Australia, Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States to name representatives to attend its second session. With the exception of the USSR, all those invited named representatives. In addition, Denmark named an observer.

On the basis of information provided by these representatives and of information previously submitted, the Commission (A/AC.46/8) took the following steps, among others, to carry out its task. The Commission noted that the information relating to former prisoners of war sentenced for war crimes, or being held for such crimes, was incomplete and decided to ask all governments detaining persons charged with war crimes, or under sentence for such crimes, for detailed information concerning the judicial procedure under which such persons had been tried and sentenced and their present status. It also decided to address a further letter to the USSR, requesting information on prisoners of war who had died while in the custody of that country. The Commission recognized that, owing to war devastation, certain available records and archives might have been destroyed and therefore asked the USSR to furnish the Commission with a list, as complete as possible, of such deceased persons and, at least, a list of those who had died since 1947.

On the basis of its examination and evaluation of other information transmitted to it, the Commission decided to ask certain governments for supplementary information. It also took action on certain specific requests from governments which called for immediate decision.

The Commission reported that, in view of the detailed information furnished by the Governments of the Federal Republic of Germany and of Japan, and taking into account the strictly objective and impartial method it had followed from the outset, it had decided not to accept the invitations from those Governments to visit their countries to examine the original records containing data about prisoners of war who were as yet unrepatriated or unaccounted for.

Before its third session the Commission once more decided that its task would be greatly assisted if certain governments most concerned named representatives to meet with it, specifically the Governments of the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan and the USSR. With the exception of the USSR, the Governments invited named their representatives who met with the Commission and were available for consultation. In addition, the Commission let it be known to other governments which had on previous occasions provided the Commission with valuable information that they were welcome to name representatives or observers. The following named representatives: Australia, Belgium, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States. In addition Brazil expressed its interest in the Commission's work and named a representative and Denmark named an observer.

At its third session (A/AC.46/11) the Commission continued the examination and evaluation of information before it and held consultations with representatives of a number of governments. In response to requests made at the second session, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy and Japan had also supplied additional information about unrepatriated war prisoners.

The Commission requested a number of governments to furnish additional information and addressed an inquiry to the Government of the People's Republic of China concerning Japanese prisoners of war who might still be under the control of that Government or who might have died while in its custody. The Commission decided that it would hold its fourth session in New York in May 1953, when it would prepare its final report.

Meanwhile, on September 12, the Commission transmitted a special report (A/AC.46/10) to the Secretary-General, informing him that it had been unable to secure the co-operation of the USSR. Therefore the Commission had regretfully come to the conclusion that it was unable to perform the basic task for which it had been set up, namely to settle "the question of the prisoners of war in a purely humanitarian spirit and on terms acceptable to all Governments concerned." It recalled that the Government of the USSR had not responded, as had other governments concerned, to the Commission's invitation to name a representative to meet with it at its session. The USSR Government had not replied to the Commission's letter of 9 February 1952 requesting information concerning prisoners of war who had died while in its custody. It had made no reply to the Commission's request contained in letters dated 18 April 1952 and 31 July 1952 for information concerning prisoners of war detained on charges of war crimes. The Commission stated that it considered it to be its duty to inform the Secretary-General that this obstacle was paralysing its work and increasing the difficulty of verifying the large amount of information furnished by other governments directly concerned in the repatriation of prisoners who have not yet returned to their homes.

The Commission asked that the Secretary-General circulate the special report to United Nations Members prior to the Assembly's seventh session.

The Commission intended to prepare at its next session the final report on the results of its work together with such conclusions as might be drawn from the documentation in its possession. It expressed the hope that a fresh appeal for international co-operation among the Members of the United Nations and to their spirit of humanity might have the effect of giving a more promising direction to the work that it had so far carried on, with only limited success.

L. FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

During 1952, the question of freedom of information was considered by: (1) the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press, at its fifth session, held from 3 to 21 March; (2) the Economic and Social Council, at its fourteenth session, at the 214th to 220th meetings of its Social Committee, from 4 to 10 June and at its 602nd to 604th plenary meetings, on 12 and 13 June; and (3) the General Assembly, at its seventh session, at the 421st to 442nd meetings of its Third Committee, from 22 October to 11 November and at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December.

In these organs, a number of interrelated aspects of the question of freedom of information were the subject of consideration, including:

(1) the work of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press; (2) conventions on freedom of information and on the international right of correction; (3) the draft international code of ethics; (4) the establishment of an international institute of press and information; (5) information facilities in under-developed regions of the world; (6) dissemination of resolutions of the United Nations; (7) the question of false or distorted information; (8) freedom of information as a means of promoting friendly relations among nations; (9) the closing down of the newspaper La Prensa; and (10) the future work of the United Nations in the field of freedom of information. The discussions and decisions of the various United Nations organs are dealt with below under these headings.

1. Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press

By resolution 414 B.I. (XIII),¹¹⁰ adopted on 18 September 1951, the Economic and Social Council decided that the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press should hold a final meeting to complete its work on the draft international code of ethics for information personnel.

In accordance with the Council's resolution, the Sub-Commission held its fifth session consisting of 26 meetings from 3 to 21 March 1952, and reported (E/2190) to the Council at its fourteenth session, held from 20 May to 1 August 1952.

The report of the Sub-Commission contained a number of specific recommendations of which an account is given below.

The report was considered by the Council's Social Committee at its 214th to 220th meetings, from 4 to 10 June and at the 602nd to 604th plenary meetings of the Council, on 12 and 13 June 1952.

In the general discussion in the Social Committee and in the Council the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR stated that in its work the Sub-Commission had concerned itself with matters outside its competence; instead of endeavouring to make freedom of information serve the campaign for peace and the development of friendship between nations, it had preferred to condemn certain governments. The representatives of Iran and Pakistan, on the other hand, congratulated the Sub-Commission on its work.

The Committee, at its 220th meeting on 10 June, by 13 votes to 3 and, on its recommendation (E/2251), the Council, at its 604th plenary meeting on 13 June, by 12 votes to 3, adopted a resolution (442 A (XIV)) formally taking note of the report of the Sub-Commission.

That part of the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2172) dealing with the question of freedom of information came before the General Assembly at its seventh session, and was discussed by the Assembly's Third Committee during its consideration of the agenda item "Freedom of Information" at its 421st to 442nd meetings, from 22 October to 11 November Views similar to those expressed in the Council were put forward.

Chile, the Dominican Republic, Honduras, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.262) concerning the Sub-Commission. Under this joint draft the General Assembly would refer to the constructive work done by the Sub-Commission during its five sessions and to the fact that the Assembly had not hitherto had an opportunity to declare an opinion on that work. The Assembly, further, would express appreciation of what the Sub-Commission had accomplished, requesting the Secretary-General to convey its thanks for the service rendered by the Sub-Commission.

After the sponsors had accepted two oral drafting amendments, the joint draft resolution was approved, at the 440th meeting of the Third Committee on 7 November, by 41 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions. The draft resolution recommended by the Committee (A/2294) was adopted by the Assembly at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December, without discussion, by 50 votes to 5, with 1 abstention as resolution 632 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering the constructive work done by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press during its five sessions,

"Considering that it has not hitherto had an opportunity to express an opinion on the work of the Sub-Commission,

"1. Decides to express its appreciation for the work which the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press has accomplished;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to convey its thanks for the service which the Sub-Commission has honourably rendered in discharging its duties."

2. Conventions on Freedom of Information and the International Right of Correction

The General Assembly, at the second part of its third session, approved (resolution 277 C (III)) a draft Convention on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction,¹¹¹ which consisted of the amalgamation, with certain revisions, of two draft conventions, one on the gathering and international transmission of news and the other on the institutions of an international right of correction, adopted by the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information, held in Geneva from 23 March to 21 April 1948. The Assembly at the same time, in resolution 277 A (III), decided not to open this draft convention for signature until it had taken definite action on the third draft convention adopted by the Conference, a general draft Convention on Freedom of Information.

At its fifth session, the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press recommended (E/2190) that the Economic and Social Council appeal to the General Assembly to open for signature at its seventh session the Conventions on Freedom of Information and on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction.

During the general discussion on freedom of information at the Council's fourteenth session at the 214th to 216th meetings of the Social Committee, from 4 to 6 June, the representative of France, supported by the representative of Egypt, drew attention to the fact that, of three draft conventions with which the Council had been concerned, not one had up to that time been opened for signature.

The recommendations of the Sub-Commission were considered by the Council's Social Committee at its 219th and 220th meetings on 9 and 10 June.

The Committee also considered an amendment by France (E/AC.7/L.114), which would substitute for the draft resolution recommended by the Sub-Commission, a resolution in which the Council would state that it was aware of the need effectively to counteract false and distorted news,¹¹² and would invite the Assembly to open for signature at its next session a convention on the international right of correction, consisting of the relevant articles contained in the Convention on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction approved in resolution 277 C (III).

The representatives of Canada, China, the Philippines, Sweden, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed any dissociation of the three draft conventions. The representative of Mexico, while agreeing with this principle, stated that he would support the French proposal. The representative of Iran made the compromise suggestion that an article embracing the right of correction might be added to the text of the draft international code of ethics.¹¹³

That part of the French amendment which would have the Committee state its awareness of the need effectively to counteract false and distorted news was adopted by the Committee, by a roll-call vote of 7 to 4, with 7 abstentions. Also by roll-call vote, the Committee, by 8 votes to 4, with 6 abstentions, rejected the proposal concerning the opening for signature of the convention. The French amendment, as a whole, was rejected by roll-call vote of 8 to 7, with 3 abstentions, and the recommendation of the Sub-Commission on the same question, after being rejected in parts, by votes ranging from 4 to 2, with 12 abstentions to 9 to 1, with 7 abstentions was rejected as a whole by 9 votes to 4, with 4 abstentions.

The Committee, accordingly, made no recommendation in this connexion to the Council.

At the seventh session of the General Assembly, during the general debate in the 421st to 428th meetings of the Third Committee from 22 to 29 October, a number of different opinions were expressed concerning: (1) the draft general convention on freedom of information and (2) the draft convention containing provisions on the international right of correction.

With regard to the draft convention on freedom of information, the following were the main points of view expressed:

¹¹¹ See Y.U.N., 1948-49, pp. 564-67.

¹¹³ See pp. 465-66.

A number of representatives, among them those of Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Ecuador, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, pointed out that the draft convention on freedom of information had been under consideration in various organs of the United Nations, including the General Assembly, since 1948, and expressed the view that the Assembly was morally bound to take steps to ensure that the work of the Committee on the Draft Convention on Freedom of Information, which the General Assembly itself had set up at its fifth session, was not dissipated.

Other speakers, including the representatives of Belgium, Chile, China, Iran, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, recalled the controversy which had always attended discussion of the draft convention especially in regard to article 2 (which lists permissible restrictions on freedom of information) and doubted that the prevailing political climate was propitious to further work on the draft.

A number of representatives, including those of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, on the other had, contended that the draft convention would facilitate foreign intervention and hostile propaganda, since it lacked certain necessary precautionary measures, such as steps to ensure that freedom of speech and of the Press was not used for war propaganda and racial discrimination, to create enmity between peoples and to disseminate slanders.

Other representatives, including those of Australia, Brazil, China, Greece, the Netherlands, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, maintained that the appointment by the Council of a rapporteur charged with the preparation of a substantive report on problems in the field and on ways and means of overcoming them represented a new approach by the United Nations, and considered that action on the draft convention should therefore be postponed until the Council had received and studied the rapporteur's report.

Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Yemen and Yugoslavia submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.256) proposing that the Committee, considering that the procedures previously followed for the purpose of reaching agreement on the provisions of the draft convention on freedom of information had not been successful and having heard the statements made in the general debate on the draft convention, should decide after the conclusion of the general debate to proceed to a detailed consideration of the draft convention with a view to reaching agreement on the contentious parts thereof.

Honduras submitted an amendment (A/C.3/L.257) proposing that a paragraph be added concerning the preparation of an annual report on freedom of information in each of the States Members of the United Nations. The amendment was later submitted to the Committee as a separate resolution (A/C.3/L.257/Rev.2) and an amendment by India (A/C.3/L.283), stipulating that the proposed report would be based on data which the Secretary-General might collect from various sources, was accepted by the representative of Honduras. At the 438th meeting on 6 November, however, the representative of Honduras withdrew his proposal.

The USSR submitted a number of amendments (A/C.3/L.254) to the draft convention on freedom of information as drafted by the Committee on the Draft Convention on Freedom of Information (A/AC.42/7, annex). The amendments related to the text of the preamble and articles 1, 2, 4, 5, 7 and 12 of the draft convention. The Committee decided at its 429th meeting, by 42 votes to none, with 12 abstentions, however, that action should first be taken on the sixteen-Power proposal (A/C.3/L.256). On a roll-call vote, the joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.256) was not adopted, 23 votes being cast in favour and 23 against, with 8 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Burma, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Uruguay, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, El Salvador, France, Greece, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Sweden, Ukrainian SSR, Union of South Africa, USSR, United States.

Abstaining: Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Dominican Republic, Iran, Turkey, United Kingdom, Venezuela.

The representative of the USSR said he would not press for action on his proposed amendments (A/C.3/L.254) since he considered it preferable to defer them until the next session of the General Assembly.

The Assembly therefore took no decision at its seventh session on the general draft convention on freedom of information.

With regard to a draft convention on the international right of correction, some representatives, including those of Egypt, Guatemala and Pakistan, said there was no danger that the draft convention, approved by the General Assembly in resolution 277 C (III), in its existing form might lead to restrictions on freedom of information.

Egypt, France, Lebanon, Uruguay and Yugoslavia submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.252) which would urge all Members of the United Nations and the other States invited to the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information to sign the text of a convention on the international right of correction, and by which the Assembly would decide that the convention should be opened for signature at the end of its seventh regular session. The text of the convention was given in an annex to the joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.252/Add.1) reproducing the provisions relating to the right of correction contained in the preamble and articles of the Draft Convention on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction approved by the General Assembly in resolution 277(III) of 13 May 1949.

The representatives of Lebanon and Yugoslavia stated that article IX of the draft convention as presented in the annex to the joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.252/Add.1)¹¹⁴ and dealing with the application of the convention in territories for the international relations of which a contracting State was responsible, had been rendered obsolete by General Assembly resolution 422(V), concerning the territorial application of the international covenant on human rights.

Egypt, France, Lebanon, Uruguay and Yugoslavia presented a revised text of their joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.252/Rev.1) proposing that articles IX, X, paragraph 2¹¹⁵ and XIII (c)¹¹⁶ of the draft convention as presented in A/C.3/L.252/Add.1 should be deleted.

Lebanon and Yugoslavia introduced an amendment (A/C.3/L.264) to the joint draft resolution, the purpose of which was to replace article IX of the draft convention, corresponding to article XVIII of the Draft Convention on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction annexed to General Assembly resolution 277 C (III), by a new article IX. This new article, which conformed to the text given in General Assembly resolution 422(V), would state that the provisions of the Convention on the International Right of Correction extended to or were applicable equally to a signatory Metropolitan State and to all the territories, be they Non-Self-Governing Territories, Trust or Colonial Territories, administered or governed by such Metropolitan State.

The proposal of the representatives of Lebanon and Yugoslavia was adopted at the 432nd meeting on 1 November, by a roll-call vote of 32 to 7, with 15 abstentions.

The joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.252/Rev.1) as thus amended was adopted by a roll-call vote of 25 to 19, with 10 abstentions.

The recommendation by the Third Committee (A/2294) was considered by the Assembly at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December. It also considered two drafting amendments presented jointly by Lebanon and Yugoslavia (A/L.131), which the sponsors described as purely formal changes, intended solely to bring the text into conformity with the intentions of the Assembly. Without discussion, the Assembly adopted the amendment in two parts, by 30 votes to 5, with 20 abstentions and by 29 votes to 5, with 22

"1. Any State may, at the time of signature or at any time thereafter, declare by notification addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations that the present Convention shall extend to all or any of the territories for the international relations of which it is responsible. This Convention shall extend to the territory or territories named in the notification as from the thirtieth day after the day of receipt by the Secretary-General of the United Nations of this notification.

"2. Each Contracting State undertakes to take as soon as possible the necessary steps in order to extend the application of this Convention to such territories, subject, where necessary for constitutional reasons, to the consent of the Governments of such territories.

"3. The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall communicate the present Convention to the States referred to in article XV(1) for transmission to the responsible authorities of:

"(a) Any Non-Self-Governing Territory administered by them;

"(b) Any Trust Territory administered by them;

"(c) Any other non-metropolitan territory for the international relations of which they are responsible."

¹¹⁵ This paragraph (corresponding to paragraph 2 of article XIX of the Draft Convention on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction annexed to General Assembly resolution 277 C (III) read:

"2. Any Contracting State which has made a declaration under article XVIII (1) may at any time thereafter, by notification to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, declare that the Convention shall cease to extend to such territory six months after the date of receipt of the notification by the Secretary-General."

("The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall notify the States referred to in article VI (1) of the following:)

"(c) Notifications received in accordance with article IX and article X (2);".

abstentions, respectively. It adopted the draft resolution, as amended, by 25 votes to 22, with 10 abstentions as resolution 630(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that establishment of the right of correction on an international basis would help to curb the dissemination of false news and to strengthen peace,

"1. Urges all Members of the United Nations and the other States which were invited to the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information to become parties to the Convention on the International Right of Correction, the text of which is annexed hereto and consists of the provisions relating to the right of correction contained in the preamble and articles of the draft Convention on the International Transmission of News and the Right of Correction approved by the General Assembly in resolution 277 C (III) of 13 May 1949 with the deletion of articles XVIII, XIX paragraph 2, and XXII paragraph (d), of the latter draft Convention and with the introduction as a new article (article IX), replacing the former article XVIII, of the following text: "The provisions of the present Convention shall extend to or be applicable equally to a contracting metropolitan State and to all the territories, be they Non-Self-Governing, Trust or Colonial Territories, which are being administered or governed by such metropolitan State.";

"2. Decides that the said Convention shall be opened for signature at the close of the present session of the General Assembly."

ANNEX

CONVENTION ON THE INTERNATIONAL RIGHT OF CORRECTION

PREAMBLE

The Contracting States,

Desiring to implement the right of their peoples to be fully and reliably informed,

Desiring to improve understanding between their peoples through the free flow of information and opinion,

Desiring thereby to protect mankind from the scourge of war, to prevent the recurrence of aggression from any source, and to combat all propaganda which is either designed or likely to provoke or encourage any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression,

Considering the danger to the maintenance of friendly relations between peoples and to the preservation of peace, arising from the publication of inaccurate reports,

Considering that at its second regular session the General Assembly of the United Nations recommended the adoption of measures designed to combat the dissemination of false or distorted reports likely to injure friendly relations between States,

Considering, however, that it is not at present practicable to institute, on the international level, a procedure for verifying the accuracy of a report which might lead to the imposition of penalties for the publication of false or distorted reports,

Considering, moreover, that to prevent the publication of reports of this nature or to reduce their pernicious effects, it is above all necessary to promote a wide circulation of news and to heighten the sense of responsibility of those regularly engaged in the dissemination of news,

Considering that an effective means to these ends is to give States directly affected by a report, which they consider false or distorted and which is disseminated by an information agency, the possibility of securing commensurate publicity for their corrections,

Considering that the legislation of certain States does not provide for a right of correction of which foreign governments may avail themselves, and that it is therefore desirable to institute such a right on the international level, and

Having resolved to conclude a Convention for these purposes,

Have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

For the purpose of the present Convention:

1. "News dispatch" means news material transmitted in writing or by means of telecommunications, in the form customarily employed by information agencies in transmitting such news material, before publication, to newspapers, news periodicals and broadcasting organizations.

2. "Information agency" means a Press, broadcasting, film, television or facsimile organization, public or private, regularly engaged in the collection and dissemination of news material, created and organized under the laws and regulations of the Contracting State in which the central organization is domiciled and which, in each Contracting State where it operates, functions under the laws and regulations of that State.

3. "Correspondent" means a national of a Contracting State or an individual employed by an information agency of a Contracting State, who in either case is regularly engaged in the collection and the reporting of news material, and who when outside his State is identified as a correspondent by a valid passport or by a similar document internationally acceptable.

ARTICLE II

1. Recognizing that the professional responsibility of correspondents and information agencies requires them to report facts without discrimination and in their proper context and thereby to promote respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, to further international understanding and co-operation and to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security,

Considering also that, as a matter of professional ethics, all correspondents and information agencies should, in the case of news dispatches transmitted or published by them and which have been demonstrated to be false or distorted, follow the customary practice of transmitting through the same channels, or of publishing, corrections of such dispatches,

The Contracting States agree that in cases where a Contracting State contends that a news dispatch capable of injuring its relations with other States or its national prestige or dignity transmitted from one country to another by correspondents or information agencies of a Contracting or non-Contracting State and published or disseminated abroad is false or distorted, it may submit its version of the facts (hereinafter called "communiqué") to the Contracting States within whose territories such dispatch has been published or disseminated. A copy of the communiqué shall be forwarded at the same time to the correspondent or information agency concerned to enable that correspondent or information agency to correct the news dispatch in question.

2. A communique may be issued only with respect to news dispatches and must be without comment or expression of opinion. It should not be longer than is necessary to correct the alleged inaccuracy or distortion and must be accompanied by a verbatim text of the dispatch as published or disseminated, and by evidence that the dispatch has been transmitted from abroad by a correspondent or an information agency.

ARTICLE III

3. Freedom of Information and of the Press: Draft International Code of Ethics

At its fifth session, the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press considered the draft international code of ethics for information personnel, revision of the previous text¹¹⁷ and the question of calling an international professional conference in this connexion. The text drawn up by the Sub-Commission at its fourth session had been referred to information enterprises and professional associations for their comments, and the Council, in resolution 306 E (XI) had requested the Sub-Commission to re-examine the text in the light of these comments. The Council, in resolution 414 B (XIII), adopted on 18 September 1951, had decided to continue the Sub-Commission to enable it, at a final session, to complete this revision.¹¹⁸

The Sub-Commission presented to the Council the text of the draft international code adopted at its fifth session (E/2190, annex A). It recommended that the Council request the Secretary-General to establish an ad hoc committee of professional workers in all media of information, charged with the preparation of an international conference on the draft code, to be held in 1953 and for which, in terms of the recommendation, funds would be made available by the General Assembly. The Secretary-General, the Sub-Commission further recommended, should be requested to communicate relevant documents concerning the draft code to national and international professional associations, informing them of the opinion of those organs of the United Nations associated with the drafting of the code that its further development was an entirely professional matter, to be carried out without government interference on either the national or the international plane.

During the general debate in the Council's Social Committee at its 214th to 216th meetings, from 4 to 6 June, the representatives of Belgium, Canada, China, Egypt, France, Iran, the United Kingdom and the United States spoke in favour of continued work on the draft code, but there was some difference of opinion regarding the manner in which this should be carried out. At its 217th meeting on 6 June, the Committee considered three amendments to the recommendations of the Sub-Commission:

(1) The United States submitted an amendment (E/AC7/L.113) which would, in effect, reject the recommendation for the establishment of an ad hoc committee, the calling of an international professional conference and the request to the General Assembly for funds for that purpose. The representative of the United States maintained that, while he was not opposed in principle to such a conference, the draft code should thenceforth be handled by the professional associations concerned, who should themselves take the initiative on the question of a conference. He was opposed to any attempt by public authorities to interfere with journalists and their work. The representatives of Canada, China and the United Kingdom expressed similar views during the general debate. By 12 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, the Committee adopted those parts of the United States amendment; the part concerning the transmission of documents to the professional associations was withdrawn by the sponsor in favour of an amendment by Sweden (see below).

(2) Amendments by France (E/AC.7/L.114) and Sweden (E/AC.7/L.116): The representative of France proposed that the draft code should be communicated to information enterprises and national and international professional associations with an assurance that the United Nations would be prepared to co-operate with them in organizing an international professional conference, if they so desired. The amendment by Sweden proposed further that the relevant documents should also be communicated. The representatives of Belgium, Cuba, Mexico and the Philippines, supporting these amendments, said that while they agreed that there should be no question of the United Nations imposing such a conference on the profession, the French amendment gave some suggestion of how the code might be handled at an international level. After some modification, both amendments were adopted by the Committee—the Swedish amendment by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, and the French amendment by 11 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions.

The draft resolution, thus amended, was adopted as a whole by the Committee (E/2251), by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, at its 217th meeting on 6 June and by the Council, by the same vote, without discussion, at its 602nd plenary meeting on 12 June. By this resolution (442 B (XIV)), the Council, having noted the revised text of the draft international code of ethics, requested the Secretary-General to communicate the draft code, together with information concerning its preparation, to national and international professional associations and information enterprises, informing them that if they thought it desirable, the United Nations might co-operate with them in organizing an international professional conference for the purpose of drawing up an international code of ethics.

During the Assembly's seventh session at the 440th meeting of the Assembly's Third Committee on 7 November 1952, a joint draft resolution on the question of the draft international code of ethics was introduced by Ecuador, India, Indonesia, Iraq, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia and Yugoslavia (A/C.3/L.263).

The draft resolution would refer to the action taken by the Council on the report of the Sub-Commission, note that the draft code had been drawn up by experts and was a workable code of professional conduct and would commend it for the consideration of members of the journalistic profession all over the world. It would further request the Council to invite international professional organizations to hold a professional conference to consider the question of drawing up a final text of the code and would request the Secretary-General to offer facilities and assistance for the holding of such a conference. Pakistan later became a co-sponsor and a revised text (A/C.3/L.263/Rev.1) was submitted. Egypt then became a co-sponsor and a second revised text (A/C.3/L.263/Rev.2) was submitted.

The new text would have the Assembly express the opinion that all further work connected with the draft code should be undertaken by professionals of information enterprises with no interference from governments, either on the national or the international level, and would request the Secretary-General, if a representative group of information enterprises and of national and international professional associations expressed a desire to do so, to co-operate in organizing an international professional conference for the purpose of preparing and adopting a final text of an international code of ethics and taking such further steps concerning implementation of the code as it might deem advisable. The revised draft resolution would further request the Secretary-General to bring the text of that decision to the notice of the information enterprises and national and international professional associations to which he had communicated the draft code.

Support for the revised draft resolution was expressed in the Third Committee by Afghanistan, Cuba, France, Greece, Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States. It was again emphasized by the representatives of Canada, Lebanon, New Zealand, Sweden and the United States that the independence of professional journalists should be respected, that no pressure should be exercised by governments and that the initiative in respect of calling an international conference should be taken by the professional associations themselves. The sponsors of the joint draft resolution expressed agreement with these views and felt that such principles were safeguarded by the text of the revised draft.

The representatives of the Union of South Africa and the USSR referred to the expense involved in convoking an international professional conference and stated that the resolution before the Committee should be interpreted in the light of the memorandum (A/C.3/L.273) in which the Secretary-General had stated that the costs resulting from the holding of such a conference could be absorbed, provided it were held at United Nations Headquarters at a time when no other major conferences were taking place, that travel and subsistence costs were borne by the professional organizations and that the conference would not involve additional printing costs.

The revised joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.-263/Rev.2) was adopted by the Committee (A/-2294) at its 441st meeting on 10 November by a roll-call vote of 43 to 5, with 7 abstentions, and by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December 1952, by 50 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 635 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting the action taken by the Economic and Social Council in resolution 442 B (XIV) of 12 June 1952 on the draft International Code of Ethics drawn up by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press at its fifth session,

"Considering that all further work connected with the draft Code should be undertaken by professional members of information enterprises with no interference from governments, either on the national or the international level,

"1. Requests the Secretary-General, if a representative group of information enterprises and of national and international professional associations expresses a desire to do so, to co-operate with it in organizing an international professional conference for the purpose of:

"(a) Preparing and adopting a final text of an International Code of Ethics;

"(b) Taking such further steps concerning implementation of the Code as it may deem advisable;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to bring the text of the present resolution to the notice of the information enterprises and national and international professional associations to which he communicated the draft Code."

4. Establishment of an International Institute of Press and Information

At its fifth session, the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press recommended (E/2190) that the Economic and Social Council urge UNESCO to expedite the establishment on a universal basis of the International Institute of Press and Information.

At the Council's fourteenth session its Social Committee considered the recommendation at its 219th and 220th meetings on 9 and 10 June. The Committee also considered an amendment by France (E/AC.7/L.114), in terms of which UNESCO would be invited: (1) to prepare a model statute for the establishment of national information institutes; and (2) to promote meetings and conversations between the representatives of international and national information institutes, representatives of professional organizations and experts in the field of information.

The Committee rejected the French amendment by 5 votes to 4, with 6 abstentions, after opposition was expressed by the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States. Those representatives felt that such institutes should be self-established; they also felt that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to evolve a model statute to meet all needs. By 6 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, the Committee also rejected the recommendation by the Sub-Commission which the French proposal sought to amend.

Accordingly, no action in this connexion was taken by the Council at its fourteenth session.

5. Information facilities in Under-Developed Regions of the World

In connexion with the question of information facilities in under-developed regions of the world, the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press, at its fifth session, recommended (E/2190) that the Economic and Social Council request UNESCO to pursue its studies and work on technical assistance for the purpose of encouraging and developing domestic information agencies. The Sub-Commission also recommended that the Council request the Secretary-General, in conjunction with the Council's Technical Assistance Committee and UNESCO, to report to the Council on this question at its fifteenth session.

During the general debate on freedom of information in the Social Committee of the Council, at its 214th to 216th meetings, from 4 to 6

June, the representatives of Egypt, France, Iran, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States, among others, expressed the view that UNESCO should continue its studies on this question and that the United Nations should actively aid efforts to promote freedom of information.

The draft resolution recommended by the Sub-Commission was considered by the Social Committee at its 219th meeting on 9 June, when the representative of France submitted an amendment (E/AC.7/L.114). This amendment would add to the preamble a statement that the Council was convinced of the desirability of developing domestic information agencies in each country. It would also replace the operative part of the draft resolution by an invitation to the Secretary-General, in conjunction with UNESCO and the Technical Assistance Committee, to study ways and means of ensuring the development of domestic information agencies and to report thereon to the Council. The French representative stated that his amendment was aimed at ensuring that the studies would be carried out under the guidance of the Secretary-General.

The representative of France accepted a number of oral amendments suggested by the United States representative to the effect, among other things, that the report should be made to the Council in 1953 and that reference to the Technical Assistance Committee should be deleted as its activities depended on requests from governments and because the Secretary-General could, as a matter of course, consult any United Nations body that he felt might be able to assist him in his studies. The representatives of Canada and Egypt expressed their preference for the text of the draft recommended by the Sub-Commission. The Social Committee, however, by 10 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions, adopted the French amendment to the operative part of the draft recommended by the Sub-Commission, and the resolution as a whole, as amended, by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention. At its 604th plenary meeting on 13 June, the Council in turn adopted, by 14 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, the resolution recommended by the Committee as resolution 442 E (XIV). By this resolution, the Council noted that it had not been possible for the Sub-Commission to examine the question of the encouragement and development of independent domestic information enterprises (agencies), and invited the Secretary-General, in conjunction with UNESCO, to study ways and means of encouraging and developing such information enterprises and to report to the Council thereon in 1953.

During the general debate on freedom of information at the Assembly's seventh session in the Third Committee, the importance of building up the information services of under-developed countries was again stressed by, among others, the representatives of Afghanistan, Chile, France, Liberia and the United States. Lack of such facilities, those representatives said, was one of the tangible obstacles to freedom of information which could probably be removed in the near future by concerted action. Such action which, some representatives, including the representative of Egypt, stressed, should be taken through the United Nations and not by any one country, would have the effect of increasing the amount of information available to the peoples of under-developed areas of the world, and of ensuring the independence of their information services. It would also serve to protect those areas from the disproportionate influence of the powerful information agencies and enterprises of the larger, more developed countries, with their world-wide ramifications.

The representative of the Philippines submitted a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.258) concerning the development of information facilities in under-developed regions of the world. The draft would have the Assembly take note with approval of the decision of the Council (resolution 442 E (XIV)), note that the scope of the decision was limited and invite the Council to consider the desirability of expanding the area of its study. The Assembly would also invite the Council to recommend to the organizations participating in the technical assistance and other programmes providing aid or assistance at the request of Member States that they should give sympathetic consideration to requests which governments might submit for aid or assistance with a view to improving information facilities and increasing the quantity and improving the quality of information available.

Another draft resolution aimed at broadening the field covered by the decisions of the Council on this subject was submitted jointly by Afghanistan, Chile, Egypt, France, Guatemala, India, Lebanon and Yugoslavia (A/C.3/L.261). The draft resolution would invite the Secretary-General, when working out, in collaboration with UNESCO, the report called for by the Council, to elaborate a programme of concrete action with a view to technical assistance for the furthering and development of independent domestic information enterprises. The programme, the draft resolution stated, should take into consideration measures for technical assistance to help countries develop national media of information, to alleviate the newsprint shortage, to eliminate economic and financial obstacles in the field of information and to organize and promote the exchange of information personnel among countries. The Council would be called upon to submit its programme concerning those matters to the Assembly at its eighth session.

Reference to technical assistance for the development of news media was also made in a draft resolution by Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Greece, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden (A/C.3/L.260), which would have the Assembly recommend that the Council and UNESCO give special attention to assisting Members in the development of news media, through such means as fellowships and training activities under the regular technical assistance programme and through regional seminars of publishers and journalists.

At the 432nd meeting of the Third Committee on 1 November, a joint draft resolution was submitted by Afghanistan, Chile, France, Guatemala, India, Lebanon, the Philippines and Yugoslavia (A/C.3/L.266 and Corr.1) covering the provisions of the eight-Power proposal (A/C.3/L.261), those of the proposal of the Philippines (A/C.3/L.258) and part of a draft resolution by Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Greece, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden (A/C.3/L.260) relating to technical assistance. The joint draft resolution would have the Assembly note with approval the decision by the Council regarding the encouragement and development of independent domestic information enterprises, but note also that the decision referred only to the encouragement and development of such enterprises. The draft would then have the Assembly invite the Council to consider, in the light of discussions at the Assembly's seventh session, the desirability of expanding the area of its study of the question. To that end, the Secretary-General would be requested, in preparing the report called for by the Council, to elaborate a programme of concrete action which would include suggestions for measures which might be taken in a number of specific fields. The Council would be requested to submit the programme, together with recommendations thereon, to the Assembly at its eighth session. The Council would be further invited to recommend that the organizations participating in the technical assistance and other programmes should provide aid or assistance at the request of Member States and give sympathetic consideration to requests which governments might submit for such aid or assistance within the framework of those programmes, with a view to improving information facilities and increasing the quantity and quality of information available to the peoples of the world.

During the discussion, the Committee heard statements from the representatives of the Secretary-General and of UNESCO at the 439th meeting on 7 November concerning measures already taken or being taken to assist countries in matters related to information under the regular programme of technical assistance and under the Expanded Programme.

Afghanistan submitted an amendment (A/C.3/L.268/Rev.1) calling for the insertion of a new paragraph in the operative part of the joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.266 and Corr.1), inviting whichever organ of the United Nations became seized of the problem of completing work on the draft convention on freedom of information to consider the inclusion in the convention of an article based on the right of all nations to nationalize foreign information enterprises.

The draft resolution and the amendment were considered by the Third Committee at its 438th to 440th meetings on 6 and 7 November.

Support for the joint draft resolution was expressed by a number of representatives, among them those of Argentina, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Cuba, El Salvador, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iran, Iraq, Israel, New Zealand, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, the USSR, the United States and Uruguay.

Support for the Afghanistan amendment was expressed by the representatives of Bolivia, Indonesia, Syria, the USSR and Yugoslavia; a number of representatives, on the other hand, including those of Argentina, Australia, China, Cuba, Egypt, El Salvador, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, India, Iran, Israel, New Zealand, Norway, the Philippines, Sweden, Turkey, the United States and Uruguay, stated either that there was no need for such an amendment and that such rights as the right to nationalize could not be considered to be within the scope of international agreements, or that, while they did not oppose the principle, they could not vote in favour of it as it created certain difficulties. The representative of Afghanistan, however, stated that his amendment did not raise the question of a Committee decision on the right of nationalization; it merely expressed a desire that this right should be taken into consideration.

At its 440th meeting on 7 November, the Committee adopted some drafting amendments to the joint draft resolution. It rejected, however, by a roll-call vote of 26 to 13, with 13 abstentions, the amendment by Afghanistan and adopted the joint draft resolution, as amended, by 47 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

The draft resolution recommended by the Committee (A/2294) was adopted by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December 1952, by 52 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 633 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that it is essential for the proper development of public opinion in under-developed countries that independent domestic information enterprises should be given facilities and assistance in order that they may be enabled to contribute to the spread of information, to the development of national culture and to international understanding,

"Convinced that the development of information media contributes greatly to the economic and social progress of peoples,

"Convinced that the time has arrived for the elaboration of a concrete programme and plan of action in this respect,

"Taking note with approval of the decision taken by the Economic and Social Council in resolution 442 E (XIV) of 13 June 1952 with regard to the study of ways and means of encouraging and developing independent domestic information enterprises,

"Noting, however, that the above decision only refers to the encouragement and development of independent domestic information enterprises, including Press, radio, newsreels and television, therefore,

"1. Invites the Economic and Social Council to consider, in the light of the discussions at the seventh session of the General Assembly, the desirability of expanding the area of its study of this question; and, to that end,

"2. Requests the Secretary-General, in preparing the report called for under the above-mentioned resolution of the Council, also to elaborate a programme of concrete action which would include, inter alia:

"(a) Measures to reduce economic and financial obstacles in the field of information;

"(b) Measures to organize and promote among countries the exchange of information personnel;

"(c) Measures to assist the training of information personnel, the raising of professional and technical standards, the provision of fellowships and the holding of regional seminars;

"(d) All necessary measures in connexion with the supply of newsprint;

"3. Calls upon the Economic and Social Council to submit the above-mentioned programme, together with recommendations thereon, to the General Assembly at its eighth session;

"4. Further invites the Council to recommend to the organizations participating in the technical assistance and other programmes providing aid or assistance at the request of Member States that they give sympathetic consideration to requests which governments may submit for such aid or assistance within the framework of those programmes with a view to improving information facilities and increasing the quantity and improving the quality of information available to the peoples of the world, as one means of implementing the right of freedom of information as enunciated in the provisions of Article 1, paragraph 3, and Article 55 of the Charter of the United Nations and in article 19 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights."

6. Dissemination of Resolutions of the United Nations

At its fifth session, the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press recommended (E/2190) to the Economic and Social Council that it should, in turn, recommend that the General Assembly urge governments, upon receipt of any resolution of any organ of the United Nations communicated to them by the Secretary-General, to give the widest possible dissemination to those resolutions through customary channels in accordance with their procedures for releasing news concerning international affairs.

This recommendation was adopted by the Council's Social Committee at its 219th meeting on 9 June 1952, without discussion, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, and by the Council at its 604th meeting on 13 June, without discussion, by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention, as resolution 442 D (XIV).

A draft resolution similar to that adopted by the Council came before the Assembly during its seventh session at the 442nd meeting of the Third Committee on 11 November 1952. Submitted by Egypt, the draft (A/C.3/L.247/Rev.1) would, in addition, have the Assembly recommend to governments that they should take special measures to disseminate any resolution communicated to them by the Secretary-General at the special request of the organ adopting that resolution. In terms of the draft, further, the Assembly would also request the Secretary-General to give the fullest possible assistance in the dissemination of all resolutions of United Nations organs, with particular attention to resolutions communicated to governments at the request of the organ adopting that resolution. An appeal would also be made to the media of information to co-operate in disseminating information concerning resolutions of United Nations organs. The representative of Egypt stressed that United Nations information centres throughout the world should distribute the texts of resolutions in the countries in which they were situated.

General support for the Egyptian draft was expressed in the Committee by the representatives of Belgium, China, France, Greece, India, Iraq, Lebanon, New Zealand, Saudi Arabia, Syria, the United States and Yugoslavia. A number of amendments, however, were submitted.

The representatives of France and the United States felt that it was inadvisable for the Assembly to recommend the wide dissemination of purely procedural resolutions or of resolutions of subsidiary organs, which were provisional in character. The representative of Egypt accepted that part of their joint amendment (A/C.3/L.285/Rev.1) which would limit the resolutions to those dealing with questions of substance. He also accepted two further amendments: one, an oral proposal by the representative of Lebanon, that the draft should urge the rapid dissemination of resolutions; the other, submitted by Greece (A/C.3/L.291/Rev.1), which would stipulate that the appropriate United Nations services should be used for the presentation in non-technical language of these resolutions.

In 14 separate votes, ranging from 18 votes to 17, with 16 abstentions, to 46 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions, the Committee adopted an amended version of the Egyptian draft and adopted the draft as a whole by a roll-call vote of 44 to 5, with 1 abstention.

Among the amendments adopted by the Committee was part of a joint amendment by France and the United States (A/C.3/L.285/Rev.1), adopted by 28 votes to 13, with 10 abstentions, to include a qualification that the resolutions, the dissemination of which was to be recommended, should be those of any principal organ of the United Nations. Consequential modifications were made to the text. The Committee, however, by 16 votes to 16, with 19 abstentions, rejected that part of the joint amendment which would apply the same qualification to the proposed appeal to the media of information for co-operation in disseminating information concerning resolutions of United Nations organs.

The Committee, by 15 votes to 12, with 25 abstentions, also decided not to recommend that governments should be urged to take special measures for dissemination. It adopted an amendment by the USSR (A/C.3/L.284) to this effect, calling for the deletion of the recommendation from the Egyptian draft. The representative of the USSR stated that governments could not be obliged to take special measures for the dissemination of what he called unjust resolutions, against which they had voted. As a result of the adoption of the Soviet amendment, two suggested modifications of the deleted paragraph of the Egyptian draft, proposed jointly by France and the United States (A/C.3/L.285/Rev.1) and orally by the representative of New Zealand, were not voted upon. Two further proposals by the USSR, contained in the same amendment, were rejected by the Committee: one, which would delete from the Egyptian draft the request to the Secretary-General to assist in the dissemination of resolutions, was rejected by 23 votes to 13, with 14 abstentions; the other, which would add to the request to governments a condition concerning dissemination ("providing that they agreed with the particular resolution") was rejected by 35 votes to 5, with 10 abstentions.

By 18 votes to 17, with 16 abstentions, the Committee decided to delete from the Egyptian draft a reference to the manner in which governments should be urged to disseminate resolutions ("in accordance with their procedures for releasing news concerning international affairs").

The resolution recommended by the Third Committee (A/2294) was considered by the General Assembly at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December 1952.

The representative of the USSR introduced a two-part amendment (A/L.129) similar to that rejected by the Third Committee. By 37 votes to 6, with 12 abstentions, the Assembly rejected the addition of the proviso that governments should agree with the particular resolution to be disseminated. By 42 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, the Assembly also rejected the Soviet proposal for the deletion of a request to the Secretary-General to assist in the dissemination. It adopted, by 53 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, the resolution recommended by the Committee. The resolution (636 (VII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having regard to resolution 442 D (XIV) adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 13 June 1952,

"1. Urges governments, on receipt of any resolutions dealing with questions of substance adopted by any principal organ of the United Nations, to make every effort to disseminate such resolutions through the customary channels;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to assist to the fullest possible extent in the rapid dissemination of all such resolutions of principal organs of the United Nations, particular attention being given to resolutions communicated to governments at the special request of the organ adopting those resolutions;

"3. Appeals to information media to co-operate in disseminating information concerning such resolutions of organs of the United Nations, drawing on the appropriate services of the United Nations for the presentation of those resolutions."

7. The Question of False or Distorted Information

mended (E/2190) that the Economic and Social Council should place on the agenda of forthcoming sessions a number of items (E/2190, annex) relating to freedom of information and of the Press. Among those items was the further consideration of effective measures to combat false and distorted news.

At its fourteenth session, the Council's Social Committee considered the recommendation of the Sub-Commission at its 218th and 219th meetings on 9 June. The Committee also had before it an alternative proposal—an amendment by France (E/AC.7/L.114) which, after oral amendment by the sponsor, would invite the Secretary-General to pursue studies on an international statute for foreign correspondents and of measures to prevent misuse of the name and emblems of the United Nations. The amendment would also invite UNESCO to study the question of exchange of staff members of information enterprises and problems of copyright at the international level.

There was some difference of opinion in the Committee as to whether, in view of the earlier adoption by the Committee of a recommendation concerning the future work of the United Nations on freedom of information and of the Press, the recommendation of the Sub-Commission and the amendment by France should be discussed. The representatives of Belgium, the United Kingdom and the United States felt that no such formal resolution was necessary. The representatives of Egypt, the Philippines and the USSR, on the other hand, felt that the Committee should consider the question, expressing the view that the dissemination of accurate news might alleviate international tension and serve as a safeguard to peace. The representative of France, who felt that the studies outlined by him might usefully be started without delay, accepted an oral proposal by Mexico, however, to present his proposal as a separate draft resolution and not as an amendment to the Sub-Commission's recommendation. France also proposed, and the Committee by 10 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions, decided, to defer consideration of the Sub-Commission's recommendation until 1953, when the report of the Secretary-General on freedom of information¹¹⁹ would be before the Council.

The Committee voted separately on the various studies proposed by France. By 8 votes to 6, with 4 abstentions, it rejected the request to the Secretary-General to continue studies for the purpose of completing an international statute for foreign correspondents. By votes varying from 6 to 3, with 9 abstentions, to 10 to none, with 8 abstentions, it adopted the remainder of the proposals concerning studies. In the voting on the French draft resolution as a whole, however, 7 votes were cast in favour, 7 against and 4 abstentions, and the draft resolution as a whole, accordingly, was not adopted.

During the Assembly's seventh session, at the 441st meeting of the Third Committee on 10 November, a joint draft resolution was submitted by El Salvador and Guatemala (A/C.3/L.281) on the question of false or distorted information. The draft resolution incorporated the substance of an amendment previously submitted by Guatemala (A/C.3/L.271/Rev.2) to a joint draft resolution by Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Greece, Lebanon, the Netherlands, Norway, the Philippines and Sweden (A/C.3/L.265).¹²⁰ It would have the Assembly state that it considered that the dissemination of false or distorted news by national as well as international information enterprises was one of the causes of the lack of mutual understanding among nations, to the detriment of international harmony. That problem, the draft would further state, should be studied in connexion with the general item entitled "Freedom of information", and it would recommend that United Nations bodies studying the problems of freedom of information should bear in mind the need to protect national prestige against the dissemination of false or distorted information.

Presenting the joint draft resolution, the representative of El Salvador stated that its purpose was to make clear to United Nations bodies studying freedom of information the interest of the Assembly in the investigation of methods to remove the difficulties faced by countries which were victims of abuses of information. Support for the principle embodied in the joint draft resolution was expressed by the representatives of Afghanistan, India, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia and Syria, though many of those representatives commented on the text and form of the draft. The representatives of the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, however, felt that the resolution if adopted might give rise to misrepresentation.

Two amendments, one by Iran (A/C.3/L.286) and one by Lebanon (A/C.3/L.289), seeking textual changes to the joint draft, were withdrawn by their sponsors and a third, presented jointly by India and the United States (A/C.3/L.287), was not voted on in view of the Committee's adoption, by 32 votes to 13, with 5 abstentions, of an amendment by France (A/C.3/L.288). In terms of that amendment, the General Assembly would recommend that United Nations bodies studying the problems of freedom of information should consider appropriate measures for avoiding the harm done to international understanding by the dissemination of false or distorted information. The Committee adopted the draft resolution, as amended, by 37 votes to 1, with 12 abstentions, and this recommendation (A/2294) was adopted in turn by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December 1952, by 50 votes to none, with 10 abstentions, as resolution 634(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that the dissemination of false or distorted information by national as well as international information enterprises is one of the causes of the lack of mutual understanding among nations, to the detriment of international harmony,

"Considering that this specific problem should be studied in connexion with the general item entitled 'Freedom of information',

"Decides to recommend that United Nations bodies studying the problems of freedom of information should consider appropriate measures for avoiding the harm done to international understanding by the dissemination of false and distorted information."

8. Freedom of Information as a Means of Promoting Friendly Relations Among Nations

During the general debate on freedom of information in the Social Committee of the Economic and Social Council, at its 214th to 216th meetings, from 4 to 6 June, the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR emphasized that freedom of information should be genuinely exercised and put at the service of peace and international concord; it should not serve, those representatives stated, as a pretext for the propagation of false news or of war propaganda.

At the 602nd plenary meeting of the Council on 12 June, those representatives recalled General Assembly resolution 110(II) entitled "Measures to be taken against propaganda and the inciters of a new war" in which the Assembly condemned all forms of propaganda wherever conducted, which was either designed or likely to provoke or encourage any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression, and invited each Member Government to take appropriate steps, within its constitutional limits, to combat all propaganda aimed against the Charter, to promote friendly relations among nations and to encourage the dissemination of all information designed to give expression to the undoubted desire of all peoples for peace.

Those representatives said that it was the Council's duty to prepare and adopt a resolution reminding Member States and their Press of the categorical terms of resolution 110(II) and of the part they had to play in the peoples' fight for the maintenance of peace. The Council should also realize that effect should be given to Assembly resolution 110(II) which was designed to promote friendly relations among nations. That was the spirit in which the USSR delegation had drafted the resolution which it was submitting to the Council's consideration (E/L.360).

The Council considered the Soviet draft at its 604th plenary meeting on 13 June. In its preamble, the draft would have the Council: (1) note that since the adoption of Assembly resolution 110(II) in November 1947, propaganda in support of Fascism and a new war had become even stronger in some countries and that new restrictions on freedom of information were being imposed; and (2) set itself the task of combating propaganda of aggression and war likely to provoke a threat to or a breach of the peace.

The draft would have the Council recognize the urgent necessity of studying a number of questions with a view to preparing and submitting to the Assembly practical recommendations to ensure that:

(1) Assembly resolution 110(II) was carried into effect; (2) the use of freedom of information was not tolerated for the purpose of propagating Fascist ideology and of arousing enmity between nations or for racial discrimination or the dissemination of slanderous rumours and false and distorted information; and (3) the development of friendly relations and co-operation between nations was encouraged by all possible means, with the assistance of truthful and objective information, independent of the dictates of private monopolies, trusts and syndicates.

The representatives of Canada, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay announced in the Council that they would vote against the Soviet draft. The representatives of Sweden, the United Kingdom and the Philippines emphasized that freedom of information and of the Press was not to be achieved by the imposition of further restrictions. The representatives of Canada and the United Kingdom described the resolution as propaganda.

The representative of Poland, on the other hand, spoke in support of the Soviet draft. The representative of Egypt, however, supported by the representative of France, felt that a compromise could be achieved between the conflicting views expressed in the Council and suggested voting on the Soviet draft in parts.

By 8 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions, and 7 votes to 7, with 4 abstentions, the Council rejected two paragraphs of the preamble which would, respectively, note an increase of propaganda in support of Fascism and a new war and have the Council set itself the task of combating propaganda of aggression and war likely to provoke a threat to the peace.

The Council voted separately on that part of the Soviet draft which would have it recognize the urgent necessity of studying three questions with a view to preparing and submitting to the Assembly practical recommendations.

On the first of these questions—to ensure that General Assembly resolution 110(II) was carried into effect—the Council decided by a roll-call vote of 8 to 6, with 4 abstentions, to reject it. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Iran, Pakistan, Poland, USSR.

Against: Belgium, Canada, China, Cuba, Philippines, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Argentina, France, Mexico, Sweden.

On the second question—to ensure that the use of freedom of information for the purpose of arousing enmity between nations, for racial discrimination and the dissemination of slanderous rumours and false and distorted information was not tolerated—the Council, after amending the Soviet proposal, rejected it by a roll-call vote of 8 to 5, with 5 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Pakistan, Poland, USSR.

Against: Belgium, Canada, China, Cuba, Philippines, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Argentina, France, Iran, Mexico, Sweden.

On the third question—to ensure that the development of friendly relations between nations was encouraged and promoted by all possible means—the Council after amending the proposal rejected it by a roll-call vote of 7 to 7, with 4 abstentions. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Iran, Pakistan, Poland, USSR.

Against: Belgium, Canada, China, Cuba, Philippines, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: France, Mexico, Sweden, Uruguay.

Under rule 63 of the rules of procedure, the Soviet proposal was considered to have been rejected as a whole, as all operative parts of the resolution had been rejected.

During the general debate on freedom of information at the Assembly's seventh session, at the 421st to 428th meetings of the Third Committee from 22 to 29 October 1952, a number of representatives, including those of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, emphasized that the Press should be an instrument for counteracting and not for disseminating war propaganda and propaganda of hatred, aggression and discrimination, and that it should work actively for peace. Those representatives maintained that legislative steps should be taken to implement previous decisions of the General Assembly on this matter.

Other representatives, on the other hand, including those of the United Kingdom and the United States, claimed that no responsible media of information sought to promote another world war as was alleged and that measures to restrict propaganda would, in practice, restrict freedom of information itself.

At the 435th meeting of the Assembly's Third Committee on 4 November, the USSR introduced a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.255/Rev.1) in terms similar to that introduced in the Council. By this draft resolution, the Assembly would recommend that all States Members of the United Nations should take all necessary steps, including legislative steps, with a view to ensuring the implementation of General Assembly resolution 110(II).

Four amendments to the Soviet draft were presented in the Committee.

(1) India submitted a four-part amendment (A/C.3/L.269) which was adopted by the Committee. By 21 votes to 5, with 27 abstentions, it decided to delete from the Soviet draft the specific request for legislative steps in this question by States Members of the United Nations (a similar proposal was made in an amendment by Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.270)—see below). By 32 votes to 2, with 18 abstentions, it adopted a paragraph proposed by India to replace part of the Soviet draft, and by this action recommended that all States Members of the United Nations should take all necessary steps to promote "by all means of publicity and propaganda available, friendly relations among nations based upon the principles of the Charter." By 18 votes to 6, with 29 abstentions, it adopted a new text for part of the Soviet draft which, in its amended form, would recommend that States Members of the United Nations take steps with a view to "promoting in every way the dissemination, independent of dictation from any source, of truthful and objective information, thereby maintaining and strengthening international peace and security, developing friendly relations and international co-operation in strengthening peace and in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural and humanitarian character, and strengthening economic and trade relations between nations on the basis of equality and mutual respect for the independence and sovereignty of States".

By 28 votes to 8, with 15 abstentions, the Committee also adopted the Indian proposal to delete that part of the Soviet draft which referred to the General Assembly's having assumed the task of counteracting propaganda in favour of aggression and war.

(2) Saudi Arabia submitted an amendment (A/C.3/L.270) in terms of which part of the preamble of the Soviet draft would be amended to have the Assembly note "that since the (Assembly) resolution (110(II)) was adopted, war propaganda has increased and has been accompanied by limitations on freedom of information".

This amendment, in favour of which the representative of India withdrew part of his amendment (A/C.3/L.269—see above) was adopted by the Committee by 16 votes to 6, with 29 abstentions. By a vote of 17 to 10, with 23 abstentions, however, the Committee, in voting on the paragraph as amended, rejected the amended text.

(3) Afghanistan submitted an oral amendment, in terms of which the resolution would refer merely to "propaganda" and not "war propaganda", which was not adopted by the Committee, 9 votes being cast in favour and 9 against, with 30 abstentions.

(4) Lebanon submitted an oral amendment which sought the deletion of that part of the Soviet draft which would urge States Members of the United Nations to take steps with a view to preventing the use of information media for propaganda of any kind in favour of aggression and war, of incitement to hatred between nations, of racial discrimination and of dissemination of slanderous rumours and of false and distorted reports. The Lebanese amendment was adopted by the Committee by 32 votes to 8, with 12 abstentions.

At its 435th meeting on 4 November, the Committee, by a roll-call vote of 21 to 19, with 12 abstentions, rejected the Soviet draft resolution, as amended, as a whole.

At the 403rd plenary meeting of the Assembly on 16 December 1952, the representative of the USSR introduced a draft resolution (A/L.125), in terms similar to those of the draft resolution introduced by the USSR in the Third Committee (A/C.3/L.255/Rev.1).

The Assembly did not discuss the Soviet draft, but a number of delegations explained their votes. The representative of Saudi Arabia asked that separate votes should be taken on individual paragraphs, phrases and words, and the President, with the concurrence of the Assembly, put the requested divisions as amendments for deletion. Four of the five Saudi Arabian amendments were adopted by the Assembly, in votes ranging from 6 to 5, with 43 abstentions, to 13 to 6, with 36 abstentions. As a result, the Assembly deleted from the Soviet draft references to: (1) the introduction of new limitations on freedom of information; (2) "Nazi, Fascist and any other" propaganda; (3) the proposed recommendation by the Assembly to Governments to take legislative steps; and (4) steps to prevent the use of information media for propaganda for aggression and war, incitement to hatred between nations, racial discrimination, dissemination of slanderous rumours and false and distorted reports. The fifth amendment by Saudi Arabia, which sought the deletion of a reference to "all" necessary steps, was not adopted, 5 votes being cast in favour and 5 against, with 45 abstentions.

The Assembly rejected by a roll-call vote of 35 to 9, with 14 abstentions, the Soviet draft resolution (A/L.125) as amended. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Iraq, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian SSR, USSR.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Israel, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Abstaining: Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Chile, Egypt, Ethiopia, India, Indonesia, Iran, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

9. Closing Down of the Argentine Newspaper La Prensa

At its 106th meeting on 18 March the Sub-Commission considered a draft resolution (E/CN.4/Sub.1/170) concerning the closing down of the newspaper La Prensa, of Buenos Aires, submitted by the member for Chile, Silva Carvallo. The resolution, which was adopted by the Commission, without amendment, by 10 votes to 1, read:

"Whereas

"On 1 March 1951 the newspaper La Prensa of Buenos Aires was closed by the Argentine police authorities, against the will of its lawful owners and staff,

"This act called for the protests from many newspapers in various countries throughout the world,

"Similar protests were also made by numerous professional associations of journalists of various countries,

"The closing down of La Prensa of Buenos Aires constitutes an infraction of freedom of the Press as conceived, defined and protected by the basic instruments of the United Nations,

"The Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press resolves:

"To condemn this infraction of freedom of information and of the Press and to communicate its resolution to the Commission on Human Rights and the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, with a recommendation that the Council, in considering future work on freedom of information, should consider measures to prevent future infractions of this kind."

No recommendation in this connexion was made to the Council.

10. Future Work of the United Nations in the Field of Freedom of Information

By resolution 414 B. III (XIII), adopted on 18 September 1951,¹²¹ the Economic and Social Council had requested the Secretary-General, after consultation with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), to conduct an inquiry among Member States regarding the Council's future work in connexion with freedom of information and to report the results to the Council in 1952.

At its fourteenth session, the Council had before it the replies of governments to the Secretary-General's inquiry (E/2178 and Add.1 to 8) as well as the Secretary-General's report on the inquiry (E/2217 and Add.1).

Among the recommendations (E/2190) made by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press concerning the future work of the United Nations in the field of freedom of information was a recommendation that the Council set up an expert committee on freedom of information to carry out an active inquiry into the degree of freedom of information existing in the world and to report directly to the Council.

The Sub-Commission also recommended (E/2190) that the Council decide that a number of items relating to freedom of information and of the Press would be placed on the agenda of forthcoming sessions. Among those items were:

(1) an annual survey on freedom of information; (2) an annual survey of information facilities; (3) the activities of the specialized agencies in the field of freedom of information; (4) the activities of non-governmental organizations in the same field; (5) the elaboration of a technical assistance programme; (6) further consideration of effective measures to combat false and distorted news;¹²² and (7) organization and promotion of the exchange between the various countries of members of the Press and of other information media.

The future work of the United Nations in the field of freedom of information and of the Press was the subject of a number of statements during the general debate on freedom of information in the Council's Social Committee, at its 214th to 216th meetings, held from 4 to 6 June. The representatives of Belgium, Canada, China, Czecho-

¹²² See pp. 471-72.

Slovakia, Egypt, France, Iran, Pakistan, the Philippines, Poland, Sweden, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States felt, generally speaking, that the importance of the principle of freedom of information and of the Press and of work in this field should be emphasized. The main decisions to be taken by the Social Committee, they considered, concerned the manner in which freedom of information should be achieved and the nature of the procedures which should be adopted in working towards that aim.

The representative of Pakistan, who maintained that the United Nations should assume direct responsibility, was supported by the representatives of Belgium, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, among others.

Among those who supported the view that a committee of twelve members should be set up were the representatives of Egypt, France and the Philippines; the representatives of Belgium, Canada, China, Sweden, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States, on the other hand, did not feel that such a body would help solve the problem. The responsibility should be that of the Council, some of these representatives maintained.

The two recommendations by the Sub-Commission concerning future work were considered by the Social Committee at its 217th to 219th meetings, from 6 to 9 June. The Committee decided to adjourn the debate on the second recommendation, which concerned subjects for consideration by the Council at subsequent sessions, but considered the Sub-Commission's other recommendation for the setting up of an expert committee, together with four amendments and sub-amendments:

(1) An amendment by France (E/AC.7/L.114) which would replace the operative part of the draft resolution recommended by the Sub-Commission with proposals requesting the Secretary-General to appoint a committee of five which would be instructed not later than 30 April 1953: (a) to collect evidence of de facto and de jure elements of freedom of information throughout the world; (b) to ascertain the conditions of freedom of information in the present-day world; and (c) to define the areas in which international action could profitably be undertaken and to suggest the conditions under which such action could be conducted. By the same amendment, the Council would decide to include discussion of the report of the proposed committee in the agenda of its sixteenth session. This amendment was later withdrawn by the sponsor.

(2) An amendment by the United States (E/AC.7/L.115) which would, among other things, replace the operative part of the recommendation made by the Sub-Commission and have the Council decide to appoint from among its members and for a trial period of one year a rapporteur on freedom of information. In terms of the amendment, the rapporteur, in cooperation with the Secretary-General and the appropriate specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations, would prepare, for the sixteenth session of the Council, a substantive report covering major contemporary problems and developments in the fields enumerated in the list of subjects recommended by the Sub-Commission, together with recommendations regarding specific and practical action which might be taken to advance freedom of information as a basic human right. By the same amendment, the Council would decide to include in the agenda of its sixteenth session an item on freedom of information, which it could consider in the light of the report. Presenting his amendment, the representative of the United States said that he had suggested a trial period of one year, after which the Council could review the proposed system.

(3) An amendment by the United Kingdom (E/AC.7/L.118) to the United States amendment proposing a number of drafting changes and stipulating that the rapporteur would be appointed in his individual capacity. Presenting his amendment, the representative of the United Kingdom said that changes had been recommended to allow for greater latitude in some cases and to clarify terms of reference in others. All amendments proposed by the United Kingdom were accepted by the United States.

(4) An amendment by Egypt (E/AC.7/L.117) to the United States amendment which would, among other things, replace the operative part of the United States draft except for that part concerning the appointment of a rapporteur on freedom of information. In terms of the Egyptian amendment, a three-member expert standing committee of investigation and surveillance would be chosen by the Secretary-General to consider what political and economic factors were likely to constitute obstacles to freedom of information throughout the world and to report annually to the Council. UNESCO, according to the Egyptian amendment, would be requested to study the technical aspects of the problem of freedom of information and to report annually to the Council. In presenting his amendment, the representative of Egypt said that he was aiming at the establishment of a permanent organ in the field of freedom of information.

The Committee, after rejecting, by 14 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, references to the proposed committee as a standing committee and the provision that it should report yearly to the Council, rejected the Egyptian amendment, as a whole, by 12 votes to 6.

By 10 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions, the Committee rejected the United States proposal, as amended by the United Kingdom, concerning the appointment of a rapporteur. The remainder of the amendment was adopted in parts by the Committee, by votes of 10 to 6, with 2 abstentions, and 10 to none, with 8 abstentions. At its 218th meeting on 9 June, the Committee adopted the amended draft resolution as a whole, by 10 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions. According to the draft resolution adopted by the Committee, the Council would recommend that the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the appropriate specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations, prepare for submission to the Council in 1953 a substantive report covering major temporary problems and developments in the field of freedom of information, together with a number of recommendations. By the same draft resolution the Council would include in its agenda for 1953 an item on freedom of information for the purpose of reviewing problems in the light of the Secretary-General's report and taking action thereon.

The draft resolution recommended by the Committee (E/2251) was considered by the Council at its 603rd plenary meeting on 13 June. The Council also considered four amendments:

(1) An amendment by France (E/L.357), which would add to the draft resolution requests to the Secretary-General and to UNESCO to undertake certain studies, similar to the proposal made also by France in connexion with the question of false and distorted news.¹²³ The representative of France, however, later withdrew this proposal.

(2) An amendment by Uruguay, which would have the Council recommend that an agenda item "Freedom of Information: Measures to ensure its implementation" should be included in the agenda for 1953. The Uruguayan amendment would also have the Council recommend to the Secretary-General that Member Governments be consulted as to the advisability and usefulness of adopting international conventions on freedom of information, including the Convention on the International Right of Correction.¹²⁴ This amendment was rejected by the Council by 8 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions.

(3) A joint amendment by Belgium, France and the United States (E/L.359), calling for the appointment of a rapporteur for a trial period of one year and similar to the proposal introduced into the Social Committee by the United States (E/AC.7/L.115).

(4) An oral amendment by Egypt to the joint amendment by Belgium, France and the United States, which would add to the persons and organizations with whom the rapporteur would be requested to co-operate, "the professional organizations, both national and international." The amendment was accepted by the sponsors of the joint draft amendment.

The Council adopted the joint draft amendment, as amended, by 12 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions, after having adopted separately, by 10 votes to 4, with 4 abstentions, those parts of the amendment dealing with the decision to appoint a rapporteur and the nature of his requested report. By this resolution (442 C (XIV)) the Council decided to appoint for an experimental period of one year, and in a personal capacity, a rapporteur on matters relating to freedom of information and to request him, in co-operation with the Secretary-General, the specialized agencies, particularly UNESCO, and the professional organizations concerned, to prepare for the Council in 1953 a substantive report covering major contemporary problems and developments in the field of freedom of information, together with recommendations regarding practical action which might be taken by the Council to surmount those obstacles to the fuller enjoyment of freedom of information which could be surmounted at the present time. The Council also decided to include in its agenda for 1953 an item on freedom of information for the purpose of reviewing and taking appropriate action on problems of freedom of information in the light of the rapporteur's report.

At its 660th meeting, on 25 July 1952, the Council elected Salvador P. Lopez (Philippines) rapporteur on matters relating to freedom of information.

The Council's recommendations were considered by the General Assembly at its seventh session, when, at the 429th meeting of the Third Committee on 1 November, Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Greece, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden submitted a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.260) which would note the decision of the Council in resolution 442 C (XIV) and would decide to consider further at the eighth session of the Assembly the problem of promoting and safeguarding freedom of information after the Council had examined the rapporteur's report.

Egypt, Lebanon and the Philippines also submitted a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.259) noting the interest of the Assembly in problems of freedom of information, requesting the Secretary-General to communicate the records of the Third Committee on the subject of freedom of information to the Council and further inviting the Council to submit to the Assembly at its eighth session a statement of its views and plans regarding future work in connexion with freedom of information.

Subsequently Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Greece, Lebanon, the Netherlands, Norway, the Philippines and Sweden submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.265) covering those parts of the above proposals relating to the future work of the United Nations in the field of freedom of information. The reference in the draft resolution by Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Greece, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden (A/C.3/L.260) to technical assistance was later embodied in a separate proposal (see above).

The draft resolution and amendments were considered by the Committee at its 435th to 438th meetings, from 4 to 6 November.

Amendments to the new joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.265) were submitted by Poland (A/C.3/L.267); Guatemala (A/C.3/L.271/Rev.2); India, Iraq, Lebanon, Mexico, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, jointly (A/C.3/L.274); India and Saudi Arabia, jointly (A/C.3/L.275); France (A/C.3/L.276); Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.277/Rev.1); the United States (A/C.3/L.278); and China (A/C.3/L.280). In addition, oral suggestions were made by the Philippines.

Two of these amendments were withdrawn. The representative of Guatemala withdrew his amendment (A/C.3/L.271/Rev.2), which concerned ways and means of preventing "international informational enterprises from undertaking campaigns against particular countries" and subsequently presented it as a separate draft resolution, co-sponsored by El Salvador (A/C.3/L.281, see above). The representative of the United States also withdrew his amendment (A/C.3/L.278) seeking a change in that part of the text referring to United Nations interest in the problem of freedom of information.

The sponsors of the joint draft accepted a number of the suggested amendments and revised the joint draft (A/C.3/L.265/Rev.1). By this draft which was presented to this Committee at its 437th meeting on 6 November, the Assembly would note the decision of the Council to appoint a rapporteur and that the rapporteur had already undertaken, in co-operation with the Secretary-General, the specialized agencies, particularly UNESCO, and the professional organizations concerned, the preparation, for submission to the Council in 1953, of a substantive report covering major contemporary problems and developments in the field of freedom of information, together with recommendations regarding practical action. It would request the Secretary-General to communicate the records of the Third Committee on the subject of freedom of information to the Council. The Assembly would also decide to consider further at its eighth session the problem of promoting and safeguarding freedom of information, including the draft convention on freedom of information, after the Council had examined the rapporteur's report,¹²⁵ and invite the Council to submit to the Assembly at its eighth session a statement of its views and plans regarding future work in connexion with freedom of information.

At its 437th meeting on 6 November, the Committee voted on the following outstanding amendments which had not been accepted by the sponsors of the joint draft resolution:

(1) An amendment by Poland (A/C.3/L.267), which, among other things, would delete three paragraphs of the preamble and one of the operative part and would, in effect, remove all reference to the rapporteur and his work, was rejected in five separate votes, ranging from 40 to 6, with 5 abstentions, to 22 to 14, with 14 abstentions.

(2) An amendment by Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.277/Rev.1) which would add to the preamble a paragraph stating that it was taken into consideration that the Third Committee had not studied the draft convention on freedom of information at its sixth and seventh sessions. This was adopted by the Committee by 26 votes to 2, with 21 abstentions.

(3) A joint amendment by India and Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/L.275) to delete a phrase stating that the report on freedom of information was being undertaken in order to surmount those obstacles to the fuller enjoyment of freedom of information which could be surmounted at the present time. The Committee rejected the joint draft amendment by 21 votes to 14, with 15 abstentions.

(4) An amendment by China (A/C.3/L.280) which would amend that part of the joint draft resolution in terms of which the Assembly would decide to consider further at its eighth session the problem of promoting and safeguarding freedom of information. The Chinese amendment, which sought to replace the words "in particular the draft convention on freedom of information" by the wording "including the draft convention on freedom of information", was adopted by 17 votes to 15, with 8 abstentions.

(5) An oral drafting amendment by El Salvador, which was adopted by 15 votes to 14, with 22 abstentions.

The Committee, after adopting in parts, by votes ranging from 40 to none, with 11 abstentions, to 32 to 14, with 5 abstentions, the joint draft resolution as amended, adopted it as a whole by a roll-call vote of 38 to 2, with 13 abstentions.

The draft resolution recommended by the Third Committee (A/2294) came before the General Assembly at its 403rd plenary meeting on 16 December. At the same meeting, the representative of Poland submitted a three-part amendment (A/L.126), substantially similar to that presented by his delegation in the Third Committee. The Assembly, by votes ranging from 35 to 10, with 10 abstentions, to 43 to 5, with 8 abstentions, rejected the Polish amendment and adopted, by 50 votes to none, with 7 abstentions, the draft resolution recommended by the Committee as resolution 631(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Reaffirming that freedom of information is a fundamental human right and is the touchstone of all the freedoms to which the United Nations is consecrated, the promotion of which is one of the fundamental tasks of the United Nations, ¹²⁵ See p. 477.

"Considering that in 1946 the General Assembly initiated the study in the United Nations of the problems of freedom of information and continues to take great interest in the said problems and to concern itself with them directly,

"Considering the continuing need for study, inquiry and investigation with a view to positive action for the removal of obstacles to the free flow of information,

"Considering that the Third Committee has not studied the draft Convention on Freedom of Information during the sixth and seventh sessions of the General Assembly,

"Noting the decision of the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 442 C (XIV) of 13 June 1952 to appoint, for an experimental period of one year, and in a personal capacity, a rapporteur on matters relating to freedom of information,

"Noting that the rapporteur designated by the Council has already undertaken, in co-operation with the Secretary-General, the specialized agencies, in particular the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and the professional organizations concerned, both national and international, the preparation, for submission to the Council in 1953, of a substantive report covering major contemporary problems and developments in the field of freedom of information, together with recommendations regarding practical action which might be taken by the Council, in order to surmount those obstacles to the fuller enjoyment of freedom of information which can be surmounted at the present time,

"1. Requests the Secretary-General to communicate the records of the Third Committee on the subject of freedom of information to the Economic and Social Council, in order that they may be taken into consideration by the Council during its studies and discussions;

"2. Decides to consider further at its eighth session the problem of promoting and safeguarding freedom of information, including the draft Convention on Freedom of Information, on the basis of the rapporteur's report to the Economic and Social Council in 1953 and after the Economic and Social Council has had an opportunity to examine the rapporteur's report; and accordingly,

"3. Invites the Economic and Social Council to submit to the General Assembly at its eighth session a statement of its views and plans regarding future work in connexion with freedom of information."

M. STATUS OF WOMEN

The Commission on the Status of Women at its sixth session, held from 24 March to 5 April 1952, discussed, among other things: the political rights of women; the nationality of married women; the status of women in public and private law; educational opportunities for women; equal pay for equal work for men and women workers; economic opportunities for women; the participation of women in the work of the United Nations; communications concerning the status of women; the programme of work of the Commission; and the report of the Inter-American Commission of Women on its activities during the year (E/CN.6/190).

The report of the Commission (E/2208 and Corr.1 and Add.1) was discussed by the Economic and Social Council at its fourteenth session, at the 575th to 580th and 583rd plenary meetings on 22, 23, and 26 to 28 May 1952. The majority commended the work of the Commission. The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR, however, criticized the Commission as not being fully effective.

The Council at its 583rd plenary meeting on 28 May, by 14 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, took note (445 A (XIV)) of the Commission's report.

The draft convention on the political rights of women was subsequently considered by the General Assembly at its seventh session. The action taken on the various items mentioned above is given below.

1. Political Rights of Women

a. REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

The Commission had before it the Secretary-General's annual report on constitutions, electoral laws and other legal instruments relating to the franchise of women and their eligibility for public offices and functions (A/1911). The report stated that, since the fifth session of the Commission, two countries, El Salvador and Haiti, had adopted new constitutions containing provisions relating to political rights of women, but that no other changes in legal instruments relating to the subject had been brought to the attention of the Secretary-General. The Commission requested (E/2208) that future reports include an additional table showing the dates on which women in the various countries had been granted the right to vote. It also invited the Secretary-General to prepare for the next session of the Commission a report containing information received from governments designed to show the actual participation of women in the political and public life of their countries.

b. DRAFT CONVENTION ON POLITICAL RIGHTS OF WOMEN

(1) Consideration by the Commission on the Status of Women at its Sixth Session

The Commission had before it, in this connexion, a report by the Secretary-General containing comments and suggestions of twenty governments (E/CN.6/184 and Add.1 and 2) on the text of the draft convention which the Commission had adopted at its fifth session and which had been circulated to governments in accordance with Council resolution 385 B (XIII).¹²⁶ The Commission noted that several governments had commented favourably on the text and had agreed that a convention on political rights of women was desirable in order to promote full equality for women in the field of political rights, particularly in countries where women have not yet been granted the right to vote. Particular importance was attached to the fact that it provided, inter alia, for the right of women to be appointed to all public offices and functions.

The Commission, following the adoption of minor drafting changes, forwarded the draft convention to the Council and proposed (E/2208 B) that the Council recommend that the Assembly open the convention for signature and ratification by Member States. The draft convention contained a preamble and three substantive articles.

(2) Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Fourteenth Session

During the debate in the Council the representatives of Egypt and Sweden expressed the view that the convention duplicated the work of the covenants on human rights and that there was no need for two instruments dealing with the same subject. Moreover, the representative of Egypt considered that it was not the function of the Commission, though competent, to draft the convention.

The representatives of Cuba and the United States, however, pointed out that this convention would probably come into force before the proposed covenants on human rights. The guarantee of equal political rights, they stated, should not be delayed on the grounds that the principle would be contained in the human rights covenants. The representative of Belgium, while supporting the draft convention, had reservations with regard to its application in Belgium's overseas territories. The customs, traditions and degree of evolution of the indigenous population were such, he said, that complete equality could not be imposed at once.

The representative of Czechoslovakia stated that it was useless to guarantee equality between men and women in cases where political rights existed only in theory. The convention, he said, would be without value unless the USSR amendments (E/L.325 — see below) were adopted.

The representative of Sweden submitted a substitute draft resolution (E/L.329) which, inter alia, would have requested the Commission on Human Rights to embody pertinent provisions in its draft covenants on human rights, instead of adopting another convention. However, he subsequently withdrew the text.

The USSR amendments (E/L.325) provided for the addition of a statement in each of the three articles that there would be no discrimination of any kind on grounds of race, colour, nationality, social position, property, language or religion. The representatives of Sweden and the United States opposed these amendments, primarily because they considered that the convention had been intended to deal with discrimination against women and not with every other possible type of discrimination. The Council rejected these amendments by separate votes of 8 to 5, with 3 abstentions.

The USSR also proposed that article 2 should be further amended to provide that women would be eligible for election to all publicly elected bodies, governmental or public, central or local.... This was rejected by the Council by 6 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions. Finally, the USSR amendment proposed two new articles to state that (1) States participating in the Convention assumed the obligation to take all the necessary action, including legislative action, to guarantee to all women the effective possibility of exercising the rights provided for in the preceding articles; and (2) that these States assumed the obligation to publish the provisions of the convention within the shortest possible time in all the territories under their jurisdiction, including Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories.

The representative of Uruguay had presented an amendment (E/L.332) to the USSR amendment to broaden the scope of the first of the proposed new articles and to ensure that the Secretary-General would be kept informed of government action to implement the convention. However, he stated that since the Belgian representative, among others, had pointed out that a similar amendment had been rejected in the Commission because it might hinder the ratification of the convention, he would withdraw his amendment and would support the draft convention as proposed by the Commission.

The new articles proposed by the USSR were rejected by the Council by 7 votes to 6, with 3 abstentions, and 8 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions.

The Council also rejected by 7 votes to 1, with 9 abstentions, an Egyptian proposal (E/L.323) to forward to the Assembly the text of the preamble, deleting the substantive articles. It adopted by 11 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, and 9 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, two United States amendments (E/L.33) of form.

The Commission's draft resolution, as amended, was adopted (445 B (XIV)) by a roll-call vote of 11 to none, with 6 abstentions, one delegation not being represented at the time of the vote. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Belgium, China, Cuba, France, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Sweden, United States, Uruguay.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Canada, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Poland, USSR, United Kingdom.

Absent: Iran.

In explaining his vote, the French representative indicated that, although he had certain reservations, he had not wished to give the impression that his delegation was opposed to the principles of the Convention and had therefore voted for it. The Polish representative had abstained since he considered the draft convention incomplete and unsatisfactory. The representatives of the United Kingdom and Canada also explained their abstentions on the ground that, while they doubted the utility of the draft convention, they did not wish to impede it in any way. The latter also pointed out that in a Federal State, such as Canada, it might present legal difficulties.

In its resolution, the Council, considering the time appropriate for an international convention to eliminate all discrimination against women in the field of political rights, requested the Secretary-General to draft the necessary formal clauses and recommended that the Assembly open for signature and ratification a convention embodying a preamble and substantive clauses. The latter would provide that women would be entitled, on equal terms with men: to vote (article 1); to be elected to publicly elected bodies established by national law (article 2); and to hold public office and to exercise all public functions established by national law (article 3).

(3) Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

The General Assembly considered the draft Convention at the 474th to 481st meetings of its Third Committee from 12 to 17 December and at its 408th and 409th plenary meetings on 20 December 1952.

(a) CONSIDERATION BY THE THIRD COMMITTEE

The Committee had before it a note by the Secretary-General (A/2156) containing the text of the Council's resolution and the preamble and substantive clauses of the draft Convention. It also had before it a memorandum by the Secretary-General (A/2156/Add.1) containing, inter alia, the draft formal clauses prepared by him at the Council's request.

The Committee decided not to have a general debate on the subject, but that members might comment on the draft convention in connexion with the consideration of the draft resolutions and the amendments before it.

The majority of the Committee were strongly in favour of a convention on political rights of women and approved the simple form of the proposed substantive articles. The representative of Egypt, however, considered that the convention was unnecessary in view of the fact that an article to the same effect had been proposed for inclusion in the human rights draft covenant on civil and political rights. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Yugoslavia felt that the wording of the draft convention was not strong enough and that it would therefore remain an instrument of a declaratory nature. The USSR again submitted several amendments (A/C.3/L.327/Rev.1),¹²⁷ substantially the same as those submitted in the Council and the same arguments were advanced for and against them (see above).

The Committee had before it a joint draft resolution submitted by Bolivia, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Norway and Sweden (A/C3/L.330) which would provide that the Assembly open the attached convention for signature and ratification. The text of the convention, as attached, included the preamble and substantive clauses as proposed by the Economic and Social Council (A/2156).

The formal clauses proposed differed specifically from those proposed by the Secretary-General (A/2156/Add.1) in that the sponsors of the draft resolution had not included a colonial clause.

The majority of the Committee felt that some provision should be made for extending the convention to Non-Self-Governing Territories and amendments were submitted to this effect (see under article 8, below).

The Secretary-General had also proposed three possible reservation clauses: the first would provide for reservations at the time of signature and permit subsequent withdrawal of these reservations; the second would permit signature, ratification or accession conditional upon enumerated reservations; and the third would provide that the Secretary-General would communicate the text of reservations made at the time of signature, ratification or accession to all States which were or might become parties to the convention. Any State thus objecting to the reservation might then notify the Secretary-General and in such cases the convention would not enter into force between such State and the State making the reservation. The sponsors of the draft resolution had chosen the third to include in the draft convention.

The action taken by the Committee on the individual articles of the draft Covenant is summarized below.

Preamble

A drafting amendment by the Netherlands to the second paragraph of the preamble (A/C.3/L.329/Rev.2) was adopted by 37 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions.

Articles 1—3 (Substantive Clauses)

The USSR proposed (A/C.3/L.327/Rev.1) to amend articles 1 to 3 by adding in each instance the words "without any discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, national or social origin, property status, language or religion."

The Committee voted first on an Afghanistan sub-amendment (A/C.3/L.331) to delete the words "national or" from the USSR amendment and rejected it by 12 votes to 7, with 32 abstentions. It considered the USSR amendment to each article separately.

The words "without any discrimination" were voted on separately and adopted by 13 votes to 12, with 21 abstentions; the remainder of the phrase proposed by the USSR was rejected by 19 votes to 9, with 21 abstentions.

Article 1, as amended, was adopted by 31 votes to 1, with 16 abstentions.

Article 2

The words "without any discrimination" were adopted by 17 votes to 16, with 17 abstentions; no vote was taken on the remainder of the USSR amendment.

A USSR amendment (A/C.3/L.327/Rev.1) providing that women would be eligible for election to all publicly elected State and public bodies, both central and, local, was rejected by 20 votes to 7, with 22 abstentions, and by 15 votes to 9, with 23 abstentions.

Article 2, as amended, was adopted by 32 votes to 2, with 16 abstentions.

The Committee decided by 20 votes to 11, with 16 abstentions, not to include the words "without any discrimination". The USSR amendment was voted on as a whole and was rejected by a roll-call vote of 27 to 7, with 17 abstentions.

Several representatives, among them those of Brazil, Denmark, France, Greece, Guatemala, India, Israel, Mexico, New Zealand, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sweden and the United States, expressed their understanding that the terms "public office" and "public functions" in article 3 did not include military service for women and this interpretation was not questioned.

Some representatives, among them those of Pakistan and the United States, were of the opinion that the expressions of "public office" and "public functions" were basically the same in meaning and therefore repetitions. However, the majority felt that the two terms had different meanings and that it was unlikely that any single term expressing both ideas adequately in all official languages could be found.

Article 3 was adopted by 37 votes to none, with 11 abstentions.

Articles 4—11 (Formal Clauses)

Articles 4, 5 and 6 concerning Signature and Ratification, Accession, and Entry into Force, were adopted, respectively, by 44 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, 46 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and by 47 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

Article 7 (Reservations)

The representative of Mexico considered that the convention was not an instrument under which States had reciprocal obligations and therefore the second part of the proposed article (providing for the notification and effect of objections to reservations) in his opinion needlessly complicated the article and made it impossible to apply in practice. At his request the article was voted on in two parts.

The first part was adopted by 32 votes to 2, with 14 abstentions, and the second part by 26 votes to 7, with 17 abstentions.

Article 7, as a whole, was adopted by 32 votes to 3, with 14 abstentions.

Article 8 (new) (Colonial Clause)

The USSR proposed a new article (A/C.3/L.327/Rev.1), as it had previously in the Economic and Social Council, providing for the immediate extension of the rights of the convention to all Non-Self-Governing Territories. This was rejected by the Committee by 14 votes to 14, with 16 abstentions.

The representatives of Afghanistan, India, Iraq and Yugoslavia jointly proposed (A/C.3/L.332) an article to provide that the convention be automatically extended to all territories—Non-Self-Governing, Trust or colonial.

Since the majority opposed this proposal either on the grounds that some territories were not yet ready for the extension of such rights or because they felt such a provision would prohibit a number of States from ratifying the convention, the representative of India withdrew as a sponsor and submitted a compromise proposal (A/C.3/L.333). This would permit States ratifying the convention to stipulate that it would not apply to certain territories and would allow these States to extend the application at a later date.

The Committee decided by a roll-call vote of 26 to 25 to vote on the Indian amendment before the joint amendment. It was adopted by a roll-call vote of 28 to 17, with 6 abstentions, following the rejection by 26 votes to 21, with 4 abstentions, of a Yugoslav sub-amendment to delete the provision permitting States to stipulate that the Convention would not apply to certain territories.

Article 9²⁸ (Denunciation and Abrogation)

This article was adopted by 43 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

Article 10¹²⁸ (Settlement of Disputes)

The Mexican representative stated that the convention was a matter for domestic policy and not a subject for international dispute, and proposed that the article be deleted. His proposal was rejected by 24 votes to 10, with 15 abstentions.

A Netherlands oral proposal to provide for the settlement of disputes arising from interpretation only and not also from application was rejected by 22 votes to 5, with 21 abstentions.

A proposal by the USSR (A/C.3/L.327/Rev.1) which would submit any dispute to arbitration by agreement between the countries concerned, rather than to the International Court of Justice, was rejected by 28 votes to 8, with 12 abstentions.

Article 10 was adopted by 27 votes to 15, with 6 abstentions.

Article 11¹²⁸ (Notifications)

This article was adopted by 47 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, subject to the addition of drafting changes made necessary by the adoption of certain amendments.

Article 12¹²⁸ (Deposit)

This article was adopted by 46 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

As in the Council, the USSR proposed a new article (A/C.3/L.327/Rev.1) which would provide for the adoption of measures, including legislative, to ensure the exercise of the rights provided in the Convention. This was rejected by 20 votes to 15, with 14 abstentions.

The amended draft convention was adopted, as a whole, by a roll-call vote of 35¹²⁹ to none, with 11 abstentions, at the Committee's 480th meeting on 17 December (A/2334). The draft resolution accompanying it was adopted by 40¹²⁹ votes to none, with 6 abstentions (for text, with minor changes, see below).

(b) CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY IN PLENARY SESSION

The General Assembly considered the report of its Third Committee (A/2334) containing the draft convention at its 408th and 409th plenary meetings on 20 December 1952.

The President ruled at its 409th meeting that the draft resolution and draft convention constituted a question of importance under rule 84 of the rules of procedure, and that a two-thirds majority vote would therefore be required for the adoption of any proposal.

The Assembly had before it several amendments to the convention recommended by the Third Committee.

One, a joint amendment submitted by France and Greece (A/L.140), would eliminate from articles 1 and 2 the words "without any discrimination" which had been inserted by the Third Committee. This was supported by the representatives of China, Cuba, Ecuador and the United States, among others, on the grounds that the phrase was repetitious, confusing and would add nothing to the benefits of the Convention. The joint amendment was rejected by a roll-call vote of 24 to 23, with 8 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Australia, Belgium, Canada, China, Cuba, Denmark, Ecuador, El Salvador, France, Greece, Iceland, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: Afghanistan, Argentina, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Liberia, Nicaragua, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Bolivia, Brazil, India, Israel, Lebanon, Pakistan, Philippines, Venezuela.

A second amendment by Indonesia (A/L.138) would instead add the words "without any discrimination" to article 3 to bring the first three articles into conformity, and to prevent a difference in interpretation. The Assembly adopted this by a roll-call vote of 38 to 2, with 16 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Ethiopia, France, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Mexico, Paraguay.

Abstaining: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Ecuador, Greece, Iceland, Netherlands, Nicaragua, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Yemen.

The USSR representative, supported by the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the Ukrainian SSR, also re-introduced (A/L.137) the amendments put forward in the Council and in the Committee.

The Assembly rejected the USSR proposal to add to articles 1 to 3 the words "without any discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, national or social origin, property status, language or religion" by 27 votes to 6, with 15 abstentions, 31 votes to 7, with 16 abstentions, and 31 votes to 7, with 16 abstentions, respectively. The further amendment to article 2 specifying that women would be eligible for election to all publicly elected State and public bodies, both central and local, was rejected by 26 votes to 5, with 20 abstentions.

The new articles proposed by the USSR, concerning the adoption of legislative measures and the extension of the convention to Non-Self-Governing Territories (see above), were rejected in a single vote of 29 to 8, with 14 abstentions. The USSR amendment to article 10 on the arbitration of disputes was rejected by 35 votes to 7, with 11 abstentions.

A number of representatives, among them those of Guatemala, Lebanon and Iraq, regretted that the compromise colonial clause (article 8) had been adopted, on the ground that the convention thus discriminated against a category of people.

Article 8 was voted on separately and rejected, since the vote of 32 in favour to 18 against, with 7 abstentions, did not constitute a two-thirds majority. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Canada, China, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Ecuador, France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Israel, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Against: Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Pakistan, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Mexico, Philippines.

A separate vote was also requested on article 7 (Reservations) and it was adopted by 35 votes to 2, with 14 abstentions.

An amendment by France and Greece (A/L.140) to the draft resolution providing that the convention be opened for signature and ratification at the end of the present session rather than during December 1952 was adopted by 36 votes to 1, with 12 abstentions.

The draft resolution and annexed draft Convention, as a whole and as amended, were adopted by the Assembly at its 409th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952 by a roll-call vote of 46 to none, with 11 abstentions, as resolution 640 (VII). The voting was as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, Iran, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Yemen.

The USSR representative stated that she had abstained because of the shortcomings of the Convention which her amendments had been designed to rectify. The Yugoslav representative felt that the convention represented a step forward and had therefore voted for it as a whole.

The resolution and the annexed Convention read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that the peoples of the United Nations are determined to promote equality of rights of men and women, in conformity with the principles embodied in the Charter,

"Believing that an international convention on the political rights of women will constitute an important step toward the universal attainment of equal rights of men and women,

"Reaffirming its resolution 56(I) of 11 December 1946, "Decides to open the attached Convention for signature and ratification at the end of the present session."

ANNEX

(e) INFORMATION CONCERNING THE STATUS OF WOMEN IN TRUST TERRITORIES

The Commission had before it a report on the status of women in Trust Territories (E/CN.6/182), a report on the status of women in Non-Self-Governing Territories (E/CN.6/183) and supplementary information concerning family law in Non-Self-Governing Territories (E/CN.6/159/Add.1 and 2), prepared by the Secretary-General.

The Commission decided to draw the attention of the Council to certain customs, which violated the physical integrity of women, and which were widely practised on young girls in certain areas of the world, including some of the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The Commission recommended (E/2208 C) that the Council adopt a resolution inviting the Trusteeship Council and Member States responsible for the administration of the Territories to take immediate action with a view to abolishing in Trust Territories and Non-Self-Governing Territories all customs which violate the dignity and security of persons. The resolution would also request the Trusteeship Council to include the necessary questions in the questionnaires, as well as to include in its annual report to the Assembly pertinent information received from Administering Authorities. During the discussion in the Council, the majority condemned the practices referred to by the Commission and agreed that all possible steps should be taken to abolish them. The representative of Belgium stressed that action would have to be taken progressively. Immediate abolition would scarcely be practicable, since these practices were closely linked to religious customs that had been firmly established for centuries. He therefore submitted an amendment to this effect (E/L.334).

The representatives of France and the United Kingdom submitted a joint amendment (E/L.326/Rev.1) to the resolution proposed by the Commission to invite all States to abolish such customs rather than limiting the recommendation to certain countries. They also considered that the last paragraph (see above) should be omitted since it was inappropriate for the Economic and Social Council to concern itself with procedural questions of the Trusteeship Council.

The representative of Cuba submitted an amendment designed to clarify the draft resolution by referring separately to the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, instead of making a joint recommendation concerning them.

The Belgian, French-United Kingdom and Cuban amendments were subsequently withdrawn in favour of a joint draft resolution (E/L.336) by Belgium, Cuba and the United Kingdom, incorporating the above points of view and replacing the draft resolution recommended by the Commission. The representative of Poland, however, took over the Cuban amendment, submitting it as an amendment to the new text. It was subsequently rejected by 8 votes to 3, with 6 abstentions.

The representatives of Mexico, the Philippines and Uruguay stressed that, although progressive action was needed, it was essential to initiate that action immediately. The representative of the Philippines therefore presented an amendment (E/L.344) to that effect which was accepted by the sponsors of the joint draft resolution.

They also accepted an Argentine proposal (E/L.346) to address the draft resolution to all States rather than simply to Member States.

The representatives of Poland and the USSR stated that the speed of implementation was of fundamental importance and therefore unless the words calling for progressive action were deleted they could not vote for the resolution. An oral USSR amendment to this effect was rejected by the Council at its 583rd meeting on 28 May by 6 votes to 4, with 7 abstentions.

The Council rejected by 7 votes to 7, with 3 abstentions, an oral amendment by Pakistan to refer to the violation of the physical integrity of women as a violation of dignity. It unanimously adopted a proposal by Cuba to recognize that there are areas where women are deprived of certain essential human rights, including the right to their physical integrity and moral dignity.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Council by 14 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 445 C (XIV). The representatives of Poland and the USSR stated that they had abstained because they found it less satisfactory than the text proposed by the Commission.

The resolution read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Considering that one of the purposes of the United Nations is to promote and encourage respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

"Considering that there are areas of the world, including certain Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, where women are deprived of certain essential human rights, including the right to their physical integrity and moral dignity,

"1. Invites all States, including States which have or assume responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to take immediately all necessary measures with a view to abolishing progressively in the countries and territories under their administration all customs which violate the physical integrity of women, and which thereby violate the dignity and worth of the human person as proclaimed in the Charter and in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

"2. Invites the Trusteeship Council, in collaboration with the Administering Authorities, to take immediately all appropriate measures to promote the progressive abolition of such customs in Trust Territories, and to consider the inclusion of the necessary questions in the questionnaires provided for in Article 88 of the Charter as well as the inclusion of the pertinent information received from Administering Authorities in its annual report to the General Assembly;

"3. Invites the General Assembly to request the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to take paragraph 1 above into account in its examination of the information transmitted under heading C of part III of the Standard Form for the guidance of Members in the preparation of information to be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter adopted by the General Assembly on 7 December 1951 under resolution 551 (VI)."

2. Nationality of Married Women

At its sixth session the Commission noted that the International Law Commission had included the item of "Nationality including statelessness" in the agenda of its fourth session¹³⁰ and that it intended to deal with the convention on nationality of married women in connexion with this item. It noted that the report of the International Law Commission's special rapporteur on "Nationality including statelessness" (A/CN.4/50) contained a draft convention on nationality of married persons which followed closely the principles formulated by the Commission on the Status of Women at its fourth session. The Commission expressed (E/2208) its satisfaction at the action taken by the various organs of the United Nations to implement its recommendations concerning the nationality of married women.

3. Status of Women in Public Law

The Secretary-General submitted to the Commission at its sixth session supplementary reports on women in public services and functions (E/CN.6/157/Add.1) and on civil liberties for women (E/CN.6/158/Add.1 and 2). The Commission adopted a resolution (E/2208) in which it noted that certain discriminations against women were apparent in the Commission's studies. It expressed the belief that there was a need for a publication designed to help Member States and their citizens become familiar with their comparative situation in regard to discrimination against women, so that they might lay the basis for constructive and practical action. The Commission therefore requested the Secretary-General to prepare a simplified summary, in narrative form, of significant discriminations against women apparent in the information available from governments, non-governmental organizations and other sources, and to present this draft summary to the next session of the Commission for comments and suggestions, looking toward publication at an early date.

4. Status of Women in Private Law

The Commission had before it a report of the Secretary-General on the Status of Women in Family Law (E/CN.6/185 and Add.1 and 2) based on replies of governments to part III of the questionnaire on the legal status and treatment of women as well as a report on the Status of Women in Private Law (E/CN.6/186 and Add.1) based on replies from non-governmental organizations as to changes considered desirable in the various legal systems in order to eliminate discrimination against women. Members of the Commission felt that the number of replies so far received by the Secretary-General from governments was not sufficient to enable the Commission to undertake the discussion of this important subject. The Commission therefore decided to postpone the consideration of this item until its seventh session and to give to this question first priority in its programme of future work.

5. Educational Opportunities for Women

a. ACCESS OF WOMEN TO EDUCATION

The Commission had before it a report prepared by UNESCO (E/CN.6/191) outlining that organization's current activities and future plans with regard to the education of women and containing in an annex statistical data on enrolment and percentage of girls in schools on various levels.

The representative of UNESCO informed the Commission that the programme of work was divided into four main parts: general education at all levels; fundamental and adult education; education for citizenship at national and international levels; and technical and professional education. She also informed the Commission of the forthcoming Fifteenth International Conference on Public Education, at which the subject would be discussed.

Some members of the Commission felt that the question of access of women to education in a country depended upon the level of general culture of that country and was closely linked to the question of political, economic and social equality of women. They felt that the work accomplished by UNESCO was not sufficient and that its results were not entirely satisfactory from the standpoint of achieving equality for women in the field of education. Some others deplored the slow pace of progress achieved in the raising of educational standards among women.

Some members indicated that due account should be taken of geographical factors and different levels of economic development when education was considered on a world-wide basis. One member criticized the theory of geographical factors as being non-scientific.

Several representatives stressed the importance of education in citizenship and some expressed the wish that UNESCO should organize a programme of political education for men along the lines of that outlined for women in the conclusions of the report prepared by UNESCO (E/CN.6/191).

The Commission adopted a resolution (E/2208) expressing its appreciation to UNESCO for its continued assistance in the study of educational opportunities for women and girls. It noted the UNESCO programmes for promotion of equality of access for girls and women at all levels of education and requested the Secretary-General to continue to seek the collaboration of the Director-General of UNESCO on these questions and to report to the next session of the Commission. The Commission expressed the wish to have information as to legal obstacles which might exist in the legal systems of various countries to prevent free access of girls and women to education and requested the Secretary-General to prepare a report on this subject for submission to its next session.

b. VOCATIONAL GUIDANCE AND VOCATIONAL AND TECHNICAL EDUCATION OF WOMEN

The Commission had before it a report by ILO on this subject (E/CN.6/178 and Corr.1). The representative of ILO, in giving a brief analysis of the report, stated that in the opinion of his organization the available openings for employment were dictated largely by a country's economic conditions. However, the provisions made for women to obtain vocational and educational training, and to enter skilled trades were inadequate, even in economically developed countries. She also stressed that women could not take advantage of opportunities for technical and vocational training, however abundant, unless they had, to the same extent as men, first received a good general education as well as sound vocational guidance.

The question whether all careers, trades and professions should be opened to women gave rise to considerable debate. Some members felt that the opening of all trades, careers and professions to women was inconsistent with protective legislation for women workers; others stated that equality did not necessarily imply identity of treatment and that it was the duty of the Commission to take the lead and to proclaim the principle of equality of access of women to all jobs. The latter opinion prevailed and the Commission proposed (E/2208 D) that the Council adopt a resolution including a statement of principle and recommending that governments:

(1) guarantee women the right to work on an equal footing with men; (2) guarantee girls and women access to all forms of training and apprenticeship; (3) take all possible measures to ensure provision of adequate facilities and opportunities for vocational training and guidance for all workers without regard to sex; (4) promote such opportunities for women; and (5) bear in mind the needs of women in making requests for technical assistance to the United Nations and the specialized agencies to develop vocational guidance and vocational and technical education.

During the discussion in the Council, the representatives of Belgium, Pakistan, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States put forward the view that governments in a free economy did not have the constitutional power to guarantee women the right to work on an equal footing with men. They thought it would be preferable to recommend that governments take all possible measures to ensure to women the exercise of this right. Accordingly, the representatives of Sweden and the United States submitted a joint amendment (E/L.328) to this effect. The representatives of Cuba, Poland and the USSR emphasized the importance of guaranteeing women the right to work on an equal footing with men and thought that the Council was not entitled to modify the idea expressed by the Commission.

The joint amendment was adopted by paragraphs at the Council's 578th plenary meeting on 26 May 1952 by votes varying from 10 to 1, with 6 abstentions, to 12 to 3, with 2 abstentions. The draft resolution, thus amended, was adopted unanimously as resolution 445 D (XIV), the representatives of Cuba and the USSR stating that they had voted for it because, even as amended, it would have some value.

The resolution read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Recognizing the increasingly important and permanent place being taken by women in the economic and industrial life of many countries,

"Believing that there should be equal opportunity for men and women to participate in the economic life of their countries,

"Believing also that the principle of equality of opportunity for men and women with respect to vocational training is therefore of great immediate importance to the economic development of the various countries,

"Recognizing further the importance of improving the economic status of women while raising their political and social status in all countries,

"Agreeing that equality of opportunity is possible only if there is, inter alia, equal access to education for boys and girls from primary school onwards,

"1. Invites the International Labour Office to collect information as to the extent to which girls and women are excluded from apprenticeship to certain trades by trade unions, by employers or by legal restriction, and to lay this information before the Commission on the Status of Women at the earliest opportunity;

"2. Recommends that governments:

"(a) Take all possible measures to ensure the right of women to work on an equal footing with men;

"(b) Take all possible measures to ensure provision of adequate facilities and opportunities for vocational training and guidance for all workers without regard to sex, and to give girls and women access to all forms of training and apprenticeship;

"(c) Bear in mind the needs of women in making requests for technical assistance to the United Nations and the specialized agencies to develop vocational guidance and vocational and technical education."

6. Equal Pay for Equal Work

The Commission had before it a report prepared by the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/179) describing the proceedings and action taken by the International Labour Conference at its 34th session held in June 1951.¹³¹

In the course of the Commission's debate several members expressed their satisfaction at the adoption by the Conference of a Convention and a Recommendation on equal remuneration for work of equal value for men and women workers. Others felt, however, that the convention completely failed to protect the rights of women workers and that it contained loopholes permitting governments to avoid its implementation. It was pointed out in this connexion that the provisions of the convention did not extend to certain Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The Commission adopted a resolution (E/2208 E) expressing regret that women workers in some countries still suffered discrimination in regard to equal pay for equal work and proposing a draft resolution for adoption by the Council.

During the discussion in the Council, the representative of Egypt submitted an amendment (E/L.324) which would delete the paragraph of the Commission's draft resolution requesting the Commission on Human Rights to include an article to provide for the principle of equal remuneration for equal work for men and women workers in the covenants on Human Rights, since such an article already had been included. He withdrew this amendment, however, in favour of an oral Cuban proposal to have the Council note with satisfaction that the Commission on Human Rights had done this. The revised paragraph was adopted by 13 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

The remaining paragraphs of the draft resolution were adopted at the Council's 576th meeting on 23 May in votes varying from 10 to none, with 6 abstentions, to 11 to none, with 6 abstentions. The amended draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 11 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, as resolution 445 E (XIV). The representative of the USSR stated that he had abstained because he considered the convention and recommendation adopted by ILO inadequate.

Resolution 445 E (XIV) read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Considering that the principle of equal rights for men and women is solemnly proclaimed in the Preamble of the Charter of the United Nations,

"Commending the action taken by the thirty-fourth Conference of the International Labour Organisation in June 1951, in the adoption of a convention supplemented by a recommendation on equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value,

"Recognizing the effective work of non-governmental organizations in many countries in creating a favourable public opinion for the application of this principle by calling attention to the value of women's work and the need for establishing improved personnel practices and equal opportunities for training and advancement, and by promoting the adoption of legislation,

"1. Recommends that States members of the International Labour Organisation introduce as soon as possible, by means of proper legislation or other measures, equal remuneration for equal work for men and women workers, in accordance with the ILO Convention and Recommendation;

"2. Urges adoption and implementation in all countries not members of the International Labour Organisation, of the principle of equal pay for equal work without discrimination on the basis of sex;

"3. Notes with satisfaction that the Commission on Human Rights has decided to include in the covenant on economic, social and cultural rights an article which would provide for the principle of equal remuneration for equal work for men and women workers."

7. Economic Opportunities for Women

a. PART-TIME WORK FOR WOMEN

In the course of the debate in the Commission, some members stressed the importance of part-time work, particularly for married women whose household duties did not occupy all their time; others felt that a resolution on part-time work for women would furnish an argument for the opponents of full access of women to every type of employment. The representative of ILO stated that, at a meeting of experts held in December 1951, ILO had been requested to study this question in all its aspects.

The Commission adopted a resolution (E/2208 F), which was subsequently adopted by the Council, without further discussion, at its 576th plenary meeting by 14 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 445 F (XIV). The Council, in this resolution, requested the Secretary-General to prepare a report for the next session of the Commission containing information from non-governmental organizations and other dependable sources, concerning the use of part-time job schedules by men and women workers, particularly by women with family responsibilities, and the areas where part-time work is of particular significance. It invited the International Labour Office to collaborate by preparing a report on part-time employment.

b. OLDER WOMEN WORKERS

During the debate on economic opportunities for women, some members of the Commission stressed the serious problem confronting older women who could no longer compete with younger applicants for employment. The problem of men in the same age brackets was also mentioned.

The representative of ILO stated that the International Labour Office would carry out a study requested by the Committee on Salaried Employees and Professional Workers in connexion with unemployment among older men and women. However, it was noted, this study had not been assigned priority.

The Commission adopted a resolution (E/2208 G) which was subsequently unanimously adopted by the Council at its 576th plenary meeting as resolution 445 G (XIV). By this resolution, the Council requested the Secretary-General to supply the Commission for its next session with any information available on the number and employment status of women as compared with men in the age brackets over 40. It invited the International Labour Office to collaborate in this study and to furnish any information it might have on older workers, including data of maximum age limits for admission to employment, retirement ages, old age insurance and pensions as established by law or practice, as well as information on plans and programmes of ILO concerning older workers.

c. WOMEN IN THE PROFESSIONS

Several members of the Commission considered that the Secretary-General should be invited, in collaboration with the non-governmental organizations and specialized agencies, to supply all information available concerning training and advancement in the liberal professions such as law, medicine, engineering, architecture, science, and teaching in institutes of higher learning. While these professions were generally open to women, women also had greater difficulty than men in advancing in them. However, the majority felt that discrimination in these fields was less pronounced than in others and the Commission decided not to undertake a study at this time.

8. Participation of Women in the Work of the United Nations

The Commission had before it a report prepared by the Secretary-General (E/CN.6/180 and Add.1 and 2) on the nature and proportion of positions occupied by women in the United Nations Secretariat and in the secretariats of the specialized agencies, together with information available on the qualifications required for professional positions. In the course of the discussion, it was noted with regret that fewer women occupied policy-making positions in the United Nations Secretariat as compared with the previous year. Some members felt that since too few women occupied high posts in national administrations, the choice of candidates for high positions in the United Nations tended to be limited. Non-governmental organizations could do much to encourage recognition of qualified women by governments, they said. The Commission adopted a resolution (E/2208) urging the Secretary-General to continue to appoint women to senior positions in the United Nations Secretariat, as envisaged in the Charter, and to continue to report on the situation of women in the secretariats of the United Nations and the specialized agencies on an annual basis. It also requested the Secretary-General to supplement the report with information on the number and proportion of women who have served as delegates and alternates for their countries in the various organs of the United Nations, in the International Court of Justice, and in conferences of specialized agencies, since the San Francisco Conference.

9. Communications Concerning the Status of Women

In accordance with Council resolution 76(V), as amended by resolution 304 I (XI) to bring the procedure for dealing with communications concerning the status of women into line with that governing communications concerning human rights, two lists of communications, a non-confidential (E/CN.6/CR.5) and a confidential list (SW Communications No. 2) were prepared by the Secretary-General. The Commission took note of both lists.

10. Other Work

a. REPORT OF THE INTER-AMERICAN COMMISSION OF WOMEN

The Commission had before it the report of the Inter-American Commission of Women (E/CN.6/190), summarizing its activities and outlining the progress achieved as a result of the action of governments, its delegates, and women's organizations in the Americas. The Commission took note (E/2208) of the report and several members expressed their appreciation of the part played by the Inter-American Commission of Women in promoting women's rights.

b. TRANSLATION INTO ARABIC OF A PAMPHLET ON POLITICAL EDUCATION OF WOMEN

On the recommendation of the Commission (E/2208 H), the Council at its 577th plenary meeting on 23 May 1952 by 13 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, adopted a resolution (445 H (XIV)) requesting the Secretary-General to undertake the translation into Arabic of part I of the pamphlet *Political Education of Women*¹³² and to consider making it available at a low price.

c. PROGRAMME OF FUTURE WORK

The Commission had before it a note by the Secretary-General on the review of programmes and establishment of priorities (E/CN.6/188) calling the attention of the Commission to Council resolution 325 (XI) establishing criteria for priorities, as well as to the recommendations made by the Co-ordination Committee and approved by the Council concerning the procedures for the establishment of programmes of priorities.

The Commission decided that the status of women in private law must be given high priority in its programme as must also the question of political rights, pending the adoption of a convention on political rights. The Commission adopted a programme of priorities for 1952-53 covering its whole agenda.

The Council, at its 579th plenary meeting on 26 May 1952 had before it a proposal by the USSR (E/L.322) that the Council should include as a first priority in its programme of work and that of the Commission for 1952-53 certain questions related to:

(1) participation by women in the fight for peace; (2) measures to promote the effective exercise by women of political rights; (3) measures to help eliminate discrimination against women in the economic field, in education, in access to medical services and other benefits; and (4) measures for improving the status of women in Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories.

Some members, among them the representatives of Egypt, the United States and Uruguay, however, pointed out that these questions were already receiving the attention of the Commission or were within the competence of other organs of the United Nations. The Council by 9 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions, adopted an oral proposal by the United Kingdom to take no action on the USSR draft resolution.

Following a review of the organization of the Economic and Social Council and its Commissions, the General Assembly (532 A (VI)) had requested the Council to reconsider its decision with a view to convening the Commission on the Status of Women for one session every year rather than every two years.

The Commission, at its sixth session, asked the Council to take into consideration the considerable extension of the scope of its activity and its increased responsibilities, and to allocate a longer time to its future sessions.

The Council at its fourteenth session had before it a draft resolution by Cuba (E/L.335) which would have the Council resolve to convene the Commission for one session every year. It adopted this proposal at its 579th plenary meeting on 26 May 1952, by 15 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 445 I (XIV).

The Council also decided to allow three weeks for the Commission's seventh session.

N. REFUGEES AND STATELESS PERSONS

1. Assistance to Refugees

a. REPORT OF THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION (IRO)

The Economic and Social Council at its fourteenth session considered the fourth and final report of the International Refugee Organization (E/2211) at its 632nd to 634th plenary meetings on 7 and 8 July 1952. The report was designed to summarize the results since the passage of resolution 62(I) by the General Assembly and to bring up to date previous reports by describing the work done from 1 January 1951 until the time the organization entered its period of liquidation on 1 March 1951.¹³³

Under the terms of General Assembly resolution 62(I) the main task of IRO had been first, to encourage and assist displaced persons to return to their country of origin; and secondly to see to it that "no refugees or displaced persons who had finally and definitely . . . expressed valid objections to returning to their countries of origin" were compelled to return there.

¹³² U.N.P., Sales No.: 1951. IV. 8.

¹³³ For an account of the work of IRO during its final period, see also Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 939-42.

Ninety per cent of the refugees registered with IRO during its period of operation had been assisted in repatriation or resettlement or had their cases otherwise closed. During the period from 1 July 1947 to 31 December 1951, the report stated, more than one million persons had been resettled in new countries and 73,000 had been repatriated to their country of origin or former domicile; the number of persons dependent on IRO for food and shelter had been reduced from 712,000 to 25,000 and a quarter of the persons remaining at the close of operations were considered to have good chances of resettlement.

The following countries had accepted more than 1,000 refugees during the life of the organization:

United States	328,851
Australia	182,159
Israel	132,109
Canada	123,479
United Kingdom	86,346
France	38,455
Argentina	32,712
Brazil	28,848
Belgium	22,477
Venezuela	17,277
Paraguay	5,887
Chile	5,108
New Zealand	4,837
Netherlands	4,355
Sweden	4,330
Bolivia	2,485
Turkey	2,358
Peru	2,340
Uruguay	1,461
French Morocco	1,446
Norway	1,105

In discussing the report, the representatives of Argentina, Belgium, Canada, China, France, Pakistan, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States paid warm tribute to IRO for its remarkable achievement in a great humanitarian undertaking, pointing out, in some cases, the contributions and support given by their Governments. The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR, however, were of the opinion that IRO had not fulfilled the terms of its mandate and had, in effect, hindered repatriation of certain nationals. They also thought that IRO had given a distorted account of the conditions awaiting refugees in certain countries of immigration and that many refugees had found themselves in great privation and distress in their new homes. The representative of the USSR called on the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France to carry out their obligation to return refugees and displaced persons to their countries of origin.

The Egyptian representative regretted that IRO's activities with regard to Palestine should have marred an otherwise fine record. Either the agency itself or some of its personnel had made possible the clandestine entry of certain elements into Palestine, he charged. He stated that he would therefore abstain on the draft resolution, proposed by Belgium and France (E/L.395), paying tribute to the achievements of IRO.

The Council, at its 634th plenary meeting on 8 July, by 14 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, adopted this resolution noting with satisfaction the report of IRO and paid tribute to the organization's achievements (resolution 438 (XIV)).

b. REPORT OF THE UNITED NATIONS HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR REFUGEES TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to the General Assembly (A/2126), covering the period from June 1951 to May 1952, dealt with the activities of the High Commissioner's Office, the refugee situation in various countries and the United Nations Refugee Emergency Fund. In the High Commissioner's view a three-point programme was necessary; first, emergency aid for the most needy groups of refugees; secondly, long-term plans of economic development to promote the assimilation of refugees; and thirdly, measures to ensure that refugees received a fair share of migration opportunities. The High Commissioner expressed concern at the continuation of certain emergency situations and at the duplication of work of agencies dealing with the refugee problem. While a beginning had been made with emergency aid, he urged increased response to his appeals for funds and hoped that Members of the United Nations in a position to contribute to a permanent solution of the refugee problem would take appropriate action.

The report also described the work of the High Commissioner's branch offices.¹³⁴ In emphasizing the importance of liaison between his office and international bodies and voluntary organizations, the High Commissioner reported that in many countries where branch offices had been established, efforts were being made to co-ordinate the activities of voluntary agencies, bringing them into closer relationship with the governments concerned.

In reviewing the situation in countries where refugees' needs remain urgent, the High Commissioner drew particular attention to Western Germany, where the refugees within his mandate were at a disadvantage because of the large number of refugees of German nationality. In Austria the problem was so grave that, in spite of the many obstacles to be overcome, integration of the refugees into the life and economy of that country seemed to be the only solution. In certain countries of asylum, the local situation appeared to rule out integration and thus, in Italy, the Free Territory of Trieste, Greece, the Near East, Shanghai and Hong Kong, the best solution for these refugees was resettlement elsewhere.

The High Commissioner also reported on the United Nations Refugee Emergency Fund (UN-REF) established in accordance with General Assembly resolution 538 B (VI) which authorized the High Commissioner, under the Statute of his Office, to issue an appeal for funds to provide emergency aid to the most needy groups of refugees within his mandate. These groups of refugees, which included those in the Far East not resettled by IRO, newly arrived refugees whose basic needs were not provided for by public relief, and the old, sick, handicapped and children among residual groups of IRO refugees, required aid, according to the High Commissioner's estimate, amounting to $3 million during 1952. He reported that, as of 5 May 1952, contributions and pledges totalled $308,801.26, including contributions of $235,395 from inter-governmental organizations and pledges of $69,284 from governments.¹³⁵

(1) Consideration by the Economic and Social Council at its Fourteenth Session

The Council had this report of the High Commissioner before it at its 632nd to 634th plenary meetings on 7 and 8 July 1952. It also had before it a note by the Secretary-General (E/2283) on the composition of the High Commissioner's Advisory Committee for Refugees. The Secretary-General pointed out that he had not received any suggestions from Member and non-member States concerning the review of the composition¹³⁶ of the Committee which the Council had planned (resolution 393 B (XIII)) to undertake at the current session.

During the discussion the majority of members congratulated the High Commissioner on the progress made in the establishment of his Office and supported the draft resolution by Sweden and the United Kingdom (E/L.399) which would note his report with appreciation. The representative of Pakistan, pointing to the large-scale influx of refugees into Pakistan, expressed regret that the terms of the High Commissioner's mandate precluded him from rendering assistance to such groups. The representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) stressed the need for funds for both the emergency and long-term aspects of the refugee problem.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR considered that the activities of the High Commissioner's Office were in direct contradiction with the purposes and principles of the Charter. The High Commissioner, the USSR representative charged, was recruiting displaced persons into veritable foreign legions which were sent to Korea and Vietnam to quell peoples fighting for national independence.

The representatives of Belgium, China, France and the United States expressed the opinion that the High Commissioner should make more frequent use of the Advisory Committee through which he could secure the co-operation of governments. The representative of the High Commissioner's Office assured the Council that the High Commissioner agreed with this policy. Since the Committee's first session had been devoted to organizational work, he urged, as suggested by the United States representative, that the Council give the Committee more time before passing judgment on its effectiveness. The Council subsequently decided to note the Secretary-General's memorandum on the composition of the Committee without taking further action.

By 15 votes to 3, it took note with appreciation of the High Commissioner's report (resolution 437 (XIV)).

(2) Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

The General Assembly considered the High Commissioner's report at the 470th to 473rd meetings of its Third Committee on 9, 10 and 11 December and at its 408th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952.

The High Commissioner, in his statement to the Third Committee, reiterated that there were three possible solutions to the refugee problem: voluntary repatriation, resettlement in new countries, or assimilation in the country of present residence. From the point of view of the refugees themselves, he stated, migration was probably the most desirable solution. However, existing possibilities for migration were extremely limited and assimilation of refugees had, therefore, become increasingly important as a solution. Such assimilation was the task of the voluntary agencies, churches and private individuals in the country concerned; it was not within the competence of an international body which could do no more than try to promote the creation of favourable economic and social conditions. His Office had no operational task in the assimilation process and wanted none. It had confined itself to studies of the assimilation process in various countries. From such studies in Austria, Germany and Greece it was evident that the most important problem of integration was the extension of credit facilities. The International Bank had indicated its willingness to finance certain particular projects but it was unable, within the scope of its activities, to grant small loans to small private enterprises.

The High Commissioner noted that his appeal for emergency aid to the most needy refugees had been heeded by a number of governments and individuals, but the total contributions to the Refugee Emergency Fund had not exceeded $800,000 which was less than one third of the amount originally recognized as necessary. The situation in Shanghai, where the High Commissioner's Office was in full charge of refugees, would be particularly adversely affected since these funds would be exhausted by 1 October 1953. He therefore appealed to all governments and charitable institutions for new contributions to enable his Office to continue this programme. He also urged that Member States issue visas to these refugees, of whom only 429 out of 3,157 were "hard-core" cases. The majority, he pointed out, were ready and able to work. He asked the Assembly's guidance and particular attention with reference to the assistance fund, to the Shanghai operation and to the matter of financing integration of refugees.

During the discussion in the Committee, the majority praised the progress made in the organization of the High Commissioner's Office and the work which it was carrying out. The representatives of China and Turkey, respectively, expressed concern that the High Commissioner was not able to extend protection or render assistance to large groups of Chinese refugees in Hong Kong and to refugees who had fled from Bulgaria to Turkey. In Hong Kong there were more than 100,000 Chinese refugees who, in the opinion of the Chinese representative, seemed to fulfil the conditions of eligibility, but were receiving no aid from the United Nations. The question of their material assistance, the representative of China stated, was urgent. In Turkey, the representative of that country stated, there were some 154,000 refugees from Bulgaria of Turkish origin. His Government was not able to accept the conclusions of the High Commissioner and his Advisory Committee that since Turkey had given them citizenship they could no longer be regarded as refugees.

Most of the representatives favoured the appeal made by the High Commissioner for emergency funds for the most needy groups of refugees, although, in supporting the principle behind the appeal, they stressed that they could not commit their governments to contributions to the fund. The representatives of the Netherlands, Sweden and the United Kingdom, among others, regretted that governments had responded so poorly to the appeal.

Among others, the representatives of Argentina, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, France and New Zealand, while recognizing the financial problems involved, supported assimilation as the most likely solution under the circumstances. General support was also given to a proposal (see below) that the High Commissioner should consult with the International Bank as to possible sources of funds. The representative of Denmark, among others, expressed appreciation of the $2,900,000 donation of the Ford Foundation. But, the Danish representative pointed out, it should be noted that the grant was a contribution to the permanent solution of the problem and not to be used for immediate aid. Therefore, it had nothing to do with the emergency fund which the High Commissioner was trying to build up.

The representatives of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom hoped that refugees would receive a fair share of the migration opportunities. The desirability of co-ordinating all refugee programmes was stressed by many representatives. The United Kingdom representative suggested that the governments concerned might work out practical plans, preferably small at first, for integrating groups of refugees and submit these plans to international organizations.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR felt that repatriation was the only satisfactory solution of the refugee problem and expressed their dissatisfaction with the methods used by the High Commissioner in carrying out his functions.

The Committee had before it a joint draft resolution of Colombia, Denmark, France and the Netherlands (A/C.3/L.322) which, inter alia, would invite the High Commissioner, in consultation with the International Bank, to examine the situation with a view to exploring what sources of funds might be available for the successful execution of long-term projects for the assimilation of refugees and the most effective means by which such funds might be utilized.

The sponsors accepted a United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/L.324) which was designed to ensure that governments directly concerned with the refugee problem should be closely associated with all practical schemes for its solution.

The draft resolution, as thus revised (A/C.3/L.322/rev.1), was adopted by the Third Committee (A/2328 A) at its 473rd meeting on 11 December by 33 votes to 5, with 13 abstentions. The General Assembly at its 408th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952 adopted it, without discussion, by 38 votes to 5, with 12 abstentions, as resolution 638 (VII). (For text, see below).

The Third Committee also had before it a draft resolution by Colombia, Denmark, France and the Netherlands (A/C.3/L.323) which, inter alia, expressed the hope that further contributions would be forthcoming so as to enable the High Commissioner to carry out his plans of assistance to the most needy groups of refugees, and reiterated the Assembly's appeal to all governments and agencies interested in migration to give to refugees under the mandate of the High Commissioner every possible opportunity in and benefit from projects to promote migration, including such measures as would facilitate the transit and resettlement of refugees.

The representative of China objected to the words in the preamble (paragraph 2, see below) which would single out, for particular mention, the refugee group in Shanghai. He thought the groups in Hong Kong and Samar also deserved special attention and to mention the Shanghai group to the exclusion of the other two would be improper.

The words "particularly in Shanghai" were therefore voted on at the Committee's 473rd meeting and retained by 15 votes to 1, with 35 abstentions.

At the request of the representative of Canada, a separate vote was also taken on the paragraph expressing hope for further contributions, and it was adopted by 26 votes to 5, with 19 abstentions.

The sponsors of the draft resolution accepted an amendment by Sweden (A/C.3/L.325) to the last paragraph to replace the words "and agencies" by the words "specialized agencies and other inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations", and the words "transit, resettlement of refugees" by the words "transit, resettlement and employment of refugees in occupations suitable to their training and skills."

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Committee (A/2328 B) at its 473rd meeting on 11 December by 35 votes to 5, with 11 abstentions. The General Assembly at its 408th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952 adopted it, without discussion, by 36 votes to 5, with 12 abstentions, as resolution 639 (VII).

Two resolutions were thus adopted by the Assembly. Resolution 638 (VII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Taking note of the observations and information contained in the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees on the problem of assimilation of refugees in the countries of their residence,

"Considering that the voluntary repatriation or the resettlement in countries of immigration of refugees under the mandate of the High Commissioner, while constituting valuable elements for the solution of the refugee problem, are not sufficient in themselves under the present conditions to offer within a reasonable time a permanent solution of that problem,

"Noting with satisfaction the efforts made by the governments of the countries of present residence of refugees towards their assimilation, as well as the studies and plans of the High Commissioner directed towards the same objective,

"Considering that, in view of the heavy financial burdens involved in the execution of integration programmes, international funds may play a useful role in the successful execution of long-term projects for the assimilation of refugees,

"Invites the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, in consultation with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, to examine the situation with a view to exploring, with the governments directly concerned, what sources of funds might be available and the most effective means by which such funds might be utilized."

Resolution 639 (VII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Concerned with the persistence of a serious refugee problem which is the direct responsibility of the United Nations,

"1. Notes with appreciation the second annual report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees;

"2. Takes note of the fact that contributions thus far received by the High Commissioner for assistance to refugees under the authority given to him by General Assembly resolution 538 B (VI) of 2 February 1952 will not be sufficient to provide in 1953 for emergency aid to the most needy groups of refugees under his mandate in Europe, the Near East and the Far East, particularly in Shanghai;

"3. Notes with appreciation the contributions already made by governments, organizations and private individuals to the fund for emergency aid to refugees;

"4. Expresses the hope that further contributions will be forthcoming to that fund so as to enable the High Commissioner to carry out his plans of assistance to the most needy groups of refugees;

"5. Reiterates its appeal to all governments, specialized agencies and other inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations interested in migration to give to refugees under the mandate of the High Commissioner every possible opportunity in and benefit from projects to promote migration, including such measures as will facilitate the transit, resettlement and employment of refugees in occupations suitable to their training and skills."

c. WORK OF THE OFFICE OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONER

(1) Organization and Operation of the Office

The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees was established on 1 January 1951 in Geneva, Switzerland, following the adoption by the General Assembly on 14 December 1950 of the Statute of the Office.¹³⁷ The Assembly on the same day appointed G. J. Van Heuven Goedhart (Netherlands) as High Commissioner for a term of three years from 1 January 1951. The High Commissioner subsequently appointed James M. Read (United States) as Deputy High Commissioner for the same term of office.

At the High Commissioner's request, and in accordance with the terms of the Statute, the Economic and Social Council established the United Nations High Commissioner's Advisory Committee on Refugees to advise him, at his request, in the exercise of his functions.¹³⁸ The first session of the Advisory Committee was held in December 1951, the second in September 1952.

After consultation with the governments concerned, as provided for in the Statute of his Office, and in order to strengthen relations with the authorities of the countries of residence of refugees, non-governmental agencies dealing with refugees and the refugees themselves, the High Commissioner established branch offices in Austria, Belgium (for the Benelux countries), Colombia (for Latin America), the Federal Republic of Germany, England (for the United Kingdom and British Commonwealth), France, Greece, Italy and the United States. In addition, the High Commissioner, together with the Inter-Governmental Committee for European Migration,¹³⁹ appointed a joint representative in Hong Kong to continue the operation begun by IRO for the care and maintenance and the resettlement of European refugees from China.

The administrative expenses of the Office of the UNHCR are financed under the regular budget of the United Nations; all other expenditures are financed by voluntary contributions.

The High Commissioner reports annually to the General Assembly through the Economic and Social Council. He is entitled to present his views before the Assembly and the Council, and follows policy directions given to him by either of these United Nations organs.

Approximately two million refugees are presumed to come within the High Commissioner's mandate (chapter II of the Statute), which extends generally to all persons who were considered refugees under the Constitution of IRO and to all refugees who, because of a well-founded fear of persecution, cannot avail themselves of the protection of their country of nationality. Certain categories of persons are excluded, such as those who are recognized by the competent authorities of the country in which they reside as having the rights and obligations which are attached to the possession of the nationality of the country, or those who continue to receive from other organs or agencies of the United Nations protection or assistance.

According to the Statute of the Office (UNHCR), the High Commissioner:

"... shall assume the function of providing international protection, under the auspices of the United Nations, to refugees who fall within the scope of the ... Statute and of seeking permanent solutions for the problem of refugees by assisting Governments and, subject to the approval of the Governments concerned, private organizations to facilitate the voluntary repatriation of such refugees, or their assimilation within new national communities."

The method by which the High Commissioner shall provide international protection is defined in article 8 of the Statute,¹⁴⁰ as follows:

"The High Commissioner shall provide for the protection of refugees falling under the competence of his Office by:

"(a) Promoting the conclusion and ratification of international conventions for the protection of refugees, supervising their application and proposing amendments thereto;

"(b) Promoting through special agreements with governments the execution of any measures calculated to improve the situation of refugees and to reduce the number requiring protection;

¹³⁸ For members of the Committee, see p. 136.

¹³⁹ This Committee, formerly the Provisional Inter-Governmental Committee for the Movement of Migrants from Europe, is not a United Nations body. It was established in November 1951 with the following members: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Denmark, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Switzerland, United States and Venezuela.

"(c) Assisting governmental and private efforts to promote voluntary repatriation or assimilation within new national communities;

"(d) Promoting the admission of refugees, not excluding those in the most destitute categories, to the territories of States;

"(e) Endeavouring to obtain permission for refugees to transfer their assets and especially those necessary for their resettlement;

"(f) Obtaining from governments information concerning the number and conditions of refugees in their territories and the laws and regulations concerning them;

"(g) Keeping in close touch with the governments and inter-governmental organizations concerned;

"(h) Establishing contact in such manner as he may think best with private organizations dealing with refugee questions;

"(i) Facilitating the co-ordination of the efforts of private organizations concerned with the welfare of refugees."

(2) Activities during 1951-1952

(a) GENERAL INTERNATIONAL PROTECTION

The Office of the High Commissioner was established by the General Assembly at a time when IRO was still continuing its operations. As IRO had missions in a number of countries and was undertaking extensive work for the protection of individual refugees, an arrangement was made with the Director-General of IRO during January 1951, under which it was agreed that the responsibility for the general work of protection relating as a rule to groups and categories of refugees should pass immediately to UNHCR, while the work of protection relating to individual refugees within the IRO mandate would be continued for the time being by IRO.

As UNHCR branch offices were progressively established in agreement with the governments concerned, arrangements were made with IRO for the transfer to UNHCR of certain additional functions of protection which it was understood would cease to be discharged by IRO after 1 October 1951. These primarily were:

1. Supervision of conditions in institutions in which institutional hard-core cases had been placed under agreement with the relevant authorities;
2. Supervision of the local settlement of those refugees who had been unable to emigrate;
3. Control of the implementation of the conditions of guardianship for unaccompanied children;
4. Legal protection of refugees.

(b) PROMOTION OF LEGAL INSTRUMENTS

The general work of UNHCR in the field of legal protection during 1951-52 was chiefly related to the negotiation and entry into force of the United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees¹⁴¹ which had been opened for signature on 28 July 1951. The convention will come into force 90 days after the deposit of the sixth ratification or accession. Up to 31 December 1952 the convention had been signed by twenty States but ratified only by Denmark, although a number of States had signified their intention to ratify it in the near future. The twenty States which have signed the convention are: Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Colombia, Denmark, Federal Republic of Germany, France, Greece, Holy See, Israel, Italy, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, United Kingdom and Yugoslavia.

In some countries, however, UNHCR was able to influence the legislation affecting the interests of refugees in such a way as to bring it into line with the provisions of the convention although that instrument had not yet entered into force.

With a view to safeguarding the interests of refugees within the mandate of UNHCR close liaison was maintained with the Commission on Human Rights, the International Law Commission, the International Labour Organisation, the World Health Organization, the Inter-Governmental Committee for European Migration, the Council of Europe and other international and intergovernmental agencies. The Office of the High Commissioner was particularly concerned with proceedings connected with:

- (1) the Protocol to the Universal Copyright Convention which provides for the assimilation of stateless persons and refugees who have their habitual residence in a State party to the Protocol to nationals of that State;
- (2) Protocols adopted by the committee of the Council of Europe, the provisions of which enable refugees to benefit by social security and medical assistance schemes;
- (3) the Convention on Declaration of Death of Missing Persons; and
- (4) the drafting of a model convention on the question of the Recognition and Enforcement Abroad of Maintenance Obligations (see A/AC.36/23).

(c) VOLUNTARY REPATRIATION

The High Commissioner undertook various measures within his competence to facilitate the voluntary repatriation of refugees. Wherever possible, representations were made to the competent authorities with a view to ensuring that information concerning conditions of repatriation was made available to refugees.

(d) ASSIMILATION

In Germany, Austria and Greece UNHCR attempted, in accordance with the terms of articles 1 and 8 of the Statute and of General Assembly resolution 538 B (VI), to promote the assimilation of refugees into the national communities. It was estimated that the problem was urgent for some 350,000 refugees, of whom approximately 100,000 were in Germany, 200,000 in Austria and 8,000 in Greece.

In Germany, following negotiations with the Federal Government, UNHCR made a contribution of 2 million DM¹⁴² to increase the capital of the Displaced Persons Branch of the Expellee Bank, which had been started by IRO with a contribution of 1,500,000 DM and had been augmented by grants of some 3,500,000 DM from the residual assets of IRO.

The Federal Government, which had contributed towards providing approximately 7,000 houses for foreign refugees in Germany, also set aside a special fund of 2 million DM to finance the further construction of houses.

In Austria a limited integration programme in the field of agriculture was begun by the Austrian Government, in consultation with members of the High Commissioner's Office, through the release of 10 million schillings from United States counterpart funds.

The High Commissioner, as administrator of the $2,900,000 grant from the Ford Foundation, supported a number of activities designed to promote the social integration of refugees in Austria, France, Germany, Scandinavia, Trieste and Latin America which were undertaken by voluntary agencies in the field.

(e) PROMOTION OF ADMISSION

Although the High Commissioner cannot engage in any direct operations of resettlement without the specific approval of the General Assembly, he is charged (paragraph 8(d) of the Statute) with promoting the admission of refugees to the territories of States. The Office, therefore, made several appeals to governments to be as liberal as possible in the admission of refugees, especially those of European origin in China, and in favour of those refugees with professional qualifications who normally do not qualify under the schemes for the recruitment of manual labour. It also, with the help of dossiers taken over from IRO, worked with the voluntary agencies to try to obtain resettlement opportunities for refugees with special qualifications. In addition, UNHCR representatives in the United States and in Latin America, when called upon, advised the competent authorities on the refugee aspects of immigration legislation.

Close liaison was established with the secretariat of the Inter-Governmental Committee for European Migration and also with the headquarters of the United States Escapee Programme working in Frankfurt. Liaison was also established between the respective representatives in all the countries where these organizations were represented. In Greece the UNHCR Branch Office was concerned with arrangements for the selection and resettlement in France of up to 200 agricultural workers from the refugees residing in Greece.

(f) TRAVEL DOCUMENTS

Since the establishment of the Office of the High Commissioner, the German Federal Republic has become a party to the London Agreement of 1946 and the Government of Brazil, which had signed the Agreement earlier, has deposited its instrument of ratification. For refugees in Trieste, an agreement was reached with the Italian authorities providing for the issue of London Travel Documents by the Italian Ministry of the Interior. In Hong Kong arrangements were made with the authorities under which refugees who were temporarily admitted to Hong Kong from China and who held end destination visas might also be given the London Travel Document.

(g) INSTITUTIONAL CARE

Under article 8 of the Statute, UNHCR took over the supervision of all agreements relating to refugees requiring institutional care. Periodic visits were made by UNHCR representatives to institutions where such cases had been placed in the countries in which they were accredited.

In October 1952 an allocation from the Ford Foundation grant was made to the American Joint Distribution Committee for the resettlement in Norway and Sweden of 87 tuberculosis patients and dependents. A grant was also made from the United Nations Refugee Emergency Fund to the World Council of Churches to place in institutions in Belgium refugees from China requiring institutional care. UNHCR also took steps to help find a solution for the difficult tuberculosis cases in Trieste.

(b) INFORMATION AND LIAISON WITH GOVERNMENTS

In all countries where large numbers of refugees were resident, the branch offices obtained from governments information concerning the number and conditions of refugees and of the laws and regulations concerning them. Requests were addressed by the High Commissioner in 1951 to governments asking them to supply UNHCR once a year with statistics concerning the number of refugees admitted, the demographic breakdown of refugees and the progress of naturalization. A number of governments met this request in 1952 and also the request to send to UNHCR, as they appeared, copies of laws, decrees or regulations affecting refugees.

(i) RELATIONS WITH VOLUNTARY AGENCIES

Under the Statute, the High Commissioner's Office was given the responsibility for maintaining contact and facilitating the co-operation of private organizations concerned with the welfare of refugees. Through its activities, both at its headquarters in Geneva and at branch offices, an informal relationship was established with the lead-agencies working internationally. Several agreements were entered into, enabling the High Commissioner to bring cases of individual assistance to the attention of these agencies.

(j) WORK OF THE BRANCH OFFICES

During 1951 and 1952 representations were made by each of the Branch Offices to the competent authorities to ensure that the standards set by the Convention of 1951 should be implemented in practice pending its entry into force. These representations covered matters such as the determination of refugee status, the regularization of residence, the exercise of the right to work, public relief, travel documents, authentication of documentation, personal status, public assistance and social security. Following is an outline of certain special features of the work of protection in some of the countries where UNHCR is represented.

WESTERN EUROPE

Belgium—At the request of the Government, the branch office took over functions previously exercised by the representatives of former international organizations and was responsible for the determination of the eligibility of individual refugees. The office also continued the work formerly performed by the field mission of IRO, under which documents issued to refugees by the offices for Russian and Armenian refugees and authenticated by the UNHCR representative are recognized in Belgium as official documents in accordance with the Agreement of 30 June 1928. The Law of 28 March 1952 concerning the Aliens Police formed the subject of close consultation between the Belgian Authorities and UNHCR. The Law provides for special safeguards against the expulsion of persons recognized as refugees. At the request of UNHCR the Belgian Authorities agreed to remove the words "must emigrate" from the residence permits of certain refugees.

France—The UNHCR Representative became a member of the governing body of the French

Office for the Protection of Refugees and Stateless Persons, created by the Law of 25 July 1952. Under the terms of the Law, the Office co-operates with UNHCR in the supervision of the implementation of all agreements concerning refugees, and determines the refugee status of persons coming within the mandate of UNHCR or within the scope of article 1 of the Convention of 1951.

Italy—On 2 April 1952, an agreement was negotiated between the Italian Government and UNHCR for the establishment of a branch office in Rome. It provided that UNHCR, at the request of the Italian Government, would co-operate in the determination of eligibility and issuance of documentation to refugees. A subsequent arrangement (see A/AC.36/23) to implement the agreement was negotiated in July 1952.

Luxembourg—At the Government's request, a UNHCR representative was appointed to be responsible for liaison between the Government of Luxembourg and UNHCR through the branch office in Brussels. The representative continued the functions in respect of refugee status formerly performed by IRO. The Government of Luxembourg, in its Draft Law of August 1952, enacting the ratification of the Convention of 1951, undertook to respect in practice the determination of refugee status made by IRO and UNHCR.

Netherlands—The UNHCR representative in The Hague was especially concerned with the problem of regularization of the status of illegal entrants into the Netherlands. After discussions in the Netherlands Parliament, the Government undertook to review the existing regulations.

United Kingdom—Protection in the United Kingdom consisted mostly of advice and guidance to refugees, many of whom spoke little English. The branch office also gave advice in a number of legal questions concerning refugees, especially refugee seamen, whose problems were often extremely complicated.

CENTRAL EUROPE

Germany—The UNHCR branch office, established in September 1951, entered into direct relations with the Federal Government. At the request of the branch office, a circular was issued by the Ministry of the Interior in June 1951 to the effect that the definition of the Law concerning the Status of Homeless Foreigners applied to refugees within the competence of UNHCR who satisfied the "residence" qualification.

In order to provide satisfactory documentation for refugees within the UNHCR mandate, the branch office in Germany requested, and the Federal Government agreed, that the London Travel Document (and, after the entry into force of the 1951 Convention, the travel document provided for in that Convention) would be issued to all refugees within the UNHCR mandate.

The branch office in Germany drew the attention of the competent Laender Authorities to the federal provisions concerning the legal status of refugees and worked to ensure their implementation in the Laender. In conjunction with the Federal Ministry for Refugees it composed a handbook for refugees containing all the necessary information concerning relevant legislation and existing organizations working on behalf of refugees and, in addition, circulated a monthly bulletin containing up-to-date information concerning new legislation and regulations affecting refugees.

UNHCR was made a "necessary party in interest" in the United States Courts in Germany under Law 11 of the United States High Commissioner for Germany concerning unaccompanied children, and was concerned with problems arising out of the compensation for damages suffered under the Nazi regime, both in helping individual refugees to obtain satisfaction for their claims and in advising the competent German authorities on the special problems affecting refugees within the High Commissioner's mandate.

As a result of the efforts of the branch office, joint Refugee Councils (Beiräte), consisting of the representatives of the German Authorities, of the refugees and sometimes of the voluntary agencies, exist in most of the Laender.

The objective of the work of the branch office in Vienna in the field of protection was to take every step within its competence, in agreement with the Allied and the Austrian Authorities, to help the refugees in Austria overcome their legal disabilities, to regularize their personal status and to facilitate their assimilation in the Austrian community.

In contrast with the position of the foreign refugees, considerable progress was made in connexion with the improvement of the legal position of the Volksdeutsche who, for the first time, have been recognized to be within the mandate of an international organization. The Allied Authorities, the branch office and the Volksdeutsche Refugee Advisory Council followed closely the various legislative steps taken to improve the legal position of the refugees. Particular attention was given to the question of aged and indigent Volksdeutsche refugees, and the payment of pensions. The UNHCR was represented on the land committees in the Laender of the three

Western Zones of Austria and on the Federal Committee.

Public campaigns were launched in the Netherlands and Norway, but the full results had not been announced by the end of the year. Some contributions were also received as a result of private campaigns in Australia and New Zealand. Preparations were made for an appeal in Belgium to take place early in 1953, and other governments were approached on the subject of public campaigns in their countries.

By 31 December 1952 a large proportion of the funds received had been allocated, the greater part (approximately $500,000) having been earmarked for material assistance to European refugees in China who, without this help, would find themselves in a desperate situation. The number of these refugees prima facie who come within the High Commissioner's mandate was assessed to be approximately 12,000. The grants made to voluntary agencies for assistance programmes in Europe and the Middle East were as follows:

2. Problem of Statelessness

a. REPORT BY THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

In resolution 319 B. III(XI) and 352 (XII) the Economic and Social Council had invited governments to submit observations on questions concerning the elimination of statelessness and to include in their replies not only an analysis of legal and administrative texts and regulations but also of their practical application. The Secretary-General, therefore, prepared a consolidated report (E/2230 and Add.1) analysing, in Part I, the information supplied by governments. Part II of the report, for the convenience of the Council and the International Law Commission, restated in a systematic but shortened form the main facts set out in Part I and gave a general view of the positions of governments as indicated in the information.

The Secretary-General's report was transmitted, as requested, to the Council at its fourteenth session¹⁴³ and to the International Law Commission at its fourth session.¹⁴⁴

b. DRAFT PROTOCOL RELATING TO THE STATUS OF STATELESS PERSONS

The General Assembly considered this item during its seventh session at the 420th and 421st meetings of its Third Committee on 21 and 22 October and at its 391st plenary meeting on 6 November 1952.

Several representatives, among them those of Argentina, Canada, France, Israel and the United Kingdom, expressed the view that the situation of stateless persons should be improved and that the proposed protocol might be a useful basis for the attainment of that objective. They held, however, that there would be little purpose in the General Assembly completing the drafting of the protocol at the current session because the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees, to which the protocol related, though signed by twenty States, had not yet been ratified and had not entered into force. It would be more realistic, they thought, to postpone the adoption of the draft protocol until this convention had entered into force and until the attitude of governments towards it had become clearer, as well as the extent to which the latter would be prepared to apply the provisions of the convention to the various categories of stateless persons who were not refugees. The representative of Canada pointed out that the International Law Commission was studying the question of nationality including statelessness, although from a different angle and that it would be desirable to wait for the completion of that Commission's work. Several representatives, among them those of Argentina, the Union of South Africa and the United States, pointed out that, as far as their countries were concerned, there was no need for the adoption of a protocol on the protection of stateless persons because they treated stateless persons on the same footing as other aliens, but that they would not oppose procedural decisions providing for continuation of the work concerning the protocol.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia and the USSR held that the subject matter of the draft protocol came within the domestic jurisdiction of States and was, therefore, not a proper subject for United Nations activities. Moreover, they said, they were opposed to the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, which legalized an irregular position and defeated the purpose of General Assembly resolution 8(I) of 12 February 1946 providing for the early return of displaced persons to their countries of origin.

At the Committee's 421st meeting on 22 October, the representatives of France, Israel and the United Kingdom submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.248/Rev.1) which was adopted (A/2240) by 34 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions. It was adopted, without discussion, by the Assembly at its 391st plenary meeting on 6 November by 43 votes to 5, with 8 abstentions, as resolution 629(VII).

It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Desiring to improve the situation of stateless persons as soon as possible,

"Considering that the draft protocol prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee on Statelessness and Related Problems established by the Economic and Social Council offers a useful basis for the attainment of this objective,

"1. Requests the Secretary-General to communicate the provisions of the draft protocol to all the governments invited to the United Nations Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Status of Refugees and Stateless Persons held at Geneva in July 1951, with a request for their comments, in particular on those provisions of the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees which they would be prepared to apply to the various categories of stateless persons, and to submit these comments, with his observations, to the Economic and Social Council;

"2. Requests the Economic and Social Council to study, if possible at its sixteenth session, the text of the draft protocol and the comments received from interested governments and, in the light of these comments, to take whatever action seems useful in order that a text may be opened for signature after the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees has entered into force."

O. SOCIAL WELFARE

1. World Social Situation

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE SOCIAL COMMISSION AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The Social Commission at its eighth session held from 12 to 29 May 1952, had before it the Preliminary Report on the World Social Situation (E/CN.5/267 and Rev.1),¹⁴⁵ prepared by the Secretary-General, with the co-operation of ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO. The report examined the world social situation with particular reference to standards of living, making no attempt to analyse the diverse social structures, religions, systems of belief, culture patterns and values except in so far as they had a bearing upon standards of living. Human rights, crime and delinquency, narcotics addiction and similar problems, which may be regarded as closely related to standards of living in the broadest sense, were not included because of lack of facilities to obtain data. Following an introductory chapter and a background chapter on population, the report dealt with health, food and nutrition, housing, education and communication, conditions of work and employment, special problems affecting living standards, and general levels of income and welfare. The report concluded with an examination of these factors in the context of living conditions in Latin America, the Middle East, and South and Southeast Asia.

The report stressed that the greatest obstacles to social progress—disease, ignorance and poverty—had perpetuated themselves throughout history, each being, in part, both cause and consequence of the others. It indicated, however, that there was growing recognition that the general impoverishment of any area was a matter of concern to all areas and that national and international action to combat these social ills was advancing. For example, the general advance in mass measures against disease, it said, had been substantial in recent years, with death rates in some of the less developed areas dropping as much as 50 per cent within a few years. Nevertheless, millions of human beings were still ravaged by diseases readily amenable to control—diseases that caused not only untold misery but also immense economic loss. The report stated further that, with regard to illiteracy and ignorance, though some notable recent advances had been made in the less developed countries, the obstacles and deterrents were still great.

Against poverty the advance had been uneven, and generally least impressive where economic want was greatest. It pointed out that the world had made tremendous though unequal strides in recent times in the industrial production of goods, but that the production of food, which constituted the occupation of the majority of the people in the less developed areas, was no greater per capita in the world as a whole than before the Second World War, and in the less developed areas it was significantly less, owing to population increases, war devastation, political disturbances and other factors. The gap between the rich and the poor countries in general levels of production and consumption was, it said, wider now than before the war.

From the point of view of the distribution within countries of the goods produced, a certain levelling process appeared to be under way in countries with relatively high and expanding national incomes, the poorer groups receiving a larger share of the total income, wage differenrials between occupational groups narrowing, and progressive labour legislation and systems of social security not only defining minimum levels of welfare but progressively defining these levels upward.

In the less developed countries, the report disclosed, some recent improvements had taken place in the fields of large-scale industrial labour and plantation labour. Yet in so far as the great masses of the people were concerned—constituting as they did mostly illiterate peasants engaged in small-scale farming with primitive techniques—general poverty had not been substantially reduced in recent years and in wide areas had possibly been aggravated as a result of declines in per capita agricultural production.

The report drew attention to the fact that some of the most urgent social problems and needs of the present day were associated with the very process of change and development. Drastic reductions in mortality rates were being effected in some of the less developed areas. At the same time birth rates continued at high levels and it seemed unlikely that they would decline significantly in the near future. The result was a rapid acceleration in population growth. The swift population increase, combined with the effects of war and economic stress, had caused a deterioration of the housing situation in many parts of the world, and particularly in less developed areas which lacked economic and technical resources to cope with the problem. Congestion and slum conditions characterized many cities that had undergone extraordinary expansion during the past decade or so, chiefly as a result of migration from the country. Such cities in many of the less developed countries now contained large floating populations of unskilled workers of peasant origin, beset by many problems and needs. This situation, together with under-employment found very extensively among the rural peasantry, constituted a tremendous waste of potentially productive manpower.

The report finally stated that more than half the population of the world was still living at levels which denied them a reasonable freedom from preventable disease, a diet adequate to physical well-being, a dwelling that met basic human needs, the education necessary for improvement and development, and conditions of work that were technically efficient, economically rewarding and socially satisfactory.

The Social Commission decided (E/2247) that the report had not been received sufficiently in advance of the meeting to permit the detailed examination and formulation of specific recommendations to the Council as called for by the Assembly in resolution 535(VI).¹⁴⁶ It considered, nevertheless, that such a report should be drawn up every four years and that a supplementary one, relating to international and governmental programmes of social development, should also be prepared every four years by the Secretariat, two years after each report on the social situation had appeared. It was understood that the first edition of the supplementary report would emphasize governmental and inter-governmental programmes undertaken since 1945 but that programmes of voluntary agencies would be considered to the extent that governments reported on them. The Commission reserved for further consideration the question of other subjects to be treated in future reports and the methods which might enable the Secretariat to extend its documentary resources for the purpose of preparing such reports.

It requested permission to hold a special session in 1953 so that it might, among other things, work out a programme of practical action in the social field on the basis of a detailed study of the preliminary report.

The Commission also proposed that, since the United Nations and the International Labour Office were jointly planning a conference of experts in late 1952 or early 1953 to consider methods of studying family living standards in less developed areas, the conference might be expanded to cover the general field of methods of measuring standards of living internationally with special reference to less developed areas. The experts, it suggested, should be requested to prepare a report that would serve as a methodical basis of future studies of changes in standards of living.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FOURTEENTH SESSION

The Council, at its fourteenth session, considered the Preliminary Report on the World, Social Situation, together with the item "Development and concentration of the efforts in the social field of the United Nations and the specialized agencies," at the 223rd meeting of its Social Committee on 18 July and at its 641st to 646th and 659th to 661st plenary meetings from 14 to 16 July and from 25 to 28 July 1952.

During the debate most members expressed satisfaction with the report as a whole finding it a central contribution to the interrelated social and economic work of the Council. A number of representatives, among them those of Cuba, Mexico, Sweden and the United Kingdom, alluded to the close parallel existing between the problems set forth in the preliminary report on the world social situation and those dealt with in the world economic report. In the light of the world social report any division between "economic" and "social" matters would henceforth have to be regarded as merely reflecting two different ways of looking at one and the same thing. The representatives of Sweden and the United Kingdom placed particular stress on the importance of self-help techniques in promoting social and economic development, especially in the under-developed areas. The need for efficiently organized self-help activities, they considered, was perhaps the main lesson to be drawn from the report.

Among others, the representatives of Canada, Cuba, Egypt, Mexico, the United Kingdom and the United States held that the report was an effective, important document for which the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies should be commended. It permitted the Council to engage in a comprehensive review of world-wide social conditions and served as the starting point for the drawing up of a programme of practical social action for the United Nations, to be implemented in co-operation with specialized agencies.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR thought that the premises on which the report had been based were faulty. They contended that the report presented overpopulation as the reason for the critical social situation in the world to divert attention from the real causes. The rapid deterioration of social conditions in the capitalistic world and the low living standards in the less developed countries were due to the policy of rearmament and to the monopolistic exploitation of the under-developed countries, they said. The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) supported this view.

The representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) recognized the merits of the report in spite of the difficulty of assessing social data which varied more widely than economic data from one country to another.

The majority of the representatives, acknowledging that the report was a remarkable achievement, made suggestions for the preparation of future reports. The preliminary report was not a global, balanced discussion of the world social situation, but rather a series of papers on different aspects of the complex problem, seen from different viewpoints. The quality of the various chapters and the concepts of the task varied and showed the need for more co-ordination and central direction to achieve a unified approach. The general lack of information on social conditions for certain large areas of the world was noted by, among others, the representatives of Canada, Czechoslovakia, Pakistan, Poland, the United Kingdom and the United States, and the hope expressed that in future these gaps could be filled. The representatives of Argentina, Belgium and Sweden urged governments to improve their social statistics and to submit to the United Nations and the specialized agencies as much information as possible on their social conditions. In connexion with future reports, the representative of Belgium suggested that more attention should be given to non-governmental organizations since the social field was one in which they did their most effective work. The Egyptian representative hoped that future reports would include studies of other social factors such as crime and delinquency, alcoholism, and narcotics.

The discussion touched upon the advisability of including in future reports information on governmental programmes and plans to improve existing conditions. Some representatives, among them those of Egypt and Poland, held that it was academic to discuss conditions without dealing with government plans to improve them. The United Kingdom representative, among others, doubted the utility of reporting on programmes since they were not always facts.

In commenting on individual chapters, the representatives of Belgium and Poland drew attention to the one on health which they respectively thought lacked adequate treatment of the subject of preventive medicine, and sufficient attention to the system of public health protection in the socialized sector of the world.

With respect to the chapter on housing, the representative of Argentina thought that the report took a very restricted view of housing problems and failed to draw the necessary relationship between housing and the problem of town planning.

In connexion with the chapter on education, the Belgian representative expressed the view that a report of the type under discussion should not deal with the whole field of education but merely with the social aspects of the problem, such as technical and professional education and educational difficulties arising from lack of resources.

In reviewing the chapter on general levels of income and welfare, he further expressed regret that the report had not dealt in detail with the important question of social security, and that tables on the distribution of national income did not include information on under-developed countries. The latter point was also mentioned by the Polish representative. Some information on national fiscal policies might also be a valuable addition to the chapter, the representative of Belgium said, since they had bearing on relative standards of living and an important influence on the distribution of national income.

The chapters dealing with social conditions on a regional basis were regarded, on the whole, as accurate presentations of existing social conditions. With respect to the Middle East, the representative of Egypt thought that insufficient mention had been made of the great effort toward social reform by countries of the region. In discussing conditions in Asian countries, the Pakistan representative regretted that no mention had been made of the Kashmir question and its effect upon social and economic conditions in India and Pakistan and that insufficient emphasis had been given to the effect upon social conditions of the large-scale movement of refugees between the two countries.

The representatives of Cuba and Pakistan congratulated the Lebanese delegation for having taken the initiative in 1949 in requesting the preparation of such a report. The representative of Lebanon, who was not a member of the Council, at the invitation of the President, addressed the Council and commended the usefulness of the report. He expressed the hope that future studies would give attention to the root causes of certain social conditions and that cultural achievement would be dealt with.

Closely related to the world social survey are the questions relating to the methods of measuring the standards of living, which were raised in General Assembly resolution 527(VI) 1952. The Council agreed that the problem of measuring standards of living was both complex and important, and at its 646th plenary meeting on 16 July decided to refer to its Social Committee a joint draft resolution (E/L.416) by Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States proposing that a group of experts be convened to advise on the best methods of defining and measuring standards of living.

The representative of Uruguay thought that the question should be referred to the Statistical Commission and submitted an amendment to that effect (E/AC.7/L.124). Most members, however, considered that the problem was more than a statistical one as it involved problems of climatic, cultural and other differences, and the amendment was rejected by 14 votes to 4. It was agreed that international comparisons should not be confined to comparisons between the more and less developed countries and that measurements should not be based exclusively on governmental data. Therefore, two amendments by Egypt (E/AC.7/L.125) which would have thus restricted the comparisons and data were rejected, respectively, by 9 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions, and by 9 votes to 3, with 6 abstentions.

The joint draft resolution was adopted by the Social Committee (E/2305) to 11 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions, and by the Council at its 659th plenary meeting on 25 July by 12 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 434 B (XIV) (see below).

At its 660th and 661st plenary meetings the Council considered four draft resolutions which also had been presented as a result of the debate: by the USSR (E/L.414), by Canada (E/L.435 and E/L.436) and jointly by Belgium, Cuba, Egypt, France, Pakistan, the Philippines and the United States (E/L.408/Rev.2). The representative of Canada stated that, since the joint draft resolution corresponded to a large extent to his delegation's views, he would withdraw the two Canadian draft resolutions.

The USSR representative proposed (E/L.414) that the Council observe that the United Nations and the specialized agencies had not prepared recommendations on such important social questions as action to check the decline in the workers' standard of living, assistance to the unemployed and their families, provision of social insurance, and welfare services. He further proposed that the Council decide to include the following matters in the 1953 programme of work for the Council and its appropriate commissions, with a view to the preparation of concrete recommendations:

"(1) Extension of social insurance and assistance in unemployment, old age, disablement and sickness and of maternal and child welfare services;

"(2) Promotion of greater accessibility of education for the broad masses of the population, and introduction in the States Members of the United Nations of free compulsory primary education for all citizens without distinction of any kind on grounds of race, sex, language, religion, material situation and social origin;

"(3) Greater accessibility of medical services for the population without discrimination on grounds of race, sex, language, religion, material situation, and social origin;

"(4) Expansion of the construction of dwellings available to the broad masses of the population;

"(5) Improvement of the position with regard to public health, education and social welfare in Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories."

The Council rejected the proposal in paragraph votes ranging from 11 to 3, with 4 abstentions, to 8 to 4, with 5 abstentions. It also rejected by 6 votes to 3, with 9 abstentions, an Argentine amendment (E/L.450) to the USSR proposal which would have had the Council, instead, decide to hold a brief series of meetings during or shortly after the next regular session of the General Assembly to consider these matters with a view to preparing concrete recommendations.

At its 661st plenary meeting on 28 July the Council adopted the joint draft resolution (E/408/Rev.2) by 5 votes to none, with 3 abstentions (resolution 434 A (XIV)).

Resolutions 434 A & B (XIV) read:

"The Economic and Social Council

"1. Commends the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies concerned for the preparation of the preliminary report on the world social situation;

"2. Draws the attention of States Members of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies to the report and, in light of it, invites their suggestions and recommendations in connexion with the drawing-up of the programme of practical action to which resolution 535 (VI) of the General Assembly refers;

"3. Recognizes the essential interdependence between the improvement of social conditions and the raising of living standards, and the urgency of breaking the vicious circle of disease, ignorance and poverty that affects more than half of the world's population;

"4. Transmits the report to the specialized agencies for appropriate action within their fields and invites their recommendations concerning the development of programmes of practical action in the social field;

"5. Invites the Secretary-General, in consultation with the executive heads of the specialized agencies concerned, to prepare and submit to the Social Commission and to the Council in 1953, any suggestions in this matter that, in his opinion, would be useful to them;

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Noting the request by the General Assembly in resolution 527 (VI) that the Economic and Social Council "... provide for the working out of adequate statistical methods and techniques so as best to facilitate the gathering and use of pertinent data in order to enable the Secretary-General to publish regular annual reports showing changes in absolute levels of living conditions in all countries and which would permit the study of this problem in the light of changing general economic conditions',

"Noting that a study of methods of measuring standards of living in less developed areas has been recommended in the work programme of the Social Commission for 1953,

"Noting also the continuing interest of the International Labour Organisation in this problem,

"Requests the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the International Labour Organisation and other appropriate specialized agencies, to convene a small group of experts to prepare a report on the most satisfactory methods of defining and measuring standards of living and changes therein in the various countries, having regard to the possibility of international comparisons, to obtain the comments and recommendations of the Statistical Commission and the Social Commission thereon, and to report to the Economic and Social Council at an early date."

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS SEVENTH SESSION

The Assembly at the 465th to 469th meetings of its Third Committee from 4 to 9 December and at its 409th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952 had before it Chapter IV¹⁴⁷ of the Report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2172) dealing with social questions.

In this connexion, it also had before it the Preliminary Report on the World Social Situation (E/CN.5/267/Rev.1). In commenting on the latter report, there was general agreement that the work of the Council should be directed toward raising living standards, and that improvements in health, food and nutrition, education, income, housing, employment, and conditions of work were among the most important elements to be considered. The relationship between economic and social problems and the need for integrated action was also stressed. The Ukrainian SSR and the USSR representatives emphasized the need for Council action on questions of social security, equal rights, and equal pay for equal work, without regard to race, sex and religion, and stated that the Council had failed to fulfil its obligations in this respect.

The majority of the members of the Committee expressed satisfaction with the report and regarded it as one of the most important documents published by the United Nations and as affording a basis for practical action toward the solution of social problems. In general, the same points were made as during the discussion in the Council. Some representatives, among them those of Iraq, the Philippines and Yugoslavia, regretted that the Council had not provided more guidance to the Social Commission and felt that the Third Committee should make specific recommendations. The Polish representative emphasized that it was the duty of the Committee to analyse the true situation and to act upon its conclusions. Failing Third Committee action, the representative of the Philippines urged that Member Governments should reply to requests for suggestions on practical action in time for the Social Commission's consideration in the spring of 1953 and should appoint highly qualified representatives to the Commission with definite instructions.

The representatives of Argentina and Greece stressed the need for concerted action to eliminate the growing gulf between the rich and poor countries. The Argentine representative thought that the report gave the erroneous impression that only the under-developed countries were affected. It was necessary for all countries and governments, particularly those in a privileged position, to take measures to promote co-ordinated and integrated economic development to eliminate the instability which seriously threatened peace and which would continue to exist while so many of the world's inhabitants were condemned to abject poverty. He therefore submitted a draft resolution (A/C.3/L.139/Rev.1) which would stress particularly the ideas that economic and social factors were interrelated and that planned action on the basis of an integrated programme was necessary. The draft resolution called for greater co-ordination between the studies and activities carried out in connexion with social questions and questions relating to the economic development of countries in the process of development.

The representative of Argentina accepted an oral amendment by Canada to the third operative paragraph (see below) to replace the words "to forward the growth of" by the words "its efforts to increase the. . ." The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted (A/2333 B) by the Third Committee at its 469th meeting on 9 December by 42 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, and by the Assembly at its 409th plenary meeting on 20 December by 38 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 642 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recognizing that the conditions necessary for social welfare are many and varied and are inter-related, and are connected also with the factors necessary for economic development,

"Considering that the effectiveness of both national efforts and international co-operation for social welfare will be increased to the extent that they are carried out on the basis of integrated programmes taking into account the various economic and social conditions and factors and their mutual relationships,

"1. Draws the attention of Member States to the desirability of framing integrated programmes taking into account the various economic and social conditions and factors and their mutual relationships, with a view to promoting the improvement of the living conditions of the peoples;

"2. Recommends to the Economic and Social Council that international co-operation for the improvement of the living conditions of the peoples, initiated at the request of Member States, should be carried out on the basis of integrated programmes in the manner specified in the foregoing paragraph;

"3. Likewise recommends the Economic and Social Council to continue its efforts to increase the co-ordination between the studies and activities carried out in connexion with social questions and questions relating to the economic development of the countries in process of development."

2. Advisory Social Welfare Services

a. CONSIDERATION OF THE PROGRAMME

In submitting the draft work programme for the years 1952 and 1953 to the Social Commission at its seventh session,¹⁴⁸ the Secretary-General had proposed that an evaluation be made of the programme of advisory social welfare services rendered during the first five years of operation. The Social Commission had welcomed this proposal and the Secretary-General accordingly submitted two reports to the Commission at its eighth session, held from 12 to 29 May 1952; one covering advisory social welfare services under General Assembly resolution 418(V)¹⁴⁹ for the calendar year 1951 (E/CN.5/265);¹⁵⁰ the other (E/CN.5/266) an evaluation of the programme of advisory social welfare services during the period 1947-51. The latter report reviewed the history and scope of the programme, gave detailed descriptions of the services rendered and analysed the individual services and the programme as a whole.

¹⁴⁹ This resolution sets forth the social welfare services to be rendered by the United Nations and the policies in accordance with which they are to be rendered. For the text of the resolution see Y.U.N., 1950, p. 596.

The Commission noted (E/2247) that, during 1952, the programme had shown an increase over 1951 in terms of experts, fellowships and scholarships. The special programme for Europe had shown a similar increase in exchange of social welfare personnel, regional seminars organized through the medium of the exchange scheme, short-term assignments of experts and the loan service of social welfare films.

The Commission recommended the continuation of the special programme for Europe and the early increase in regional services for less developed areas on the basis of the European experience. With regard to the programme of fellowships, the Commission agreed with the Secretary-General's conclusions: candidates should be given prompt, full information on applications and arrangements; fellowships should be made available to applicants other than government officials; candidates should be carefully screened by national selection committees before their applications were submitted by governments; fellows upon return should work in positions to permit their countries to benefit from their observations abroad.

The Commission considered that progress had been made in implementing the programme of experts. It emphasized that, in general, experts should be not only professionally qualified but should also be familiar with the economic, social, cultural and administrative conditions of the country of assignment, or possess qualities enabling them readily to adapt themselves to those conditions. In view of this, the Commission recommended that use should increasingly be made of the services of those experts who had already had previous field experience in less developed areas.

The Commission stated, however, that it was not ready to recommend at the present stage the formation of a more or less permanent corps of international experts, in view of the importance of maintaining the necessary flexibility to meet the requirements of many and varying requests. For the same reason, the Commission welcomed the initiative taken by the Secretariat of giving a few social welfare officers of the Secretariat temporary assignments as advisers to governments, which would enable them to obtain or renew field experience in less developed areas.

The Commission reiterated its previous statement to the effect that the request for expert services by governments should be clearly defined and related to the specific needs, conditions and resources of the requesting country.

The Commission stressed that experts should not confine themselves to drawing up plans for the development of services, but should also advise governments on the practical implementation of these plans and on ways to overcome obstacles to such implementation.

Emphasizing the importance of seminars for the study of problems and the exchange of views on a regional basis, the Commission expressed concern at the variation in type and function of seminars. While it recognized that the term "seminar" as defined in General Assembly resolution 418(V) should be interpreted flexibly, it recommended greater attention in the future to defining the purpose and programme of each seminar and in selecting suitable participants.

Discussing the over-all aspects of the programme, the Commission supported the conclusion that governments should aim increasingly at combining the various services available (for example, those for experts, fellowships and seminars), so that each would strengthen the effect of the others. Expressing again its concern in this regard, the Commission emphasized the desirability that governments create appropriate machinery for the internal planning and co-ordination of matters relating to technical assistance, in order to arrive at balanced national programmes and to prevent the overlapping of requests. It also reiterated the importance of a close relationship between the economic and social aspects of development.

The Commission noted with satisfaction that information on measures taken by governments for national co-ordination of technical assistance had been circulated in connexion with the Expanded Programme of technical assistance. It expressed the hope that the Council would urge all governments to create and use national co-ordinating machinery for consideration of requests and projects in the fields of advisory social welfare services and general technical assistance. The Commission suggested that the Secretary-General explore with governments the possibility

The Commission expressed general appreciation of the progress made in integrating the programme for direct assistance to governments with its regular programme of studies and research. It agreed that social welfare projects in the technical assistance field should receive maximum assistance from the Division of Social Welfare and welcomed the development of joint projects by the United Nations and the specialized agencies. The Commission also expressed its satisfaction with the progress made in the co-ordination on a regional and country-to-country basis between the programme of Advisory Social Welfare Services and other international programmes of technical assistance.

The Commission agreed that regional social welfare advisers had important functions in assisting individual governments and regions in matters relating to technical assistance, and endorsed the Secretary-General's intention to continue and extend the use of regional advisers and to strengthen regional staffs wherever possible.

In view of the fact that expenditures in the past had, as a result of unusual conditions, remained somewhat below budget allocations and that conditions and problems of countries in the same region were often similar, the Commission recommended to the Council that it might instruct the Secretary-General to explore with governments the possibility of inaugurating one or more long-term regional projects to meet the urgent needs of governments in specific fields of priority in the Commission's work programme.

Believing that the programme of advisory social welfare services should be better known, the Commission requested the Secretary-General to arrange for the printing and wide circulation of his report (E/CN.5/266).

The Council, at its fourteenth session, at the 223rd and 224th meetings of its Social Committee on 18 and 21 July and at its 659th plenary meeting on 25 July 1952, briefly reviewed the recommendations of the Social Commission concerning advisory social welfare services and, in general, supported its views. Among other things, the representatives of Belgium, France, the United States, and Uruguay approved of the Commission's decision that experts should be familiar with the countries in which they were assigned. The representatives of Canada and the United States also emphasized the need for periodic assessments of the services rendered along the lines of the Secretary-General's report on the first five years of the programme. The representative of the United Kingdom considered the advisory social welfare services an essential part of the technical assistance programme and thought that credits set aside for technical assistance should be used to help the most needy. The Philippine representative suggested that it would be useful to set up a permanent system of advisory social welfare services which would fulfil the same role as the regional economic commissions in the economic field.

After approving a Canadian proposal to refer to the views expressed by the Council as well as those expressed by the Social Commission, the Commission's draft resolution, as amended, was adopted unanimously by the Social Committee (E/2305 II B) at its 224th meeting, and by the Council at its 659th plenary meeting as resolution 434 D (XIV). By this resolution, the Council recognized the importance of the advisory social welfare services, recalled the initial emphasis and sustained support given the programme by the Social Commission and requested the Secretary-General to continue to emphasize this field of work, carrying out the programme in accordance with General Assembly resolution 418(V) and paying due observance to the views expressed by the Social Commission at its eighth session and by the Council.

b. ADVISORY SOCIAL WELFARE SERVICES FURNISHED DURING 1952

During 1952 a total of 52 social welfare experts were sent to 27 countries. Their fields of activity included: social casework; housing and town planning; welfare of crippled children; welfare of the blind and deaf; maternal and child welfare; administration of health centres; youth recreational activities; community development; demographic questions; social defence; medical social work; social welfare training, policy and administration; and refugee resettlement. Six social welfare experts were also supplied to a joint field mission (joint TAB project) on indigenous populations which visited Bolivia, Ecuador and Peru. Also in co-operation with the specialized agencies concerned, the United Nations sent small survey missions to Central America and the Caribbean, Asia and the Far East, and the Middle East to visit and review selected community development projects.

In addition to these expert services, the United Nations has continued to assist governments in the European region by arranging for the exchange of experts on a short-term basis. During 1952 eleven experts were made available by three countries to requesting governments.

With regard to social welfare fellowships and scholarships, 280 awards were given in 1952, of which 152 were financed from funds allocated from the regular budget of the United Nations (General Assembly resolution 418(V)) and 128 were financed from the Special Account set up in connexion with the Expanded Programme of technical assistance.

In order to extend the benefits of observation abroad for shorter periods of time to a number of practising social workers and officials, an experimental project was launched in Europe in 1950 to promote the intra-European exchange of social welfare personnel. Under this scheme, the United Nations regional office in Geneva acts as a co-ordinating agency for bilateral and multi-lateral arrangements between national exchange committees. ILO collaborates in this scheme. During 1952, 236 social workers were enabled to spend two to four weeks in a neighbouring country to observe social welfare practices or to attend seminars arranged under the Exchange Programme.

A third social welfare seminar for the Arab States of the Middle East was held in Damascus, Syria, in December. The objective of this seminar was to continue and to supplement the work already accomplished in two earlier social welfare seminars, held in Beirut and in Cairo, by assisting and stimulating the participating governments in their efforts to improve the economic and social conditions of their populations and by helping the governments plan a co-ordinated approach to the planning and administration of social services.

In London, a seminar on probation was held in October and was attended by national teams representing the judiciary of each country as well as services connected with correctional administration, social work training and probation. The countries represented were: Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Israel, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia.

A group training course on the rehabilitation of handicapped adults was held from September to November in Denmark, Finland and Sweden under the joint sponsorship of the Governments of these countries and of the United Nations, WHO and ILO. It was attended by national teams, comprising specialists on various aspects of the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped from the sponsoring countries and from Austria, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands and Norway. The basic intention of the course was to emphasize the way in which medical, technical, occupational and social aspects could be fused in an integrated service, and to enable participants to study developments in the techniques of rehabilitation, with particular emphasis on their psychological, social and industrial aspects.

"Exchange Plan" seminars were held in Geneva for English-speaking participants; in Keuruu, Finland, for the benefit of 63 English-speaking professional social workers from Exchange Plan countries; and in Oslo, Norway, for 38 persons from Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, United Kingdom and Yugoslavia. The seminars were, respectively, concerned with the principles and techniques of social casework; the teaching and supervision of social casework; and on the foster home care of children.

A national demonstration centre on the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped was opened in Belgrade, Yugoslavia, in October and the establishment of national demonstration centres for the blind was under way in Turkey and Egypt. A joint United Nations-WHO mission of two experts left in August 1952 for an eight-week visit to five Latin American countries to survey the possibilities of establishing one or more regional demonstration and training centres for the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped.

Technical publications were furnished in connexion with the work of experts in fifteen countries and one or more kits of standard volumes in the housing and town and country planning field were furnished to 34 countries and twelve territories and colonies. Equipment was furnished to five demonstration centres and 316 social welfare films were loaned.

3. Family and Child Welfare

The Commission at its eighth session had before it two reports by the Secretary-General which it had requested at its seventh session: an integrated programme for meeting the needs of children (E/CN.5/256) and a report on the extension of specific measures relating to maternity, infant and child care (E/CN.5/257).

The Commission agreed with the recommendations of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) (E/2161 and Corr.1) that in the development of an integrated programme of child welfare, priority should be given by the United Nations, including UNICEF and TAA, and the specialized agencies to two types of programmes:

(a) assistance to governments in assessing existing services for children and in developing broad and well balanced national programmes for child services within the framework of a general plan for national social services, with indications of the most effective type of international assistance required; and (b) the development of plans for protection and normal development of children and for training health, nutrition and welfare personnel at professional levels and as auxiliary workers, and of methods to increase as rapidly as possible their number and use, particularly in rural areas.

The Commission asked that the proposed list of specific measures (E/CN.4/257), including measures essential to social security of the family, be amplified; that proposed methods and activities be examined by regions and with reference to related services, and that these proposals be assembled in convenient form for the use of governments and technical advisers.

It proposed that, by means of regional seminars, those countries which had received international help in assessing needs and planning the development of their child welfare services should share their experience with neighbouring countries with similar problems.

The Commission also considered a final report by the Secretary-General on children deprived of a normal home life (E/CN.5/271 and Add.1), having at its seventh session deferred consideration of a draft report on children homeless in their native countries (E/CN.5/237) to permit its circulation to governments for comment. The conclusions and recommendations in chapter VII of the final report were unanimously approved by the Commission.

Among other things, it stressed that a child should, as far as possible, remain in his own home with his own parents; services to strengthen the family were therefore of basic importance. If it were necessary to remove a child, foster-family homes should be considered first as providing the type of care which came closest to that the child would receive in his own home, and institutional care should be considered only when other solutions were not possible. The report also emphasized the need for specially trained personnel, recognition of the basic rights of children deprived of a normal home life, and the special responsibilities of governments towards such children.

The Council at the 224th meeting of its Social Committee on 21 July and at its 659th plenary meeting on 25 July 1952 considered the draft resolution on family and child welfare proposed by the Social Commission (E/2247). It expressed approval of this draft as presenting a satisfactory plan for the preparation of an integrated programme for child welfare, in accordance with the high priority given by its Committee on Co-ordination to the strengthening of national programmes for child welfare.¹⁵¹

Following the acceptance of a minor drafting amendment by the Social Committee, the resolution was unanimously adopted by the Committee (E/2305) and by the Council in plenary session. In resolution 434 E (XIV), the Council, inter alia, requested the Secretary-General, in co-operation with UNICEF, the specialized agencies, interested non-governmental organizations and other international bodies:

(a) to encourage and assist governments to assess the extent to which development of services of children are necessary, with a view to formulating and carrying out a plan of action applicable to both rural and urban areas, and indicating, where necessary, the type of international assistance required;

(b) to develop plans for the training of sufficient personnel;

(c) to develop further in all phases the integrated programme presented to the Social Commission at its eighth session (E/CN.5/256 and 257) for meeting the needs of children;

(d) to concentrate attention on provision of adequate nutrition, with special reference to countries where adequate feeding is still a fundamental problem;

(e) to report progress on these activities to the next session of the Commission. The Council further recommended that special attention in the further development of child welfare programmes be given to underdeveloped areas, and urged governments to take appropriate steps to develop their child welfare programmes along the lines proposed.

4. In-Service Training of Social Welfare Personnel

The Social Commission, at its eighth session, had before it a report by the Secretary-General, "In-Service Training for Social Welfare" (E/CN.5/261),¹⁵² one of a series of studies initiated by Council resolution 43 (IV)¹⁵³ on ways of developing a long-term welfare training programme of assistance to governments. The report dealt with the general principles, administration, range, content and methods of in-service training. The Commission recognized that in-service training and formal training in schools of social work and similar institutions, as discussed at earlier sessions, were equally necessary and mutually complementary means of providing the training required. Recognizing the importance of maintaining high standards of professional training, the Commission reaffirmed the principles concerning social work training which it had formulated at its previous session.¹⁵⁴ At the same time, it recognized the great need for workers in the social field and of recourse to in-service training for both formally trained and untrained persons. It therefore adopted (E/2247) the following principles and proposed that the Council recommend them to the attention of Member States.

(1) Training for social work should take as many forms as appropriate to the needs of various countries.

(2) In-service training programmes should be regarded as essential in the administration of a social welfare organization and necessary to all categories of social welfare personnel, including persons who have as well as those who have not received formal training.

(3) In-service training should be regarded as complementary to a formal course of professional training rather than as a substitute for it.

(4) Training programmes should make the fullest use of available training facilities such as universities, special schools of social work and other recognized institutions, and in social welfare organizations a qualified officer should be assigned responsibility for promoting staff development.

The Commission recommended that the Secretary-General, in consultation with the specialized agencies concerned, should assist requesting governments in the development of necessary forms of social welfare training, including in-service training.

The Council's Social Committee at its 224th meeting on 21 July unanimously adopted a resolution (E/2305 II D) which was, in turn, unanimously adopted by the Council at its 659th plenary meeting on 25 July as resolution 434 F (XIV). By it, the Council recommended that Member States give due attention to the principles adopted by the Social Commission concerning in-service training of social welfare personnel.

5. Housing and Town and Country Planning

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE SOCIAL COMMISSION AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

The Social Commission, at its eighth session in May 1952, had before it an interim report (E/CN.5/264) on current information on urban land policies, summarizing the preliminary findings of a study (ST/SOA/9) which was subsequently circulated to Member States and to individual experts for comment. The preliminary study, the report indicated, had surveyed urban land policies in developed areas and was intended primarily to assist less developed countries in formulating policies which would enable them to cope with their current problems of housing and urban redevelopment, particularly in connexion with land cost. Although no recommendations had been drawn up, the report stated, certain trends had been defined in the study and certain inferences had been drawn. The Commission noted that, following the receipt of the comments, the study would be revised and published as a special issue of the bulletin, Housing and, Town and, Country Planning.

The Commission expressed interest in the relationship between the cost of the construction of dwellings and the expenditures for community services and public utilities in new housing projects. It was generally agreed that practical recommendations on urban land policies could be most appropriately developed at meetings of experts and that priority in convening such meetings should be given to the Asian and Far Eastern regions.

The Commission also took note of the description of the world housing situation contained in the Preliminary Report on the World Social Situation (E/CN.5/267)¹⁵⁵ and stressed that the use of self-help methods in less developed areas should be increased. The Secretariat was also asked to submit to the Commission a progress report on work undertaken in under-developed countries to relieve the housing problem.

The Social Commission, in connexion with General Assembly resolution 537(VI),¹⁵⁶ also discussed the financing of housing from domestic and external sources.

It adopted a resolution on the financing of housing and community development, recommending that the Council ask the Secretary-General, inter alia, to explore the possibility of financing housing and community development from external sources, and in this connexion to give particular attention to: housing for low income groups, the fullest utilization of local sources of building materials, the efficiency of the building industries and the advisability of promoting and financing the establishment of industries producing building materials in countries which had to import a considerable proportion of such materials. The Secretary-General was also requested to pay special attention to the needs and economic conditions of under-developed countries whose housing facilities had deteriorated owing to war destruction, and to report to the appropriate organs of the United Nations (E/2247) on the progress made.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FOURTEENTH SESSION

The Council at the 225th and 226th meetings of its Social Committee on 21 and 22 July and at its 659th plenary meeting on 25 July 1952 had before it the relevant portions of the Social Commission's report (E/2247) and a background memorandum by the Secretary-General on housing and town and country planning (E/2284). The Council noted the emphasis placed by the Commission on the study of the possibility of financing housing and community development from external sources. The majority of the Council, however, considered that, while financing of housing programmes was largely a domestic responsibility of governments, external aid should not be excluded. International action in this field, within the framework of the technical assistance programme, could be of particular value.

The Swedish representative pointed out that the financing of housing from external sources was not a question of primary importance but was related to the complex and permanent problem of economic financing as a whole and should be studied in relation to it. The representative of the Philippines pointed out that the Assembly in paragraph (e) of resolution 537(VI) had asked the Council to study measures to assist governments in financing housing programmes from domestic or external sources. Therefore, he said, the latter should not be overlooked, nor should the use of domestic sources be unduly stressed.

The Social Committee had before it a revised draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.127/Rev.1) by Iran and Sweden which was subsequently adopted by the Committee and by the Council in plenary session with the following amendments.

(1) By 11 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions, the Committee adopted an Argentine proposal to recommend that governments also consider measures to encourage the trade between countries in building materials and equipment.

(2) By 9 votes to 8, with 1 abstention, the Committee adopted a Philippine amendment (E/AC.7/L.131), revised orally, to the second operative paragraph which, instead of requesting studies dealing particularly with domestic sources of financing, would ask the Secretary-General to complete for early consideration the studies referred to in Assembly resolution 537(VI) (and in particular in paragraph (e)). Prior to voting on the paragraph, the Committee adopted the last phrase, referring to paragraph (e), by 8 votes to 3, with 7 abstentions.

The Committee at its 226th meeting on 22 July adopted (E/2305 III) the amended text, as a whole, by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions. The Council, however, at its 659th plenary meeting on 25 July, by a vote of 8 to 8, with 2 abstentions, decided to delete the second operative paragraph. In this connexion, the Assistant Secretary-General in charge of the Department of Social Affairs assured the Council that the study on financing of housing from domestic and external sources was contained in the work programme of the Secretariat, and that the Secretariat would endeavour to carry out the entire programme as rapidly as possible.

The amended draft resolution was then adopted by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 434 I (XIV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Having noted the request of the General Assembly in its resolution 537 (VI) of 2 February 1952, to give urgent attention to practical measures to assist governments in increasing available housing facilities for people in the lowest income groups (A/2119),

"Having noted the extent of the problem of housing and community improvement as reflected in the Secretary-General's preliminary report on the World Social Situation (E/CN.5/267, chapter V),

"Having considered:

"(a) The Social Commission's resolution on financing of housing and community development adopted at its eighth session (E/2247),

"(b) The progress made in implementing the Social Commission's work programme in the fields of housing, town and country planning, and building (E/2284),

"(c) The increasing collaboration in this programme among regional economic commissions, specialized agencies and interested non-governmental organizations, and

"(d) The growing volume of requests by governments for direct assistance in the form of expert advice, training opportunities, and demonstration projects,

"Having noted that governments are assuming an increasing responsibility for the programming and financing of housing and community services as part of general economic and social development,

"1. Recommends governments:

"(a) To develop, particularly for the benefit of people in low income groups, long term policies and comprehensive programmes of housing and community improvement and encourage their realization on a continuing basis;

"(b) To facilitate the exchange among nations of information on research and practical experience in housing, community planning and the building industry;

"(c) To consider measures encouraging the trade between countries in building materials and equipment;

"(d) To encourage, with the help of interested organizations of employers and of employees, higher productivity and development of the building industry and the manufacture of building materials from local sources, including agricultural and industrial wastes and by-products;

"2. Invites the regional economic commissions to assist governments to carry out the recommendations under paragraph 1 by initiating or developing, where appropriate, regional activities pertaining to building, housing and town and country planning in co-operation with the specialized agencies, inter-governmental and non-governmental organizations;

"3. Recommends that the Technical Assistance Board develops further its activities pertaining to housing, community planning and building;

"4. Suggests, in connexion with the above recommendations (paragraphs 1 to 3), that the special needs and economic conditions of the less developed countries be taken into consideration."

6. Rehabilitation of the Physically Handicapped

In accordance with Council resolution 309 E (XI) requesting the Secretary-General "to plan jointly with the specialized agencies and in consultation with the interested non-governmental organizations a well co-ordinated programme for the rehabilitation of physically handicapped persons", the Commission at its eighth session had before it the report of the Secretary-General on an international rehabilitation programme for the physically handicapped (E/CN.5/259).

The report described the steps which had been taken in practical implementation of the programme.¹⁵⁷ The proposed programme as jointly considered and approved by the United Nations, ILO, WHO, UNESCO, UNICEF and IRO was outlined under ten headings:

(1) a new approach to disability; (2) the education of public opinion; (3) a complete rehabilitation service; (4) building up a rehabilitation programme; (5) developing rehabilitation services; (6) training rehabilitation personnel; (7) organizing and financing of rehabilitation services within governments; (8) the contribution of the United Nations and the specialized agencies; (9) the contribution of the non-governmental organizations; and (10) methods of co-ordination.

The Commission also examined, as part of the co-ordinated programme for the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped, a report on an international programme for the welfare of the blind (E/CN.5/260). The report dealt with the incidence of blindness, definition, prevention, education, vocational training and employment, teachers and workers for the blind, placement officers, administrators of blind welfare, social security provisions, special techniques and appliances and the spreading of information on work for the blind. It recommended a general programme for the education, rehabilitation, training and employment of the visually handicapped.

The Commission approved (E/2247) the proposals for an international programme for the rehabilitation of the physically handicapped and for the prevention and treatment of blindness. It invited the Secretary-General, in co-operation with the specialized agencies and interested non-governmental organizations, to undertake those projects authorized in the work programme, which for 1952-53 included rehabilitation of the handicapped, rehabilitation of physically handicapped persons in under-developed areas and welfare of the deaf. The Commission urged that direct assistance to under-developed countries be intensified and expanded so that realistic rehabilitation programmes could be worked out, including a programme for the prevention of blindness and the welfare of the blind.

By resolution 451 A (XIV)¹⁵⁸ the Economic and Social Council decided to include in its priority programme the provision of assistance to the disabled; and by resolution 434 H (XIV) (see below) the Council approved the work programme of the Social Commission and the specific projects recommended by the Commission.

7. Social Defence

During 1952 the United Nations, in co-operation with the specialized agencies concerned and the interested non-governmental organizations, continued its programme¹⁵⁹ in the field of the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders, as well as for the suppression of the traffic in persons and of the exploitation of the prostitution of others.

In accordance with Assembly resolution 415 (V),¹⁶⁰ which set forth a programme of action following the transfer of the functions of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission (IPPC) to the United Nations, the first regional conference concerned with the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders was held in December 1952 at Geneva. Representatives of thirteen European countries, observers from, among others, Burma, Japan and the United States, and representatives of the specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations concerned participated. The conference dealt with: standard minimum rules for the treatment of prisoners; recruitment, training and status of the staff of penal and correctional institutions; open penal and correctional institutions; a study of criminality; and the treatment of juvenile delinquents. Discussions were also held on ways and means of utilizing technical assistance techniques in advancing national programmes in the field of social defence. The conference, among other things, made suggestions to the Secretary-General concerning future United Nations action.

The fourth conference of representatives of specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations on this subject was also held in December 1952 at Geneva. The aim of these conferences is to co-ordinate and stimulate international action carried out by a large number of international organizations in the field of the prevention of crime and the treatment of offenders.

A European Seminar on Probation, in which teams of specialists from seventeen countries as well as observers from several international and national non-governmental organizations participated, was held in London in October 1952. Technical problems of an administrative and legal nature were studied and major emphasis was placed on the practical aspect of probation services.

During the year comparative regional surveys dealing with the treatment of juvenile delinquents, based on national studies which had been in progress for some time, were completed, and three reports relating to North America, Europe and Latin America were published (ST/SOA/SD/1 and Add.1 and 2).

Two issues of the International Review of Criminal Policy were published (ST/SOA/SER.M.1 and 2). The first was designed to familiarize the reader with the work and programme of the United Nations in the field. The second contained articles on open institutions and the treatment of offenders, notes and communications on the subjects constituting the United Nations current programme of work.

With regard to the suppression of the traffic in persons and the exploitation of the prostitution of others, the summary of annual reports for the period 1948-50 was prepared by the Secretariat and published in August 1952 (E/TWC/Summary 1948-50). Future reports on this subject are to be based on the new questionnaire which has been prepared as a result of the adoption by the General Assembly, on 2 December 1949, of a consolidated Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Prostitution of Others.

8. General Work Programme

The Commission, at its eighth session, reviewed the progress made by the Secretariat in carrying out its work programme (E/CN.5/268). It also took note of two reports, "Methods of Administering Assistance to the Needy" (E/CN.5/273) and "Economic Measures in Favour of the Family" (ST/SOA/8), which had been prepared at its request.

In compliance with Council resolution 402 (XIII), the work programme approved by the Commission was organized into four main fields of activity: social policy and development; social services; housing and town and country planning; and social defence. Within those groups, projects or functions were divided into categories as follows: (a) continuing functions and projects of high priority; (b) ad hoc projects of high priority; and (c) projects to be deferred or undertaken only in so far as resources permit.

The full programme, as recommended by the Commission, was included in annex II of its report to the Council (E/2247). In preparing its programme, the Commission combined a number of projects appearing in earlier work programmes, deferred less urgent projects and laid stress on those continuing functions and ad hoc projects likely to provide practical solutions to social problems facing many Member States. At the same time, the Commission recognized that major changes in the programme would be premature until such time as the Council had completed the detailed examination of activities in the social field, as requested by General Assembly resolution 535 (VI), and, in the light of this fact, inter alia, it recommended that this question be placed on its own agenda in 1953.

The absence of problems of social security, education and health from the work programme of the Commission was questioned by some members who sought their inclusion in studies for 1952-54. Most representatives, however, while sharing concern for these important problems, thought they were the proper concern of the specialized agencies and that their inclusion in the Commission's work programme would entail duplication of effort.

The Commission, instead of making specific additions to its own programme, decided to recommend to the Council that the United Nations and the specialized agencies, as soon as possible, give special attention to the following questions, with a view to drafting practical recommendations thereon:

(1) social security measures such as social insurance and social assistance for the unemployed, the aged, the sick, dependent children and other needy groups; (2) the availability of education and the introduction of free compulsory elementary education for all; (3) the availability for all of measures for the maintenance of good health and the prevention and treatment of disease; and (4) measures to be taken immediately to promote social progress.

The Council during its fourteenth session considered the report of the Social Commission specifically at the 224th to 226th meetings of its Social Committee on 21 and 22 July and at its 659th, 661st and 663rd plenary meetings on 25, 28 and 29 July 1952. The USSR considered that problems of social security, education and health should be included in the work programme. The majority agreed that the main programmes in these fields were the concern of the specialized agencies or of other United Nations bodies.¹⁶¹ The representatives of Belgium, the United Kingdom and the United States stressed that the expenditure entailed by the execution of the programme would not be greater than that provided for 1952.

Following the acceptance of an oral Philippine amendment to draw the Commission's attention to the Council's discussions on the work programme for its general guidance, the Social Committee, at its 225th meeting on 21 July adopted (E/2305 II F) by 14 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, a Canadian draft resolution (E/AC.7/L.128) concerning the work programme. The Council at its 663rd plenary meeting on 29 July adopted by 12 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, a United States amendment (E/L.452) which would also call to the Commission's attention the Council's action on United Nations priority programmes.¹⁶² The resolution, thus amended, was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 434 H (XIV) (see below).

By 14 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, the Social Committee at its 226th meeting on 22 July adopted (E/2305) a draft resolution proposed by the Chairman noting the Commission's report. Following the adoption, by 9 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions, of an oral amendment by Uruguay to include an expression of the Council's satisfaction with the Commission's work, the resolution was adopted by 15 votes to 3, as resolution 434 C (XIV).

The representatives of Czechoslovakia and the USSR stated they had voted against the resolution because they did not consider the Commission's work satisfactory.

By resolution 434 H (XIV), the Council approved the work programme drawn up by the Social Commission at its eighth session and invited the attention of the Commission to the record of its discussions on the programme and to section II on United Nations priority programmes in the report of the Co-ordination Committee as approved by the Council.

By resolution 434 C (XIV), the Council took note with appreciation of the Social Commission's report.

P. UNITED NATIONS INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND (UNICEF)

The Executive Board of UNICEF held two sessions in 1952, from 22 to 24 April and from 6 to 10 October. The officers and the members of the Programme Committee and the Committee on Administrative Budget for 1952 were elected¹⁶³ at a special meeting of the 1952 Executive Board held on 12 November 1951.

a. EMERGENCY AID

The emergency aid allocated by the Executive Board in 1952, which totalled $4,478,000, constituted about one third of the total aid approved (excluding freight and operational services). Of this amount, the largest allocations, totalling $3,115,000, were in connexion with aid for Palestine refugees (mothers and children in care of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWAPRNE), and "economic refugees" in Egypt and Jordan). Other emergency aid, which constituted about 13 per cent of total aid approved, was for children and mothers in drought-stricken areas of Brazil and India, and for refugees from a volcano-stricken area in the Philippines.

The Executive Board in April 1952 discussed the policy issues involved in continued assistance by UNICEF for situations which other United Nations agencies had been created to meet. It agreed, as a matter of policy, not to continue UNICEF aid for Palestine refugee mothers and children beyond 30 November 1952. It did not, however, exclude the possibility of providing aid beyond this period out of gifts in kind to the Fund, or which could be best procured with certain currencies contributed to the Fund. In November 1952 an allocation of $200,000 was approved along these lines by the Executive Board for the period beyond 30 November 1952.

b. LONG-RANGE AID

Long-range aid totalling over $9 million was approved during the year for some 80 long-range programmes in 49 countries and territories. In fifteen countries and territories UNICEF aid was approved for the first time during the year, as follows: Africa, seven (Belgian Congo, Cameroons, French Equatorial Africa, French West Africa, Liberia, Ruanda Urundi and Togoland); Asia, two (Cambodia and Vietnam); Eastern Mediterranean area, two (Ethiopia and Sudan); Europe, one (Portugal); Latin America, three (Grenada, St. Lucia and Surinam).

The percentage distribution of long-range aid as between areas was as follows:

	Per Cent
Africa	11.1
Asia	43.1
Eastern Mediterranean	15.2
Europe	10.1
Latin America	16.4
Benefiting more than one region	4.1
	100.0

In terms of types of programmes aided, the percentage distribution was as follows:

	Per cent	Per cent
Maternal and Child Welfare
Services and Training	35.5
Mass Health Campaigns		43.2
Anti-malaria	19.9
Anti-yaws, Bejel, VD	9.1
BCG anti-tuberculosis vaccination	8.1
Other	6.1
Child Nutrition		21.3
Long-range feeding	6.3
Milk conservation	15.0

Maternal and Child Welfare Services and Training: To strengthen these basic services, UNICEF aid was approved in 1952 amounting to $3,211,000 for eleven countries in Asia (Afghanistan, Burma, Ceylon, China (Taiwan), Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Pakistan, Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam); four countries in the Eastern Mediterranean region (Iran, Jordan, Libya and Syria); three countries in Europe (Greece, Portugal and Yugoslavia); and two countries in Latin America (Panama and Paraguay). Included was further aid for the International Children's Centre in Paris, engaged in international teaching and research work in the field of maternal and child welfare.

In Asia, 56 per cent of total allocations for long-range aid was in the field of maternal and child welfare services and training; in the Eastern Mediterranean area it was 16 per cent; and in Latin America, 4 per cent.

The aid to countries was in the form of equipment and supplies for maternal and child welfare centres, primarily in rural areas, children's hospitals or wards, school health services, clinics and laboratories. Assistance included midwifery kits; scales, thermometers, needles, syringes; transport; hospital equipment; drugs, sera, vaccines, common medicines, soap, disinfectants; powdered milk; fish-liver oil capsules and other diet supplements; and health education materials.

During 1952, aid was approved for some 2,000 maternal and child welfare centres. The UNICEF-equipped maternal and child welfare centres, in addition to providing preventive and curative services to children and mothers, provided training facilities for local child care personnel, mainly assistant midwives or village midwives. Other UNICEF aid for maternal and child welfare took the form of supplies and equipment for midwifery training centres, schools of nursing, teaching hospitals and pediatric wards.

In April 1952 the Executive Board decided in principle that as an additional measure of increasing aid for training auxiliary child care personnel in rural regions it would, in certain circumstances, provide stipends in local currencies for trainees. In October 1952 it provided small sums (stipends in local currencies) for midwife trainees in four countries (Libya, India, Pakistan and Thailand).

Anti-Malaria and other Insect-Control Measures: UNICEF allocated $1,794,000 for DDT, sprayers, transport and field equipment to help countries combat malaria and other insect-borne diseases (diarrhoea, typhus) taking a heavy toll of children's lives and health. Aid was approved to three countries in Africa (Togoland, the Cameroons and Liberia), three countries in Asia (Afghanistan, India and Pakistan), four countries in the Eastern Mediterranean area (Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon and Syria), and ten countries in Latin America (Bolivia, Colombia, Grenada, Haiti, Honduras, Jamaica, Peru, St. Lucia, Surinam and Trinidad). In Africa, 45 per cent of total allocations in the area for long-range aid in 1952 was for anti-malaria campaigns; in Asia, 13 per cent; in the Eastern Mediterranean area, 21 per cent; and in Latin America, 36 per cent.

During 1952, anti-malaria campaigns (aided by allocations in previous years and, in part, the 1952 allocations) protected approximately 8,300,000 in fifteen countries as follows:

Area	No. of Countries	No. Protected
Asia	4	5,000,000
Eastern Mediterranean	1	98,000
Latin America	10	3,200,000
	15	8,298,000

Anti-Yaws Campaign: Yaws is a contagious disease which particularly attacks children and is susceptible to treatment on a mass scale by penicillin. In 1952 UNICEF approved aid totalling $828,000 for anti-yaws campaigns in one country in Africa (Liberia), three in Asia (China (Taiwan), Philippines and Thailand), and one in Latin America (Haiti). In Latin America the amount allocated was 17 per cent of total area allocation for long-range aid in 1952; in Asia it was 13 per cent; and in Africa 5 per cent. UNICEF aid took the form of penicillin, needles, syringes, transport, and clinical and laboratory supplies. The UNICEF-aided campaigns have importance in the preventive field as well since, through mass treatment, sources of infection are eliminated.

Aided by allocations in previous years, and, in part, 1952 allocations, anti-yaws campaigns in 1952 (and anti-bejel and anti-venereal disease campaigns also carried on through penicillin injections) resulted in the examination of over 5,200,000 persons and the treatment of about 1,300,000 in seven countries, as follows:

Area	No. of Countries	No. Examined	No. Treated
Asia	4	4,270,000	427,000
Eastern Mediterranean	1	120,000	24,000
Europe	1	not available	not available
Latin America	1	843,000	843,000
	7	5,233,000	1,294,000

BCG Anti-Tuberculosis Vaccination Campaigns: During 1952 UNICEF aid in BCG anti-tuberculosis vaccination campaigns totalled $736,000 to nine countries in Asia (Burma, Cambodia, China (Taiwan), Hong Kong, India, Pakistan, Philippines, Thailand and Vietnam), and three countries in the Eastern Mediterranean region (Ethiopia, Jordan and Sudan). Included was $40,000 for field studies of the effects of BCG vaccination (Skive project), carried on in Denmark under the technical supervision of the Tuberculosis Research Office of the World Health Organization.

In Asia, aid for BCG vaccination campaigns amounted to 15 per cent of the total allocated for long-range aid during the year; in the Eastern Mediterranean area, 7 per cent. The type of equipment provided by UNICEF consisted of tuberculin, vaccine and transport.

UNICEF also approved during the year an amount of $54,000 to three countries (Burma, India and Trinidad) for equipment for tuberculosis control related to BCG campaigns.

In 1952, as a result of allocations made in previous years, and, in part, those made during the year, 13,500,000 persons were tested and 4,850,000 vaccinated against tuberculosis, as follows:

Area	No. of Countries	No. Tested	No. Vaccinated
Africa	1	not available	not available
Asia	9	10,620,000	3,750,000
Eastern Mediterranean	4	1,860,000	619,000
Latin America	5	976,000	580,000
	19	13,456,000	4,949,000

Other Health Campaigns: UNICEF during 1952 allocated approximately $500,000 for other mass disease campaigns. The bulk of this was for equipment for a penicillin production plant in Chile ($285,000) and for anti-trachoma work in Morocco, Tunisia and China (Taiwan). The number of children expected to be reached in the anti-trachoma campaigns was 130,000.

The aid for anti-trachoma work took the form of antibiotics, field and laboratory equipment, transport and public health education materials. The Executive Board noted that there was interest in a number of countries in international aid against trachoma, a highly contagious eye disease, most acute among children, and it regarded its allocation in the nature of aid for pilot projects, the experience of which would be a guide in considering future aid against trachoma.

The aid for the penicillin production plant was given on the basis of a series of special criteria established by the Executive Board in 1951 for capital investment aid of this type.

Long-Range Feeding Assistance: During 1952 UNICEF allocations totalled $566,000 for long-range supplementary child feeding projects. Included was aid to two countries in Africa (Belgian Congo and Ruanda-Urundi) for dry milk powder to combat a serious nutritional deficiency in children (kwashiorkor). This constituted the first UNICEF aid for this type of problem. Plans for the programmes were developed in close collaboration with both WHO and FAO.

The long-range feeding assistance also included allocations to five countries in Latin America (British Honduras, Chile, Honduras, Nicaragua and Peru) and two countries in the Eastern Mediterranean area (Iraq and Turkey). For Chile, Honduras, Nicaragua, Iraq and Turkey, this feeding assistance was related to UNICEF aid for milk conservation which would permit the Governments of these countries to continue the child feeding programmes on a permanent basis from their own milk production.

Of the total area aid for long-range programmes allocated for Africa in 1952, some 32.5 per cent was for long-range feeding programmes; for Latin America the percentage was 12.5.

In December 1952, out of these allocations and those made earlier, there were 763,000 beneficiaries of long-range feeding programmes in eighteen countries as follows:

Area	No. of Countries	Beneficiaries during December 1952
Africa	3	40,000
Asia	3	112,000

Area	No. of Countries	Beneficiaries during December 1952
Europe	2	393,000
	18	763,000

Milk Conservation: UNICEF provides equipment for drying and pasteurization of local milk supplies to be used for the benefit of children. In 1952 the Executive Board approved allocations totalling $1,360,000 for four countries in the Eastern Mediterranean area (Egypt, Iraq, Israel and Turkey), two countries in Europe (Italy and Yugoslavia), and one country in Latin America (Honduras). The milk conservation projects in Egypt, Iraq and Turkey were small-scale projects designed to serve as demonstrations of modern milk handling processes in countries with relatively small milk supplies. The plants themselves are to serve as training centres for personnel to be used in future milk conservation schemes. In Iraq some of the milk will be sterilized, a type of aid approved for the first time, with the hope that the experience would be significant for other countries without widespread refrigeration. The aid for Israel was for the purchase of equipment for bottling pasteurized milk, refrigeration, and equipment for making milk bottles. The allocations for Italy and Yugoslavia constituted extensions of milk conservation projects for which allocations had been made in previous years. Of the total long-range aid approved in 1952 for the Eastern Mediterranean area, 52 per cent was in the field of milk conservation; for Europe it was 55 per cent and for Latin America 10 per cent.

2. Finances

In 1952 a total of 38 governments pledged or contributed a total of $10,775,000 to UNICEF. (Included in this amount are some of the 1952 pledges, which were actually entered into the UNICEF accounts for the year 1951.) The 38, governments were:

Afghanistan	France
Australia	Germany
Austria	Greece
Bolivia	Honduras
Brazil	India
Brunei	Indonesia
Burma	Iraq
Canada	Israel
Ceylon	Italy
Chile	Japan
Denmark	Liechtenstein
Dominican Republic	Luxembourg
Ecuador	Netherlands
El Salvador	New Zealand

Norway	Thailand
Pakistan	Turkey
Peru	United Kingdom
Sweden	United States
Switzerland	Yugoslavia

Contributions from the governments of underdeveloped countries constituted 17.7 per cent of the total amount. The largest contributor, the United States Government, contributed $6,667,000 in 1952. The amounts pledged or contributed by governments in 1952 reflected an increase over 1951 when it totalled $9,851,000 from 35 governments.

Income from individual private contributions in 1952 totalled $99,000, compared with $67,000 in 1951. Income from organized private fund-raising campaigns was $48,000 in 1952; however, proceeds of over $400,000 from 1952 Australian, New Zealand and Pakistan campaigns were not committed to UNICEF until 1953. Proceeds from the settlement of UNRRA claims amounted in 1952 to $137,000. Income of the Fund during the year 1952 other than contributions amounted to $638,000.

The total income entered in the UNICEF books from all sources during the year 1952 was approximately $10,270,000. The fact that the Fund was able to allocate $16.8 million was due to the fact that it was able to draw, in part, on funds raised in earlier years.

Target Programme and Budget: At its April 1952 session, the Executive Board approved a target programme and budget of $20 million for external aid for the period 1 July 1952 to 30 June 1953. Following a recommendation of the Programme Committee's Sub-Committee on Fund Raising, the Executive Director submitted to the Board a proposed target programme and budget to cover the calendar year 1953.

Approved by the Executive Board in October 1952, this allocations target for external aid in 1953 amounted to $20 million. In setting this target, the UNICEF Executive Board took into account the additional amounts to be provided by each assisted country as a result of the UNICEF "internal matching" principle. The internal matching, which included expenditures from local resources for local personnel, facilities, supplies and services, involved commitments by governments in 1952 of over $23 million.¹⁶⁴

Inclusion of UNICEF as Responsibility of General Assembly Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds: At its October 1952 session, the Executive Board decided "that, it would be advantageous for representatives of governments to add their weight to that of the Administration in securing contributions for UNICEF from Governments". The Board expressed the opinion that this responsibility might best be undertaken through the General Assembly's Negotiating Committee for Extra-Budgetary Funds. This was approved by the General Assembly at its seventh session in resolution 693(VII).¹⁶⁵

In April 1952 the Executive Board approved a report of its Working Group on Creation of a Fund Raising Committee and authorized the Programme Committee either directly, or through a committee established by it with the addition of one or more members of the Executive Board, to advise the Executive Director and the Executive Board on fund raising for UNICEF from governmental and private sources. On the basis of the Executive Board's action, the Programme Committee in April 1952 established a Sub-Committee on Fund Raising, consisting of three members of the Programme Committee and two from the Executive Board. This Sub-Committee reported to the October 1952 session of the Executive Board on the question of UNICEF inclusion in the scope of the General Assembly Negotiating Committee, on ways in which individual Board members could assist the Administration in disseminating information about the work of UNICEF, on the use of services of outstanding personalities for fund-raising purposes, and on the question of establishing National Committees for UNICEF. The report of the Sub-Committee set forth a number of ways through which the Executive Board, the Programme Committee, governments and the Administration might assist in the creation of National Committees for UNICEF. It was pointed out that National Committees were not exclusively nor even predominantly fund-raising instruments but had wider functions. These functions would be determined by local circumstances in each instance.

3. Co-operation with other United Nations Agencies and Non-Governmental Organizations

The UNICEF function of providing essential supplies and equipment to governments for child care programmes is part of a co-ordinated scheme through which the technical departments of the ¹⁶⁴ These figures understate the amount of local commitments, as they do not include the expenditures which will be made on a continuing basis for the programmes after UNICEF aid has ceased, nor do they take into account the large amount of voluntary effort characteristic of many of the programmes.

¹⁶⁵ See p. 126.

United Nations and the relevant specialized agencies give the governments related technical advice and services. In addition, these agencies provide UNICEF with assurance that the plans for the use of the UNICEF aid, and the supplies and equipment to be provided, are technically sound.

At its April 1952 session, the Executive Board noted that this general division of functions had proved useful and workable and that government plans of operations coming before the Board for approval showed increasingly the value of the joint participation by all relevant agencies at the earliest stages of planning and implementation of programmes.

The Executive Director in his General Progress Report to the October 1952 Board session referred to administrative developments along these lines in each of the regions which had served to strengthen the relationship in the field. He called attention to the large number of WHO and FAO experts and United Nations Social Welfare Advisers available in the field to assist both governments and UNICEF in various aspects of UNICEF-aided programmes. At the October 1952 Board session, statements on the value of co-operation with UNICEF were also made by the Director-General of WHO, the Director-General of FAO and the Director of the United Nations Division of Social Welfare.

The Executive Board approved the granting of consultative status to the members of the Non-Governmental Organizations Committee on UNICEF. This Committee was established in the summer of 1949 with the name "UNICEF Advisory Committee of Non-Governmental Organizations" to advise the UNICEF Administration on fund-raising and other matters. In order to prevent misunderstanding as to its functions in relation to the UNICEF Board, the Committee decided to change its name to "Non-Governmental Organizations Committee on UNICEF". The manner in which the consultative status was granted to members of the Committee was defined in a set of rules adopted by the Board.

4. Consideration of the Board's Report

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE SOCIAL COMMISSION AT ITS EIGHTH SESSION

In accordance with Assembly resolution 417 (V),¹⁶⁶ the Social Commission at its eighth session, held from 12 to 29 May, considered the report of the Executive Board of UNICEF (E/2214) and the documents concerning principles and policies relating to the Fund's programmes (E/CN.5/258 and Add.1).

The Executive Director of UNICEF, in submitting the report, noted that UNICEF aid was now going principally to under-developed countries, including Africa, for long-range programmes. At every point in UNICEF's work a high degree of co-ordination had been achieved with the Department of Social Affairs, the Technical Assistance Administration and the specialized agencies. He noted the increasing efforts of citizens both at national and local community levels and the increasing government expenditures in under-developed countries for child care, encouraged by the material aid of UNICEF. He stressed the great need for new funds in order to achieve the goal of $20 million for the year ending 30 June 1953.

Most representatives paid tribute to the work of the Fund as an outstanding example of international collaboration.

It was pointed out that UNICEF participated in the Working Group on Long-Range Activities for Children, of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, which had given first priority to the development of programmes for the training of auxiliary maternal and child welfare personnel. The Commission noted with satisfaction that the Executive Board had stated its readiness under certain conditions to aid in meeting the local costs of training of auxiliary personnel.

The Commission unanimously adopted a resolution (E/2274) which it recommended for adoption by the Economic and Social Council.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FOURTEENTH SESSION

At its fourteenth session, held from 20 May to 1 August, the Economic and Social Council considered the report of the Executive Board of UNICEF (E/2214), following its session in April 1952. The Council also had before it the recommendation contained in the report of the Social Commission (E/2274).

At the 658th and 659th plenary meetings of the Council on 24 and 25 July, the representatives of Belgium, Canada, China, Egypt, France, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sweden, the United States and Uruguay paid tribute to the work of UNICEF as an outstanding example of international collaboration similar to those tributes which had already been paid in the Social Com mission. The conditions of tens of millions of children had been improved; UNICEF aid had led to increased child care services within the countries concerned, and the relatively small amounts of supplies and equipment provided by UNICEF had provided the foundation for permanent child care services. UNICEF was commended for its ability to provide relief rapidly in the event of natural catastrophes and other emergencies, for its sound principles, flexibility of operational methods and economical administration, and for its close collaboration with other United Nations bodies.

The Council adopted, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, the resolution recommended by the Commission (resolution 434 J (XIV)). By this resolution, the Council noted the report of the Executive Board in which aid was approved for 53 separate child care projects in 39 countries and territories. It noted:

(1) that programmes were to be extended to 72 countries and territories; (2) that this aid, extended principally to economically under-developed countries, dealt with basic maternal and child welfare programmes, the training of auxiliary workers, mass campaigns against wide-spread epidemic and endemic diseases of childhood, child feeding, milk conservation and the establishment of plants to produce antibiotics, insecticides and vaccines; and (3) the promptness of UNICEF's emergency aid.

The Council also commended the extension of UNICEF assistance to African countries; endorsed the Executive Board's encouragement of the training of auxiliary workers; and recommended that efforts be increased to make known the achievements of UNICEF in its world-wide collaboration with the United Nations and the specialized agencies and with governments. The Council further expressed concern that the lack of funds had prevented UNICEF from fulfilling its target budget of $30 million during the year 30 June 1951 to 1 July 1952, and called to the attention of governments and private individuals the need for meeting the target programme of $20 million for the year 1 July 1952 to 30 June 1953.

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS SEVENTH SESSION

Views similar to those expressed in the Commission and in the Council were expressed in the Assembly's Third Committee, at its 465th to 469th meetings, from 4 to 9 December, during the general debate on the report of the Economic and Social Council (A/2172) on social questions. The representatives of Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Canada, China, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, France, Greece, Haiti, India, Israel, the Netherlands, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sweden, the United States and Yugoslavia, among others, paid tribute to the activities of UNICEF as an outstanding example of constructive and practical United Nations achievement in the social field, and drew attention to the importance of financial support of the work by all governments. These representatives also stressed the following points:

(1) the appeal of UNICEF to public opinion and the fact that it had evoked universal approbation and acclaim; (2) the important concrete benefits children had received as a result of the stimulus of UNICEF aid; (3) the emphasis placed by UNICEF on aid to economically under-developed countries, and on long-range programmes, together with ability to provide assistance rapidly in emergencies; (4) the value of the UNICEF "internal matching" principle and its emphasis on self-help; (5) the sound operational methods and structure of the Fund; (6) the increasingly close co-operation between UNICEF and the specialized agencies; (7) the valuable impetus to training personnel for maternal and child welfare afforded by UNICEF aid to country programmes and through institutions such as the International Children's Centre in Paris; and (8) the fact that the work of UNICEF received too little attention in the information media of the world.

Australia, Belgium, Burma, the Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Haiti, Iran, Israel, the Philippines, Sweden and Yugoslavia presented a joint draft resolution (A/C.3/L.320) commending the work of UNICEF and appealing to governments and private individuals to contribute to the Fund as generously as possible during 1953 so that its target programme of $20 million could be fulfilled.

An amendment by Afghanistan (A/C.3/L.321), which would add an appeal to information media to co-operate in disseminating information concerning the activities of UNICEF, was adopted by 35 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

The twelve-Power draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Committee by 42 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, and by the General Assembly, at its 409th plenary meeting on 20 December, without discussion, by 49 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. The resolution (641 (VII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the report of the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly, and noting the high tribute paid by the Council to the work of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund as an outstanding example of international collaboration,

"Noting that the Executive Board of the Fund approved in 1952 aid for eighty long-range child-care programmes in forty-nine countries and territories, and that the Fund will now be aiding children in seventy-two countries and territories, particularly in under-developed areas,

"Noting with appreciation the method of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund aid whereby supplies and equipment are used to make a permanent contribution to the welfare of millions of children by encouraging development and extension within the countries of action on behalf of children,

"Commending the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund for the promptness of its aid in case of emergencies such as floods, earthquakes and droughts,

"Expressing its appreciation that close working relationships have been developed between the Fund and technical departments of the United Nations and the relevant specialized agencies, so that there is increasing joint participation at the earliest stages in the planning and implementation of aid to child-care programmes,

"Bearing in mind that, because of its practical and material forms, United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund aid is easily and invariably understood in all parts of the world and thus has become an outstanding symbol of constructive United Nations activities,

"Convinced of the importance of contributions to the Fund in amounts sufficient to fulfil its target programme and budget of $US20 million for the year 1953,

"1. Appeals to governments and private individuals to contribute to the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund as generously as possible during 1953, so that the target programme of $20 million may be fulfilled for the benefit of the children of the world;

"2. Appeals to information media to co-operate in disseminating information concerning the activities of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund."

Q. NARCOTIC DRUGS

The Commission on Narcotic Drugs devoted the greater part of its seventh session, held from 15 April to 9 May 1952, to studying measures to combat the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs and to preparing a single convention on narcotic drugs to replace the existing international instruments.

The Commission's report (E/2219) was considered by the Economic and Social Council at its fourteenth session, at the 574th, 580th, 581st and 583rd plenary meetings on 22, 27 and 28 May. During the discussions, some representatives, including those of Pakistan and the USSR, expressed their objection to parts of the report referring to certain countries. The Council, however, at its 583rd plenary meeting on 28 May, by 14 votes to 4, adopted resolution 436 B (XIV), in which it took note of the Commission's report.

Also before the Council was the report of the Permanent Central Opium Board on statistics of narcotics for 1950 and the Work of the Board in 1951 (E/OB/7 and Add.1). During the discussion, some representatives, including those of India, Iran and the United Kingdom, submitted explanations in connexion with some of the statistics contained in the report. The Council, at its 583rd plenary meeting on 28 May, by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention, adopted resolution 436 H (XIV) in which, among other things,¹⁶⁷ it took note of the Board's report.

The Council examined major problems such as those relating to opium and the coca leaf and also studied administrative measures intended to lead to closer international co-operation in the control of narcotic drugs and to strengthen such control by the adoption of measures at the international level. The matters considered by the Commission and the Council are dealt with below.

1. International Limitation of Opium Production

At its thirteenth session in 1951, the Council had had before it two proposals seeking by different methods to limit the production of opium. The first was a proposed interim agreement to limit the production of opium to medical and scientific needs, by means of an international opium monopoly. The second was a group of general principles which the Commission on Narcotic Drugs had set forth with a view to the conclusion of a protocol relating to the limitation of the production of opium by means of the limitation of opium stocks. In resolution 395 B and C (XIII),¹⁶⁸ the Council had requested the Secretary-General to transmit those two texts to governments, asking them to submit observations. The Secretary-General had also been instructed to prepare an annotated compendium of these observations and to draft the protocol in legal form.

At its fourteenth session, the Council had before it an annotated compendium of the observations of 37 governments on the principles of the draft protocol and on the proposed interim agreement (E/2186 and Corr.1 and Add.1 to 3), as well as a legal text of the protocol, prepared by the Secretary-General (E/2186, annex). The compendium presented general comments on the protocol, general comments on the interim agreement and comments on specific provisions of the protocol.

Most representatives felt that, in the light of those observations, the time had not yet come to set up the international opium monopoly contemplated by the proposed interim agreement. They also thought that, in view of the divergencies of opinion which had appeared, it was preferable not to reopen the discussion on this matter.

Some representatives, including those of Belgium, China and the United Kingdom, considered that the text of the protocol submitted did not adequately meet the situation. The representatives of China, Pakistan, Sweden and the United Kingdom were among those who suggested that the text should be transmitted to governments with the request that they communicate to the Secretary-General their observations.

The representatives of Belgium, Egypt, France and the United States, on the other hand, felt that an international conference should not be further postponed. In spite of certain deficiencies, the draft protocol represented the best means of settling, partially at least, the problem of limiting opium production so as to reduce the illicit traffic and drug addiction. Accordingly, these representatives submitted, at the 574th plenary meeting of the Council on 22 May, a joint draft resolution (E/L.320, subsequently revised as E/L.320/Rev.1) which would have the Council convene an international conference to adopt a protocol relating to the limitation of the production of opium and request governments to submit, before the opening of the conference, their observations on the draft protocol.

Two amendments were submitted, one by the Philippines (E/L.33) and one jointly by China, Sweden and the United Kingdom.

The Philippine amendment proposed to add to the joint draft resolution a request that the Secretary-General bring to the attention of the proposed conference General Assembly resolution 422 (V)¹⁶⁹ of 4 December 1950, in which the Assembly requested the Commission on Human Rights to include in the International Covenant on Human Rights an article by which the provisions of the Covenant should be applicable equally to a signatory Metropolitan State and to all the territories administered or governed by such Metropolitan State. The amendment was not adopted by the Council, 6 votes being cast in favour, 6 against, and 6 abstentions.

Part of the joint amendment by China, Sweden and the United Kingdom, which would have the Council state that it realized the need for limiting the production of opium to medical and scientific needs, was adopted by the Council, by 15 votes to 3, at its 580th plenary meeting on 27 May. The remainder of the amendment, which, among other things, sought the circulation of the text of the draft protocol to governments for their comments, was rejected in a series of separate votes, ranging from 10 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions, to 8 votes to 6, with 4 abstentions.

The joint draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by the Council at the same meeting by 13 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions, as resolution 436 A (XIV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Realizing the importance of the struggle against the development of drug addiction, and the need for limiting the production of opium to medical and scientific needs,

"Wishing to pursue the efforts already accomplished on the international level to facilitate this struggle and make it more effective,

"Having examined the observations made by governments on the principles of the protocol relating to limitation of the production of opium,

"Convinced in the light of these observations that it is desirable and possible to adopt immediately effective measures to further the progress already made under the 1925 and 1931 Conventions,

"1. Decides to convene as soon as possible, in conformity with Article 62, paragraph 4, of the Charter, an international conference to draft and adopt a protocol relating to the limitation of the production of opium; and

"2. Requests the Secretary-General:

"(a) To convene the Conference at such time as he may find appropriate, and preferably after the conclusion of the eighth session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs;

"(b) To invite to the Conference States Members of the United Nations and non-member States which have acceded to the international conventions concerning narcotic drugs;

"(c) To invite representatives of the specialized agencies, with the same rights and privileges as they enjoy at sessions of the Council;

"(d) To prepare provisional rules of procedure for the Conference;

"(e) To ask such governments as have not already done so to submit before 1 December 1952 their observations on the present draft protocol relating to limitation of the production of opium, together with such textual amendments as they think fit to propose; and

"(f) To prepare a compilation of the observations submitted by governments and transmit it to all States invited to the Conference not less than six weeks before the opening of the Conference."

2. The Problem of the Coca Leaf

At its thirteenth session, in resolution 395 D (XIII),¹⁷⁰ the Council had requested the Commission to examine the problem of the coca leaf, taking into consideration all available information, and to submit to the Council its recommendations on the matter. The information available to the Commission was to include not only the documentation then existing¹⁷¹ but also the comments which the Governments of Bolivia and Peru had been invited to address to the Secretary-General with respect to the additional observations of the Commission of Enquiry (E/CN.7/-235).

The Bolivian Government stated that no conclusions could be formulated on the problem of coca chewing until the studies undertaken by the countries concerned had been completed. It also applied for United Nations assistance to continue its study of the problem. The Peruvian Government, for its part, disputed some conclusions of the Commission of Enquiry, including those relating to the dangers of coca chewing, but agreed that some of the experiments proposed by the Commission of Enquiry should be carried out. These experiments were to consist of observing the reactions of individual coca chewers after an improvement had been made in their social conditions, and in particular their diet, in order to determine whether, in improved circumstances, they would continue or cease to chew the leaf. The Bolivian Government informed the Commission on Narcotic Drugs during its seventh session that it agreed to the proposed experiments.

On the basis of the recommendations made by the Commission (E/2219) a draft resolution (E/L.342) was prepared by the Secretariat and, with some drafting changes, was adopted by the Council at its 583rd plenary meeting on 28 May, by 13 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 436 E (XIV).

By this resolution, the Council requested the technical assistance services of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, with the help of the Secretariat, to study the possibility of undertaking the experiments proposed, within the framework of the existing technical assistance programmes in Bolivia and Peru. It recommended that the Governments of Bolivia and Peru should take the necessary steps to limit the production of coca leaves to licit consumption and manufacture and take effective measures to prevent the introduction into trading channels of coca leaves and crude cocaine which could form a

3. Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs

In its report (E/2219), the Commission on Narcotic Drugs informed the Council of the progress achieved with the preparation of a single convention to replace the existing multilateral treaties for the control of narcotics. In accordance with the decision taken at its previous session,¹⁷³ the Commission thoroughly examined the draft convention prepared by the Secretary-General (E/CN.7/AC.3/3/Rev.2). During these discussions, which concerned articles 2 to 13 (relating to the scope of the convention, the obligations of parties to the convention and certain matters concerning the international control organs), the Commission took into account the written observations communicated to the Secretary-General by the governments of some of the States represented on the Commission and by the Permanent Central Opium Board, the Drug Supervisory Body and the World Health Organization.

The Commission decided to postpone consideration of the other articles (which concerned other matters regarding the international control organs, economic phases, penal provisions and the cure of the drug habit, as well as general provisions and definitions) to its eighth session. It asked the Secretary-General to prepare for submission to its eighth session a revision of the first part of the new draft convention and certain schedules which would form an integral part of the draft, with due regard for the principles formulated by the Commission at its seventh session.

These principles related in particular to articles 2 to 13 of the draft convention, though some of them related to the text as a whole or to

¹⁷¹ This documentation consisted chiefly of the report of the United Nations Commission of Enquiry on the Coca Leaf (E/1666), the statement made by the Peruvian representative to the fifth session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs (E/1666/Add.3), the summary records of the 118th and 119th meetings of the Commission, and the observations of the Commission of Enquiry on the statements made by the representatives of Bolivia and Peru at the fifth session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs (E/1666/Add.1).

¹⁷² The President of the Council confirmed the interpretation that this resolution was in no way inconsistent with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 200(III) on technical assistance for economic development, because the studies referred to in the Council resolution would not be undertaken unless the governments concerned so requested.

provisions which did not appear in these articles. Essentially, they dealt with four problems.

The first related to the precise scope of the new treaty. For example, the Commission considered whether it was sufficient to codify the provisions existing in present treaties, subject to the inclusion of only those modifications which experience had shown to be necessary, or whether a system of control should be elaborated which would anticipate, in so far as was possible, future developments. The Commission felt that it was impossible to take a decision of principle in this respect and that there was no fundamental discrepancy between these two views but merely a difference of emphasis.

The second problem studied by the Commission was that of the establishment, structure and status of the control organs. It took the view that the policy-making and technical functions ought to be the responsibility of a new organ similar to the Commission on Narcotic Drugs, namely, a functional commission of the Council, which would be distinct from the semi-judicial body corresponding to the Permanent Central Opium Board and the Drug Supervisory Body, and which would be known as the "International Narcotics Commission". The decisions and recommendations adopted by the proposed new organ under the new convention could be approved, modified or rejected by the Council but would become operative automatically whenever the Council took no action in the matter within a specified time-limit. Provision was made for cases in which the Council would invite certain States not Members of the United Nations to be represented in the new commission and, accordingly, it was decided to create in the text of the convention a legal basis for the privileges and immunities which its members would need for the performance of their functions. In addition, it was proposed that provision should be made in the convention to enable the new commission to delegate its powers to a committee. As regards the functions currently being performed by the Permanent Central Opium Board and the Drug Supervisory Body, it was decided to recommend the merger of these two bodies into a single semi-judicial organ to be known as the "International Narcotics Control Board".

Thirdly, the Commission expressed its views on placing additional drugs under control and on the exemption of certain others. It was recognized that in exercising this function the "International Narcotics Commission" should act in each case on the advice of WHO as regards the medical, pharmacological and pharmaceutical characteristics of the drug in question, but that it would be for the Commission, subject to the Council's approval, to take the final decision with regard to control, in view of the fact that such decisions had social and administrative as well as technical implications. Any decision taken in this respect should be binding on the parties, save in the case of a recommendation to prohibit the use of narcotic drugs. In addition, it was decided to maintain the Commission's power to place a drug under provisional control.

Lastly, as regards the procedure whereby the various control systems would be applied to each category of drugs, the Commission proposed that the various drugs should be listed in schedules forming an integral part of the treaty. As regards the export of narcotic drugs, the Commission rejected the idea of an international clearing house which would have made the issue of export permits subject to verification by the proposed "International Narcotics Control Board" in the light of the estimates drawn up for the importing country. The Commission felt, however, that the new Board should have the task which was now entrusted to the Permanent Central Opium Board by virtue of the 1931 Convention of informing countries desirous of exporting the more dangerous drugs to countries not parties to the 1925 and 1931 Conventions, whether such exports should exceed their estimates for the year in question.

After its discussion of the draft single convention and of the control system to be provided for in the future treaty, the Commission decided that the control measures applicable to the various categories of drugs should be set forth in the text of the new convention. As to the use of certain drugs for medical purposes, the Commission decided that the convention should not compel governments parties to it to prohibit the use of any drug for medical purposes but that it should contain recommendations for the prohibition of certain dangerous drugs. The drugs to be included in this group would be listed and the Commission would subsequently be able to recommend the addition of other drugs to the list.

Finally, with regard to the information to be supplied by governments to the international control bodies, the Commission felt: (1) that the nature of the statistical information required should be made clear in the text of the convention instead of being determined by the new commission; and (2) that it was not necessary for States to communicate to each other the names and addresses of importers and exporters of narcotic drugs. They would, however, continue to communicate all other information which they are bound to supply under the existing treaties.

The Council at its fourteenth session took no action with regard to the proposed single convention.

4. Scientific Research on Narcotics

At its fourteenth session, the Council had before it a number of recommendations made by the Commission (E/2219) concerning the future of research into the nature of opium and, in particular, into the possibility of determining the origin of opium seized from the illicit traffic. This research was being carried on pursuant to Council resolutions 159 II C (VII)¹⁷⁴ and 246 F (XI).¹⁷⁵

The Commission felt that the research programme should be intensified by again inviting governments to send opium samples to the Secretariat, and that the scientific processes devised for determining the origin of opium should be employed forthwith in the campaign against the illicit traffic. It proposed, among other things, that the Secretariat should be enabled, by arrangement with the authority seizing a quantity of opium, to examine a sample and subsequently communicate to the Commission the results of its laboratory tests.

The Commission advocated the establishment of a permanent United Nations laboratory which would continue work currently in progress concerning opium, and might eventually also engage in other activities, such as the development of methods for the analysis of adulterated illicit narcotics and for the identification of synthetic narcotics which may find their way into the illicit traffic. The Secretariat provided an approximate estimate of the cost of fitting out such a laboratory in the Headquarters building (E/2219).

At the 581st plenary meeting on 27 May, without discussion, the Council adopted by 14 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, a draft resolution submitted by the United States (E/L.339) as resolution 436 F (XIV). By this resolution, the Council requested governments to send to the United Nations Research Laboratory, for analysis, samples of opium seized in illicit traffic. The Council also instructed the Secretary-General to submit to it, at its fifteenth session, a more detailed estimate of the cost of equipping a laboratory, preferably in the Secretariat building, large enough to handle the work.

5. Control of Synthetic Narcotic Drugs

At its seventh session, the Commission discussed the question of synthetic narcotic drugs and noted that, owing to their peculiar properties and increasing consumption, these drugs raised a new and difficult problem in the matter of narcotic drugs control.

During the debate in the Commission it was recognized that it was impossible at present to achieve the ideal of prohibiting the manufacture of addiction-producing synthetic narcotic drugs (except for scientific purposes) since effective harmless substitutes were not always available.

Reference was also made during the discussion to the difficulties experienced by the customs services in certain countries in identifying synthetic narcotic drugs, of which there was a long list and the names and formulae of which were complicated. The Commission's attention was also drawn to the dangers of pilferage to which the presence of a visible mark on the outer wrappings of a package of synthetic narcotic drugs might give rise in the course of warehousing operations or in transit.

The Commission also discussed a proposal submitted by the World Health Organization (WHO) to the effect that on all receptacles containing synthetic narcotic drugs the international non-proprietary name proposed by WHO should be inscribed. The Commission, however, considered this recommendation premature since not all States had as yet agreed to adopt the nomenclature proposed by WHO.

The Commission recommended (E/2219) and the Council, at its 581st plenary meeting on 27 May, adopted, by 12 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, without discussion, a proposal relating to the control of synthetic narcotic drugs. By this resolution (436 G (XIV)), the Council, noting that the use of synthetic narcotic drugs was developing rapidly, requested the Secretary-General to call the attention of governments to the desirability of:

(1) bringing all synthetic narcotic drugs under their national legislation; (2) acceding to the Protocol of 19 November 1948; (3) limiting their estimates to medical and scientific requirements; (4) exercising strict control over the manufacture and therapeutic use of synthetic narcotic drugs; and (5) requiring all packages containing them to be marked clearly with a double red line for identification. By the same resolution, the Council expressed its thanks to the Permanent Central Opium Board and the World Health Organization for the vigilance they had exercised in regard to these substances.

6. Illicit Traffic in Narcotics

At its seventh session, the Commission examined and noted the summaries of illicit transactions and seizures communicated to the Secretariat in 1951 (E/NS. 1951, Summaries 1 to 6), the documents reproducing chapter V (Illicit Traffic) of the annual reports of governments for 1951 (E/CN.7/232 and Add. 1-4) on the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs, and the Secretary-General's memorandum on the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs in 1951 (E/CN.7/234).

In this connexion, the Commission reviewed the situation in the various areas of the world where there is known illicit traffic, concentrating particularly on America, Europe, the Near East and the Far East.

During this general discussion on the illicit traffic, it was noted that co-operation between the administrative and police authorities of all the countries concerned was continuing to develop and was giving excellent results. On the other hand, the Commission expressed concern over the fact that in a number of countries persons involved in the illicit traffic were being given comparatively light sentences. Some countries, however, had taken steps to provide heavier penalties.

The Commission took note of the memorandum from the International Criminal Police Commission (ICPC) on the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs in 1951 (E/CN.7/236) and then heard a statement by the representative of ICPC, who drew attention to the advantages of international co-operation in the fight against the illicit traffic. This statement also stressed the importance of the rapid transmission of information on cases of the illicit traffic to all the responsible national and international bodies.

The Commission discussed ways and means of collaboration between ICPC and the Secretariat of the United Nations. It considered that such collaboration should include in the first place the exchange of information on the movements of drug traffickers. Less importance, on the other hand, should be attached to statistical information. It was also emphasized that excellent results had been achieved by direct collaboration between the governments concerned and ICPC. The importance of the special courses for police officers organized by ICPC was also mentioned, especially in the case of countries not maintaining police units specializing in narcotics cases.

The Commission recommended (E/2219) and the Council adopted without discussion, at its 581st plenary meeting on 27 May, the draft resolution, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 436 C (XIV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Having been informed by the Commission on Narcotic Drugs that the international illicit traffic in narcotic drugs has increased dangerously,

"Requests the Secretary-General:

"(a) To advise governments that this baneful trade cannot be combated successfully by national efforts alone, and that international co-operation is essential;

"(b) To urge governments to take immediate steps, if they have not already done so, to adopt the practice of direct communication between national administrations controlling the illicit traffic; if, within a country, more than one department exercises control thereof, the government concerned shall determine the channel through which such communication is to be conducted; and

"(c) To ask governments to review their preventive systems with a view to ensuring that their preventive organizations are adequate to combat the illicit traffic within their territories."

Another aspect of the question of illicit traffic in narcotics considered by the Commission was that of illicit trafficking by the crews of merchant ships and civil aircraft. The Commission informed the Council that there had been an increase in the illicit traffic in narcotics on merchant ships and civil aircraft during the last five years and that this increase was mainly due to smuggling by merchant seafarers and crews of civil aircraft. The Commission recommended (E/2219) that the Secretary-General be requested to compile a list of such persons who had been convicted of offences against narcotic laws on or after 1 January 1953, and that such list be sent to all States with the recommendation of the Council that they take measures, among other things, to revoke or withhold licences and certificates to such persons.

To the second draft resolution recommended by the Commission, the representative of the United Kingdom submitted a two-part amendment (E/L.340). He said that the first part concerned merely drafting changes but the second was designed to extend the scope of the Commission's draft which would have the Secretary-General transmit to the maritime and aeronautical unions and companies a list of merchant seamen and members of civil air crews who had been convicted of offences against narcotic laws on or after 1953. The amendment was designed to include all shipping and aeronautical organizations.

Both parts of the United Kingdom amendment were adopted by the Council, by 10 votes to 1, with 7 abstentions, and by 15 votes to none, with 7 abstentions, respectively. The Council, at its 581st plenary meeting on 27 May, adopted the recommendation of the Commission as amended (resolution 436 D (XIV)). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Having been informed by the Commission on Narcotic Drugs that there has been an increase in the illicit traffic in narcotics on merchant ships and civil aircraft during the past five years and that this increase is principally due to smuggling by merchant seafarers and crews of civil aircraft,

"Desiring to take all measures possible to combat this illicit traffic,

"1. Requests the Secretary-General to compile as soon as may be convenient, and thereafter to bring up to date at convenient regular intervals, a list of merchant seafarers and members of civil air crews who have been convicted of offences against narcotic laws on or after 1 January 1953, setting out so far as possible the following information:

"(a) Name (including aliases where appropriate);

"(b) Nationality;

"(c) Date of birth;

"(d) Nature of offence and disposition of the case; and

"2. Instructs the Secretary-General to send the list to the governments of all States with the recommendation of the Council;

"(a) That they take appropriate measures:

"(i) To revoke certificates and licences currently held by merchant seafarers or members of civil air crews so convicted; and

"(ii) To withhold the issue to such persons of such licences and certificates, such revocation or withholding of such licences or certificates to be either temporary or permanent as may be appropriate in the circumstances of any particular case, provided that if either course does not accord with national law or usage the government concerned shall take such steps as may be open to it in accordance with domestic law or usage to give effect to this resolution, i.e., by sending a copy of the list to the competent authorities for such action as the latter may decide to take; and

"(b) That they send a copy of the list to the maritime and aeronautical unions, companies and other appropriate organizations in their territories for their consideration in connexion with the exercise of their disciplinary functions and any functions which they may exercise in connexion with the engagement of crews."

7. Permanent Central Opium Board

At its 574th plenary meeting on 22 May, the Council considered the report of the Permanent Central Opium Board on statistics of narcotics for 1950 and the work of the Board for 1951 (E/OB/7 and Add.1).

The Council also had before it a joint draft resolution by Belgium, France and the United States (E/L.319) which would have the Council note the statement of the Board contained in its report that there were inadequate national controls over the production of opium and coca leaves and that there was ground for the conclusion that the illicit traffic had its origin in the producing countries. The draft would further urge the governments of producing countries to take effective measures of control.

Support for the joint draft resolution was expressed by the representatives of Egypt, Iran, Pakistan and the United Kingdom; the representatives of Iran and Pakistan, however, deplored its emphasis on the producing countries. Pakistan submitted an amendment to extend the scope of the joint draft to all countries and this amendment was also sponsored by the United States (E/L.338).

At the suggestion of the Chairman, the sponsors of the joint draft resolution agreed to add a paragraph in terms of which the Council would take formal note of the report, and the Council adopted this paragraph without vote. It adopted unanimously the Pakistan amendment, by which the Council would urge the governments of all countries to take further suitable steps to tighten control on import and distribution of opium and coca leaves in their respective countries. At its 583rd plenary meeting on 28 May the Council adopted, by 17 votes to none, with 1 abstention, the joint draft resolution as a whole, as amended, as resolution 436 H (XIV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"1. Takes note of the report of the Permanent Central Opium Board on statistics of narcotics for 1950 and the work of the Board in 1951; and

"2. Noting the statement of the Board that there is inadequacy of national controls over the production and distribution of opium and coca leaves and that 'there is ground for the conclusion that the illicit traffic in question has its origin in the producing countries',

"3. Urges the governments of the opium and coca leaf producing countries:

"(a) To take effective measures immediately to control all production and distribution of opium and coca leaves, in order to prevent these substances from entering the illicit market; and

"(b) To report their full production, stocks and exports of opium and coca leaves for 1950 to the Permanent Central Opium Board if they have not already done so; and

"4. Urges the governments of all countries to take further suitable steps to tighten control on import and distribution of opium and coca leaves in their respective countries."

8. Implementation of International Treaties

a. INVITATION TO LIBYA

At its 574th plenary meeting on 22 May, the Council had before it a memorandum by the Secretary-General (E/2188), proposing that the Council adopt a draft resolution inviting Libya to become a party to the Protocol of 19 November 1948 relating to Narcotic Drugs. Support for the draft was expressed by the representative of Egypt.

The Council unanimously adopted a resolution to that effect (resolution 436 I (XIV)).

On the basis of a memorandum submitted by the Secretary-General (E/2198), the Council, at its 580th plenary meeting on 27 May, by 15 votes to 3, adopted a resolution (436 J (XIV)) authorizing the Secretary-General to act on its behalf whenever findings made by the World Health Organization under the 1925 Convention concerning the exemption from the control of certain preparations containing narcotic drugs were communicated to governments.

c. INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF THE DRUG β -4-MORPHOLINYLETHYLMORPHINE

In its report on its seventh session (E/2219) the Commission informed the Council of the steps that had been taken to define the system of international control to be applied to the drug β -4-morpholinylethylmorphine. The Commission explained that in view of the relevant finding by WHO's Expert Committee on Drugs Liable to Produce Addiction, a committee of three experts had been appointed under article 11 (4) of the 1931 Convention, to determine whether the drug in question came under sub-group of Group I, or under Group II of article 1 of the Convention. The Committee appointed decided that β -4-morpholinylethylmorphine should be placed under Group II, that is, in a category subject to a less stringent system of control. This decision was communicated by the Secretary-General to the governments of States Parties to the narcotics conventions.

No action in this connexion was taken by the Council at its fourteenth session.

R. POPULATION AND MIGRATION QUESTIONS

The Population Commission did not meet in 1952 and therefore did not report to the Economic and Social Council at its fourteenth session. The Council, however, considered the question of convening a world population conference at its 588th and 598th plenary meetings on 3 and 10 July 1952.

The report of the Social Commission, in so far as it referred to migration questions, was considered by the Council at the 224th meeting of its Social Committee on 21 July and at its 659th plenary meeting on 25 July. It also considered a report by ILO on methods of international financing of European migration at its 649th plenary meeting on 18 July 1952.

1. Population

In accordance with resolution 389 C (XIII)¹⁷⁶ the Council had before it at its fourteenth session a report by the Secretary-General (E/2199 and Add.1 to 4) containing the replies of 32 governments and of interested specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations on the holding, date, possible agenda and composition and cost of a world conference on population. The majority, the report indicated, had approved, in principle, the holding of such a conference under the sponsorship of the United Nations, in collaboration with interested specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations (including the International Union for the Scientific Study of Population (IUSSP)). The majority also considered that the conference should be primarily a scientific discussion of experts, but opinion was divided as to whether it should be held in the summer or autumn of 1953 or 1954. The Secretary-General also suggested a tentative list of topics for discussion at the conference: (a) demographic aspects of problems of economic development of under-developed countries; (b) demographic aspects of post-war migration problems; (c) probable future growth of population; (d) aging of the population; (e) legislation relevant to population; and (f) methodology.

The Council considered the question at its 588th and 598th plenary meetings on 3 and 10

July 1952. In addition to the Secretary-General's report, it had before it a joint draft resolution (E/L.318) by the Philippines and the United States providing, inter alia, for the convening of a conference in 1953 or 1954, and a note (E/L.351) by the Secretary-General on the financial implications of this proposal.

The majority of representatives, among them those of Belgium, Canada, China, Cuba, Egypt, France, Mexico, Pakistan, the Philippines, Sweden, the United States and Uruguay, were in favour of calling a world population conference. Among the reasons given were: no conference of the kind had been held for fifteen years; the world's population had undergone considerable change during that period; the results of the 1950 census were gradually coming in and if a conference were held later than 1954 it would be said that the figures were out of date; and the experts of the Population Commission who had recommended holding the conference in 1953 or 1954 must have had valid reasons for doing so.

The representative of the United Kingdom, however, was of the opinion that it was not possible, on the basis of the replies received, to state that there had been a clear majority in favour of the holding of such a conference. The Secretariat's questionnaire had been too limited in scope and, in fact, a large number of governments had not replied. Of those which had given favourable answers, only eight were represented on the Council and only about a dozen were ready to participate in a conference in 1953. A world conference could not be successful if the great majority of governments were not represented.

The representatives of Poland and Czechoslovakia agreed that little interest had been shown. The representative of Czechoslovakia also thought it apparent from the programme of the conference that there would be a tendency for it to be merely academic and limited to the ascertainment of secondary facts. Moreover population problems should not be studied in isolation, but in close relation to economic and social problems.

As to the date of the proposed conference, some representatives, among them those of Canada, Sweden, the United States and Uruguay, thought it should be held as soon as possible. Others, among them the representatives of Argentina, China, Egypt, Iran, Mexico and Pakistan, preferred 1954 to 1953. The United Kingdom representative considered that even 1954 would be too early to have adequate documentation prepared on the basis of the 1950 census results. He also thought that, before holding the conference, it would be desirable that the Secretariat's studies on the concentration of efforts and resources of the United Nations in the field of population should be completed prior to the holding of the conference.

Most of the representatives preferred that the conference should be organized by the United Nations in collaboration with the interested specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations, such as IUSSP. The Belgian and Philippine representatives, however, thought it would be better to make the IUSSP responsible for organizing the conference, under the auspices of and with limited financial support from, the United Nations. The representative of France suggested a joint sponsorship between the United Nations and a number of specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations concerned with demographic problems, such as the IUSSP.

There was general agreement that the conference should be a meeting of experts acting in their individual capacities. It was also agreed that the cost to the United Nations should not exceed $US 24,000.

Various suggestions were made concerning the agenda. The representative of China proposed that the conference should undertake studies in connexion with the effect of modern science on mortality, the adequacy of food resources to feed a growing population, the question of middle aged and elderly persons no longer able to work, and the problems of continental and inter-continental migration arising particularly after wars, whether open or undeclared.

The French representative thought that the following four points were particularly worth including in the agenda: the material and moral consequences of the aging of the population; the influence of the economic, social and cultural development on fertility; the consequences of the decrease in the mortality rate in countries in the course of development and a legal survey of the effects of legislation on demographic trends.

At the 598th plenary meeting the representatives of the Philippines and the United States presented a revised draft resolution (E/L.318/Rev.1) to incorporate some of the points raised in the discussion, in particular:

(1) A suggestion by Argentina that it be made clear that the conference was to be held under United Nations auspices; and (2) a suggestion by France that the responsibility of establishing a preparatory committee should be shared by the specialized agencies and interested non-governmental organizations.

The revised draft resolution also included a new paragraph referring to Assembly resolution 479(V) concerning the rules for the calling of non-governmental conferences by the Council.

The draft resolution was further revised at the 598th meeting to meet the suggestion of France that it should provide for the participation not only of experts nominated by United Nations Members but of those nominated by all governments.

The Council rejected by 4 votes to 3, with 11 abstentions, an oral Polish proposal to delete the reference to United Nations financing. By 13 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions, it adopted an oral amendment by Pakistan to delete the word "1953" and thus ensure that the conference would not be held until 1954. It adopted by 10 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, and by 8 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, respectively, two United Kingdom amendments (E/L.355). The first added a paragraph specifying that the conference should be devoted solely to the exchange of ideas and experience on population matters among experts in the field concerned and the second stated that if the conference were in Europe, it should be held at Geneva.

At the request of Poland, the second operative paragraph of the joint draft resolution, relating to financing, was voted on separately; it was adopted by 12 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions. The preamble and the first operative paragraph were adopted by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

The revised draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted at the Council's 598th plenary meeting on 10 June by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, as resolution 435 (XIV). It read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Noting the report of the Secretary-General (E/2199 and Add. 1-4) on the results of the inquiries concerning the proposed world conference on population which were addressed to governments, specialized agencies and interested non-governmental organizations, in accordance with Council resolution 389 C (XIII),

"Having regard to the rules for the calling of non-governmental conferences by the Economic and Social Council approved by the General Assembly in resolution 479 (V),

"1. Approves the holding in 1954, under the auspices of the United Nations, of a world population conference of experts, in close collaboration with the International Union for the Scientific Study of Population and interested specialized agencies, to discuss the problems of population set forth in annex II of document E/2199;

"2. Decides that the Conference shall be devoted solely to the exchange of ideas and experience on population matters among experts in the field concerned;

"3. Requests the Secretary-General to negotiate the financing of the Conference with interested specialized agencies, non-governmental organizations and any interested host governments, provided that the total additional cost of the Conference to the United Nations, including all preparatory work, shall not exceed $24,000;

"4. Authorizes the Secretary-General, in close collaboration with the International Union for the Scientific Study of Population and interested specialized agencies, to establish a small preparatory committee to be composed of their representatives and a small number of internationally recognized population experts, this committee to assist the Secretary-General in formulating an agenda based on the suggestions contained in annex II of document E/2199, and in making the necessary arrangements for the Conference;

"5. Requests the Secretary-General to invite, in their individual capacity, experts nominated by: (a) governments; (b) non-governmental scientific organizations concerned; and (c) the interested specialized agencies, and in addition to invite a small number of experts with a scientific interest in population questions. In carrying out this provision the Secretary-General shall determine, with the advice of the preparatory committee, the number of experts to be invited in each of the categories mentioned;

"6. Authorizes the Secretary-General to convene the Conference at a site which will involve the least cost to the United Nations, but at Geneva, if in Europe."

The Preparatory Committee, established as a result of the Council's resolution, held its first session (E/CONF.13/PC/1) in Geneva from 17 to 19 November 1952.

Representatives of the United Nations, FAO, ILO, UNESCO, WHO, and IUSSP were present. Of the experts individually invited by the Secretary-General, those from France, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States attended; those from Brazil and Egypt were unable to attend the first session. Upon the invitation of the Committee, a Japanese expert attended as a co-opted member for the first session, without vote. Noting that resolution 435 (XIV) stipulated that the conference be held in 1954, the Committee recommended that it be convened early in September of that year and, because of the number and complexity of the subjects of major interest requiring consideration, that it last for nine working days, if possible. In view of an offer by the Italian Government of a contribution equivalent to $25,000 if the conference were held in Rome, and of the FAO facilities available there, the Committee recommended that the conference be held in Rome, if the Council would amend its resolution to permit this.

The Preparatory Committee also made preliminary suggestions for the programme of the conference, under the following headings:

Trends of mortality, fertility and population change; demographic aspects of economic and social development of under-developed countries; migration and population distribution; aging of the population; social and biological aspects of demographic changes; demographic aspects of the First and Second World Wars; legislation, administrative programmes, and services relevant to population; needed programmes of population research, and problems of training qualified personnel.

The Committee also made recommendations on attendance, languages, and length of papers at the conference. It suggested that the Secretary-General consider using technical assistance funds to meet a part of the costs of the conference, and that he invite contributions from governments and specialized agencies.

2. Migration

a. SIMPLIFICATION OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURES FOR MIGRANTS

The Social Commission, at its eighth session in May 1952, had before it a report by the Secretary-General (E/CN.5/262 and Add.1 to 3) on the Simplification of Formalities and Reduction of Costs for Migrants. The report, which was based upon data supplied by governments, specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations, dealt only with the question of simplification of administrative procedures for migrants and not with governmental policies for the admission of such migrants.

The Commission also had before it the report of the Third Conference of Non-Governmental Organizations Interested in Migration (E/CN.5/274), held in New York from 16 to 22 April 1952.

On the basis of the Secretary-General's report, the Commission examined the objectives to be achieved by governments through multilateral agreements and/or national regulations. It expressed general agreement with the following objectives:

- (a) Limiting to the minimum the number of documents required from migrants and simplifying their contents;
- (b) Reducing to the minimum or eliminating the costs imposed by governments for documents;
- (c) Reducing to the minimum the duration of the procedure for the issuance of passports and visas to migrants;
- (d) Decentralizing, wherever desirable and practicable, the competence of immigration authorities as regards granting of individual authorizations for admission;
- (e) Arranging facilities for the admission of families of migrants with a view to avoiding their prolonged separation;
- (f) Arranging facilities for stateless persons and refugees unable to produce the documents generally required from migrants;

(g) Using the services of voluntary agencies in the accomplishment of formalities for migrants.

During its fourteenth session, the Council, at the 224th meeting of its Social Committee on 21 July, considered a draft resolution submitted by the Social Commission (E/2247). The representative of the USSR considered migration formalities, the issuance of passports, visas and other documents as matters wholly within the domestic competence of States and he was, therefore, in principle opposed to the proposals. The Argentine representative supported the draft resolution on the understanding that it did not limit the right of a government to take steps to ensure that prospective immigrants would constitute a desirable element of the country's population.

Following the adoption by 13 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, of a Belgian drafting amendment, the resolution recommended by the Social Commission was adopted by 12 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions (E/2305 II E). It was adopted by the Council at its 659th plenary meeting on 25 July by 12 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions, as resolution 434 G (XIV).

The representative of Pakistan, explaining his abstention, expressed the view that the problem of migration should be dealt with on a global basis whereas the United Nations appeared to be concerned only with migrants from Europe to America and Latin America.

The resolution read:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Having taken note of the reports of the Secretary-General on simplification of formalities and reduction of costs for migrants as well as of the action taken on this subject by the Third Conference of Non-Governmental Organizations interested in migration,

"Having recognized that simplification of formalities and reduction of their costs for migrants and for their families would be advantageous to countries of emigration and immigration and would alleviate many of the difficulties which migrants must often face in preparing to emigrate and securing admission to the country of their destination,

"1. Draws the attention of the interested governments to the recommendations contained in the reports of the Secretary-General and invites them to consider the possibilities of adjusting the existing practices and procedures accordingly, in particular by means of bilateral agreement;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General, through all the available facilities of the United Nations, in co-operation with the interested specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations, to promote the best practical means for simplifying formalities and reducing their costs."

b. REPORT BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

The Council, in accordance with resolution 396(XIII),¹⁷⁷ had before it at its fourteenth session a report submitted by the Director-General of ILO on methods of international financing of European emigration (E/2235) and an account (E/2235/Add.1) of the proceedings of the Migration Conference convened by ILO at Naples in October 1951.¹⁷⁸ The Director-General of ILO outlined the action taken during 1951 on methods of international financing of European emigration and the action contemplated by ILO on the recommendations of the Naples Conference. This conference and the subsequent establishment of the Provisional Inter-Governmental Committee for the Movement of Migrants from Europe (PICMME)¹⁷⁹ had emphasized the need for solving the basic and long-term problems involved in the organization and financing of satisfactory migration. The migration activities currently being carried out by ILO, the report stated, were concerned with: the protection of migrants; information concerning migration opportunities; the practical selection, placement and vocational training of migrants and their adaptation to new conditions of employment; and the effect of migration upon the economies of the emigration and immigration countries undertaken with a view to raising of living and working standards. The extent of these activities, the report stated, was restricted by the limited resources available to ILO for such work. In most instances, the activities took the form of technical assistance to the countries concerned. Wherever appropriate, projects were being undertaken in co-operation with other agencies, both intergovernmental and non-governmental.

The Council discussed the report at its 649th plenary meeting on 18 July. The majority of members commended ILO for its report and for its work. The representatives of Belgium and the United States, among others, stressed the importance of the establishment of PICMME, to aid in relieving the pressure of population. The representative of France stated that all possible means should be used as quickly and effectively as possible to encourage and assist migrants and to ensure their security and well-being. However, the movement should not compromise the economic recovery of Europe. In his opinion, the encouragement to migrants should, for the time being, take the form of payment of travel expenses and the organization of their transport. The Argentine representative emphasized the link between migration and economic development.

The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) considered that in order to safeguard the economic and social interests of emigrant workers, the Council should ensure that the most representative trade union organizations should participate in the various stages of migratory movements.

The Council adopted a Canadian draft resolution (E/L.424), first in paragraph-by-paragraph votes and then as a whole, by 13 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. By this resolution (439 (XIV)) the Council took note of the report of ILO on migration (E/2235 and Add.1) and expressed its approval for the Organisation's contribution, through the report, to the Council's continued consideration of problems in the field of migration.

3. Activities during 1952

Pursuant to the report of the Population Commission on its sixth session (E/1989) and Council Resolution 389 (XIII), the Secretary-General continued during 1952 the programme of work in the field of population, placing special emphasis on those aspects of the programme relating to the development of under-developed areas and to the raising of living standards.

A comprehensive summary of the existing knowledge concerning the relationship between population trends and social and economic conditions, which was undertaken in 1949, was completed and expected to be published in 1953 under the title of Determinants and Consequences of Population Trends: A Summary of the Findings of Studies on the Relationships between Population Changes and Economic and Social Conditions. Those parts of the report dealing with the factors determining the levels and trends of birth and death rates, the currents of migration, and the growth or decline of population were expected to provide a better basis for national measures of population policy. Those parts relating to the social and economic consequences of population changes would assist Member States, specialized agencies and the United Nations in dealing with problems of manpower, employment and unemployment, in assessing the needs for food, housing and other items of consumption, and in planning programmes for education, social security, conservation of resources and, above all, for the social and economic development of backward areas.

During 1952 the United Nations continued to collaborate with the Government of India in carrying out a field survey of population trends in relation to social and economic conditions in a selected area of that country. This survey was designed to obtain primary data which could be used to estimate the birth rates, death rates and rates of growth of different groups of the population, and to analyse the relationships between those rates and the social and economic changes occurring in various parts of the area studied. The survey was expected to assist the Government of India in implementing its five-year plan of economic development.

S. TEACHING ABOUT THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

The Economic and Social Council, at its 655th and 656th plenary meetings on 23 July 1952, considered a report, "Teaching of the Purposes and Principles, the Structure and Activities of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies in Schools and Educational Institutions of Member States" (E/2184 and Add.1 to 5), prepared by the Secretary-General and by the Director-General of UNESCO. The report, prepared in accordance with Council resolution 314(XI),¹⁸⁰ covered the period from March 1950 to March 1952. It summarized information received from Member States, reviewed the programme of the United Nations and UNESCO in the field, and described the co-operation of non-governmental organizations.

The report stressed the importance of basic teaching about the United Nations at the elementary school level and the urgent need for teacher-training programmes in this subject. Ways to improve teaching about the United Nations in the educational systems of Member States were also suggested. For example, it was pointed out that the most important single basis for further improvement lay in the administrative arrangements in educational systems, and criteria were suggested against which such arrangements might be checked. As part of the more general teacher-education programme, it was suggested that Member States might encourage the holding of more national and regional seminars, institutes and workshops on teaching about the United Nations, utilizing the experience and special resources of UNESCO fellows who have studied the practical problems involved.

There was a need at almost all levels, it was stated, for the preparation of suitable materials adapted to national languages and local needs, and it was suggested that Member States might appoint special officers to work with the United Nations and UNESCO in developing such materials. In planning this programme, the needs of school systems in Trust Territories should also be considered. Various suggestions, including the following, were made for preparing suitable materials:

(1) The United Nations and UNESCO should make available to Member States more prototype material, suitable for adaptation to national and regional needs and for all levels of education; (2) governments should help to develop further the network of strategically placed volunteer educational centres for the United Nations and the specialized agencies and further use ought to be made of existing centres, volunteer correspondents and speakers units; (3) materials normally distributed to such centres by the United Nations and the specialized agencies should be supplemented by nationally produced or adapted materials; (4) non-governmental organizations, Press, radio, and film and television agencies should be encouraged to co-operate in the preparation of suitable material for adult education programmes.

It was further suggested that the programme of the United Nations, UNESCO and other specialized agencies in this field might be co-ordinated with the technical assistance programme for under-developed countries and that small technical assistance appropriations might be made to enable seminars, workshops and institutes on teaching about the United Nations and the specialized agencies to be held in host countries of the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

During the discussion, the majority of members of the Council commented on the progress achieved in teaching about the United Nations at the secondary and higher education levels. The representatives of the Philippines and the United States stressed the need for developing ways of advancing international understanding at the primary school level, since most of the world's school children concluded their education at an early age. The United Kingdom representative said that experiments conducted in his country had proved that international understanding could not be taught directly to children under eleven. It could best be fostered by using effective materials in the regular school curricula to instil a sense of citizenship and community in the life of the school as a whole. The Mexican representative agreed, and suggested that, in order to work out within a few years a general plan which would be effective in most countries, governments should experiment and fully investigate the possibilities of improving techniques and materials. The representatives of the Philippines and the United States also pointed out that, in spite of the laudable efforts of many non-governmental organizations, teaching at the adult level was generally inadequate and should be intensified, and that every effort should be made to increase the attention paid in teachers' colleges to teaching about the United Nations. Emphasis should also be placed on the eradication of national superstitions and prejudices regarding other people, the Swedish representative said.

Several members of the Council, among them the representatives of Iran, Pakistan, the Philippines and Uruguay, praised the work of the United Nations International School and expressed the hope that it would be able to continue and perhaps become a model for other institutions.

The Council adopted the following two amendments by the Philippines (E/L.444/Rev.1) to a joint draft resolution (E/L.442 and Corr.1) submitted by Cuba, Mexico and the United States.

(1) by 9 votes to none, with 9 abstentions, a new sub-paragraph requesting the United Nations and UNESCO to continue to assist non-governmental organizations working in the field;

(2) by 8 votes to none, with 10 abstentions, a new paragraph inviting UNESCO, in collaboration with the United Nations, to advise those governments which so requested on ways in which teaching about the United Nations might effectively be integrated into their educational programmes.

The joint draft resolution, as amended, was adopted at the Council's 656th plenary meeting on 23 July 1952, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

In this resolution (446(XIV)), the Council noted with approval the report by the Secretary-General and the Director-General of UNESCO and regretted that not all United Nations Members had replied to the request for information. It commended the work of the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies in providing individuals, such as those benefiting from international exchange of persons, fellowship and scholarship programmes, with opportunities to familiarize themselves with the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. Recognizing that teaching in Member States about the United Nations and the specialized agencies is essential to the fulfilment of the purposes of the Charter, the Council expressed appreciation to non-governmental organizations for their successful programmes and requested the Secretary-General and the Director-General of UNESCO to cooperate in concentrating on teaching materials for use in primary-elementary, adult and teacher education, in encouraging the widest possible dissemination of material so prepared and in continuing assistance to non-governmental organizations working in the field.

The Council invited UNESCO, in collaboration with the United Nations, to advise requesting governments on ways in which teaching about the United Nations might effectively be integrated into their education programmes. It further requested the Secretary-General to compile, on the basis of inquiries to Member States, a further report for the Council in 1956, emphasizing the usefulness to States of material prepared by the United Nations and UNESCO, as well as suggestions for its improvement, and the results achieved by Member States with different types of programmes. The Council invited Member States to examine the report and, in the light of the questions treated therein and of this resolution, to comply with the request of the Secretary-General for material to be used in the 1956 report.

During 1952 the volunteer services of the Education Section of the Department of Public Information, through its network of 739 volunteer education centres and speakers units in 83 countries, reached some five million people. A large number of requests are received by these centres, mainly from educators, teachers, students and adult education groups, in the preparation of United Nations exhibits, the showing of United Nations films and filmstrips, the organizing of study groups and seminars on teaching about the United Nations, and the promoting of special talks on the United Nations. Thus, in the British Cameroons a volunteer education centre was appointed by the local authorities to do liaison work with the United Nations Visiting Mission in its fact-finding expedition. On its own initiative, a volunteer education centre in Japan translated into Japanese the booklet, Teaching about the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies.

Under the auspices of the Education Section, a workshop for teachers, at which 125 elementary and secondary schools in New York City and the vicinity are represented, has met monthly at the United Nations Headquarters.

The United Nations has co-operated with UNESCO in a programme for fellowships to promote teaching about the United Nations; in 1951 and 1952, eleven fellows came to the United Nations Headquarters to study the work and activities of the United Nations.

In addition, a large number of publications concerning the work of the United Nations have been published both by the United Nations Department of Public Information and by Member and non-member countries.

T. QUESTIONS OF CO-ORDINATION AND RELATIONS WITH SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

At its fourteenth session, the Economic and Social Council reviewed the development of co-ordination between the United Nations and specialized agencies. It had before it the following documents: the tenth and eleventh reports (E/2161 and Corr.1 and E/2203) of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) and a report (E/2204) of the Secretary-General on regional co-ordination.

The tenth report of the ACC reviewed the machinery for the Expanded Programme of technical assistance, including the development of the work of the Technical Assistance Board (TAB), and made recommendations on the reorganization of the Board.¹⁸¹ The report emphasized the need and the opportunity for concerted action by the various United Nations organizations in respect of these emergency programmes.

It also dealt with certain general considerations regarding the United Nations priority programmes (see below) and drew the attention of the Council to the results of the inter-agency consultations among officers of the United Nations (including UNICEF) and of certain specialized agencies on long-range activities for children. It further noted the progress in the development of a co-ordinated international programme in the field of rehabilitation of the physically handicapped, and discussed administrative matters relating to common services, the International Civil Service Advisory Board, co-ordination of public information activities of the United Nations and specialized agencies, and the problem of securing copyright protection for the works of the United Nations and the agencies.

The eleventh report of the ACC reviewed, inter alia, the co-operation in Korea and the Middle East between the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA) and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWAP-RNE) on the one hand, and the specialized agencies and branches of the United Nations on the other. Dealing with the principles of co-operation in emergency programmes, the ACC emphasized that, in an emergency situation, the area information, the technical experience and the assistance that the specialized agencies could furnish should be placed at the disposal of the emergency organization. Subject to the constitutional powers and procedures of the specialized agencies, however, the nature and scope of its tasks as well as local matters must be left to the emergency agency. Special funds for the emergency programmes must be allocated and put to use by the emergency organization itself. However, specialized agencies should be encouraged to make separate budgetary provisions for the support of emergency programmes. The report also recognized that regular consultations among officers of the emergency agencies and specialized agencies through the machinery of the ACC had proved valuable.

The report then considered the principles of regional co-ordination, outlining the action required at three levels: at headquarters, at the regional centres (or as between regional organizations) and in the individual countries in which work was being carried out. The essential criterion, it stated, was that the measures taken within each organization to co-ordinate central and regional action and measures of regional co-ordination affecting a number of organizations should not frustrate one another. It also reviewed some of the arrangements made for co-operation and co-ordination between the specialized agencies and the regional economic commissions, stating, among other things, that this had led to integration of regional activities with those initiated at the respective headquarters.

The ACC report also dealt with a number of items of an organizational, substantive and administrative nature such as the review of work programmes and United Nations priority programmes, (on which it made detailed recommendations) co-ordination of services, scheduling of meetings and questions relating to salary differentials and cost of living adjustments.

The report of the Secretary-General (E/2204) provided information on the progress of regional co-ordination of the programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies and relations with non-United Nations regional intergovernmental organizations. It covered programme co-ordination between the United Nations regional economic commissions and the specialized agencies, programme co-ordination between the United Nations and the specialized agencies in respect of particular regions and programme co-ordination among the specialized agencies themselves in respect of particular regions.

The above reports were considered by the Co-ordination Committee of the Economic and Social Council during its consideration of the item "Co-ordination of the work of the United Nations and specialized agencies" at its meetings held between 2 June and 25 July, and by the Council at its 661st and 662nd plenary meetings on 28 July.

While most of the discussion, both in the Committee and in the Council's plenary session, was devoted to the United Nations priority programmes, general appreciation was expressed of the close attention given by the ACC, the Secretary-General and the heads of the specialized agencies to the problems of co-ordination and of the progress that had been achieved in that direction.

In its report (E/2306) the Co-ordination Committee noted the progress made in the past year towards more effective co-ordination of the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. It further noted the policy guidance which the ACC had given towards the reorganization of the machinery for the Expanded Programme of technical assistance, and the principles which it had formulated in regard to regional co-ordination and the relations between emergency organizations and the permanent organs of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. It proposed a draft resolution which was adopted by the Council, by 12 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, on 28 July 1952.

In this resolution (451 A (XIV)) the Council, after noting the report of its Co-ordination Committee, expressed satisfaction with the progress made in the past year towards more effective co-ordination and urged continued efforts in that direction.

By the same resolution, the Council adopted the statement on United Nations priority programmes contained in the report, approved the recommendations of the Co-ordination Committee concerning the review of programmes and expressed its appreciation to the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions for the observations submitted in response to the Council's request. The Secretary-General was asked to bring these observations to the attention of the specialized agencies and the organs of the United Nations concerned for appropriate action.

The questions of priority programmes, the review of programmes and administrative and budgetary co-ordination which received more detailed consideration either in the Economic and Social Council or in the General Assembly are dealt with below.

1. United Nations Priority Programmes

The Economic and Social Council in resolution 402 B (XIII), adopted on 17 September 1951, decided to include in the agenda of its fourteenth session the question of "The adoption of United Nations Priority Programmes" and requested the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (ACC) to submit, before that session, its comments on the suggestions made by delegations at the thirteenth session and any further proposals which it deemed useful.

The ACC put forward, in its tenth report (E/2161 and Corr.1), certain preliminary considerations in the matter and in its eleventh report (E/2203) set out detailed proposals. It drew attention to three objectives which seemed to call for an intensification of effort by the United Nations as a whole: the economic and social development of under-developed areas; measures for promoting domestic full employment and international economic stability; and the formulation and observance of human rights. At the same time, the ACC considered that provision should also be made for assigning, from time to time, special priority to emergency programmes of importance requiring the mobilization of the efforts and resources of the United Nations agencies, and suggested that the programmes for Korean reconstruction and for the relief and the promotion of the economic self-support of Palestine refugees currently deserved such priority.

The question of priorities was discussed by the Council's Co-ordination Committee at its 101st to 113th meetings between 2 June and 25 July 1952 and by the Council, in plenary session, at its 661st and 662nd meetings on 28 July 1952.

The report (E/2306) of the Co-ordination Committee to the Council, contained a list of priority programmes which was approved by the Council with some amendments in its resolution 451 A (XIV) on 28 July 1952. The list was as follows:

List of priority programmes in the economic and social fields

(b) Promotion of human rights and their observance, including elimination of forced labour, of restrictions on freedom of association, and of all discriminatory measures referred to in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

(c) Promotion of freedom of information and of the Press.

The list was drawn up, the Council stated, subject to the overriding objective of keeping in view at all times the economic and social development of under-developed areas. It was considered that this over-all priority should apply to all of the programmes listed, particularly to those connected with increased food production and distribution, and increased production in other fields. The Council recognized that the priorities listed would not apply to some urgent problems of particular regions which might call for special measures. It noted further that the list was not a comprehensive one which attempted to cover all the activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, but represented rather the major activities on which efforts should be further concentrated.

While recognizing that both the commissions and the specialized agencies were engaged in certain programmes which were not listed, the Council decided:

(1) To request the functional and regional commissions to appraise their programmes in the light of the priority programmes outlined by the Council and, as far as possible, to give special emphasis to projects likely to contribute directly to the fulfilment of these priority programmes; and (2) to invite the specialized agencies to keep the suggested priorities in mind when reviewing and formulating their programmes and to give their comments on these priorities.

During the discussion, both in the Committee and in plenary session, a number of representatives, including those of Argentina, Mexico, Sweden and the United Kingdom, expressed doubts as to the usefulness of a detailed list of priorities. The representative of the USSR supported by the representatives of Czechoslovakia and Poland, stated that a number of objectives not included in the list should be given prominence. These included such questions as:

"Cessation of the reduction of civilian industry and expansion of civilian production"; "improvement of the situation of the unemployed and the semi-employed by means including the introduction of state unemployment insurance, free medical services, the granting of allowances and the improvement of housing and other living conditions"; "restoration and extension of international economic relations by the renunciation of all forms of discrimination and restrictions in international trade"; "implementation of the General Assembly resolution 110(II) concerning measures to be taken against propaganda and the inciters of a new war"; "participation of women in political and economic matters, including measures to secure the full implementation in all countries of the principle of equal pay for equal work"; and a fuller statement concerning promotion of freedom of information and of the Press (see below).

In the plenary session, the USSR submitted amendments and additions (E/L.453) to the list embodying these suggestions and containing the following additional points: "extension of social insurance and provision of assistance in old age, disablement and sickness"; "provision of medical services more easily accessible to the population without discrimination on grounds of race, sex, language, religion, material position and racial origin". In section F of the list dealing with human rights the USSR proposed the addition of provisions to eliminate discriminatory measures "based on distinctions of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, or property, birth or other status".

It also proposed that sub-section (c) of section F of the list, dealing with "promotion of freedom of information and of the Press", be replaced by the following new item "Promotion of freedom of information and of the Press; the use of all means to encourage and promote, with the help of truthful and objective information, the development of friendly relations and co-operation between nations in the settlement of economic, social and humanitarian problems, and prevention of the use of freedom of information and of the Press for the purpose of creating enmity between nations, for war propaganda and for racial discrimination".

The majority of representatives, while not contesting the importance of some of these problems, felt that they should not be included in the list of priorities in the form in which they had been drawn up. Moreover, it was felt that many of these questions had already been covered.

The various points of the USSR amendments were voted on separately at the Council's 662nd meeting. The point relating to the "extension of social insurance and provision of assistance in old age, disablement and sickness" (see Section D, sub-section (a) of the list) which was not covered in the original list submitted by the Co-ordination Committee, was adopted by 8 votes to 7, with 3 abstentions.

The rest of the points in the USSR amendment were rejected by votes ranging from 8 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, to 11 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions.

Section C sub-section (d) of the list submitted by the Co-ordination Committee had contained a provision whereby the under-developed countries would increase the export of raw materials essential to the economic life of the industrialized countries. During the voting in the plenary meeting the representative of Poland requested that this provision be voted on separately and by roll-call. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Belgium, Canada, China, France, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, USSR.

Abstaining: Argentina, Iran, Uruguay.

The proposal was, therefore, rejected by 8 votes to 7, with 3 abstentions.

The representative of the United States requested a separate vote on the words ". . . and cultural life" in Section E, sub-section (d) of the list providing for "Accessibility of education and cultural life to all sections of the population". The United States representative felt that the words were too vague. He also requested a separate vote on Section E, sub-section (e) which listed "Scientific education and research".

The words "and cultural life" were retained by a vote of 12 to 2 with 3 abstentions. Sub-section (e) of Section E was retained by a vote of 12 to 1, with 5 abstentions. The representative of the United States said that he had voted against the proposal to list scientific education and research separately because it formed part of almost every programme on the list.

Sections A, B, C as amended, D as amended, E and F of the list were adopted by 13 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

2. Review of 1953 Programmes of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies

In its resolution 402 B (XIII), the Council had decided that at its next summer session it would again review the programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies and had requested its commissions and the specialized agencies to review their programmes for 1953 and subsequent years in the manner outlined in General Assembly resolution 413(V) and Council resolution 362 B (XII).

The question was considered by the Co-ordination Committee at its meetings held between 2 June and 25 July and by the Council at its 661st and 662nd plenary meetings on 28 July 1952. The Council had before it a paper by the Secretariat (E/AC.24/L.72) outlining the action taken by the commissions, the specialized agencies and by the emergency agencies of the United Nations to give effect to the Council's recommendation concerning the review of 1953 programmes. It also had before it the reports of its commissions and specialized agencies.

In reviewing the 1953 programmes from the point of view of the implementation of Council resolution 402 B (II) (XIII), the Co-ordination Committee, in its report (E/2306), noted with pleasure the efforts made by the commissions concerned to follow the Council's recommendations as well as the efforts made by the specialized agencies to indicate, in so far as practicable, the major shifts in emphasis in their programmes and their major priorities for the following year. The Committee, the report said, also received with appreciation the information concerning priorities which United Nations emergency agencies such as UNICEF, UNKRA and UNRWAPRNE had submitted.

The report further stated that the Committee had found it difficult to review effectively the action taken by the agencies and commissions regarding priorities without reopening substantive discussion of their reports. It recommended a procedure, which the Council accepted in resolution 451 A (XIV), adopted by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, aimed at avoiding this difficulty in the future. The recommendations were as follows:

(1) Discussion of the action taken by the functional and regional commissions of the Council and by the specialized agencies concerning the establishment of priorities should take place when the reports of these commissions and agencies are considered at plenary meetings of the Council or the Economic and Social Committees of the Council.

(2) The Secretariat should summarize the views thus expressed on the question of priorities in those meetings and bring them to the attention of the Co-ordination Committee.

(3) The Co-ordination Committee should take these views into account when drawing general conclusions regarding the effect given to resolutions of the Council and the General Assembly regarding priorities and when making any recommendations in that connexion.

In the same resolution the Council also approved the following recommendations of the Co-ordination Committee:

That the Council should continue to review each year the programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, and to this end should ask its commissions, the specialized agencies and the emergency agencies to revive annually their future programmes in accordance with the procedure outlined under Council resolution 402 B (II) (XIII) in so far as these procedures were applicable.

That the Council should invite the specialized agencies to report to it on any major shifts in emphasis in their programmes and any major priorities they might have established for the following year.

3. Administrative and Budgetary Co-ordination

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AT ITS FOURTEENTH SESSION

In response to an invitation by the Secretary-General, on behalf of the President of the Economic and Social Council, the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions submitted observations¹⁸² on administrative and budgetary co-ordination between the United Nations and specialized agencies which might in its opinion assist the Council in reviewing the 1953 programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. These observations related to budgetary stabilization, financial implications of new projects, expenditure on travel by international officials, reduction of documentation, "staggering" of conferences and application by the specialized agencies and the commissions of the criteria for priorities established by the Council at its eleventh session.

¹⁸² See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Fourteenth Session, Supplement No. 1, appendix to the annex of resolution 451 (XIV), pp. 54-56.

The Council in resolution 451 A (XIV) expressed its appreciation of these observations and requested the Secretary-General to bring them to the attention of the specialized agencies and the organs of the United Nations concerned for appropriate action.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS SEVENTH SESSION

The question of administrative and budgetary co-ordination was also considered by the General Assembly at its seventh session both in the Fifth Committee and in plenary session. The Fifth Committee considered the question at its 370th meeting on 12 December 1952. It had before it the following documents: Information Annex II to the Secretary-General's budget estimates for 1953 (A/2125/Add.1); a report of the Secretary-General on common services and co-ordination of services at various centres (A/C.5/504); the twenty-fifth report of the Advisory Committee (A/2287).

During the discussion in the Fifth Committee the Chairman of the Advisory Committee drew attention to the following points covered in the report of his Committee: the question of continuing arrears of contributions and the methods adopted to meet the situation; the need for legislative control of technical assistance programmes and expenditures; and the difficulties in developing a consolidated budget for the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

The representative of the United States, while acknowledging that much progress had been made in achieving co-ordination, expressed his Government's concern at the size of the task still to be accomplished. This, he felt, could be done only if the representatives of Member States acted to achieve that co-ordination. He suggested that the entire question of the relationship between the United Nations and the specialized agencies might be reopened when the question of the revision of the Charter was considered in 1955.

The representative of Belgium emphasized the importance of maintaining the independence of the specialized agencies but agreed on the need for achieving the widest possible co-ordination and considered that this could be achieved by agreement at national levels between the various departments and ministries of each government.

The representative of Canada stated that some agencies had been more successful than others in establishing priorities and in stabilizing their budgets. Some agencies had also been more successful than others in establishing administrative practices and in applying sanctions to States in arrears of their contributions. He urged the necessity of greater uniformity in the treatment of these problems.

In the light of the discussions in the Committee the Chairman submitted a draft resolution which would invite the attention of the specialized agencies to the recommendations made in the Advisory Committee's report and request the Secretary-General to give continued attention to the co-ordination of administrative procedures and services.

A second draft resolution (A/C.5/L.208/-Corr.1) by Canada and the Netherlands, related to audit procedures of the United Nations and the specialized agencies—a question which was discussed at the Committee's 368th meeting. Speaking on this question, the representative of Canada suggested that the General Assembly should review audit procedures. He considered that it was not in the interest of the United Nations that one country (Canada) should be permanently represented on the Board of Auditors. The Canadian Government had agreed to the reappointment of the Canadian Auditor General to this post only because it was essential for the United Nations to have one member of the Board near New York and in a position to supply the necessary examiners for the audit of the New York accounts.

The joint draft resolution would invite the Secretary-General and the heads of the specialized agencies to review the present audit procedures and to make recommendations.

The Fifth Committee adopted both draft resolutions by 39 votes to none, with 5 abstentions (A/2324). Both resolutions were adopted by the General Assembly, without objection, at its 409th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952, as resolutions 672 A and B (VII).

"The General Assembly

"1. Takes note with satisfaction of the report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions dealing with the administrative budgets of the specialized agencies for 1953 and of the Secretary-General's report on common services and co-ordination of services of the United Nations and the specialized agencies at various centres;

"2. Invites the attention of the specialized agencies to the recommendations and suggestions made in the Advisory Committee's report, as well as to the views expressed by Members during the seventh session of the General Assembly;

"3. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the executive heads of the specialized agencies and with the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, to give continuing attention to the co-ordination of administrative procedures and services."

B

"The General Assembly,

"Noting the increase in the activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies and the related increase in their financial responsibilities,

"1. Considers that the present system for the audit of their financial accounts may not be the most suitable and efficient that can be devised to meet these increased requirements;

"2. Invites the Secretary-General and the executive heads of the specialized agencies, in consultation with the Joint Panel of Auditors, to review in the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination the present audit procedures and arrangements, and to make appropriate recommendations on any changes or improvements they may consider desirable;

"3. Invites the governments of Member States to submit any views or recommendations they may have on this question to the Secretary-General for his consideration and for transmittal to the specialized agencies and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions;

"4. Requests the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to examine the recommendations of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its eighth session;

"5. Decides to include an item in the provisional agenda of the eighth session of the General Assembly entitled 'Review of audit procedures of the United Nations and the specialized agencies'".

4. Programme of Conferences at United Nations Headquarters and at Geneva

In resolution 534(VI) the General Assembly had requested the Secretary-General, after consultation with the specialized agencies and the principal organs of the United Nations concerned, to prepare an annual conference pattern for submission to its seventh session.

In his report (A/2243), the Secretary-General narrated the results of the consultations with the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council and with the executive heads of the specialized agencies. He stated that there had been a divergence of views in the Economic and Social Council on the question, some delegations holding that Headquarters bodies should always meet at Headquarters, others maintaining that some of them should periodically meet at Geneva. Neither Council had felt that it was in a position at that time to suggest a fixed annual pattern for itself and its subsidiary organs. The Economic and Social Council had adopted a resolution (458(XIV)) inviting "the Secretary-General to take due account of the views on the subject expressed during the fourteenth session of the Council when he prepares basic conference patterns of meetings for submission to the next regular session of the General Assembly". The Trusteeship Council had decided to postpone consideration of the matter until it met again in November 1952. The representatives of specialized agencies situated in Europe, when consulted, emphasized the importance of maintaining the closest relationship with the Economic and Social Council and maintained that the scheduling of the conferences of different international organizations was dependent upon long-term and firm arrangements regarding the time and place of the sessions of that Council. The Secretary-General's report also gave relevant information on conference activities at the United Nations Headquarters and its European Office, together with financial estimates for holding certain meetings at Geneva rather than at Headquarters.

At its 398th plenary meeting on 25 November the General Assembly adopted, without reference to a Committee and without objection, a joint draft resolution submitted by Argentina, Belgium, Denmark and France (A/L.114) as amended by the United Kingdom (A/L.115). In this resolution (698(VII)) the Assembly expressed the conviction that a regular programme should be prepared for the rational and economic distribution of United Nations conferences and meetings between the permanent Headquarters and the United Nations Office at Geneva, making full use of the available facilities. It instructed an ad hoc committee of twelve members, to be appointed by the President of the General Assembly to prepare, with the assistance of the Secretary-General, a programme of this kind covering a period of from three to five years and providing for sessions of the Councils and functional commissions to be held in Geneva at regular intervals and to report to the Assembly as soon as possible.

The Special Committee, consisting of Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Iraq, Pakistan, the USSR, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela, held its first meeting on 26 November. It recommended (A/2323) the following resolution which was adopted by the General Assembly at its 409th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952 by 45 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 694(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Taking note of the report and recommendations of the Special Committee on Programme of Conferences,

"Mindful of the necessity of firmly fixing a long-term pattern of conferences to allow for the rational and economic distribution of meetings between Headquarters and Geneva and to permit the proper utilization of staff and conference facilities at both places,

"Recognizing the importance to the United Nations and the specialized agencies of having a regular conference pattern,

"1. Decides that a regular pattern of conferences should be established for a period of four years commencing on 1 January 1954, under which sessions of all Headquarters-based bodies should be held in New York and sessions of all Geneva-based bodies should be held in Geneva with the following exceptions:

"(a) The regular summer session of the Economic and Social Council would be held each year in Geneva during which period no other meeting of the United Nations bodies would be held in Geneva;

"(b) Sessions of a functional commission or of functional commissions (but preferably not more than one) of the Economic and Social Council, to be determined by the Economic and Social Council, would meet in Geneva without overlap for a total period not exceeding five weeks between mid-March and the end of April;

"(c) The International Law Commission would meet in Geneva only when its session could be held there without overlapping with the summer session of the Economic and Social Council;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit to all organs of the United Nations and to the specialized agencies a conference pattern based on the principles enumerated above;

"3. Recommends to all organs of the United Nations that they arrange their meetings in accordance with the dates and places set forth in the pattern presented by the Secretary-General, and invites the specialized agencies concerned to give due consideration to this pattern in drawing up their own programmes of meetings."

5. Postal Activities of the United Nations

At its 662nd meeting, at its fourteenth session, the Economic and Social Council considered the question of common arrangements between the United Nations and the specialized agencies with regard to postal matters. A resolution had been adopted on the question by the XIIIth Congress of the Universal Postal Union. The UPU had recommended that any further postal activity proposed by the United Nations or by a specialized agency should be the subject of consultation with UPU through its Congress or its Executive and Liaison Committee, and that after such consultation any agreement should be concluded only after favourable recommendation by the General Assembly.

The Council, after discussion, noted this resolution and adopted, by 14 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, resolution 451 B (XIV) requesting the specialized agencies to submit any proposals concerning postal operations to the Secretary-General for consultation with UPU through its competent organs, and for subsequent consideration by the General Assembly.

6. Applications for Membership in UNESCO

The Economic and Social Council considered the applications for membership in UNESCO of the United Kingdom of Libya, Spain and Nepal (E/2167/Add.1 and 2) during its fourteenth session, at the 573rd plenary meeting, on 21 May 1952. There was unanimous support for the applications of Libya and Nepal, but the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR opposed the admission of Spain on the ground that the regime in that country had been branded as Fascist by the General Assembly which had also stated that Spain could not be admitted to membership in the United Nations. The representative of Mexico expressed a similar point of view.

The Council, in three separate votes, adopted resolution 452 (XIV) by which it decided to inform UNESCO that it had no objection to the admission of these three States to that organization. The parts of the resolution referring to Libya and Nepal were adopted unanimously. The part of the resolution referring to Spain was voted on by roll-call and was adopted by 12 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Belgium, Canada, China, Cuba, Egypt, France, Iran, Pakistan, Philippines, United Kingdom, United States.

Against: Czechoslovakia, Mexico, Poland, USSR, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Sweden.

7. Application of Japan for Membership in ICAO

In a note (A/2176) dated 8 September, the Secretary-General stated that he had received from the Secretary-General of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) a note transmitting, in accordance with article II of the Agreement between the United Nations and ICAO, an application from the Government of Japan for admission to participation in the Convention on International Civil Aviation. He proposed that the item be placed on the agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly.

An explanatory memorandum (A/2176/Add.1) by the Secretary-General, dated 7 October, set forth the relevant instruments and other background information such as the decisions of the Assembly regarding the admission of other non-member States to ICAO.

The General Assembly considered the item without reference to a committee, at its 391st plenary meeting on 6 November 1952. It adopted, without debate, by 53 votes to none, with 6 abstentions, a draft resolution (A/L.113) by Canada, Peru, the United States and Venezuela, by which the Assembly would inform ICAO that it had no objection to the admission of Japan to that organization. On the request of the representative of the Philippines, a vote was taken by roll-call and the draft resolution was adopted by 53 votes to none, with 6 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Burma, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Philippines, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR.

The resolution adopted by the General Assembly (697(VII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the application regarding the admission of Japan to the International Civil Aviation Organization, transmitted by that organization to the General Assembly in accordance with article II of the agreement between the United Nations and the International Civil Aviation Organization,

"Decides to inform the International Civil Aviation Organization that it has no objection to the admission of Japan to the organization."

8. Annual Reports of the Specialized Agencies¹⁸³

a. INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION (ILO)

The Council considered the annual report (E/-2240) of the International Labour Organisation at its 646th to 649th meetings from 16 to 18 July and heard a statement by the representative of ILO. Most representatives expressed appreciation of the work done by the organization during the past year and especially that it was placing increasing emphasis on activities in under-developed areas while continuing its traditional task of establishing international labour standards.

ILO's efforts were commended in the field of manpower, in raising living standards of workers, in establishing minimum social security standards, increasing labour productivity, improving industrial relations and tackling such special problems as those of agricultural and women workers. Satisfaction was expressed at the way in which ILO had co-ordinated its activities with those of the United Nations, other specialized agencies and other international organizations such as the Council of Europe.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR, however, expressed the view that ILO had failed to comply with the principles laid down in its constitution and that, instead of serving the interests of the workers, it had served those of capitalistic monopolies by supporting the supply of manpower for armaments production. The representative of the WFTU also made a statement supporting this view.

The Council adopted, by 15 votes to 3, resolution 447(XIV) taking note with appreciation of the report of ILO.

b. FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION OF THE UNITED NATIONS (FAO)¹⁸⁴

c. UNITED NATIONS EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION (UNESCO)

The Council considered the annual report of UNESCO (E/2226) at its 616th and 617th meetings on 24 June and heard a statement from the Director-General of the organization. There was general satisfaction with the efforts made by UNESCO to revise its programme of work in order to achieve greater concentration of effort and more far-reaching co-ordination with the United Nations and with other specialized agencies. There was particular appreciation of UNESCO's progress in fundamental education, in improving access to books and in technical assistance. It was noted with satisfaction that the International Agreement, sponsored by UNESCO, on the Importation of Educational and Scientific Material had come into effect on 21 May 1952.

The Council adopted by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, resolution 449(XIV) taking note with appreciation of the report of UNESCO.

¹⁸³ For an account of the activities of the specialized agencies during 1952 see under their respective headings, Part II.

¹⁸⁴ For Council's consideration of the report and of the food situation, see above under Food and famine.

d. WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION (WHO)

The annual report of WHO (E/2239 and Corr.1 and Add.1 to 3) was considered by the Council at its 612th plenary meeting on 19 June. Representatives expressed general appreciation for the work done by the organization in the past year, in particular its anti-malaria campaigns and the steps it had taken to prevent epidemics. The completion of the plan for decentralization of WHO's services was also noted. The representatives of Canada and France expressed the hope that the organization's role as Co-ordinator of international health work would not suffer as a result of too rapid decentralization. The United States representative expressed concern at the continued rise in WHO's budget.

The Council adopted, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, resolution 448 (XIV) taking note with appreciation of the report. The Council noted with approval the priority given to the development of health services and health training programmes and commended WHO for adopting the International Sanitary Regulations, for publishing the first volume of the International Pharmacopoeia and for its excellent record in providing assistance in connexion with health programmes in the Republic of Korea and for Palestine refugees.

e. INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION (ICAO)

At its 621st and 622nd meetings on 26 and 27 June the Council considered the report of the International Civil Aviation Organization (E/2218 and Add.1) and heard a statement from the representative of that organization. Appreciation was generally expressed of ICAO's technical, legal and economic activities. In the technical field, ICAO's assistance in the training of personnel was noted and the need for giving more such assistance to under-developed countries was emphasized by representatives of China and Pakistan. The representative of the United Kingdom noted the comments in the report on jet and turbine-propelled aircraft while the United States representative referred to the excellent safety record of 1951. The representative of Belgium noted that ICAO had successfully completed the annexes to the Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation, and that its Legal Committee had accomplished important work, including the revision of the Warsaw Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules Relating to International Carriage by Air and the study of new draft conventions on the legal status of aircraft. He also made a plea for the reorganization of ICAO's administrative structure with a view to economy.

The representative of Czechoslovakia, while expressing appreciation of the valuable technical work of ICAO, stated that the organization had, however, failed to prevent discrimination in civil aviation operations. He referred, in particular, to an order by France, the United Kingdom and the United States whereby Czechoslovak aircraft were forbidden to fly over Western Germany.

The representative of ICAO said that he was not familiar with the details of the case and that he was not aware that Czechoslovakia had submitted a complaint to ICAO on the matter.

The Council adopted, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, resolution 248 (XIV) taking note of the report of ICAO.

f. INTERNATIONAL TELECOMMUNICATION UNION (ITU)

The annual report of the International Telecommunication Union (E/2243) was considered at the 621st meeting of the Council on 26 June when the Council heard a statement by the representative of ITU. General appreciation was expressed of ITU's work with regard to the allocation of the radio spectrum space, the organization's close co-operation with the United Nations and with other specialized agencies including participation in the Expanded Programme of technical assistance.

The representative of the USSR protested against the decisions made at the Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference at Geneva regarding the allocation of the radio frequency spectrum which, he said, did not take account of previous allocations.

The Council adopted, by 14 votes to 3, resolution 429 (XIV) expressing satisfaction with the report of ITU.

g. UNIVERSAL POSTAL UNION (UPU)

The Council considered the report of the Universal Postal Union (E/2179) at its 622nd meeting on 27 June and heard a statement from the representative of that organization.

During the discussion, mention was made of UPU's close co-operation with ICAO and with the International Air Transport Association on international air mail matters. The representative of the United States, while expressing appreciation of the report of UPU, felt that the section dealing with its relations with the United Nations was somewhat brief. He hoped that in its future reports more reference could be made to efforts to implement those recommendations of the General Assembly and of the Council which were of concern to UPU.

The Council adopted, by 14 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, resolution 430 (XIV) taking note with satisfaction of the report of UPU.

h. INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION (IRO)¹⁸⁵

i. WORLD METEOROLOGICAL ORGANIZATION (WMO)

The Council considered the report of the World Meteorological Organization (E/2196) at its 622nd plenary meeting on 27 June and heard a statement by a representative of that organization. Several representatives expressed satisfaction at the solid foundation established by WMO in the first eight months of its existence as a specialized agency. Note was taken of WMO's progress in establishing relationship with other specialized agencies. The hope was expressed that more information on WMO's technical work would be included in future reports.

The Council adopted by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, resolution 431 (XIV) taking note with satisfaction of the report.

j. INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AND INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND¹⁸⁶

The Council considered the annual report of the International Bank (E/2168 and Add.1) at its 605th and 606th plenary meetings on 16 June and that of the International Monetary Fund (E/2169 and Add.1) at its 584th plenary meeting on 29 May. The President of the Bank and the Managing Director of the Fund made statements before the Council. The Council unanimously adopted resolutions 416 B (XIV) and 421 (XIV) taking note, respectively, of the reports of the Bank and the Fund.

9. Audit Reports on Expenditure by Specialized Agencies of Technical Assistance funds from the Special Account Resolution 519 A (VI)¹⁸⁷ adopted by the General Assembly on 12 January 1952 called on the specialized agencies participating in the Expanded Programme of technical assistance "to provide, in their regular budget documents, information concerning their estimates for the expenditure of technical assistance funds; and to transmit to the General Assembly, for examination and approval, the audit reports relating to expenditure of technical assistance funds allocated from the Special Account after approval of the appropriate audit reports by the general conferences of their agencies or by such other authorities of the agencies as are constitutionally authorized to approve them".

Pursuant to this resolution, the Secretary-General, in a note (A/C.5/518) dated 25 November 1952, transmitted to the Assembly the reports which had been submitted by the specialized agencies participating in the Expanded Programme of technical assistance. These reports comprised for each agency financial statements covering operations under the Expanded Programme in the form prescribed by the Technical Assistance Board, accompanied by the Certificate of the External Auditors and, where applicable, by such further comments on technical assistance matters as the auditors had included in their reports to the general conference or equivalent authority of the agency concerned. The Secretary-General's note was also accompanied by a combined statement showing the status of allocations to the participating organizations under the Expanded Programme as of 31 December 1951, and summarizing the separate audited financial statements submitted by the agencies, as well as similar information regarding the transactions of the United Nations under the same Programme.

With the exception of the audit reports relating to the accounts of UNESCO and FAO, the audit reports in question had been approved by the general conference or by such other authorities of the agencies concerned as were constitutionally authorized to approve them. In the case of UNESCO, the audit report had been submitted to the session of its general conference which commenced on 12 November 1952. In the case of FAO, the audit report had been considered by the Council of FAO but could not be finally approved until the next session of the Conference of FAO in 1953.

Total allocations from the Special Account during the period under review amounted to $13,163,004, of which $6,256,771 was spent or obligated up to 31 December 1951.

¹⁸⁵ For the activities of IRO see pp. 491-92.

¹⁸⁷ See Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 400-01.

In its nineteenth report to the seventh session of the General Assembly (A/2270), the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions stated that the proportion of administrative and indirect operational costs in relation to the total of obligations incurred, based on figures appearing in the Secretary-General's note was as follows:

	Project Costs	Administrative and Indirect Operational Costs (net)
	Per cent
United Nations	61	39
ILO	69	31
FAO	73	27
ICAO	86	14

The Advisory Committee, inter alia, found the proportion of administrative costs to total expenditure to be "extremely high". In its opinion, it was possible that central servicing units had been expanded in advance of actual needs and on a scale which was not warranted by the current development of direct country activities. It recommended the competent legislative bodies of the specialized agencies to give this subject adequate consideration. The Advisory Committee suggested that efforts should be made to distribute indirect operational costs to the respective projects, possibly on a general pro rata basis.

The Fifth Committee at its 367th meeting on 1 December considered the Secretary-General's note and the comments on it by the Advisory Committee. The representative of Egypt called special attention to the observation of the Advisory Committee regarding the proportion of administrative costs to total expenditure.

The Fifth Committee, by 44 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, adopted a resolution (A/-2321) which was considered by the General Assembly at its 409th plenary meeting on 20 December and was adopted without discussion as resolution 673(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly

"1. Accepts the audit reports relating to expenditure by specialized agencies of technical assistance funds allocated from the Special Account for the period from the inception of the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance to 31 December 1951;

"2. Takes note of the observations thereon of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions."

U. RELATIONS WITH NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS

1. Application of Headquarters Agreement¹⁸⁸ to Representatives of Non-Governmental Organizations in Consultative Status with the Economic and Social Council

The General Assembly, on 1 February 1952, adopted resolution 606(VI)¹⁸⁹ authorizing the Secretary-General, upon request of the Economic and Social Council or its Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations, to make arrangements to enable the representative designated by any non-governmental organization having consultative status to attend public meetings of the General Assembly whenever economic and social matters are discussed which are within the competence of the Council and of the organization concerned. The Assembly further requested the Secretary-General to continue to give assistance to representatives of such non-governmental organizations in facilitating transit to or from sessions of the Assembly and its Committees.

At its fourteenth session, from 20 May to 1 August 1951, the Council had before it two proposals on the application of the Agreement to representatives of non-governmental organizations under the terms of the Assembly's resolution.

One of these proposals, presented by Poland (E/L.372), would state that it was not necessary for the Council to discuss each individual case of inviting representatives of non-governmental organizations to attend the Assembly, and would attribute infringements of the provision of the Agreement to the Government of the United States. It proposed that the Assembly be requested to reconsider resolution 606(VI) with a view to drawing to the attention of the United States

¹⁸⁸ The Agreement, which concerns, among other things, special privileges regarding transit and visas for visits to the Headquarters District, was signed on 26 June 1947 by the Secretary-General of the United Nations and by the Secretary of State of the United States and was brought into effect by an exchange of notes between the Secretary-General and the permanent representative of the United States at the seat of the United Nations, on 21 November 1947. For text, see Y.U.N., 1947-48, pp. 199-204.

Government the inadmissibility of practices violating sections 11 and 13 of the Headquarters Agreement. This draft resolution would further request the Secretary-General to continue to give assistance to representatives of non-governmental organizations including access to the Headquarters District to facilitate the carrying out of their consultative functions, attendance at public meetings of the Assembly and the Council when matters of interest to the organization were to be discussed, and assistance to enable representatives to obtain necessary visas in accordance with provisions of sections 11 and 13 of article IV of the Agreement.

The second draft resolution, presented by France (E/L.317), would request the Secretary-General to invite each organization in categories A and B to send a representative to attend public meetings of the Assembly in regular sessions at which economic and social matters within its competence were to be discussed. It was argued that this proposal, which complied with the Assembly's instructions, would end the controversy and solve the problem by means which lay within the powers of the Council and the Secretary-General.

The Council discussed the application of the Agreement at its 572nd, 576th, 578th, 579th, 591st, 596th, 600th, 618th and 619th plenary meetings, from 21 May to 25 June 1951.

The representative of Poland, presenting his draft, argued that resolution 606(VI) authorizing the Secretary-General to make arrangements to enable the representative designated by any non-governmental organization having consultative status to attend meetings of the Assembly only upon request of the Council or its NGO Committee was in contradiction with the Headquarters Agreement, and that it was illogical for this resolution to provide for representatives of non-governmental organizations to attend meetings of the Assembly but not of the Council.

The Polish proposal was supported by the representatives of Czechoslovakia and the USSR who alleged that the Government of the United States had denied admittance to representatives of non-governmental organizations to the Headquarters District on a number of occasions since the autumn of 1950. These representatives also maintained that the proposal would guarantee that non-governmental organizations would be able to participate in the work of the United Nations in accordance with the principles laid down in Article 71 of the Charter, free of any arbitrary restrictions imposed by one Member State.

Among representatives who supported the French proposal were those of Argentina and Sweden. The representatives of Sweden and Uruguay pointed out that important questions of principle were involved. The representative of the Philippines felt that "excessive caution" in the granting of visas might impede the work of the Organization.

The representative of the United States, supporting the French proposal, denied that his Government had at any time violated the Headquarters Agreement with respect to the admission of representatives of non-governmental organizations to sessions of the Council or its subsidiary bodies. Certain understandable delays in issuing visas had occurred, but he said that representatives of non-governmental organizations who were more interested in attending a session than in publicity could attain their purpose by applying for visas sufficiently in advance. United States legal experts had held the opinion that the Agreement did not apply to persons wishing to attend the Assembly under arrangements made by the Council; however, since the General Assembly in resolution 606(VI) had made it clear that representatives of non-governmental organizations could be invited to attend meetings of the Assembly, the United States Government had concluded that the Agreement would apply to such representatives and would in future act on that premise. He further pointed out that the second proposal before the Council was more liberal than Assembly resolution 606(VI) since, without requiring a separate decision by the Council and the NGO Committee in each case, it would empower the Secretary-General to invite to meetings of the General Assembly representatives of all non-governmental organizations in categories A and B. That invitation would suffice to make the Headquarters Agreement applicable to such persons who would then be freely admitted to the Headquarters District.

The representative of Iran presented an oral amendment to the French draft which would have the Secretary-General invite each such organization in category A or B to send "its" representative to public meetings of the General Assembly in regular session at which economic and social matters within its competence are discussed, thus amending the French text which referred to "a" representative. The representative of France accepted the amendment. At the 619th plenary meeting on 25 June, however, the representative of the United States presented a further oral amendment which would, in effect, restore the original wording of the French proposal.

The United States amendment was not adopted, 7 votes being cast in favour, 7 against, with 4 abstentions.

The representative of Czechoslovakia proposed orally that the operative part of the French draft should be amended to have the Council request the Secretary-General "to invite each non-governmental organization having consultative status to send representatives to attend public meetings of the General Assembly at which economic and social matters within the competence of the Council and of the organization concerned are discussed." The representative of the USSR proposed orally that the amendment by Czechoslovakia should contain a stipulation that the representative referred to in the draft might be accompanied by a reasonable number of advisers and experts. The representative of Czechoslovakia agreed to this suggestion. The Council voted first on the amendment by Czechoslovakia which would replace the words "each such organization in categories A and B" with the words "each non-governmental organization with consultative status", rejecting the proposal by 6 votes to 5, with 7 abstentions. The Council then rejected, by 10 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions, the remainder of the Czechoslovak proposal.

At its 619th plenary meeting on 25 June, the Council adopted, by 13 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions, the amended French draft resolution (455 (XIV)). By this resolution, the Council, after citing its consideration of Assembly resolution 606 (VI), requested the Secretary-General to invite each organization in categories A and B to send its representative to attend public meetings of the Assembly at which economic and social matters within its competence are discussed.

In view of the adoption of the French draft, the Council decided, by 8 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions, that it would not vote on the Polish draft.

2. Granting of Consultative Status¹⁹⁰

Twenty-eight applications or re-applications were considered and reported on by the Council Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations during its fourteenth session, at its 112th to 114th meetings, from 8 to 9 April 1952.

On the basis of a report from the Council NGO Committee (E/2201 and Add.1) on applications and re-applications for consultative relationship submitted by non-governmental organizations, the Council, at its fourteenth session, in resolution 453 A.I (XIV), adopted at its 572nd and 573rd plenary meetings on 21 May 1952, and by resolution 453 A.II (XIV), adopted at its 586th plenary meeting on 2 June 1952, decided that the following organizations be placed in category B (voting on individual organizations is shown in parentheses below):

- Inter-American Statistical Institute (15 votes to 3)
- International Association of Juvenile Court Judges (15 votes to 3)
- International Catholic Migration Commission (15 votes to 3)
- International Commission against Forced Labour Camps (15 votes to 3)
- International Federation for the Rights of Man (15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions)
- International Federation of Settlements (14 votes to 3)
- International Islamic Economic Organization (unanimously)
- International Labour Assistance (formerly International Socialist Aid) (15 votes to 3)
- World Council for the Welfare of the Blind (15 votes to 3)

The Council, in resolution 453 A.I.2 (XIV), adopted at its 573rd plenary meeting on 21 May 1952, decided that the following organizations, at that time on the register of non-governmental organizations referred to in paragraph 17 of Council resolution 288 B (X),¹⁹¹ be transferred to category B:

- International Catholic Child Bureau (15 votes to 3)
- International Congresses for Modern Architecture (unanimously)
- World Power Conference (unanimously)
- World Veterans Federation (15 votes to 3)

The Council, at its 573rd plenary meeting on 21 May 1952, adopted resolution 453 A.I.3 (XIV) in which it requested the Secretary-General to place the following organizations on the register of non-governmental organizations referred to in paragraph 17 of Council resolution 288 B (X):

- Confederation internationale du credit populaire (subject to review at the fifteenth session) (12 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions)
- European Centre of Documentation and Compensation (15 votes to 3)
- International Federation of High Police Officers (15 votes to 3)
- International Federation of Women Lawyers (15 votes to 3)

The Council unanimously adopted resolution 453 A.I.4 (XIV), requesting the Transport and Communications Commission to advise it on the application of the International Automotive Institute for consultative status in category B. By the same resolution, the Council requested the NGO Committee to reconsider this application at the fifteenth session in the light of the comments of the Transport and Communications Commission.

The Council, by 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, adopted resolution 453 A.I.5 (XIV), requesting the NGO Committee to reconsider the application for category B consultative status of the International Society of Social Defence at the fifteenth session.

The Council, by 13 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions, adopted resolution 453 A.I.6(a) (XIV), approving the agreement of the International Trade Secretariats to be represented through the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, an organization in category A consultative status. It adopted unanimously part (b) of the same resolution, requesting the Council NGO Committee to review the status of the following two International Trade Secretariats, in category B consultative status, and to report thereon to the Council at the fifteenth session:

International Federation of Unions of Employees in Public and Civil Services.

International Transport Workers' Federation.

The Council adopted unanimously resolutions 453 A.I.7 and 9 (XIV), taking note that the Caritas Internationalis had been replaced on the list of organizations in category B consultative status by the International Conference of Catholic Charities and that the World Engineering Conference, an organization in category B consultative status had ceased to exist.

The Council, in resolution 453 A.I.8 (XIV), adopted unanimously, decided that the World Confederation of Organizations of the Teaching Profession shall, when it is established and subject to the receipt of its formal application, supersede the World Organization of the Teaching Profession in category B consultative status.

3. Review of Non-Governmental Organizations in Consultative Relationship

The Economic and Social Council, in pursuance of its resolution 413 B (XIII)¹⁹² reviewed the non-governmental organizations granted consultative status at its eighth and ninth sessions. At its 573rd plenary meeting on 21 May 1952, the Council, having considered the report of its Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations (E/2201), adopted, by 15 votes to 3, resolution 453 B 1. (XIV), deciding that the International Carriage and Van Union and the International Wagon Union shall be represented by the International Union of Railways in category B consultative status. By 15 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, the Council adopted resolution 453 B 2. (XIV), in which it requested the Secretary-General to place the International Institute of Public Law and the International Temperance Union, formerly in category B, on the register of non-governmental organizations referred to in paragraph 17 of Council resolution 288 B (X).

4. Communications Containing Complaints against Governments

Pursuant to paragraph 35(g) of Council resolution 288(X) on matters affecting the consultative arrangements under Article 71 of the Charter, the Secretary-General submitted a memorandum (E/C.2/332) to the Council NGO Committee requesting guidance on the procedure to be followed in the case of written statements from non-governmental organizations in consultative status containing complaints, including complaints against governments.

The Council NGO Committee considered the memorandum at its 117th and 118th meetings on 27 June and 3 July and recommended (E/-2270) that all communications from non-governmental organizations having consultative status in category A or B alleging violation of human rights, including those complaining against governments, should be handled in accordance with the special procedure laid down in Council resolution 75(V), as amended—established for the purpose of handling such complaints—and that Council resolution 288 B (X) should also be used in addition to that procedure. The Committee made a similar recommendation with regard to complaints concerning the status of women, which it held should be handled according to the procedure set forth in Council resolution 76(V), as amended.¹⁹³

The Committee further recommended that other communications containing complaints against governments, that is, other than complaints alleging violation of human rights, should be distributed only after the government concerned had been notified, and that any reply of the government concerned should, if received within six-weeks, be circulated in the same document, otherwise as an addendum.

¹⁹³ The procedures for handling complaints concerning human rights and the status of women provided, inter alia, for the compilation of confidential and non-confidential lists indicating the substance of the communication to be made available to the members of the respective commissions. See Y.U.N., 1950, p. 534 and pp. 562-3. (Written statements by NGO's were under Council resolution 288 B (X). The texts to be circulated to Council members.) See Y.U.N., 1950, pp. 658-59.

The Committee's recommendation was considered by the Council at its 661st and 662nd plenary meetings on 28 July 1952.

During the discussion, the representative of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions held that if, as the Committee recommended, complaints from non-governmental organizations concerning human rights were handled under resolution 75(V), no action would be taken on such complaints. She held that that resolution had never been intended to cover non-governmental organizations in consultative status, but related solely to petitions from private persons or organizations. Council resolution 288(X) on revised arrangements for consultation made no reference to resolution 75(V) and did not cite it in part C among the earlier resolutions which resolution 288 B (X) had in some respects replaced. The Committee's recommendation was indefensible from a legal standpoint and constituted one of a series of steps which were depriving the consultative non-governmental organizations of their privileges. The International Federation of Agricultural Producers fully shared these views.

Some representatives, among them those of Argentina, the USSR and Uruguay, opposed the recommendation of the Committee.

The representative of Uruguay stated that limiting the procedure to that under resolution 75(V) would be unjust, for under that resolution communications from non-governmental organizations concerning human rights could not be circulated as Council documents. The Committee's recommendation would mean that only those non-governmental organizations having representatives in New York and which could, therefore, present their views orally under rule 80 of the rules of procedure of the Council, would be able to submit complaints against governments concerning human rights; other non-governmental organizations would be in a less favourable position. The proposed solution would not encourage non-governmental organizations to continue their consultative work with the enthusiasm they had already displayed.

The representatives of Argentina and the USSR opposed the Committee's recommendations on the grounds that the Charter provided for only one category of complaints, that is, petitions relating to Trust Territories; all other complaints, they held, should be submitted to the competent authorities of the State against which the complaint was directed. Any other procedure would be a violation of the sovereignty of States and, therefore, contrary to Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter.

Support for the Committee's recommendation was expressed by the representatives of Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States. The United States representative held that no distinction should be made on the basis of the source of complaints; all communications alleging violations of human rights should, therefore, be handled under Council resolution 75(V) as the Committee had recommended. In the absence of an international covenant on human rights or other legal instrument defining human rights, the Council would be unable to take action on communications alleging the violation of human rights; in these circumstances to publicize complaints by circulating them under the provisions of resolution 288 B (X) would only damage the prestige of the United Nations. The Committee's recommendation did not limit the prerogatives of the non-governmental organizations and, in fact, confirmed their right to bring complaints against governments, other than those concerning human rights, a right which previously had never been clearly established. Reference was made to paragraph 13 of Council resolution 288 B (X) which states the principle that arrangements should not be such as to overburden the Council or transform it from a body for co-ordination of policy and action, as contemplated in the Charter, into a general forum for discussion.

The representative of Argentina proposed orally that the Committee's recommendation should be clarified by the addition of a stipulation that the complaints other than those alleging violation of human rights were understood to refer to communications on "questions within the competence of the Council and of the non-governmental organizations concerned." The Argentine amendment was adopted by the Council, by 12 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions, and the Committee's recommendation, as a whole, as amended, by 11 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions, at the 662nd plenary meeting on 28 July. In terms of this resolution (454(XIV)), the Council decided that complaints charging violations of human rights should continue to be handled under Council resolution 75(V) as amended and that complaints dealing with other matters be handled under Council resolution 288 B (X), with the understanding that the Committee's recommendation on complaints, other than those alleging violation of human rights, referred to communications on questions within the competence of the Council and of the non-governmental organizations concerned.

5. Arrangements of Regional Economic Commissions for Consultation with Non-Governmental Organizations

By resolution 414 C (XIII), adopted on 18 September 1951,¹⁹⁴ the Council made recommendations concerning consultative relations with the regional economic commissions. These recommendations concerned, among other things, procedure in respect of consultation.

Action taken by these commissions¹⁹⁵ was as follows:

Economic Commission for Europe (ECE): At its seventh session, ECE examined the desirability of revising its rules of procedure relating to consultative relations with non-governmental organizations in accordance with the principles contained in Council resolution 288(X). The Commission noted, however, that its rules of procedure, as at present applied, did conform with the spirit of the rules laid down by the Council.

Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE): At its eighth session, ECAFE considered that same Council resolution and decided to amend its rules of procedure regarding consultative relations with non-governmental organizations so as to bring them generally in line with the rules established by the Council for its functional commissions.

Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA): The Committee of the Whole of ECLA took note of the resolution of the Council and postponed action on changes of the rules of procedure relating to non-governmental organizations until the fifth session of the Commission.

V. IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS ON ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL MATTERS

In accordance with the procedure adopted in its resolution 283(X),²¹⁰ the Economic and Social Council had before it at its fourteenth session the Secretary-General's report on "Implementation of Recommendations on Economic and Social Matters" (E/2166), together with the replies from governments (E/2165 and Add.1 to 44),²¹¹ to the Secretary-General's request (sent in accordance with resolution 283(X)) for information as to what governments had done to carry out the recommendations adopted by the General Assembly and the Council during 1948 and 1949.

The report (E/2166) contained an annotated list serving as an index to the replies received from 28 governments²¹² on some or all of the recommendations circulated in accordance with resolution 283(X) and also to information received from governments in other contexts. In the annotated list the resolutions were grouped under four general headings: economic questions, social questions, co-ordination questions and legal questions. A separate section was devoted to treaties, conventions and protocols, and another to recommendations involving requests for specific information.

The Secretary-General also submitted a note (E/L.403) suggesting which recommendations adopted by the Assembly and the Council during 1950 and 1951 might be included in the 1954 report on implementation.

During the discussion at the Council's 663rd plenary meeting on 29 July 1952 some members, among them the representatives of Belgium, France, the United Kingdom and the United States, expressed the opinion that, although their Governments were greatly interested in the implementation of the resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Council, the results of the procedure established under Council resolution 283(X) had fallen short of expectations. It was pointed out by the United States representative that the General Assembly and the Council had tended to adopt resolutions which required specific reports within specific time-limits, and under which the Secretary-General took steps other than under the bi-annual reporting procedure of resolution 283(X) to obtain information from governments. Replies from governments regarding such resolutions were, on the whole, more satisfactory. The representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States also alluded to the need for avoiding duplication of effort and documentation in keeping with General Assembly resolution 593 (VI).

The United Kingdom and the United States presented a joint draft resolution (E/L.454) (see below) which was supported by the majority of the Council. The representative of the USSR, however, held that governments should be free to submit information under conditions most convenient to themselves.

The representatives of Egypt and Uruguay objected to a paragraph in the preamble to the joint draft which would note that only 28 governments had replied. They held that the criticism implied in the paragraph was unjustified since the number of replies was not discouraging. The sponsors of the draft resolution agreed to the deletion of this paragraph and, at the suggestion of the Swedish representative, also to the deletion of the second operative paragraph recommending that the Assembly adopt procedures similar to those recommended in the draft for adoption by the Council. The representative of Sweden pointed out that the Assembly had already decided to reconsider its own procedure for formulating resolutions.

The draft resolution, as thus amended, and with certain other drafting amendments was adopted by the Council by paragraph-by-paragraph votes, varying from 11 to 5, with 2 abstentions, to 15 to 3. The amended draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 14 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, as resolution 450 (XIV). It read:

These summaries and analyses were considered by the sixteen-member Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories set up for this purpose by Assembly resolution 332(IV)⁵ of 2 December 1949. The Committee held 21 meetings, from 11 September to 11 October. In accordance with Assembly resolutions 333(IV) and 565(VI),⁶ special attention was paid to social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, and a special section of the Committee's report to the General Assembly (A/2219) was devoted to this subject. The report was considered by the Fourth Committee at its 251st to 260th meetings, from 21 to 31 October, and by the General Assembly at its 402nd plenary meeting on 10 December. The consideration of particular aspects is dealt with below under subject headings.

1. Territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter Applies

In the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and in the General Assembly, reservations were expressed by certain delegations, in particular regarding individual territories concerning which information had been transmitted.

In the Committee the representative of Ecuador reserved the position of his delegation with regard to the Territories which came under Article 73e and in particular with regard to those in the American Continent on which the Netherlands Government had decided not to transmit any further information.

Arising from the fact that information had been transmitted by the Netherlands on Netherlands New Guinea (Irian), formal reservations on behalf of their respective Governments regarding this territory were made in the Committee on Information by the representatives of Indonesia and the Netherlands. Similar statements were made by both representatives during the general debate in the Fourth Committee, when reservations were also made in regard to sovereignty over British Honduras (Belize Territory) by the representatives of Guatemala and the United Kingdom; over Aden by the representatives of Yemen and the United Kingdom; and over the Falkland Islands (Islas Malvinas) by the representatives of Argentina and the United Kingdom. The representative of Mexico stated that in the view of his Government the transmission of information on a Non-Self-Governing Territory by the responsible State did not affect the rights of sovereignty over that Territory which might be claimed by any other State which regarded itself in a position to do so.

Formal declarations were also made by the representatives of Lebanon, Iraq and Syria to the effect that their participation in the discussion on information relating to Morocco and Tunisia was without prejudice to the recognition by their Governments of the sovereign status of these two States, which were bound only by treaty obligations to France. A statement reserving the position of his Government in regard to the consideration of the question of Morocco and Tunisia was made by the representative of France.

At the 402nd plenary meeting of the General Assembly on 10 December, the representative of El Salvador, speaking on behalf of his own Government and those of Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica, expressed sympathy with the reservation made in the Fourth Committee by Guatemala concerning Belize Territory, taking into consideration the fact that that problem directly concerned the geographical unity of Central America.

Diverging opinions were also expressed regarding the interpretation of Article 73e and on the competence of the General Assembly to decide as to the Territories on which information should be transmitted.

The representative of the USSR pointed out that Chapter XI of the Charter placed obligations upon countries responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The list of Territories in respect of which these obligations existed had been approved by the General Assembly at its first session and could be changed only by the Assembly itself; the Administering Powers could not decide unilaterally whether information should or should not be transmitted in respect of those Territories. The representative of Egypt disagreed with the interpretation that a decision to cease transmission of information lay solely with the Administering Authority and referred to General Assembly resolution 334(IV), in which the Assembly considered that it was within its responsibility to express its opinion on the principles which had guided or might in the future guide the Members concerned in enumerating those Territories.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France and the United Kingdom, on the other hand, asserted that such decisions rested solely with the Administering Powers concerned; that Assembly resolution 66(I), which enumerated Territories falling within Chapter XI of the Charter, merely listed the Territories as enumerated by the Administering Powers; that the information transmitted was, in the words of Article 73e, "for information purposes"; and that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, though it could make substantive recommendations relating to functional fields generally, could not do so in respect of individual Territories. These representatives also asserted that they were faithfully carrying out their obligations under the Charter. They suggested, further, that a comparison might be made between conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories and those in neighbouring territories or territories with similar problems, but this was not considered by the representatives of China, Guatemala, Haiti, India and Saudi Arabia to be a useful measure.

The representative of Belgium stated that a responsibility to transmit information fell upon all States administering populations which had not attained the same degree of civilization as themselves, whether or not these States were among the so-called Administering Powers. Many backward indigenous peoples did not enjoy the international guarantees to which they were entitled under the Charter, because the Powers administering them refused to admit their obligations at the level of the United Nations and continued to refrain from transmitting the information called for under the provisions of Chapter XI.

The representatives of Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Liberia, Mexico, Peru, the Philippines, Syria and Venezuela rejected this interpretation of Chapter XI as a distortion of its real meaning. They pointed out that by its title Chapter XI referred to "Non-Self-Governing Territories" and not to peoples in independent sovereign States who enjoyed full rights as nationals of such States. The indigenous inhabitants in dependent Territories did not always enjoy the same rights and protections as nationals of the Metropolitan countries and for this reason their welfare and advancement to self-government had been accepted as an international concern. The representative of the Dominican Republic felt that a study should be made of the legal implications of Chapter XI, in view of the conflicting interpretations placed on it.

a. FACTORS TO BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING IF A TERRITORY IS SELF-GOVERNING

In 1946, the General Assembly enumerated (resolution 66(I)) Territories falling within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter. In 1949, by resolution 334(IV),⁷ the Assembly noted the cessation of transmission of information under Article 73e in respect of certain of these Territories, and called for an examination of the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose peoples have not yet achieved a full measure of self-government. By resolution 567(VI),⁸ adopted on 18 January 1952, the Assembly stated that it had examined a report by the Special Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and considered that a further study should be undertaken. It appointed a ten-member Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories), comprising Australia, Belgium, Burma, Cuba, Denmark, France, Guatemala, Iraq, the United States and Venezuela, to undertake that study.

The Committee held six meetings from 4 to 9 September 1952. Its report (A/2178) to the General Assembly contained a list of recommended factors (see below).

(1) Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

The report was considered by the Fourth Committee at its 271st to 279th meetings from 12 to 19 November and by the General Assembly at its 402nd plenary meeting on 10 December.

Introducing the report, the representative of Iraq, chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee, stated that the work of the Committee had been governed by certain general considerations. First, it had been agreed that the Committee was concerned only with Non-Self-Governing Territories as covered by Chapter XI of the Charter. Second, the Committee had decided that the question of what authority should determine that a territory had reached a stage of self-government where it fell outside the scope of Article 73e of the Charter was not within its competence. Third, it had been agreed to refer to the Assembly the question of the extent to which Article 73e continued to apply in the case of territories which had become neither independent nor fully integrated within another State but which had already attained a full measure of self-government in their internal affairs.

The representative of Iraq emphasized that the most important statement made by the Committee was that no enumeration of factors could do more than serve as a guide in determining whether a territory was or was not fully self-governing. Each specific case would have to be determined by its particular circumstances. Resolution 567(VI) had underlined that principle by stressing that such a list of factors could not be regarded as exhaustive or definitive.

The Committee, he said, had produced a revised list of factors, but the same two general categories (see below) had been maintained. His Government had suggested that a new factor, relating to the question of armed forces, should be added to the list; but as this suggestion raised the difficult questions of security, which were beyond the terms of the Committee's work, it had been agreed to include a broad reference to the question of responsibility for national defence, and to record in the report the text submitted by Iraq.

Although the majority of representatives expressed appreciation of the work of the Committee, many made reservations in respect of the Committee's report and the list of factors it contained.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, on the one hand, stressed that general criteria such as those enumerated in the report could not be uniformly applied to the 60 Territories on which information was to be supplied. These representatives, and the representatives of Belgium and the Union of South Africa, also emphasized that the decision whether or not to transmit information lay with the Administering Powers concerned; that direct control could not be exercised by the United Nations. They felt that the report lacked definition of some of the concepts with which it was concerned and that the study was not sufficiently exhaustive. The representatives of Australia, France and the United States drew attention, in particular, to what they regarded as the distinction between independence and self-government.

The representatives of Poland, the USSR and Yugoslavia, on the other hand, emphasized the need to recognize the right to self-determination and felt that the list of factors should take into account the freely expressed will of the peoples concerned.

The representatives of Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Cuba, Egypt, El Salvador, Guatemala, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Venezuela, among others, maintained that the obligations assumed under Chapter XI of the Charter were as binding as those under other Chapters of the Charter and arose from a multilateral agreement concluded by the Administering Powers with other signatories of the Charter. The decision as to whether a Territory had become fully self-governing could not unilaterally be decided by Administering Powers; the international community was also concerned and therefore it was important to determine what factors must be taken into account. Although all these representatives did not necessarily approve the list completely, they felt that it would serve as a guide. They emphasized that "a full measure of self-government" as envisaged in Chapter XI of the Charter meant essentially political self-government and could not be limited to self-government only in the economic, social or educational spheres.

The representatives of Cuba and Venezuela, supported by the representative of Indonesia, added that Chapter XI gave the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories an assurance that their aspirations could be achieved by peaceful measures. Moreover, international peace and security could not be adequately safeguarded if the problems of the dependent peoples were neglected.

Although they agreed that the Assembly was fully competent to decide whether a territory was self-governing, the representatives of the Dominican Republic, Peru and Uruguay felt that criteria of self-government were difficult to establish and define; that there were still legal doubts on the matter of constitutionality; and that further study was needed.

The representatives of Israel, India and Liberia, noting the opposing views, urged a compromise solution. The representative of Israel said that any resolution adopted by a majority which did not include even a single Administering Power would not solve the difficulty.

The representatives of Egypt and Honduras stressed that the people concerned had a right to decide whether or not they had achieved a measure of self-government.

(2) Resolution Adopted by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

At its 278th meeting on 18 November, the Committee voted on the following draft resolution and amendments submitted during the debate:

(1) A joint draft resolution by Burma, Cuba, Egypt, Guatemala, Iraq and Venezuela (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1), in terms of which the Assembly would:

- (a) approve as a guide the list of factors;
- (b) recognize that each case should be considered in the light of its particular circumstances;

(c) declare that the factors should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government;

(d) further declare that for a territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs, it was essential that its people should have attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter; and

(e) recommend that the factors contained in the list should be taken into account in any case examined by the Assembly concerning the cessation of transmission of information, or in relation to other questions concerning an obligation to transmit information.

In a series of 24 separate votes—ten of which were by roll-call—varying from 55 to none with no abstentions, to 19 to 11, with 25 abstentions, the Committee adopted the draft resolution. In its final form, it incorporated amendments by Argentina, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Iraq, the Netherlands, Peru, Poland and the USSR (see below).

(2) An amendment by the USSR (A/C.4/L.233) to the six-Power draft. Referring to the preamble, in which reference was made to General Assembly resolution 222(III) stating that it was essential for the United Nations to be informed of any change that may take place in the constitutional status of a Non-Self-Governing Territory, the Soviet amendment would add that such information should be transmitted within six months. The information, the amendment further stated, should include the constitution, legislative Act or executive order providing for the government of the Territory and the constitutional relationship of the Territory to the Metropolitan country (adopted by a roll-call vote of 19 to 11, with 25 abstentions).

(3) An amendment by Poland (A/C.4/L.235) to add a specific reference to the right of self-determination (adopted by a roll-call vote of 39 to 7, with 9 abstentions).

(4) A joint amendment by the Dominican Republic and Peru, (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1) which would:

(a) delete from the preamble a statement that the obligation to transmit information remained in force until such time as the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter are fulfilled (by a roll-call vote of 36 to 8, with 11 abstentions, the Committee decided to retain the statement as part of the preamble);

(b) add a reference in the preamble to resolution 567(VI) (see above) of the General Assembly (adopted by 36 votes to none, with 16 abstentions);

(c) commend the report of the Ad Hoc Committee as a valuable contribution to the exhaustive study of factors (this part of the joint amendment was later withdrawn);

(d) decide to set up a new ten-member Ad Hoc Committee to carry out a more thorough study of factors (adopted by 32 votes to 6, with 15 abstentions);

(e) invite such committee to consider not only the current list of factors but also the possibility of defining "self-government", the features guaranteeing the principle of self-determination and the manifestation of the freely expressed will of the people in relation to the determination of their national status (adopted, as a whole, by 42 votes to none, with 12 abstentions); and

(f) request that the new Ad Hoc Committee be convened two weeks before the opening of the 1953 session of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (adopted, after acceptance by the sponsors of an oral amendment by Iraq (see below), by 39 votes to none, with 13 abstentions).

All the amendments by the Dominican Republic and Peru were proposed as substitute provisions for the entire operative part of the six-Power draft, but the Committee decided to vote on them as additional paragraphs to that draft.

(5) Two amendments by Argentina (A/C.4/L.237 and 238) to the joint amendment by the Dominican Republic and Peru, which would:

(a) maintain the original paragraphs of the preamble in the joint draft resolution (A C.4 L.231 and Corr.1) and add—instead of substitute—the provisions of the amendment by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1) to the six-Power draft (by its agreement to give precedence in voting procedure to this proposal, the Committee thus made the six-Power draft the basis of its decisions, and the individual provisions of the joint amendment by the Dominican Republic and Peru were voted on as additions to the six-Power draft);

(b) stipulate that the approval of the list of factors was made provisionally (A/C.4/L.238) (adopted by a roll-call vote of 23 to 4, with 28 abstentions).

(6) An amendment by the Netherlands (A/C.4/L.236) to the joint amendment by the Dominican Republic and Peru, which would:

(a) invite Member Governments to transmit, by 1 May 1953, their views on the subjects contained in the terms of reference of the proposed new committee accepted by the sponsors; and

(b) request this committee to take into account the statements on the subject of factors transmitted earlier by certain Governments in compliance with Assembly resolution 567(VI) (adopted by 25 votes to none, with 27 abstentions).

(7) An amendment by Ecuador (A/C.4/L.239) to the joint amendment by the Dominican Republic and Peru, which would have the reference to the possibility of defining the concept of self-government relate specifically to "the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter" (adopted by 14 votes to none, with 35 abstentions).

(8) An oral amendment by Iraq to the joint amendment by the Dominican Republic and Peru, which would have the proposed new committee convene not later than four weeks (instead of two weeks) before the 1953 session of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (accepted by the sponsors).

The joint draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 34 to 12, with 8 abstentions.

At its 296th meeting on 8 December, the Fourth Committee approved the nomination by the Chairman of the following as members of the proposed Ad Hoc Committee: Australia, Belgium, Burma, Cuba, Guatemala, Iraq, Netherlands, United Kingdom, United States and Venezuela.

Membership of the Committee was confirmed by the General Assembly at its 402nd plenary meeting on 10 December 1952.

At this plenary meeting the draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2296) was adopted without discussion by the Assembly by a roll-call vote of 36 to 15, with 7 abstentions, as resolution 648 (VII). Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Panama, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Denmark, France, Iceland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Greece, Israel, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay.

The resolution read:

"The General Assembly,

"Taking into account the obligation to transmit information, accepted in virtue of Article 73 e of the Charter, by the Members which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government,

"Taking into account that this obligation remains in force with regard to each Territory until such time as the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter are fulfilled,

"Taking into account the statement contained in resolution 222 (III), adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948, to the effect that it is essential for the United Nations to be informed of any change that may take place in the constitutional status of any Non-Self-Governing Territory, and that, not later than six months after the submission of the aforesaid information, such information as may be required in such cases should be communicated, including information about the constitution, legislative acts or executive orders regarding the government of the Territory as well as about the constitutional relationship of the Territory to the government of the metropolitan country,

"Having examined the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories),

"Recognizing that, in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government, an enumeration of factors would be a useful guide both for the General Assembly and for the Administering Member concerned,

"Having regard to its resolution 567 (VI) of 18 January 1952,

"1. Approves provisionally the annexed list of factors which may serve as a guide, both for the General Assembly and for the Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government;

"2. Recognizes that each concrete case should be considered and decided in the light of the particular circumstances of that case and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples;

"3. Declares that the factors, while serving as a guide in determining whether the obligations as set forth in Article 73 e of the Charter still exist, should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"4. Further declares that, for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs, it is essential that its people shall have attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter;

"5. Recommends that, provisionally, the annexed list of factors should be taken into account in any case which the General Assembly examines resulting from any communication received by the Secretary-General in virtue of General Assembly resolution 222 (III) concerning the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter, or in relation to other questions that may arise concerning the existence of an obligation to transmit information under this Article;

"6. Decides to set up a new Ad Hoc Committee of ten Members, consisting of Australia, Belgium, Burma, Cuba, Guatemala, Iraq, Netherlands, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America and Venezuela, with instructions to continue and carry out a more thorough study of the factors which will have to be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government;

"7. Invites the said Committee to take into account, inter alia, the list of factors prepared in 1952 by the Ad Hoc Committee set up under General Assembly resolution 567 (VI) and the statements transmitted by governments in compliance with the aforementioned resolution and, further, to take into account the following additional elements:

"(a) The possibility of defining the concept of a full measure of self-government for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter;

"(b) The features guaranteeing the principle of the self-determination of peoples in relation to Chapter XI of the Charter;

"(c) The manifestation of the freely expressed will of the peoples in relation to the determination of their national and international status for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter;

"8. Invites all Members of the United Nations to transmit in writing to the Secretary-General, by 1 May 1953, a statement of the views of their governments on the subjects contained in the terms of reference of the Committee;

"9. Requests the Secretary-General to convene the Ad Hoc Committee so that it may begin its work not later than four weeks before the opening of the 1953 session of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories."

Executive: The selection of members of the executive branch of the government by the competent authority in the territory receiving consent of the indigenous population, whether that authority is hereditary or elected, having regard also to the nature and measure of control, if any, by an outside agency on that authority, whether directly or indirectly exercised in the constitution and conduct of the executive branch of the government;

Judiciary: The establishment of courts of law and the selection of judges.

2. Participation of the population. Effective participation of the population in the government of the territory: (a) Is there an adequate and appropriate electoral and representative system? (b) Is this electoral system conducted without direct or indirect interference from a foreign government?*

3. Economic, social and cultural jurisdiction. Degree of autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs, as illustrated by the degree of freedom from economic pressure as exercised, for example, by a foreign minority group which, by virtue of the help of a foreign Power, has acquired a privileged economic status prejudicial to the general economic interest of the people of the territory; and by the degree of freedom and lack of discrimination against the indigenous population of the territory in social legislation and social developments.

2. Opinion of the population. The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed

* For example, the following questions would be relevant:

(i) Has each adult inhabitant equal power (subject to special safeguards for minorities) to determine the character of the government of the territory?

(ii) Is this power exercised freely, i.e., is there an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter and of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties? Some tests which can be used in the application of this factor are as follows:

(a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;

(b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;

(c) The existence of a secret ballot;

(d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;

(e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;

(f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times;

(iii) Is each individual free to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day?

and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

3. Geographical considerations. Extent to which the relations of the territory with the capital of the central government may be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles.

4. Ethnic and cultural considerations. Extent to which the population are of different race, language or religion or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associate themselves.

5. Constitutional considerations. Association (a) by virtue of the constitution of the metropolitan country; or (b) by virtue of a treaty or bilateral agreement affecting the status of the territory, taking into account (i) whether the constitutional guarantees extend equally to the associated territory, (ii) whether there are powers in certain matters constitutionally reserved to the territory or to the central authority, and (iii) whether there is provision for the participation of the territory on a basis of equality in any changes in the constitutional system of the State.

B. Status

2. Local rights and status. In a unitary system equal rights and status for the inhabitants and local bodies of the territory as enjoyed by inhabitants and local bodies of other parts of the country; in a federal system an identical degree of self-government for the inhabitants and local bodies of all parts of the federation.

3. Local officials. Appointment or election of officials in the territory on the same basis as those in other parts of the country.

4. Internal legislation. Local self-government of the same scope and under the same conditions as enjoyed by other parts of the country.

b, CESSATION OF TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION UNDER ARTICLE 73e OF THE CHARTER

At its 304th meeting on 12 December 1952, the Fourth Committee discussed the question of the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73e of the Charter in respect of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam.

The Committee had before it a communication addressed to the Secretary-General from the Netherlands delegation (A/2177). The communication, among other things, stated that, in view of the latest constitutional changes, granting a full measure of self-government in all internal matters to these territories, the Netherlands Government was of the opinion that these two Territories were no longer to be considered Non-Self-Governing Territories as referred to in Article 73e of the Charter and that the Netherlands Government had decided no longer to submit an annual report on the territories.

By the same communication, the Netherlands delegation transmitted copies of an Explanatory Note of the Netherlands Government on the termination of the transmission of information, together with copies of the Interim Order and Constitution of the two territories and copies of the principal relevant articles of the Netherlands Constitution (A/C.4/200).

Guatemala submitted a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.254) which, in effect, would postpone until the next session of the General Assembly the consideration of the agenda item.

The Guatemalan draft stated that the decision would be taken bearing in mind the importance of the item and the information by the Netherlands, as well as the short time remaining for the conclusion of the work of the current Assembly session.

The proposal would also have the Assembly decide that the newly constituted Committee on Factors should examine carefully any documents submitted by the Netherlands Government relating to the territories in the light of the resolution on factors adopted at the Assembly's current session, and report to the Assembly at its next session.

The representative of the Netherlands stated that although he would prefer a definite settlement of the item in the form of a resolution taking note of the communication by his Government, his delegation readily understood that

(a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;

(b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;

(d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;

(e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;

the Assembly required more time than was currently as its disposal. Moreover, as the Assembly also wished to give further study to the question of factors at the next session, he would be prepared to accept postponement.

Further, the Round Table Conference on the definitive Statute of the Kingdom of the Netherlands would probably be convened before the next Assembly session.

In the case of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, the representative of the Netherlands added, full measure of self-government was granted under the Interim Law, one of the results of the 1948 Round Table Conference between the Government of the Netherlands, Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles.

Support for the Guatemalan draft was expressed by the representatives of Canada, the Dominican Republic, Iraq and Yugoslavia.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Denmark, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States declared that they saw no need for further examination of the documents submitted by the Netherlands Government in the light of the resolution on factors adopted by the General Assembly or of any other resolution.

The Guatemalan draft resolution was adopted by the Committee (A/2331) by 29 votes to none, with 13 abstentions, and by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 409th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952, by 55 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, as resolution 650(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Bearing in mind the importance of the question of cessation of the transmission of information and the information supplied on that subject by the Netherlands Government, and in view of the short time remaining for the conclusion of the work of the seventh session,

"Decides that the Committee set up to study the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government, should examine carefully the documents submitted by the Netherlands Government relating to the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam in the light of the resolution on factors adopted by the General Assembly, and report to the Assembly at its next regular session."

2. Conditions, Development and Policies in Non-Self-Governing Territories

a. ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

In accordance with Assembly resolution 333 (IV) of 2 December 1949, the Committee at its first session in 1950, had paid special attention to education and, in 1951, to economic conditions and problems of development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In resolution 564(VI)⁹ of 18 January 1952, the General Assembly approved the special report on economic conditions (A/1836) presented by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories as a brief but considered indication of economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. By the same resolution, it invited the Secretary-General to communicate the report to Administering Members, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned.

At its third session, from 11 September to 7 October 1952, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories considered questions arising out of the special report, as well as statistical summaries of agricultural and industrial production, prepared by the Secretary-General (A/AC.35/L.102 and A/AC.35/L.109).

The Committee discussed economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories at its meetings from 12 to 16 September.

Referring to questions arising out of the special report, the representatives of Egypt, India, Indonesia and Pakistan, supported by those of Brazil and Ecuador, emphasized that the Committee should be informed by the Administering Members of the action and progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the light of General Assembly resolutions and the recommendations in the special reports of the Committee.

The representatives of Australia, France, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States considered that the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories was the responsibility solely of the Administering Powers. The recommendations contained in General Assembly resolutions and the general principles enunciated in the special reports of the Committee could serve as useful guides to possible solutions for particular problems. The progress achieved in the functional fields and the extent to which account was taken of such resolutions and recommendations were reflected in the information transmitted regularly under Article 73e of the Charter.

The representative of the USSR stated that although the information transmitted was inadequate, the facts led to the inevitable conclusion that conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories were highly unsatisfactory and characterized by economic exploitation and low standards of living. He criticized the fiscal and trade policies of Administering Members and claimed that the wealth of these territories was being drained for the benefit of the metropolitan countries.

The representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States replied that the charges by the USSR were unfounded.

Information was requested by the representatives of Egypt, India and Indonesia on several aspects of economic development as shown by the general policies of the Metropolitan countries and in the internal conditions of some of the Territories. The representative of Egypt asked whether there were not indications that the economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories had suffered as a result of defence programmes and of currency policies. The representative of Indonesia thought it difficult to judge how far economic progress had really bettered the position of the indigenous inhabitants and felt that more information was required on the participation of the peoples of the Territories in new economic enterprises. The representative of India considered it important to note the disequilibrium which had resulted in certain Non-Self-Governing Territories from restrictions on imports from areas other than the sterling area.

In reply, the Administering Members gave further details of economic progress made in their Territories; some Members provided information showing that contrary to the allegations that the Non-Self-Governing Territories had been exploited by the Metropolitan governments, substantial economic assistance had been provided. Moreover, the Committee, in its report on economic conditions, had recognized that: "By various means considerable sums of money have been made available to the Non-Self-Governing Territories through a policy of planned investment—i.e., by direct grants from metropolitan countries, by loans on the local, metropolitan or international market or by other forms of controlled investment."

The General Assembly did not consider separately the question of economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, although many representatives emphasized the importance of accelerating economic development to raise the standard of living of the peoples in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

b, SOCIAL CONDITIONS

In accordance with a decision of the Committee in 1951, which was approved by the Assembly in resolution 565 (VI), special attention was given at the Committee's third session to basic social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The Secretary-General had prepared analyses of information on aspects of social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and these analyses, together with documents dealing with subjects within their respective fields submitted by ILO and WHO, were presented to the Committee as follows:

Secretariat studies on general policies and major problems of social development (A/AC.35/L.94), race relations (A/AC.35/L.87),¹⁰ human rights (A/AC.35/L.97, A/2132/Add.1, A/2134/Add.1), public health administration (A/AC.35/L.89), problems of vital statistics (A/AC.35/L.82 and Add.1), family and child welfare benefits (A/AC.35/L.98), urban welfare (A/AC.35/L.100), social aspects of peasant settlement (A/AC.35/L.101), statistics on wages, cost-of-living indices and the development of trade unions (A/AC.35/L.105) and standards of living (A/AC.35/L.91 and Add.1); ILO studies on migrant labour (A/AC.35/L.107), workers' housing problems (A/AC.35/L.106) and wages and labour productivity (A/AC.35/L.108); a summary of UNESCO activities in the social sciences field (A/AC.35/L.93); and WHO studies on problems and trends in public health (A/AC.35/L.84), epidemic diseases (A/AC.35/L.88) and medical research (A/AC.35/L.90).¹¹

From 16 to 26 September, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories discussed basic social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories and the policies and programmes followed by Administering Members. It also discussed in detail problems of public health, rights of women, race relations, community development, family and child welfare, migrant labour, general labour conditions and policies, and standards of living. During the discussion, statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Cuba, Denmark, Egypt, France, India, Indonesia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Pakistan, the USSR, the United Kingdom and the United States. The representatives of Brazil, Cuba, Egypt, India, Indonesia and Pakistan expressed some criticism concerning specific conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and replies to criticisms and to requests for further information were given by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The majority of representatives stressed the interdependence of economic development and social progress, and it was pointed out that while economic development itself brought problems of a social character, it was not possible to finance social services without the development of the territorial resources, particularly agricultural production. The representative of Egypt, among others, while appreciating the efforts made by Administering Members, expressed the view that opinions differed as to whether efforts made by Metropolitan countries in giving outside assistance to their Territories were not counterbalanced by the advantages which were derived from the territories. Members of the Committee generally felt that increased international assistance should be made available to help the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories achieve a higher standard of living.

On 19 September, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories established a sub-committee consisting of Egypt, France, India (chairman), Indonesia, Netherlands and the United Kingdom, with broad terms of reference to prepare a special report on social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The Sub-Committee's report (A/AC.35/L.111) was considered by the Committee on 3 October.

The representative of the USSR criticized the whole trend of the report as not presenting an accurate picture of the social conditions existing in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He claimed that the policies of the Administering Members in social and other matters were subordinated, not to the interests of the indigenous populations, but to the political and economic interests of the Metropolitan countries.

With some amendments, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories approved, by 11 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, the report of the Sub-Committee. The report (A/2219, part II), as presented to the General Assembly, complemented the reports of 1950 (A/1303/Add.1) and 1951 (A/1836) and together, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories reported, these reports represented the considered views of the Committee on economic, social and educational problems as based on information transmitted by Members responsible for the administration of the Territories, supplemental information placed at the disposal of the Secretariat by Members concerned, and the discussions which had taken place in the Committee.

In the report on social conditions, the Committee stated that the living conditions of many of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories, despite the efforts of the Administering Members, were urgently in need of improvement. An indispensable condition for raising standards of living, it stated, was increased production, which was in turn dependent on a sufficiency of healthy and competent workers, forming part of communities providing adequate social satisfactions. Failure to appreciate the social implications of economic development might, therefore, make such development impossible.

Health was the first basic problem. While much had been done to provide public health organizations, to combat epidemic and endemic diseases and to reduce infant mortality, the general results in improving health conditions and extending services to the majority of the peoples were admittedly insufficient. The Committee considered that better nutrition, more adequate sanitation, as well as housing and health education were of primary importance in raising the level of health. An essential principle which it felt should govern health planning was the co-ordination of health and economic and social policy, both through the influence of health considerations on economic planning and on education, and through the understanding of economic, social and psychological considerations by public health officers. The Committee suggested that the Secretariat and WHO should continue to study the information provided by the Administering Members in order to assist in planning public health programmes and to indicate ways of co-ordinating these programmes with general policies of economic and social development.

Apart from long-standing problems of ill-health and poverty, it was noted, programmes of social advancement had to overcome problems of social adjustment emerging with economic change, which had tended in general to disrupt established forms of social organization. While noting a substantial expansion in the social welfare services in some Territories, the Committee suggested that further developments were required. The services provided varied considerably due to the different traditions of the Administering Members and to the difference in local needs. Social services, especially in areas of recent urban growth, were mainly curative—designed to meet the more urgent needs for public utilities, housing, public health and education. In the more recent programmes, however, the Committee found a commendable tendency to seek popular collaboration in preventive measures with the long term objective of fostering the growth of a community consciousness and responsibility. It was considered that the integration of preventive and curative programmes, which it found of equal importance, should be the aim of all long-range policy for the social progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The Committee emphasized the importance of obtaining popular participation at all levels in the formulation and execution of policies and endorsed the view that no programmes for the improvement of the life of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories could have any hope of success unless it had the consent and whole-hearted support of the peoples, obtained by the stimulation of their own aspirations and their realization of their own needs. It also pointed out that popular collaboration was an economic necessity in view of the limited resources available for the expansion of social services. Commenting on the necessity for outside assistance, the Committee noted that such assistance was being provided by the Metropolitan countries, mainly in the form of operational or advisory services, grants for capital expenditure and facilities for education and training. Attention was drawn to the social welfare technical assistance offered through the United Nations and its specialized agencies. The Committee stressed the important role that international assistance played in accelerating action and expressed the hope that Administering Members would increasingly avail themselves of these facilities.

With respect to labour conditions, the Committee considered it imperative that, even if only a minority of workers were employed for wages, the conditions of their employment should not only be just, but should also foster social progress. Wage-earners should receive sufficient pay to support themselves and their families in the circumstances of their employment. It was urgently necessary to raise wages, the Committee stated, but it recognized that this must be accompanied by increased productivity. In this connexion, it cautioned that inquiries undertaken into the relationship of wages to productivity be sufficiently broad to take account of the educational, health and social improvements necessary before examining the techniques of adjusting wages to productivity. The Committee considered that efforts to foster trade unions and provide training for trade union officers should be continued and extended.

ILO reports concerning migrant workers were endorsed by the report, which observed that forms of migrant labour which led to long absences of men from their families were socially undesirable and brought about serious social problems, both in the village communities and in the labour centres. The Committee expressed the hope that all Administering Members would ratify the International Labour Conventions concerning workers in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories also approved, by 13 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, a draft resolution submitted by India and New Zealand, by which the General Assembly would approve the report on social conditions and invite the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Administering Members, the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council and the specialized agencies concerned.

This draft resolution was considered by the Fourth Committee during its discussion of the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/2219). Members of the Fourth Committee did not discuss it at length, although reference to social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was made during the general debate on the Committee's report.

The majority of representatives in the Fourth Committee expressed general approval of the report. They felt that the three special reports by the Committee served a useful purpose.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, however, maintained that despite the deficiencies and omissions in the information, the political, economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories showed that the Administering Powers had not fulfilled the obligations they had undertaken under the Charter. They were of the opinion that Non-Self-Governing Territories were being exploited as cheap sources of raw materials. Citing examples to show low wages, deplorable housing conditions, discriminatory legislation, inadequate public health measures and educational facilities, they stated that social conditions in general were unsatisfactory and that the policy of the Administering Powers in social and other matters was subordinated to political, economic and military interests of the Metropolitan countries. They stated that all problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories were essentially political and the only solution was rapid progress towards eventual independence.

The representative of Yugoslavia, who felt that the report had certain shortcomings, hoped that more detail would be submitted in future reports. The information it did contain, however, was valuable, he said.

The draft resolution was adopted by the Committee, at its 262nd meeting on 3 November, by 43 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

At its 402nd plenary meeting on 10 December 1952, the General Assembly adopted the draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2296). The paragraph approving the report of the Committee on Information was adopted by 45 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions and the draft resolution as a whole by 45 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions as resolution 643 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting the report prepared by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"1. Approves the report of the Committee as a brief but considered indication of social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories and of the problems of social development;

"2. Invites the Secretary-General to communicate the report, for their consideration, to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned."

c. EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

At its second session in 1951, the Committee agreed that further discussion of progress achieved in the field of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories should take place at its session in 1952. Accordingly, the Committee had before it a summary of information concerning education prepared by the Secretary-General (A/AC.35/L.104) as well as reports (A/AC.35/L.99 and A/AC.35/L.103) submitted by UNESCO on the use of indigenous national languages and on measures for eradicating illiteracy.

In discussing the use of vernacular languages, the representative of Egypt expressed disappointment that the report of UNESCO paid chief attention to problems arising in cases where a vernacular was not highly developed or widely used. He referred to the statement in the report that "If the mother tongue is adequate in all respects to serve as the vehicle of university and higher education it should be so used," and urged that more regard should be paid to this recommendation. In particular, he made a strong appeal to the French Government to give more emphasis to the teaching and use of Arabic as a medium of instruction in the educational system of Morocco and Tunisia.

The representative of France assured the Committee that Arabic was being fostered in French North Africa and stated that his Government encouraged the use of the vernacular wherever it was sufficiently developed. The use of the vernacular for school instruction, however, could not be made a general rule applicable to all territories irrespective of the circumstances prevailing in each territory. The representatives of the United Kingdom and the Netherlands supported this view and gave examples from their territories showing the difficulties experienced in the use of vernacular languages in multi-lingual areas.

The representative of India said that no general rule regarding the use of vernacular languages in education could be presented without qualification to take into account local factors and that in some specific instances the use of a lingua franca might have certain advantages. But he agreed that the tendency was in favour of the fuller use of the national language of the people. He pointed out that, over and above eradicating illiteracy, it was necessary to prevent the lapse into illiteracy. For this purpose it was essential that adequate and suitable follow-up material should be provided. He noted with appreciation the progress made in various aspects of education, but deplored the fact that the achievement of universal primary education was in one instance made conditional on the ability of the Native Authorities to finance it.

The representative of the United Kingdom, commenting on an observation by the representative of India on the need to provide free and compulsory education, stated that this was the ideal aimed at in the educational policy of territories under the administration of his Government. He instanced, however, the many difficulties that had to be overcome before this ideal could be achieved. It was the policy of the United Kingdom Government to develop in its dependent territories the whole educational system rather than one particular aspect and to give due regard to the traditions of the local inhabitants. He agreed with the representative of India on the importance of preventing a lapse into illiteracy of those who had received a modicum of education. To this end, literature bureaux had been set up in East and Central Africa to publish books in vernacular languages, both for use in schools and for reading, as well as to encourage the talents of local authors.

The representative of the USSR observed that the Administering Authorities were not fulfilling their obligations in matters of education and that, consequently, there was mass illiteracy among the indigenous population. He cited specific cases in support of his contention.

The Fourth Committee did not consider separately the question of educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, but, at the conclusion of its debate on the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, adopted a draft resolution (see below) dealing with educational, economic and social policies.

d. INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION ON ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

In resolution 445(V), the General Assembly confirmed "its recognition of the importance of international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories as expressed in resolution 331(IV)," and invited the specialized agencies to communicate annually to the United Nations information on the progress of work undertaken by them which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In resolution 444(V),¹² the Administering Members needing technical assistance for the economic, social and educational advancement of their Non-Self-Governing Territories were invited to submit their requests, and also to include in the information transmitted by them a report on the manner in which technical assistance received from the United Nations and the specialized agencies had been integrated into long-range development programmes in the Territories. Furthermore, the General Assembly, in resolution 336(IV), requested "the Secretary-General to keep the Special Committee informed of the nature of the technical assistance which is accorded from time to time to Non-Self-Governing Territories by specialized international bodies."

In the light of the above, the Secretary-General had prepared documents setting out details of international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions and of technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, while memoranda concerning activities in their respective fields of interest to Non-Self-Governing Territories were submitted by WHO and UNESCO (A/AC.35/L.86, A/AC.35/L.92-93 and A/AC.35/L.95-96).

The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories discussed the question of international collaboration and technical assistance from 29 September to 1 October.

The representatives of Egypt, India and Indonesia stressed the importance which the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council had attached to the provision of technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories and questioned whether full advantage had yet been taken of existing possibilities. They recognized the value of the provision of fellowships and scholarships, but urged also that the necessary measures should be taken to send to the Territories international experts capable of demonstrating on the spot methods suited to the development of the Territories. These representatives also commended the growing practice of providing for the attendance of representatives of the Non-Self-Governing Territories at regional seminars.

The representative of India also drew attention to the importance of close working collaboration between the United Nations and the intergovernmental regional commissions. There was an obligation on the Committee to stress the importance of another aspect of international collaboration, namely, between the United Nations and its specialized agencies on the one hand and the Metropolitan countries and their dependent Territories on the other. It was also important that, where United Nations fellowships and scholarships had been granted, due care should be taken to assure that the knowledge gained would benefit the local populations.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, the United Kingdom, and the United States outlined the positions taken by their Governments in regard to technical assistance from the United Nations and its specialized agencies and the point was made that such assistance was available on a relatively modest scale and should be viewed in the total perspective of the greater technical facilities of the Administering Members which were made available to the Territories and of the other programmes of technical assistance of a regional or bilateral character. Examples of the various forms of national and regional technical assistance were instanced. The United Nations had emphasized the need of experts to be briefed on local conditions and, in their opinion, this was where persons already serving in the Territories had advantage over international experts. They assured the Committee that there had been no reluctance on their part to apply for such assistance, and gave details of the assistance received under the regular and expanded programmes of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies. Particular reference was made by representatives of some of the Administering Members to the participation of inhabitants of the various Territories in the programme of United Nations fellowships and scholarships and of the value of this programme to the individuals concerned and to the Territories.

The question of international collaboration on economic, social and educational conditions was not discussed separately by the Fourth Committee, but in the general debate on the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories representatives repeated the views they had expressed in that Committee. The representatives of Argentina, Denmark, Pakistan, the United States and Uruguay, among others, expressed the view that in certain cases some form of technical assistance was desirable to accelerate development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

e. ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND EDUCATIONAL POLICIES

During the discussions in the Fourth Committee, a joint seven-Power draft resolution on economic, social and educational policies was presented at the 260th meeting on 31 October by Brazil, Ecuador, Egypt, India, Iraq, Pakistan and the Philippines (A/C.4/208).

In terms of this draft, the General Assembly would:

(1) express the hope that the Members concerned, in transmitting information under Article 73e of the Charter, would furnish annually as complete information as possible on any action taken to bring the reports of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to the attention of the authorities responsible in the Territories for the implementation of educational, economic and social policy, and on any problems which might arise in giving effect to the general views expressed in these reports; and

(2) invite the Committee, in its annual reports to the Assembly, to consider the information transmitted under Article 73e in the light of the views expressed in the special reports on educational, economic and social conditions.

Sponsors of the draft resolution explained that it was a natural and logical consequence of Article 73e and in no way infringed the rights or responsibilities of the Administering Powers, or attempted to impose new obligations on them. The method proposed by the joint draft would lead to the establishment of closer relations between the Administering Powers and the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The representatives of Belgium, France, the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom, however, maintained that the joint draft resolution was liable to give the impression that the United Nations intended to intervene in the relations between Administering Powers and local administrations. The representative of the United States said that he would vote for the joint draft on the assurance given by the sponsors. The representative of New Zealand said that as the Administering Powers had not undertaken to transmit information of a political character, he therefore considered the resolution as drafted was merely a request to the Administering Powers, who were free to comply with it or not, as they chose. The representatives of Argentina, El Salvador and Israel were among those who supported the contention of the sponsors that the draft did not infringe the prerogatives of Administering Powers.

The representative of the Ukrainian SSR submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.220) to delete a paragraph of the seven-Power draft, as the reports mentioned did not, in his view, give a clear idea of economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The objectives of the Administering Powers in those Territories were not those which they claimed—in the Committee—to be following. He emphasized that he was not opposed in any way to the actual principle that all Powers should collaborate in the observance of the Charter. The paragraph to which the Ukrainian representative raised objection would state that the reports expressed "general views and objectives to be taken into account in the formulation of policy."

At the 268th meeting on 13 November, by 34 votes to 5, with 7 abstentions, the Committee rejected the Ukrainian amendment and adopted the seven-Power draft as a whole by a roll-call vote of 34 to 2, with 12 abstentions.

The report of the Fourth Committee (A/2296) was considered at the 402nd plenary meeting of the General Assembly on 10 December 1952. The Assembly did not discuss the report, but a number of delegations, including those of Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, India, Iraq, Netherlands, New Zealand, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, Uruguay and Venezuela, made statements in explanation of their votes.

After adopting, by 42 votes to 6, with 9 abstentions, that paragraph of the draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2296) which recognized that the reports of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories "express general views and objectives to be taken into account in the formulation of policy", the General Assembly, at its 402nd plenary meeting on 10 December 1952, adopted the resolution as a whole by 47 votes to 2, with 8 abstentions as resolution 645 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories is invited to submit to the General Assembly at its regular sessions reports containing such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable, relating to functional fields generally,

"Considering that in 1950, 1951 and 1952 the General Assembly approved special reports prepared by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on educational, economic and social conditions, and invited the Secretary-General to communicate these reports to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories for their consideration,

"Recognizing that these reports express general views and objectives to be taken into account in the formulation of policy,

"1. Expresses the hope that the Members concerned, when transmitting information under Article 73 e of the Charter, will furnish annually as complete information as possible on any action taken to bring the reports of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to the attention of the authorities responsible in the Territories for the implementation of educational, economic and social policy, and on any problems which may arise in giving effect to the general views expressed in these reports;

"2. Invites the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in its annual reports to the General Assembly to consider the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter in the light of the views expressed in the special reports on educational, economic and social conditions."

f. RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

The report of the Sub-Committee (A/C.35/L.111), appointed by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to prepare a special report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, which was considered by the Committee on 3 October, stated that the vital importance of improving race relations among all peoples should be evident to all who wished for the maintenance of world peace. It pointed out that in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the fact that the bulk of the inhabitants were of an ethnic origin and had a cultural heritage different from those of the peoples of the countries responsible for their administration and currently filling most of the senior offices in the Territories made the collaboration among races in these Territories of even greater importance. While recognizing that there were many practical problems to be faced, it urged that effective measures of reaching the objective of eliminating race prejudice and effectively establishing race equality should be sought in the field of legislation, of administrative practice, and of education and through the promotion and encouragement of enlightened public opinion. In the field of legislation, two principal problems were considered by the Committee: the abolition of any existing laws which tend to perpetuate race cleavages, and the adoption of laws consecrating the principle of race equality or directed against particular instances of race prejudice.

The representatives of Egypt, India, Indonesia and Pakistan submitted, in the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, a joint draft resolution on the subject of racial discrimination. The sponsors stated that in the light of the provisions in the Charter, the Committee should mark its recognition of the importance of the problem of race relations. The draft resolution would give formal expression to the view recorded in the report.

The representative of the USSR stated that various discriminatory measures existed in Non-Self-Governing Territories, notwithstanding the obligations incumbent on all Member States under the Charter and the Declaration of Human Rights to foster respect for all human rights without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion. As a rule, he said, the indigenous inhabitants were excluded from administrative posts and there were cases in which, although labour legislation prohibited such discrimination, it was applied in practice. Discriminatory measures, he alleged, included the restriction of health facilities and educational opportunities as well as the application of corporal punishment to the indigenous inhabitants and discriminatory policies were further implemented through residential segregation which was common in many Territories.

The representative of New Zealand said that it could be assumed that no Administering Power desired other than harmonious race relations in its Territories, but much levelling up of social conditions was needed before equality could be achieved. He drew attention to a UNESCO publication, The Roots of Prejudice, by Arnold M. Rose, which reached the conclusion that legislation against discrimination was one of the most important means of breaking down traditions of prejudice, though to be effective, legislation needed the support of community opinion.

Speaking against adoption of the draft resolution, the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom cited measures taken by their countries to guarantee human rights and establish equal treatment, and said that there was no need for formal action by the Committee since this would result in duplicating its views on the subject of racial discrimination which had already been adequately expressed in the report on social conditions. Such a resolution would have the disadvantage of concentrating attention on a problem which was of world-wide significance and which was not related to Non-Self-Governing Territories only. Moreover, the problem was at present under consideration by other organs of the United Nations. The representative of Belgium added that his Government considered the question of race relations touching the field of political questions was a matter within its domestic jurisdiction; he would accordingly abstain from taking part in the discussion of the draft resolution as well as in the voting.

The draft resolution as a whole, with some amendments, was adopted by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in a roll-call vote of 13 to none, with 2 abstentions.

Explanations of their votes were given by the representatives of Australia, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. The representative of Australia stated that, while fully supporting the principles enunciated against racial discrimination, he had abstained from voting because: (1) he considered the resolution duplicated what was already set out in the report on social conditions; (2) the problem of racial discrimination was not confined to the Non-Self-Governing Territories; (3) the whole question was under study by other United Nations organs; and (4) it was not proper for the Committee to recommend to Member States the examination of their legislation with a view to its alteration. The representative of the Netherlands stated that, while he had voted for the resolution, he associated himself with the remarks made by the representative of Australia and regretted the adoption of the resolution as it weakened the effect of the report on social conditions. The representative of the United Kingdom had voted for the resolution but without prejudice to the position of his Government, as stated on 18 August 1950, with regard to the competence of the Committee and without prejudice to the proposal of further amendments by the United Kingdom delegation to the General Assembly.

The Fourth Committee discussed the question of racial discrimination in Non-Self-Governing Territories at its 260th to 262nd meetings, from 31 October to 3 November.

The Committee had before it the draft resolution recommended by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories

(A/2219, part I, annex II.B). The draft would have the Assembly:

(1) recommend to the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories the abolition of discriminatory laws and practices where they may still exist;

(2) recommend the examination of all laws and their application to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, with a view to abolition of any discriminatory provisions or practices;

(3) recommend examination of laws distinguishing between citizens and non-citizens primarily on racial grounds—wherever such laws exist;

(4) recommend the opening of all public facilities to all inhabitants without distinction of race;

(5) recommend examination of laws providing "particular measures of protection for sections of the population", in order to ascertain whether their protective aspect is still predominant and whether provision should be made for exemption from them in particular circumstances; and

(6) recognize that the establishment of improved race relations largely depends on the development of educational policies and commend "all measures designed to improve understanding among all pupils in all schools of the needs and problems of the community as a whole".

During the discussion of the draft resolution, the representatives of Belgium and France declared their determination to suppress and punish any racial discrimination. These representatives, however, together with those of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, said that the problem of race discrimination, like all other questions affecting human rights, should be dealt with in a world-wide context and should not be discussed piecemeal, since a partial solution might well become a biased one. The representative of the Union of South Africa, on the other hand, stated that the question of race relations, as dealt with in the draft resolution, fell within the political field and was not covered by Chapter XI, which imposed certain obligations on Administering Members. The representatives of Brazil, Egypt, Guatemala and Uruguay were among those who expressed disagreement with this interpretation.

Among representatives who announced that they would support the draft resolution, several expressed the view that it was important to put an end to practices of racial discrimination as soon as possible. Among them were the representatives of El Salvador, Guatemala, Peru and the USSR. The representative of Thailand said that the draft represented a praiseworthy attempt to solve a very delicate problem.

The Committee also had before it the following amendments:

(1) An amendment by Venezuela (A/C.4/L.216), seeking to clarify the draft resolution by substituting for its three operative paragraphs a more specific text.

(2) Two amendments by the United Kingdom: (a) An amendment (A/C.4/L.218) to have a reference in the preamble to protective measures designed to safeguard the rights "of the indigenous inhabitants" relate instead to "sections of the population." (This was later withdrawn.)

(b) An amendment (A/C.4/L.215) which would state that the aim of the proposed examination of laws should be to abolish discriminatory practices "of racial or religious character." It also sought that the recommended examination of laws distinguishing between citizens and non-citizens, primarily on racial grounds, should be extended to discrimination on "religious" grounds.

(3) An amendment by Indonesia (A/C.4/L.219) to have that part of the resolution which referred to "particular measures of protection for sections of the population" relate specifically to "indigenous" sections of the population. (This was later withdrawn.)

(4) An amendment by the United States (A/C.4/L.217) which would: (a) refer the resolution to the Commission on Human Rights; and (b) request the Commission to give it appropriate consideration. At the request of the representative of Brazil, the representative of the United States later withdrew the latter part of his amendment.

Introducing his amendment, the representative of Venezuela said that the amendment did not attempt to impose a specific line of conduct on Administering Members; only true collaboration between Administering and non-administering Powers would make it possible to attain the lofty aims of Chapter XL The problems concerning the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were not, he said, solely of a humanitarian nature; they also had political aspects and endangered international peace and security. In this view he was supported by the representative of El Salvador.

The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his amendments would enlarge rather than restrict the force of the draft resolution. This point of view was contested by a number of delegations, among them those of Brazil and India.

The United States representative recalled that his delegation had voted for the joint draft resolution in the Committee; he would however vote for several amendments which he felt improved the text. While supporting the view that the problem of racial discrimination was world wide, he nevertheless felt that the Fourth Committee must not overlook various aspects of the problem before it.

In a series of fourteen separate votes, the Committee adopted the resolution as a whole as amended. Two of the Venezuelan amendments were adopted by 45 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, and the third by 45 votes to none, with 3 abstentions. The first United Kingdom amendment was adopted by 16 votes to 12, with 16 abstentions, and the second by 41 votes to none, with 3 abstentions. The draft resolution as modified was adopted on a roll-call vote of 46 to none, with 2 abstentions.

After the adoption by 37 votes to 6, with 11 abstentions, of a United Kingdom drafting amendment (A/L.127), the General Assembly, at its 402nd plenary meeting on 10 December 1952, adopted as a whole the resolution proposed by the Fourth Committee (A/2296) by 51 votes to none, with one abstention as resolution 644 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having regard to the principles of the Charter and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights emphasizing the necessity of promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

"Having regard to the principle recognized in Chapter XI of the Charter that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are paramount,

"Recognizing that there is a fundamental distinction between discriminatory laws and practices, on the one hand, and protective measures designed to safeguard the rights of the indigenous inhabitants, on the other hand,

"1. Recommends to the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories the abolition in those Territories of discriminatory laws and practices contrary to the principles of the Charter and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

"2. Recommends that the Administering Members should examine all laws, statutes and ordinances in force in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration, as well as their application in the said Territories, with a view to the abolition of any such discriminatory provisions or practices;

"3. Recommends that, in any Non-Self-Governing Territory where laws are in existence which distinguish between citizens and non-citizens primarily on racial or religious grounds, these laws should similarly be examined;

"4. Recommends that all public facilities should be open to all inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, without distinction of race;

"5. Recommends that where laws are in existence providing particular measures of protection for sections of the population, these laws should frequently be examined in order to ascertain whether their protective aspect is still predominant, and whether provision should be made for exemption from them in particular circumstances;

"6. Recognizes that the establishment of improved race relations largely depends on the development of educational policies, and commends all measures designed to improve among all pupils in all schools understanding of the needs and problems of the community as a whole;

"7. Calls the attention of the Commission on Human Rights to the present resolution."

3. Association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the Work of the Committee on Information

By resolution 566 (VI),¹³ the General Assembly invited the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine the possibility of associating the Non-Self-Governing Territories more closely in its work and to report to the Assembly at its seventh session.

The Committee considered this question from 2 to 6 October. It had before it a memorandum by the Secretary-General (A/AC.35/L83 and Add.1 and Corr.1) analysing briefly the forms of association and provisions for such association in the constitution of certain international bodies.

The Committee also had before it a joint draft resolution by Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, India and Pakistan (A/AC.35/L.116) which would, among other things, invite the Administering Members to avail themselves of the opportunity of the participation, in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, of representatives of Non-Self-Governing Territories, where the inhabitants have attained a wide measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies. This, the joint draft stated, would contribute toward more effective co-operation regarding the study of conditions in the Territories.

The sponsors of the joint draft resolution recognized that there might be some technical difficulties in drawing up conditions of associate membership, but they felt that there could be no opposition to the principle involved since the proposals were entirely in accord with Assembly resolution 566 (VI). Participation would be of benefit both to the Committee and to the representatives of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. There would be no question of dual representation since the draft resolution invited the Administering Members themselves to nominate the representatives who would be associated with the work of the Committee. The sponsors indicated that they were not considering conferring membership in the Committee on representatives of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The idea was merely to give such representatives an opportunity to express their views. Such spokesmen would be selected by local governments as representatives of the indigenous populations.

The representative of India thought that the technical difficulties could be solved. There were strong reasons which made it desirable that the Non-Self-Governing Territories should have more direct participation which would enable them to acquire additional experience. He thought that such associate membership could be limited to four Territories at each session of the Committee, selected according to equitable geographical representation, having regard to the nature of the work the Committee planned to take up at the session concerned. He added that, as a tentative measure, all resolutions and reports adopted by the Assembly relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories might be sent to certain representative organizations in the Territories, and that the reactions of the recipients should be included in the information transmitted under Article 73e of the Charter.

The representative of the USSR stated that the joint draft resolution did not provide for adequate representation of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, since such representation would be subject to selection by the Administering Members and only from those Territories which had attained "a wide measure" of self-government. Furthermore, it was certain that no resolution inviting the Administrative Members to secure the closer association of Non-Self-Governing Territories would have any results. He, therefore, proposed an amendment, by which the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories would be authorized "to invite the participation in its work, without the right to vote, of representatives of social, cultural and educational organizations, as well as of representative organs of local self-government if such exist in Non-Self-Governing Territories."

The representative of the United States stated that the joint draft resolution raised serious implications. In general, his Government considered it desirable that a close association between dependent areas and the work of the United Nations should be maintained so that the inhabitants of these Territories might gain a wider understanding and appreciation of the principles and objectives of the Charter and of the work of the United Nations. However, it was unable to support any action which would create any form of representation in the Committee of their inhabitants distinct from that of the Members of the United Nations responsible for their administration, and he felt that there was no need for associate membership in the Committee. He felt that the most practicable way of providing for a closer association was to continue and intensify the practice followed by some Administering Members of attaching to their delegations suitably qualified persons from the Territories and proposed a draft resolution to this effect.

Opposing the joint six-Power draft resolution, the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom stated that, while they recognized that Non-Self-Governing Territories were admitted as associate members in some specialized agencies or regional economic commissions, there was nothing in common between the Committee under consideration and those bodies. Moreover, there was nothing in the Charter authorizing such participation in a Committee of the General Assembly whose members were restricted to those of the United Nations itself. These representatives, and the representative of Australia, felt that associate membership would be a form of dual representation. Their Governments could not accept a proposal which ignored the unity of authority which was an essential to democratic government.

The representative of Denmark stated that although he agreed with the principle that methods should be sought to achieve closer association, he did not agree with the methods proposed in the six-Power draft.

The representative of India proposed that the Committee should recommend to the Assembly the need for a further study of the problem.

The Committee rejected the Soviet amendment by 11 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions. The joint six-Power draft resolution was also rejected, by 8 votes to 7, with 1 abstention. The Committee further rejected the United States draft in a roll-call vote of 8 to 5, with 3 abstentions.

The Fourth Committee discussed the question at its 268th to 270th meetings, on 10 and 11 November 1952.

It had before it a joint draft resolution submitted by Burma, India, Indonesia and Pakistan (A/C.4/L.221), according to which the General Assembly would:

(1) express the hope that Administering Members would find it appropriate to extend the practice of associating suitably qualified persons from their Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee in any manner that might be deemed desirable;

(2) invite the Administering Members to transmit copies of the reports on economic, social and educational conditions of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, together with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, to the authorities of such Territories as have legislatures, and to include in the information annually furnished to the Secretary-General the views of those legislatures on such reports and resolutions; and

(3) invite the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study the further question of the direct association in its discussions on economic, social and educational conditions of representatives of Territories whose inhabitants have attained a wide measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies; and to include recommendations on this question in its report to the eighth session of the General Assembly.

The sponsors and the representatives of Israel, the Philippines and Yugoslavia recalled in support of the joint draft resolution that dual representation had been accepted by the United Kingdom in the League of Nations when India had been separately represented. They expressed the view that it was not the intention of those who framed the Charter to prevent the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories from being associated with the United Nations. Moreover, there was a greater need now for equality and fraternity. The draft resolution respected the right of the Administering Members to select such representatives of Territories to be associated with the work of the Committee. The association of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the United Nations would not only contribute to the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories; it would also help the representatives of these Territories to acquire, in addition to knowledge and experience, confidence in their capacity to assume complete responsibility ultimately for their own affairs.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, India and the USSR stated that the Assembly was entitled to know the reactions and opinions of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories to its resolutions and recommendations.

These representatives, and those of Brazil, Egypt, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, the United States, Uruguay and Yugoslavia, expressed the view also that the indigenous inhabitants should participate in the formulation and administration of any development plans in the Territories themselves.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom, on the other hand, maintained that the sole responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories lay with the Administering Powers concerned and that any attempt to establish direct relations between the United Nations and the local legislatures would amount to a usurpation of one of the prerogatives of the Administering Members. They did not see how the adoption of the joint draft resolution would assist in the achievement of the goals of Chapter XI of the Charter. Some of these representatives, including those of Australia, France, the United Kingdom and the United States, said that they were quite prepared to include in their delegations representatives from the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representatives of Australia, France and the United Kingdom insisted, however, that the right to choose such persons was entirely that of the Administering Power concerned.

The representatives of Brazil, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Israel, Peru and Venezuela stated that although they favoured the principle of the participation of indigenous inhabitants, they recognized that such participation could be achieved only with the co-operation of the Administering Powers, and that certain realities had to be faced.

The representatives of Argentina, Bolivia, Egypt, El Salvador, Guatemala, Iraq, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Syria presented a joint amendment (A/C.4/L.230/Rev.1) to the four-Power draft. Some of the sponsors of this amendment, including the representatives of Guatemala, Iraq, Lebanon and Syria, emphasized that they were in full accord with the principle of participation and were seeking a practical solution to the problem. The nine-Power amendment would have the Assembly invite the Administering Members to make participation possible. This amendment was presented as a substitute paragraph for that part of the four-Power draft which would express the hope that Administering Members would find it appropriate to extend the practice of associating suitably qualified persons from their Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The sponsors of the four-Power draft did not accept this amendment, but they accepted an oral drafting amendment by Denmark and a Brazilian amendment (A/C.4/L.227) which would refer to "direct participation" in the work of the Committee instead of to "the closer association" of the indigenous inhabitants, and would further state that the proposed study of direct association should be concerned with direct "participation."

The USSR also presented an amendment (A/C.4/L.224) to provide a substitute text for the same paragraph. In terms of the Soviet amendment, the Assembly would declare that it considered it "essential" that Administering Members should extend the practice of associating suitably qualified persons from their Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee.

The United States proposed (A/C.4/L.288) a number of drafting changes as well as the deletion of a paragraph of the four-Power draft, which would have invited the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study the further question of the direct participation of the indigenous inhabitants in its discussions on economic, social and educational policies and to include recommendations on this question in its report to the eighth session of the General Assembly.

At its 270th meeting on 11 November, the Committee, in a series of 13 separate votes, took action on the joint four-Power draft and the amendments.

Paragraphs of the preamble, as modified by the accepted amendments of Brazil and Denmark, were adopted by votes varying from 40 to 8, with 3 abstentions, to 49 to none, with 3 abstentions.

The USSR amendment was rejected by 23 votes to 7, with 22 abstentions.

The nine-Power amendment was adopted by a roll-call vote of 31 to 14, with 9 abstentions.

The two drafting changes proposed by the United States were adopted in separate votes, of 32 to 10, with 11 abstentions, and 40 to 1, with 11 abstentions. The Committee, however, in a roll-call vote of 22 to 17, with 15 abstentions, rejected that part of the United States amendment which would delete a request to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study the further question of direct participation.

The joint draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 40 to 10, with 4 abstentions.

The draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2296, draft resolution V) was adopted by 43 votes to 11, with 4 abstentions, by the General Assembly at its 402nd plenary meeting on 10 December 1952 as resolution 647(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling that, in resolution 566 (VI) adopted on 18 January 1952, the General Assembly invited the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine the possibility of associating the Non-Self-Governing Territories more closely in its work and to report the results of its examination of this problem to the General Assembly at its seventh session in connexion with the Assembly's consideration of the Committee's future,

"Recalling that it has been found both possible and useful to associate Non-Self-Governing Territories with the work of technical organs of the United Nations, including the specialized agencies,

"Recognizing that direct participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories can be of further assistance in promoting the progress of these Territories and their peoples towards the goals set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations,

"Noting that the Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories have from time to time attached qualified persons from these Territories to their delegations to the Committee,

"1. Considers it desirable that there be associated in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories qualified indigenous representatives from Non-Self-Governing Territories, and invites the Administering Members to make such participation possible;

"2. Invites the Administering Members to transmit copies of the reports on economic, social and educational conditions of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, together with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, to the executive and legislative branches of these Territories;

"3- Invites the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study further the question of the direct participation, in its discussions on economic, social and educational conditions, of representatives of those Territories the inhabitants of which have attained a wide measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies, and to include recommendations on this question in its report to the General Assembly at its eighth session."

4. Future of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories

Assembly resolution 332 (IV), which constituted the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, provided that "the General Assembly will . . . examine in 1952 the question whether the Special Committee should be renewed."

The Committee, on 2 and 3 October, discussed the question of the future of the Committee. In general, four views were expressed; the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom were not in favour of the renewal of the Committee in its present form. The representatives of Brazil, Ecuador, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Pakistan and the USSR supported the principle of establishing the Committee on a permanent basis. The representative of the United States, supported by Denmark, Australia and the Netherlands, proposed the continuation of the Committee for a further three-year period, while the representative of Cuba, supported by the representative of Ecuador, felt that should the Committee not be established on a permanent basis, it should be continued for a four-year term.

The representative of Belgium felt that the Committee's work was useless and sterile. The fact that the Committee had not been given the right to make comparisons with conditions in independent countries faced with similar problems was seriously jeopardizing the value of its conclusions. Discussions should take place in some other body to which experts from Member States with common problems should be convened, he said.

The representative of the United Kingdom referred to the lack of constitutional provision in the Charter for the creation of the present Committee, particularly as the information transmitted under Article 73e was supplied for information purposes. He stated that the legal responsibilities of the United Nations were discharged when the Secretary-General had received the statistical and other technical information submitted by the Administering Members. Although the United Kingdom had in the past year collaborated in the technical discussion in the Committee, he did not consider that these discussions had brought results which, even if the constitutional objections were set aside, justified the renewal of the Committee.

The representative of France pointed out that his Government had participated in the Committee to the best of its ability in a spirit of goodwill and faith in international co-operation. The Committee, however, was getting away from reality.

In support of the view that the Committee should be established on a permanent basis, the representatives of the non-Administering Members stressed the obligations and moral accountability of the Administering Members. The Committee not only served a useful purpose but had made some valuable contributions. As long as Non-Self-Governing Territories existed and the Charter of the United Nations and the resolutions of the General Assembly remained in force, some machinery was needed to assist the General Assembly in discharging its responsibilities towards the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was, accordingly, impossible to do away with the Committee without grave and adverse psychological repercussions. The Committee had a responsibility towards the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories which no specialized agency or any other organ of the United Nations could fulfil.

The representative of the USSR concluded that since the Administering Members had accepted obligations toward the Non-Self-Governing Territories the General Assembly had to ascertain to what extent these obligations had been fulfilled. Conditions remained unsatisfactory in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The obligations of the Administering Members to transmit information was of a permanent character and the Committee whose function it was to examine such information should therefore be established on a permanent basis.

The representative of the United States agreed that the Committee had made some useful contributions in its work, and, taking into consideration that wide differences existed as to whether or not the Committee should be renewed, submitted a draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.114) advocating that the Committee should be continued on the same basis for a further period of three years. In this view he was supported by the representatives of Australia, Denmark and the Netherlands. The representative of the Netherlands, however, preferred the creation of a committee of experts.

The USSR submitted a draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.115) recommending the establishment of the Committee on a permanent basis, but this was rejected by 8 votes to 7, with 1 abstention.

Egypt proposed an amendment to the United States draft, to extend the term of the Committee for a period of four years instead of three years. With 8 votes in favour and 8 against, the amendment was not adopted.

The Committee, by 13 votes to 3, adopted the United States draft.

In terms of the resolution recommended by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories the Assembly would not only decide to continue the Committee for a further three-year period "on the same basis", but would also instruct the Fourth Committee, acting on its behalf, to fill such vacancies as might occur among the non-Administering Members of the Committee.

From its 264th to 267th meetings, from 5 to 11 November, the Fourth Committee considered the question of the Committee's renewal and the draft resolution recommended by the Committee on Information (A/2219, part I, annex II.C).

Twenty-one delegations presented an amendment (A/C.4/212) to the draft resolution recommended by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Sponsors of this draft were: Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Uruguay, Yemen and Yugoslavia. This would amend the draft recommending renewal for a further three-year period by having the Assembly decide to continue the Committee on the same basis "for as long as there exist Territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government."

During the debate on the question of renewal a majority of delegations expressed themselves generally in favour of the continuance of the Committee. Among representatives who expressed this view were those of Brazil, Canada, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Israel, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, the USSR, the United States, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yemen.

The representatives of Bolivia, Burma, China, Cuba, El Salvador, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Uruguay, among others, expressed the view that the Committee should be renewed on a permanent basis.

The representative of the Netherlands, however, expressed reservations concerning the constitution and terms of reference of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, while others, among them those of Poland and the USSR, felt that, although the reports of the Committee were unsatisfactory from their point of view, it was nevertheless important that the function performed by the Committee should continue.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, on the other hand, doubted the usefulness of the service performed by the Committee. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom emphasized that the Charter did not provide for any accountability or supervision by the United Nations in connexion with Non-Self-Governing Territories as in the case of Trust Territories. They felt that the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on a permanent basis implied the existence of such an obligation on the part of Administering Powers.

The representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom stated that if the Fourth Committee should decide to renew the Committee permanently, they reserved the rights of their Governments on whether or not, in such circumstances, they would continue to serve on the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Although they had felt no compulsion to do so, they had agreed, in a spirit of co-operation, to serve on the Committee originally and to contribute experience gained in the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, in the hope that that experience would prove useful to the United Nations and to Member States. Their participation had been conditional and subject to the limited period envisaged when the Committee was first established.

The assertion that no obligation on the part of Administering Members existed in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories was contested by a number of delegations, among them those of Haiti, Poland, Syria, the USSR and Yemen.

The representative of Poland said that the negative attitude of the Administering Powers towards the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories was inspired by their determination to limit the functions of the United Nations in relation to Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representative of the USSR said that Chapter XI of the Charter imposed special obligations which would continue to exist so long as there remained Non-Self-Governing Territories.

A number of representatives, including those of Brazil, China, Cuba, Egypt, Greece, India, Israel, Liberia, Peru, the United States and Venezuela, said that although it was desirable that the Committee should continue on a permanent basis, it appeared from the discussion that a permanent Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories might have to continue without the services of some of the Administering Powers. Such a condition might seriously impair the value of the Committee's work and the co-operation of the Administering Powers, thus endangering its existence. In view of this, they felt that a compromise was necessary.

The United States and Venezuela proposed an amendment (A/C.4/L.223) to the 21-Power amendment. By this amendment the Committee would be renewed for a further three-year period and thereafter would be continued automatically for three-year periods, unless otherwise decided by the General Assembly. This provision would replace the qualification "for as long as there exist Territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government" appearing in the 21-Power draft. Sponsors of both amendments met privately in an attempt to reach a compromise, but no agreement was reached. The United States and Venezuela then presented a revised amendment (A/C.4/L.223/Rev.1) which would add their provisions to those of the 21-Power draft, without eliminating any part of the latter.

The representative of Liberia proposed (A/C.4/L.225) the addition of a clause indicating that the proposed continuation should be subject to the Assembly's considering it necessary, but later withdrew this amendment. Its purpose had been, it was stated, to establish that any question of terminating the Committee or altering its basis would not come before the Assembly unless such a question were specifically proposed as an item for inclusion in the agenda.

At its 267th meeting on 11 November, the Fourth Committee voted on the United States and Venezuelan revised joint amendment. It adopted the phrase "unless otherwise decided by the General Assembly," by a roll-call vote of 22 to 20, with 12 abstentions. It rejected, by a roll-call vote of 23 to 22, with 9 abstentions, the phrase "for additional three-year periods." Also by roll-call vote, it adopted the joint amendment, as amended, by 23 votes to 16, with 15 abstentions. The Committee then adopted, by a roll-call vote of 40 to 12, with 2 abstentions, the 21-Power amendment (A/C.4/212) as amended.

The draft resolution as a whole, as modified, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 40 to 12, with 2 abstentions.

By this action, the Fourth Committee decided to recommend to the Assembly the continuation of the Committee on the same basis for a further three-year period and at the end of that period, unless otherwise decided by the General Assembly, to continue it automatically thereafter for as long as there exist territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

When the draft resolution (A/2296, draft resolution IV) came before the 402nd plenary meeting of the General Assembly on 10 December 1952, the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom announced that they would not participate in its work if the Committee were continued on a permanent basis. They held that there was no provision in the Charter for a systematic examination by a special body of the information transmitted under Article 73e. These representatives said that their Governments were prepared to participate, in a spirit of co-operation, as long as the Committee existed on a temporary basis, but that they could not accept the implication that Administering Members were accountable to the United Nations for the administration of their Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The representatives of Canada and the Dominican Republic said that, in view of the newly expressed interpretations of the draft resolution with regard to the obligation to transmit information, renewal of the Committee on a fixed-term basis would be desirable.

The representative of Denmark proposed that the Assembly vote separately on the combined proposal to continue the Committee: (1) on the same basis for a further three-year period; and (2) at the end of that period, to continue the Committee automatically. He stated that if the addition were rejected, this would ensure the co-operation of all Member States.

Though stating that they did not necessarily agree with the motives of the Administering Powers which had declared that they would not participate if the Committee were to be renewed on a permanent basis, the representatives of Brazil, Ecuador, India, Iraq, Uruguay and Venezuela, among others, considered that it was important that the Committee should continue to function, and because of this, they said, they would not insist on the permanent re-establishment of the Committee, if this would prejudice the future work of the Committee.

The representative of India proposed orally that, should the Assembly reject that part of the draft providing for the automatic continuation of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories after a further three-year period, a provision should be added which would ensure that the Assembly consider, at its regular session in 1955, the question of renewal.

The Assembly first adopted, by 52 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions, that part of the draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2296) which would decide to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories "on the same basis for a further three-year period."

It then voted, by roll call, on the remaining part of the paragraph which read: "and at the end of that period, unless otherwise decided by the General Assembly, to continue the Committee automatically thereafter for as long as there exist Territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government."

Eleven votes were cast in favour, 18 against, with 30 abstentions, and that part of the paragraph was accordingly rejected. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Indonesia, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Iceland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Peru, Sweden, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece, India, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Paraguay, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen.

The Indian oral amendment, which would have the General Assembly examine the question of renewal of the Committee on Information at its regular session in 1955, was then adopted by 43 votes to 3, with 11 abstentions.

The resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted at the Assembly's 402nd plenary meeting on 10 December 1952 by 53 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions as resolution 646(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having established, by resolution 332 (IV) adopted on 2 December 1949, a Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Recognizing the value of the work performed by this Committee,

"Recalling its decision set out in resolution 332 (IV) to "examine in 1952 the question whether the Special Committee should be renewed for a further period, together with the questions of the composition and terms of reference of any such future Special Committee",

"Having re-examined the terms of reference of the Committee and the provisions for its composition as set forth in resolution 332 (IV), and the provisions relating to the work of the Committee set out in resolution 333 (IV),

"1. Decides to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis for a further three-year period;

2. Instructs the Fourth Committee, acting on behalf of the General Assembly, to fill such vacancies as may occur among the non-administering Members of the Committee;

"3. Decides that, at its regular session in 1955, the General Assembly will examine the question whether the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories should be renewed for a further period, together with the questions of the composition and terms of reference of any such future committee."

On 15 December the Fourth Committee, on behalf of the General Assembly, elected Brazil, China, India and Iraq to fill four vacancies on the 16-member Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, their terms of office to begin in 1953.

B. THE QUESTION OF SOUTH WEST AFRICA

In resolutions 65(I), 141 (II), 227(III), 337(IV) and 449(V),¹⁴ the General Assembly expressed its opinion that South West Africa should be placed under the International Trusteeship System and that a Trusteeship Agreement should be submitted in respect of the Territory.

In resolution 570(VI),¹⁵ adopted on 19 January 1952, the Assembly reiterated its recommendations and recalled that it had accepted the advisory opinion of 11 July 1950 of the International Court of Justice, which stated, inter alia, that:

(1) the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter are applicable to the Territory of South West Africa in the sense that they provide a means by which the Territory may be brought under the Trusteeship System; (2) these provisions do not impose on the Union of South Africa a legal obligation to place the Territory under the Trusteeship System; and (3) the Union of South Africa, acting alone, has not the competence to modify the international status of the Territory and that such competence rests with the Union acting with the consent of the United Nations.

By the same resolution, the Assembly reconstituted the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa to "confer with the Government of the Union of South Africa concerning means of implementing the advisory opinion of the Court." The Committee, consisting of the representatives of Norway, Syria, Thailand, the United States and Uruguay, was further authorized "as an interim measure, and pending the completion of the negotiations with the Government of the Union of South Africa, and as far as possible in accordance with the procedure of the former Mandates System, to examine reports on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa as well as petitions and any other matters relating to the Territory that may be submitted to the Secretary-General."

1. Consideration by the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa

Following the adoption of resolution 570(VI), the Ad Hoc Committee held 16 meetings, from 26 March to 18 November 1952. It decided after three meetings that its task would be facilitated if meetings were held in private. In addition, it held three informal meetings on 27 May, 2 June and 13 October. The representative of the Union of South Africa met with the Committee on 10 and 18 September, 1 and 29 October and 6 November. On 18 November, the Committee adopted its report to the General Assembly and decided to release the report on 25 November.

In its report (A/2261) to the General Assembly, the Committee summarized the exchange of opinions between the Committee and the representative of the Union of South Africa.

On 10 and 18 September the representative of South Africa re-submitted, as a basis for further consideration in view of the wider terms of reference of the Ad Hoc Committee, a proposal made by his Government in 1951, namely, that a new instrument in respect of the Territory should be concluded, under the terms of the former League of Nations Mandate, with the three remaining principal Powers—France, the United Kingdom and the United States—as the other party to the instrument. He reaffirmed that his Government, despite the opinion of the International Court of Justice, still maintained that the Mandate had lapsed with the demise of the League of Nations, but added that if negotiations should proceed satisfactorily, his Government would make available information on its administration of South West Africa to the second party to the new instrument.

The Union representative stated that the three Powers would act as principals and not as agents; that his Government did not intend to by-pass the United Nations, which would have to approve the general principles of the instrument before it could come into force.

The Committee, on 1 October, informed the South African representative that it could not accept any proposal which did not give adequate effect to the principle of international accountability by the Union Government for its administration of South West Africa.

To certain specific questions put by the Committee, the representative of South Africa stated that it was the intention of his Government to supply annually information concerning the Territory and that it further contemplated giving accountability to the three Powers concerned. Further details of the international supervision could be discussed after a decision had been reached on a new instrument and on whether the three Powers were acceptable to the Committee as the second party to the new instrument.

On 29 October the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee informed the Union representative orally of the Committee's views on the South African proposal. The Committee repeated its contention that it could not accept any proposal which did not recognize the principle of supervision by the United Nations, as envisaged in the advisory opinion of the International Court and it was unable to reconcile the South African proposal with this principle. It stated further that negotiations for an agreement could only be undertaken by the United Nations through an agency responsible to that Organization.

On 6 November the representative of South Africa contended that the Committee had given an incorrect interpretation of the Court's opinion and asked, in view of this, whether the Committee could not now accept the proposal. The Chairman reaffirmed the Committee's interpretation.

On 18 November negotiations were suspended. The Committee reported that negotiations had proved inconclusive, adding that agreement in principle had been reached on the following points:

(1) That a new instrument, replacing the former Mandate for South West Africa, should be concluded;

(2) That the new instrument should revive the "sacred trust" contained in articles 2 to 5 of the Mandate, with minor modifications necessitated by the changed circumstances but which would not affect in any way the principle of the "sacred trust";

(3) That, under certain conditions, the Government of the Union of South Africa would make available information on its administration of South West Africa;

(4) That such information would be as full as that once supplied by the Government of the Union of South Africa under the Mandates System; and

(5) That there should be some form of supervision, on the administration of South West Africa, by the Union of South Africa.

The points of difference between the Committee and the representative of the Union of South Africa were the following:

(1) There was fundamental disagreement on how supervision of the administration of South West Africa by the Government of the Union of South Africa should be carried out. The Committee was of the opinion that such supervision, even though it should not exceed that which applied under the Mandates System, should be exercised by the United Nations. It considered that the form of judicial supervision by the International Court, which the Government of the Union of South Africa was prepared to accept, failed to meet the requirements laid down in the opinion of the Court which had been accepted by the Assembly. On the other hand, the representative of the Union Government was of the opinion that, from a practical point of view, supervision exercised by the United Nations would be for the Union of South Africa more onerous than that existing under the Mandates System. Before submitting its proposal, the Government of the Union of South Africa had examined the question of supervision in all its aspects, and had come to the conclusion that any obligation it would assume, which would carry with it supervision by the United Nations, would go beyond the obligations undertaken under the Mandates System. This point of difference remained unresolved.

(2) The Committee and the representative of the Government of the Union of South Africa did not agree on who the second party to the agreement should be. The Union representative stated unequivocally that his Government did not contemplate concluding an agreement on South West Africa directly with the United Nations, although the agreement which it was prepared to negotiate and conclude with France, the United Kingdom and the United States would have to be approved by the United Nations. Moreover, the Union of South Africa would be responsible only to the second party to the agreement and would supply information concerning South West Africa only to that party. The Committee considered that the agreement should be concluded either with the United Nations or with an agency appointed by and responsible to the United Nations.

The Committee regretted that agreement had not yet been reached on these points of difference, and held itself ready to make further efforts during the current session should the General Assembly request it to do so.

The representative of Uruguay stated that, since he could not endorse some of the points mentioned in the report, he reserved his Government's right to refer to these discrepancies before the Assembly.

The Committee also reported that with regard to the authorization given to it by the Assembly to examine reports on the administration of South West Africa the Committee was unable to comply with the Assembly's instructions because no such report was submitted by the Government of the Union of South Africa. With regard to the authorization given by the Assembly to examine petitions and any other matters relating to the Territory that might be transmitted to the Secretary-General, however, the Committee recalled that, in 1951, it had received and examined ten communications relating to South West Africa.¹⁶

In 1952, the Committee received and examined six communications relating to South West Africa from outside the Territory. The communications¹⁷ were:

A communication dated 6 March 1952 from the Reverend Michael Scott to the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee, together with a petition from the Convention People's Party of the Gold Coast;

A communication dated 17 September 1952 from the Reverend Michael Scott to the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee, together with a memorandum on the subject of South West Africa;

¹⁶ See Y.U.N., 1951, p. 632.

¹⁷ For texts, see K/2261.

A communication dated 20 October 1952 from the Reverend Michael Scott to the Secretary-General, together with a memorandum on the subject of South West Africa;

A communication dated 23 October 1952 from Lord Hemingford, Chairman of the Africa Bureau, London, to the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee, together with a report published by the South African Institute of Race Relations on the welfare of the indigenous inhabitants of South West Africa;

Communications dated 26 and 29 October 1952 from the Reverend Michael Scott to the Chairman of the Fourth Committee on the subject of legislation enacted in South Africa in connexion with its policy of apartheid, together with a statement by the Dutch Reformed Federated and Mission Churches of South Africa in connexion with the Native question; and

A communication dated 5 November 1952 from the Reverend Michael Scott to the Chairman of the Committee, together with seven documents relating to South West Africa and the South African policy of apartheid.

In the case of each of these communications, the Committee decided:

(a) To accept the communications, as far as they relate to the Territory of South West Africa as petitions;

(b) In accordance with the procedure of the former Mandates System, to transmit the petitions to the Government of the Union of South Africa for comment; and

(c) To include the petitions in the report to the General Assembly.

In 1952, the Committee received and examined three communications relating to South West Africa from the Territory itself. They were:

Two communications, dated 7 February and 7 March 1952, from Chief Hosea Kutako addressed to the Secretary-General;

A communication, undated, from Messrs. Beukes, Diegaard and van Wyk, addressed to the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee.

On 25 April 1952 the Committee decided to acknowledge receipt of these three communications meanwhile, and on 7 November it considered what action should be taken. The Committee realized on the one hand that, in accordance with the procedure of the Permanent Mandates Commission, petitions sent through any channel other than the Mandatory Government were returned to the signatories with the request that they should re-submit them in accordance with established procedure. On the other hand, the Committee, being aware of the attitude of the Government of the Union of South Africa, expressed in the letters dated 8 and 25 April 1952, decided to transmit these communications to the Assembly and also to the Government of the Union of South Africa. By a letter dated 19 November 1952 the Committee transmitted the three communications to the Union Government.

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

At the 304th meeting of the Fourth Committee on 12 December, during a discussion on the question of how the Committee might most effectively deal with the items remaining on its agenda for the current session, the representative of the Union of South Africa said that although his delegation was prepared to discuss the question of South West Africa at any time convenient to the Committee, it would, however, be preferable not to begin the discussion a few meetings before the adjournment and then postpone further discussion until the following year. He was supported in this view by the representatives of Belgium and Brazil.

At its 308th meeting on 16 December, the Committee began discussion of the question. The Chairman said that he understood that the Committee wished to confine its consideration to the question of procedure and not to embark on a debate on the substance of the matter.

The Committee had before it the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa (A/2261). It also had before it a joint draft resolution by Brazil, El Salvador and the United States (A/C.4/L.257), according to which the Committee would decide to postpone consideration of the question until the eighth regular session of the Assembly; request the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa, established by General Assembly resolution 570 A (VI), to continue on the same basis as stated in that resolution; and further request the Committee to report to the General Assembly at its eighth regular session.

Presenting the three-Power draft, the representative of Brazil stated that it was considered that more time was required for the examination and settlement of the question. Moreover, the report of the Ad Hoc Committee did not advance proposals sufficiently precise and concrete for a brief consideration of the question to be of any real value. He felt that immediate discussion of the question might even jeopardize the success of the negotiations.

The representative of Thailand, Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee, stated that the wisdom of the three-Power proposal was all the more apparent since the head of the South African delegation had stated in a letter addressed to the United Nations that if the Fourth Committee saw fit to extend the mandate of the Ad Hoc Committee, his Government would undertake to collaborate with the Committee with a view to reaching an agreement on the matter. The representative of the Union of South Africa confirmed that his Government thought that consideration of the questions in dispute should be continued.

The representatives of the Dominican Republic and Guatemala expressed the view that the resolution contained a practical proposal.

The representative of the USSR, on the other hand, recalled that the United Nations had been concerned with the question of South West Africa for seven years. To postpone consideration for yet another year would further prejudice the International Trusteeship System, whose principles the Union of South Africa had disregarded in this matter, and weaken the relevant provisions of the Charter.

Yugoslavia submitted an oral amendment to the three-Power draft, which would advance consideration to the second part of the seventh session of the General Assembly, but this was rejected by 22 votes to 12, with 4 abstentions.

During the debate, the Committee was informed by the Chairman that three letters from the Reverend Michael Scott addressed to him, one of which was dated 7 December and two dated 15 December, would be referred for consideration to the Ad Hoc Committee, if this Committee were renewed. In the first of those letters, Mr. Scott set forth his interest in the question of South West Africa and offered to make an oral submission, if the Fourth Committee so wished, when it came to discuss the item.

The Fourth Committee adopted the three-Power proposal for postponement and the continuation of the Ad Hoc Committee by a roll-call vote of 27 to 8, with 5 abstentions, and this resolution (A/2336) was adopted, without discussion, by the General Assembly at its 409th, plenary meeting on 20 December 1952, by 45 votes to 2, with 8 abstentions (resolution 651 (VII)). It read:

"The General Assembly

"Decides to postpone consideration of the question of South West Africa until the eighth session of the General Assembly, and requests the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa, established by General Assembly resolution 570 A (VI) of 19 January 1952, to continue on the same basis as stated in that resolution and further requests the Committee to report to the General Assembly at its eighth session."

C. CONDITIONS IN TRUST TERRITORIES IN THE PACIFIC

During its tenth session, held from 27 February to 1 April 1952, the Trusteeship Council examined annual reports submitted by the Administering Authorities on the administration of each of the four Trust Territories in the Pacific: Nauru, New Guinea, Western Samoa and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.¹⁸ These reports covered the administration of these Territories during the year 1950-51, except in the case of the report on Western Samoa, which covered the last nine months of 1950. Observations (T/962) of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) on these reports were considered by the Council in connexion with its examination of educational conditions in each of the four Territories.

Only one petition—from New Guinea—relating to Trust Territories in the Pacific area was examined by the Council during 1952.

Arrangements for a second Visiting Mission to Trust Territories in the Pacific in 1953 were made by the Council during the second part of its eleventh session, held from 19 November to 3 December 1952. At its 456th meeting on 19 November, the Council decided that one Mission, composed of representatives of the Dominican Republic, France, Syria and the United Kingdom, should visit all four of the Territories. The Mission should leave Headquarters about the middle of February 1953, the Council decided, and return about the middle of May. Approving the nominations of the above Governments, the Council on 20, 24 and 25 November appointed Enrique de Marchena (Dominican Republic) as Chairman of the Mission and Leon Pignon (France), Najmuddin Rifai (Syria) and W.A.C. Mathieson (United Kingdom) as members of the Mission.

By resolution 642 (XI), adopted on 24 November 1952 by 10 votes to none, with one abstention, the Council directed the Mission:

(1) to investigate and to report as fully as possible on the steps taken in the Territories towards the realization of the objectives set forth in Article 76 b of the Charter;¹⁹ (2) to give attention, as might be appropriate in the light of Council and General Assembly resolutions, to issues raised in connexion with the annual reports, petitions and the first periodic Visiting Mission's reports relating to these Territories and the observations of the Administering Authorities on that Mission's reports; (3) to accept petitions and to investigate on the spot, in consultation with local representatives of the Administering Authority concerned, such of these petitions as, in its opinion, warranted special investigation; (4) to examine, in consultation with the Administering Authorities, the measures taken and to be taken with respect to the provision of information about the United Nations to the peoples of the Trust Territories under the Trusteeship Council's resolution 36(III) of 8 July 1948²⁰ and to investigate on the spot the best means of disseminating such information as requested in its resolution 311 (VIII) of 7 February 1951.²¹ Finally, the Council requested the Mission to report by 10 June 1953 on its findings, with such observations, conclusions and recommendations as it might wish to make.

1. Nauru, Administered by Australia on Behalf of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom

Nauru is an isolated island with a total area of 5,263 acres, 4,116 of which contain the phosphate deposits which give the island its importance. As of 30 June 1951, according to the Administering Authority's annual report,²² Nauru had a population of 3,434, of whom 1,618 were Nauruans, 1,411 Chinese, 274 Europeans and 131 Gilbertese.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

An Administrator, under the authority of the Government of Australia, has full powers of legislation, administration and jurisdiction. He is assisted by an administrative staff, which on 30 June 1951 consisted of 302 employees: fourteen Europeans, 250 Nauruans, eight Gilbertese and 30 Chinese. The training of Nauruans for higher administrative positions has in the past been recommended by the Trusteeship Council, and the Administering Authority stated in its report that courses of students receiving education outside Nauru were selected with this in view.

The Administering Authority reported that its plan, welcomed by the Trusteeship Council in 1951, to reconstitute the Council of Chiefs into a nine-member body with increased powers had been put into effect under an Ordinance enacted by the Administrator on 20 August 1951. The new Council, the Nauru Local Government Council, retains the power to advise the Administrator on any matter affecting Nauruans. In addition, it was granted the power, subject to existing laws and to the approval of the Administrator: to make rules for regulating the conduct of its business and for the peace, order and welfare of the Nauruans; to organize, finance or engage in any business or enterprise; to carry out works for the benefit of the Nauruans; to provide public or social services; and to charge for its services. The Ordinance provides that members of the Council be elected by universal adult suffrage and secret ballot for a term of not more than four years rather than for life as before. During its tenth session, the Trusteeship Council was informed that the first election was held on 15 December 1951. A Nauru Local Government Council Fund was also established by the Ordinance. Expenditures from this Fund, if not otherwise covered by money received by the Council, are to be met by transfers from the Nauru Royalty Trust Fund.

The Trusteeship Council commended the Administering Authority on the reconstitution of the Council of Chiefs. It also expressed the hope that full information on the new Council's operations would be included in the next annual report.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The economy of Nauru is almost entirely dependent on the phosphate industry. On 30 June 1951, according to the Administering Authority's report, the industry employed 111 Europeans, 1,381 Chinese and 105 Nauruans. The industry is controlled by three Phosphate Commissioners appointed by Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom.

As of 30 June 1951, the British Phosphate Commissioners held under lease 1,169 acres of phosphate-bearing land and 186 acres of non-phosphate land; corresponding figures the year before were 1,125 and 154, respectively. Except for small areas owned by the Administration and missions, all the land is owned by Nauruans. To lease phosphate-bearing land, the Phosphate Commissioners must pay the landowners a lump sum of £45²³ an acre, in addition to royalties, and for other land, which may be leased with the approval of the Administrator, they pay an annual rent of £3 an acre. Of the island's total acreage of phosphate-bearing land, 602 acres are unworkable. Of the 3,514 acres of workable land, 582 acres had been worked or partly worked by 30 June 1951, as compared with 545 acres a year earlier. In the past, the Trusteeship Council has recommended studies to determine whether the island would remain habitable after the phosphate deposits are exhausted and to determine the possibility, among other things, of making use of worked-out phosphate land. In its report for 1950-51, the Administering Authority stated that it was still studying the question of the future of the Nauruans after the phosphate deposits are exhausted. It added, however, that investigations up to that time on making use of worked-out phosphate land indicated that this would not be practicable generally.

At its tenth session, the Trusteeship Council again expressed concern over the eventual exhaustion of phosphate deposits and maintained its earlier recommendation that the Administering Authority continue to investigate all possible alternative means of livelihood for the inhabitants, so as to secure a sound economic basis for their future.

The Administering Authority reported that 950,744 tons of phosphates, valued at £1,378,579, were exported during 1950-51, as against 1,009,266 tons, valued at £1,589,594, the year before. These exports, as in the past, went entirely to Australia or New Zealand. The report for 1950-51, like the previous one, contained the latest accounts of the British Phosphate Commissioners for Nauru and Ocean Island presented jointly rather than, as requested by the Trusteeship Council, information which would show the separate financial operations of the Commissioners with respect to Nauru and the actual prices received for phosphate as compared with world market prices.

Increases in phosphate royalties, as notified to the Trusteeship Council during its eighth session in 1951,²⁴ were put into effect on 1 July 1950, according to the Administering Authority's annual report. Accordingly, during 1950-51, the Phosphate Commissioners were required to pay royalties totalling 3s.7d. on each ton of phosphate exported: 2s.3d. to or on account of the Administration (Is. to meet ordinary expenses of the Administration; 9d. to repay a rehabilitation advance made by the Commissioners; and 6d. to repay their advance for Nauruan housing) and 1s.4d. to or on account of the Nauruans (6d. to the owner of the land; 2d. to a long-term trust fund for the benefit of landowners; 3d. to the Nauru Royalty Trust Fund created exclusively for the benefit of the Nauruans; and 5d. to the Nauruan Community Long-Term Investment Fund). In addition, for 1950-51, the Phosphate Commissioners increased from £12,000 to £24,000 the amount they paid each year in commutation of payments due with respect to customs duties and other charges of the Administration. This sum, together with royalties, brought the amount payable to or on behalf of the Administration and the Nauruans to £194,342 in 1950-51, as compared with £142,364 in 1949-50. Actual royalty payments to Nauruans or to the various Nauruan trust funds amounted to £55,268 in 1950-51, as compared with £44,045 the preceding year. The balance in the Landowners' Royalty Trust Fund increased by £11,924 to £124,005, and in the more recently established Nauruan Community Long-Term Investment Fund by £18,316 to £32,506. During the same period, the number of Nauruan depositors in the Savings Bank increased by 42 and the amount of net deposits by Nauruans by £874, as compared with increases of 91 and £6,949, respectively, the year before.

The Trusteeship Council had asked the Administering Authority in 1951 to consider further increasing those royalties payable for the benefit of the inhabitants. It was informed during its tenth session that the royalty rate was not determined by the price of the phosphate exported but by the financial requirements for the present and future needs of the Nauruan population. The Administering Authority also pointed out, in its report, that in 1920, when it purchased the deposits from the Pacific Phosphate Co., Ltd., the royalty payable to Nauruan landowners was one halfpenny per ton of phosphate exported, whereas the total royalties payable to or on behalf of Nauruans as of 30 June 1951 amounted to 1s.4d. per ton.

Territorial revenue during 1950-51, the Administering Authority reported, totalled £145,019, of which £137,138 was paid directly by the Phosphate Commissioners (£53,138 royalty, £24,000 commuted payment, £60,000 rehabilitation advance). Territorial expenditure amounted to £130,491, of which £23,160 was spent directly for the benefit of Nauruans. In addition, £8,048 was spent from the Nauru Royalty Trust Fund, principally for Nauruan education.

The Trusteeship Council had asked the Administering Authority in 1949 to study the question of replacing the capitation tax by an income tax. It was informed during its tenth session that an Ordinance had been passed to abolish the capitation tax, but that no substitute was being proposed. The Council expressed its satisfaction with the abolition of the capitation tax.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Most Nauruan men work for money wages either for the Administration or the Phosphate Commissioners. All the Chinese, who form a community almost the size of the indigenous population, are employed by the Phosphate Commissioners as tradesmen or unskilled workers and, to a small extent, by the Administration. Immigrant communities are permitted to settle only in areas specially prepared for them. Chinese labourers are hired under one-year contracts and, unless they are re-engaged, are repatriated when their contracts terminate. They are not permitted to bring their families to Nauru. Under the Chinese and Native Labour Ordinance, the basic labour legislation for the Territory, every contract for work in Nauru by Chinese, Nauruans and other Pacific Islanders must be made in the presence of and subject to the agreement of the Administrator. Labourers under contract are subject to penal sanctions, 20 Chinese having been convicted under the Ordinance during 1950-51, according to the Administering Authority's report.

Prior to its tenth session, the Trusteeship Council had noted disparities between wages paid to Nauruan, Chinese and European workers and had recommended increased wages for non-European workers. The Administering Authority did not include in its 1950-51 report figures on the basic wages of employees in the phosphate industry. However, it reported that the basic wages of Nauruan employees of the Administration amounted to £100 for 1950-51, an increase of £27 over the previous year, and that a further increase of £26 per year had been granted to such Nauruan employees effective 1 July 1951. It added that increases had also been granted to employees of the Phosphate Commissioners from the same date.

The review of the Chinese and Native Labour Ordinance and the Movement of Natives Ordinance earlier requested by the Council had not been completed, the Administering Authority reported. The latter Ordinance, which the Administering Authority states is liberally interpreted, controls the movements of the indigenous inhabitants outside their own districts between 10 p. m. and sunrise and the movements of Chinese outside their location at all times. The Administering Authority reported that 26 Chinese and six Nauruans were convicted under this Ordinance during 1950-51. The Council was informed, during its tenth session, that the Administrator of Nauru did not consider it practicable in existing circumstances to make any alterations in the Ordinance or in the procedure followed in its liberal interpretation. After examining the situation, the Council again asked the Administering Authority to consider further the modification of the Chinese and Native Labour Ordinance and the Movement of Natives Ordinance, with a view to removing the restrictions on the movement of Nauruans as well as Chinese.

The annual report stated that practical steps, as had been suggested by the Council, had been taken to discourage gambling in the Chinese community through the provision of additional amenities, including an extra free cinema show each week and increased sporting and recreational facilities. With respect to the Council's recommendations for admitting the families of Chinese workers to Nauru, the special representative of the Administering Authority explained to the Council in March 1952 that the position remained unchanged. The major difficulty in reaching a solution to the problem was that extra land would be required and that the Nauruan Head Chief, on behalf of the Nauruans, had expressed the view that there should be no further encroachment on the already limited land available for the Nauruans. The Council requested the Administering Authority to give close attention to further improving the social conditions of the Chinese workers, and particularly to studying the possibility of enabling them to be accompanied by their families.

The Administering Authority reported that the project for building 250 European-style houses for rental at nominal rates by Nauruans was completed during 1950-51 and a further programme for the erection of another 100 dwellings had begun. The completion of the first housing programme for Nauruans was noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council.

Public health expenditures rose from £10,841 in 1949-50 to £19,712 during the year under review, according to the Administering Authority's report. The Staff of the Health Department increased from 25 to 27, new facilities were established, and X-ray and other equipment was installed. In 1950-51, public health facilities maintained by the Administration comprised a small general hospital for Nauruans, which treated 521 in-patients and 2,658 out-patients, three out-patient clinics, a leper station and a prophylactic clinic, a tuberculosis station, a quarantine station, a dental clinic and a baby clinic. The two hospitals maintained by the Phosphate Commissioners, one for Europeans and one for Chinese, treated 685 in-patients and 3,940 out-patients during 1950-51. Among the patients treated in the Administration hospital, the most common diseases were leprosy (71 cases), bronchitis and bronchopneumonia (71), influenza (69) and tuberculosis (29). The representative of Australia stated at the tenth session of the Trusteeship Council that the Director of the Makogai Leper Settlement in the Fiji Islands had recently visited Nauru and made a report on the treatment of leprosy in the Territory. After noting the high rate of leprosy, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would include information concerning this investigation in its next annual report.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Education is compulsory for Nauruan children between the ages of six and sixteen. No school fees are required. The cost of their education, both in Nauru and overseas, is charged against the Nauru Royalty Trust Fund and that for Europeans against the Administration's general funds, to which the salary of the Director of Education and other general expenses are also debited. According to the annual report, expenditure for the education of Nauruans increased from £4,470 in 1949-50 to £5,936 in 1950-51, and for the education of Europeans and for general purposes from £2,758 to £4,119.

As of 30 June 1951, the Administration conducted six primary schools for Nauruans, attended by 282 pupils; a special school at the leper station, attended by five Nauruans; a European primary school, attended by 44 Europeans and one Chinese; and a secondary school for Nauruans, opened during the year in temporary quarters and attended by 30 pupils. There was also one primary mission school, run by three sisters and attended by 93 Nauruans. The whole educational system is under the direction of a European, assisted by three European teachers and a staff of 27 Nauruans.

The Administering Authority also reported that eighteen Nauruan students were overseas. Of these, fourteen were in secondary schools in Australia, nine of them for training as teachers; two were in their final year at the Central Medical School at Suva, Fiji; and two were attending theological colleges in Australia.

The Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would give increased attention to teacher-training. It also requested that a full account of secondary education be included in the next annual report.

2. New Guinea, Administered by Australia

New Guinea consists of approximately 600 islands with a total land area of about 93,000 square miles. According to the Administering Authority's annual report,²⁵ the indigenous population in 1950-51 numbered 1,094,014—811,714 enumerated and the balance estimated; the non-indigenous population consisted of 6,429 Europeans and 2,527 non-Europeans. The special representative of the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council during its tenth session that in October 1951 the indigenous inhabitants and also the Chinese and other people born in New Guinea who were not British subjects had been given the status of "Australian protected person."

The Administering Authority reported that the area brought under administrative control by its policy of peaceful penetration by patrols had increased from 60,820 to 65,570 square miles during the year ended 30 June 1951. Of the remaining uncontrolled areas of the Territory, 9,252 square miles were under administrative influence, 3,530 square miles were under partial influence and 14,648 square miles had been penetrated by patrols. Noting that one of the major tasks facing the Administering Authority was that of bringing the whole of the Territory under its control, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that this would be accomplished by the end of 1954, as anticipated by the Administering Authority.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

An administrative union between New Guinea and the adjacent Territory of Papua was established under the Papua and New Guinea Act, 1949-50,²⁶ and an Administrator appointed over the combined Territory. He is advised and assisted by an Executive Council appointed by the Governor-General of Australia and consisting in 1951 of eleven officers of the joint Administration.

Under the Administrator, eleven government departments provide administrative and technical services for the combined Territory of Papua-New Guinea. As of 30 June 1951, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, there were 1,581 classified positions in the public service, all tenable by Europeans; 1,280 of the positions were filled. Of the total, 413 were common to New Guinea and Papua, 774 were assigned to the Trust Territory and 394 to Papua. During 1951, a total of 9,655 indigenous inhabitants of New Guinea were also employed by the Administration. The annual report showed that the number employed by the Administration as general labourers decreased from 7,172 in 1950 to 5,757 in 1951, those employed in the police force from 1,544 to 1,246 and those employed as agricultural workers from 444 to 114, while the number employed as medical and hygiene orderlies rose from 735 to 1,145, those employed in clerical and allied positions from 135 to 397, and those employed as teachers and educational assistants from 101 to 137. In addition, 11,490 indigenous inhabitants had been appointed by the Administration as officials in villages as luluais (chiefs or headmen), tultuls (assistants to the luluais), and medical tultuls.

At its tenth session, the Trusteeship Council noted the progress made in employing indigenous inhabitants in certain of the administrative services of the Trust Territory. The Council, however, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would intensify its efforts to train indigenous inhabitants for more responsible posts in the Administration and adopt a more vigorous policy of associating these inhabitants in the various aspects of territorial life.

The Trusteeship Council was informed during its tenth session that the joint Legislative Council provided for in the Papua and New Guinea Act, 1949-1950, had been inaugurated in November 1951. The Legislative Council's powers to make ordinances for the peace, order and good government of the Territory had until then been vested in the Governor-General. When the Trusteeship Council had earlier examined the Administering Authority's plans for establishing the Legislative Council, it had recommended, inter alia, both in 1950 and 1951, that in the proposed legislature the indigenous inhabitants be given increasingly greater participation, leading eventually to an indigenous majority. The special representative of the Administering Authority stated during the tenth session of the Trusteeship Council that the Legislative Council consisted, as originally proposed, of 29 members—the Administrator, sixteen official members and twelve non-official members. Of the latter, three were elected European members and nine were nominated by the Administrator, three to represent the Christian missions, three the non-indigenous population and three the indigenous inhabitants. Of the last three, two were indigenous inhabitants of New Guinea. Ten of the 29 members were resident in the Trust Territory.

The Trusteeship Council noted that the appointment of the two indigenous members from New Guinea represented the first time that indigenous inhabitants had been members of an organ legislating for the Trust Territory. It again expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would endeavour to ensure further participation of indigenous representatives in the legislative system.

Local administration, under the District Commissioners, is based on the village, or group of villages, where authority is exercised on behalf of the Government by the luluais appointed by the Administration. The Administering Authority reported that four Native village councils (three in New Britain and one in the Manus District) had been established by 30 June 1951 under an Ordinance enacted in 1949, and it was planned to establish two or possibly more such councils. These councils are empowered to make rules for the maintenance of peace, order and good government and for the provision of social and public services; they may levy rates, taxes and charges. No advisory councils for Native matters, authorized under the Papua and New Guinea Act, had as yet been established, however. The Administering Authority stated that the formation of district and town advisory councils with a membership restricted to non-indigenous inhabitants had been approved during the year under review. Town advisory councils had been formed in the five larger towns by the end of June 1951 and a district council was to be formed in each district in the Trust Territory to advise on matters affecting the administration of the district.

The Trusteeship Council expressed satisfaction that a fourth Native village council had been established and that two further councils were expected to be set up soon. It recommended that the Administering Authority continue to press on with the establishment of such councils. It also asked the Administering Authority to report on the operation, in the light of the interests of the indigenous inhabitants, of its policy of creating separate advisory councils for the indigenous and non-indigenous sections of the population. At the same time, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority consider appointing indigenous members to the various district and town advisory councils.

According to the annual report, no judicial tribunals composed exclusively of indigenous inhabitants are recognized as part of the judiciary of the Trust Territory. Village courts exist, but they operate exclusively within traditional custom. Under the Papua and New Guinea Act, the establishment of Native courts composed exclusively of indigenous inhabitants was authorized; these courts would supplement existing courts for Native affairs. The Administering Authority stated that it was considering the provisions of an ordinance and regulations to enable the establishment of the Native courts. Noting this, the Trusteeship Council urged the Administering Authority to take such action in the immediate future.

As requested in 1951 by the Trusteeship Council, the Administering Authority supplied information concerning the "Paliau movement" and the "cargo cults". The latter, the Administering Authority stated, were modern variations of an indigenous "cult tradition" which apparently existed before the coming of the Europeans and contact with the European way of life. The cult usually began by some member or members of the village claiming to have been in touch with ancestors and to have been told by them that great quantities of goods were being sent by steamer; in the expectation of this "cargo" the people might destroy their gardens and their pigs and poultry. As the ship failed to arrive, confidence in the leaders evaporated and the movement crumbled.

The Administering Authority observed that no definite connexion seemed to exist between these cults and the Paliau movement. As regards the latter, the Administering Authority stated that Paliau, a former sergeant in the New Guinea Police Force and a native of the village of Baluan, had blended some Christian dogma with elements of orthodox Native administration policy and had succeeded, between 1946 and 1950, in establishing a politico-religious cult affecting almost one-third of the 13,000 indigenous inhabitants of the Manus District. The Administering Authority reported that, following a "cargo cult" movement in 1946 in Baluan and nearby islands, which was found to be separate from Paliau's movement although involving some of his adherents, a selected group of Natives, including Paliau, was taken to Port Moresby and advised there of the plans of the Administration for the economic, social and political development of the indigenous population. In May 1949, Paliau was appointed Luluai of Baluan. By November 1949, he had achieved a surplus of food supplies and markedly improved housing among his people.

In 1950, as the Trusteeship Council had earlier been informed, Paliau was convicted and imprisoned for six months on a charge of spreading false reports, which tended to cause trouble among the people, to the effect that he had the power to appoint magistrates. Since Paliau's return to Baluan, the Administering Authority reported, he had been most circumspect in behaviour; he had spoken of the need for literacy. More children were seeking admittance to the Administration school, and the people were being most co-operative.

The special representative of the Administering Authority later informed the Trusteeship Council that, during the last half of 1951, Paliau was elected as a member of the Baluan Village Council, in the Manus District, and then was appointed as Chairman of the Council and had carried out his duties intelligently and enthusiastically. However, he was convicted in October 1951 and sentenced to three months' imprisonment for an offence which concerned his personal morals and was in no way related to his public activities. When he was imprisoned, the Administration decided that upon his release no restriction would be placed on his continuation as Chairman of the Baluan Council or general participation in the affairs of the area.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The main economic activities of New Guinea are crop production, some processing of agricultural products and gold mining. There are no major secondary industries. Desiccated coconut, production of which increased from 652 tons in 1949-50 to 939 tons in 1950-51, is the principal item manufactured; otherwise, the processing of crops is limited almost entirely to the cutting and drying of copra and the fermentation and drying of cocoa beans. New Guinea is dependent upon external sources of supply for practically all manufactured goods and for a large part of the foodstuffs consumed by non-indigenous inhabitants.

According to the Administering Authority's reports, both imports and exports increased during 1950-51, totalling £6,186,669²⁷ and £5,436,617, respectively. Exports of local origin showed an increase of £1,398,387 over the previous year, the principal contributing items being copra (£936,601), gold (£145,393), desiccated coconut (£95,024), trochus shell (£95,709) and cocoa beans (£60,934). Exports of copra, the main cash crop in the Territory, increased from 47,094 tons, valued at £2,264,114, in 1949-50 to 64,301 tons, valued at £3,200,715, in 1950-51. Copra continued to be marketed through the Australia-New Guinea Production Control Board. A nine-year agreement, effective 1 March 1949, between the United Kingdom Ministry of Food and the Commonwealth Government, provides for the sale to the Ministry of Food of all New Guinea copra in excess of the requirements of the Territory and of Australia for home consumption. The selling price is fixed under the agreement, which provides that it should not vary more than 10 per cent from one year to the next; for the first year the price was fixed at £60 f.o.b. New Guinea ports, for the second year at £60 12s.6d., and for the third at £67 3s.9d. A copra stabilization fund, created in 1946-47 by means of a levy of £5 per ton on exported copra, had an accumulated balance at 30 June 1951 of £1,202,409, the Administering Authority reported.

Gold is exported only to Australia. During 1950-51 the quantity of gold produced amounted to 87,593 fine ounces, valued at £1,356,962. The price of gold remained at £15 9s.10d. per fine ounce during the year. Fees for rights, licences and leases and a royalty of 5 per cent on all gold won are payable to the revenue of the Administration for the use and benefit of the Territory. The revenue derived from this royalty amounted to £67,844 in 1950-51. In its annual report, the Administering Authority stated that, as earlier recommended by the Trusteeship Council, it had considered the question of increasing the rate of royalty; but had decided to retain the existing rate. It also supplied information on production from the various gold-fields, on accidents on mining fields, and on mining by indigenous inhabitants. Recalling its previous request for as full information as possible concerning the gold mining industry, the Trusteeship Council at its tenth session asked the Administering Authority to provide in its next report detailed information on production costs and profits so that the Council could judge whether the industry was making an adequate contribution to the Territorial revenues. As an interim measure, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority consider introducing a sliding scale of royalties based on profit.

Territorial expenditure during the year amounted to £3,575,721 and internal revenue to £1,219,411; the balance was met by a non-repayable grant of £2,356,310 from the Australian Government. The Administering Authority reported that no income or business tax was levied. It further stated that the examination, in progress for some time, of all aspects of the Territory's fiscal policy was not yet concluded. The Trusteeship Council recommended that this examination be completed as soon as possible and noted the substantial grants made by the Administering Authority towards the cost of administering the Territory.

Both the Council and the General Assembly have in the past been concerned with the extent of participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the Territorial economy. With the exception of Native-produced copra, amounting to about 10,000 tons in 1950-51, the whole of the agricultural products exported are from plantations operated by non-indigenous inhabitants. Similarly, the majority of firms and companies engaged in mining, merchandising, shipping and air services are largely staffed by non-indigenous inhabitants of European ancestry. Chinese conduct store-keeping and trading establishments, tailoring and carpentry businesses. The Trusteeship Council was informed at its tenth session, however, that the number of indigenous inhabitants engaged in copra production was rapidly increasing. They were also beginning to grow cocoa and coffee and were showing a growing tendency to form co-operative societies. The Administering Authority referred to the Amele rice project, developed by community enterprise, and consisting in 1951 of 150 acres. It added that sales of rice had been made and rice-milling facilities were being purchased by community funds. Moreover, Native wage labour was used extensively on plantations, in mines and in domestic service.

The Administering Authority considered that the Territory's resources would be developed to some extent by the indigenous inhabitants, but it felt that for a considerable time the major development would be through industries controlled by Europeans who possessed the necessary capital, technical knowledge and skills, and organizing ability. The Administration's policy was to encourage development by private enterprise in so far as the rights and interests of the indigenous inhabitants were respected and safeguarded. Non-indigenous groups had no special position in the Territorial economy other than that acquired by their possession of high technical skill and greater financial resources, the Administering Authority assured the Trusteeship Council. The extent and tempo of economic development, it stated, was largely dependent on the availability of Native workers, whose employment in non-Native private enterprise would enable them to acquire experience and technological skill. The Trusteeship Council was informed that arrangements were being made for a physical resources survey of regions considered most suitable for economic development.

The Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority's policy of encouraging development by private enterprise would not lead to its partial withdrawal from the direct responsibility for the Territory's development. The proposed physical resources survey, the Council recommended, should be expanded into an over-all economic survey as a basis for broad development plans and the Administering Authority should give particular emphasis in its development plans to indigenous participation in the Territorial economy. The Council commended the Administering Authority for its efforts to introduce new crops suitable for cultivation by the indigenous population. It urged the Administering Authority to pursue a co-ordinated policy along such lines, wherever possible, by encouraging the growth of indigenous co-operative enterprises, and also to take measures to enable the indigenous inhabitants to have access to adequate forms of credit for their economic development.

The Administering Authority's annual report revealed that, of the total land area, estimated at 59,520,000 acres, 940,262 acres had been alienated from the indigenous inhabitants by 30 June 1951, an increase of 24,458 acres over the year before. The alienated land comprised 519,380 acres of freehold, 170,222 acres of leasehold, 224,049 acres held by the Administration and 26,611 acres held in trust for the Natives. The Administering Authority stated that land generally belonged to the indigenous inhabitants and could be acquired from the indigenous owner only by the Administration after it was satisfied that the land was not necessary for the owner's own use. Since the availability of land for settlement was considered an important factor in the Territory's development, steps were being taken to determine the actual indigenous ownership of land and the further areas that could safely be made available for settlement. The Administering Authority added that a Native Land Commission, provided for under the Native Lands Registration Ordinance, 1951, was to determine what land was the rightful and hereditary property of Natives or Native communities by Native customary right and who owned the land.

The importance of properly clarifying the land ownership rights of the inhabitants and the registration of those rights was recognized by the Trusteeship Council. Consequently, it recommended that the Administering Authority organize the Native Land Commission without delay. The Council also recommended that the Administering Authority exercise caution in its policy of purchasing and alienating indigenous land, in order to safeguard the interests of the indigenous population.

Describing transport and communications, the Administering Authority stated that air services, both within New Guinea and to and from Australia, had continued to improve; there were 61 aerodromes throughout New Guinea in 1951, as compared with 75 in 1950. A regular passenger and freight steamship service between Australia and New Guinea was also maintained. There were 1,980 miles of roads and 19,704 miles of bridle paths in the Territory, but heavy rains and frequent landslides made maintenance a problem and bridges were frequently damaged by the flooding of creeks and rivers. Although the nature of the country made road construction and maintenance both difficult and expensive, the Administering Authority recognized the effect of a fully developed road system on the development of the Territory. It reported that a steady programme of road construction was being followed and that the length of roads of all classes was increased by 49 miles during the year 1950-51. Expenditure on roads and bridges that year totalled £75,333. The Trusteeship Council, noting that only 49 miles of road had been built during the year, recommended that the Administering Authority intensify its efforts to develop the road system.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Among the developments in the social field during 1950-51 was the coming into force on 1 January 1951 of the Native Labour Ordinance, 1950. The last of the contracts of service concluded under the repealed 1946 Ordinance, which had provided for a system of indentured labour and penal sanctions for breach of contract, were to expire by the end of 1951. No such provisions were contained in the 1950 Ordinance. The new Ordinance provides for a system of civil agreements between employers and workers. It also deals with the employment of casual workers, the movement of Natives beyond the Territory and general employment conditions. By 30 June 1951, the Administering Authority reported, the number of indentured workers had already been reduced by 4,723, although the total number of Native workers employed increased by 2,168. There were 34,419 Native workers employed in the Territory as of 30 June 1951.

The Administering Authority stated that with the opening up of the Western and Eastern Highlands Districts, an increasing number of Natives from that area were seeking employment; 5,363 were employed in New Guinea and 1,784 in Papua as of 30 June 1951. Although the supply of labour in the Trust Territory had shown steady improvement, it was still not equal to the demand. Reported shortages of labour were estimated in 1950-51 at 2,100 as compared with 8,000 in 1948-49. The wages paid indigenous employees were tabulated in the annual report. General labourers, privately employed under agreement, were shown as having an average wage of 16s. 3d. per month plus food, housing, clothing and equipment, which employers are required to provide. The Administering Authority acknowledged a request made in 1951 by the Trusteeship Council for detailed data on the relationship between real wages and the cost of living and stated that such information would be furnished when available.

Under the Papua and New Guinea Act, 1949-50, forced labour is prohibited except in such circumstances as permitted by the International Labour Convention concerning Forced or Compulsory Labour. The Administering Authority reported that regulations concerning these circumstances were amended during the year under review to provide for forced labour for food cultivation in an area liable to a famine or deficiency in food supplies. An amendment was also made to the Shipping Ordinance, 1937, to extend to Native seamen the provisions of another International Labour Convention for unemployment indemnity in case of loss or foundering of the ship.

The question of the status of Chinese residents in the Territory was again brought up during the tenth session of the Trusteeship Council. At its eighth session in March 1951, the Council had decided to postpone consideration of a petition (T/Pet.8/4 and Add.1) from the Chinese residents of Rabaul and Kavieng since an examination of the situation was being made at the time by the Administering Authority.²⁸ Meanwhile, the petitioners submitted a further communication (T/Pet.8/4/Add.2) reiterating their request that Chinese who were non-permanent residents in the Territory be given the right of permanent residence and that the national status of locally born Chinese be clarified. Commenting on this petition, the Administering Authority stated (T/965) that locally born Chinese had been accorded the status of "Australian protected person" by an amendment made in October 1951 to the Citizenship Regulations. The question of the right of permanent residence, it informed the Council, concerned some 200 Chinese who had entered the Territory under immigration exemptions and who had been in the Territory for periods ranging from ten to eighteen years. They had been unable to return to their own country at the end of the expiration period because of the conditions existing both then and since brought about by war activities. The periods of exemption had been extended from time to time and were at present valid until June 1952. The whole position was being reviewed, the Administering Authority stated, and all factors, including the representations made by petitioners, would be taken into consideration.

On 26 March 1952, the Council adopted a resolution (428(X)) on the petition. It recommended that the Administering Authority grant further immigration exemptions to the 200 Chinese pending a decision on their applications for permanent residence. It also expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would complete its examination of the question without undue delay and asked to be informed of the results of the examination and of the action taken or being taken.

Under the Criminal Code of the Territory, a prisoner declared an habitual criminal may be detained after serving his prison sentence for a specific crime until such time as the Administrator considers him fit to be at large. The Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council, however, that there was no case on record in the Territory of a prisoner having been declared an habitual criminal. It reported that the legislation relating to habitual criminals had been examined, as recommended in 1949 by the Council, and was being amended to require a review of such cases at six-month intervals by the Supreme Court or a Supreme Court judge. With respect to the formal abolition of corporal punishment, repeatedly recommended by the Council and the General Assembly, the Administering Authority stated that corporal punishment had not been applied in the Territory since the end of the Second World War. The special representative informed the Council during its tenth session that amending Ordinances had been enacted on 13 November 1951 to reduce the number of offences for which corporal punishment could be given and in some cases to reduce the number of strokes. Noting this, the Council again recommended that corporal punishment be formally abolished.

Over-all medical services, according to the Administering Authority's report, increased by an estimated 25 per cent during 1950-51. Total expenditure on public health increased from £608,674 in 1949-50 to £868,972 (excluding expenditure on hospital buildings) in 1950-51. The number of indigenous inhabitants admitted to hospitals increased from 57,366 to 69,781. The number of hospitals and clinics increased from 424 to 599; there were also six established Administration infant and maternal welfare clinics and others on a part-time basis. There were 211 village aid posts staffed by 240 medical and hygiene assistants; the Administering Authority stated that the Native Village Councils had accepted financial responsibility for the wages of their assistants and it believed that this would encourage pride in social services and a more general desire to seek aid earlier. The Administering Authority reported that 31,461 Natives were treated during 1950-51 by European officers on medical patrols. In addition, there were 297 patrols by Native medical personnel. A 65-ton ship was converted for medical patrolling and vehicles were provided for clinic patrolling wherever roads allowed. The Administering Authority also drew attention to the special health projects undertaken in the Territory. These included: a study of depopulation in New Ireland, a medical survey in the Western Islands (Manus District), research on tuberculosis control by mass testing and inoculation, vaccinations against whooping cough, continued research programmes into the best methods for an anti-malaria campaign and for the treatment of tropical ulcers. The report showed decreases during the year, mainly due to resignations, in the number of Department of Public Health medical officers (from 35 to 30) and European medical assistants (from 71 to 58).

While noting the over-all increase in medical services, the Trusteeship Council expressed concern at the decrease in the number of European medical personnel and urged the Administering Authority to take all possible steps to increase their number substantially. It also recommended that efforts to train indigenous medical personnel be intensified. The Council further urged the Administering Authority to institute a campaign of instruction in maternal and child welfare.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Schools in the Territory are operated by the Administration and by religious missions subsidized by the Administration and inspected by Administration officers. Education is free but not compulsory. The Administering Authority reported that during 1950-51 the number of Administration schools had increased by fifteen to 65 and the number of mission schools by 97 to 2,407. The total number of pupils in schools of all kinds had increased from 67,385 in 1948-49 to 88,726 in 1949-50 and 90,809 in 1950-51. During the same three-year period, the number of teachers in Administration schools had increased from 119 to 191 and in mission schools from 2,421 to 2,948. Other developments during 1950-51 included the construction of eight school buildings and the establishment at Dregerhafen, near Finschhafen, of a multi-purpose educational institution incorporating a village higher school, a central school, a higher training institution for teacher-training, general education facilities for clerical and other posts and technical training, a Native women's class and a part-time school for European children.

Of the total number of pupils in 1950-51, the Administering Authority stated, 3,675 were in Administration schools and 87,134 in mission schools. The former included ten European primary schools (203 pupils), 34 village higher and other schools classified as elementary (2,034 pupils), seven higher elementary schools (670 pupils), and eight pre-vocational schools classified as secondary schools (367 pupils). Mission schools included 2,284 village schools (77,718 pupils), 93 intermediate schools (8,187 pupils) and 24 training schools (1,219 pupils). These schools represent the principal categories of Administration and mission schools in the Territory. Apart from the higher training centres, there is no secondary school in the Territory. In the case of European children, the Administering Authority stated, financial assistance was granted during 1951 to parents of approved students for secondary education in Australia.

The inadequacy of the number of available qualified teachers has in the past been recognized as a limiting factor in education by both the Trusteeship Council and the Administering Authority. In its annual report, the Administering Authority stated that the European teachers in Administration schools were qualified teachers; of 49 such teachers in 1951, fourteen were teaching in the primary schools for European children and the rest in the Administration schools for indigenous and Asian children. Their salaries, according to the report, ranged from £354 for the lowest category of female education officer to £860 for the highest class of education officer, plus cost-of-living and territorial allowances. There were also 197 European teachers in the mission schools. A number of the indigenous teachers in Administration schools, the Administering Authority indicated, had received their education in schools in New Guinea before the war; refresher courses were being arranged where possible. Indigenous teachers, it stated, might be paid up to £16 per month, plus maintenance, and a higher-graded supervisory teacher might earn a maximum of £20, plus maintenance for himself and his family. The annual report showed that more indigenous teachers were being trained—90 at a higher training institution at Keravat, from which 34 teachers had graduated during the period under review and taken positions in Administration schools; and 26 were in their first year at the new education centre at Dregerhafen. The Administering Authority also stated that teachers' wives were being trained so that some might be used as teacher-assistants in general women's welfare work.

After examining educational conditions in the Territory, the Trusteeship Council urged the Administering Authority to intensify its efforts to build up an adequate educational programme for increasing the number of primary schools, establishing secondary schools as soon as possible, and instituting a scholarship system for indigenous inhabitants for secondary and higher education abroad. In view of the serious shortage of teachers, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority make every effort to expand teacher-training facilities and to take advantage of such facilities provided by the religious missions.

3. Western Samoa, Administered by New Zealand

On 31 December 1950, according to the Administering Authority's annual report,²⁹ the population of Western Samoa consisted of 74,663 Samoans, 5,866 part-Samoans possessing European status, 327 Europeans, 171 Chinese and 63 Melanians.

Formerly, the Administering Authority stated, the great majority of Samoans were British-protected persons, but, in accordance with the wishes of Samoan representatives, this status was changed to that of New Zealand-protected persons by the Western Samoa New Zealand Protected Persons Order, 1950. Domestically, however, the inhabitants of the Territory remained divided into the categories of "Samoan" and "European" with respect to certain parts of municipal law. Under prescribed conditions, individuals may petition the High Court of Western Samoa for a change of status. By 31 December 1950, the Administering Authority reported, this Court had declared 553 former Samoans to be Europeans and 43 Europeans to be Samoans. The Administering Authority stated that it had so far been unsuccessful in its attempt to evolve a common domestic status for the inhabitants and thereby promote a unity of interest among all sections of the population based on their domicile in Western Samoa. It would, however, make further efforts in this direction. Recalling its earlier recommendations on the subject, the Trusteeship Council at its tenth session expressed satisfaction with the change in the international status of the inhabitants and urged the Administering Authority to continue to study the problem of evolving a common domestic status and to report on its results.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

During 1950, the executive branch of Government remained entirely under the control of the High Commissioner, the Administering Authority reported. The High Commissioner is required by law to consult the Council of State, consisting of himself and the two Fautua (the highest Samoan chiefs), on all proposals for legislation to be submitted to the local Legislative Assembly and on all questions relating to Samoan customs. He is also advised by the Fono of Faipule, a traditional Samoan body composed of 41 members elected from the traditional districts and sub-districts of Western Samoa by the matai, the title holders or family heads who constitute about one-fourth of the adult male population. The Fono of Faipule has the statutory right to express opinions and make recommendations to the High Commissioner on any matters concerning the welfare of the Samoan people. In its report the Administering Authority stated that it and the Samoan Government were considering the establishment of an executive council in Western Samoa, as recommended in 1951 by the Trusteeship Council. During its tenth session, the Trusteeship Council was informed that the Administering Authority intended to make legislative provision during 1952 for setting up such a council. Noting this, the Trusteeship Council expressed interest in receiving information on this action and on the composition and powers of the proposed council.

The Legislative Assembly, which is composed of the Council of State, twelve Samoan members elected by the Fono of Faipule, five elected European members and five official members, has the power to enact legislation on all purely domestic matters, subject to the High Commissioner's assent on all ordinances and his recommendations on all financial legislation. According to the Administering Authority's report, the Assembly held two sessions during 1950; it discussed, amended and approved the estimates for the financial year and passed thirteen ordinances, all of which were assented to by the High Commissioner. The Administering Authority observed that, as the year before, the Assembly had shown a conservative tendency in public spending and that the government accounts had been thoroughly examined. Reference was also made to the valuable part played by elected members in the general debates.

The special representative of the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council during its tenth session that elections for the Legislative Assembly had been held in April 1951 and had resulted in an increase in the proportion of younger men in the Assembly. He stated that in electing the Samoan members, the Fono of Faipule had, in the case of contested seats, for the first time voted by secret ballot. This had led the Administering Authority to the belief that this method of election might become firmly enough entrenched in Samoan thought to be considered for fairly general adoption.

In its report, the Administering Authority had pointed out that it was aware of the advantage of introducing some form of universal suffrage in the election of members of both the Fono of Faipule and the Assembly, but that it did not wish to impose prematurely on the Samoans a system foreign to their customs and traditions. It felt that the principle of universal suffrage would be accepted only through political education, perhaps over a long period. However, the special representative of the Administering Authority later informed the Trusteeship Council of a change of feeling on the part of a section of the population. He explained that the first Samoan political party, known as the Samoa Democratic Party, had been formed following the election of the Legislative Assembly. Claiming a membership of some 300 Samoans, this party aimed at securing electoral changes which would permit the election of the Samoan members of the Assembly from the matai group by all Samoans over 21, and the extension of Samoan representation to 41 members, thus removing the need for the Fono of Faipule.

The use of the secret ballot by the Fono of Faipule and the election of an increasing number of younger men to the Assembly were viewed with approval by the Trusteeship Council. While noting the attitudes of the Samoan people towards universal suffrage, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority give constant attention to educating the Samoans toward a realization of the place of universal suffrage in a system of democratic self-government.

Commenting on the report of the Commission of Enquiry into the organization of district and village government in Western Samoa in 1950,³⁰ the Administering Authority stated that this report, copies of which were provided to the Trusteeship Council (T/941 and T/L.121), would require careful examination because of the complexity of its recommendations and the administrative difficulties of establishing the machinery envisaged. The special representative later added that to adopt the recommendations in toto would be to crystallize Samoan custom and enshrine it in law at a time when its natural fluidity and susceptibility to change needed to function to the maximum. The Trusteeship Council asked to be informed of any decisions and developments in the field of local government and expressed the hope that progress would be made, in particular, towards devising a form of local government for the urban area of Apia.

The Council also expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to bear in mind, with regard to all constitutional developments, including the establishment of the proposed Executive Council, the importance of ensuring ample opportunity for the adaptation of traditional Samoan concepts to the requirements of representative self-government.

The special representative informed the Council that the contemplated regrading of the Public Service of Western Samoa had been completed and, as a result, the salaries for most positions had been considerably increased. At the end of 1950, according to the Administering Authority's report, the Public Service employed 1,164 persons, of whom 76 were recruited overseas and 1,088 locally. The total represented an increase of 98 since March 1950, due in part to the fact that all 67 employees of the New Zealand Reparation Estates except the General Manager had been included in the Public Service. The report stated that by the end of 1950 Samoans or part-Samoans were the principal officers in three Departments and four young Samoans who had completed scholarship courses in New Zealand had joined the government service on their return to Western Samoa. The reorganization and regrading of the Public Service was noted with approval by the Trusteeship Council, which urged the Administering Authority to continue its efforts to provide training, both locally and in New Zealand, for administrative personnel.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Western Samoa is predominantly an agricultural country. The great majority of Samoans are engaged principally in growing food and catching fish for local consumption. Samoan growers also produce over 90 per cent of the principal export, copra, about 41 per cent of the cocoa, the next crop of commercial importance, and 95 per cent of the bananas. The marketing of these commercial crops is carried out partly by governmental contractual arrangements and partly through the open market.

According to the Administering Authority's report, copra exports declined from 16,455 tons in 1949 to 13,917 tons in 1950. This decline it attributed to the unavailability of shipping rather than to a slackening of production. The entire crop was sold to the United Kingdom Ministry of Food under a nine-year contract concluded in 1949. For 1950, the Administering Authority indicated, the price of copra was fixed at £48 10s.³¹ per ton f.o.b. Apia, £2 5s. of this being paid into the Copra Stabilization Fund. The price for 1951 was raised to £53 15s. and for 1952, according to information supplied to the Trusteeship Council at its tenth session, to £65. There was also a reduction in the cocoa harvest, due to seasonal conditions, and exports in 1950 totalled 1,880 tons as compared with 2,894 tons the year before. Banana exports, on the other hand, increased from 87,121 cases in 1949 to 97,357 in 1950. Total exports during 1950 were valued at £1,303,761, slightly less than in 1949, while imports, totalling £1,095,121, showed an increase of over £200,000.

Commenting on the question of abolishing the preferential customs treatment accorded since 1920 to British goods imported into Western Samoa (customs duties of 11 per cent ad valorem in their favour), the Administering Authority stated that it had ascertained that the removal of this preference was not likely to disrupt the economy of Western Samoa or disturb the pattern of its trade. Before any change could be made, however, it was necessary to consider carefully the practical effect of the removal of the preferential tariff on the obligations undertaken by the Territory to other countries. The Trusteeship Council indicated that it looked forward to receiving a report on the action which the Administering Authority might take in the matter.

According to information supplied by the Administering Authority to the Committee on the Rural Economic Development of the Trust Territories (T/AC.36/L.32), Western Samoa has a land area of 725,000 acres, of which an estimated 55 per cent is wasteland. Of the total, about 565,640 acres are held by Samoans, 40,000 acres by Europeans and missions and 119,360 acres consist of Crown land. The Crown land includes 75,360 acres forming the New Zealand Reparation Estates, the most important plantation enterprise in the Territory; it consists of land formerly held by Germans and acquired by the New Zealand Government as reparations after the First World War. The uncultivated land in the Territory consists of about 24,000 acres of lava fields and 578,409 acres of rain forest. Of the remaining 122,591 acres, which are under cultivation or used for grazing, the Administering Authority estimated that the New Zealand Reparation Estates held 12,619 freehold and 2,000 leasehold, Samoans 80,472, Europeans 2,500 leasehold and Europeans and missions 25,000 freehold.

The Administering Authority reported that the increasing population had led to a degree of population pressure along the northern coast of Upolu. It noted, however, that the opening up of new areas for settlement as a result of progress in road construction and its policy of granting Crown land to congested villages had offered some relief. Nevertheless, due to the annual population increase of nearly 4 per cent, the problem of population pressure was likely to continue. In its report, the Administering Authority stated that toward the end of 1950 it had decided to offer about 43,000 acres of the Reparation Estates, not required for operation, to the Samoan Government. The Trusteeship Council was later informed that the transfer of 41,615 acres had been completed during 1951 and that there was a long-term plan for gradually transferring land in the Apia area to allow for the orderly expansion of the town. After noting with satisfaction the transfer of Estates land and the Administration's long-term plan for Apia, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that further transfers of land would be made to meet the needs of the Samoans whenever population pressure required.

The Administering Authority's report revealed an increased tempo in the economic development of Western Samoa during 1950. A census of the Territory's agriculture had been completed, a survey of forestry resources made, a new hydro-electric plant brought into operation, road-construction continued, a report on the development of harbours completed and work begun on the harbour facilities at Apia. Progress had also been made by the re-established Department of Agriculture. Moreover, the Administering Authority indicated, the work of the South Pacific Commission, which co-operated closely with the Samoan Government during 1950, promised to assist greatly in the Territory's economic advancement.

Further developments were referred to by the special representative during the tenth session of the Trusteeship Council. To supplement the existing power supply, an additional electric unit had been ordered and was expected to be in operation by May 1953. In addition, recommendations had been made for the construction of another hydro-electric plant which would increase the total capacity of the Territory's electric plants to 1,730 kilowatts. Completed road construction of all types totalled 245 miles and work on two bridges had started. Water supply systems had been installed for two villages and extended in two others and pipes had been ordered for ten additional projects. The progress made in the use of water resources for hydro-electric development was noted by the Trusteeship Council, which expressed the hope that similar progress would be made in providing piped water supplies to rural villages.

The special representative also informed the Council that the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the United Nations in undertaking a general economic survey of the Territory had been considered, but that the plans for this survey were still being formulated and no formal request for assistance had yet been made to the United Nations. While noting the progress already made in the economic development of Western Samoa, the Council considered that the continuing population pressure emphasized the need for expanding and diversifying the Territory's economy. Accordingly, it urged the Administering Authority to proceed with the contemplated general economic survey, including a land and soil survey.

With respect to the financial position of Western Samoa, the Administering Authority reported that the accumulated surplus of public funds increased from over £300,000 in 1946 to £733,624 at the end of 1950, held mainly in investments in New Zealand. For the nine months ending 31 December 1950, revenue totalled £471,087 and expenditure £444,202, the principal fields of expenditure being public works (£160,628), public health (£93,667), and education (£74,197). Import and export duties, which constitute the most important source of public revenue, yielded £196,681 and £94,683, respectively. The store tax or tax on the gross selling price of goods, the principal direct tax, yielded £65,789, and a salary tax applying to incomes over £200 yielded £4,960; other direct taxes are licences and fees, the building tax, water rates, the amusement tax and stamp duties. During the Trusteeship Council's tenth session, the special representative stated that the Finance Committee of the Legislative Assembly had in principle supported the replacement of the salary and store taxes by an income tax. Further information on a number of details was awaited before beginning the task of drafting legislation to bring about the desired revision of the tax laws. The Trusteeship Council, considering that taxation policy should be based on wide considerations of national income, future economic possibilities and population trends, expressed the hope that proposals for revising the tax structure would not be unduly delayed.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority stated that it aimed at social development mainly in the fields of public health, nutrition and improved infant care, and that increases in trained staff, investigations of dietary conditions, continued encouragement of the women's village committees and improved educational facilities were its chief means of achieving these ends. It considered it unwise to set up a huge social services machine, the cost of which would be beyond the economy of the Territory when it achieved self-government. It pointed out that the Samoans themselves were aware of the dangers of this course and had consistently been against subsidies from New Zealand for other than capital development. Commenting on the prudence of the Samoans, the Trusteeship Council nevertheless considered it desirable that they be encouraged to avoid a static conception of government expenditure. It urged that they be encouraged to ensure that the expenditure on social services reflected the continuing prosperity of the Territory.

Although no family living studies had been carried out in the Territory, the Administering Authority reported that the agricultural census, which was being tabulated, should help to determine the living standards of the people. It also stated that the Public Service Commissioner was carrying out a study of the cost of living in the Territory, mainly to guide him in assessing salaries and allowances in the public service; it was thought, however, that this study would be of value in assessing trends in living costs generally. The Trusteeship Council requested that a report on the results of these enquiries be included in the next annual report.

On 30 October 1950, according to the Administering Authority's report, the working week for casual labour in the public service was reduced from 44 to 42 1/2 hours per week. The Administering Authority stated that a further reduction in 1951, to 40 hours, was proposed, together with an increase in the minimum rate of pay from 10d. to 1s. per hour. Referring to the Council's earlier recommendation that elementary social legislation, including labour legislation, be introduced as soon as possible, the Administering Authority again explained that the Territory lacked administrative facilities to ensure that labour laws were observed and added that the maintenance of a special administration and the enactment of precise labour legislation was unnecessary due to the small proportion of the population depending on wages. It stated, however, that, as a result of an investigation into labour conditions in 1950, a comprehensive system of workers' compensation should soon be established. It later informed the Trusteeship Council, during the tenth session, that a draft ordinance on this subject was under consideration by the Government of New Zealand.

The most prevalent diseases in Western Samoa are hookworm, yaws, filariasis and diseases resulting from faulty sanitation. Tuberculosis is also a major problem and chest diseases, such as pneumonia, are common. In its report, the Administering Authority indicated its awareness of the necessity for intensified measures to combat tuberculosis. It reported that a 60-bed tuberculosis ward at the Apia Hospital was nearing completion and stated that a research team from the South Pacific Commission sent to the Territory had studied methods of treatment and problems connected with the incidence of the disease. Another team had been sent to study yaws and hookworm.

Describing the medical facilities in the Territory, the Administering Authority reported that the rebuilding of the hospital at Apia, the central unit in the medical services, had been proceeding according to schedule; in 1950, a 30-bed women's ward was opened. There were thirteen "district dispensary hospitals". District facilities were being consolidated, expanded and modernized and were to comprise a main district hospital in each of five medical districts, with smaller dispensary hospitals as subsidiaries; the costs of constructing and equipping the new hospitals were being shared by the Government and the districts. A third mobile clinic was being established. These clinics visit the more readily accessible villages. The Administering Authority reported that in the nine months ending 31 December 1950, a total of 4,261 in-patients and 149,323 out-patients had been treated at hospitals and dispensaries, an increase over the previous full year. The Administering Authority felt that this increase, mainly due to out-patient visits, illustrated a growing confidence in modern medicine. The total medical staff had increased from 121 to 134 by the end of 1950.

The Administering Authority reported that the South Pacific Health Service, with which it was associated, now maintained a pool from which medical officers for the Territory were supplied. Moreover, the special representative informed the Trusteeship Council during its tenth session that legislation was passed in 1951 providing that a person, although not registered in New Zealand or the United Kingdom as a medical practitioner, might be appointed a medical officer if the Medical Council of New Zealand certified that he had attained a standard of practice equivalent to that required for registration in New Zealand.

The Trusteeship Council expressed its gratification at the increase in the total medical staff and at the passage of legislation which had enabled the Territory to recruit more medical officers. It also noted the progress made in providing facilities for tuberculosis treatment and expressed the opinion that the Administering Authority should seriously consider the institution of an educational campaign to impress upon the Samoans the seriousness of the disease.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority reported continued progress in its educational development plan, growing enthusiasm for education on the part of the pupils, teachers and Samoans in general, and commendable work by community leaders in supporting the school building programme.

Education in Western Samoa is provided by the Government and the five religious missions which are active in the Territory. Many children attend both mission and government schools. At the village school level, government and missions were progressing towards a unified system and a common syllabus, the Administering Authority indicated. It added that the Government and the five missions co-operated closely in the field of education and that the Education Department has assisted mission schools through educational broadcasts, the provision of text-books and refresher courses for teachers. Until the Samoan Government was itself able to provide a system of universal education, however, the Administering Authority stated, it would enlist the co-operation of missions only with respect to questions of organization, staffing and curricula.

According to the Administering Authority's report, 23,331 were enrolled in mission schools in 1950, including 14,937 listed as not also attending government schools. Mission schools comprised 345 elementary-type schools run by pastors or catechists, five theological colleges, 40 primary schools and four secondary schools. They had 1,002 teachers, of whom 86 were Europeans, 369 Samoan pastor teachers and 557 Samoan lay teachers.

The government education system comprised 114 schools, 399 teachers and 13,899 students during the last nine months of 1950. Most of the pupils, 12,637, attended the 105 village primary schools, and 1,060 pupils, including 620 at European primary schools, attended more advanced types of primary schools. The one post-primary school was attended by 40 students. There were also 119 students in training as teachers. The increase in the total teaching staff, which numbered 358 in 1949, included an increase from 304 to 340 in the number of Samoan teachers. Evening classes in general and commercial subjects continued to be held at the adult night school, which had an enrolment of 43 men at the end of 1950, a decrease of 33 during the nine months under review; seven students from the school had passed the Samoan Public Service examination, the Administering Authority indicated. Developments in adult and community education included the publication of a weekly newspaper, Samoa Bulletin, the first issue of which appeared in November 1950.

The Administering Authority reported that funds had been made available for the proposed Samoa college near Apia and that construction had begun on a 130-acre site. It later informed the Trusteeship Council, during the tenth session, that this college was nearing completion and that one wing was expected to be ready for occupation in the middle of March 1952.

Apart from the training of teachers and the proposed Samoa college, no formal education on a level higher than the post-primary school was provided by the Government within the Territory. From 1945 to the end of 1950, however, the New Zealand Government's scholarship scheme had enabled 69 Samoans and part-Samoans from both government and mission schools to continue their education in New Zealand. At the end of 1950, according to the Administering Authority's report, five of these students had returned to Western Samoa and 41 were still enrolled in preparatory and secondary schools; the others had completed their secondary education and all except two had proceeded to specialized training. In addition, three Samoan medical practitioners had finished their training at the Central Medical School in Fiji and four more entered training. Three students were being trained as fully qualified nurses and suitable scholarship pupils in New Zealand were being encouraged to study for New Zealand qualifications as medical and dental officers. In addition, five Samoan students with medical scholarships had entered the Central Medical School in Fiji during the nine months under review, making a total of seventeen in training there, four of whom were in their final year. The Administering Authority also reported, with respect to higher education, that it was studying the recommendations resulting from the South Pacific Commission's investigation of vocational-training facilities in the South Pacific, the future requirements of individual territories, and the means by which these requirements might be met.

After examining educational conditions in the Territory, the Trusteeship Council asked the Administering Authority to consider a long-term educational programme which would take into account the level of recurrent costs which can be borne by the Territory in relation to the growth of the school population and the Territory's prospective general revenue. It also suggested that a more closely integrated school system be considered. In this connexion, the Council, noting the progress in the construction of Samoa college, expressed its opinion that the Administering Authority should intensify its efforts to improve secondary education facilities and to provide more scholarships for overseas study.

The expansion of adult and community education was viewed with interest by the Council, but, in view of the decreased enrolment in the adult night school, the Council urged the Administering Authority to do everything possible to stimulate interest in the available adult education facilities.

4. Pacific Islands, Administered by the United States

This Territory, spread over some three million square miles, consists of three groups of Micronesian Islands: the Marshalls, Carolines and Marianas (except Guam). It contains 96 distinct island units with a combined land area of about 687 square miles. On 30 June 1951, according to the Administering Authority's annual report³², the indigenous population totalled 55,730, three-fifths of whom lived on the six principal island units: Saipan, the Palaus, Yap, Truk, Ponape and Majuro.

The Administering Authority reported that the United States Congress had as yet taken no action on the proposed organic act for the Territory. Meanwhile, the indigenous inhabitants continued to be described unofficially as "Citizens of the Trust Territory". Temporary headquarters of the Territory were located at Honolulu, in the Non-Self-Governing Territory of Hawaii, the Administering Authority stated, pending the selection of a suitable site within the Trust Territory. During its tenth session, the Trusteeship Council was informed that the Administration had made plans to locate the capital within the Trust Territory but a final decision had not yet been made; it would then be faced with the problem of constructing buildings and providing the services needed to house the capital. The Trusteeship Council recommended that the Administering Authority's efforts to secure the final enactment of an organic act for the Trust Territory and its decision to locate Administration headquarters within the Territory be expedited.

The Administering Authority further informed the Council that it was studying the question of applying to the Territory the provisions of all appropriate international treaties, conventions and agreements to which it was a party. Noting this, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would earnestly pursue this study and report on its progress.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

In its report, the Administering Authority stated that all powers of government and jurisdiction and final administrative responsibility over the Trust Territory are vested in the High Commissioner. He was subject to the direction of the United States Secretary of the Navy until 1 July 1951, when administrative responsibility for the Territory was transferred from the Department of the Navy to the Department of the Interior. The Administering Authority observed that the timely substitution of civilian personnel for Navy personnel was the greatest problem involved in the transfer. To maintain continuity as far as possible, the Navy had agreed to release personnel on active duty in the Territory for employment with the Department of the Interior; seven officers and 39 enlisted personnel had been transferred to the new administration. Between February and June 1951 the majority of the Naval staff at headquarters and in the field had been gradually replaced by civilians.

In order to replace the services rendered by Naval vessels and planes, a contract to service the Territory had been awarded to a shipping line, and eight service craft, thirty small craft and seven cargo vessels had been transferred by the Department of the Navy to the Department of the Interior. The latter were to form a fleet as soon as they could be provided with civilian crews. A contract for air transport had also been awarded to an airline and four Naval aircraft had been transferred for service in the Territory. All Navy communications stations in the Territory and their equipment had been transferred to the Department of the Interior. On 1 July 1951 Navy post offices had been replaced with civil post offices by the United States Post Office Department.

Printing Ofc., Washington, 1951, OPNAV P-22-100-M). For detailed discussions of this report in the Trusteeship Council, see Trusteeship Council Official Records, Tenth Session (27 February-1 April 1952); summaries of the observations of individual members are included in the Trusteeship Council's report to the Security Council (S/2599).

The United States Weather Bureau took over the operation of weather stations.

The special representative of the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council during its tenth session that the transfer of administration had been accomplished with no disruption of the various public services, and the Council noted this with satisfaction. The special representative also stated that the transfer had been discussed with the indigenous inhabitants and they had co-operated fully in all aspects of the operation.

The Territorial Administration was now fully staffed by civilians and operating under civilian authority, the special representative observed. The staff was receiving constant training and was provided with technical instructions. According to the annual report, the detailed work of administration continued to be carried out by five Civil Administration Units with headquarters at Saipan (Northern Marianas), Koror (Western Carolines—Palau District), Truk (Eastern Carolines), Ponape (Eastern Carolines) and Majuro (Marshall). In addition to a Civil Administrator at each of the District Headquarters, four representatives of the Civil Administrators were located at Tinian, Yap, Kusaic and Kwajalein, islands some distance from civil administration headquarters. A total of 1,539 indigenous inhabitants were employed by the Civil Administration Units and the Central Pacific Insular Constabulary in 1951, an increase of 452 over the number employed by Civil Administration Units in 1950. The highest positions held by indigenous employees included those of supervisor, clerk, technician, administrative assistant, accountant, interpreter, medical practitioner and school principal.

Reporting on developments in self-government at the municipal level during 1950-51, the Administering Authority stated that a continually increasing number of municipal officials were elected by popular vote with a secret ballot. The municipalities are responsible for local law enforcement, particularly with regard to sanitation and education, for levying, collecting and expending local taxes, and for keeping financial and vital statistics records. Each municipality has at least two officers, an executive head or magistrate, and a treasurer; frequently, a council of elders serves as an advisory body to the magistrate. The Administering Authority reported that, of the 116 municipalities, 20 still preferred their hereditary chiefs as magistrates, fifteen had magistrates appointed by the Administration after consultation with chiefs and elders, and 81, thirteen more than in 1950, had elected magistrates. The Trusteeship Council, after commending the Administering Authority, expressed the hope that it would intensify its efforts to replace the hereditary system by the electoral system.

At the district level, the Administering Authority reported, the Palau and Marshall Islands Congresses continued to function as advisory bodies during the year under review and a regional Congress had been established in the Ponape District. A Charter for a Congress for the Saipan District was being considered by the people of the District, but they had not yet reached agreement on the matter. Island problems at Yap, in the Palau District, are considered by a Council of Chiefs and an elected Young Men's Council. The Administering Authority stated that the congresses discussed such problems as taxes, land claims, trade and the prohibition of intoxicating liquors. It observed that these regional organizations were giving the people an opportunity to become acquainted with the problems of their immediate area and that they would be given additional powers when they had mastered the techniques and procedures of legislation.

The Administering Authority explained that its objective was to build regional government by perfecting first the governments in the municipalities. These, it stated, had been established on the foundation of existing indigenous governments. The Administering Authority's aim was to develop those indigenous governments by retaining, as it built, those customs that were desirable and substituting new ideas to supplant those that would retard democratic progress. When the municipalities had reached a unity of purpose and practice, they could unite under the already functioning regional congresses. Thus it was hoped to build towards regional government and eventually to a government of the entire Territory.

At its tenth session, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to foster local initiative in the different regions for the purpose of creating additional regional representative organizations by such means as the integration of the municipalities.

There is no legislative body for the whole Territory, but the Administering Authority reported that a preliminary step had been taken in this direction with the formation of a Legislative Advisory Committee to draft regulations, process laws and study legislation. The Committee was composed of five members appointed by the High Commissioner from among the heads of the Administration's Staff Departments. As soon as practicable, the Administering Authority stated, the Committee would be enlarged by adding indigenous members. It hoped that in time the Committee would consist entirely of indigenous members who would develop and carry out legislative proposals for the Trust Territory as a whole. The special representative subsequently informed the Trusteeship Council, during its tenth session, that in the last half of 1951 this Committee had been replaced by the High Commissioner's Council, comprising all the heads of the Staff Departments. The establishment of this Council, which might eventually become the nucleus of a central legislative body, was viewed with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council. The Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would earnestly consider associating the indigenous inhabitants directly in the work of the High Commissioner's Council as soon as possible, even if only in an advisory capacity.

According to the annual report, the judiciary includes five types of courts—Appeals, District, Superior, Justice and Community. All elements of the population are entitled to participate and officiate in any court. Only the last three Courts, however, had indigenous judges. In 1951, the four Superior Courts had eight indigenous and one non-indigenous judges, the six Justice Courts seven indigenous and five non-indigenous judges, and the 105 Community Courts 127 indigenous judges.

The Administering Authority reported that the position of Public Defender and Counselor was established in September 1950 and an experienced lawyer was appointed to the post. As Public Defender, he protects the legal rights of all inhabitants and defends the accused in serious criminal actions; as Counselor, he advises the inhabitants in civil matters of a legal nature, rendering the necessary legal aid and representing them in civil actions. During the tenth session of the Trusteeship Council, the special representative spoke of the difficulty of teaching the indigenous inhabitants the necessity of separating administrative and judicial powers. He stated that the Courts and the Public Defender had co-operated in instituting classes to instruct the inhabitants in court procedure and legal methods. These classes, he considered, had had much influence in increasing general understanding of judicial and legal processes. In time, it was anticipated, no magistrate would also be a judge.

The Trusteeship Council drew the Administering Authority's attention to the desirability of giving constant consideration to training indigenous inhabitants to sit on the higher tribunals.

It expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would study the means of giving indigenous judges more effective participation in the District Court and the Court of Appeals.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The annual report indicated that the economic situation of the Trust Territory had improved considerably. The Administering Authority attributed this improvement mainly to the increased production of copra, the main export, and the high price which it brought in the world market during 1950-51. Total exports increased from $1,644,180.94³³ in 1949-50 to $2,213,621.64 in 1950-51. The chief exports consisted of copra ($1,296,081.59), phosphates ($741,935), and trochus ($82,531.78). All except 2 per cent of the copra was exported to Japan; the remaining exports went to the United States and Guam. Imports, most of which originated in the United States, increased from $1,347,901.26 during 1949-50 to $2,223,174.13 during 1950-51.

The Administering Authority reported that the Island Trading Company, an Administration-sponsored project which is wholly owned by the Government of the Territory, continued to handle the major part of the import and export trade, but private trading companies, which were expected eventually to replace the Company, were being established and their development aided. These companies, including four established during 1950-51, were in operation at all Civil Administration centres and at Yap and Kwajalein.

Since copra forms the basis of the economy in most of the Territory, the Administering Authority stated, a price stabilization policy had been established, and the Island Trading Company had been made the sole exporter of copra. The price paid to producers increased from $90 per ton in February 1950 to $130 in February 1951. The Administering Authority noted that its stabilization policy had proved sound shortly afterwards when the world market collapsed, for, although the price received by the Island Trading Company declined by $140 per ton, the price paid to producers was reduced by only $15 per ton, effective 18 July 1951.

On 1 July 1950 the funds previously set aside to use in maintaining the price of copra when markets were low were placed in a special Copra Stabilization Fund in the Territory's treasury and the High Commissioner formally established the amount of future contributions in the form of taxes. The Island Trading Company began to pay a 25 per cent processing tax on all copra exported, of which 15 per cent became local revenue and the remaining 10 per cent was deposited in the stabilization fund. In October 1950 the processing tax was increased to 35 per cent and the portion of the fund was also increased to 15 per cent. With the decline in world prices payments to the fund were discontinued and the processing tax was reduced to 15 per cent.

The phosphate deposits on Angaur Island in the Palaus continued to be worked by the Japanese Phosphate Company of Angaur, which employed 370 Japanese and 40 indigenous workers. Exports during 1950-51, the Administering Authority reported, totalled 143,738 tons, an increase of 8,997 tons over the previous year. Under mining agreements concluded in 1949 and 1950, a 15 per cent ad valorem processing tax is paid to the Trust Territory, a severance fee of $2 a ton is paid into a trust fund for the permanent inhabitants of Angaur, and payments of $15,000 per year are made from this trust fund directly to the Angaurese. In addition, the Administering Authority stated, the trust fund provided during the year under review a special fund of $50,000 for the development of economic projects desired by the Angaurese and a $25,000 catastrophe relief fund. As of 30 June 1951, the trust fund amounted to $370,678.17.

The Administering Authority stated that no large-scale industrial developments were planned since there existed neither the raw materials, the machinery, nor the technical or skilled labour on which to base such developments at present. However, it was encouraging and assisting light industries, the most important of which was the production of handicraft. Boat building had become important in the Marshall Islands where surplus Navy boats were being converted to merchantmen at an indigenously operated boat-yard. One hundred ex-Navy hulls had been distributed through the Territory and inhabitants of all Districts were becoming proficient in converting them into fishing and cargo vessels.

The Administering Authority reported that it was annually spending considerable sums, totalling $93,000 during 1950-51, for research, surveys and experimental projects. The largest amount of capital for investment, however, was furnished by the Island Trading Company, which had set aside, as of 30 June 1951, $250,000 for economic development. Of this, the Administering Authority stated, $240,950 had been obligated for specific established projects—$150,000 to promote local shipping as an indigenous enterprise, $50,000 for cacao development and the balance for such purposes as the construction of a marine railway, the purchase of a copra drier, typhoon damage loans, and poultry, coffee, ramie, coir fibre and bee projects. In addition, the Company provided technical assistance and extended credit to indigenously operated trade stores.

Although the economic situation had improved, the Administering Authority stated that its primary objective of creating a self-sustaining economy for the Territory was far from fulfilment. It considered that even in the most favourable circumstances the islands could never be rich because the meagreness of their natural resources precluded anything except a subsistence economy.

The Trusteeship Council recognized the efforts so far made to develop the Territory's economy and recommended that the Administering Authority continue its efforts to develop the material resources so that the Territory might achieve a greater degree of economic advancement and self-sufficiency. It urged the diversification of agriculture. In this connexion, it noted that preparations had been made to introduce cacao culture in the Territory and expressed the hope that this would be expedited and would prove successful. The Administering Authority was also asked to continue to develop the transport services of the Territory in such a manner as effectively to replace the services formerly provided by the United States Navy.

Local revenue for the fiscal year 1951 amounted to $346,326.72, according to the Administering Authority's report. Trust Territory taxes consist of internal revenue taxes on cosmetics and tobacco, processing taxes on copra and phosphate and a head tax, imposed by the Administration but collected and expended by the municipalities, of $2 on each adult male. The internal revenue tax and the processing tax on copra, which constitute the principal Territorial taxes, amounted in 1951 to $46,486.93 and $186,389.90, respectively.

The amount made available for spending during 1951, the Administering Authority reported, totalled $2,492,704 and included $1,014,000 appropriated by the United States Congress, $421,326 approved by Congress for spending from past or current Territorial revenue, a special appropriation of $1,011,400 to meet the costs of the transfer of administration, and $45,978 derived from the processing tax on phosphate. In addition, it was estimated that materials and facilities provided by the United States Navy and not included in the Territorial budget cost $6,210,600.

With respect to land tenure in the Territory, the Administering Authority indicated that in-indigenous inhabitants held about 250 square miles of the total land area and the Administration had custody of 434 square miles, including public domain and land formerly controlled or owned by the Japanese and now under cognizance of the Alien Property Custodian. The Administering Authority reported its progress in the settlement of land ownership problems. It stated that during 1950-51 no additional public land had been acquired, some had been returned to former owners pending the adjudication of titles, and some releases of land had been made in the Saipan District. Two Land and Claims Regulations were issued to expedite the procedure for effecting the prompt return to owners of public and private lands controlled by the Administering Authority but no longer needed for government purposes. Under this procedure, Title Officers hold public hearings, determine ownership, and execute the release of land. Land title cases are adjudicated by the District Court which acknowledges customary usage.

The Administering Authority stated that land owners who do not regain land they formerly held are to be given appropriate land elsewhere or reimbursed and given the opportunity to purchase other lands. Owners of land required for military purposes are to be compensated for the use of their land. Where feasible, private land will be exchanged for public domain. Some public land is to be used to homestead landless persons, and some is to be developed by government-sponsored projects or under lease arrangements. During its tenth session, the Trusteeship Council was informed of further developments by the special representative, who stated that 10,240 acres of land listed in the annual report as public lands had been turned over to former owners in connexion with the adjudication of titles and that the balance of the public lands still held was being returned as readily as legal ownership could be established.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority reported that it was continuing to carry out and expand programmes for the development of self-government, economic self-sufficiency, medical care and education, all aimed at improving social conditions. It considered that these and the indigenous social systems provided the necessary guarantees for social welfare and social security. A staff of anthropologists continued to advise district officials. The standard of living continued to improve generally, the Administering Authority observed, and the people were enjoying better living conditions than they had ever known. Although it did not consider cost-of-living surveys practicable, the Administering Authority stated, the results of a contemplated survey of the Territory by an economist would give some indication of the correlation of the economic situation with wages and the cost and standard of living. The Trusteeship Council recommended that the Administering Authority supply further information concerning this study.

According to the annual report, social legislation promulgated during 1950-51 was directed toward the settlement of the land problem; the care and disposition of lepers; the pay and allowance for employees of the Public Health Department; the regulation of divorce, annulment and adoption; and the establishment of new interim regulations on criminal procedure and the judicial code and law enforcement. Because of the predominantly non-industrial character of the Territory, the need for trade unions, collective bargaining processes and the right to strike had not become evident. Of about 5,000 wage earners, the Administering Authority reported, one-third worked for the Administration and the rest engaged in light business enterprises, copra and handicraft production, public works and salvage operations for military or civilian contractors. Work periods and holidays are generally controlled by established indigenous customs. Government employment is based on a 40-hour week, and a policy of equal pay for equal work in a District applies to all inhabitants. The Administering Authority stated that it employs non-indigenous personnel only when the necessary professional or technical knowledge and experience cannot be found among the indigenous inhabitants; where necessary, it added, explicit regulations had been enacted to ensure that the indigenous inhabitants employed suffered no indignities and received a fair share of the desirable and undesirable jobs.

The Administering Authority affirmed that it recognized the equality of women in all matters and added that, with the encouragement of the Administration, women were demonstrating an increasing desire to participate in the management of local affairs. Noting this, the Trusteeship Council recommended that the Administering Authority continue to encourage such development.

Referring to the former inhabitants of Bikini who had been resettled on Kili Atoll in 1948, the Administering Authority assured the Council that it was keeping their situation under careful observation and assisting them with their economic and cultural problems. It noted that they were gradually adjusting psychologically and economically to their new home. The Administering Authority further stated that it had given them a deed in perpetuity to Kili, provided them with a new boat, and transferred to their ownership two islands within the nearby lagoon of Jaluit where they might establish warehouses for their copra and other trade goods.

Medical facilities within the Trust Territory, according to the Administering Authority's report, included five unit dispensaries and two sub-dispensaries with facilities for in-patients, 94 sub-dispensaries for out-patients and a leprosarium at Tinian with facilities for 100 lepers. Special or difficult cases continued to be treated at the Guam Memorial Hospital. During 1950-51, the Administering Authority reported, indigenous medical personnel totalled 382 and included 12 medical practitioners, 2 dental practitioners, 23 nurses, 136 midwives, 166 health aides, and 43 nurses aides. Non-indigenous medical personnel, including 14 medical and dental officers, totalled 52. In addition, 51 indigenous students were being trained as medical and dental practitioners at the Central Medical School at Suva, Fiji, and 13 students were being trained as nurses at the Guam Memorial Hospital; others were being trained at the Civil Administration Unit dispensaries and dental clinics as medical and dental assistants, health aides, dental aides and nurses aides.

In May 1951, the Administering Authority stated, the medical survey ship, U.S.S. Whidbey, terminated her four-year medical and dental survey of the entire Trust Territory during which it examined about 75 per cent of the total population. In order to continue adequate follow-up studies and to contribute to diagnostic aids and better medical care on the more remote islands, the Administering Authority had approved plans to instal X-ray equipment in four station ships engaged in making field trips in the Territory.

The Trusteeship Council expressed its satisfaction with the progress made in public health. It emphasized the need for continuing effort to improve and expand the health services, particularly with respect to tuberculosis, leprosy and filariasis. It also expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to accelerate the training of medical personnel. A statement by the Administering Authority indicating its willingness to share the results of its medical and other research was viewed with satisfaction by the Council, which recommended that the desirability of continuing research in tropical diseases be kept under constant review.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The objective of its basic educational policy, the Administering Authority stated, was to promote the educational advancement of the inhabitants by establishing a system of elementary and intermediate education, by facilitating the vocational and cultural advancement of the people and by encouraging students to pursue professional training. Educational expenditures for the fiscal year 1951 were reported at $385,509, an increase of about $9,000 over the preceding year. This sum did not include the salaries of elementary school teachers, paid from local municipal funds; nor did it include other expenses, amounting to $48,000, borne by the Administering Authority for such purposes as salaries of Naval personnel engaged in educational work and free material distributed by the Administration. Progress was reported in the school construction programme, twelve new schools having been completed.

The Education Department, located in Hawaii, is responsible for the administration of the public school system, according to the annual report. The Advisory Committee on Education for Guam and the Trust Territory makes recommendations concerning professional and technical phases of education and educational administration, screens candidates for teaching positions, and reviews the progress of the programme. Within the Trust Territory, Educational Administrators for each District, and for the island of Yap, direct educational affairs, implement policies, and are responsible for expanding and supervising educational programmes in their respective Districts. Each District also has an indigenous Superintendent of Elementary Schools who was reported to have taken over many of the educational tasks of the District.

The municipalities have primary responsibility for elementary public schools, which are staffed entirely by indigenous teachers; they received subsidies totalling $9,090 in 1951, an increase of $4,576 over 1950, to help pay teachers' salaries. The Administering Authority reported that, as of 30 June 1951, there were 138 elementary public schools throughout the Territory with a teaching staff of 246 and an enrolment of 6,609, indicating an increase of eight schools and 25 teachers and a decrease of 106 pupils as compared with the previous year. A total of 707 students, about 511 of whom had scholarships providing for free subsistence and money for incidentals, attended the six intermediate schools, staffed by 23 indigenous and 26 non-indigenous teachers. In addition to these public schools, the Administering Authority stated, there were 20 private elementary schools conducted by religious missions; these had an enrolment of 1,760 students and a staff of 83 teachers.

Public education beyond the intermediate level was offered at the Pacific Islands Teacher Training School at Truk, the Administering Authority reported. This included a school for training teachers, a school for training indigenous radio operators, and a school of general education, established in 1950 to provide secondary education. These had a total enrolment of 106 students and were staffed by three non-indigenous and five indigenous teachers. The special representative of the Administering Authority later informed the Trusteeship Council, during its tenth session, that emphasis had been shifted from teacher-training alone to secondary education generally. It was felt that this change was of some significance since the school, the name of which was changed to Pacific Islands Central School, would still advance the level of teachers and would now also fill the need for training in vocational and professional fields.

Students who meet the qualifications for American universities are eligible for scholarships from the Administering Authority, various universities and private sources. During the year under review, students at universities and high schools in the United States increased from four to seven; students at seminars in the Philippine Islands increased from five to 11; and students attending high schools on Guam at their own expense increased from 10 to 22.

The Trusteeship Council recommended that, in the absence of institutions of higher education within the Trust Territory, the Administering Authority should consider establishing an expanded scheme of scholarships to enable indigenous students to study abroad, particularly in law and business administration.

The Administering Authority reported that the knowledge of indigenous culture and the fostering of art continued to be actively encouraged. Archeological investigations were being conducted throughout the Territory as part of the programme of the Scientific Investigation of Micronesia. A fair to sponsor and popularize the production of indigenous articles in the Palau Islands was conducted by the Koror Intermediate School in 1951. An atoll music festival was staged by the intermediate school and Teacher Training School at Truk; in addition, sketches and paintings prepared by students at these schools were exhibited in schools throughout the United States. The first two volumes of Legends of Micronesia, prepared by the Education Department with the assistance of indigenous inhabitants, were published during the year under review.

The Trusteeship Council noted with satisfaction the Administering Authority's concern for the study of indigenous art and culture. With respect to indigenous art, it suggested that the free development of art in its creative form should be encouraged among the indigenous artists; an assurance along these lines was given by the Administering Authority and noted by the Council.

D. CONDITIONS IN TRUST TERRITORIES IN EAST AFRICA

Annual reports submitted by the Administering Authorities on the administration of Ruanda-Urundi, Tanganyika and the Trust Territory of Somaliland during 1951 were examined by the Trusteeship Council during the first part of its eleventh session, held from 3 June to 24 July 1952.³⁴

In 1951, the Council had sent to these Trust Territories a Visiting Mission composed of Enrique de Marchena (Dominican Republic) as Chairman and Mom Chao Dilokrit Kridakon (Thailand), G. R. Laking (New Zealand) and William I. Cargo (United States) as members.³⁵ Leaving United Nations Headquarters on 17 July, the Mission had proceeded, via Brussels, Belgium, and Leopoldville, Belgian Congo, to Ruanda-Urundi, arriving on 24 July. On 13 August, the Mission flew to Tanganyika, where it stayed until 15 September. It then spent four days in Nairobi, Kenya, where it discussed, with the Chairman and principal officials of the East Africa High Commission, the operation of the Inter-Territorial Organization, which involves Tanganyika. On 19 October, the Mission flew to Somaliland, leaving that Territory on 7 October. It then went to Europe, where it had conversations with officials of the Administering Authorities concerned and returned to New York on 17 October. During its stay in the Trust Territories, the Mission spoke with representatives of the people and with government officials, and visited hospitals, prisons, schools, agricultural and commercial establishments and other institutions. The Mission prepared separate reports on Ruanda-Urundi (T/948), Tanganyika (T/946 and Corr.1) and Somaliland (T/947 and Corr.1), and observations on the last two reports were submitted by Italy (T/1006) and the United Kingdom (T/977), as Administering Authorities of the Territories. Both Governments expressed their appreciation of the objective and realistic assessment of conditions and problems in Somaliland and Tanganyika, respectively. The reports of the Mission, as well as the observations of Italy and the United Kingdom, were considered by the Council concurrently with its examination of the annual reports of the Administering Authorities.

By resolution 464(XI), adopted on 22 July 1952 by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention, the Trusteeship Council decided that, when examining matters relating to the three Trust Territories in the future, it would continue to take into account the observations and conclusions of the Mission and the relevant observations of the Administering Authorities. The latter were asked to consider most carefully the conclusions of the Mission as well as the comments made thereon by members of the Trusteeship Council.

In examining the annual report on Somaliland, the Council also took into account the report of the United Nations Advisory Council for the year ended 31 March 1952. Observations (T/1012) of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) concerning Tanganyika were considered by the Council in connexion with its examination of educational conditions in that Territory.

In 1952, during its tenth and eleventh sessions, the Council dealt with 23 petitions concerning Ruanda-Urundi, 61 concerning Tanganyika and 215 concerning the Trust Territory of Somaliland.³⁶ It adopted resolutions on 183 petitions which it examined individually; some of these related exclusively to personal matters, others also raised more general questions, many of which, the Council informed the petitioners, had already been and would continue to be examined in connexion with its annual examination of conditions in the Territories. Of the remaining 116 petitions, a few were anonymous and the balance were wholly concerned with general problems on which the Council had taken decisions or made recommendations in the past. In accordance with a new procedure³⁷ adopted during the Council's eleventh session, no resolutions were passed on these petitions, but the problems dealt with were considered by the Council during its examination of conditions in the Territory concerned.

In addition to the consideration of petitions in the Trusteeship Council, representatives of the Wa-Meru tribe of Tanganyika and of political parties from Somaliland were heard in the General Assembly.

A brief description of conditions in each of the three Trust Territories in East Africa, based on the annual reports and the reports of the Visiting Mission, is given below, together with an account of some of the more important questions raised in petitions, the conclusions and recommendations of the Trusteeship Council, and the General Assembly's consideration of the problem of the Wa-Meru and of conditions in the Trust Territory of Somaliland.

1. Ruanda-Urundi, Administered by Belgium

This Territory, covering a total area of 54,172 square kilometres, is the most densely populated in Africa. On 3 January 1952, according to the Administering Authority's annual report,³⁸ the non-indigenous population numbered 4,325 Europeans (3,733 in 1950), 1,498 Asiatics (1,896 in 1950), 100 non-indigenous Africans (68 in 1950), and 1,370 half-castes (1,207 in 1950). The indigenous population living under the authority of chiefs was estimated in 1950 at 3,904,779. In addition, in 1951 there were 62,261 indigenous inhabitants living in extra-tribal areas (centres extra-coutumiers) who were not subject to the authority of chiefs (53,015 in 1950). The capital of the Territory is Usumbura.

The indigenous inhabitants of Ruanda-Urundi are known by that term (indigènes du Ruanda-Urundi), which has not been defined by law. Their legal status was determined by the Act of 21 August 1925, which united the Trust Territory administratively with the adjacent Colony of the Belgian Congo.³⁹ Article 5 of that Act provides that rights granted to the inhabitants of the Belgian Congo by the laws of that Territory extend, subject to the qualifications contained therein, to persons under the jurisdiction of Ruanda-Urundi. Commenting on this situation, the Visiting Mission sent to the area in 1951 observed (T/948) that, in view of the special status of Ruanda-Urundi as a Trust Territory, the Administering Authority should consider defining the status of the inhabitants more precisely. Their rights, the Mission stated, should derive from the legal status of Ruanda-Urundi and not from rights enjoyed by the indigenous inhabitants of the Belgian Congo.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

Executive power over the Trust Territory is vested in the Governor of Ruanda-Urundi, who also bears the title of Vice-Governor-General of the Belgian Congo. He is assisted by a Provincial Commissioner and the staff of various administrative departments. Two Residents, one for Ruanda and one for Urundi, and District Administrators are responsible for local administration. Under them, indigenous authorities are responsible for indigenous administration and for numerous functions prescribed by law. A Mwami, or king, chosen according to Native custom and invested by the Governor, heads each of the two indigenous states (pays)—Ruanda and Urundi. Each pays is divided into chiefdoms (51 in Ruanda and 36 in Urundi) and sub-chiefdoms (628 in Ruanda and 499 in Urundi) under chiefs and sub-chiefs who are appointed by the Mwami in accordance with customary law and invested, respectively, by the Governor and Residents.

Ruanda-Urundi has no legislative body. It is subject to Acts of the Belgian Parliament, decrees of the Belgian Crown and ordinances of the Governor-General of the Belgian Congo. Decrees and ordinances which do not expressly state that they are applicable to Ruanda-Urundi do not apply there, however, unless the Governor makes them applicable. A Council of the Vice-Government-General, a 22-member advisory body established in 1947, meets for a few days each year to examine budgetary proposals and consider questions submitted to it by the Governor. Until 1949, when the two Bami (plural of Mwami) were made ex officio members, the Council was composed exclusively of Europeans. In 1951, an African priest was appointed as a full member. These three members and two European religious authorities represent more particularly the interests of the indigenous inhabitants.

The Administering Authority reported that the plan for the reform of the indigenous political organization, which had been considered earlier by the Trusteeship Council,⁴⁰ had been placed before the Colonial Council in Belgium in 1951. This plan, as contained in a draft decree, was designed to make the customary councils for each of the two pays, the chiefdoms and sub-chiefdoms more representative and to give them increased powers. In addition, a council was to be organized at the district level to deal with all questions of common concern to the localities making up the district. These various councils would have to be consulted on all matters of concern to their respective districts and the consent of the councils of the pays and of the chiefdoms would be required, in many cases, to validate decisions of the Mwami or the chiefs acting within the limits of their powers as recognized by the decree.

It was also proposed to extend the powers of the indigenous authorities, particularly in certain matters formerly reserved to the European authorities: demarcation of the boundaries of the chiefdoms and sub-chiefdoms, power to ban residence in certain areas, decisions as to the number and salaries of the police, determination of the agricultural programme and of individual work programmes, redemption of customary levies, imposition or special taxes, approval of expenditure, etc

A permanent deputation to the council of the pays would be responsible for supervising the councils of the chiefdoms and sub-chiefdoms and for enforcing decisions and regulations made by the Mwami with the consent of the council of the pays.

The Visiting Mission stated that it had the impression that there was scarcely any contact between the indigenous authorities of Ruanda and of Urundi, and that, according to the information at its disposal, the political reform plan contained no provisions concerning relations between the two pays. The Mission emphasized the need for fostering collaboration and close relationship between the people and institutions of the two pays to facilitate the evolution toward a common structure. It suggested that the emphasis placed upon the development of the indigenous political structure in the political reform plan might be balanced by giving comparable attention to the development of a central legislative body, necessarily of limited competence at the beginning. In this connexion, the Mission expressed the opinion that the Council of the Vice-Government-General, in its present form, was of little political significance and could not satisfactorily exercise powers of legislation for the Territory as a whole without substantial changes in its composition involving a clear relationship to indigenous institutions in the two pays. Pending further developments of the political institutions of the two pays and a careful study of the relationship between them and a central legislative body, the Council, with increased African representation, could usefully be retained as an advisory organ and could provide indigenous persons with experience in the processes of government.

During the eleventh session of the Trusteeship Council, the special representative of the Administering Authority maintained that the composition of the Council of the Vice-Government-General had been studied by the Administration with a view to making the interests of the indigenous inhabitants predominant. Their interests, he stated, were protected much more effectively by the officials, the magistrates and the missionaries than by themselves. Moreover, at the present time, few Africans were prepared to sit on the Council. Their number would be increased progressively as and when possible, but to replace certain members of the Council by Africans would be a grave mistake. Considering that the two Bami, the two Residents and the religious authorities were members of the Council, he stated, he could not see how the institutions of the two pays could have been better taken into consideration.

The Trusteeship Council welcomed the important reforms proposed in the indigenous political structure. It also noted with interest the value of the Council of the Vice-Government-General as a means of affording the indigenous inhabitants experience in the processes of government and recommended that the Administering Authority consider expanding this Council's membership in order to ensure the representation and participation of all important indigenous interests.

According to the annual report, the central Administration employed 120 Europeans in 1951, as against 131 in 1950. The number of Europeans employed in the local Administration in Ruanda rose from 127 in 1950 to 156 in 1951, and in Urundi from 146 to 201. In addition, in 1951, the civil service included in the permanent staff 493 (451 in 1950) literate Africans in subordinate posts such as book-keepers and clerks. The Administration also maintained a corps of 298 (282 in 1950) indigenous police, and many other Africans were employed as assistant hospital attendants, labourers and so on. The Visiting Mission reported that the possibilities of Africans qualifying for responsible positions in the Administration, as suggested in the past by the Trusteeship Council, depended upon their opportunities to prepare themselves for such positions, and those possibilities were at present very limited. It also stated that it had received complaints from indigenous inhabitants in the central Administration that the salaries were inadequate. With respect to the indigenous organization, the Mission considered that, although ordinarily the European Administration consulted the Bami and some chiefs on measures affecting the indigenous inhabitants, the indigenous authorities were generally restricted to a very limited field of action and, except in the exercise of their judicial functions, occupied a subordinate position. The Mission felt that the importance of service under the traditional indigenous organization depended on the degree of development of local government. It concluded that, to meet the increase in the responsibilities of local government which would accompany the Territory's political development, the services of better qualified officials would be required. It was, therefore, very important to attract more educated Africans into local government employment. The Mission considered that the Administration should take steps to put the employment of Africans by the indigenous organizations on a regular basis, with a view to improving rates of pay and regularizing other conditions of employment. This, it felt, might open the way in due course to the creation of a unified service for local government employees, offering the possibility of interchange of personnel between the various organs of local government.

During the eleventh session of the Trusteeship Council, the special representative stated that the Mission had not examined in the correct light the question of giving Africans posts in the Belgian Administration. As long as the Territory was under Trusteeship, he stated, the administrative personnel was naturally Belgian and it was normal that the indigenous inhabitants should have only modest jobs. Referring to the indigenous organization, which he stated was parallel with the Belgian Administration, he expressed the opinion that the future independence of the Territory should be achieved as the result of the progressive transfer of powers from the non-indigenous to the indigenous authorities and not by the introduction of indigenous persons into the Belgian Administration. The latter method, he felt, would merely serve to perpetuate the co-existence of two Administrations and divide the indigenous officials and, perhaps, set them in opposition. Moreover, important posts were much more numerous in the indigenous Administration than in the central Administration. It was not unusual to see officials with posts in the central Administration give up those posts for more interesting positions as chiefs or sub-chiefs.

The Trusteeship Council drew the Administering Authority's attention to the views expressed in the Council concerning the existing duality of the administrative structure and the difficulty which it appeared to present to the development of a territorial government in which the indigenous inhabitants might play a full part; it invited the Administering Authority to include in its next annual report a full explanation of its policy in this matter and of the means by which the difficulties involved in it might be overcome.

The Council further recommended that the Administering Authority continue to develop opportunities for indigenous inhabitants to enter the public service. Such measures might include the granting of scholarships for study abroad and should be designed particularly to fit the indigenous inhabitants for higher posts in the Administration. In this connexion, the Council invited the Administering Authority to review the salary scales for Administration employees in order to determine their adequacy from the points of view of both the prevailing cost of living and the desirability of encouraging the most suitable persons to enter the public service. It asked that information on this matter be included in the next annual report.

In 1951, according to the annual report, a third attempt was made to introduce an electoral system for the selection of members of councils in the centres extra-coutumiers. The Administering Authority described in detail the local Administration's preparations for the election of six councillors in the centres extra-coutumiers of Usumbura. In spite of the preparatory publicity, only one candidate came forward spontaneously and the Administration had to designate seventeen others. Eight days before the elections, only 25 persons out of a total population of 6,000 had voluntarily collected electors' cards. On the basis of information it received, the Administration considered that most of the population felt that the inhabitants of the centres were not mature enough to take part in elections and that the councillors should simply be designated by the Administration. It concluded that any hopes of enlisting the interest of the indigenous inhabitants in political life were premature. The Visiting Mission recognized the difficulties inherent in the development of an electoral system, and considered that the Administration was to be commended for its efforts. It added that, obviously, the goal of popular representation could not be achieved by a single isolated measure; what was required was a comprehensive plan, including a series of steps designed to eliminate the remaining obstacles to the political evolution of those living in the centres extra-coutumiers, and to extend the measures to those living under the traditional system. The special representative informed the Trusteeship Council that the Administration intended to continue its efforts, and that the political reorganization of the chiefdoms would allow it to accustom the indigenous people to a democratic method of electing members to councils. It was not the organization of the elections that was difficult, but the formation of a political conscience in the indigenous inhabitants.

The Trusteeship Council expressed regret that the further effort to introduce the electoral principle had not been received with sufficient interest by the indigenous inhabitants concerned. It commended to the consideration of the Administering Authority the Mission's views on the general problem of introducing electoral methods and invited it to consider measures which might be taken to create a public opinion favourable to electoral experiments on an increasingly wide scale.

The Mission reported an encouraging trend in the indigenous judicial system in that it was becoming more and more common for the chiefs, who were ex officio presidents of the chiefdom courts, to be replaced by deputies appointed for the purpose. The Mission considered that the Administering Authority should intensify its efforts to secure genuine separation between executive and judicial functions, in the indigenous as well as in the European jurisdiction, and to ensure the independence of the judiciary. The Mission's attention was drawn to the length of the period of detention for persons awaiting trial or the hearing of appeals against conviction, and complaints on this subject were included in two petitions examined by the Trusteeship Council at its tenth session—from Chaka Selemani (T/Pet.3/40 and Add.1-3) and Joseph Marie Ngwela (T/Pet.3/43 and Add.1). The Administering Authority explained (T/943 and Add.1 and T/C.2/SR.2 and 6) that the proceedings in these cases had been held up pending the receipt of a report from a handwriting expert in the Belgian Congo, and that steps had been taken to avoid excessively long periods of trial detention in the future. By resolutions 439(X) and 442(X) of 31 March 1952, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would take all appropriate action to limit the duration of detention pending trial to a minimum and to expedite the obtaining of necessary expert advice.

It appeared to the Mission that knowledge of the right of petition was not very widespread in the Territory; several indigenous inhabitants who approached the Mission expressed the fear that, by stating their views or grievances, they might expose themselves to direct or indirect reprisals. The Mission did not consider that those fears had any real foundation, but believed that they should be dispelled by appropriate efforts on the part of the Administration to acquaint all the inhabitants of the Territory with their right of petition under the Trusteeship Agreement.

During the eleventh session of the Trusteeship Council, the special representative of the Administering Authority pointed out (T/PV.421 and 423) that the Administration had undertaken to co-operate fully with the General Assembly and the Council in the fulfilment of all their functions, and notably of those with respect to petitions. It regarded it as a duty to transmit petitions where necessary and to inform the inhabitants of their right of petition. But it felt that it would be excessive to carry out propaganda in favour of this right. The Administering Authority considered that the natural recourse for the indigenous inhabitants was to the Belgian Administration and that recourse by means of petition to the Council should remain exceptional, comparable to a court of appeal. It assured the Council, however, that every indigenous inhabitant had the right to address himself directly to the Council without having had recourse in the first instance either to the local authorities or to the Administering Authority.

The Council, expressing concern at the impression gained by the Visiting Mission that the right of petition was not fully understood or effectively exercised in the Territory, welcomed the assurance given by the Administering Authority that no obstacles were placed in the way of indigenous inhabitants in exercising this acknowledged right. It urged the Administering Authority to take appropriate steps to ensure that the place of petitions in the International Trusteeship System was fully understood and recommended that these efforts be co-ordinated with the dissemination of general information about the United Nations.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The economic situation of Ruanda-Urundi in 1951 was described in the annual report as very favourable. Economic trends in recent years had been characterized by a growing increase in production, exports and imports, and by a great development in communications and the growth of new activities. The proposed Ten-Year Plan for the economic and social development of Ruanda-Urundi was approved and published in 1951 by the Ministry of the Colonies. This Plan, it was stated, called for a total investment outlay of 3,670 million francs⁴¹ and was to be put into operation progressively, beginning in 1952, with funds from an extraordinary budget to be voted by the Belgian Parliament. The Administering Authority annexed a summary of the Plan to its annual report but emphasized that it was not its intention that the Plan should be discussed by the Trusteeship Council when the annual report for 1951 was examined. It added that future annual reports would enable the Council to appraise the progress made in implementing the Plan.

Commenting on the considerable progress achieved in the Territory during 1951, the Trusteeship Council noted the publication of this Plan with particular interest.

Due to the exceptional density and growth of the population, Ruanda-Urundi has a most acute demographic problem. Food supply has been the most urgent problem, for the land is overworked and insufficiently productive owing to the effects of soil deterioration, unfavourable climatic conditions and water shortage. Thus, the 1951 Visiting Mission reported that, despite the large production of foodstuffs, the Territory lived under the constant threat of food shortage or famine. The Administering Authority, however, stated that the increase in the production of foodstuffs, in conjunction with the use of a network of roads (8,332 kilometres), and the installation of food warehouses had considerably mitigated the danger of famine.

The Administering Authority reported further increases during the year in the land made available for cultivation through the drainage of marshlands, irrigation and anti-erosion measures. The total area under cultivation, it was estimated, increased from 1,318,014 hectares in 1950, to 1,337,606 hectares, or 24.7 per cent of the Territory's land area, in 1951. Of this, 1,299,000 hectares, or 97.2 per cent of the area under cultivation, were used by the local population for growing foodstuffs, production of which rose from 3,783,300 tons in 1950 to 5,160,750 tons in 1951. The annual report also showed increases over 1950 in the amount of cash crops produced by the indigenous population, as follows: arabica coffee beans, from 15,675 to 17,500 tons; cotton seed, from 3,220 to 3,835 tons; palm oil, 550 to 1,265 tons; and castor oil, 2,390 to 2,960 tons. Agricultural production by non-indigenous enterprises, amounting in 1951 to 129 tons of arabica coffee, 287 tons of robusta coffee, 934 tons of pyrethrum, 172 tons cinchona bark and 122 tons of sisal, had not changed appreciably since 1950 according to the report.

It was recognized in the Ten-Year Plan that the development of agriculture, as well as of stock-raising, was dominated by the problems of overpopulation and over-grazing. On the assumption that each family needed from two to five hectares of cultivable land and that each head of cattle needed over three hectares of pasturage, 145,000 of the 780,000 families in Ruanda-Urundi, and 440,000 of the 970,000 head of cattle could not be maintained.

Among the measures contemplated under the Ten-Year Plan to remedy the situation, which was regarded as serious, were programmes for land conservation, the adaptation of indigenous agriculture and the strengthening of the existing anti-famine campaign, the establishment of complementary zones, some for the more intensive cultivation of food crops and others for industrial crops, the redistribution of the population within Ruanda-Urundi or into neighbouring territories and the establishment of indigenous agricultural communities. The Ten-Year Plan envisaged increases of 10 per cent in the area of cultivated land, 31 per cent in the production of indigenous food crops and 155 per cent in the production of indigenous export crops. It was expected that the realization of the agricultural development programme would be facilitated by scientific research directed by the Institut de la recherche scientifique en Afrique centrale and the Institut national pour l'étude agronomique du Congo Beige.

The Visiting Mission stated that the Administration should be commended for its extensive use of research. It described the programme for the redistribution of the population as a bold plan, particularly by the establishment of indigenous agricultural communities. The Mission had been struck by the complete absence of villages. The dispersal of the population in groups of four or five families, with huts hidden among the plantations, was considered by the Administering Authority the greatest and most insidious obstacle to civilizing influences, and it was expected that the regrouping programme would benefit agricultural development.

To reduce the number of cattle to a rational level, according to the Ten-Year Plan, 170,000 head of cattle should be eliminated annually for nine years. At present, the number slaughtered and exported is no more than 100,000, or about 20,000 less than the annual natural increase. The cattle were described as generally undernourished and diseased. They are regarded exclusively as a sign of wealth and social and political prestige by the indigenous inhabitants, who use every form of obstruction to prevent the elimination of old and diseased beasts. Under a complex customary system of contracts known as ubuhake, cattle are handed down in exchange for services from shebuja (lord or master) to umugaragu (client or serf) and similarly redistributed by the latter in a pyramidal system extending through all levels of society, from the Mwami to the peasant. The Administering Authority expressed the hope that one of the principal means of reducing the cattle population would be the abolition of the ubuhake. This, it was noted by the Mission, had been recommended by the indigenous authorities themselves. As a result of the termination of the ubuhake contracts and the attendant apportionment of the cattle between the various shebuja and abagaragu (plural of umugaragu), it was expected that the importance attached to the possession of cattle would gradually diminish and that the lack of pasture land and the services of farm labour would oblige the individual owners to reduce their herds by selling inferior animals. Under the Ten-Year Plan, the excess livestock would be purchased by an indigenous co-operative organization and delivered to a processing plant established and financed by the co-operative but operated by a European firm, the profits to be divided between the factory operator and the members of the co-operative. In addition, the Ten-Year Plan proposed a programme for selecting and improving livestock, improving grazing grounds, reforming the conditions of stock-breeding, launching anti-disease and anti-parasite campaigns, and planning animal husbandry for the production of meat, milk and milk products and skins.

The Visiting Mission considered the programme devised by the Administration an ingenious attempt to solve the cattle problem; no progress, it observed, was possible unless that problem was solved. It felt that, though a solution would naturally entail social disturbance and possibly some hardship to sections of the population, those objections must be balanced against the resultant benefits to the Territory and its inhabitants generally.

The Trusteeship Council, recalling the importance which it had previously attached to the social and economic problems arising from the indigenous ownership of livestock, noted with interest the measures developed to deal with the situation and urged the Administering Authority to put these measures into effect without delay.

The Administering Authority's report for 1951 stated that the indigenous inhabitants owned about 36,000 square kilometres of land; the Government owned 129 square kilometres; and the non-indigenous inhabitants owned 92 square kilometres and held 126 square kilometres on lease. In 1949 the Administering Authority had decided to limit the granting of agricultural concessions to 5 hectares for residential purposes and the following year it announced that the granting of concessions to non-indigenous inhabitants even over such small areas had been temporarily suspended. These decisions had been commended by the Trusteeship Council. The Council had considered it of prime importance that uninhabited and uncultivated lands should, as a rule, be reserved for the indigenous population and had urged that the restrictions on the settlement of agricultural land by non-indigenous persons be maintained. The Ten-Year Plan stated, however, that, though opportunities were few, non-indigenous settlement for agriculture and stock-breeding was warranted, chiefly because of its educational value to the local inhabitants. The Plan envisaged:

(1) the possibility of granting agricultural concessions of not more than 50 hectares in densely populated districts, somewhat larger concessions in sparsely populated districts and up to 200 hectares in unpopulated areas; (2) the granting of long (30-year) leases on land suitable only for forestry and intended for afforestation; (3) the establishment of model stock farms of a maximum area of 200 hectares, at the rate of two such farms for each of the six great pastoral areas; and (4) the granting of small concessions of not more than five hectares for use as nurseries and market gardens, and for horticulture, poultry farming and small-scale stock-farming.

The Mission recognized the contribution made by settlers to the Territory's economic and agricultural development and the value of their example in educating the indigenous inhabitants. However, in the light of the special problem of land in relation to population, intensified as that problem was by the cattle question, the Mission reached three general conclusions with respect to land settlement:

(1) It considered that responsibility for the proposed model stock farms might best be assumed by the Administration or by the Institut national pour l'étude agronomique du Congo Beige, possibilities suggested in the Ten-Year Plan.

(2) The Administration should also take primary responsibility for afforestation to ensure that the maximum benefit accrued to the indigenous inhabitants. In view of the vital need for afforestation on as large a scale as possible, however, the Mission felt that planting or the supervision of planting might in some instances be entrusted, with proper safeguards, to the present settlers; but it did not believe that the problems of developing the Territory's forest resources were such as to warrant new European settlement.

(3) With respect to the possibilities of new land concessions in certain sparsely populated areas, the Mission considered that the admission of new European settlers should not be considered until an exhaustive examination had been made of the possibility of developing these areas by other means; it appeared to the Mission that concessions to set up a proposed sugar industry were justified.

During the eleventh session of the Trusteeship Council, the special representative of the Administering Authority stated that the Administration felt that it must insist on the advantage to the Territory offered by the presence of settlers as well as on the organization of certain model farms and the granting of concessions for afforestation. He pointed out that the land occupied by non-indigenous inhabitants in 1951—218 square kilometers—was really insignificant in proportion to the total land area.

With respect to mining, the Administering Authority reported that since 1 June 1950, when the general right to prospect was restored, the Territory had embarked upon a new phase of intensive prospecting. Further intensified exploration and prospecting was provided for under the Ten-Year Plan. According to the annual report, mining output during 1951 was valued at 270,097,670 francs and comprised 0.17 tons of gold, 2,610,838 tons of cassiterite, 277,494 tons of wolframite and 161,865 tons of mixed ores. The output in 1950 was valued at 180,600,540 francs. The Administering Authority stated that the amounts payable for mine occupancy included personal taxes, prospecting fees, survey charges, operating and occupancy duties and company income taxes. These amounted to 24,140,745.40 francs in 1950 and 49,840,453.05 francs in 1951; the 1951 figures were not final and did not include income taxes. In addition, the Territory derived income from the securities it held in mining companies. The Visiting Mission reported that it had obtained no particulars concerning the relation between the contribution of mining companies to the public treasury and those companies' profits. However, an assurance by the Administering Authority that it would include such information, previously requested by the Trusteeship Council, in its next annual report was welcomed by the Council.

The Administering Authority reported that there were 814 non-indigenous industrial plants in 1951 as compared with 782 in 1950; most of them were engaged in either construction or agricultural and related industries. In addition, there were 226 indigenous plants, of which 170 were building undertakings operated by chiefdoms.

The importance of industrialization to Ruanda-Urundi was stressed in the Ten-Year Plan. It was envisaged that the Territory could specialize in manufacturing, using raw materials produced in the vast neighbouring territories where there was a manpower shortage, and import the necessary food and other goods it required. Under the Plan, it was proposed to set up an office to promote, through processing, an increase in the value of indigenous produce and stock-breeding and to develop the Territory's internal and external markets. The formation of indigenous co-operatives was also planned. The first two of these, which were consumers' co-operatives, were about to begin operations, the Administering Authority reported, and others, for artisans, cotton and food producers, were about to be formed. The establishment of a stock-raisers' association, cotton, coffee and oil producers' co-operatives, peach-growers' co-operatives, hotels and public transport undertakings were also contemplated under the Ten-Year Plan. According to the Plan, the prevailing economic conditions in the Territory would appear to favour three principal industries—the processing of meat and animal by-products, manufacture of fertilizers and the production of sugar. In addition, the possibility of developing or establishing local industries for the processing and treatment of coffee, cotton, palm oil and palmetto nuts, wheat, fibres and other produce was contemplated.

The Plan, it was stated, relied on the electrification of Ruanda-Urundi to stimulate industrialization; for this purpose, it was planned to harness the hydroelectric resources of the Ruzizi River, which has a potential of nearly 600,000 horsepower. The Administering Authority furnished the Trusteeship Council with a full text of the agreement for the establishment of a syndicate for the electrification of part of the Kivu province in the Belgian Congo and of Ruanda-Urundi. The Council expressed its appreciation of this action and noted that the Trust Territory would benefit considerably from the enterprise.

The Visiting Mission, noting that the Ten-Year Plan foresaw a threefold increase, in ten years, in the indigenous consumption of cotton fabrics, expressed the opinion that the Administration should do its utmost to promote the establishment of a cotton textile factory in the Territory. During the Trusteeship Council's eleventh session, however, the special representative of the Administering Authority stated that this was considered premature as current local needs could be met by duty-free imports from a nearby factory in the Belgian Congo. Should the Trust Territory's needs increase, he added, the Administration would reconsider the matter.

In its annual report, the Administering Authority stated that the indigenous inhabitants were playing an increasing part in the economic life of Ruanda-Urundi. It pointed, inter alia, to the progressive increase in indigenous internal trading establishments, from 21 in 1948 to 647 in 1951, when 37 per cent of such trade was in indigenous hands.

The Visiting Mission, on the other hand, was of the opinion that the indigenous inhabitants had only a minor role in the economy and that they should participate more widely and with a greater measure of responsibility. In this connexion, the Mission noted with satisfaction a statement to the same effect in the Ten-Year Plan and understood that the Administration's policy was to encourage such participation. It drew attention, however, to observations in the Ten-Year Plan on the part to be played by European settlers and the indigenous inhabitants and quoted the following passage from the Plan:

"The development of the non-indigenous settlements would be hindered by the widespread organization of indigenous processing co-operatives, which would, moreover, have to enlist the services of European employees. Under present conditions, the best way to distribute profits equitably and to make the best use of skills is to have indigenous co-operatives working hand in hand with non-indigenous industrial settlers, the former responsible for production and the latter for processing."

The Mission stated that it did not propose to draw far-reaching conclusions from this isolated passage, which seemed to assign to the indigenous inhabitants a restricted role in the economic life of the Territory.

The Administering Authority explained that it was not its intention to reserve a position in the economy for non-indigenous inhabitants. If they appeared to monopolize certain functions it was for the reason that they alone could exercise them, either because of their training or on account of their financial means. It added that the indigenous inhabitants, through education and training, were gradually becoming more capable of assuming a fuller part in the economy.

The Trusteeship Council noted the evidence of increasing participation by the indigenous inhabitants in the economy, including the increased number of indigenous trading centres and the steps taken to organize indigenous co-operatives. It expressed the hope that, as these and other measures became more widespread and more firmly established, steps would be taken to assist the inhabitants to participate in other aspects of the economy, such as the development of secondary industries, as part of the economic activity being stimulated by the Ten-Year Plan.

Territorial revenue for 1951, according to the annual report, totalled provisionally 490 million francs, including 110 million francs from indigenous taxes (poll, polygamy and cattle) and 189 million francs from customs duties. Revenue for the year had been estimated at 321 million francs and expenditure at 364 million francs. These figures in the ordinary budget included neither the budgets of the indigenous treasuries of the two pays and the chiefdoms, which had an aggregate revenue of 60 million francs and expenditure of 55 million francs in 1951, nor the 1951 programme of the Fonds du bien-être indigène, which anticipated an expenditure of 50 million francs. Expenditure under the extraordinary budget for 1951 was estimated at 161 million francs, chiefly for roads, ports and miscellaneous constructions. It was to be financed by a reimbursable non-interest-bearing advance from Belgium which would raise the public debt of Ruanda-Urundi to 320 million francs.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, the number of indigenous workers in permanent employment rose from 51,948 in 1947 to 81,190 in 1951—24,434 in industry, 10,738 in agriculture, 10,002 in commerce, 15,195 in religious missions, 14,344 in the administrative services and 6,477 in other occupations. In addition, 46,266 indigenous workers were in non-permanent employment in the Trust Territory in 1951. A continued reduction was reported in the number of seasonal workers emigrating to neighbouring territories; they totalled 37,588 in 1951. Because of the accompanying social dislocations, the Visiting Mission felt that large-scale seasonal migration of labour from Ruanda-Urundi was not desirable.

Legislation governing indigenous labour within the Territory is based on the Decree of 16 March 1922, which sets forth the rights and duties of master and Native worker, employee and domestic help. The Administering Authority reported that in 1951, 1,246 indigenous workers were sentenced to imprisonment for desertion from work or dereliction of duty; 288 were sentenced to fines on the same counts and three were acquitted. In 1950 the figures had been respectively: 974; 206; and 87. In 1951 thirteen employers were ordered to pay fines for various infringements of labour contracts. The Trusteeship Council, which had in 1950 recommended the abolition, as soon as practicable, of penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts, was informed at its eleventh session in June 1952 that a draft decree was being studied which would reduce the number of such cases.

In its report, the Administering Authority stated that a labour inspector was appointed in 1951 to supervise the strict observance of conditions of employment. Although trade union legislation existed, the Administering Authority reported, no indigenous trade union had yet requested recognition. Three Commissions had been set up in 1949 to develop among the workers and their families a better knowledge of their interests and social duties and a feeling of responsibility towards their work; each Commission had met twice during 1951. The Visiting Mission considered the presence of indigenous representatives on these Commissions of great importance from the educational point of view. Due to the lack of training and trade union experience of the indigenous representatives and their generally reticent nature, however, the Mission felt that the burden of protecting the interests of indigenous workers undoubtedly rested with the Administration's representatives. It observed that trade union activity should be further developed and workers should be given more encouragement to study questions affecting their own interests.

The Administering Authority indicated that a survey started in 1951 showed a notable improvement in the standard of living; this was corroborated by an increased volume of purchases at trading depots. Daily wage rates at Usumbura in 1951 averaged ten to twelve francs for a labourer and seven to ten francs for an agricultural worker; for skilled workers they were higher—40 to 100 francs for a driver and 25 to 100 francs for a typist, for example. The Mission considered that the wage level was still low and expressed its conviction that further increases were essential for the Territory's advancement. It had the impression that there was a tendency to favour the maintenance of an economy based on low wages and to justify the existing wage level on the ground of the low productivity of indigenous workers. While the Mission recognized that a considerable increase in labour productivity was needed, it felt that greater incentives should be given to workers to acquire new skills and fit themselves for more responsible and better paid occupations. According to the Ten-Year Plan, the existing wage level was economically justified in view of the generally poor quality of the work, but was not justified from a social viewpoint. The Government's policy, it was stated, was to advance gradually towards a minimum living wage and to go beyond that when the quality of the manpower had improved. The Administering Authority indicated that in 1951, at Usumbura the statutory minimum wage was 66 per cent of the minimum living wage and, in the interior, 64 per cent of the minimum living wage; in 1952 it would rise to 72 and 71 per cent, respectively. It was noted, however, that in practice the wage paid was generally higher than the statutory minimum. Low productivity, cited in the Ten-Year Plan as the essential manpower problem, was attributed to obstacles related to custom, poor health and deficient diet, and to the lack of vocational training and skill. Measures to overcome these obstacles were included in the Plan. The Mission noted with satisfaction that attention had been given in the Plan to the manpower question and pointed to the need for vigorous Government intervention to increase labour productivity and raise the level of wages.

Recalling its previous recommendations for a review of legislation involving racial discrimination, the Trusteeship Council at its eleventh session gave particular attention to regulations limiting the movement of persons. Under these regulations, an indigenous inhabitant may not leave his chiefdom, nor may he leave his residence to stay in a part of the chiefdom over which non-indigenous inhabitants hold private rights for a continuous period of more than 30 days without a "transfer passport" from the chief or his deputy. In addition, in urban areas, European centres, or in designated parts thereof, the indigenous inhabitants are not allowed to move about between 10 p.m. and 4:30 a.m. unless required to do so by their duties in a public service. During its stay in the Territory, the Visiting Mission received complaints concerning such restrictions, particularly those preventing indigenous inhabitants from moving about freely at night in the urban areas. Several reasons were advanced to the Mission in justification of this measure, including the need to take proper precautions against theft and other offences, but the Mission expressed the opinion that the desired results could be achieved by other measures. During the Council's eleventh session, the special representative of the Administering Authority stated that the regulations were not discriminatory and were simply a measure of protection against robbers. When the Administration could set up a system of street lighting and organize a well disciplined indigenous police force, he added, the regulations could easily be cancelled.

The Trusteeship Council nevertheless recommended that consideration be given to the possibility of adopting at an early date alternative measures which would not give an impression of racial discrimination. It also recommended that the Administering Authority review as a whole the regulations dealing with the movement of persons which restrict the personal liberty of the inhabitants.

The Mission received petitions (T/Pet.3/48, 50, 51 and 53)⁴² complaining of discrimination against Africans in judicial matters and in admittance to hotels and restaurants. Since the Council had already made recommendations concerning questions of discrimination, it did not adopt a resolution on these petitions. Two other petitions (T/Pet.3/39 and 55), from the Union des colons du Ruanda-Urundi, claimed, by contrast, that there was racial discrimination against the Europeans, for example in judicial matters, social and labour legislation, expulsion from the Territory and electoral matters. Commenting on these petitions, the Administering Authority observed (T/943 and 961 and T/C.2/SR.32) that, with respect to some of the situations complained of by the petitioners, special protection was accorded to indigenous inhabitants and that in other instances no question of discrimination was involved. By resolution 491(XI) of 10 July 1952, the Council called the attention of the petitioners to the Administering Authority's observations and decided that in the circumstances no recommendation was necessary.

The Administering Authority reported that the penitentiary system was being revised and that the new system would provide for more selective and effective segregation of convicts, their close confinement, a more systematic and rational arrangement of their work, and the training of staff for the responsible and other posts in penitentiaries. With respect to corporal punishment, the Administering Authority stated that, effective 18 December 1951, Native courts were no longer authorized to order whipping as a sentence; before that date, 2,600 sentences of flogging were imposed during 1951 by the indigenous courts. Whipping remained legal as a disciplinary measure for second class soldiers and in prisons, subject to certain restrictions. In 1951 whipping was applied as a disciplinary measure in prisons in 4,380 cases, the punishment varying from one to eight lashes; as from 20 September 1951 the maximum number of lashes was reduced from eight to four. The special representative informed the Trusteeship Council during its eleventh session that the Administration wished to abolish the penalty of whipping completely, as had been repeatedly recommended by both the Council and the General Assembly, but for the moment it desired to retain the penalty in principle until the rearrangement of existing prisons would allow its replacement by solitary confinement.

Reporting on public health services, the Administering Authority stated that about 93 million francs were allocated to the medical service in 1951. Medical facilities comprised one mixed hospital for Europeans and Asians, 35 hospitals for indigenous inhabitants (including a new hospital inaugurated at Usumbura in July 1951), 89 dispensaries, six maternity hospitals, and one isolation hospital for sleeping-sickness cases. In addition, eight new rural dispensaries, three maternity hospitals and one sanatorium were under construction. At the end of 1951, the European medical staff, including the Government staff, comprised 63 medical practitioners (54 in 1950), 3 pharmacists (2 in 1950), 2 dentists (2 in 1950), 19 midwives (18 in 1950), 28 nurses (30 in 1950), 14 colonial nursing assistants (12 in 1950), 60 medical assistants and health officers (37 in 1950). The indigenous staff consisted of 28 medical assistants (17 in 1950), 40 certificated male nurses (47 in 1950), 482 assistant nurses (443 in 1950) and 78 assistant midwives (67 in 1950). The total number of consultations in 1951 was 7,884,663 for the indigenous population, 18,230 for Europeans, 7,243 for Asians and 1,466 for Eurasians. In addition, 46 infants' clinics gave 800,237 consultations, as against 692,522 the year before.

Other action affecting public health and hygiene, according to the annual report, included: continued training of personnel; improvement in the refuse disposal service; continuation of campaigns against relapsing fever and trypanosomiasis (sleeping sickness); and the teaching of hygiene in schools, social service centres, pre-natal clinics and infants' clinics. The anti-tuberculosis mission from the Centre of Medical Research of the University of Brussels examined 130,000 indigenous inhabitants and detected 2,423 cases of pulmonary tuberculosis. The laboratory at Astrida continued bacteriological and serological diagnosis. In April 1951, the Institut pour la recherche scientifique en Afrique centrale undertook epidemiological research concerning the anopheles mosquito and malaria and the tsetse fly and trypanosomiasis.

Under the Ten-Year Plan it was proposed to improve, expand and increase health facilities and to increase the medical staff; to intensify sanitation and maternal and child welfare programmes; to construct two laboratories, a pharmaceutical depot, two tuberculosis sanatoria, a mental hospital and two lepers' farm villages; and to purchase 30 ambulances. The Plan also provided for the expansion of the water supply. The full cost, estimated at 450 million francs, of supplying the customary districts with water is to be assumed by the Fonds du bien-être indigène; in 1952, the hydrological mission will have an appropriation of 91 million francs to purchase the necessary heavy equipment. During 1951 this mission laid pipes from 1,500 springs in the rural areas and dug about 20 water holes.

The Visiting Mission to the Territory was impressed by the substantial results achieved by the Administering Authority in the field of medical and public health services and by the hospitals and dispensaries which it visited. It felt, however, that the number of dentists should be increased and that special consideration should be given to the possibility of training indigenous doctors.

The Mission's conclusion concerning the medical and health services, as well as the valuable assistance given these services by private agencies and scientific bodies in Belgium, was noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council. The Council commended the Administering Authority in particular for the special campaigns against tuberculosis, malaria and other diseases. Recognizing the need for the further expansion of the medical and health services, the Council welcomed the prominence given to this problem in the Ten-Year Plan. It urged the Administering Authority to give the problem continued attention and to consider including the training of indigenous medical practitioners on a larger scale in its future programmes.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, expenditure on education in 1950 amounted to 32.1 million francs, of which 24.7 million francs represented subsidies to missions; incomplete figures showed an expenditure of 27 million francs in 1951, including 19.8 million francs in subsidies. In addition, 12 million francs were appropriated in the special budget for 1951 for building, and 23.3 million francs were contributed for school construction by the Fonds du bien-être indigène. The Administering Authority stated that education at all levels was free and that over 75 per cent of the pupils who were boarders paid no boarding fees.

Primary education for the indigenous inhabitants other than that offered by the government school at Astrida, in which 674 pupils were enrolled, was provided almost exclusively by Catholic and Protestant missions and was subsidized by the Government. In 1951 a total of 139,327 pupils, mostly boys, attended denominational primary schools, which included 3,203 classes, 2,400 of which were lower primary classes providing instruction only through the third year. In addition, 988 children attended Moslem schools. The missions also conducted chapel or reading schools designed primarily to give religious instruction and prepare persons of all ages for baptism; these were attended by 325,552 persons in 1951, according to reports from the missions. The Administering Authority praised the valuable contribution toward the elimination of illiteracy by the Christian missionaries, who insisted that the children of their followers should attend school regularly and generally accepted for baptism only those who could read.

Government post-primary education for the indigenous inhabitants is given at the Astrida School Centre, with a teaching staff of 22 Europeans; in 1951 a total of 286 boys were receiving secondary education and 170 were attending administrative, agricultural, medical and veterinary courses. Pending completion under the Ten-Year Plan of a Latin secondary school in Ruanda, 60 students from Ruanda-Urundi were attending the Latin secondary school in the Kivu Province of the Belgian Congo. Other post-primary schools within Ruanda-Urundi included seven domestic science schools (with 140 pupils); craft apprenticeship schools and auxiliary schools (with 453 pupils) run by Catholic missions; and a government vocational school opened in 1951 at Usumbura (with 44 pupils). Teacher-training schools (écoles de moniteurs) and teacher-trainee centres operated by the missions were attended by 712 students. The Administering Authority stated that the establishment of a teacher-training department at the Astrida School Centre in 1952 was planned.

Higher or post-secondary education remained limited to the seminaries and various departments of the Astrida School Centre, but the Administering Authority planned to set up a university centre in Ruanda-Urundi by 1960.

The Administering Authority considered that, given the available facilities for secondary education, it would be necessary during the next few years to limit the number of secondary school students in proportion to the requirements, employment openings and even the physical facilities. Similarly, admission to higher or post-secondary education was limited by the physical capacity of the Astrida School Centre and was restricted to properly qualified candidates. The Administering Authority felt that it would be socially dangerous and detrimental to the future of the Territory if unqualified persons were accepted for training as potential indigenous leaders. The Administering Authority stated that, although it preferred that the people should be educated within the Territory, it encouraged study abroad if this was warranted by the ability and previous education of the candidates. In 1951, it reported, sixteen indigenous students from Ruanda-Urundi were attending courses at the Lovanium university centre in the Belgian Congo, five were attending the postal and telecommunications schools at Leopoldville in the Belgian Congo and one was receiving higher education in Belgium. Indigenous Roman Catholic priests had studied in Rome and an indigenous Protestant minister had attended a college in the United Kingdom.

Programmes for the further development of education were included in the Ten-Year Plan. In the case of boys' education, the Plan stated that the objective in the past had been to provide elementary education for the mass of the indigenous inhabitants and to equip Ruanda-Urundi with the nucleus of an intellectual elite, while the task in the future was gradually to build up an intermediate elite of skilled craftsmen. The Plan included provisions for more schools at the elementary, intermediate and secondary levels as well as schools for teacher training and vocational training. As regards girls' education the programme was mainly designed gradually to close the substantial gap between the educational facilities for girls and those for boys; it included provisions for additional primary, domestic science and teacher-training schools.

The Visiting Mission noted that, although education in Ruanda-Urundi had made significant progress, great efforts were still required to eliminate illiteracy and to establish a comprehensive educational system throughout the Territory. Without the co-operation of the religious missions, the Visiting Mission stated, it would clearly have been impossible to establish as many schools in Ruanda-Urundi. The Mission was also favourably impressed by the conditions in many of the schools visited and by the evident ability and devotion of the missionaries. However, it expressed its considered opinion that the Administration should take a more direct part in education by establishing official secular schools and by ensuring a more complete supervision of existing schools. The Mission added that it was essential to the Territory's educational progress for the Administration to have under its immediate direction schools in which experiments with syllabuses and teaching methods could be made and standards set for other schools. Calling attention to the existence of a common educational system for both Ruanda-Urundi and the Belgian Congo, the Mission stated that an Administering Authority should establish in a Trust Territory an educational programme designed especially for the needs of the Territory in the light of its international status and of prevailing conditions.

The Mission considered that, although the measures envisaged in the Ten-Year Plan would certainly contribute to the improvement of existing school facilities, they were too limited in scope. Moreover, they did not touch upon two important problems: the length of study in lower primary schools, which the Mission felt should be gradually extended; and the improvement of the chapel and reading schools. These, the Mission considered, might be developed into an enlarged primary school system if they had government supervision and were provided with improved equipment and better trained teachers. The Mission also suggested that the Administering Authority should furnish more detailed statistics to permit an appraisal of the value and scope of primary education in the Territory.

The Mission considered that the problem of providing primary education for Asian and Eurafrikan children deserved special attention. The Administering Authority indicated in its annual report that school facilities for non-indigenous inhabitants included one government primary school for Europeans at Usumbura, attended by 129 pupils in 1951, and one for Asians, attended by 213 pupils; two mission primary schools for Europeans, one at Usumbura, with 117 pupils, and one at Astrida, with 114 pupils; and classes for Asians in various other places, attended by 71 pupils. The Mission reported that it had received complaints from Asians living outside Usumbura concerning the difficulties of securing education for their children; cases were cited of Asian children who had allegedly been refused admission to certain schools. As for Eurafrikan children, those recognized by their fathers or adopted by Europeans might be admitted to schools for Europeans if accepted by an admissions board; those not admitted to such schools might be admitted to ordinary or special institutions run by religious missions. The Visiting Mission felt that the situation illustrated the desirability of establishing a number of government non-denominational schools open to applicants of all races and religions.

Turning to the question of teacher training, the Mission expressed the view that the general level of the students, particularly those admitted in the teacher-trainee centres, was too low and that entrance requirements should be raised as rapidly as possible. Noting that under the Ten-Year Plan girls would still presumably be unable to proceed through secondary schools to higher education, the Mission expressed the hope that, if that interpretation was correct, the Administration would reconsider its plans and make more satisfactory provision for the education of women.

With respect to higher education in general, the Mission noted that there would be no graduates of secondary schools before 1954-55 and no students qualified for admission to institutions of higher education in Europe. It suggested that it would be desirable meanwhile to arrange for some form of advanced training for a selected group of capable young Africans. In this connexion, it observed, the Administration might consult UNESCO and the Technical Assistance Administration of the United Nations. The Mission considered inconclusive the argument advanced by officials to the effect that it would be unwise to send African students abroad because they would find themselves in the wrong environment. It pointed to the need for any country aiming at self-government or independence to develop contacts with other cultures and to educate its potential leaders in comparative methods of government.

In commenting on the Mission's report during the eleventh session of the Trusteeship Council, the special representative of the Administering Authority stated that the Administration would establish secular schools when the need arose. Meanwhile, it considered that it should use its resources in placing educational facilities at the disposal of the greatest possible number of indigenous inhabitants without creating, in principle, establishments which would be extremely costly and for which the need had not yet been felt. The special representative agreed with the Mission's view that the general educational level of students admitted to teacher-training schools was too low, but pointed out that the number of moniteurs would be considerably diminished if a higher level were demanded at present. The Administration, he stated, had certain reservations to the sending of indigenous students to foreign universities. While not formally opposed to that course, it maintained that such students should first have had a secondary education; in the existing circumstances, it would therefore be necessary to send students not to universities but to secondary schools, and this would involve considerable expense and the risk of their not qualifying for university study. Moreover, it was not possible to form abroad the whole elite which the Territory needed. The Administration accordingly felt that the problem should be solved by organizing within the Territory secondary and higher educational facilities comparable to similar institutions abroad. Only then could the Administration create scholarships for study abroad by those students who had completed their higher training.

The Trusteeship Council recognized the substantial contribution made by the religious missions in the field of education. Nevertheless, it considered it desirable that the Administration should exercise more direct intervention in the education of the inhabitants. It urged the Administering Authority to supervise the elementary mission schools (reading schools) more closely and, where conditions justified it, to establish additional government schools. The Council further recommended that the Administering Authority develop and extend existing facilities for secondary and higher education in the Territory and, in addition, provide scholarships to indigenous students to pursue their studies abroad. Finally, the Council asked the Administering Authority to take the necessary steps to improve teacher-training facilities in the Territory.

2. Somaliland, Administered by Italy

This Territory consists of approximately 500,000 square kilometres. According to the annual report⁴³ of the Administering Authority its estimated population at the end of 1951 numbered 1,242,199 indigenous inhabitants, 23,000 Arabs and 1,000 Indians and Pakistanis; there were also 4,744 Italian residents, as compared with 4,235 at the end of 1950.

The Administering Authority reported that the Italian Parliament, by Act 1301 of 4 November 1951, the text of which was made available to the Trusteeship Council (T/954/Add.1), had ratified the Trusteeship Agreement for the Territory, thus making the Declaration of Constitutional Principles annexed to the Agreement⁴⁴ an integral part of Italian law.

a. UNITED NATIONS ADVISORY COUNCIL

The United Nations Advisory Council, established under the Agreement to aid and advise the Administering Authority, reported (T/979) on its activities during the year 1 April 1951 to 31 March 1952. It stated that since its establishment on 1 April 1950 it had held 55 meetings, including 40 during the year under review, but that all three of its members—the representatives of Colombia, Egypt and the Philippines—were present in Mogadiscio for only 123 days, and during the year under review only from 1 to 22 April 1951. Over the two-year period, a quorum of two members existed for 354 days but, the Advisory Council stated, it had been unable to function properly with only two members present since differences of opinion arose, particularly with respect to the method of dealing with communications addressed directly to the Council.

In this connexion, rule 45 of the Advisory Council's rules of procedure provided that all "petitions . . . which do not contain a request for a specific action by the Advisory Council, if received by the Advisory Council shall be transmitted to the Secretary-General for submission to the Trusteeship Council." The representatives of Colombia and Egypt considered that the Advisory Council should deal unofficially with those communications addressed directly to it as long as the Administering Authority was ready to discuss the relevant complaints with representatives of the Council in a spirit of co-operation. The representative of the Philippines, on the other hand, maintained that communications calling for specific action by the Advisory Council were within the Council's legal competence and should be dealt with officially.

In its report, the Advisory Council gave an account of the advice it had given, on request, to the Administration; according to the Administering Authority's annual report, most of the advice was accepted. Advice was given, inter alia, on: the establishment of Municipal

Councils; reforms of the Territorial and Residency Councils; regulations to control the establishment of new economic enterprises and private insurance companies and to govern fishing rights and mining; a draft ordinance to tax the income of agricultural enterprises; the establishment of central economic and health councils; the creation of labour offices and a labour inspectorate service; compulsory industrial accident insurance; salaries for locally-recruited teachers; and the transfer of the power to grant pardons.

The representative of the Philippines annexed to the Advisory Council's report a statement expressing his views on certain aspects of the Council's work and of the Administering Authority's policies and methods of administration. Observations of the Advisory Council, as well as of the representative of the Philippines, are referred to below in connexion with specific subjects.

Factors restricting the effectiveness of the Advisory Council were also referred to by the Visiting Mission. In addition to a considerable degree of disharmony among the representatives and the absence of one or more of them from Mogadiscio for long periods, the Mission noted that elements of the indigenous population misunderstood the Council's position vis-a-vis the Administration and, in any instance of dissatisfaction, appealed at once to Council representatives with the apparent expectation that their desires would be met. The Mission felt that the difficulties and dangers of the situation were apparent and that heavy responsibilities were thus placed on the Advisory Council.

The Trusteeship Council, noting that the role of the Advisory Council was to aid and advise the Administering Authority, expressed the hope that all three members would participate fully in its work and remain in the Territory for sufficient periods of time to enable it to function effectively and harmoniously.

b. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the annual report, there were no major changes in the Territory's administrative structure during 1951. Executive authority remained vested in the Administrator, who also retained legislative powers until the establishment of an elective legislature. In the political field, the Administering Authority stated, development had been rapid, with representative organs of government increasingly assuming their functions.

The Territorial Council held three sessions during 1951. It was reorganized in 1952, the Administering Authority reported, less emphasis being given to tribal representation and the representation of political parties and economic groups, in particular, being enlarged. The total number of seats was increased from 35 to 45, and those allotted to Somalis from 28 to 37. The Administering Authority reported that the Residency Councils, established in each of the 27 Residencies, had functioned throughout 1951. Their composition was also modified in 1952 and the representation of political parties increased. Other developments in the political field included the establishment in 1951 of Municipal Councils in Mogadiscio and in 32 communities throughout the Territory. These Councils were initially given purely advisory functions, the Administering Authority indicated, but in certain important matters consultation with them was obligatory. The Administering Authority reported that a civil registry system, to be established in the municipal communities, would permit the introduction of a system of suffrage in these communities.

The Territorial Council, as reconstituted, comprised 21 regional (formerly tribal) representatives, twelve representatives of political parties, eight of economic groups and one each of cultural groups, the Italian community, the Arab community, and the Indian and Pakistani community. The twelve seats allotted to political parties were distributed as follows: five to the Somali Youth League, three to the Hisbia Dighil Mirifle, two to the Unione Nazionale Somala, and one each to the Unione Africana Somalia and the Lega Progressista Somala. Although thirteen political parties had been granted legal recognition, these five were the only active ones, the Administering Authority stated. The Somali Youth League was said by the Administering Authority to favour rapid and radical change, including the abolition of traditional institutions. The other four, the nucleus of the disbanding Conferenza Party, represented, according to the Administering Authority, a moderate-progressive point of view, seeking Territorial independence together with a gradual replacement of traditional institutions. The Administering Authority estimated that the Somali Youth League had about 12,000 members while the other four parties together had about 20,000 members. The Visiting Mission was of the opinion that these estimates might be low.

The Advisory Council reported that most of its recommendations on the reconstitution of the Territorial Council were accepted by the Administering Authority, but that the following were rejected:

(1) that the "progressive" and "moderate progressive" political parties be given an equal number of seats; (2) that the Hamar Youth Club be given a seat as a political party; (3) that the "double list", whereby the Administrator nominated members from lists containing twice as many names as the number of seats to be filled, be replaced by a single list; and (4) that provision be made for holding extraordinary plenary sessions of the Territorial Council.

The Hamar Youth Club complained (T/Pet.11/41) that it had been unjustly excluded from the Territorial Council, and the Administering Authority stated (T/952 and T/C.2/SR.31) that this Club had recently been recognized as a political party instead of a cultural organization and would be entitled to representation in the Territorial Council when it had at least five registered branches in the interior of Somaliland. Noting this, the Trusteeship Council, by resolution 497(XI) adopted on 10 July 1952 by 10 votes to 1, concluded that a basis for a satisfactory settlement had been provided.

In the opinion of the Visiting Mission, substantial and rapid development in the organization and procedures of the Territorial Council would be necessary if it were to become a legislative body within the remaining period of Trusteeship. The Mission felt that to combine proportional representation of political parties with representation of functional groups was unnecessarily complicated and suggested that fuller use be made of the principle of Territorial representation, which was already applied in the selection of regional representatives. It might be possible initially, it felt, to provide for elections to the Territorial Council from municipal constituencies and for the nomination or indirect election of members from rural districts. Moreover, the introduction of elections in municipal centres, the Mission stated, should not be made conditional on the establishment of a civil registry, since only a simple system for the registration of voters was required.

In his statement annexed to the Advisory Council's report, the representative of the Philippines expressed the view that more vigorous "progressive" young men should be appointed to the Territorial Council in lieu of tribal chiefs and that the procedure of the deliberations could be improved.

It was alleged in a number of petitions⁴⁵ that the real chiefs and representatives of the people were excluded from sitting on the Territorial, Residency or Municipal Councils, which were said to comprise only pro-Italian elements and illiterates appointed by the Administration.

In reply, the Administering Authority explained (T/952) with reference to the Territorial Council that, in view of the low educational level of the Somali population, which excluded the possibility of a modern electoral system, it had been necessary to establish methods of composition and selection which would mirror as accurately as possible the existing structure of the Somali community, which was over three-quarters traditionalist and tribal and less than one-quarter "progressive". The Residency Councils, the Administering Authority stated (T/978), were composed of chiefs elected by tribal assemblies and representatives chosen by the political parties, and the Residency Councils in turn designated the members of the Municipal Councils.

In its annual report, the Administering Authority stated that the draft legislation for modifying the political bodies had included a provision designed to give Somalis more opportunity to express their views more frequently on the question of tribal leadership by requiring that tribal assemblies be held every two or three years to elect the tribal chiefs or to confirm their tenure of office. Although a majority of the Territorial Council had expressed opposition to this provision, the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council that it would nevertheless be reintroduced in the future when legislation was introduced to modify further the powers and composition of the Territorial Council.

As to the functioning of various Councils, the Visiting Mission noted that the Territorial Council's procedures had not developed beyond an elementary stage and it urged that functional committees, which it considered indispensable to a legislative process, should be established in the Council. The Residency Councils, it appeared to the Mission, were handicapped by the rigidly localized political outlook of many Somalis and their lack of familiarity with procedures of modern administration. The Mission expressed the hope that Administration officials would continue and extend throughout the Territory their efforts to explain methods of discussion and action to Residency Council members and that all other necessary measures would be taken to ensure the rapid development of these local Councils into genuinely representative democratic bodies. Since the Municipal Councils had been established only a short time before its visit, the Mission was unable to comment on their operation, but it noted that authority was vested entirely in the Resident. It also noted, however, that the Administration expected a steady and continuous development in municipal government; it expressed the hope that the necessary steps would be taken to ensure the early establishment of municipal administrations having administrative and financial autonomy.

In its observations on the Mission's report, the Administering Authority stated (T/1006) that several of the Mission's suggestions with respect to the functioning of the Territorial Council had already been followed in the course of the progressive transformation of that Council, which was destined to become the Territory's Legislative Assembly. It added that the Permanent Committee of the Council had been transformed in 1952 into a functional committee and would be divided into political and economic sections as soon as possible.

This was noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council, which recommended that particular attention be given to developing further the use of functional committees, not only in the Territorial Council but in the Residency and Municipal Councils as well, in order that the practical political experience of the representatives in these bodies might be increased. The Trusteeship Council further recommended that the Administering Authority proceed with its plans to hold direct elections in the towns and villages for members of the Municipal Councils and of the Territorial Council. Such elections, the Trusteeship Council felt, would not only represent an important step towards full participation of the inhabitants in the political life of the Territory, but would also largely eliminate the difficulties caused by the existing system of proportional representation, which had been viewed with concern by the Visiting Mission. The Council also expressed the hope that the promising development of political maturity among Somalis and the increasingly representative character of the political bodies would provide a basis for a progressive expansion of their powers. Noting that the measures proposed by the Administering Authority for introducing democratic procedures in the tribal assemblies had not been endorsed by the Territorial Council, the Trusteeship Council called the attention of this Council and of the representatives of public opinion to the advantages which the Territory would derive from such measures and urged the Administering Authority to continue its efforts to this end.

The relatively high degree of development of political party activity in the Territory was described by the Visiting Mission as one of the most interesting features of Somali life. The Mission observed, however, that political issues of little more than historical significance still dominated the political outlook of many groups and that attitudes towards the return of the Italian administration still played a disproportionately large part in determining political party alignment although it found the attitude toward traditional forms of tribal organization a factor of increasing significance. The Mission reported that it heard numerous representations from political parties concerning their standing, the administration of the Territory and general conditions in Somaliland, and that it found many of the claims to be exaggerated. Existing political tensions would be relaxed only when political parties replaced their present somewhat sterile activities by a comparably intense interest in the solution of social and economic problems, the Mission stated, and it expressed the hope that the leaders of political parties would emphasize increasingly the constructive aspect of their role. The Mission noted that political party activities were still regulated by a proclamation issued during the former period of British Military Administration and expressed the view that more suitable legislation should be enacted.

In petitions (T/Pet.11/40 and 120) before the Trusteeship Council, the Central Committee of the Somali Youth League expressed its opposition to the Italian administration, which it claimed was not implementing the Trusteeship Agreement. It alleged, inter alia, that former Fascist and colonial laws were still in force, former Fascist rulers returned to office, and a policy of "divide and rule" followed. Members and sympathizers of the Somali Youth League were continuously arrested, imprisoned and convicted, the Central Committee alleged, and the Administration did everything in its power to suppress the national movement for independence.

Similar allegations were contained in petitions from various branches of the League,⁴⁶ from the Unione Giovani Benadir (formerly called the Hamar Youth Club) (T/Pet.11/121) from a faction of the Hisbia Dighil and Mirifle Party (T/Pet.11/109) and from individuals (T/Pet.11/101,103,117). The faction of the Hisbia Dighil and Mirifle Party contended that the Administration had interfered with the operation of the Party which, although originally in favour of the Administering Authority, now opposed it because of its failure to promote the Territory's progress towards independence. The Central Committee of the Somali Youth League asked that more effective machinery be established to implement the Trusteeship Agreement so as to enable Somaliland to become independent by the end of 1960. In particular, it requested that:

(1) a separate Questionnaire be drawn up for Somaliland; (2) a different procedure be followed in the examination of the annual report and petitions; (3) a separate Visiting Mission be sent to the Territory every two years; (4) the United Nations Advisory Council be given more power, in particular to deal with petitions and to investigate serious incidents; and (5) the Somali Youth League be allowed to participate in the Trusteeship Council's debates on Somaliland.

One petition (T/Pet.11/101) requested direct administration by the United Nations.

On the other hand, satisfaction with the achievements of the Administering Authority was expressed in petitions from other parties, including the other faction of the Hisbia Dighil Mirifle (T/Pet.11/76 and 110), the Lega Progressista Somala (T/Pet.11/153,193,195), the Unione Africani Somalia (T/Pet.11/75, 78, 91, 93-96), the Somalia Conference (T/Pet.11/174) and the Unione Maniferro Somalia (T/Pet.11/111). These parties asserted, however, that the Administration showed preference for the very parties which opposed it. Some claimed that the Somali Youth League pursued a policy of nationalistic extremism and fomented political agitation.

In its observations (T/952, 978) on these petitions, the Administering Authority stated that the allegations of the Somali Youth League were groundless. It added that the complaints from other parties to the effect that it was indulgent towards oppositionist elements further demonstrated that those allegations were without serious foundation. The Administering Authority assured the Trusteeship Council that it made impartial use of every constructive element in the two opposing political movements and had no other concern than to carry out its commitments under the Trusteeship Agreement.⁴⁷

In nine separate resolutions⁴⁸ on petitions from branches of the Somali Youth League⁴⁹ and from individuals (T/Pet.11/125 and 144), the Trusteeship Council recommended that the Administering Authority continue to take measures to dissipate the League's feeling that it was discriminated against. These resolutions were adopted on 9 and 10 July 1952, by votes of 10 to 1 in six instances, 9 to 1, with one abstention in one case (594(XI)) and 10 to none, with 1 abstention in another (561(XI)).

In its report to the General Assembly, the Council expressed its satisfaction at the steps taken by the Administering Authority to give political parties an increased role in the political organs of the Territory. It stated that it shared the hope expressed by the Visiting Mission that the leaders of these parties would emphasize increasingly the constructive aspect of their role. The Council noted that the Administering Authority contemplated a new law regulating the activities of political parties and urged that such a law be put into effect as soon as possible.

The Administering Authority reported that, of 4,504 persons employed in the administrative service during, 1951, a total of 3,730 were Somalis, none of whom occupied a high post, 387 were Italians or other nationals recruited locally or during the British Military Administration and 363 were Italians recruited in Italy. The Administering Authority indicated that a general plan for the increased participation of Somalis in the civil service would be formulated in the near future. It reported that Somalis were being assigned to a relatively large number of responsible posts in certain of the government services such as the customs, post office, police and Residency offices but added that the School of Political Administration had as yet been unable to contribute graduates to the civil service since it was only in its second year and offered a three-year course.

The Visiting Mission considered that, for the Territory to attain independence in nine years, it was essential that a civil service composed primarily of Somalis be formed. It felt that the Administering Authority should be commended for establishing the School of Political Administration, which was designed to produce at least the nucleus of this service within the limited time available. The Mission noted that, within a given category, locally recruited staff frequently received one-third or one-fourth the salary of staff recruited in Italy and it suggested that the Administration should review its salary schedule in order to eliminate inequities. The Mission also suggested that every effort be made to provide in-service training for Somali personnel in the administrative service; it also stressed the need for technical staff in connexion with development plans. The representative of the Philippines on the Advisory Council felt that efforts to train Somalis to replace Italians in the civil service were inadequate and should be accelerated through more scholarships for study abroad.

It was stated in a number of petitions⁵⁰ that many Somalis had been discharged from various administrative services, including the police force, and their positions taken by Italians. It was also asserted that Somalis and Italians who performed similar functions were paid at different rates. Several of these petitions, as noted above, were from the Somali Youth League. The Unione Africana Somalia maintained, on the other hand, that the Italian Administration had taken over a bureaucracy which was anti-Italian and nationalistic and that only five per cent of the civil service posts were open to members of the Unione. Two other petitions (T/Pet.11/163 and 204) commended the Administering Authority for having improved the wages of Somalis in the government service. The Administering Authority pointed out (T/967, 975, 982) that most of the Italian officials had been recruited by the British Military Administration. Under proposed new regulations, it added, any disparity in the treatment of foreigners and Somalis would be eliminated and they would receive the same basic salaries if they had equal capabilities and educational qualifications. It stated that only moral qualifications and potential efficiency were taken into account in hiring personnel and that it did not inquire into political views or party affiliations; it could not therefore meet the request of the Unione Africana Somalia for a balanced quota of personnel. The Administering Authority cited specific reasons, including incompetence, for the dismissal of certain individual Somalis. In the case of Somalis on the police force, the Administering Authority stated that they were not permitted to engage in political activities and attributed the dismissal of some of the Somali police officers to their violation of this condition.

The special representative of the Administering Authority further informed the Trusteeship Council during its eleventh session that in 1952 twelve students of the School of Political Administration had been promoted and assigned to higher posts with executive functions, replacing in each case an Italian official. Two were made section chiefs in the central Administration, another executive assistants to a Resident; four Somali police inspectors were in charge of police stations and many had been placed in charge of customs and post offices.

The measures taken by the Administering Authority to increase the participation of Somalis in the administrative service were viewed with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council, which expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would be able to extend such measures throughout all administrative services. The Council also noted that the Administering Authority was sending Somali members of the army and police forces abroad for special training and recommended that this programme be extended to other branches of the Administration.

In 1951, as in the previous year, the administration of justice was based on the Italian Penal and Civil Codes and the Somaliland Judiciary Rules, the Administering Authority reported. Koranic and customary law were recognized in civil cases and, to the extent that they did not conflict with the general principles of law, in penal cases when the parties concerned were Moslems. The Administering Authority reported that a draft law for the administration of justice had been presented to the Territorial Council and to the Advisory Council for their opinions. This proposed law would restrict the competence of the Kadis to such questions as personal status and inheritances and place all other matters concerning both indigenous and foreign persons within the jurisdiction of the regular Italian courts, which would include indigenous members. A Court of Appeal would be established in the Territory. Administrative officials who were invested with judicial functions would be placed outside the administrative organization for the duration of their service as officers of the judiciary.

Noting that, under the existing system, certain judicial functions were being carried out by the Residents, Regional Commissioners and the Administrator, the Visiting Mission observed that the new regulations should provide for a clear separation of executive and judicial functions in accordance with article 7 of the Declaration of Constitutional Principles annexed to the Trusteeship Agreement. The Mission stated that it had heard complaints, while in the Territory, concerning the prolonged detention of persons awaiting trial and of long arrests without show of cause. Complaints of this nature were also contained in petitions⁵¹ before the Trusteeship Council. The Mission also heard allegations that persons were sometimes condemned without being present in court. Two petitions (T/Pet.11/66 and T/Pet.11/112 and Add.2) also alleged that Somalis had been convicted by penal decree without having an opportunity to appear in their own defence. Similar allegations were heard by the Mission. The Mission reported that it also received some complaints that persons had been imprisoned on political grounds. On inquiring into the matter, the Mission was informed by the Administration that since the amnesty of July 1950 there had been no arrests for political offences or for offences resulting from political actions.

In commenting (T/952, 982, 991) on the petitions, the Administering Authority assured the Trusteeship Council that no one had ever been arrested except when charged with criminal actions under laws in force in the Territory. Of 2,864 persons arrested during 1951, it stated, 1,023 had been released and 1,841 had been brought to trial, almost all for crimes against property or for fights, and none for political offences. Only in exceptional cases, restricted to crimes carrying a penalty of no more than three months' imprisonment, was an accused person sentenced by penal decree without a hearing and in such cases he was granted the right of appeal to the same judge. Under the proposed new judicial regulations this practice would be restricted to the imposition of small fines. During its eleventh session, the Trusteeship Council was further informed that a legislative order had been issued in April 1952 limiting preventive detention, except for extremely serious crimes, to two, three and five months, and that a forthcoming order would abolish sentencing by penal decree. As regards police arrest, the Administering Authority stated, Italian law applied throughout the Territory limited detention to 48 hours, after which the person arrested must either be released or charged before the judicial authorities.

After noting the statements made by petitioners and the Administering Authority, the Trusteeship Council expressed concern at the length of the period which had elapsed in some cases between arrest and trial and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would make every effort to remedy that situation. While noting that the Administering Authority had taken further steps toward the separation of executive and judicial functions, the Council shared the view of the Mission that the new judicial regulations should ensure the absolute independence of the judiciary.

The Visiting Mission noted that collective sanctions were levied against tribes and tribal subdivisions and two tribes submitted petitions (T/Pet.11/150 and 226) complaining of such collective fines. The Administering Authority informed the Mission that, after considering the matter it had decided against abolishing collective sanctions since it was often impossible to establish individual responsibility and, even when such identification had been made, it had been found that many of the individuals had acted under the mandate of the tribe. On 10 July 1952, by votes of 8 to 1, with one abstention, and 10 to 1, respectively, the Trusteeship Council adopted separate resolutions (566(XI) and 595 (XI)) on these petitions. It noted, as had the Mission, that the Administering Authority was aware of the inequities which might result from a system of collective sanctions and expressed the hope that it would vigorously pursue its current policy looking toward the abolition of this system. The Council recognized, however, that until the institution of a new system, the imposition of collective sanctions was in accordance with existing law.

c. BOUNDARY BETWEEN THE TRUST TERRITORY AND ETHIOPIA

The Administering Authority reported renewed bloodshed and raiding in 1951 between the Averghedir and Darot groups in the Mudugh area,⁵² where the existing tension due to insufficient sources of water and pasturage had been aggravated by the establishment in 1950 of the provisional administrative line which had separated the Mudugh area from Ethiopia. The fighting had been stopped by the prompt intervention of police and administrative officers and the Administering Authority hoped that the construction of new wells would alleviate the situation.

Such difficulties were also reported by the Visiting Mission, which heard numerous complaints and received petitions⁵³ relating to the absence of a definitive boundary between the Territory and Ethiopia. It was claimed, among other things, that the provisional administrative line divided tribes, barred certain tribes from access to their traditional wells and grazing lands, and made it impossible to recover stolen cattle driven across the border. The delimitation of a definitive border was considered urgent by the Mission. Referring to the procedure for fixing the boundary outlined in General Assembly resolution 392 (V) of 15 December

1950,⁵⁴ the Mission suggested that if direct negotiations between Italy and Ethiopia failed, the matter should proceed without undue delay to the succeeding stages of mediation and arbitration. Moreover, the settlement should contain a generous understanding between the two Governments regarding the passage of persons, goods, and herds across the frontier and the access to water supplies in the border areas.

Subsequently, the representative of the Administering Authority informed (T/PV.415) the Trusteeship Council, during its eleventh session, that diplomatic relations between Italy and Ethiopia had been re-established and conversations on the boundary question initiated. Noting the statement of the Mission concerning the urgency of the matter, and the situation as described in the petitions, the Council expressed the hope that these conversations would lead to a satisfactory settlement.

d. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The indigenous economy of the Territory is of a pastoral-agricultural type; the majority of the inhabitants are nomadic or semi-nomadic pastoralists and stock is the main form of wealth of the Territory, although it is usually regarded as fixed capital and a source of prestige rather than a commercial commodity. The relatively small group of sedentary agriculturalists is confined principally to the banks of the Uebi Scebeli (Ouebbi Shebelli) and Giuba (Juba) Rivers.

The Administering Authority reported that its efforts during 1951 were devoted to encouraging and co-ordinating the development of industry, commerce and agriculture, and that an Economic Council composed of persons representing a wide range of economic interests had been established towards the end of the year.

A United Nations Technical Assistance mission composed of specialists in economics, animal husbandry, agriculture, social development, health and education spent over two months in the Territory in 1951 and the Administering Authority stated in its annual report that, as soon as this mission's report was received, a final draft of a general economic development plan would be prepared and communicated to the Trusteeship Council. Another mission, sent by the United States Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA), had made a survey of ground water resources in the Territory.

Since water was considered the controlling factor regulating settlement and the movement of people in the Territory, the Trusteeship Council's Visiting Mission stated that the Administration should adopt vigorous methods to improve water supplies. Noting that efforts to secure assistance from the population in this task had met with little response, the Mission suggested that the Administration should persevere in its efforts to engage their co-operation. The Mission also considered that the establishment of a satisfactory stock industry, which was essential as an additional source of income, would bring about a substantial stabilization of the nomadic and semi-nomadic people.

The Administering Authority stated in its annual report that the problem of livestock would be given particular emphasis in its plans for the Territory's economic development and that careful consideration would be given to the recommendations of the ECA mission as well as to those of the United Nations Technical Assistance mission. It added, however, that the assistance which had been anticipated from ECA in drilling wells had not been granted since this had not been considered, strictly speaking, a technical assistance project. The lack of water supplies and the difficulties encountered in times of drought were referred to by a number of petitioners,⁵⁵ who asked that new wells be dug and irrigation systems constructed. The Administering Authority pointed out that, as part of its programme for the development of water resources, thirteen new wells were being excavated in the Giuba area and that sixteen were under construction and 35 were being rebuilt in the Mudugh area.

The Trusteeship Council suggested that the Administering Authority continue with its plans for developing the Territory's water resources and urged all sections of the Somali population to co-operate fully in this programme.

Agricultural production in 1951, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, was considerably higher than in 1950. With respect to foodstuffs, the report showed that production of sorghum increased from 127,000 quintals in 1950 to 450,000 quintals in 1951 and of maize from 96,000 quintals to 280,000 quintals. Over 15,000 quintals of maize were in storage at the end of 1951 as a reserve against a food shortage and the Administering Authority planned to increase storage capacity to 50,000 quintals. To assist Somalis to develop more productive forms of agriculture, the Administering Authority reported, five farming centres and agricultural experiment stations and one experimental livestock station had been established by the end of 1951. Seven indigenous co-operative farming enterprises with a total area of 3,250 hectares were being established in the vicinity of the Uebi Scebeli and Giuba Rivers. The Administration had provided the co-operatives with the technical aid and the necessary machinery for the construction of irrigation ditches. The system of cotton growing and marketing under co-participation agreements between European settlers and indigenous farmers had been considerably expanded and it was estimated that 20,000 quintals were produced during 1951. Groundnuts and sesame were also being raised under this system in various districts. Under this system, the European farmer usually provides the indigenous farmer with seed, a cash advance and sometimes mechanical equipment in return for the right to purchase the crop at a price agreed on beforehand.

The Visiting Mission felt that production among indigenous farmers could be much improved by establishing an agricultural extension service, that development efforts should be undertaken as energetically in the dry-land farming zones as along the rivers, and that greater emphasis should be placed on agricultural training in schools. In this connexion, it expressed satisfaction that a school of agriculture and animal husbandry would be established by the middle of 1952. Observing that the co-participation system of farming had given an impetus to cotton cultivation, the Mission stated that this system could serve as the basis of the development of indigenous farmers' co-operatives. It further considered that the possibility of developing a co-operative marketing scheme should be examined and measures taken to diversify crops in case the market price of cotton should drop too low.

Several petitions⁵⁶ referred to the backwardness of indigenous agriculture and stated that the Administration made no adequate effort to promote agricultural development. The petitioners stressed the need for a co-ordinated programme which would include the provision of modern equipment, the construction of irrigation systems, the expansion of research and the provision of technical and financial assistance and improved credit facilities. In commenting on these petitions, the Administering Authority referred (T/982) to the experiments being carried out to supply farmers with machinery. Certain petitioners⁵⁷ requested that Somali cotton growers should not be restricted to selling their cotton only to Italian companies and traders from whom they received low prices, and that the Administration should be persuaded to establish regional cotton marketing co-operatives run by Somalis. The Administering Authority pointed out (T/952 and 982) that contracts under the co-participation system were freely entered into and that indigenous farmers were also free to plant and sell cotton independently. It drew attention, further, to new regulations enacted in 1952 for cotton production and trade.

After noting with satisfaction the measures taken by the Administering Authority to encourage agricultural training, including the establishment of an agricultural school, and to establish farmers' co-operatives, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that these measures would be extended. At the same time, it urged the Administering Authority to intensify its efforts to ensure the diversification of crops in order to minimize difficulties in the event of a decline in market prices of the principal crops.

It is estimated by the Administering Authority that 40 per cent of the total land area of the Territory is uncultivable, 50 per cent is pasture land, part of which can be used for certain crops, and 10 per cent is cultivable or cultivated land. Under the pre-war land legislation in force, the Administering Authority reported, all lands occupied or exploited by indigenous tribes are regarded as their property and are not disposable by the Administering Authority. Concessions may be granted from disposable land for intensive agriculture, but no concessions were granted during 1951, the Administering Authority stated. The Visiting Mission expressed grave doubts about the advisability of granting further agricultural concessions in view of the small amount of arable land in the Territory and the special character of the Trusteeship arrangement. It was informed by the Administration that it was not its policy to grant concessions under the old law and that the necessary modifications were to be made to bring the laws into conformity with the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement. The representative of the Philippines, in his statement annexed to the report of the Advisory Council, also considered that the cultivable land remaining should be conserved for the future Somali State and not alienated to foreigners although it might be leased to foreign concessionaires under conditions which would benefit both the concessionaires and the Native population and induce the latter to settle on the land. He considered it desirable that land legislation to this effect be promulgated as soon as possible.

A number of petitioners⁵⁸ complained of the alienation of land to Italians. It was alleged that the best land along the rivers was held by Italians while Somalis were obliged to use barren land where irrigation was impossible, that land was alienated arbitrarily and that the Administration often recognized claims made by settlers on the basis of concessions granted during the former Italian regime.

The Administering Authority maintained (T/952 and 978) that no land had been alienated under Italian administration and that several of the instances referred to in the petitions related to disputes over leases, boundaries or concessions which had been in the possession of the parties concerned for a long time. It described as absurd and untrue the assertion that fertile lands were entirely in the hands of Italians and observed that the total land in the possession of European farmers was estimated as less than 2 per cent of the cultivable and cultivated land in the Territory.

After considering the various aspects of the land question, including the complaints made in the petitions and the assurances of the Administering Authority that it was not its policy to grant concessions under existing laws, the Trusteeship Council requested the Administering Authority to take all necessary steps for the prompt enactment of land legislation giving expression to the principles of the Trusteeship Agreement. In addition, in resolution 531(XI) adopted on 10 July 1952 by 10 votes to 1 following its examination of one of the petitions (T/Pet.11/106), the Council urged the Administering Authority to exercise the utmost caution in the matter of land leases pending the enactment of the new legislation.

The Administering Authority reported a further increase in imports and exports during 1951, imports being valued at 93.6 million somalos⁵⁹ and exports at 55.5 million somalos. The increase in imports was attributed to heavy purchases of industrial and agricultural machinery and equipment and of consumer goods, particularly food-stuffs. Exports were said to have increased 8.4 per cent in quantity and 23 per cent in value over 1950. Although there was a small export surplus with Italy and the dollar area, the Administering Authority indicated, the over-all import surplus was due to trade with the sterling area, where a deficit equivalent to 40 million somalos was incurred. The export and import trade is carried on by Arab, British, Indian, Italian and Somali concerns; the number of the Somali traders had increased, the Administering Authority reported, from 29 on 1 April 1950 to 61 at the end of 1951.

In many petitions,⁶⁰ opposition was expressed to the existing trade controls. It was stated that because of currency difficulties severe restrictions had been imposed on the issue of import and export licences for trading with countries other than Italy. The petitioners complained, in particular, that the Territory was cut off from cheap sources of imports in East Africa and Aden and stated that even the traditional barter trade between the northern section of the Territory and Aden could no longer be carried on. The curtailment of the barter trade, the petitioners held, could not be justified by exchange difficulties. It was further alleged that in the granting of export and import licences preference was given to Italian and non-Somali traders and that licences were granted to Somalis only through the intermediary of chiefs and other notables, who distributed them on a political basis. Moreover, the cost of licences and warehousing was said to have increased.

The Visiting Mission stated that it was unquestionably true that the principal foreign exchange earnings were lire and that this necessitated purchases in the lire area. On the other hand, the Mission observed, the Territory was meeting its foreign exchange requirements only with the assistance of Italy, which had enabled the Territory to make limited purchases within the sterling area and had made available sterling funds to cover 80 per cent of the resultant exchange deficit.

In its observations (T/952 and Add.1, T/982) on the above petitions, the Administering Authority stated that it gave preferential treatment in granting export and import permits to organizations formed by Somalis or by Somalis and Europeans. It affirmed that the cost of trading licences had never been increased. With regard to the alleged impossibility of obtaining import licences for trade with the sterling area, the Administering Authority pointed out that imports from the sterling area represented more than half the value of total imports during the last nine months of 1950 and more than a third of total imports during 1951. It further stated that trade between northern Somaliland and Aden, Zanzibar and other ports was proceeding normally. It denied that the laws and regulations had created difficulties for traders, adding that, on the contrary, there had been an increase in trade by sea. Concerning trade restrictions in Galcaio, the subject of two of the above petitions (T/Pet.11/51 and 62), the Administering Authority stated (T/959 and 964) that new import and export regulations put into effect in that area had met the wishes of the traders. This was noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council in resolution 503 (XI), adopted by 8 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, on 9 July 1952.

In its report to the General Assembly, the Council, taking into account the petitions and the views of the Visiting Mission concerning foreign trade restrictions, expressed satisfaction at a statement by the Administering Authority to the effect that foreign exchange was now available to traders, that in granting licences preference was given to Somali traders, and that the volume of exports and imports had increased, favourably affecting the standard of living of the population.

Transportation along the coast is principally by small sailboats (dhows) and a few larger ships. The Administering Authority reported that it had tried, thus far without success, to encourage the establishment of a coastal shipping organization by private interests. Several dhow owners from Alula objected (T/Pet.11/72) that dhows were not permitted to sail unless they flew the Italian flag and they refused to do so because 47 ships which had raised the flag had been lost. This requirement was also referred to in other petitions (T/Pet.11/114, 118, 160 and Add.1). The Administering Authority explained (T/967) that dhows registered in the Territory must fly the Italian flag to be assured of assistance and protection when outside the Territory; it added that the Alula dhow owners had later realized that their objections were unfounded and had hoisted the flag of the Italian merchant marine. By resolution 518(XI) of 9 July 1952, adopted by 8 votes to none, with 3 abstentions, the Trusteeship Council stated that, inasmuch as the Alula petitioners appeared to have understood and accepted the relevant regulations, it considered the problem satisfactorily resolved.

There are over 9,000 kilometres of roads and tracks in the Territory, according to the Administering Authority's report, and 1,898,000 somalos were spent for road construction during 1951. The Mission noted, however, that travel by road was difficult and in many instances impossible during the two rainy seasons. The Mission expressed the hope that development plans would provide for road improvement as it felt that the situation was a serious obstacle to economic development. Several petitions⁶¹ also referred to road conditions, stating further that the only railway had been dismantled by the British Military Administration and not replaced and that harbour facilities were in poor condition. In its observations (T/982) on these petitions, the Administering Authority pointed to its expenditures for dock maintenance and repairs and for road repairs.

According to the Administering Authority's reports, industrial development remained limited but some improvement had taken place. Among the new establishments were a textile mill, a modern and well-equipped machine shop on the plantations of the Societ  Agricola Italo-Somala (SAIS) and numerous cotton gins. Considerable development was reported with respect to soap manufacturing, textile weaving and ivory carving establishments. Studies were undertaken for the re-establishment of the saltworks at Hafun and the establishment of a meat cannery and refrigeration plant. The sugar refinery of the SAIS, the principal industrial establishment in the Territory, was soon to be enlarged, the Administering Authority stated. Other industrial enterprises in the Territory included two large saw-mills, two tanneries, three tuna fish canneries and plants for the extraction of vegetable oils.

The Administering Authority reported that during 1951, regulations were adopted governing fishing and mining concessions; concessions for fishing would be limited to a maximum of nine years and for mining to 40 years. The Administering Authority indicated that it would soon undertake a study, in conjunction with the Food and Agriculture Organization, of the possibilities of developing fisheries, and that a United States ECA mission was also expected to study the question in the near future.

The Administering Authority further stated that it was trying to increase the production and to improve the quality of incense, which was of considerable economic importance in the northern section of the Territory.

Permission to engage in prospecting for iron, lead, titanium and lignite was granted in 1951 to an Italian mining company to which permission to prospect for tin, tungsten, molybdenum and zirconium had been granted in 1950, the Administering Authority reported. The Administering Authority's special representative later informed the Trusteeship Council, during its eleventh session, that two companies, one Italian and one American, were also seeking oil.

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, the over-all receipts and expenditures of the Territory for the fiscal year 1950-51 were 32.3 and 65.5 million somalos, respectively, the deficit being covered by a grant from the Administering Authority. The Territory derived its revenue mainly from customs duties and taxes on production (17.2 million somalos), on consumption (3.4 million somalos) and receipts from monopolies on tobacco and matches (5.1 million somalos). The greatest single item of budgetary expenditure—30.1 million somalos—was on civil personnel for all services. Military expenditures, which are outside the budget and met by the Administering Authority, amounted to 75.4 million somalos in 1950-51; the Administering Authority indicated that a decrease of military expenditures to 31.4 million somalos in 1951-52 was envisaged by reducing the number of Italians in the security forces. Income and hut taxes are levied and the Administering Authority reported that it also intended to apply taxes on all cultivated lands and on cattle. The Administering Authority stated that it shared the view expressed by the Trusteeship Council at its ninth session that future budgets should present separately those charges which are now borne directly by the Administering Authority and would not be charged to the future Somali State and those charges which would ultimately be borne by that State.

In the opinion of the Visiting Mission, a major problem was that of creating adequate revenues so that the substantial contributions being made by the Administering Authority could be dispensed with. The Mission suggested that the Administering Authority should eliminate the budgetary deficit as far as possible during the period of Trusteeship by increasing the Territory's productivity, fully utilizing its taxable capacity, rationalizing the administrative structure and training Somalis to replace Italians in the Administration. The Mission also felt that the problem of outside assistance which might be necessary during the initial period of independence deserved some consideration at an early date.

Taking into account the Mission's statement that the only sound basis on which the independent State could be established was one of self-support, the Trusteeship Council called the attention of the inhabitants of the Territory and the Administering Authority to the importance of increasing the financial contribution of all sections of the population toward the Territory's expenses.

It was generally recognized by the Administering Authority, the Trusteeship Council and the Visiting Mission that new capital would have to be attracted to the Territory for any significant development of the general economy. The Mission noted that the possibilities of obtaining such capital were limited by the scarcity of fields for profitable investment and the nature of the Trusteeship Agreement, which provides for the termination of Trusteeship by 1960. The Administering Authority reported that it was seeking to encourage an increase in loans by Italian banks as well as aid from the United States ECA. The special representative of the Administering Authority pointed out, during the Trusteeship Council's eleventh session, that the solution of some problems, such as the permanent surfacing of roads and the construction of a harbour, required long-term investments that could only be advisable for reasons not strictly economic. He suggested that assistance from international financial organizations could probably enable the Administration to face such problems without slowing down developments in other fields.

In several petitions⁶² it was alleged that little or nothing was being done for the general economic development of the Territory. A number of petitions⁶³ requested financial and technical aid from the United Nations in developing the Territory. The Administering Authority, in reply, stated (T/978) that the progress made during 1951 towards the Territory's economic development could be verified from its annual report. It also observed that it placed its hopes chiefly in the studies carried out during the year by the United Nations Technical Assistance mission and stated that it hoped to attract foreign private capital and the public capital of international organizations, which it considered essential for the realization of an economic development plan.

The Trusteeship Council expressed its satisfaction with the improvement in the economic situation over 1950 and expressed the hope that continued improvement would be possible in future years. It noted that the report of the Technical Assistance mission would soon be available and that, after considering this report, the Administering Authority intended to draw up and submit to the Council a comprehensive plan of economic development. The Council commended the Administering Authority for co-operating with the specialized agencies and other international technical agencies and expressed the hope that the plan would be presented with the next annual report and that it would provide such a basis for economic development as would encourage both the investment of capital in the Territory and further assistance from international agencies.

e. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority reported that it was studying problems relating to nomadism, as had been requested by the Trusteeship Council in 1951, and that, after it had considered the report of the United Nations Technical Assistance mission, it would submit the results of its study to the Council probably in its next annual report. It was of the opinion that, because of environmental conditions, a majority of the population would be nomadic for some time to come, but it considered that steps could be taken in various parts of the Territory to improve their social and economic conditions and to ensure them a greater measure of security. It would be necessary in the far north to eliminate those factors which were gradually leading to the depopulation of the area and further south, in the Mudugh area, to solve problems arising from the provisional administrative boundary with Ethiopia. A balance would have to be obtained between herds on the one hand and pastures and water resources on the other, the Administering Authority stated, and commercial outlets developed for the economic utilization of livestock. The Administering Authority indicated that it had sought the aid of UNESCO in developing fundamental education projects among the nomadic population.

Recalling its earlier recommendations on the social aspects of nomadism in Somaliland, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that a comprehensive programme would be undertaken to solve the political, social and economic problems arising from nomadism and that the Administering Authority would report fully to the Council on all aspects of its effort to deal with the problem.

According to the annual report, the standard of living of the inhabitants had improved during 1951. The prices of locally produced commodities were generally lower than in 1950 and this, together with a gradual increase in wage levels and the payment of salary arrears to former soldiers and employees of the pre-war Italian administration, the Administering Authority stated, had increased the purchasing power of the population. Farmers had benefited from good harvests and an increase in the production of cash crops. An increase of 6 per cent was reported in the cost of living for a typical family in Mogadiscio with an income of about 150 somalos a month.

Several petitions⁶⁴ complained of the low standard of living and the poverty of the Somali people, stating that the cost of living was very high and increasing daily. It was alleged that prices had risen over 40 per cent since April 1950 and this was attributed to the high cost of Italian imports and expenditures on the military establishment and government salaries. In its observations (T/952 and Add.1 and T/996) on these petitions, the Administering Authority referred to the improvement in the situation over the previous year as stated in its annual report and added that both wholesale and retail prices were supervised.

One of the petitions (T/Pet.11/192) referred to a shortage of housing and increasing rents and suggested that a programme of housing development be drawn up and that the Administration assist builders and facilitate the establishment of building co-operatives. The Administering Authority observed (T/982 and 996) that substantial effort had been made to develop Somali quarters in Mogadiscio as part of a city planning scheme and that it had encouraged building by granting plots of land and had given financial assistance to establish the first building co-operative in Mogadiscio for Somali government employees. The co-operative had already built four apartment houses. Moreover, legislation had been enacted in 1950 controlling rentals and contracts and restricting landlords' powers of eviction.

At the request of the Administering Authority, the International Labour Organisation (ILO) sent a representative to Somaliland in 1951 to study labour conditions. In its report (T/935), ILO observed that lack of education, past serfdom or forced labour formerly associated with agricultural work, disease, malnutrition, climate, religion, superstition and custom, and the attitude towards money were all important factors in the Somali's failure to work regularly and to attain reasonable standards of output or quality. To improve the situation, ILO recommended, inter alia, incentives to better and more regular work, educational measures and improvements in labour legislation, including immediate steps to work out, in collaboration with the International Labour Office, a comprehensive labour code. The Administering Authority reported that it had already taken measures, in accordance with the ILO recommendations, to establish labour offices, labour inspectorate services, and a system of compulsory insurance for industrial workers against work-incurred accidents, and had drawn up legislation for the protection of women and child workers, abolished penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts and accepted ILO collaboration in drawing up a labour code.

The Visiting Mission considered the ILO report a useful analysis and noted the steps being taken by the Administration to implement the recommendations. It endorsed particularly the idea of a comprehensive labour code and felt that the question of labour incentives merited careful study. The development of a stable and efficient labour force was regarded by the Mission as particularly important in relation to economic advancement. The Mission also recommended that the Administering Authority take adequate measures to protect women workers, who, it noted, were commonly employed in agricultural and industrial enterprises.

A number of petitions⁶⁵ complained of the absence of trade unions and of adequate legislation governing the conditions of employment of Somalis. It was alleged by the Central Committee of the Somali Youth League (T/Pet.11/120) that Italian plantation owners had been trying to restore the former system of forced labour and that the introduction of joint farming enterprises was a disguised form of the system. Complaints of the existence of widespread unemployment were also contained in many petitions.⁶⁶

The Administering Authority pointed out (T/-978) that complete social legislation was being prepared, that the new labour inspectorates and labour offices supervised the observance of basic standards of labour and social security and that the labour offices were also responsible for finding work for unemployed persons and promoting the peaceful settlement of labour disputes. Regarding unemployment, it added that work was to be had, that a recent request for labourers for road work had gone unanswered, and that in the towns many Somalis would like to do easy work.

The Trusteeship Council noted with satisfaction that the Administering Authority had begun to implement the ILO recommendations and particularly that it had made arrangements for ILO assistance in the preparation of a comprehensive labour code which was to be adopted progressively. It asked to be kept fully informed of developments in this respect. In a resolution (510 (XI)), adopted on 9 July 1952 by 10 votes to 1, on one of the petitions (T/Pet.11/59/Add.1), the Council further expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would take all necessary measures to enact a labour code in the near future. In its report to the General Assembly, the Council also expressed the hope that the labour regulations contemplated for the protection of women and children, particularly in agricultural employment, would soon be drafted and put into force.

The prisons in the Territory, according to the Visiting Mission, were generally overcrowded and the prisoners inactive. The Mission considered that measures should be taken to improve this situation and that every effort to ensure that persons who, under existing regulations, might spend long periods in jail awaiting trial were separated from convicted prisoners. Observing that facilities for women prisoners and for juvenile delinquents were unsatisfactory, the Mission urged the establishment of a special penal institution for women and expressed the hope that a separate rehabilitation centre planned for juvenile delinquents would be completed earlier than was projected. The Administering Authority pointed out in its annual report that prisoners were generally employed within the prisons on such work as the upkeep and enlargement of buildings and the manufacture of clothing and furniture. The number of prisoners in the central prison at Mogadiscio would be reduced, the Administering Authority explained, as soon as the penal farm at Balad was completed. During the eleventh session of the Trusteeship Council, the special representative of the Administering Authority added that the prison situation had received particular attention in 1952 and financial provision had been made for the establishment of the agricultural penal settlement in the Balad zone and the rehabilitation centre for minors and for the remodelling of three prisons.

Several petitions⁶⁷ complained of bad prison conditions, stating that the prisons were unsanitary and filled beyond their capacity, that prisoners were treated harshly and that the food was unfit for consumption. The Administering Authority observed (T/959/Add.1 and T/982) in reply that the Mogadiscio prison had an infirmary directed by a doctor and that a daily sanitary inspection was carried out in other prisons by a physician.

The Trusteeship Council noted that the prison system was unsatisfactory, due largely to the inadequacy of existing buildings, and that the Administering Authority intended to remedy the situation by establishing modern penal institutions such as prison farms. It also noted the steps taken to provide new facilities for juvenile delinquents and to expand those for women and the measures contemplated to provide for the rehabilitation of prisoners through vocational training. The Council requested that more precise details on these measures be given in the next annual report.

It was alleged by the Guardie Carcerarie Somale (T/Pet.11/100) that prison guards were ill-treated by their supervisors whenever they applied for new uniforms or salary increases and that they were not given educational instruction. The Administering Authority stated (T/982) that the allegation of ill-treatment was without foundation and that salaries and working conditions were adequate. It also pointed out that the petitioners could attend the evening school for adults in Mogadiscio. By resolution 530 (XI), adopted by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention, on 10 July 1952, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would consider the possibility of extending in-service training facilities to prison guards.

The Administering Authority reported that it continued to publish Il Corriere della Somalia, the only daily newspaper in the Territory. A radio broadcasting station was opened in Mogadiscio in 1951 and programmes were broadcast four hours daily in Italian and Somali. It was alleged in petitions before the Trusteeship Council (T/Pet.11/103,117) that freedom of the Press did not exist in the Territory. These petitions, as well as another (T/Pet.11/66), also claimed that freedom of speech was denied.

One petition (T/Pet.11/119) alleged that human rights were ignored in the Territory and others⁶⁸ claimed that racial discrimination existed. Similar allegations, as referred to above, were made by various political groups, in particular the Somali Youth League. The Administering Authority stated (T/952 and 982), however, that these allegations were unfounded and assured the Trusteeship Council that human rights, freedom of speech and of the Press were fully protected.

Medical facilities, as described in the annual report, comprised four hospitals in Mogadiscio, eight secondary hospitals in the interior, sixteen infirmaries and 72 dispensaries in 1951, a considerable increase over the number reported in 1950. The number of doctors increased from 37 to 47 during 1951 and further increases were expected. The number of patients treated in 1951 was more than double that of the previous year. In the opinion of the Administering Authority, the level of education was not yet sufficient to warrant the establishment of a medical school, but a two-year course for medical assistants had been started to which nineteen out of 50 applicants were admitted. A one-year course was also offered for training dressers and nurses. The Administering Authority stated that a plan for the development of medical and health services, to be adopted in 1952, provided for increases in the number of infirmaries, dispensaries, staff and medical equipment. Other improvements to be made included the expansion of hospital services, ambulances to make hospitals in the interior more accessible to the more remote communities and the establishment of centres for combating the principal diseases, such as tuberculosis, malaria and syphilis. A Health Council was established in 1951 to study development plans and to advise on medical and health problems.

In the view of the Visiting Mission, health and sanitary conditions constituted a serious problem impeding social and economic development. The Mission felt that effective measures must be taken, particularly to reduce the danger of contamination of sources of drinking water. It also hoped that efforts to provide anti-malarial drugs and to control mosquitoes would be expanded, and considered that much could be done to combat prevalent diseases if drugs and medicines were made increasingly accessible to the population under the existing system of distribution. The Mission found that there were serious dietary deficiencies in certain areas, and starvation conditions in the north. It recommended that studies of dietary conditions be made to determine the remedial measures needed and expressed the hope that special treatment would be given to as many of the victims of malnutrition as could possibly be reached. It recommended that the Administering Authority should seek assistance and advice from the World Health Organization (WHO), the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) and the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF).

Many petitions⁶⁹ complained that medical services were inadequate, that there was a serious shortage of medicine, that medicines were not provided free even though Somalis could not afford to buy them and that the hospital diet was poor. The petitioners urged that more funds be allocated for the construction of hospitals and clinics and for the training of nurses. Four petitions⁷⁰ commended the Administration for the improvement of medical facilities.

In its observations on the petitions (T/952), the Administering Authority stated that over eight million somalos had been spent on medical services during the financial year 1950-51 as against over two million the preceding year and it referred to the increases in facilities and doctors during its administration of the Territory.

The Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would furnish detailed information on its plans for the development of medical and health services. Noting the existence of serious dietary deficiencies in certain areas, particularly in the north, the Council endorsed the Mission's recommendation that the Administering Authority seek help from WHO, FAO and UNICEF in the study and treatment of these problems.

With respect to five of the petitions (T/Pet.11/33, 70, 77, 106, 160) complaining of inadequate medical and educational facilities in their regions—Bardera, Brava, Afgoi and Alula—the Council, on 9 and 10 July 1952, adopted five resolutions recommending that the Administering Authority take all possible steps to improve those facilities and, in the case of Brava, that it stimulate the initiative and participation of the local population in the development of the area. Four of these resolutions (495 (XI), 519 (XI), 531 (XI), 572 (XI)) were adopted by 10 votes to 1, and one (516(XI)) by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

f. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority reported that the reorganization of the educational system, as well as its expansion, had been continued in 1951, and that a five-year plan for the development of education had been drawn up and submitted to UNESCO and to the United Nations Advisory Council as well as to the Territorial Council. This programme envisaged a total school enrolment of 40,000 students by 1955.

According to the annual report, the enrolment of students for the school year 1951-52 was 11,646, as compared with 7,479 during 1950-51. In the elementary schools, 484 were enrolled in Italian-type, 10,241 in Somali-type, and 160 in Indian and Pakistani schools; in the secondary schools, 328 were enrolled in Italian-type, 138 in Somali-type, and 71 in teacher-training schools; in the technical and special schools, 53 were enrolled in an elementary vocational school, 8 in a school for aeronautical specialists, 71 in a school for typists, 28 in a commercial course and 64 in the School of Political Administration. The number of elementary schools increased from 70 in 1950-51 to 113 in 1951-52 and expenditures increased from approximately 3 million somalos in 1950-51 to 4.6 million in 1951-52.

Education was free of charge in all Somali-type schools and in Italian-type primary schools. Italian and Arabic were the languages of instruction in the schools and the oral use of Somali was permitted. The Administering Authority stated that opinion differed among the Somalis themselves on the question of developing a written form of the Somali language.

The number and quality of Somali teachers was inadequate for the requirements of the Territory, the Administering Authority observed, and would be a serious problem for several years. A teacher-training programme functioned on the middle school level and only after the 1952-53 school year, when the students began graduating, could a teacher-type training school on a higher secondary level be established.

With few exceptions, the Administering Authority stated, no indigenous persons were prepared to undertake advanced secondary studies in 1951. However, it was felt that the best students graduating from the School of Political Administration in 1953 might attend, at least as auditors, courses in law, economics and political science in universities outside the Territory. Beginning with the school year 1952-53, some 30 students would be sent to Italy to follow secondary and teacher-training courses, and 22 students were scheduled to undertake studies at El-Azhar University in Egypt early in 1952.

Adult education had been offered only at the primary school level. The problem of mass education was to be the subject of a separate programme to be developed in collaboration with UNESCO.

The Visiting Mission found that education in the Territory was in the very early stages of development, that schools were few and that facilities outside Mogadiscio were of a low standard. The great majority of children had no access to schools and the rate of illiteracy was high. Problems of staffing were serious, particularly as a consequence of using both Italian and Arabic as the official languages of instruction. While the Mission saw no real alternative, for the time being, to the continued use of the Italian and Arabic languages as the media for instruction in the schools, it felt that emphasis must be placed increasingly on the development of a Somali written language and its use in furthering the educational development of the people, particularly with respect to mass education. The Visiting Mission also felt that greater emphasis should be given to the training of Somali teachers under the five-year plan.

The Mission was particularly impressed at the extent to which the United Nations was known throughout the Territory. It approved the efforts of the Administration and the Advisory Council to disseminate information on the United Nations in the Territory and supported the suggestion that, as far as possible, information materials be made available in Italian and Arabic and in sufficient quantities.

Many petitions⁷¹ before the Trusteeship Council contained complaints about inadequate educational facilities for Somalis. Some stated that the budget was spent mainly on the education of Italian children. It was also alleged that Italian and Somali pupils were completely segregated. It was requested that a sound system of education be established, that instruction be given in the principles of the Moslem faith and that students be enabled to attend educational institutions in other Moslem countries. In its observations (T/940, 952, 982) on the petitions, the Administering Authority stated that the greatest part of its expenditure on education was for the salaries of the teaching staff. In the elementary school system, schools of the Italian type had nineteen teachers as against 194 (77 Italians, six Libyans, 111 Somalis) in Somali-type schools. There was a comparable ratio with respect to expenditures on buildings and equipment. It was further stated by the Administering Authority that Somali students were admitted to secondary schools of the Italian type, and that Somali students would be regularly sent to Italy. Koranic schools existed for the teaching of the Islamic religion and many of these were intermittently subsidized by the Administration, which also encouraged the admission of Somalis to Islamic universities. However, there were as yet no students in the Territory prepared to undertake these studies.

The question of instruction in the Arabic language was also raised in numerous petitions.⁷² It was alleged that, in spite of the expressed wish of the population, Arabic was neither used nor taught in the schools. It was requested that teachers of Arabic should be obtained from neighbouring countries and that Somalis should be enabled to attend universities in Arab countries. In its observations (T/952, 982) on the petitions, the Administering Authority stated that in elementary schools the number of hours devoted to Arabic exceeded those devoted to any other subject, Italian included, and that Arabic was the only written language taught in the first two years; after that, both written Italian and Arabic were taught, but during the first two years Italian was taught in the spoken form only.

The Trusteeship Council expressed satisfaction at the increases in the number of elementary schools, in expenditures, in the total student enrolment and in the number of elementary school teachers. However, it recommended that still greater efforts be made to accelerate the expansion of educational facilities and that particular attention be given to the problem of increasing the number of Somali teachers. Noting with concern the absence of a written indigenous language, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would give particular attention to reducing the Somali language to written form, with the co-operation of UNESCO and other educational organizations. The Council further noted the steps taken in expanding the teaching of Arabic and expressed the hope that the question of the language of instruction would be considered by the Administering Authority and by the inhabitants from the standpoint of the long-range development of the indigenous Somali culture.

g. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS SEVENTH SESSION OF CONDITIONS IN SOMALILAND

At its 279th meeting on 19 November, the Fourth Committee acceded to a request of the Italian Observer to the United Nations to participate in the work of the Committee during the examination of the report of the Trusteeship Council (A/2150). The report, among other things, concerned the Trust Territory of Somaliland under Italian administration.

At the 282nd meeting of the Committee on 25 November, the Italian representative made a statement outlining the plans of his Government for the administration of Somaliland until it achieves independence in 1960.

He said that in April 1950 Somaliland was a country of limited natural resources and a largely nomadic population. In the last 30 months, however, Italy had laid the foundations of the political and educational system of the Territory.

The Italian representative said that development measures planned by the Administration included development of the councils, particularly the Territorial Council, which would become a legislative body and later a Constituent Assembly. Meanwhile, Italy had submitted to the United Nations a plan which envisaged, by January 1954, the reorganization of the Territorial Council into a body elected by direct universal suffrage as well as the establishment of a special electoral system for the nomadic population through the modernization of traditional tribal assemblies. The competence of the Council would be extended and its advice on some budgetary matters would become binding on the Administration. The first electoral experiment in Somaliland would take place the following February, when elections for the municipal councils would provide a "test" for the general elections to the Territorial Council in the autumn of 1953. Through the Territorial Council and other local and regional councils, the country had assemblies where all ethnical groups and all political trends were represented.

A reform of the administrative organization of the Territory was already being drafted, he added. Students graduating in the spring of 1953 from the political and administrative schools would be appointed direct to some of the district offices. Others would be given directive functions in central bureaus at Mogadiscio and in regional offices. Before 1958, when the Italian Government would submit to the Trusteeship Council a plan for transferring all functions to the independent Government of Somaliland, at least one of the six regions in the Territory would be entrusted to indigenous administrators, assisted by a skeleton Italian staff.

Somaliland would also shortly benefit from an organic judicial law drawn up with the co-operation of the United Nations Advisory Council. Among the projects to be put into effect immediately was the institution of a supreme judiciary and administrative court in Mogadiscio. This procedure would eliminate appeals to the courts in Italy. Within two years a project for the total transformation of penal institutions would be completed.

In the economic and social fields, agricultural co-operatives for the Somalis had been promoted, workmen's compensation made compulsory and profit-sharing contracts issued in the cultivation of cotton and sisal. The Government of Italy had also decided to send to the Territory an expert to advise in the development of the country's economy. Anti-malarial and anti-tuberculosis campaigns had been introduced.

In the field of education, school pupils, totalling 2,500 in 1950, now totalled 17,000. New secondary and professional schools were giving training in agriculture, industry, fisheries and navigation. Some 1,000 elementary classes would probably be in existence by 1956 and this figure should be more than doubled at the end of the Trusteeship period. By that time there would also be a considerable number of high schools and some pre-university classes, bringing the total school population to 100,000. Students were already going abroad to Italy and Egypt for special study.

At its 265th meeting on 6 November, the Committee granted requests for hearings to two political organizations in Somaliland—the Somali Youth League and the Unione Nazionale Somala. The request of the Somali Youth League was approved by a roll-call vote of 43 to 6, with 4 abstentions and that of the Unione Nazionale Somala by a roll-call vote of 46 to 4, with 4 abstentions.

Before the voting took place, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States emphasized that they did not oppose the right of petition but opposed "side-stepping" the machinery of the Trusteeship Council which had been established for hearing petitions. Following the voting, the representatives of France, the Netherlands and the United States explained that they had voted in favour of granting the second request—that of the Unione Nazionale Somala—because of the Committee's decision to grant a hearing to the first petitioner, the Somali Youth League.

The Committee heard statements by Abdullahi Issa, representing the Somali Youth League, and Haji Salah Scek Omar, representing the Unione Nazionale Somala, at its 313th meeting on 19 December. Both representatives replied to questions by members of the Committee at that meeting and at the 314th meeting on the same day.

Mr. Issa, speaking on behalf of the Somali Youth League, stated that since the General Assembly decided on 21 November 1949 that Somaliland would be granted independence after ten years under Italian administration, no steps had been taken to set up proper machinery to implement this solemn decision. Some Administering Powers, he alleged, seemed to hope for the failure of the "test case" of Somaliland to avoid precedent for other Territories now under the International Trusteeship System. Italy, as Administering Authority for Somaliland, he alleged, was violating the main provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement and the Declaration of Human Rights.

Former Fascist rulers, Mr. Issa asserted, were persecuting nationalist elements. Members of the Somali Youth League had been arrested and convicted on purely political grounds. Since last August these persecutions had been intensified and extended. Moreover, the Administration was alienating land from Somalis in favour of Italians and Italian private companies and was imprisoning Somalis who complained of this action. Fascist laws were still in force in the Territory, he stated, and the judiciary was still completely subordinated to the Administration. Because of this, all convictions on purely political grounds could be easily legalized.

Mr. Issa also complained of arbitrary arrests, the detention of Somalis without trial, the revival of tribalism as an instrument of a "divide-and-rule" policy and the lack of intention on the part of the Administering Authority to establish legislative or municipal councils elected by the people. The administration of the Territory was overstaffed with Italians, and Somalis were humiliated. Public schools were inadequate. The current economic crisis was "the worst Somaliland has ever known". Unemployment was high and the standard of living was declining rapidly. Petitions concerning these complaints had not been dealt with either by the United Nations Advisory Council for Somaliland or the Trusteeship Council, he maintained. He asked that an impartial mission be sent to the Territory, as soon as possible, to investigate.

He also asked that a special committee be established to ensure that the General Assembly's resolution on the Territory (289 B (V)) be successfully implemented. Moreover, as Somaliland could not achieve independence without economic stability, United Nations technical assistance should be urgently considered.

Mr. Omar told the Committee that he represented not only the Unione Nazionale Somala but also the Hisbia Dighil Mirifle, the Unione Africani, the Lega Progressista Somala, the Unione Gioventu Benadir, the Hidajet Islam and the Unione Bimal.

He said that the people of Somaliland aspired to the creation of a Somali State based on the principles of freedom and democracy, with unity and independence as a goal. The Unione Nazionale Somala hoped to achieve, through study and work, the fraternal association of all inhabitants of the Territory and the political, social and cultural evolution of all Somalis, as effective independence could be gained only in this way.

There was a tendency in certain circles to grant hearings to those elements which were noisiest; political agitation was rendering no service to his country.

He claimed that a regime of real freedom had been established in Somaliland, a fact to which the Trusteeship Council Visiting Mission could testify. His party had been able to approach members of the Italian Government in Rome, including the Prime Minister, and learn the principles which were to guide the administration of Somaliland. He was satisfied that Italy would make great sacrifices to see that independence was achieved by the Somalis.

The United Nations Advisory Council for Somaliland had always been ready to hear requests taken to it, he said. His party relied on the undertaking given by the Administration that it would "Somalize" the Administration, and it was hoped that when Trusteeship came to an end there would be a sufficiently large number of Somalis qualified to staff the administration. The standard of living had improved, cultivation of cotton had been extended and trade opportunities had been increased for the Somali people as a result of the facilities granted by the Administration.

Somaliland, however, was a poor country and it needed ports, roads and irrigation schemes if its resources were to be developed. He hoped that the United Nations would find a way of supplying technical assistance to this end. Though his people had faith in the Administration and his party was grateful for this assistance and would continue to support the Administration, the people of Somaliland wanted to speed up the development of their country. This required financing on a scale which the Italian people could not reasonably provide. For this reason, the people of Somaliland were turning to the United Nations for aid in the task already begun in Somaliland. It would, he asserted, be the best way of diffusing the spirit of the United Nations throughout Africa and of bringing solidarity and progress.

At the 314th meeting on 19 December, El Salvador introduced a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.270) whereby the General Assembly would:

(1) take note of the statements of the representatives of organizations of Somaliland under Italian Administration; (2) decide to transmit these statements and the comments of members of the Fourth Committee to the Trusteeship Council requesting it to give special attention to these questions, particularly with respect to the application of past recommendations relating to them, in the light of the statements of the petitioners and of the observations made in the Fourth Committee, and to report to the Assembly's eighth session; and (3) request the Council to consider the desirability of preparing a special questionnaire for Somaliland and of sending a separate Visiting Mission to that Territory, in view of its special position and of the fact that it would acquire independence in the next eight years, and include a report on this matter in its next report.

The representative of El Salvador subsequently accepted an oral suggestion by the representative of Indonesia that the draft should stipulate that the transmission should be made "without prejudice to future requests for oral hearings before the Fourth Committee" as well as some drafting amendments.

During the debate following the statements by the representatives from Somaliland, the representatives of Poland and the USSR maintained that the statement by the representative of the Somali Youth League showed that Italy was violating the terms of both the United Nations Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement. The draft resolution by El Salvador, these representatives held, was not an adequate answer to the problem, as it did not contain any concrete proposals which would enable the legitimate demands of the Somali people to be met. The representative of Yugoslavia stated that the peoples of Somaliland were entitled to expect assistance from the United Nations. Italy was bound to pursue a policy which would enable the Territory to stand independently at the end of the period of Trusteeship.

Support for the draft resolution by El Salvador was expressed by the representatives of Argentina, the Dominican Republic, Egypt and the Netherlands. The representatives of Argentina, Egypt and the Netherlands doubted, however, whether a need existed for sending a special Visiting Mission to the Territory, the representative of the Netherlands pointing out that a regular Visiting Mission would go to the Territory in two years. The representative of Argentina suggested orally that reference to a special mission be deleted from the draft; but when this suggestion was not accepted by the representative of El Salvador, he asked that a separate vote be taken on that part.

The representative of the Government of Italy said that his country had never failed to declare its firm determination to fulfil the task assigned to it by the General Assembly within the time-limit prescribed. Charges that land in the territory was being alienated in favour of Italians and that political persecution was being carried out were false; political liberty was enjoyed by all and freedom of movement and of speech were maintained.

The Committee voted on the draft resolution by El Salvador, as amended, at its 314th meeting on 19 December. In a separate vote it decided, by 23 votes to 12, with 6 abstentions, to ask the Trusteeship Council to consider the desirability of sending a separate Visiting Mission to Somaliland. The Committee then adopted the draft resolution as a whole by 30 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions.

The recommendation of the Fourth Committee (A/2342) was in turn adopted by the General Assembly at its 410th plenary meeting on 21 December 1952, in a roll-call vote of 46 in favour, 1 against, and 11 abstentions. Voing was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Liberia, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen.

Against: Belgium.

Abstaining: Australia, Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, France, Luxembourg, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Yugoslavia.

3. Tanganyika, Administered by the United Kingdom

Tanganyika, the largest of the Trust Territories, has a total area of 362,688 square miles, of which 20,000 are water. According to the Administering Authority's annual report,⁷³ the population was conservatively estimated at the end of 1951 at 7,700,000 Africans, 71,000 Asians and 16,000 Europeans, as compared with 7,332,539 Africans,

For detailed discussions of this report in the Trusteeship Council, see Trusteeship Council, Official Records, Eleventh Session (3 June-24 July 1952); summaries of the observations of individual members are included in the Council's report to the General Assembly (A/-2150). a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

Executive authority is vested in the Governor, who is assisted by an advisory Executive Council composed, at the end of 1951, of eight senior government officials and six appointed unofficial members; the latter included three Europeans, one Indian and one African. The Governor makes laws with the "advice and consent" of an appointed Legislative Council. This Council consists of the Governor, fifteen official and fourteen nominated unofficial members (four Africans, three Asians and seven Europeans).

The Administering Authority reported that the Committee on Constitutional Development, consisting of two official and all the non-official members of the Legislative Council, had presented a unanimous report proposing important changes at the central, regional and local government levels. The Visiting Mission sent to the Territory in 1951 noted in its report (T/946 and Corr.1) that the implementation of many of these proposals, if approved, would depend on the outcome of a further inquiry by a Commissioner appointed from outside the Territory. The Administering Authority subsequently informed the Trusteeship Council that this inquiry would start early in 1952.

The appointment in 1951 of the first African member of the Executive Council resulted from the Governor's acceptance of a recommendation by the Committee. Both the Visiting Mission and the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would consider increasing the African membership in the Executive Council as soon as possible. The Administering Authority observed that membership in this Council depended primarily on knowledge and experience and that Africans must first obtain training in local Government councils and the Legislative Council.

The latter Council, the Committee on Constitutional Development proposed, should be expanded to comprise the Governor, 21 official members and 21 unofficial members (seven Africans, seven Asians and seven Europeans).

The Committee favoured the retention of the official majority until sufficient experience had been gained in the enlarged Council. Explaining its proposal for the equal distribution of unofficial seats among the three main races, the Committee stated that it had found it impossible to assess their relative claims to representation on the basis of numbers, financial interests or political maturity, and had based its recommendations "on the need to obviate feelings of distrust and lack of confidence and to lay a sound foundation for future political development."⁷⁴

It considered that the reform of the legislature should follow within three years of the inauguration of local government institutions and that the details of the scheme and the preparation of an electoral system should be studied by a special committee. The Governor considered that this inquiry should be carried out by the Commissioner. Both he and the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies indicated that the new legislature should be established within five years of the approval in principle of the Committee's recommendations.

The Visiting Mission reported that the Committee's proposals concerning the Legislative Council, particularly the equal representation of the three main races, had occasioned more public discussion than any other aspect of the Committee's report. Petitions on the subject were also presented to the Mission from the Indian Association (T/Pet.2/116) and from African sources,⁷⁵ including the Tanganyika African Association, which the Mission regarded as representative of educated African opinion. Giving an account of the views of the various communities, the Mission stated that the Asian community was very much in favour of the Committee's proposals, of which, in the opinion of the other communities, it was the principal beneficiary. The Indian Association also advocated the immediate introduction of a common electoral roll for non-African communities and its eventual adoption for all communities. Tribal Africans made little comment on the reform proposals, the Mission reported, but the African Association desired an increase in the proportion of unofficial African members. In some cases the need for elective representation was stressed by Africans. Spokesmen of the Tanganyika African Association expressed the view that the Committee had made a genuine attempt to strike a blow at racialism, but informed the Mission that they were not satisfied with the proportion of unofficial seats proposed for Africans. Nevertheless, the Mission stated, they did not entirely exclude acceptance of the proposals if they could be satisfied that parity was only temporary. Members of the European community, the Mission noted, had been the most active in expressing their views, which were mostly unfavourable, on the Committee's report. Officers of the Tanganyika European Council, which claims to represent all unofficial Europeans in the Territory, expressed strong disapproval of the Committee's proposals other than its proposal for an electoral system for European and Asian unofficial members, the Mission reported.

The Mission was of the opinion that the time and methods for replacing the official majority with an unofficial majority were of the greatest importance, and should await the attainment by the African community of a political maturity more consonant with its position in the population as a whole. Meanwhile, the Administering Authority should retain direct legislative control until a more representative legislative body could be established. The Mission approved of the equal distribution of unofficial seats among the three main races as an interim measure but not as a satisfactory long-term solution. It hoped that the functioning of the proposed new Legislative Council would lead before long to a situation in which it would be possible to depart from the principle of communal representation, and believed that the use of a common electoral roll might form a bridge between the proposed system and a more representative one. The Mission doubted the wisdom of delaying the implementation of the reforms for five years. It stated that it appeared possible and preferable to proceed almost immediately to the election of European and Asian unofficial members; African members, it suggested, might continue to be appointed until an electoral system could be established for that community.

The Administering Authority stated (T/977) that it agreed with the Mission's views concerning the composition of the Legislative Council. Subsequently, the Trusteeship Council was informed, during its eleventh session, that the United Kingdom Government had accepted the recommendations of the Committee on Constitutional Development for the maintenance of an official majority and the equal distribution of unofficial seats.

The Trusteeship Council considered that, in Tanganyika's political development, communal interests should be subordinated to the interests of the Territory as a whole. It therefore endorsed the Mission's opinion that equal representation of the three main races in the legislature, though useful as an interim measure, did not offer a satisfactory long-term solution and the Mission's suggestion that the Administering Authority consider the use of a common electoral roll. The Council also expressed the hope that the overall development of the new political institutions would be rapid enough to permit the implementation of the legislative reforms before the end of five years.

On a regional level, advisory provincial councils had been established in 1949 and 1950 in two of the eight provinces of the Territory. The constitution of further councils had been postponed pending approval of the recommendations of the Committee on Constitutional Development as to the most desirable form of regional organization. The Committee proposed the decentralization of many of the administrative and executive services of the central Government and recommended the division of the Territory into regions much larger than the existing provinces, which it stated could not support the burden in staff, resources and finances required to operate the decentralized services. Regional councils should be established on an inter-racial basis and empowered to control regional policy and expenditure, the Committee suggested; for a limited period, they should have an official majority. The region should be subdivided into counties, which should be larger than the existing districts (numbering 55 in 1951, according to the Administering Authority's annual report). The Committee recommended the creation of inter-racial county councils throughout the Territory as the largest units of local government; these, it suggested, should usually have an unofficial majority. These councils would at first control only those matters affecting all races, such as the maintenance of roads, ferries and bridges, the establishment and control of markets, the conservation of natural resources and health services. Unofficial members of both the regional and county councils, the Committee proposed, should be nominated in the first instance and later chosen by election. The Committee considered that the introduction of the county councils should be the first step in implementing the proposed political reforms. This proposal was accepted in principle by the Governor, who informed the Visiting Mission that it was hoped that these councils would be working within a year.

In the Mission's opinion, the functions proposed for the county councils were by no means extensive. As to their composition, the Mission presumed that a majority of the non-official members in most cases would be Africans and that in the few areas where non-African settlement was particularly heavy, African representation would at least equal that accorded non-Africans. With regard to regional administration, the Mission noted that both the Governor and the Secretary of State for the Colonies had expressed doubt as to the desirability of implementing the Committee's proposals without the most serious consideration. The Mission considered that the situation should not be frozen while lengthy inquiries were being carried out and suggested that temporary measures be taken to improve regional organization. The Administering Authority's policy regarding the development of governmental machinery between the local and Territory-wide level, the Mission stated, should be established with all possible speed. Endorsing this statement, the Trusteeship Council requested the Administering Authority to include in its next annual report full information on the results of its deliberations.

Local government bodies in the Territory are of two types, urban and rural, and consisted in 1951, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, of 30 Township Authorities, one Municipal Council (in Dar-es-Salaam) and 435 Native Authorities. The Committee on Constitutional Development recommended that these urban and rural authorities should continue to be responsible to the central Government rather than to the proposed county councils.

The Administering Authority stated that it attached importance to the development of municipal councils and other autonomous local government bodies, that the township of Tanga was moving towards full municipal status, and that the granting of autonomous status to other major townships was being considered. The Township Authorities usually consist of the District Commissioner as Chairman, a majority of official members and nominated unofficial members. The number of unofficial members, the Administering Authority reported, was steadily increasing. The Municipal Council of Dar-es-Salaam and the Township Authority of Tanga both had a large unofficial majority and equal representation of the three main races. Increased African representation in the urban institutions was requested in a petition (T/Pet.2/130) from Africans in Tanga.

The Committee on Constitutional Development recommended that the councils of the major townships should be made corporate bodies, should be empowered to make by-laws and should be given fiscal autonomy. Official membership of all town councils, the Committee proposed, should be progressively reduced and non-racial elective representation, based on wards, should be introduced. The Visiting Mission agreed with these recommendations.

The great majority of the African population of the Territory is subject to the system of "indirect administration" under which the conduct of its affairs is in the hands of the Native Authorities. These Authorities, except in a few areas, are the hereditary or partly hereditary rulers of the people under traditional tribal systems.

The Administering Authority stated that its general policy was to modify and develop the traditional tribal structure to bring it into conformity with modern conceptions of local government. Accordingly, it encouraged the federation or amalgamation of disconnected tribal units and the establishment of district councils and subordinate division, area and chiefdom councils. In the more backward areas, these councils were often merely advisory to the Native Authorities. In more advanced areas, they had taken over local legislative powers from the Native Authorities and had in some instances assumed some executive powers. The Administering Authority explained that the extent to which such councils had been introduced and their composition and powers depended on the widely different conditions and development of the various tribal communities, but it felt that definite progress towards uniformity had been made during 1951. The Councils usually comprise the Native Authority, sub-chiefs, elected commoners and a number of nominated members.

The Visiting Mission was favourably impressed with the efforts of the Administering Authority to develop African political institutions and described the far-reaching reforms taking place in certain regions where councils containing an increased proportion of elected representatives were being established. On the other hand, the Mission noted the uneven quality of councils in some regions, and reported that it had spoken with chiefs of areas in the interior which were far too backward to have a system of councils.

On the whole, however, the Mission concluded that development was proceeding along sound lines. It considered that the time had come for a major recasting of the legislation governing the activities of Native Authorities and district councils and observed that it should be possible to decide on a pattern of African local government for the whole Territory even though it might be possible to introduce it at the present time only in a few areas. A more precise enumeration of the functions and financial powers, which were divided largely on an ad hoc basis between the central Government and the Native Authorities, also appeared to be required, the Mission stated. The Mission also stressed the need for attracting more educated Africans into local government employment and for raising the pay and other conditions of service of Native Authority employees to a level comparable to that of the central Government Service. Finally, the Mission suggested that Tanganyika Government officials should take more dynamic action to develop the backward areas politically. Commenting on this last suggestion, the Administering Authority stated (T/977) that action taken so far had, except in a few areas, been well in advance of public demand and that persuasion, rather than coercion, was the most effective means of promoting new developments.

The Trusteeship Council expressed its approval of the general policy and efforts of the Administering Authority and noted that, on the whole, the development of African local government was proceeding on sound lines. It endorsed the Mission's view concerning the recasting of the relevant legislation.

Commenting generally on political development, the Visiting Mission stated that a considerable measure of progress must still be achieved before the ultimate goal of self-government or independence could be realized, and that the development of a sense of territorial consciousness amongst all inhabitants of Tanganyika was perhaps the most important step to be taken in this direction. It felt that preliminary steps should be taken by the Government and the various communities to eliminate the existing pattern of a strictly communal development and considered that the Administering Authority should encourage African political associations, particularly those working in tribal areas.

The Administering Authority cited (T/977) its efforts to encourage amalgamations and federations of tribal units as an important step in that direction. These efforts of the Administering Authority were noted with approval by the Trusteeship Council.

The Mission referred to complaints by some educated Africans that the immigrant communities claimed all the privileges of inhabitants of the Territory, but retained the nationality and other advantages of their country of origin. It suggested that the situation might be improved by the establishment, in the law of the Territory, of a status of citizen of Tanganyika applying to all persons of whatever origin or nationality genuinely domiciled in the Territory; it added that such a citizenship would, in its opinion, contribute greatly toward the development of a territorial consciousness. This suggestion was endorsed by the Trusteeship Council. The Administering Authority stated that it was considering the question and agreed that all persons genuinely domiciled in the Territory must be regarded as inhabitants within the meaning of the Charter,⁷⁶ but it must also give special protection, where necessary, to the interests of the African population.

The central Government service, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, comprised 35 departments and offices functioning in Tanganyika apart from those departments and services administered jointly with those of Kenya and Uganda under the East Africa High Commission.⁷⁷ During 1951, 2,599 Europeans, 1,259 Asians and 12,381 Africans were employed in the various territorial departments. The Government Service includes a Senior Service for personnel holding responsible posts or possessing technical qualifications and a Junior Service for other employees who have passed the necessary entrance examinations.

In a number of petitions⁷⁸ received by the Visiting Mission from Africans, including associations of Government servants, the petitioners claimed that any European was automatically placed in the Senior Service and that many Africans in the Junior Service were performing the same type of work as Europeans with the same academic or other qualifications in the Senior Service. Without disputing the case for an expatriation allowance, they expressed resentment that Europeans normally residing in East Africa were paid at the same rate as officers recruited from overseas, while Asians and Africans who might be promoted to the Senior Service received only three-fifths of the salary paid Europeans in the same positions.

The Mission reported that spokesmen of the Asian community made similar complaints with respect to the admission of Asians to the Senior Service. It found that one African and a number of Asians with long service had been promoted to that Service.

The Administering Authority stated (T/953/Add.1,2,4, and T/977) that the declared object of the creation of the Junior and Senior Services had been the establishment of a civil service on non-racial lines. Promotion from the Junior to the Senior Service was dependent on personal qualifications, irrespective of race. The Administering Authority expressed regret that so few Africans had qualified, but indicated that several individual cases were being made the subject of special consideration. At the same time, it cautioned that a relaxation of standards might react ultimately to the disadvantage of the Service as a whole and that the promotion of inadequately equipped officers, who would in consequence have to be qualified as "failures", would prejudice rather than advance the interests of African civil servants generally. It was true that in a few cases Africans performed similar duties to those carried out by members of other races, but with few exceptions African employees were still of lower efficiency. As regards obtaining the necessary academic qualifications for the more senior posts, the Administering Authority pointed out that the facilities now offered by Makerere College, in Uganda (see below under Educational Development), had materially improved the position. With respect to salaries, it observed that Africans had benefited proportionally more than Asians or Europeans from the revisions made in 1948.

As had been suggested by the Visiting Mission, the Trusteeship Council recommended that the Administering Authority institute a uniform scale of basic salaries for officials regardless of country of origin for positions in both the Senior and Junior Services, and that this scale should be supplemented by a system of expatriation allowances for personnel not domiciled in East Africa, and of efficiency differentials where these were felt to be applicable. The Council further suggested that the Administration should provide increased access to educational facilities so that appropriate qualifications might be obtained for direct entry to the Senior Service. It expressed the hope that the recent elevation of Makerere College to the status of a university college would lead to its degrees being recognized for this purpose.

According to the Administering Authority's report, administrative officers served as magistrates in most of the ordinary subordinate courts, but the number of resident magistrates with solely judicial duties increased from eighteen in 1950 to 20 in 1951. Both the Visiting Mission and the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the number of resident magistrates would be progressively increased. The Mission was of the opinion that the judicial organization of the Territory was being developed along sound lines. It observed, with respect to the Native court system, that the Government was encouraging the development of the various forms of customary law and the separation of judicial functions from the traditional functions of Native Authorities, particularly under a new constitution for the Chagga tribe. This policy was noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Tanganyika is primarily an agricultural country but has great potential mineral wealth. The Territory has few industries and these are mainly concerned with the processing of raw materials; new factories which had been or were about to be established included, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, a meat packing factory, a paint factory, canning works, a second brewery at Dar-es-Salaam and a large cement works. The Administering Authority reported a continued improvement in the economic situation during 1951. Total imports and exports amounted, respectively, to £31,642,508 and £41,497,471, a total volume considerably over that for 1950 and almost three times that for 1947.

In its report for 1951, the Administering Authority stated that total revenue on the Territorial and development accounts in 1950 amounted to £13,323,763 and expenditure to £13,560,957; each of these figures represented about £1 million more than the estimates given in the previous report. Taxes accounted for 73.5 per cent of the Territorial revenue during 1950. Of this percentage, three fifths was from indirect taxes, mainly customs and excise duties, and the balance from direct taxes, including income and non-Native poll and education taxes, and Native house and poll taxes. The Native house and poll taxes continued to be fixed at flat rates, varying in different localities. A petition (T/Pet.2/121) complained that taxes were increased without due notification, but this was denied by the Administering Authority (T/953/Add.2).

The total value of agricultural production during 1951 was £58,487,700. The bulk of the African produce is consumed locally, but the indigenous inhabitants also produce certain cash crops, including about two-thirds of the coffee and most of the cotton, hides and skins. Sisal, the most important commercial crop and the largest revenue earner for the Territory, is produced almost exclusively by non-indigenous inhabitants. Sisal production was estimated to have increased in 1951 by some 20 per cent over that of 1950, when sisal exports amounted to 118,909 tons valued at £11,846,057. The Visiting Mission, noting the annual increases in the production and the market price of sisal, expressed the view that the industry should make a more substantial contribution to the Territorial revenue than the existing export duty of 5 per cent ad valorem. The Administering Authority replied (T/977) that it had been decided after careful consideration not to increase the tax rate. It pointed out that the industry had been recovering from the effects of low prices and that the high prices of recent years had enabled the industry to renew machinery, plant and equipment and carry out necessary capital developments; moreover, the continuance of high prices was not certain.

The Administering Authority indicated that its economic policy was directed primarily toward making the Territory self-sufficient in essential food supplies. It reported that 60,350 tons of grain had been stored at central points throughout the Territory in 1951. Measures to improve cultivation and animal husbandry were continued. In particular, progress was made in the large-scale development schemes for the reclamation of areas hitherto uncultivable because of insufficient water and the prevalence of the tsetse fly. The most important of these schemes were in the Sukumaland and Mbulu Districts.⁷⁹ The Visiting Mission reported that water had been provided for 2,500 of the 9,000 square miles of previously unoccupied land in the former area. Schemes for the general development of other areas had also been introduced or were contemplated. Some of these were financed by the Administering Authority under the Ten-Year Development and Welfare Plan; others were financed and carried out by the indigenous inhabitants. Pilot experiments in mechanized ploughing were being carried out in several areas, and on an increasing scale in rice-growing areas. Demonstration farms were established as one means of improving animal husbandry. Cattle disease control measures were proving successful and the Mission was told that it was not unusual for primitive tribesmen to make long journeys to buy hypodermic needles and dimidium bromide to protect their cattle from trypanosomiasis. Dipping or spraying had been introduced to combat east coast fever. The Administering Authority also reported, inter alia, that additional facilities were being built for training agricultural and veterinary instructors, that the Territory's agricultural services were being continually strengthened, and that scientific experimentation and research were being developed.

With respect to the Overseas Food Corporation's groundnut scheme, the Administering Authority reported that the reduction in the scope of the scheme had interfered with some of its welfare aspects, such as the establishment of model communities. Nevertheless, the Administering Authority stated that the immediate benefits of the scheme had been considerable—new port installations, railway communications, and the establishment, in several groundnut areas, of ancillary services, such as aerodromes, roads, water supplies, power stations, workshops, hospitals, schools and new townships. The Visiting Mission also commented that, although £32 million of the sums advanced to the Corporation had had to be written off, the expenditure of much of this money in Tanganyika had stimulated general economic development.

Under a new scheme undertaken by the Colonial Development Corporation at Njombe, it is proposed to plant some 30,000 acres of wattle by 1955 and to establish a factory for extracting tannin from wattle bark. By the end of 1951, the Administering Authority reported, 13,000 acres of land had been cleared and 5,000 acres planted.

The Visiting Mission praised the Administering Authority's efforts to improve agriculture and animal husbandry and considered that general development schemes for particular areas constituted the most satisfactory method of dealing with the problem. It noted, however, that many regions were not covered. The scope of the problem was enormous, the Mission stated, and a much greater capital investment would be required to bring into production large areas now tsetse-infested and insufficiently watered and to exploit fully the possibilities of mechanization. In some areas, large contributions from development funds might not be required. It appeared to the Mission that African co-operation was best assured if funds were made available to districts to supplement their own self-help, as in the Mbulu scheme. In many respects, the most satisfactory experiment seen by the Mission was in the Pare District, where a mass literacy campaign had had the effect of stimulating interest in improved methods of land utilization. However, no development scheme, as such, existed in that District and there were few officials and limited government funds available. An additional allocation of staff and funds to this District, the Mission felt, would be amply repaid.

⁷⁹ See Y.U.N., 1951, p. 707.

The Administering Authority indicated (T/977) that it shared the Mission's views and would examine its suggestion for the provision of more assistance to the Pare District.

The emphasis placed by the Administering Authority on self-sufficiency in food supplies was approved by the Trusteeship Council, which expressed interest in the experiments being carried out in mechanized cultivation and in the progress of mechanized rice cultivation. The Council recommended that, as soon as satisfactory methods were evolved, the Administration encourage further mechanization and continue increasing its efforts to improve African agriculture and animal husbandry. It also expressed the hope that the success of the Sukumaland and Mbulu development schemes would lead to the establishment of similar schemes in other regions not yet covered by such schemes.

The Arusha Citizens Union, in a petition (T/Pet.2/146) examined by the Council at its eleventh session, complained against the compulsory measures which required African agriculturalists to maintain the fertility of their land, to plant certain food crops as insurance against the failure of others and to submit their livestock to inoculation or dipping, and which restricted the felling of trees in certain areas. Similar complaints were made in another petition (T/Pet.2/156); one petitioner (T/Pet.2/124), on the other hand, claimed that not enough was being done to combat soil erosion.

The Administering Authority pointed out (T/953/Add.2) that some of the measures were departures from traditional methods of cultivation. While many appreciated their value and carried them out willingly, others were actively opposed. Every effort was being made, by propaganda, instruction and demonstration, to persuade the agriculturalist of the need to improve farming methods and to preserve land fertility.

On 10 July 1952, by a vote of 10 to 1, the Trusteeship Council adopted a resolution (484 (XI)) on the petition from the Arusha Citizens Union. It recommended that the Administering Authority continue carrying out its propaganda campaign emphasizing the dangers of soil erosion and the measures employed to combat it and that it also carry out a propaganda campaign in favour of a selective reduction in the number of livestock in the Arusha District. The Council urged the Union to co-operate with the Administering Authority in its programme of re-forestation.

Apart from agriculture and animal husbandry, the most important economic activity of the Territory is mining, which is almost exclusively in the hands of private non-indigenous enterprise. Minerals exploited in 1951 were valued at £1,568,979. In 1950 and 1951 gold was the chief mineral exported, exports being valued at £824,047 and £847,832 (provisional estimate), respectively, for these two years. The value of diamond exports fell from £1,010,000 in 1949 to about £86,749 in 1951, due to a dispute between the principal producer, Williamson's Diamonds Ltd. and the overseas buyers. Tin ore, salt and mica are among other minerals exploited. Large deposits of other minerals, including lead, titanium magnetite, iron ore, coal and tungsten, are known to exist but have not yet been exploited. The Administering Authority reported that the Colonial Development Corporation was investigating the coal deposits in the Ruhuhu area. These deposits, it was stated, contain sufficient coal to meet total East African requirements for many years and to permit the exploitation of large iron ore deposits at Liganga. The building of the necessary rail and road communications was under consideration. A new railway, it was pointed out by the Mission, would also facilitate production and transport of African cash crops in the area. In view of the interest previously expressed by the Trusteeship Council in the revenue accruing to the Territorial budget from mining operations, the Mission inquired into this matter and was informed that royalties from mining due in 1950 amounted to £140,000, and that royalties and income tax payable by Williamson's Diamonds Ltd., amounted to 14 shillings in each pound of its profits.

Petitions asking that prospecting for gold and diamonds be open to all races (T/Pet.2/150) and that the minerals be exploited by Africans for the welfare of their country and not remain in the hands of individual foreigners (T/Pet.2/144) were before the Council at its eleventh session. The Administering Authority observed (T/953/Add.2 and 4) that, except for diamond prospecting, which was strictly controlled, rights to prospect could be obtained by anyone capable of understanding and complying with the relevant laws and regulations. While a number of Africans were engaged in mining, the Administering Authority stated, Africans generally had neither the experience nor the resources necessary for extensive mining operations and to restrict mineral exploitation to them would not be to the advantage of the Territorial welfare.

Indigenous participation in the economic life of the Territory, the Administering Authority indicated, was largely confined to the production of primary agricultural products and animal husbandry, activities which were increasingly being organized on a co-operative basis. In 1951 there were 138 registered co-operatives with a total membership of 105,762,126; of these, 126 were primarily engaged in marketing produce, supplying agricultural requisites, providing storage accommodation and, to a lesser extent, processing.

The Visiting Mission felt that means should be found to enable Africans to participate more fully in the economic life of the Territory and not be confined to subsistence farming or unskilled labour; it suggested, in particular, that indigenous production and marketing of cash crops might serve as the basis for building such participation. In this connexion, the Mission was particularly impressed with the benefits derived by the Chagga tribe from the cultivation and sale of coffee and from the improvements made in the Moshi District by the Kilimanjaro Native Co-operative Union, Ltd., which markets the coffee. The Mission noted, however, that the entire Moshi District coffee crop was sold under a contract with the Ministry of Food, which paid much less than the world market price. It stated that in the Bukoba District, where part of the crop was auctioned on the Mombasa market, producers benefited to a greater extent from the sharp increases in coffee prices. But the price paid was still lower than that paid to producers, for example in Ruanda-Urundi, and much dissatisfaction had resulted among the Bukoba producers. In both Districts, regulatory powers with respect to the whole coffee industry were vested in Native Coffee Boards with official majorities. The Administering Authority observed (T/977) that the Ministry of Food had agreed to increases in the contract prices for future sales and had also paid a bonus on previous sales. Petitions from the Bukoba District (T/Pet.2/148 and 154) complained that the African coffee producers were paid inadequate prices and were not permitted to sell their produce freely through their co-operatives wherever the highest prices prevailed, in particular in Ruanda-Urundi and Uganda, and that as a result profits were being made by smuggling coffee into these areas. The Administering Authority acknowledged (T/953/Add.4) that smugglers and black-marketeters had been active in the District but hoped that the increased official prices now being paid would reduce the temptation to sell other than through approved agencies.

The Trusteeship Council noted that the Visiting Mission had expressed the view that indigenous local producers of export crops should benefit fully from rising world prices. Accordingly, it recommended that long-term contracts between marketing co-operatives and the Ministry of Food should be kept under constant review.

Several other petitions (T/Pet2/103, 104, 150) also requested the removal of barriers to trade with Ruanda-Urundi and other neighbouring territories and asked that the foreign trade of Tanganyika be opened to all nations. In reply, the Administering Authority stated (T/953/Add.3 and 4) that no discriminatory barriers to trade existed and that trade with Ruanda-Urundi was not forbidden but that the difference in currency gave rise to difficulties. It added that trade in livestock, of particular interest to the petitioners, was restricted owing to the need for rinderpest control measures.

The Trusteeship Council considered that co-operatives were the most effective way in which Africans could compete in trade at the present time. In this connexion, the Council noted the success achieved by existing co-operatives, particularly the Kilimanjaro Native Co-operative Union, Ltd. It expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to encourage co-operatives and would expand the part they played in the general economy of the Territory.

The Visiting Mission considered that better credit facilities should be provided for Africans wishing to establish themselves in trade or to improve their agricultural methods. The Mission found that individual Africans had difficulty in obtaining credit and this was also reflected in several petitions (T/Pet.2/103, 108, 120, 150). Africans were unable to secure funds largely because they could offer no security, the Mission stated. Few, if any, enjoyed a security of land tenure that would qualify them for loans from the Loan Bank, and the guarantee of the local Native Authority required for Africans to obtain credit from the Local Development Loan Fund was rarely given.

In its observations on the petitions (T/953/Add.4), the Administering Authority agreed that many Africans would welcome the idea of a wide extension of loans, but there was a limit to the money which could be made available and adequate safeguards were needed in the use of public funds for such purposes.

In commenting on the Mission's report, the Administering Authority stated that it fully appreciated the importance of associating Africans more broadly in the economic life of the Territory and that it would continue to make every effort to achieve this objective. It added that the suggestions made by the Mission for hastening this process would receive careful consideration.

The Administering Authority reported that a new and more comprehensive development plan was being prepared. Meanwhile, the existing Ten-Year Development and Welfare Plan was regarded as satisfactory for immediately necessary projects. As revised in 1950, this Plan contemplates an expenditure of over £24 million during 1950-56. Top priority under the Plan is given to the conservation and development of natural resources, involving an expenditure of some £4.3 million and including 63 schemes directed primarily to developing self-sufficiency in primary foodstuffs and to the further development and control of water resources. Referring to a suggestion made in 1950 by the Trusteeship Council concerning schemes for the provision of cheap hydro-electricity, the Administering Authority reported that several small electricity schemes had been inaugurated in 1951 and that further possibilities would be kept under review. The limited extent of permanent natural water supplies, however, was a serious obstacle to the promotion of large-scale hydro-electric schemes. This factor was also recognized by the Mission, which nevertheless considered that further investigations should be made in this field.

The improvement of communications is the second item in order of priority under the Plan and the first in terms of expenditure. It is proposed to spend over £8 million, including nearly £5 million on the development of major roads. The Visiting Mission considered that the improvement of communications was a prerequisite to the substantial development of Tanganyika and that the projects being carried out or under consideration would considerably improve the situation. The need for improved communications was also raised in three petitions (T/Pet.2/106, 108 and 110), and the Administering Authority in reply (T/953/Add.2 and 4), pointed to the high priority it had been given. Two of the petitioners requested that a railway be built linking the Northern and Lake Provinces, but this, the Administering Authority stated, could not at present be contemplated for economic reasons.

The Visiting Mission observed that the Territory's development was being undertaken by a diversity of agencies and expressed the hope that, with respect to activities of agencies other than the Tanganyika Government itself, appropriate measures would be taken to protect the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory. Noting that it was the stated intention of the United Kingdom Government to transfer control of the operations of the Overseas Food Corporation to the Tanganyika Government, the Mission considered that the principle of transfer to Territorial control should also be applied to the activities of the Colonial Development Corporation. The Mission also pointed to the need for proper government control over large private development projects in the Territory. In this connexion, the Mission expressed satisfaction with existing safeguards in the diamond industry and the Rondo Plateau timber concession in which the Territory and the concessionaires will share equally in the net profits. In the former case, under an agreement with the Williamson's Diamonds Ltd., control over the Company cannot be transferred without the consent of the Tanganyika Government. The Mission expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to exercise vigilance with respect to such private concessions. The Administering Authority (T/977) noted the Mission's views.

The Trusteeship Council expressed satisfaction at the rapid rate of economic development in the Territory and noted the Administering Authority's assurances on the need for sufficient government control over private development schemes to safeguard the interests of the inhabitants.

It was alleged in a petition (T/Pet.2/124) that the Administering Authority was discouraging private enterprise and the investment of private capital because this would lead to rapid industrial development and thus deprive the United Kingdom of a market for its manufactured goods; instead, it was stated, the Administering Authority preferred to develop, under nationalized schemes, only those industries which would benefit it. In reply, the Administering Authority commented (T/953/Add.2) that development by private enterprise was encouraged by every legitimate means and that "nationalized schemes" were introduced only when private investment was not forthcoming or when projects were unsuitable for private enterprise.

The Administering Authority reported that of the total land area, 3,569 square miles, or 1 per cent was held by non-Africans in 1951—1,486 square miles on freehold and 2,083 on rights of occupancy, mainly on 99-year leases. It informed the Visiting Mission that the percentage of land alienated would probably never reach 10 per cent of the total land area and estimated that it would be possible to provide land for only some 500 additional non-African farmers in the next few years. Land was no longer auctioned, but was granted to individuals or companies after careful selection with the objective of making the best possible use of land and increasing the production of foodstuffs.

A Land Utilization Board had replaced the Land Settlement Board. The Mission pointed out that the complaints it had heard that there was insufficient African representation on the Board and its provincial committees had some justification and the Administering Authority replied (T/977) that it would consider increasing such representation.

The Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority's intention of strengthening African representation on the Land Utilization Board would soon be implemented in a liberal manner.

The Mission received a large number of petitions⁸⁰ concerning the land policy. The petitioners requested that alienation be curtailed and that proper consideration be given to the present and future needs of Africans. They complained that land was taken away from Africans without sufficient compensation and that the maximum of 99 years for leases to non-African settlers was too long. The small compensation paid Africans for their land was contrasted to the very large sums paid to Europeans whose estates had been compulsorily acquired in more heavily settled areas. A number of Arabs and Africans claimed (T/Pet.2/119) that land owned by their families for generations had been taken by the Government for housing purposes and that they had received compensation only for the trees on the land.

Commenting on these petitions, the Administering Authority stated (T/953/Add.1-4) that land was alienated only where it would not endanger the present or foreseeable rights and interests of the indigenous population, and where utilization of at present unoccupied or undeveloped land would contribute to the Territory's economic advancement. The amount of compensation paid depended on the form of tenure, the Administering Authority explained. For freehold, the owner could claim full value, but in the case of tribal tenure, compensation would be paid only for the loss of usufructory rights, for improvements to the land and for disturbance.

The Mission also received complaints from Asians (T/Pet.2/116) who claimed that preference was given to Europeans in the allocation of ex-enemy estates and other lease-hold land. The Administering Authority assured the Trusteeship Council that no discrimination existed in this matter (T/953/Add.2).

The Mission reported that to some extent the existing attitude of suspicion and alarm over the land question seemed to be associated with the fear that an increase in European settlers might lead to their political predominance. This fear might abate, the Mission suggested, if the new constitutional proposals were adopted. The Mission realized that private capital must be attracted to the Territory and agreed that there was no over-all shortage of land in the Territory. Nevertheless, it was struck by the fact that most of the alienated land it saw was of good quality and situated in areas having a good climate and rainfall. It was told that, in general, such conditions were essential for successful non-African settlement by individual farmers. The amount of such land still available was limited and, while much of it might be surplus to present African requirements, proposals to alienate it for as long as 99 years must be considered with the greatest caution. The Mission therefore considered that the Administering Authority and the Trusteeship Council should watch developments in this field with close attention. Noting that one of the functions of the Land Utilization Board was to encourage the development of a suitable system of land tenure for Africans, the Mission suggested that this aspect of the Board's work be pursued without delay. The Trusteeship Council accordingly made a recommendation to this effect and suggested that the Board take into account any recommendations that might be formulated by the Council's Committee on Rural Economic Development.⁸¹

The Mission observed that land shortages existed in a number of areas. The most marked examples, it stated, occurred in the Moshi and Arusha Districts in the areas surrounding Mounts Kilimanjaro and Meru, respectively. The Chagga, whose situation had previously been examined by the Trusteeship Council,⁸² seemed reasonably satisfied with the settlement reached in their case; as a result of their previous petition, some of the alienated lands in the Kilimanjaro area had reverted to them. In a further petition (T/Pet.2/-137) received by the Visiting Mission, however, the Chagga Council stated that little or nothing had been done to develop the lower areas. They asked that the Government accelerate its efforts to provide water, roads, dispensaries, schools and other necessary facilities, and to eradicate the tsetse fly. Pointing out that the delay had been due to difficulties in ensuring adequate water supplies, the Administering Authority stated that it was also anxious to develop the lower areas as soon as possible (T/953/Add.2).

The tribes in the Arusha District, the Mission reported, seemed less satisfied than the Chagga'. It was proposed to alienate land held by Africans in the Mount Meru area to form a homogeneous non-African bloc to be used as an infection-free, compulsory dipping area for cattle ranching, and some 360 Wa-Meru families in the Nagare-Nayuki and Leguruki areas would be transferred elsewhere when new areas had been properly developed.⁸³ The balance of the Wa-Meru tribe would receive about 10,900 acres on the slopes of Mount Meru. At a public meeting, the Mission received a petition (T/Pet.2/142) from the elders of the tribe requesting that they be given additional farm plots not yet alienated and that no new lands be alienated in the future. As regards the Arusha tribe, the Mission reported that it was proposed merely to improve access to the lower expansion areas.

Representatives of the Arusha claimed (T/Pet.2/144 and 146) that the land at their disposal had been reduced several times by periodic expansion of the Arusha township and that the land outside the belt of European settlement surrounding them was too dry for an agricultural tribe like theirs. The Administering Authority stated (T/953/Add.2), on the contrary, that the township had been reduced to a quarter of its original size and would not be expanded until the fullest possible use had been made of area available within the township; while it was true that Africans were moved in 1930, the Administering Authority added, they suffered no hardship and all received compensation and alternative land.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

In its annual report, the Administering Authority stated that the cost of living had continued to rise and that generally, during 1951, there had been a tendency towards a shortage of money in the towns and a shortage of goods in the rural areas. In the opinion of the Visiting Mission, the standard of living was low in many parts of the Territory. The Mission also pointed out that there was a definite population movement by Africans from rural to urban areas and the problem of their standard of living was becoming of increasing importance. From a limited survey carried out in 1951, the Mission noted that living conditions appeared difficult for the lower-paid Africans in the towns. The Mission considered that more detailed studies of these conditions should be made with a view to ensuring reasonable minimum wages.

The Administering Authority reported that in 1951 there were 455,398 Africans in paid employment in Tanganyika, mainly in agriculture (232,481, including 126,723 employed on 180 sisal plantations), construction (45,034), central and local Government (31,212), manufactures and electricity (26,022), transportation (24,120), wholesale and retail undertakings (19,949) and mining and quarrying (18,329). The Administering Authority reported that the labour supply was inadequate and that the rapid expansion of the Territory's economic development required the proper organization and full utilization of the Territory's manpower potential, with an increase in the stability, efficiency and productivity of labour. A survey of these problems was undertaken in 1951 and "A preliminary investigation of the manpower position, 1951" was published.

This preliminary investigation recommended that a single body representative of all interested employers might be the best means of improving the rationalization and recruitment of labour. The Visiting Mission questioned the advisability of establishing such a body on a Territory-wide scale for a number of reasons. It also stated that a similar system operating in the Northern Province seemed unpopular with many of the more efficient employers. Opposition to the Northern Province Labour Utilization Board was also voiced by the Chagga Cultural Association (T/Pet.2/134) on the grounds that it recruited Africans for labour far from their homes, that workers were badly treated and that the Government exercised a levy on each recruit. The Administering Authority pointed out (T/953/Add.2) that most of the recruits came from comparatively short distances and were provided with transport and rest camps which had been inspected and commended by the Visiting Mission. It denied that a levy was collected, and explained that an employer was only required to pay for costs incurred in obtaining labour. In any case, it added, a review of the Board's operations was to be made shortly. As to the establishment of a single central organization as suggested by the preliminary investigation, the Administering Authority stated that no decision had been taken (T/977).

⁸³ For further consideration of this question, see pp. 660 S.

The preliminary investigation suggested that the introduction of a system of identification of employees should be seriously considered. The Administration informed the Mission that registration should not be considered only in relation to the labour supply or primarily as a means to check desertion but that it would also be of great help in the efficient administration of social services of all kinds. While recognizing this, the Mission doubted the desirability of a general labour registration, especially in view of the opposition which might be expected from Africans. It pointed out that the suggestion had been bitterly opposed by the Tanganyika African Association, which considered it as a move to placate settlers. Opposition to any registration or direction of labour, which it was feared might interfere with the liberty of workers, was also expressed in a petition (T/Pet.2/123). The Administering Authority commented (T/953/Add.1) that no system was contemplated which would interfere with individual liberty and that there was no question of the direction of labour. It stated (T/977), in its observations on the Mission's report, that the need for some form of registration was becoming more and more apparent and that consideration was being given to introducing a Territory-wide system of registration on a non-racial basis for the entire adult male population, and not only for industry.

The preliminary investigation suggested that malnutrition, disease and the high turnover of unskilled labour were important causes of low productivity. It considered that efforts must be made to stabilize labour by providing attractive housing and other amenities. The Visiting Mission agreed that the labour output must be increased and that the soundest method of so doing was to stabilize labour; housing was probably the most important single factor in such a stabilization, but it must be provided for the worker's family as well as the worker. The Mission, however, doubted whether stabilization could be achieved without a marked improvement in both the wages and working conditions of African labour. The Administering Authority agreed on the whole with the Mission's views, but stated (T/977) that it appreciated the economic necessity of maintaining a proper relationship between wages and productivity.

A number of petitions⁸⁴ brought before the Trusteeship Council complained of the inadequacy of African wages as compared with rising living costs and appealed for a general increase of wage levels. It was stated that the wages of manual workers especially were insufficient to provide an adequate standard of living. Allegations that Europeans and Asians received higher wages than Africans possessing the same qualifications were also made in the petitions.

The Administering Authority observed (T/953/Add.1, 2 and 4) that existing differences in rates were not due to racial discrimination but to differing individual experience and qualifications. It emphasized the need to relate expenditure on wages and salaries to output.

In another petition (T/Pet.2/121), the African Cooks, Washermen and House Servants Association complained that domestic servants were not granted holidays nor provided with sleeping quarters or clothing, and were liable to summary dismissal even after long periods of service. The Association also complained that its registration as a trade union had been cancelled.

The Administering Authority stated (T/953/Add.2) that there were no regulations governing conditions of domestic service which were the subject of mutual agreement between individual employers and employees. It added, however, that domestic servants who might be the victims of breach of contract by an employer or who found themselves in any genuine difficulty could receive assistance from the Labour Department and that labour exchanges were available for those seeking employment. The Association's registration as a trade union had been cancelled, the Administering Authority stated, after it had become clear that it comprised only a few self-seeking office-holders of doubtful integrity, especially in the handling of funds.

After noting with concern the statement of the Visiting Mission on the low standard of living prevailing in many parts of the Territory, the Trusteeship Council endorsed the Mission's recommendation that the Administration should undertake more detailed studies of the cost and standard of living with a view to ensuring that reasonable minimum wages prevail. The Council also expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would undertake further action toward improving the difficult living conditions of lower-paid Africans, particularly those in urban areas.

It further recommended that the Administering Authority continue to give close attention to the problem of stabilizing the labour force and increasing its productivity and in this connexion that it consider measures for improving working conditions.

During 1951, according to the annual report, 107 employers were convicted of labour offences, mainly concerned with failure to pay wages and with the employment of children; of these, 102 were fined, three bound over and two imprisoned. The number of employees convicted was 339, of whom 76 were fined, 256 imprisoned and seven bound over. The Administering Authority stated that conditions still did not justify the abolition, as earlier recommended by the Council, of penal sanctions relating to the unlawful departure of a servant from his employer's service with intent not to return. Unlawful desertion presented a particular problem in a country where contracted workers were frequently brought long distances at considerable expense to the employer, the Administering Authority explained.

Referring to its programme, under the revised Ten-Year Plan, for alleviating the housing shortage, the Administering Authority reported that in Dar-es-Salaam 300 semi-permanent and 80 temporary-type houses had been completed and work was proceeding on 300 more. The Visiting Mission expressed the hope that the Government would press on with the implementation of its housing schemes and would encourage suitable private building. The Mission considered, in particular, that the claims of African civil servants for adequate housing required closer attention. The Administering Authority assured the Trusteeship Council that every effort was being made to accelerate the housing programme. The Council noted this assurance and fully endorsed the views expressed by the Mission.

The Tanganyika African Association expressed opposition to further immigration into Tanganyika until the Territory had achieved its independence and stated that foreign workers should not be allowed to remain in the Territory after the expiration of their employment (T/Pet.2/103 and 130). It was alleged by the Indian Association (T/Pet.2/166) that immigration regulations discriminated against Asians in favour of Europeans, while another petition (T/Pet.2/124) claimed that the Government discouraged all European and Asiatic immigration. Commenting on these petitions, the Administering Authority stated (T/953/Add.2 and 4) that immigration was controlled in the general interests of the inhabitants and not on a racial basis. The Visiting Mission observed that the fears of Africans were usually associated with complaints about the Government's land policy. It added, with respect to discrimination against Asians, that the immigration policy was administered in a careful and non-discriminatory manner.

Several petitions⁸⁵ alleged that social discrimination on racial grounds was prevalent in the Territory and the Mission reported that it had heard such allegations from educated Africans and Asian associations. The specific complaints dealt mainly with access to hotels and clubs. The Mission considered, as did the Administering Authority, that there were limits to the effectiveness of government action. It was of the opinion that club membership was a private matter but suggested that the Administering Authority, in licensing hotels to serve the public, should ensure that they followed a non-discriminatory policy. It noted that such a policy existed in hotels, as well as trains, operated by the East African Railways. The Administering Authority observed (T/977) that any attempt to overcome racial prejudice in hotels by direct action would be ineffective and might even strengthen the prejudice in some cases.

Both the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly have in the past repeatedly recommended the abolition of corporal punishment. In its annual report for 1951, the Administering Authority reported that the desirability of abolishing this punishment as a sanction of the courts at the earliest possible date had been impressed upon the Tanganyika Government but that its immediate abolition was not considered practicable. It stated that a Bill designed to reduce the number of offences for which corporal punishment could be awarded was introduced in the Legislative Council by the Administration in 1951 but had failed to pass; only one of the unofficial members, a European, had supported the measure, which was regarded by other unofficial members of all races as premature. The Bill was therefore reluctantly withdrawn and further consideration was being given to the matter. In 1951, according to the annual report, the High Court imposed one sentence of corporal punishment and the subordinate courts 585 sentences. Of these, sixteen were quashed and one not carried out for medical reasons. Of those sentenced, 423 were juveniles. The indigenous local courts, in 1950, imposed 736 sentences of whipping. One person was corporally punished in 1951 for offences against the prison regulations.

Three petitions (T/Pet.2/111, 130 and 149) called for the abolition of corporal punishment or alternatively requested that it be applied without discrimination as to race. The Administering Authority, among other observations (T/953/- Add.4) on these petitions, stated that corporal punishment was not applicable to Africans only.

The Visiting Mission reported that it was favourably impressed with the prisons and penal institutions that it was able to visit, and particularly by the Kingolwira prison, a "prison without walls". The Tanganyika African Association petitioned (T/Pet.2/130) for the construction of more such prisons or for a reform in the system in existing prisons, where, it stated, little attempt was made to rehabilitate prisoners and no effort was made to separate first offenders from hardened criminals. It also sought increased educational and recreational facilities to counteract the rapidly increasing incidence of juvenile delinquency. In this connexion, the Administering Authority agreed (T/953/Add.4) that counteractive measures were important; it felt, however, that the most effective means of dealing with juvenile delinquency was the probation system, which was to be expanded considerably. With respect to prisons, the policy was to segregate prisoners, the Administering Authority stated, and a major objective of its present building programme was the replacement of old buildings by modern spacious buildings in rural surroundings.

The social status of African women varies considerably from tribe to tribe, but in general they are regarded by indigenous custom as inferior to men. Polygamy and the payment of bride price is still practised and, as noted by the Visiting Mission, a great proportion of the drudgery of rural life is borne by the women. The Visiting Mission drew attention, in particular, to the status of women in the Bukoba District. During recent years, it stated, an increasing number of Haya women had been leaving the District to take up employment and some also to engage in prostitution. As a result, the Haya men attempted to prevent the women from leaving the area. They appealed⁸⁶ for help in their efforts to control prostitution and for assistance in eliminating venereal disease. The Administering Authority stated (T/953/Add.2 and T/C.2/SR.28) that the conclusion was reached, after investigation, that the unsatisfactory social conditions within the Bukoba District were the underlying cause of the problem. Special measures were now being taken, it added, to improve the status of Haya women.

The Governor of Tanganyika informed the Trusteeship Council, during its eleventh session, that he considered the improvement of the status of women to be perhaps the most important social problem faced by the Administration. African women were the key to the future of Tanganyika, he stated, and it was often they who had exercised pressure upon the men to accept progressive methods, such as ploughing schemes, and they were also working to improve their own lot at the present time. While noting that social and educational measures were already being taken he felt that more positive steps were required to improve the status of women. To facilitate such steps, he felt, one tribe must be persuaded to set an example of proper treatment of women: he planned to make such a challenge to the Wapare.

The Council, recognizing the importance of the emancipation of African women and the influence they have on the advancement of indigenous society, expressed satisfaction with the statement of the Governor and hoped that the Administering Authority would continue to emphasize the improvement of the status of women.

On 10 July 1952, the Council by a vote of 9 to 1 on the first and 8 to 1 on the others adopted four resolutions (469 (XI), 476 (XI), 485 (XI), 488 (XI)) on the petitions. It considered the Administration's approach to the problems of prostitution and venereal disease should contribute to their solution and expressed the hope that the Haya men would become aware of the wider social aspects of these problems and would recognize their responsibilities and co-operate in an effort to improve social conditions in the Bukoba District.

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, there were 155 government-registered and licensed physicians and 153 non-official physicians in 1951, as compared with 135 and 166, respectively, in 1950. The number of qualified government nurses had increased from 142 to 205 in 1951 and the number of non-official qualified nurses from 191 to 217. There were five official and nine non-official dentists, as compared with four and twelve in 1950. The Administering Authority also pointed to the increased budget for the health services, amounting to £1,144,925 in 1951, as compared with £871,089 in 1950. Few changes were reported in the number of hospitals and dispensaries, but the total of maternity and child welfare clinics (Government, mission and Native Authority) had increased from 79 in 1950 to 104 in 1951.

The Visiting Mission reported that it found the number of hospitals too small in comparison with the immense need for health services in the Territory. It also stated that the standard of construction of the hospitals was, generally speaking, lower than that of other government buildings such as schools and prisons, and that less building was being carried out by the Government in the medical field.

It further noted that different standards of accommodation existed which appeared to be based exclusively on racial lines. The Mission appreciated that there were many difficulties in the way of a considerable expansion of the medical services and realized that the principal short-term difficulty was the recruitment of the necessary staff. It was not satisfied, however, that everything possible was being done in this connexion. There appeared to have been confused policies in the past, and the Mission noted, even when it was in the Territory, a certain apparent complacency about the medical situation on the part of some Government officials. It was glad to learn that the number of African medical personnel graduating from some of the training institutions was being considerably increased but commented that the rate of increase would need to be much more rapid if the system of dispensaries in rural areas was to be placed on a more comprehensive and more efficient basis. Finally, the Mission expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to provide adequate financial resources to expand medical services and that it would offer salaries large enough to attract the necessary personnel. It doubted whether planning for expansion was on a sufficiently concrete basis and considered that a more comprehensive scheme of medical development should appear in the revised development plan. The shortage of medical facilities and medical personnel was also reflected in two petitions (T/Pet.2/704 and 111) from the Territory.

In its observations (T/977) on the Mission's report, the Administering Authority stated that the rate of building had been governed by the limited capacity of the Public Works Department and contractors, but progress had been made, some of it at places the Mission was unable to visit. A building programme had been carefully worked out and an agreed standard hospital plan approved. The system of describing hospitals or wards as "European" or "Asian" or "African" was somewhat misleading, the Administering Authority observed. The so-called European hospital at Dar-es-Salaam, for example, admitted patients of all races. As a general rule patients wished to follow their own ways of life while in the hospital; the question of feeding was a particular problem. With respect to recruiting staff, the Administering Authority stated that the position had improved considerably and salaries were no longer a problem. The aim was still to bring the number of medical officers up to a total of 120, but not until the general medical development plan had been much further advanced and more district hospitals and other facilities had become available. The Administering Authority pointed out that it was fully aware of the inadequacy of the present medical services and of the great amount remaining to be accomplished. There were certainly no grounds for complacency. It regretted that the Mission should have received that impression since it did not reflect the attitude of either the Administering Authority or the Government of Tanganyika.

The Tanganyika African Association alleged (T/Pet.2/130) that racial discrimination existed in the provision of medical facilities and stated that African patients suffering from malaria were denied quinine injections for experimental reasons. Opposition was also expressed to the recruitment of Asian doctors, who, it was alleged, were interested only in their private practices and not in African patients.

The Administering Authority stated (T/953/Add.4) that these statements were quite incorrect.

The Trusteeship Council, while noting with approval that there has been some increase in the medical staff during 1951, shared the view of the Mission and of the Administering Authority that existing medical and health facilities were inadequate for the needs of the Territory. The Council also noted with concern the statement of the Visiting Mission with respect to medical training and the standard of construction of hospitals, and recommended that every effort be made to achieve with the least possible delay the objectives of the Administration's medical development plan.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, total expenditure for education from all sources rose from £1,503,505 in 1950 to £2,075,276 in 1951. Government primary education was free, but varying fees were usually charged in other schools. The number of pupils in African schools increased from 182,942 in 1950 to 210,949 in 1951; most of them attended primary schools run by religious missions. The number of pupils in Asian schools rose from 13,286 in 1950 to 14,445 in 1951 and the number in European schools from 1,417 to 1,655. Reporting on the number of schools for Africans, the Administering Authority indicated that in 1951 there were

1,467 primary schools, as compared with 1,378 in 1950; 28 secondary schools (27 in 1950) and 77 new middle schools were introduced; the number of teachers in these schools rose from 4,645 in 1950 to 4,849 in 1951.

The Administering Authority reported that, despite some opposition on the part of Africans in rural areas to the education of girls and particularly to their post-primary education, the attendance of girls in primary schools increased from 27,846 pupils in 1947 to 55,143 in 1951. The number of girls attending middle and secondary schools increased from 380 in 1947 to 2,469 in 1951.

With respect to higher education, the Administering Authority reported that in 1951, 49 African students from Tanganyika were at Makerere College in Uganda and 22 were studying abroad, as compared with 42 and fourteen, respectively, in 1950. The number of pupils receiving industrial and vocational training rose from 786 in 1950 to 1,091 in 1951.

A mass literacy campaign in the Pare District had been particularly successful, the Administering Authority stated. The establishment of broadcasting facilities at Dar-es-Salaam represented a further development during 1951.

The Administering Authority observed that one of the major problems in the development of education was the shortage of teachers and that every effort would be made to accelerate the expansion of teacher-training facilities. During 1951, it reported, 1,144 pupils were enrolled at 35 teacher-training establishments.

On the whole, the Administering Authority felt that it was making progress toward the attainment of the goals it had set for itself in its ten-year programme for developing education in the Territory. It was intended to accept six Asian students from East Africa in Makerere College in 1952 as an experiment in inter-racial education. The Administering Authority was of the opinion that inter-racial systems of education were better tried out in institutions of higher learning where the English language was more widely understood. The question of language alone would make inter-racial education impracticable in the primary schools, it stated. To achieve the objective of making the greatest possible number of children literate in the shortest possible space of time, the younger children must be taught in the language which could be most easily understood by them. Moreover, any decision to change the language of instruction in primary schools would also have the effect of depriving the Territory of the services of a large proportion of its African teachers.

The Visiting Mission found a widespread desire among Africans for a great increase in educational facilities of all kinds and a realization that the extension of education was a cardinal factor in the advancement of the Territory and its people. This was also reflected in many petitions from the Territory.⁸⁷ In the Mission's opinion, the quality of existing educational institutions was good, the system was efficiently administered and the Ten-Year Plan was being implemented energetically.

However, the Mission noted that, if the target for primary education was reached, only 36 per cent of the children would have received four years of primary schooling. While recognizing that the attainment of such a figure by 1956 would represent a considerable achievement, the Mission expressed the hope that the general development of the Territory would permit an enlargement of the objectives of the Plan. Among the most frequent complaints by Africans, it stated, was that only one in five of the pupils completing four years of primary education would be eligible under the Plan for further schooling. The Mission questioned this ratio in view of the needs of the Territory for educated Africans and doubted the adequacy of four years of primary education as a sufficient basis for permanent literacy. A number of petitions⁸⁸ requesting the expansion of secondary education were also received.

The Administering Authority observed (T/977) that the question of the adequacy of a four-year primary education was being studied by an educational mission which had recently visited Tanganyika under the sponsorship of the Nuffield Foundation.

The Mission noted that people in the more advanced districts felt that the Plan restricted their educational development. It referred in particular to the statement by the Chagga Council (T/Pet.2/137) to the effect that they were prepared to make important financial contributions towards the expense of additional education in the Moshi District. The Mission considered that the Government should give additional help to the Chagga and other tribes in advanced districts in return for increased financial contributions on their part.

By resolution 482(XI) of 10 July 1952, adopted by 10 votes to 1, the Trusteeship Council noted the offer by the Chagga Council with satisfaction and expressed its confidence that the Chagga people would continue to co-operate to the fullest extent with the District Education Committee and that the latter would continue to give due attention to the needs of the Chagga Native Authority schools.

With respect to religious missions, the Visiting Mission stated that it was convinced that they played a useful part in education. Nevertheless, it considered that greater emphasis should be given to the establishment of new Government and Native Authority schools. It pointed out that the need for non-mission schools was particularly great in the predominantly Moslem areas where educational facilities were generally the least adequate.

The Visiting Mission heard complaints and received petitions (T/Pet.2/142 and 148), concerning the charging of school fees. It felt that all primary education should be free and that, in the Bukoba District in particular, there should be other means of raising funds for education. The Administering Authority pointed out (T/977) that the decision to charge a fee in the Bukoba District had been made by the local Education Committee after full discussion in tribal councils, on the understanding that fees would be remitted in necessitous cases.

While the Mission recognized the comparatively backward state of education for girls, it was particularly impressed by the degree of enthusiasm shown by teachers and pupils at the secondary and middle schools for girls which it visited. It expressed the hope that soon some of them would be studying at Makerere College.

The Mission was also impressed by the many skilled operations being performed by African mechanics and it received numerous requests⁸⁹ from Africans for increased facilities in industrial, commercial and technical training. The need for additional facilities of this type was recognized by the Administering Authority, which stated (T/973/Add.2 and 4) that it had been decided to establish two or three new trade schools similar to the one existing at Ifunda. It added that a natural resources school was being built and that an institute to provide higher technical training was also to be established.

Four petitions⁹⁰ received by the Mission requested increased opportunities for study at overseas universities and the Mission, noting that three Africans had received government scholarships for such study in 1951, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would take more active steps in that direction in the future.

The Administering Authority indicated (T/977) that it expected an increase in the number of students qualifying for scholarships and further pointed out that, since full university courses were available at Makerere College, it was no longer necessary to send students overseas to obtain degrees.

Requests for the establishment of a college of university standing within the Territory were made in nine petitions.⁹¹ The Mission was informed that the Administration was considering the establishment of such an institution within Tanganyika in due course, and it suggested that this matter be given attention at an early date. The Mission also expressed the hope that some means would be found to provide legal training for Africans.

The Mission received petitions (T/Pet.2/116, 120) from Africans and Asians to the effect that inter-racial education should be introduced at least in secondary schools. Noting the opinion of the Administering Authority on this subject, the Mission expressed the opinion that the need to promote inter-racial harmony was urgent. In view of the facility in English shown by pupils in the secondary schools, the Mission was convinced that the Government should give serious consideration to the establishment of a senior secondary school open to students of all communities. The Administering Authority, however, questioned (T/977) the wisdom of starting other inter-racial educational centres before the system had been put into practice at Makerere College.

The Trusteeship Council, while noting with satisfaction that the Ten-Year Plan for education was being implemented in an energetic manner, agreed with the Mission that the targets for post-primary education were too limited and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would consider expanding this part of the programme. The increase in the number of Tanganyika students receiving higher education was viewed with approval by the Council, as were the increased facilities made available for vocational and technical training. The Council welcomed the Administering Authority's statement that the establishment of a university college in Tanganyika was being actively considered and expressed its confidence that efforts in the important field of technical training would be continued.

The Visiting Mission reported that copies of the official records of the Trusteeship Council had been sent to all provincial offices and that a number had been made available to schools, training centres and welfare centres. The Tanganyika Government had suggested, however, that the number of copies sent to the Territory should be increased from 60 to 150. In all the middle and secondary schools which it visited, the Mission found posters prepared by the United Nations Department of Public Information and was informed they were considered effective as a medium for imparting information about the United Nations. A booklet about the United Nations and the operation of the Trusteeship System, which appeared adequate and well written to the Mission, had been prepared by the Government for use in post-primary schools. The Mission was also informed that pamphlets in Swahili for use in primary schools and distribution to Native Authorities had also been prepared and that the radio station at Dar-es-Salaam broadcast programmes on the United Nations in Swahili. Releases on matters affecting Tanganyika in the Trusteeship Council were being issued to the local Press. The Administration suggested that reprints of articles from the United Nations Bulletin of particular interest to Tanganyika would also be useful. The Mission itself suggested in addition that the Administering Authority might issue further pamphlets in Swahili concerning the Trusteeship System and that African organizations might do much to increase knowledge about the United Nations by translating such documents as the Charter and Trusteeship Agreement into Swahili.

Noting the measure of success achieved in the implementation of its resolutions on the provision of information about the Trusteeship System and the United Nations, the Trusteeship Council endorsed the practical suggestions of the Visiting Mission and the Administering Authority, particularly in regard to the translation of such information into Swahili for dissemination among wide sections of the Tanganyika population.

4. The Wa-Meru Land Question

In petitions to the Trusteeship Council (T/Pet.2/99 and Add.1-7 and T/Pet.2/143), petitioners of the Meru tribe, living in Tanganyika, opposed the transfer of a number of Wa-Meru from the Ngare-Nanyuki and Leguruki areas. The petitioners claimed to speak on behalf of some 3,000 tribesmen and their families, who would be affected by the move.

These petitions were considered by the Visiting Mission to East Africa. The Mission concluded that the removal of land from actual occupation by Africans in this heavily congested area was open to question and that the matter warranted the serious attention of the Trusteeship Council, particularly if any pressure was brought to bear on the Africans concerned. The Mission also recalled that the Government of Tanganyika had explained to both the 1948 Visiting Mission and to the Council that, if any land were approved for alienation, the Africans then occupying it would be given the option of remaining or removing to any other area they wished.

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL AT ITS ELEVENTH SESSION

During the eleventh session of the Trusteeship Council, two representatives of the Wa-Meru, Earle Seaton and Kirilo Japhet appeared before the Council—Mr. Seaton at the Council's 431st and 432nd meetings on 30 June and Mr. Japhet at the 451st and 452nd meetings on 21 and 22 July 1952. They made detailed statements and answered the questions of members of the Council.

The representatives stated that during the German regime in Tanganyika, until the end of the First World War, much of the traditional tribal land had been alienated or expropriated. After Tanganyika became a Mandated Territory administered by the United Kingdom, the Wa-Meru were allowed to buy, between 1925 and 1939, two farms on this land from which they had been earlier evicted without compensation and were assured by the Administering Authority that these would always remain tribal lands of the Wa-Meru.

In November 1951, however, although they had repeatedly protested against a scheme for re-alienation of these lands to non-Native settlers, 3,000 Wa-Meru had been forced to vacate their lands. Homes, foodstuffs and livestock had been destroyed and twenty persons arrested and imprisoned, they stated. It was doubtful, moreover, whether the Wa-Meru could live in the new area offered them without changing their whole economic system. This new area, they complained, was inhabited by the tsetse fly and held little promise of fertility. Although it was proposed to refund to the Wa-Meru the price they had paid for the two farms, the amount was now much less than the current open-market value of the land. Moreover, the primary interest of the Wa-Meru was to remain on the lands to which they felt attached by religious, traditional and sentimental ties.

The representatives also informed the Council that the Wa-Meru would not refuse to co-operate in any scheme genuinely designed to relieve congestion of the Native population or to develop the resources of the Territory in the interests of all its inhabitants; they were not convinced, however, of the merits of this particular scheme of land re-distribution, and the method and timing of its enforcement had provoked resentment.

The Administering Authority (T/953 and T/977) and its special representative (T/PV.431) maintained that the petitioners and their representatives did not represent the Meru tribe but could claim only to express the views of the 312 taxpayers who had been transferred. The Administering Authority regretted that it had proved necessary to use pressure but felt that this was justified in the circumstances—that the removal was part of a general scheme which would benefit the tribe as a whole and one which could not be abandoned at such an advanced stage. The special representative stated that the land had already been allocated to thirteen applicants before the Trusteeship Council's Standing Committee on Petitions had requested information on the matter and, for this reason, it had not been possible to wait for the Council's decision on the petitions.

It was further stated that the tribesmen concerned and their families had been moved from two former German farms which they had bought and on which they had settled; they had not been removed from ancestral lands. The explanations given by the Government of Tanganyika to both the 1948 Visiting Mission and to the Trusteeship Council, which were recalled by the Visiting Mission to East Africa in its report to the Council, reflected the policy of the Administration on such lands. The Administering Authority assured the Council that the persons moved would be fully compensated for the land alienated and for the disturbance; moreover, they would receive their new lands free and would be assisted in re-establishing themselves.

The question was discussed further by the Council when it considered the sixteenth report of its Standing Committee on Petitions (T/L.295) at the 442nd and 452nd meetings of the Council on 10 and 22 July 1952.

At its 452nd meeting the Council adopted, with three drafting amendments proposed by the Dominican Republic, a draft resolution (T/L.295) proposed by the Standing Committee (see below).

The representatives of China, France, New Zealand and the United States, among others, supported the draft resolution. While expressing sympathy for the petitioners, these representatives said that they were convinced that the Administering Authority had acted with the best interests of the Wa-Meru and the Territory in mind.

The drafting amendments by the Dominican Republic (T/L.315) were adopted in separate votes, ranging from 5 to 1, with 5 abstentions, to 3 to 1, with 7 abstentions. The Council, however, rejected by 7 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, a part of the Dominican Republic proposal to delete from the draft resolution a phrase which described as "advantageous to the majority of inhabitants in the Arusha-Moshi area" the scheme of the Administering Authority under which the movement in question took place. The representative of El Salvador, supporting this proposal, felt that this phrase prejudged a question which had not yet been studied by the Council.

The Council also rejected, by a roll-call vote of 8 to 1, with 3 abstentions, part of a USSR amendment (T/L.287) which would call for the immediate return of the lands in question, the prohibition of further alienation and full compensation for the losses suffered by the Wa-Meru during the eviction. By a roll-call vote of 10 to 1, with 1 abstention, it rejected the remainder of the Soviet draft, which would have the Council recommend, inter alia, that the Administering Authority "immediately put an end to its anti-democratic policy towards the indigenous population" and that it not permit any future violation of the rights and interests of the indigenous inhabitants of the Territory. The USSR representative felt that the recommendation by the Standing Committee did not satisfy the petitioners' requests, which should be fully met by a decision of the Council.

In its resolution (468(XI)), adopted by 8 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, the Council expressed regret that it should have been found necessary to move any of the Meru people from land on which they had settled and to use force in doing so. It recognized that their removal was part of a larger scheme which would benefit the majority of indigenous inhabitants in the Arusha-Moshi area, in that a large area of previously alienated land had been provided for tribal occupation and further under-developed lands would be opened up for tribal expansion. The Council stated that it considered that in future schemes the Administering Authority should be guided by the principle that African communities settled on the land should not be moved to other areas unless a clear expression of their collective consent had been obtained.

It urged the Administering Authority to do all in its power to relieve the hardships suffered by the Meru families who had been required to move, to compensate them generously for their loss of property and their disturbance, and to continue to make available to them assistance in their resettlement, particularly by helping them build new huts and by undertaking further efforts to eradicate the tsetse fly. The Council further recommended that the Administering Authority should intensify its educational campaign to convince the Wa-Meru of the desirability of reducing congestion in the tribal area by moving to new expansion areas and should carry out a community development and welfare plan as a further effort to direct the activities of the Wa-Meru into constructive channels.

It expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue taking all practicable measures to provide for the increasing numbers of the Wa-Meru tribe and to relieve congestion on occupied tribal land and by opening up and developing new lands for cultivation and grazing. Finally, the Administering Authority was asked to keep the Council informed of any further developments in the matter of resettlement in the Arusha District.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS SEVENTH SESSION

The General Assembly considered this question from the 286th to 291st meetings of its Fourth Committee, from 29 November to 3 December 1952, and at its 410th plenary meeting on 21 December 1952, during its consideration of the report of the Trusteeship Council (A/2150).

(1) Consideration by the Fourth Committee

At its 251st meeting on 22 October, the Fourth Committee considered a request from petitioners of the Wa-Meru that the tribe be allowed to make oral presentations before the Committee.

The Committee, on a roll-call vote of 39 votes to none, with 11 abstentions, decided to accede to the request.

Accordingly, at its 286th meeting on 29 November 1952, the Committee heard Mr. Japhet, Secretary of the Citizens' Union of the Meru, assisted by Mr. Seaton, again recount the history of the lands in question and plead for their restoration to the tribe.

Mr. Japhet stated that in 1949 the Wa-Meru were told that the settlers and administrative officers of the Northern Province of Tanganyika felt that the land should be cleared of Wa-Meru and given to European farmers, thus enabling this area to be linked up with the European settlements, and that unused land to the south should be made available to the Wa-Meru families affected. On 6 July 1951, a government official told them that if they did not move they would be moved by force.

The Wa-Meru protested to the local administrative officers and to the Secretary of State for Colonial Affairs, but without effect. In September 1951 they petitioned a United Nations Visiting Mission to Tanganyika. In October the Legislative Council for Tanganyika passed a Bill empowering the Administering Authority to evict by force the Wa-Meru from the Ngare-Nanyuki area. On 17 November about 120 police, seven European officers and 100 Kikuyu tribesmen arrived in the area, arrested six persons, removed food from the houses and set some homes alight. Livestock were taken away. Access to the Ngare-Nanyuki River was barred, the road to Meru closed and the area isolated by barriers.

Mr. Japhet said that some of the 3,000 evicted Wa-Meru were carried in trucks of the Administering Authority to Kingori, where the land made available to the Wa-Meru as compensation was situated. The overwhelming majority refused to settle there, however, and found shelter with friends in other Meru areas. Others became guests of the Masai and Mbulu tribes; others again became squatters on farms held by Europeans.

Casualties and losses resulting from the eviction, he alleged, included the death of 64 persons and the loss of 2,190 cattle, 4,442 sheep, 4,542 goats and 325 donkeys.

Mr. Japhet contended that the Trusteeship Council had failed to recommend that the injustice be corrected by restoring the land and therefore much of the confidence and trust vested in the Council by the Wa-Meru had been lost. The greatest desire of his people, he said, was the restoration of their land and he asked the Committee to recommend its immediate restoration.

Replying to questions by members of the Committee, Mr. Japhet stated, among other things, that:

(1) the whole Ngare-Nanyuki area from which the Wa-Meru were evicted comprised some 78,000 acres but that the area of the two particular farms in question was 5,345 acres;

(2) the Tanganyika Government had made no attempt to arbitrate with the Wa-Meru;

(3) the real reason for the alienation was that the land lay within an area of European settlement;

(4) the Wa-Meru were prepared to accept any instruction and education for their improvement after the restoration of the land; and

(5) the land from which 3,000 Wa-Meru had been evicted was allocated to thirteen European settlers, who had not yet taken up the allocations.

In the general debate, the representative of the United Kingdom, the Administering Authority for Tanganyika, warned the Committee against hasty action on the petition. He said that the main question involved was how the land in Tanganyika might be used to provide the greatest benefit to all. This question had arisen from the great pressure on land resulting from increases of population in the last 60 years since Europeans took over the administration of the Territory. The present estimated African population of the Territory was 8,000,000, composed of many different tribes. Among the smaller sections were the Meru, numbering some 38,000. Only a small proportion of these—some 330 taxpayers and their families, a total of about 1,500 persons—were affected by the move.

The United Kingdom representative denied that the action involved racial discrimination. He drew the Committee's attention to a White Paper (The Meru Land Problem) prepared by the Tanganyika Government which, he said, explained the policy involved and showed the Government's perseverance and patience in trying to persuade the Meru to co-operate in the larger plan and convince them that the scheme would benefit all inhabitants, including themselves. In the comprehensive scheme of resettlement, he stated, more land under European occupation had been alienated than that under African occupation; both Africans and Europeans would suffer temporary hardship. The Government had already explained that every assistance and compensation would be given.

Early in the general debate, a joint draft resolution was presented by El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Indonesia, Liberia, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Syria (A/C.4/L.242). The sponsors felt that European and not African interests had been served by the removal of the Wa-Meru; that a serious matter of principle was involved; that the prestige of the United Nations demanded the support of the people of the Trust Territories; and that the Trusteeship Council had failed to apply the principles of the Trusteeship System. These views were supported by representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Poland, the USSR and Yugoslavia, among others, who claimed that the action of the Administering Authority was a violation of the Trusteeship Agreement for Tanganyika and of the United Nations Charter. They asserted that the move had been designed to consolidate the holdings of European settlers in the Territory and that, in its recommendation on the question, the Trusteeship Council had failed in its obligations.

The eight-Power joint draft resolution would, in the first three paragraphs of its preamble, note the Trusteeship Council resolution, the oral statements before the Fourth Committee by the representatives of the Wa-Meru and the statements by the Administering Authority.

It would further declare that those statements clearly indicated that the Administering Authority expelled some 3,000 Wa-Meru tribesmen from their lands, forcibly and against their will, "with the purpose of transferring those lands to European settlers."

The first three paragraphs of the preamble were adopted by a roll-call vote of 51 to none, with one abstention. The fourth paragraph was adopted by a roll-call vote of 29 to 17, with 7 abstentions, after the sponsors had accepted an Egyptian oral amendment to delete the last phrase. The Committee rejected, by a roll-call vote of 25 to 24, with 3 abstentions, proposals to delete the paragraph, made in joint amendments by Brazil, Ecuador and Peru (A/C.4/L.243) and by Canada, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden (A/C.4/L.245).

In its operative part, the eight-Power draft would have the General Assembly:

(1) express disapproval of the action of the Administering Authority in proceeding to move the Wa-Meru against their will, in applying force to bring about their eviction and in destroying houses and property;

(2) express its disapproval of Trusteeship Council resolution 468 (XI);

(3) request the Administering Authority to return immediately to the members of the Meru tribe the lands from which they were expelled, to reconstitute their legal rights to these lands, to compensate them for property destroyed or lost and to indemnify them duly for all damages and inconveniences suffered by them as a result of their eviction;

(4) recommend that the Administering Authority should suspend the execution of any plan for the redistribution of land which would entail the eviction of indigenous inhabitants by force;

(5) recommend that the Administering Authority should take adequate measures to train the Wa-Meru in modern methods of agriculture and cattle-ranching, in order that the wealth of the Territory might be increased and that the Wa-Meru might be able to improve their own economic and social status, and that, to this end, technical assistance from the United Nations and its specialized agencies should be sought; and

(6) recommend that the Administering Authority should report fully to the Trusteeship Council, at its summer session in 1953, on the measures taken to implement the resolution.

Alterations to the operative part were proposed in three amendments:

(1) Canada, the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden introduced an amendment (A/C.4/L.245), of which New Zealand became a co-sponsor.

These representatives, although they were sympathetic to the evicted Wa-Meru, considered that transmigration was often necessary and was a problem with which the Administering Authority had to deal. The representative of the Netherlands stated that he felt strongly that the Committee was not in possession of sufficient facts to enable it to judge the question; few legal cases were so complicated as those which dealt with questions of land. Moreover, the General Assembly was not a Court of Justice and therefore the Fourth Committee was neither empowered nor called upon to give judgment in a very intricate case. The best course would be for the Trusteeship Council to carry out a thorough investigation and report back to the Fourth Committee at its following session. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, the Union of South Africa and the United States also cautioned against undermining the authority of either the Trusteeship Council or the Administering Authority.

The five-Power amendment (A/C.4/L.245), which incorporated oral drafting amendments proposed by the representatives of France and Greece, proposed the replacement of the entire operative part of the eight-Power draft by three paragraphs which would:

(1) express the hope that a satisfactory adjustment might be found through consultation between the United Kingdom and the Wa-Meru; (2) invite the establishment, on part of the alienated land, of an experimental farm for the Meru people; and (3) request the Trusteeship Council to report fully on the problem in its next report.

By a roll-call vote of 31 to 17, with 5 abstentions, the Committee rejected the amendment.

(2) An amendment by India (A/C.4/L.244) to the eight-Power draft sought to substitute for the part which expressed disapproval of the resolution of the Trusteeship Council a paragraph which would express regret that the steps taken by the Council to solve the problem had proved inadequate.

This amendment was accepted by the sponsors and adopted by the Committee in a roll-call vote of 27 to 20, with 5 abstentions.

(3) An amendment to the operative part of the eight-Power draft was presented jointly by Brazil, Ecuador and Peru (A/C.4/L.243). Its sponsors stated that while they agreed with a number of features of the eight-Power draft, they felt that an amended version would achieve more, in that it would offer a more moderate approach to the problem.

The three-Power amendment would eliminate that part of the draft which expressed disapproval of the Trusteeship Council resolution on the question (This part of the three-Power amendment was later withdrawn in view of the adoption of the Indian amendment—see above).

The amendment would further eliminate that part of the eight-Power draft which would express disapproval of the action of the Administering Authority.

The Committee, by a roll-call vote of 27 to 17, with 8 abstentions, agreed to the elimination of the paragraph.

The three-Power amendment would also eliminate from the paragraph of the eight-Power draft—which requested the return of the lands, compensation and indemnity—a request that the Administering Authority restore to the Wa-Meru their legal rights to these lands. The sponsors accepted this part of the three-Power amendment, which was later adopted by the Committee, in separate roll-call votes of 34 to 15, with 3 abstentions, in favour of the return of the land, and 43 to 3, with 6 abstentions, in favour of requesting measures for compensation.

The last three paragraphs of the eight-Power draft resolution were adopted in votes ranging from 40 to none, with 11 abstentions, to 36 to 11, with 5 abstentions.

At its 291st meeting on 3 December, the Committee adopted the amended resolution as a whole by roll-call vote of 32 to 17, with 3 abstentions.

(2) Consideration by the General Assembly in Plenary Session

The resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/2342) was considered by the General Assembly at its 410th plenary meeting on 21 December 1952.

The Assembly also had before it a joint draft resolution by Canada, Denmark, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden and Uruguay (A/L.141), similar to that presented in the Fourth Committee by Canada, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden and New Zealand. The seven-Power draft would, among other things:

(1) express regret at the forcible eviction of the Wa-Meru; (2) invite the Administering Authority to make compensation for the alienated land; (3) express the hope that a solution would be reached by the two parties to the dispute; (4) invite the establishment on the land in question of an experimental farm to teach the tribesmen modern methods; and (5) ask the Trusteeship Council to report fully on the matter.

The representative of the United Kingdom told the Assembly that his delegation would vote against the Committee's recommendation, adding that if the Assembly should adopt this draft the United Kingdom would not implement its recommendation. He repeated the views expressed in the Fourth Committee by the United Kingdom representative, that the question arose out of the problem of the utilization of the land in Tanganyika in the best interests of the whole population and that it was the task of the public authorities to decide on the public interest. He assured the Assembly that there had been no idea of racial discrimination behind the move in alienating the land. The seven-Power draft (A/L.141), he considered, was a constructive proposal.

The representatives of New Zealand, Sweden and Uruguay, sponsors of the seven-Power draft, stated that they believed that their proposal reflected the interest and sympathy of the Assembly in the case of the alienated tribesmen and presented a practicable solution of their difficulties. It was the Assembly's duty to retain the confidence of the tribesmen and this, they felt, could be better achieved by adoption of the seven-Power draft.

Support for the seven-Power draft was also expressed by the representatives of France and the United States. The representative of France said that the Assembly could not take measures which would negate all progress, such as those recommended by the Fourth Committee.

The representatives of Guatemala and Indonesia, however, maintained the position they had taken in the Fourth Committee, that racial discrimination had resulted from the action of the Administering Authority. These representatives also felt that the seven-Power draft did not envisage the problem in the proper light and, further, did not urge the restitution of the land. The United Nations, they said, could not sanction any violation of human rights.

The President of the Assembly ruled that as both proposals before the Assembly related to the operation of the Trusteeship System, under rule 84 of the rules of procedure each would require a two-thirds majority for adoption.

The draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee was voted on by roll call and received 28 votes in favour, 20 against and 10 abstentions. Having failed to gain the required two-thirds majority, it was not adopted. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, China, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Iceland, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States, Union of South Africa, Uruguay.

Abstentions: Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Thailand, Venezuela.

When the vote was taken on the seven-Power draft, the Assembly decided to vote separately on the second paragraph, which would invite the payment of compensation to the alienated Wameru. In a roll-call vote this paragraph received 27 votes in favour, 19 against and 12 abstentions and, accordingly, was not adopted. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Greece, Iceland, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Sweden, Thailand, Union of South Africa, United States, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Abstentions: Argentina, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Czechoslovakia, India, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, USSR, United Kingdom, Venezuela.

The seven-Power draft, as amended by the deletion of this paragraph, was also voted on by roll call, receiving 21 votes in favour, 21 against and 16 abstentions. The draft resolution was, accordingly, not adopted. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Australia, Belgium, Canada, China, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, France, Greece, Iceland, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Sweden, Thailand, United States, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Abstentions: Argentina, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Nicaragua, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian SSR, Union of South Africa, USSR, United Kingdom, Venezuela.

E. CONDITIONS IN TRUST TERRITORIES IN WEST AFRICA

Annual reports submitted by the Administering Authorities on the Administration of the two Cameroons and the two Togolands during 1951 were examined by the Trusteeship Council during the first part of its eleventh session, held from 3 June to 24 July 1952.⁹² Observations

⁹² See chart on the examination of annual reports, pp. 746-47.

(T/1012) of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) on these reports were considered by the Council in connexion with its examination of educational conditions in these Territories.

In 1952, during its tenth and eleventh sessions, the Council also disposed of twelve petitions concerning the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration, eleven concerning the Cameroons under French administration and two concerning both of these Territories, four concerning Togoland under United Kingdom administration, 34 concerning Togoland under French administration and twelve concerning both Togolands.⁹³ The Council adopted resolutions on 59 of these petitions which it examined individually. The remaining sixteen petitions dealt wholly with general problems on which the Council had taken decisions or made recommendations in the past. In accordance with a new procedure⁹⁴ adopted during its eleventh session, the Council passed no resolutions on these petitions but considered the problems raised in them during its examination of the relevant annual reports.

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 553(VI) of 18 January 1952,⁹⁵ the Trusteeship Council decided, by resolution 424(X) of 3 March 1952, that its next Visiting Mission to the two Togolands should also submit a report on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem. On 27 March, the Council decided that the same Mission should also visit the two Cameroons, where it should stay about six weeks, and then return to Headquarters to draft its general reports on the four Territories visited; at the same time, the Council decided that the Mission should be composed of persons nominated by Australia, Belgium, China and El Salvador. The Council later approved, during its eleventh session, on 24 June, the nomination of the following persons as members of its second regular Visiting Mission to the four Trust Territories in West Africa: Roy A. Peachey (Australia) as Chairman, Robert Scheyven (Belgium), H. K. Yang (China) and Roberto E. Quiros (El Salvador). On 22 July, by resolution 465 (XI), the Council directed the Mission:

(1) to investigate and report as fully as possible on the steps taken in the four Trust Territories towards the realization of the objectives of Article 76b of the Charter; (2) to give attention, as might be appropriate in the light of Council and Assembly discussions and resolutions, to issues raised in connexion with the annual reports on the administration of the four Trust Territories concerned, in petitions received by the Council relating to the Territories, in the reports of the first periodic Visiting Mission sent to the Terriories in 1949 and in the observations of the Administering Authorities on those reports; (3) to accept petitions and to investigate on the spot, after consultation with the local representative of the Administering Authority concerned, such of the petitions received as in its opinion warranted special investigation; (4) to examine, in consultation with the Administering Authorities, the measures taken and to be taken with respect to the provision of information about the United Nations to the peoples of the Trust Territories under Council resolution 36(III) of 8 July 1948⁹⁶ and to undertake the duties enumerated in resolution 311 (VIII) of 7 February 1951⁹⁷ on the same question.

Finally, the Council requested the Mission to report, as soon as possible after completing its visits, its findings, with such observations, conclusions and recommendations as it might wish to make.

Conditions in each of the four Territories, as well as an account of some of the more important questions raised in petitions and the conclusions and recommendations of the Trusteeship Council, are summarized below. The Ewe and Togoland unification problem is treated separately in this chapter.

1. Cameroons, Administered by the United Kingdom

This Territory, which is divided near the Benue River by some 45 miles of Nigerian territory, covers a total area of 34,081 square miles. In 1951, according to the Administering Authority's annual report,⁹⁸ it had an estimated indigenous population of 1,083,000. Some 107,000 non-Moslems, referred to as "pagans", lived in unsettled districts having a total area of 1,150 square miles in the north and central parts of the Territory; no persons are permitted to enter such districts except those indigenous to it, public officials and authorized persons, the Administering Authority stated, because of the danger of inter-village warfare during the dry season.

For detailed discussions of this report in the Trusteeship Council, see Trusteeship Council, Official Records, Eleventh Session (3 June-24 July 1952); summaries of the observations of individual members are included in the Council's report to the General Assembly (A/2150). a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

The Trust Territory continued to be administered as an integral part of the adjoining British Protectorate of Nigeria, sharing a common constitution, budget and administrative and technical services.⁹⁹ The whole of Nigeria, including the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration, is divided into three broad regions, the Eastern, Western and Northern Regions, each under a Lieutenant-Governor. The southern portion of the Trust Territory, consisting of two self-contained Provinces, Cameroons and Bamenda, forms part of the Eastern Region of Nigeria; a Commissioner of the Cameroons is responsible to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Eastern Region for the administration of the southern Cameroons and to the Governor of Nigeria for Trusteeship matters affecting the Trust Territory as a whole. The northern portion of the Trust Territory forms parts of three different Nigerian Provinces, which in turn form part of the Northern Region of Nigeria.

Proposals for political reform reviewed by the Trusteeship Council in 1951¹⁰⁰ were put into effect, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, under the Nigeria (Constitution) Order in Council, 1951. The new Constitution established: a central Council of Ministers as the principal policy-making body for all of Nigeria and the Trust Territory; a House of Representatives, a central legislature with complete control over expenditure and legislation; and an Executive Council and Regional Legislature for each Region of Nigeria (the Regional Legislature for the Northern Region is a bicameral one, comprising a House of Chiefs and a House of Assembly).

The Administering Authority reported that the people of the Trust Territory went to the polls for the first time in 1951, to elect members to the Northern and Eastern Houses of Assembly. The franchise in both Northern and Eastern Regions was extended to all adult Nigerian taxpayers who either had a residency qualification in the constituency or were natives of it. In the Eastern Region, representatives were elected in primary elections to form an electoral college for each of the five existing divisions; this electoral college in turn elected from among its members representatives to the Eastern House of Assembly. In the Northern Region, the constituency was a Province and, between the primary electorate and the electoral college of the Province, there were not less than two intermediate stages of electoral colleges. The elections were preceded by a campaign conducted throughout the Trust Territory to familiarize the inhabitants with the procedure of the elections and to explain their significance. Nevertheless, the amount of interest shown in the Bamenda and Cameroons Provinces, which elected thirteen of the 80 members forming the Eastern House of Assembly, was disappointing, with few elections contested, the Administering Authority stated. With respect to the northern part of the Trust Territory, which elected three out of the 90 members of the Northern House of Assembly, the Administering Authority observed that in the Bornu Province, which includes the Dikwa Division of the Cameroons, the average poll was 60 per cent, while in the Adamawa Province the people generally took great interest in the primaries. The northern portion of the Trust Territory is also represented in the Northern House of Chiefs by the Emir of Dikwa. Referring to an earlier suggestion by the Trusteeship Council that it take special precautions to ensure that the interests of the Cameroons were not prejudiced by those of Nigeria, the Administering Authority pointed out that the Trust Territory, with an adult male population of 5.6 per cent of the total for Nigeria, had a combined representation in the Regional Houses of 14.4 per cent. In the north, the ratio was 3.3 per cent representation to 3.6 per cent population and in the south 16.2 per cent representation to 10.8 per cent population.

The Regional Houses in turn elected from among their members 136 members of the central House of Representatives, which otherwise comprises six ex-officio members, not more than six special members and a President; six of the members elected from the Eastern House and two from the Northern House of Assembly were Cameroonians. One of these was also the Trust Territory's representative in the Council of Ministers, which consists of six ex-officio members and twelve Ministers, with the Governor as President. The Trust Territory is represented in the Executive Council for the Eastern Region by two members, one of them the Commissioner for the Cameroons, the other a representative from the Eastern House of Assembly, but no member of the Executive Council for the Northern Region is a Cameroonian.

The Trusteeship Council welcomed the benefits which the new Constitution for Nigeria and the Cameroons made available to the Trust Territory in the form of representation on the regional and central executive and legislative organs of government, the introduction of modern methods of suffrage and general experience in democratic government. Noting, nevertheless, that indifference towards the first elections was observed in some areas, the Council urged the Administering Authority to continue by all practicable means to foster the political education of the inhabitants and encourage them to participate fully in the operation of the new government.

Native Authorities, functioning under the supervision of administrative and technical government officials, are responsible for local government. The Administering Authority considered that the political developments during 1951 under the new Constitution were of such importance that such changes as took place in local government could not be compared to them. It reported that a promising start had been made in connexion with the Man-o'-War Bay scheme, in the Victoria Division of the Cameroons Province, for training potential leaders in community development; two successful courses were held in 1951, it stated, but it was still too early to say whether similar training centres would be opened elsewhere. In the north, the 1951 elections had aroused the interest of the people of Adamawa and Dikwa in their own local affairs. In the Adamawa Province, local government had been discussed and the broadening of the Lamido's council was under consideration. In Dikwa, the Emir was formally installed in 1951, two educated men were appointed to fill vacant district headships, five more district councils were formed (so that all districts had such councils by the end of 1951) and village scribes were appointed to improve village administration.

The Trusteeship Council considered that during the consolidation of the new constitutional reforms it was essential for the balanced political development of the population that comparable advances take place in local government. Noting that the Administering Authority's policy was to bring about the evolution of existing tribal and other local government institutions into more modern and democratic forms, the Council welcomed the steps already taken in this direction and expressed an interest in receiving information on additional measures and the progress made in implementing them.

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, there were no significant changes during 1951 in the civil service or the judicial organization.¹⁰¹ The inquiry into the working of indigenous courts in the Cameroons had not been made since the Chairman of the Commission of Enquiry had been unable to visit the Territory during 1951, as originally planned. The Administering Authority stated, however, that he had recommended that a special commission investigate the situation in the Trust Territory.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The Territory's economy, according to the Administering Authority, is in the south based primarily on the plantation lands, which produce bananas in particular, and also rubber and palm produce, the principal exports from the Cameroons, and elsewhere is based on peasant agriculture and cattle raising. Over half a million cubic feet of timber and firewood were produced from the Territory's forests in 1951. Except for palm produce and rubber-processing factories in the plantation areas, and local cottage crafts, there was no industry in the Territory. Neither were there any known mineral resources of economic value.

Apart from subsistence farming, indigenous farmers produce some export crops, of which cocoa, palm products and groundnuts are sold through statutory Nigerian Marketing Boards. Agricultural and animal husbandry services are provided both by the Nigerian technical departments and by the Native Authorities, the Administering Authority indicated. In the northern Cameroons, there was a staff of trained African agricultural assistants within the Trust Territory. The scheme for the distribution of fertilizers in Dikwa Emirate, the Administering Authority reported, resulted in a striking increase in yields during 1951 and experimental sowing and transplanting of Virginia tobacco in Dikwa also gave promising results. In the southern Cameroons, there were an agricultural experimental station, five smaller demonstration farms and a livestock investigation centre. A senior agricultural officer and a cocoa survey officer were stationed in the area during 1951, and the Administering Authority reported progress in the rehabilitation of abandoned cocoa farms and improvement in the quality of cocoa. The veterinary staff in the Territory included a senior veterinary officer and four other officers, all on a part-time basis. While there was no meat shortage in the northern section, the Administering Authority observed, the meat supply in the Cameroons Province was not yet satisfactory and the Bakweri people continued to oppose the use of grassland on the Cameroons Mountain for cattle.

Five British trading companies continued to operate in the Territory during 1951. As a means of promoting indigenous participation in trade and industry, the Administering Authority stated, it was encouraging the expansion of co-operative societies. According to the annual report, there were 34 such societies in 1951 with a total of 1,579 members, of whom 1,108 were members of cocoa marketing societies. There were also three unions of marketing societies involving 24 societies, and one co-operative village shop, with a membership of 38, was opened at Gwoza in 1951. The Administering Authority stated that about 10 per cent of the total cocoa crop was marketed co-operatively during the year but efforts to establish village co-operative societies for the benefit of small cocoa farmers had aroused little interest.

By far the largest plantation enterprise in the Territory is the statutory Cameroons Development Corporation, set up to operate former German plantation lands as a public enterprise and for the benefit of the people of the Territory. In the past, the Trusteeship Council's principal interest in the operations of the Corporation has centred on the application of the latter principle. The Corporation is managed by a nine-member board of directors, three of them Cameroonians. Its principal products are bananas, oil palm produce and rubber. Production showed a steady increase. This was particularly true of bananas, the chief crop, exports of which rose from 1,281,330 stems in 1947 to 5,773,208 stems in 1951, all of which, as in previous years, was sold to the United Kingdom Ministry of Food; the price in 1951 was £32 a ton, the same as in 1950.

The Corporation's accounts for 1951 showed a working profit of £635,000 (£317,426 in 1950), of which £230,000 (none in 1950) was placed in reserve for staff welfare, £350,000 (£280,000 in 1950) was set aside for the 1952-53 income tax assessment, and the remaining £55,000 (£53,296 in 1950) was declared surplus profits to be expended for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Trust Territory. All the 1948 surplus profits and part of the 1949 surplus had been allocated to the Cameroons, after consultation with local development committees, for local development schemes, medical services, reading rooms and scholarships in the southern Cameroons and for transport facilities and a health centre in the north. The allocation of the balance of the 1949 profits and of the 1950 profits was under discussion during 1951. During the eleventh session of the Trusteeship Council, the special representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council that a conference, attended by representatives from both the northern and southern sections of the Cameroons, had been held to discuss expenditure of the Corporation's surplus profits for 1950. The conference adopted allocation principles designed to secure equal treatment for all parts of the Trust Territory and reached unanimous recommendations on projects of social and economic development which the Governor of Nigeria had been asked to approve.

Although the Cameroons and Nigeria shared a common budget, the Administering Authority included separate estimates for the Cameroons in its annual report. It reported a continued surplus of revenue over expenditure for the second consecutive year. Revenue and expenditure amounted to £1,202,000 and £998,000, respectively, for 1950-51 as against £1,106,000 and £880,000 for 1949-50. The continued improvement in the financial situation over previous years was again attributed to the increasing prosperity of the Cameroons Development Corporation and an important banana estate operated by a commercial company under licence from the Corporation. The Nigerian Government decided that the whole of the current and future surpluses should be paid into a Cameroons Development Fund, which was established in March 1951 with an initial contribution of £350,000. The Fund is administered by the Governor, with the advice of the Commissioner of the Cameroons, in consultation with regional authorities and after discussion with representatives from the Trust Territory. The Territory also benefits from expenditure under the ten-year development plan for Nigeria; projects specifically for the Cameroons during the financial years 1951-52 and 1952-53 amounted to £380,392, of which £38,060 would be spent in the northern Cameroons, the Administering Authority reported. Other sources of development revenue for the Cameroons, apart from the surplus profits of the Cameroons Development Corporation, included grants made by the Nigeria Cocoa and Oil Palm Produce Marketing Boards.

Under the new Constitution, the various Regions of Nigeria will have, for the first time, their own sources of revenue and will arrange their own laws instead of, as in the past, disbursing moneys voted them by the Government of Nigeria. Development projects in the Territory will thus be undertaken by the Eastern and Northern Regional Production Development Boards which cover the southern and northern Cameroons, respectively. These Boards have assumed responsibility for commitments entered into by the Marketing Boards, which no longer administer development projects directly but make grants to the appropriate Regional Production Development Board. The Administering Authority stated that the Boards have strong African representation and that one of the nine members of the Eastern Board comes from the Cameroons. In 1951, the Administering Authority reported, this Board made a grant of £165,000 for coffee production in Bamenda Province, and the Northern Board was considering an application for a grant in connexion with an agricultural resettlement scheme near Gwoza designed to promote the emergence of the "pagans" of the unsettled districts from their isolation.

Besides expenditure from these sources, the Native Authorities have their own budgets, with revenues estimated to total £282,600 in 1951-52, mainly from indigenous taxes, and expenditures, estimated at $260,100, devoted to local works and services. Their largest single item of expenditure, as in previous years, was on administration and amounted to £36,000.

The Trusteeship Council expressed satisfaction with the continued buoyant economic situation of the Trust Territory and the particularly important contribution made to it by the Cameroons Development Corporation. Nevertheless, it drew attention, as in the previous year, to the predominance of banana production in the economy and recommended that the Administering Authority continue giving careful attention to diversifying agricultural production. The Council asked that further information be given on this matter in the next annual report. The continuing contribution of the Cameroons Development Corporation to the social and educational development of the Territory, both through its own operations and the allocation of its surplus profits for the benefit of the Territory as a whole, was also noted by the Trusteeship Council. It welcomed, in particular, the inauguration of a representative territorial conference as a means of determining the application of the surplus profits to public projects and expressed the hope that such consultations would be continued and their scope broadened as and when appropriate. The Council recalled that it was the intention of the Administering Authority eventually to transfer the management and control of the Corporation to the indigenous inhabitants, but recognized that too drastic a change from the existing system of management might impair both the efficiency of the Corporation and its economic importance to the Territory. It therefore recommended that indigenous inhabitants continue to be brought into posts of responsibility in the Corporation as rapidly as they were equipped to fill them. In this connexion, it suggested that the Corporation's scholarship programme be directed as far as practicable towards training in business and technical methods appropriate to the management of the Corporation.

The importance of more and better roads to the Territory's economy had been emphasized in the past by the Administering Authority, the Visiting Mission, the Council and a number of petitioners. In 1951, the Administering Authority reported, the total mileage of motorable roads was 1,470, compared to 1,366 in 1950. The first part of the road development programme, made possible by the favourable financial position of the Territory since 1949, as well as by generous contributions from Nigeria and the United Kingdom, would be the improvement of the Victoria-Bamenda road, the construction of a road into the isolated Tigon-Ndoro-Kentu area (projects which alone would cost some £900,000) and the improvement of the road south from Bama to link the northern and southern sections of the Territory. Contributions to these developments included a special allocation by the Nigerian Government of £148,911 and another from the United Kingdom of £150,000.

Recalling the emphasis which it had placed on the importance of road communications to the development of the Territory, the Trusteeship Council noted with satisfaction the further concentration of planning and effort devoted to road construction by the Administering Authority. In particular, it noted the substantial further allocations of funds for this purpose and urged the Administering Authority to press forward with its programmes of road development.

Of the Territory's 34,081 square miles of land, about eleven and a half square miles are held by the Government and some 460 square miles, most of which was alienated in the southern Cameroons during the German regime, are held by the Cameroons Development Corporation, trading companies, missions and non-indigenous inhabitants. All other lands, as well as the 395 square miles leased to the Corporation, have been declared Native lands, which the Governor of Nigeria is required by law to hold and administer for the use and common benefit of the inhabitants. According to the Administering Authority's report, missionary societies held some 4,075 acres of land in 1951, an increase of 179 acres over the previous year. In addition, grants of 12,500 acres of Native land for cattle rearing and 1,200 acres for a leper settlement were approved during 1951, to await demarcation and survey. Grants to the Eastern Regional Production Board of 1,200 acres of Native land for coffee growing and 5,600 acres for cattle rearing were also approved.

Problems resulting from the alienation of lands in the south formed the subject of a number of petitions examined by the Trusteeship Council. In various petitions submitted since 1946, the Bakweri Land Committee has complained that lands operated by the Cameroons Development Corporation had been taken illegally by the Germans from the Bakweri people. The Committee sought the return of the lands to the Bakweri with compensation. Subsequently, the Administering Authority drew up a programme, which was endorsed in 1950 by the Trusteeship Council, for the resettlement and rehabilitation of the Bakweri. Representatives of the latter, however, insisted on the recognition of their ownership of the land which had been alienated. The Administering Authority reported that during 1951 the Bakweri Land Committee continued to refuse to co-operate in the implementation of the resettlement scheme, but it observed signs of growing interest among other sections of the Bakweri. It concluded that the scheme would therefore be carried out in co-operation with those who were willing to participate. In a later petition (T/Pet.4/76 and Add.1), the Bakweri Land Committee rejected the idea that the Bakweri people might have had a change of heart regarding the resettlement scheme, the execution of which, it held, should be preceded by an unequivocal pronouncement by the Trusteeship Council that the Bakweri people were recognized as the sole legal owners of the plantation lands within their tribal area. They requested that the Council arrange for an investigation of the matter by an international judicial body, to accompany the next Visiting Mission to the Territory.

In commenting on the petition, the Administering Authority stated (T/955/Add.1 and T/C.2/SR.39) that it appeared that the Bakweri Land Committee could no longer fairly claim to be fully representative of the Bakweri people, that other Bakweri representatives had now approached the Administration with requests for implementation of the plan, and that prospects of progress in the matter were markedly improving. The special representative of the Administering Authority informed the Council, at its eleventh session, of the formation of the Bakweri Farmers' Union, a co-operative society of some 70 members pledged to support the plans for Bakweri resettlement. The Union had already begun selling to the Cameroons Development Corporation bananas produced by its members. The ultimate objective was the exploitation by Bakweri farmers of lands to be excised from the Corporation's holdings in accordance with the Administration's plans. If the Union were successful, the special representative stated, there was a reasonable prospect of making headway with the schemes for Bakweri rehabilitation.

After examining the petition, together with the observations of the Administering Authority, the Trusteeship Council on 22 July 1952 adopted, by 10 votes to 1, resolution 616(XI), in which it reaffirmed its sixth session resolution¹⁰² on the question and urged the petitioners to co-operate with the Administering Authority in its schemes for the resettlement and rehabilitation of the Bakweri.

In another petition (T/Pet.4/82), the Bamenda Improvement Association alleged that land had been wrongfully taken from them by the people of Bali. Their suit having been rejected by the Nigerian Supreme Court, a number of people demonstrated before the judge and the petitioners "declared civil war" against the Balis. The Association asserted that the subsequent disorders were due to bad administration, and demanded that periodic reports on the disturbances should be sent to the Governor and the Press of Nigeria. The Administering Authority observed (T/1013 and T/C.2/SR.39) that since the Balis were in effective occupation of the land when European administration was established, the validity of their title by right of conquest must be recognized. During the disorders, it stated, about 5,000 armed persons burned homes and looted crops and property in Bali territory but order was restored without the use of force. It added that the Governor of Nigeria had appointed a judge of the Supreme Court to conduct an inquiry into the rival claims of the disputants.

On 22 July 1952, by resolution 620(XI), adopted by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention, the Council requested the Administering Authority to inform it of the results of the inquiry. Pending the outcome of the inquiry, the Council considered that it need make no recommendation.

Another land dispute was referred to in a petition (T/Pet.4/81) from the Bwinga Native Community objecting to the Government's payment of compensation, for land occupied by the United Africa Company, to the Victoria Native ¹⁰² See Y.U.N., 1950, pp. 705-6.

Administration rather than to the petitioners themselves. The petitioners requested the Council to intervene with the Administering Authority on their behalf. The Administering Authority informed the Council (T/C.2/SR.39) that a sum equivalent to rent for the land was being paid to the Victoria Native Administration — the nearest and smallest unit of local government in the area — for the benefit of the indigenous population of the area and that it was not prepared to transfer the revenue derived from the property to the petitioners. In the circumstances, the Council decided on 22 July 1952, by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention, that no recommendation on its part was necessary (resolution

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Although there were no regular or Territory-wide studies of either standards or costs of living, the Administering Authority stated that it could be safely assumed that the standard of living in the plantations area had improved considerably as a result of wage increases and the establishment of plantation shops. Sharp rises in prices for agricultural commodities generally had also helped to increase the prosperity of farmers.

The only large wage-labour force in the Cameroons is in the southern part, particularly in the plantations area. In 1951, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, out of a total of some 34,600 wage-earners, about 25,000 were employed in agriculture, mostly on the plantations. Of the latter, 17,000 belonged to the Cameroons Development Corporation Workers' Union, and 3,000 workers on the largest commercial banana plantation were also unionized; smaller numbers of wage-earners belonged to unions of transport and public service workers. The Administering Authority reported four disputes resulting in work stoppages during 1951, three involving Corporation workers. The most serious of the three, involving 700 workers, concerned a request for a change of working hours and the reinstatement of five dismissed workers, which was granted; another stoppage, in protest against an allegedly excessive task, lasted 26 days, and the third, involving eighteen men, concerned wages. Wage increases were also demanded in the fourth dispute and work was resumed after intervention.

The Administering Authority reported that 1951 marked the publication of the first newspaper in the Cameroons, The Eastern Outlook and Cameroons Star, a weekly with correspondents in the Southern Provinces of the Cameroons.

The Administering Authority observed that child marriage was still practised in the Territory but it outlined the steps taken to improve the status of women. Some held positions in government or business, it stated, some had been elected to the new Federal Councils, and the majority of Native courts had at least one woman sitting on the bench. Two women from the Cameroons were receiving higher training in the United Kingdom during 1951. In addition, domestic science centres had been established in the southern Cameroons and the Bamenda Women's Institute had continued to flourish.

The Trusteeship Council recommended that the Administering Authority continue its efforts to improve the status of women and requested that further information on the measures undertaken be included in the next annual report. The Council further recommended that the Administering Authority continue to urge the progressive abolition of child marriage.

The abolition of corporal punishment has been repeatedly recommended in the past by both the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly. By resolution 562(VI) of 18 January 1952,¹⁰³ the latter urged the Administering Authority to comply with its recommendations on this subject without delay. In its annual report for 1951, the Administering Authority replied that it would continue to work towards the abolition of corporal punishment, although the achievement of this aim remained dependent on its acceptance by African public opinion and on the existence of alternative penalties. Action had been taken, however, to limit the offences for which corporal punishment may be inflicted and to abolish the power of Native courts to award this punishment to adults in the Eastern Region of Nigeria, which includes the southern Cameroons.

After noting this recent action by the Administering Authority, the Council again drew the Administering Authority's attention to previous recommendations concerning corporal punishment, particularly General Assembly resolution 562 (VI), and urged it to make every effort to bring about the complete abolition of corporal punishment.

With respect to medical and health services, the Administering Authority reported an increase in total personnel from 396 in 1950 to 423 in 1951; personnel in 1951 included fifteen doctors, eighteen nursing sisters and 50 African qualified nurses. In addition, the Administering Authority pointed out, some of the Nigerian medical staff give part of their services to the Trust Territory. Government expenditure on medical services in 1950-51 amounted to about £82,300, including expenditure under the Development and Welfare Plan. Facilities included, in the Cameroons and Bamenda Provinces, one mission hospital, seven government hospitals, one main hospital and four other hospitals provided by the Cameroons Development Corporation, 20 Native Authority dispensaries and 30 Corporation dispensaries. A medical field unit also operated in the southern section and a leprosy research project was still in progress. Facilities in the northern section were more limited, but the Administering Authority reported progress during 1951 in the construction of the Mubi hospital, the first in the north. Meanwhile, the northern area was served by a few dispensaries, leprosy treatment centres and mobile field units. Otherwise it was dependent on facilities in Nigeria. The building, in the near future, of a Medical Assistants' Training School at Kano in Nigeria would, the Administering Authority anticipated, make possible the training of more African medical assistants from the northern section.

The Trusteeship Council urged the Administering Authority to press forward with its efforts to expand medical and health facilities, particularly in the northern area, and to modernize leprosy treatment. Noting that there was a lack of adequate information on the incidence and causes of infant mortality in the Territory and recognizing the difficulties involved in obtaining such information, the Council asked the Administering Authority to furnish as precise as possible an analysis of this aspect of public health.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The educational system in the Trust Territory is under the supervision of the Inspector-General of Nigeria, with central and regional advisory boards, which included no members from the Cameroons. Estimated public expenditure on education in 1950-51, according to the annual report, amounted to £133,200, including about £24,000 by Native Authorities, as compared with £118,200 in 1949-50. Figures on the expenditure by missionary societies were not available. Government grants-in-aid to education, including development and welfare grants, amounted to £94,200 in 1950-51; missionary societies alone received £56,600 in grants in 1951. The percentage of illiteracy in the Territory, outside the Victoria Division in the south, was estimated by the Administering Authority at over 90 per cent, and higher among women and elderly persons.

In 1951, the Administering Authority reported, the Trust Territory had 302 primary and vernacular schools, attended by 28,960 pupils in the southern section and 2,060 pupils in the northern area; two secondary schools, with an enrolment of 317 pupils; and seven teacher-training schools, with 340 pupils. The Administering Authority stated that 252 of the schools, including both secondary schools, were run by missions and 50 by the Government and the Native Authorities. Except for 36 primary schools and one teacher-training school in the northern section, all schools were in the south. A slight increase over 1950 was reported in the percentage of enrolment of school-age children in the Territory, averaging in 1951 about 24.5 per cent in the south and about 1.5 per cent in the north, but the annual report showed a reduction in the number of teachers during 1951.

There was a continuing scarcity of higher elementary certificated teachers for senior primary schools in the south and the supply of indigenous teachers in the north was still inadequate, the Administering Authority observed. It anticipated, however, that the opening of a new higher elementary class in the training centre in the Cameroons Province in 1952 would ease the situation in the south by 1954 and that the continued expansion of the teacher-training centre at Mubi, in the north, would improve the situation in that area. The opening of the first Trade Training Centre in the Territory, at Ombé, originally scheduled for mid-1951, was expected to take place early in 1952, the Administering Authority stated.

The Trusteeship Council had previously made recommendations for the eventual establishment of free primary education. The Administering Authority reported that school fees continued to be charged in all except vernacular schools but that the Cameroons Development Corporation was embarking on a programme of free primary education for the children of all its workers. According to the annual report, the annual rates in the Government primary schools at the junior level were 12s. 6d. and at the senior level 25s.; in the Native Authority and mission schools the rates varied, depending on the classification of different areas as "primitive", "poor" or "wealthy". Fees of £18 per annum for tuition and board, plus £3 for books and uniform, were charged in one secondary school and £12 per annum, plus £4 for books for newly-enrolled pupils, were charged in the other. However, scholarships to secondary schools both in the Territory and in Nigeria were provided by the Government, Native Authorities and the Cameroons Development Corporation; the latter, in 1951, provided eighteen such scholarships in addition to those awarded exclusively to children of employees. Scholarships were also provided for higher education at the University College at Ibadan, Nigeria, and at institutions in the United Kingdom. In 1951, the Administering Authority stated, 31 Cameroonians were pursuing courses of higher education in Nigeria or overseas on scholarships, fifteen of them granted by the Government and British Council and the rest by the Cameroons Development Corporation.

In the field of adult education, the most notable progress was reported in the plantation areas, where 2,283 pupils were enrolled in adult education centres run by the Cameroons Development Corporation. In 1951, the Administering Authority stated, the Corporation employed five organizers for this purpose and six full-time teachers in 22 sewing classes attended by wives of estate employees. Progress was also reported in the north, where five adult education organizers "had been appointed and primers in Fulfulde were being prepared. In the Mubi District considerable interest was shown in these projects, the Administering Authority observed. Domestic science centres continued to attract good attendance, but three domestic science and adult women's training centres in Bamenda, which had suffered from lack of supervision, had had to be closed during 1951. Apart from a few libraries belonging to schools, Native Authorities and training centres, there was a small library of adult education literature at Tiko and a circulating library of 1,600 books provided by the Corporation for the estate labour camps.

The Trusteeship Council noted that, although budgetary allocations for education continued to increase, the estimated rate of illiteracy remained high. The Council therefore recommended that the Administering Authority take further steps to meet the educational needs of the Territory and expressed the hope that it would utilize the technical knowledge of UNESCO and other organizations. The Administering Authority was recommended in particular to increase its efforts to provide primary education facilities, especially in the north, and was urged to take steps to ensure that the local authorities which were responsible for education in the north adequately carried out the role entrusted to them. As it attached particular importance to the progressive education of women, the Council asked that the school enrolment of boys and girls be shown separately in future annual reports. Noting that fees continued to be charged at primary schools in the south, the Council recalled its previous recommendation on the subject and urged the Administering Authority to review its policy with a view to taking progressive measures, such as allowing an increasing number of exemptions from the payment of fees, towards the ultimate objective of free education. The Council also expressed the hope that the decrease in the number of teachers during 1951 would prove only temporary and that the accelerated supply of teachers of high standard anticipated by the Administering Authority would result in a progressive improvement in the situation. Finally, after noting the further progress made in adult education, particularly through the influence and activities of the Cameroons Development Corporation, the Council expressed the hope that, in view of the high percentage of illiteracy in the Territory, the Administering Authority would continue its efforts in this field.

2. Cameroons, Administered by France

This Territory, which covers an area of 432,000 square kilometres, had an African population of 3,062,835 in December 1951, according to the Administering Authority's annual report,¹⁰⁴ as compared with 2,997,164 in January 1950. The European population increased from 12,021, of whom 8,988 were French, at the end of 1950 to 13,733, of whom 11,482 were French, in December 1951.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

The Territory continued to be integrated within the French Union as an "Associated Territory"¹⁰⁵ and governed by the legislative and executive organs of the French Republic and the French Union in France. The Cameroons elects four deputies, one by the electoral college of French citizens and three by the college of Africans, to the French National Assembly; three representatives, two of them Africans, to the Council of the Republic; five representatives, three of them

For detailed discussions of this report in the Trusteeship Council, see Trusteeship Council, Official Records, Eleventh Session (3 June-24 July 1952); summaries of the observations of individual members are included in the Council's report to the General Assembly (A/2150). For general discussion in the Assembly concerning conditions in Trust Territories, see pp. 726-29.

Africans, to the Assembly of the French Union; and two representatives, both Africans, to the Economic Council of the French Union. A local Territorial Assembly functions within the Territory. It discusses and passes the budget and may discuss and make decisions on other matters provided they are non-political.

On 17 June 1951, the Administering Authority reported, elections to the French National Assembly were held in the Trust Territory. For these elections, the Administering Authority stated, the categories of electors had been increased under a new Act and special action had been taken to make voting easier and to induce those on the electoral lists to vote. As a result, the number of Africans registered on the electoral lists for the first college increased from 116,566 in March 1951 to 532,475 in June 1951; of the latter 234,611 electors voted. The abstention of 45 per cent of those registered was attributed in the annual report to geographical difficulties, the stage of development of the people and, particularly, the persistence of certain customs unfavourable to the emancipation of women. The college of citizens of French status comprised 6,140 voters at the time of the elections. The Administering Authority pointed out that the electoral body in the Cameroons was slowly becoming aware of its civic rights, largely as a result of the continuous growth of the civil registration system. Four large new registration centres were set up in 1951, the Administering Authority reported. In the south, the annual report noted, the inhabitants attached particular importance to the registration of births, marriages and deaths as a means leading to the franchise, but the introduction of registration was meeting with difficulties in the eastern and northern areas among peoples under the influence of traditional institutions, and particularly among the Kirdis, or "pagans", a still primitive people who found it hard to understand the desirability or necessity of registration. Inadequate registration, the Administering Authority's report added, was the sole obstacle to the introduction of universal suffrage, as had been recommended by the Trusteeship Council

As described in the annual report, the political parties, other than purely local parties, in the Territory included:

(1) the Union des populations du Cameroun (UPC) which had been at odds with the Rassemblement démocratique africain (RDA) ever since the latter detached itself from the Communist Party, and whose representative received 3,077 votes out of 16,950 recorded at the last electoral consultation; the Kumzse which had separated itself from the UPC but was still active locally among the Bamiléké; (2) the Union des Syndicats confédérés (USCC), which had split into two groups, one remaining faithful to the metropolitan Confédération générale du travail (CGT) and the other forming an association of indigenous trade unions; (3) the Union sociale camerounaise (ESOCAM), a non-revolutionary progressive party; (4) the Renaissance camerounaise, a progressive party of the central area; and (5) the Bloc démocratique camerounais, a new party directed by members of the intelligentsia in the central and western areas.

The first of these parties, the UPC, claimed (T/Pet.5/97/Rev.1) that the Administration encouraged the drawing up of lists of electors favourable to its own candidates. In another petition (T/Pet.5/99), the UPC requested the establishment of a single college of electors, protested against the establishment of three electoral constituencies and claimed that one of the candidates, Louis Aujoulat, had been elected to the National Assembly as a result of propaganda conducted in his favour by officials.

The Administering Authority stated (T/1001 and T/C.2/SR.38) that the complaint of fraudulent elections was unfounded, that representatives of all political parties were present when the lists were drawn up and that the lists were publicly displayed and full opportunity was given for the correction of errors and omissions or for additional registration. As to the division of the Territory into three constituencies, the Administering Authority pointed out (T/1016) that this was quite proper since three seats in the French National Assembly were allotted to the indigenous electorate. It added that Mr. Aujoulat had received 28,309 out of 114,173 votes, the balance having been distributed among fourteen other candidates; therefore, even if there was any administrative pressure, the majority of electors were apparently not susceptible to it. The special representative of the Administering Authority further explained (T/C.2/SR.37) that the local Territorial Assembly had requested the continuance of the dual electoral system but that the Administering Authority nevertheless hoped to replace it by a single electoral college when the Territory had attained a sufficient degree of development and provided the experience of the single college instituted in Togoland under French administration was favourable.

By resolution 623 (XI), adopted on 22 July 1952 by 10 votes to 1, the Trusteeship Council noted the special representative's statement and recalled its earlier recommendation,¹⁰⁶ at its ninth session in 1951, that the dual system be replaced by a single electoral college.

¹⁰⁶ See Y.U.N., 1951, p. 722.

The establishment of a single electoral college in the Cameroons was also sought by the Ressor-tissants camerounais de Paris (T/Pet.5/104), which protested against the Act of 22 November 1951 establishing a single college for Togoland under French administration while providing for the continuance of the double college in the Cameroons for a further five years. The Administering Authority suggested (T/1016) that the Territory's parliamentary representatives and the members of its Territorial Assembly, which had desired the continuance of the double electoral college, were better qualified than the petitioners to speak for the higher interests of the Cameroons. Moreover, it pointed out, the Trusteeship Agreements did not provide that identical measures should be instituted in both Trust Territories.

In its report to the General Assembly, the Trusteeship Council commended the Administering Authority for the enactment in June 1951 of the law further extending the franchise and expressed satisfaction at the marked increase during 1951 in the number of registered voters. It expressed the hope, however, that additional measures would be examined with a view to attaining, as soon as practicable, universal suffrage and a single electoral college and that efforts would be made, through encouragement and instruction, to increase the proportion of voters among the existing electorate.

The Administering Authority in its annual report recalled that the decree of 29 October 1949 establishing the Representative Assembly of the Cameroons provided that the final form of the Assembly should be determined by later enactments. The first such law, it stated, was enacted by the French Parliament on 6 February 1952. This law transformed the former Representative Assembly into the Territorial Assembly and raised the number of councillors of French status from sixteen to 24 and those of local or personal status from eighteen to 32, thus altering the distribution of seats in favour of the African members. The law also provided that legislation enlarging the Assembly's powers should be introduced not later than July 1952. An extension of the Assembly's powers has been repeatedly recommended since 1949 by the Trusteeship Council.

The petitions from both the Ressor-tissants camerounais de Paris and the UPC referred to the Assembly. The former demanded that it be granted political powers and increased responsibilities in economic and social matters. The latter alleged that the indigenous members of the Assembly were not allowed to participate in decisions and it sought the establishment of a Legislative and Constituent Assembly.

After recalling its previous recommendations on the subject, the Trusteeship Council noted with interest that legislation providing for an extension of the Assembly's powers was expected to be enacted soon by the French Parliament. It also noted with satisfaction that the total membership of the Territorial Assembly had been increased and that the proportion between African and European members had been altered in favour of the former. The Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would further increase the African membership and that the bill extending the powers of the Assembly would be enacted with the least possible delay.

Reporting on reforms at the regional level, where authority is exercised by traditional chiefs under the supervision of administrative officers and of chefs de regions and chefs de subdivisions, the Administering Authority stated that draft legislation to organize regional councils to replace the Councils of Notables had again been considered in April to May 1952 by the Territorial Assembly. The regional councils were to be given more extensive powers and a larger membership than the Councils of Notables, which assist the administrative officers in the consideration of regional, financial, economic and social matters. Discussion in the Assembly, the Administering Authority observed, showed that further study was needed before the proposed reform could be put into effect throughout the Territory. Draft legislation on the status of chiefs, the Administering Authority reported, had been sent to the French National Assembly after submission to the Assembly of the French Union. Finally, the Trusteeship Council was informed during its eleventh session that the Administering Authority was studying a plan which it considered an important step towards the decentralization and the administrative autonomy of the regions. The plan contemplated the organization of elected rural municipalities having autonomous budgets and the merger of this system with that of the regional councils.

At the municipal level, the annual report indicated that, in addition to seven existing mixed communes, one had been organized for the first time in the north, at Garoua. The extension of this experiment to other urban centres in the north was anticipated by the Administering Authority. Moreover, the Administration was considering the transformation of appointed municipalities into elected municipalities.

The Administering Authority stated that the reform of the regional councils, for several years under consideration by the Territorial Assembly, was expected to be put into effect in 1952 and that the elected rural municipalities would be established during the same year. This statement was welcomed by the Trusteeship Council, which expressed the hope that the Administering Authority's efforts to develop regional councils would meet with early success.

According to the annual report, there were few changes in the structure of the administrative services during 1951. A new service, the Control des regies financières, was established, the Service des Domaines was enlarged and various administrative posts were created. The report showed that Europeans in the administrative staff increased from 1,375 in 1950 to 1,625 in 1951 and Africans from 7,568 to 8,509. Africans were admitted to several important posts during 1951, including one appointed as assistant to a chef de subdivision, one as a chef de région agricole and several as chefs de poste agricole. Experiments were carried out with a view to admitting Africans to positions previously held only by European officials. The increased proportion of European staff, the report explained, was due to the closer supervision required for the more rapid training of the African staff. Since the Europeans were usually engaged on contract or as auxiliaries, however, they could be replaced by Africans without difficulty. Methods used to fit Africans for important posts while giving them a general and professional education included evening classes at Yaounde, Douala and Nkongsamba, the opening of professional training courses for postal, telecommunication and mining officials, and the award of scholarships for advanced training in France. The Administering Authority reported that an order of 2 April restored the recruitment of regional agents and personnel for the technical services, conferring upon them a status practically equivalent to that of the regular civil service and facilitating their access to it. By the end of 1951, the staff of these services numbered 3,138 as against 2,342 the year before.

In one of its petitions (T/Pet.5/97), the UPC complained against the Bamiléké officials and the Administering Authority acknowledged (T/1001) that some officials were carrying on commercial or political activities through their relatives, but pointed out that, unless abuse or the exercise of undue influence could be proved, it was difficult to remove these officials from their area of origin.

Reporting on the judicial system, the Administering Authority stated that the Cameroons now had a completely autonomous judiciary, the guiding principle of which was the complete separation of judicial and political powers. Judicial autonomy was ensured by the establishment of a Court of Appeal at Yaounde by a decree of 11 April 1951. According to the annual report, French courts, which apply French procedure and law and comprise judicial magistrates, try: (1) all penal cases; (2) civil and commercial cases in which a European is a party; and (3) civil and commercial cases between two Africans, provided both consent. In the latter cases, customary law and usage is applied unless the parties request otherwise. Indigenous courts have jurisdiction only in civil suits between Africans, and appeals from these courts are dealt with by a chamber of the Court of Appeal at Yaounde.

The Trusteeship Council noted with satisfaction that the separation of judicial and executive powers, as it had previously recommended, had been achieved and that the Territory now had judicial autonomy.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

According to the annual report, the Territory was undergoing a transition from an essentially agricultural and lightly-equipped economy to one which was completely transforming its traditional resources and methods. This was attributed largely to the continued implementation of the ten-year plan and the stimulation of government and private investment. Private investment in new industries opened between 1948 and 1950 or still being established was said to have exceeded investment in firms previously established. It totalled approximately 3,620 million francs,¹⁰⁷ including 605 million in agriculture, 1,550 million in forests, 1,465 million in industry and an additional 1,250 million reinvested. Of the total, 1,800 million francs consisted of advances from the Caisse Centrale de la France d'Outre Mer and from the Crédit du Cameroun. Programmes in progress under the ten-year plan comprised an initial group of operations extending from July 1947 to June 1952 and represented, allowing for the revaluation of December 1951, a total investment of public funds supplied by France amounting to about 16,400 million francs.

The Territory's increased prosperity was reflected in a considerable rise in the volume of imports, from 226,442 tons in 1950 to 413,137 tons in 1951, and in a regular rise in exports from 223,929 tons in 1950 to 307,902 (including about 78,000 in re-exports or goods in transit) in 1951, the highest export figure yet attained by the Territory. Equipment material accounted for 59.5 per cent of the 1951 imports and there was also an increase in the percentage of imported foodstuffs.

In 1951, according to the annual report, exports of cocoa, the most important of the cash crops sold abroad, amounted to 47,000 tons, all produced by Native planters; the Agricultural Service continued its efforts to maintain and improve further the quality of the cocoa. Coffee growing continued to develop, 10,300 tons being exported; the area farmed by Africans increased and efforts were being made to mechanize and improve farming methods. Banana exports exceeded 55,000 tons, the African share of production continuing to increase steadily. Successful efforts having been made to interest African farmers in tobacco growing, cultivation continued to expand. Africans also harvested 26,650 tons of palm kernels. The station at Dschang continued the establishment of a plantation of selected trees to popularize cinchona production by Africans and similar efforts in crop selection and protection were being made by the various agricultural stations for cocoa, local millets, ground-nuts, etc. Agricultural centres and experimental stations already set up or being established in various areas were described as among the most important achievements in agriculture. Food production continued to meet requirements, the Administering Authority reported, although there was a slight decline, due, it was stated, to the attraction of valuable export crops. This trend was being checked, however, by the encouragement of high-output crops, such as cassava and fruit trees.

Owing to the need to improve the quality of livestock, numbering 600,000 head, a second stock-breeding and selection station was established at Kounden. The laboratories of the Agricultural Service were re-equipped under the ten-year plan and an artificial-insemination station, several immunization and treatment centres, and the installation of a pig farm (at Kounden) were completed or near completion. Grazing lands were being improved and the construction of wells and watering places in the north was continued. The organization of the Territory's meat supply by establishing a series of cold-storage depots between the stock-breeding areas of the north and the great centres of consumption in the south reached an advanced state; a number of cold-storage plants were installed during the year and air transport was being used on certain sections of the route.

The Territory's mining output, particularly gold and titanium ore, suffered a serious setback in 1951 due to a decline in selling price, the Administering Authority reported, but efforts were being made to increase production and to provide a stable mining industry. A drilling programme was started during 1951 in a search for petroleum deposits in the Douala area, by a company in which the Territory held 33 per cent of the shares, the Research Bureau 51 per cent and the Central Fund of Overseas France 16 per cent.

Industrialization progressed steadily, according to the annual report, but would not reach its height until the completion of the Edéa dam. Schemes under consideration included a plan for a paper mill with an annual output of 30,000 tons, an iron and steel factory for the production of sheet iron and steel sections, a general machinery factory, a can factory, and a cement casing works. An oil-processing plant, to be operated on the same lines as the Dibombari factory (in which 50 per cent of the shares are reserved for Africans) and likewise given to the Cameroons by the French Government, was nearing completion at Edéa. The newly established spinning and weaving mill at Douala expected to extend its operations when the problem of training indigenous labour had been solved. This problem, which could only be solved gradually, the Administering Authority stated, was raised in the Cameroons for the first time as a result of the establishment of specialized industries.

The Administering Authority observed that the road construction programme undertaken under the ten-year plan should provide, when completed, a system of roads and bridges which would meet the needs of the Territory's rapidly developing economy. Three main arteries, comprising 2,760 kilometres of main roads, were planned, as well as 1,730 kilometres of secondary roads to serve these main highways. Expenditure on the work already completed amounted at the end of 1951 to over 3,000 million francs. The renewal and modernization of railway lines and rolling stock, on which over 2,000 million francs had been disbursed, was almost finished and an important plan for the extension of the railway towards Lake Chad was to be resumed. Rail traffic figures rose to 538,000 tons in 1951, an increase of 29.3 per cent over the 1950 figures. The traffic handled by the port of Douala increased to 633,000 tons, and work on the expansion of the port to an annual capacity of one million tons progressed. A considerable increase during 1951 in air traffic, particularly freight, was also reported. Air transport was beginning to be used to transport building materials, meat and vegetables, among other things, and plans for transporting the cotton crop from the Chad area to Douala by air were being considered. In view of this rapid development, an air equipment plan was introduced envisaging a total expenditure of 1,500 million francs, and improvements were already in progress. The postal and telecommunications systems were also improved and extended during 1951, the Administering Authority reported.

Co-operative methods appeared to the Administering Authority to be the most suitable for enabling the indigenous inhabitants to participate in the exploitation of the Territory at the existing stage of economic development. According to the annual report, there were 84 co-operatives in 1951, with a total known membership of about 40,800; 57 of them were agricultural production organizations and sixteen were consumer organizations. The provident societies, which were State co-operatives, had 791,971 members; by the end of 1951, they had received loans totalling 147 million francs. In 1951, the Administering Authority reported, the Central Supervisory Committee of the provident societies, which includes two members of the Territorial Assembly, asked that the most important branches should be given financial independence. The societies would become autonomous and direct administrative intervention would cease when they had achieved a sufficient degree of stability, the Administering Authority stated.

The Union des populations du Cameroun (UPC) claimed (T/Pet.5/97) that the provident societies operated only for the benefit of Europeans, but the Administering Authority maintained (T/1001) that their supervision by the Administration was designed to ensure that the general interest came before individual interests. It further pointed out that the provident society at Mungo had with its own resources set up a sawmill which was operated entirely for the benefit of its members.

According to the annual report, land is classified as (1) public or private domain of the Territory, (2) land held under the rules of local custom, and (3) land for which proceedings for the recognition of land rights were pending. In addition, land is granted by concession; concessions to non-indigenous inhabitants are subject to the prior approval of the Representative Assembly. As of 31 December 1951, the total area of land granted by concession, either provisionally or finally, amounted to 740 hectares in 2,501 urban concessions and 102,876 in 898 rural concessions. Indigenous inhabitants held 80 hectares of urban land and 2,726 hectares of rural land under concession. Of the total, 979 hectares represented 44 rural concessions granted during 1951, 22 provisionally and 22 finally. The annual report indicated that indigenous inhabitants, because of their desire for affirmation of their rights to the land which they held by custom, had applied for recognition of their property rights over 411 hectares of urban land and 6,351 hectares of rural land. By the end of 1951, the Administering Authority stated, 1,224 land ownership certificates were issued and applications were being dealt with by a steadily expanding land register service.

In one of its petitions (T/Pet.5/108), the UPC alleged seizures of land by the Administration or under its auspices. This was denied by the Administering Authority, which pointed out that it had never owned the land in question. It added that individual ownership had spread gradually and that some of the old chiefs sought to check development for their own ends. However, application should have been made to the customary courts, which were competent to give rulings in these matters. Transfers of land to Europeans, the Administering Authority stated, were made only after the required discussions and, in any case, the land in question was in a former desert area and its development by Europeans had stimulated the economy of the area and helped to populate it.

Approximately 82,000 square kilometres of land in the Territory consisted of exploitable forests, the Administering Authority reported. It referred to the important role in the Territory's economy played by forestry produce, exports of which totalled 642 million francs in 1951; local consumption for building and heating was also increasing. Forestry studies and research, equipment of the Forestry Service, the scheduling of 500,000 hectares of forest land, the enrichment and re-timbering of extensive forest zones were carried out under the ten-year plan, according to the annual report. Although efforts made to educate the indigenous population in forest conservation and restoration proved generally satisfactory, particularly among the Bamiléké farmers, nevertheless the scheduling of certain zones was prevented by lack of understanding on the part of the indigenous populations holding customary rights in those zones and by a request by the Territorial Assembly that scheduling operations be suspended. The Administering Authority stated that the regulations in force made the fullest allowance for the interests of the indigenous population.

After examining the situation, the Trusteeship Council concluded that the economic development of the Territory was proceeding along sound lines. It noted in particular the expansion of trade, implementation of the ten-year plan, growing industrialization, increase of hydro-electric power, and the increase of investments both by the Administering Authority and by private individuals. The Council also noted with satisfaction that surface and air communication and transport facilities were being extended and improved. It considered the development of transport and communications vital to the Territory's progress and recommended that the Administering Authority extend still further the transport facilities and especially the network of secondary roads. While recognizing that the Administering Authority was faced with the delicate task of reconciling the economic interests of the relatively large number of Europeans in the Territory and those of the indigenous inhabitants, the Council expressed confidence that the economic interests of the latter would continue to be carefully guarded and that their rights to land and forest resources in particular would be fully protected. In connexion with the classification of forests, the Council expressed regret at the opposition shown by the indigenous population. Recalling its previous recommendations on the subject, the Council again expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to maintain adequate forest cover and that it would succeed in overcoming the hesitations of the indigenous inhabitants in the matter.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the annual report, social problems were becoming increasingly acute due to the rapid development of the Territory, but the Administering Authority regarded the advances made through social services, particularly in improving living conditions and productivity, as encouraging. Expenditure on social services in the Territory's budget amounted to over 1,578 million francs, or 29.47 per cent of the budget, in 1951. The activities of the Social Service during 1951 included: the establishment in six areas of social, family and educational centres organized on the basis of the results of pilot projects at Douala; the operation of seven kindergartens, five of them at Douala, offering popular courses in domestic science, child care, hygiene and first aid; the organization of home visits and consultations; the maintenance of reception centres and small dispensaries; and numerous investigations, particularly into industrial accidents.

During 1951 preliminary surveys were undertaken to develop methods of investigating standards of living. The net national income, considered as the annual total of income paid to productive workers, was calculated at 31,067 million francs for 1950 and appeared to have increased 5 per cent, to 32,500 million francs, for 1951. While the cost of living was stated to have increased by 13.8 per cent between November 1950 and November 1951, the rise was compensated by other factors and the actual purchasing power of the indigenous inhabitants was said to have increased appreciably. Indices given for wages and retail prices for local products showed that the purchasing power had more than doubled from 1945 to 1950, and a growing demand among indigenous inhabitants for imported goods also reflected an increase in purchasing power.

The Trusteeship Council noted with satisfaction that the statistical services had been developed sufficiently to permit scientific and methodical inquiries into the standard of living of the different social categories of the indigenous inhabitants. It expressed interest in the figures provided in the annual report and indicated its confidence that the Administering Authority would supply more detailed information in its next report.

There were about 120,000 wage earners in the Territory, the Administering Authority reported, and the supply continued to be greater than the demand. It stated that the principle of equal pay for equal work was very rarely disputed and that the few breaches of labour regulations were usually settled by conciliation. Trade unions numbered 128 in 1951, with a membership of about 20,355, according to the report. A tendency for the trade unions movement to become independent from the Metropolitan union headquarters and to develop features of its own was observed. The Administering Authority noted an absence of educated trade-union leaders in the Territory and an unwillingness on the part of African workers to pay union dues, which were regarded as payments without immediate or concrete returns. The proposed labour code for the Territory, it indicated, would probably enter into force in 1952. Improving output and vocational training represented the chief labour problem in the Territory and a programme to develop technical education was being implemented.

Over-population of towns continued to make housing conditions difficult for both Africans and Europeans, the Administering Authority stated.

It reported that 129 houses were built for African officials in 1951, that a building society had been founded on the budget of the ten-year plan to help Africans buy suitable housing and that provident societies were directing their attention to building.

Noting the continued housing shortage in the principal towns and the measures taken to overcome the problem and to develop plans for improving housing throughout the Territory, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would vigorously pursue its programme for dealing with housing problems, many of which, the Council considered, required study and action. The Administering Authority was asked to provide full information on the matter in its next annual report.

In its report, the Administering Authority stated that French law did not allow discrimination on grounds of race, sex or religion and that the Government was doing everything in its power to ensure the strict application of this principle. The Union des populations du Cameroun (UPC) maintained (T/Pet.5/97), however, that there were still instances of discrimination against Africans in the Cameroons. In reply, the Administering Authority pointed out (T/1001) that, of three establishments referred to in the petition, one was a private club entitled to refuse admission to non-members, another an hotel admitting persons of all races provided they were correctly dressed, and the third a rest centre with insufficient accommodation to admit all applicants. Another complaint by the UPC, to the effect that human rights and freedom of speech were not respected in the Territory, was described by the Administering Authority as completely unfounded. The Trusteeship Council considered that in the circumstances no recommendation on its part was necessary.

Developments in the prison system, the Administering Authority reported, included the passing of an order setting up a prison camp at Edéa, close to the dam construction settlement; the construction company was to be responsible, under the supervision of a commission composed of administrative, judicial, medical and technical authorities and two councillors of the Territorial Assembly, for training the prisoners. Efforts to rehabilitate juvenile delinquents were being continued and the methods used should have been entirely overhauled by the beginning of 1952, the Administrative Authority observed. The Administering Authority also indicated that it intended to improve the penitentiary system in the Territory. This was noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council, which expressed the hope that the projected reforms would be carried out in the near future; the Council also asked that full information on the matter be provided in the next annual report.

In one of its petitions (T/Pet.5/97), the UPC claimed that European prisoners enjoyed privileged prison conditions not allowed to African prisoners; it objected especially to the continued employment of the latter as water carriers. The Administering Authority stated (T/1001) that the latest reports of the Control Commissions for the Dschang and Nkongsamba prisons refuted the allegations of the UPC; every prisoner was provided with a bed, blankets and clothing, individual mess-tins and spoons. As regards the water fatigue duties, the Administering Authority added, these were not unduly excessive and would be abolished when the water distribution system under construction was completed.

In its resolution on the petition (622(XI)), adopted on 22 July 1952 by 9 votes to 1, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to improve prison conditions.

According to the annual report, it was hoped to speed up the emancipation of women by granting scholarships, training nurses, teachers, typists and students, and sending domestic science teachers and social workers to the villages. Nevertheless, the solution of the problem lay in a far-reaching change in traditional customs, which would necessitate a strong movement of public opinion. One of the most important questions raised by the emancipation of women was that of the dowry; it is generally considered that polygamy and the maintenance of the dowry paid to the wife's parents might well be responsible for the inferior position of African women. The Administering Authority indicated, however, that a decree of 14 September 1951 now governs monogamic marriage and gives girls who have reached majority the right to marry despite the opposition of their parents. The adoption of this decree was welcomed by the Trusteeship Council. While noting with satisfaction the improvement in the status of women, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would further its efforts to achieve a greater improvement.

Reporting on medical services, the Administering Authority stated that 652.5 million francs had been appropriated on the 1951 budget for medical services and that an additional 435.5 million francs had been allocated, under the special budget of the ten-year plan, for building and the purchase of technical equipment and vehicles. The total medical personnel had risen by the end of 1951 to 3,216, including 150 Europeans. Of the total, 137 were doctors, 18 pharmacists, 6 dentists, and 62 midwives and nurses; this represented an increase over 1950 of 9 doctors, 2 dentists and 27 nurses, and further increases were expected for 1952, the Administering Authority indicated. During 1951, according to the annual report, African hospital patients numbered 2,123,905; 1,128,742 were in sleeping sickness and leprosy centres. The figures for consultations rose to 5,136,447 for 1,594,465 African patients; in addition, mobile health and prophylaxis teams checked 380,578 inhabitants of whom 298,222 were examined, treated or vaccinated. The health service continued its efforts in the field of maternal and child welfare, but, the annual report stated, these efforts often still met with unwillingness or passivity on the part of the population. Maternal and child health centres at Douala and Yaounde were reorganized in 1951 and eight clinics were built in Douala. Soap, salt, meat, milk, baby clothes, blankets, etc., were distributed through special funds, amounting in 1951 to seven million francs. In the Territory as a whole, 70,808 children were examined during the year and 213,242 consultations were given.

The Trusteeship Council noted with satisfaction the increases in expenditure for health purposes and further noted that the Administering Authority had co-operated in the field of public health with the World Health Organization. Reiterating its previous recommendations on the subject, the Council recommended that the Administering Authority continue to ensure the widest possible provision of medical facilities in the Territory and, to this end, further intensify its efforts to train African medical personnel.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, the urgency of certain aspects of the educational situation called for early efforts in three specific directions: (1) more instruction in the early years of secondary education so as to give the country quickly the educated personnel needed; (2) a more rapid rate of expansion of education for girls; and (3) the adoption, by a decision taken in July 1951, of a programme aimed at doubling within five years the present number of persons with schooling. The achievement of this aim, the Administering Authority stated, had become a major concern of its educational policy.

The Administering Authority reported that 480 million francs was appropriated in the local 1951 budget for education, as compared with 332 million in 1950. The execution of the ten-year plan had been delayed, however, and, of a total of 2,500 million francs assigned for the first four years, only 372.9 million francs had been allocated by the end of 1951. Pointing out that the situation had improved considerably, the Administering Authority stated that the planned programme of school construction could be carried out without further delay.

Increases, from 128,914 in 1950 to 140,582 in 1951, were reported in the number of children attending public and private primary schools; of the totals, about 20,000 in 1950 and 24,000 in 1951 were girls. The number of schools increased from 181 in 1950 to 203 in 1951 and the number of primary school teachers from 2,736 (including 142 women and 249 Europeans) to 3,306, of whom 163 were women and 176 were Europeans. Assistance from the local budget, the Administering Authority noted, had enabled missions to improve many of the small schools which had previously given only religious instruction in local languages.

The report indicated that 1,204 pupils attended the six public secondary schools in 1951 and 365 attended four of the private secondary schools; attendance figures for five secondary schools connected with Catholic missions were not available. A total of 58 candidates passed examinations for the baccalauréat during 1951, 43 for the first part and fifteen the second. The Administering Authority reported that a programme to expand the buildings of the Lycée Leclerc at Douala, one of the two secondary schools in the Territory offering a course identical with that given in France, had been drawn up and was expected to be completed within three years and that this expansion would enable the training of a large number of teachers holding adequate certificates. Other developments included the organizing of three supplementary courses to be started in 1952 at Fouban, Dschang and Ebolowa.

Apart from the technical and vocational education offered at secondary schools, a public apprenticeship centre was opened in October 1951 at Nkongsamba, and three others were scheduled to be opened elsewhere during 1952. Three pre-apprenticeship sections, with 107 students, were in operation during 1951 and three more were being established. Private vocational training was given at two established schools and during the year three apprenticeship centres were set up at Douala, Neiganga and Maroua; in addition, an African businessman at Douala was providing a three-year training course for building-workers. The teaching staff of secondary and technical training establishments numbered 126, including 38 women.

The Administering Authority considered the establishment of higher educational facilities in the Territory impracticable as there were still too few Cameroonians with secondary education. However, all Cameroonians holding the baccalauréat were being sent to France for higher studies. In December 1951, according to the annual report, the Territory had 260 scholarship-holders in France, 102 in secondary education, 80 in technical education, 57 in higher education; 21 scholarships were held by young civil servants of exceptional ability who went to France as internes in administrative branches of government or in technical institutions.

According to the annual report, 122,864 persons in the Territory under 21 years of age were able to read and write. The programme of fundamental education started in 1950 had been expanded, the Administering Authority stated, and included a campaign against illiteracy through courses for adults, attended in 1951 by 10,000 persons, and the dissemination of ideas of elementary hygiene by means of the cinema. Post-school activity was being pursued through study groups organized around the libraries and through correspondence and evening courses. The latter, offering finishing courses to civil servants, were well attended, the Administering Authority indicated; the courses at Yaounde included nearly 250 registered students in 1951.

The Trusteeship Council noted with satisfaction that further progress had been made in the field of education and, in particular, the increase in the budgetary appropriation for education and the continued efforts to increase the number and improve the quality of the teaching staff. Nevertheless, it considered that efforts should be intensified. It recommended that the Administering Authority further the educational advancement of the Territory, more particularly by extending education to women and by expanding technical education, the teacher-training programme and by promoting vocational and adult education. The Council also recommended that the Administering Authority make a preliminary study of the question of establishing higher educational facilities within the Cameroons as soon as practicable and that it report fully on the matter in its next annual report.

3. Questions Relating to Both Cameroons

Questions concerning the division of the Cameroons under two separate administrations were again considered in July 1952 by the Trusteeship Council in connexion with its examination, at its eleventh session, held from 3 June to 22 July, of petitions from: the Kamerun United National Congress (T/Pet.4/79-5/-105 and Add.1, and T/Pet.4/83); the Union des populations du Cameroun (T/Pet.5/97 and 99); the French Cameroons Welfare Union (T/Pet. 4/71 and Add.1-5 and T/Pet.4/72); and Joseph Ngu, President of the Kumba Branch of the latter Union (T/Pet.4/70 and Add.1). Such questions were later brought up in the General Assembly, in December, when the Assembly heard representatives of petitioners from the Cameroons under French administration.

a. CONSIDERATION BY THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

The Kamerun United National Congress, founded in August 1951, stated that its main objective was the early unification of the two Cameroons. As a necessary preliminary to unification, which it recognized could not be achieved immediately, the Congress sought:

(1) the removal of all existing obstacles to the free movement of persons and goods across the frontier and the creation of a customs union between the two Cameroons; (2) revision of the Trusteeship Agreements to provide safeguards to preserve the distinct political status of the Cameroons as a whole, especially as regards existing administrative arrangements between part of the Cameroons and Nigeria on the one hand and the French Union on the other;¹⁰⁸ (3) establishment of free liaison between the indigenous inhabitants of the two Cameroons, with freedom of speech, of the Press, of assembly, of petition and of movement; (4) creation of a separate House of Assembly for the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration and appointment of a High Commissioner directly responsible to the Trusteeship Council through the Governor of Nigeria; creation of a separate House of Representatives in the Cameroons under French administration independent of the French National Assembly; both Houses to have an African majority and most Ministries to be headed by Africans; (5) compulsory instruction in French and English in both Cameroons; and (6) indigenous representation at meetings of the Trusteeship Council.

¹⁰⁸For examination of these arrangements during 1952, see under Administrative Unions.

The petitioners considered that neither of the Administering Authorities had lived up to its obligation to promote the most rapid possible development of the Cameroons and expressed dissatisfaction with the conclusions of the first United Nations Visiting Mission to the Territories, which, they felt, had been reluctant to criticize the Administering Authorities and particularly to recognize the wishes of the people for unification. While acknowledging that fundamental human rights and freedoms were fully enjoyed in the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration, the Kamerun United National Congress stated that it was reliably informed that Africans in the French-administered Territory, especially those exhibiting nationalist tendencies, were denied these rights and freedoms. The Congress requested the Trusteeship Council's assistance to obtain a "safe conduct" to enable 30 of its members to attend a conference in the Cameroons under French administration.

In their observations on these petitions, both France (T/1009 and T/C.2/SR.39) and the United Kingdom (T/1018 and T/C.2/SR.39) maintained that few of the indigenous inhabitants of either Territory showed enthusiasm for unification and added that the constitutional changes suggested by the Kamerun United National Congress would prejudice the future political development of the Territories after the termination of Trusteeship. As to the administrative integration of the Cameroons under its administration with Nigeria, the United Kingdom pointed out that the identity of the Trust Territory was preserved by the Trusteeship Agreement and the supervisory machinery provided by the Trusteeship Council; it also referred to the advantages derived by the Cameroons from this integration. Both Administering Authorities maintained that much progress had been made in the Cameroons under their respective administration. Neither considered the compulsory teaching of both English and French practicable since children would then be required to study three languages; English, it was reported, was taught as a subject in the secondary schools of the Cameroons under French administration and French was similarly taught in the other Trust Territory. Frontier regulations had already been liberalized, the Administering Authorities stated, and additional measures were under consideration to facilitate further petty and barter trade across the frontier by increasing the quantity of goods which could be transported without formalities and by liberalizing exchange controls. Movement of persons across the frontier, it was stated, was as free as possible; those entering the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration required a travel document while inhabitants of that Territory had to present an identity card to cross into the French-administered Territory.

The Union des populations du Cameroun (UPC) also called for the unification of the two Cameroons. It maintained that the existence of two official languages, different educational systems and legislation could only hinder the ultimate establishment of a single Cameroonian nation. Restrictions were still imposed on trade between the two Territories, the UPC maintained, despite earlier recommendations of the Trusteeship Council. It added, however, that the mere relaxation of frontier barriers would not satisfy public opinion, and alleged that human rights were not respected in the French-administered Cameroons and that many people were migrating to the British zone. The UPC stated that the people of the Cameroons unanimously demanded revision of the Trusteeship Agreements, unification of the Cameroons and the establishment of an autonomous government with a legislative and constituent assembly.

In reply, France, as the Administering Authority concerned, observed (T/1001, T/1016, T/C.2/SR.37 and 38) that no referendum had ever been taken in the Cameroons under French administration and that the UPC could not claim to represent the unanimous will of the people since it represented only an extremely small minority of the indigenous electorate. In the Administering Authority's opinion, the failure of the petitioners to propose a Cameroonian dialect as the single official language for both Cameroons constituted adequate proof that there was no real cultural link between the two Trust Territories. The Administering Authority described as fantastic the allegation that human rights were not respected in the French-administered Cameroons. It also denied that masses of Cameroonians were leaving the Trust Territory to settle in the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration, and stated that nearly all the Bamilékés who had emigrated some years ago had since returned to their country of origin.

On 22 July 1952 the Trusteeship Council, by 10 votes to 1, adopted a resolution (621 (XI)) on the petitions from the Kamerun United National Congress. By this resolution, the Council called the attention of the petitioners to various observations of the Administering Authorities and to the Council's conclusions and recommendations, adopted during its eleventh session, concerning the administrative arrangements between the Cameroons on the one hand and Nigeria and the French Union on the other,¹⁰⁹ and concerning the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the work of the Council.¹¹⁰ General conditions in the Cameroons, the Council informed the petitioners, were examined each year in connexion with the examination of annual reports on these Territories. As regards the unification of the two Trust Territories, the ultimate objective of the petitioners, the Council observed that the basic objective of the Trusteeship System was to promote the progressive development of the Trust Territories towards self-government or independence as might be appropriate to their particular circumstances and the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned. The Council expressed the hope that the measures being taken by the Administering Authorities would eliminate the frontier difficulties referred to by the petitioners. By resolutions 622(XI) and 623 (XI), adopted on the same date by 9 votes to 1 and 10 votes to 1, respectively, the Council called the attention of the UPC to its resolution on the petitions from the Kamerun United National Congress.

The question of the status in the Cameroons under British administration of immigrants from the French-administered Trust Territory was again considered in 1952 by the Trusteeship Council, for the third consecutive year. At its ninth session in 1951, after examining petitions from the French Cameroons Welfare Union (T/Pet.4/71 and Add.1) and Joseph Ngu, the President of the Kumba Branch of the Union (T/Pet.4/70), claiming that such immigrants were denied the right to vote and were otherwise discriminated against, the Trusteeship Council, by resolution 383 (IX), had asked the Administering Authority to supply further information on the situation and had decided that it would re-examine the petitions when this information was available.¹¹¹

Accordingly, in its annual report for 1951, the United Kingdom informed the Council that an estimated 400 to 500 persons from the French-administered Cameroons annually entered the Dikwa Division in the northern part of the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration, about 65 per cent of them settling permanently; there was little immigration into the Adamawa region, other than a seasonal influx of casual workers. Immigrants living in the southern portion of the Territory, the United Kingdom reported, numbered about 17,000, or 3.6 per cent of the population in that region. The Administering Authority again outlined the qualifications required for naturalization, which would automatically bring with it the right to vote.

At its eleventh session, the Trusteeship Council re-examined the above petitions, as well as further communications from the French Cameroons Welfare Union (T/Pet.4/71/Add.2-5 and T/Pet.4/72) and Mr. Ngu (T/Pet.4/70/Add.1). The Union expressed its disappointment at the resolution adopted by the Council at its ninth session, stating that it seemed to reflect either a cursory or inadequate appreciation of the arguments presented by the Union. Pointing out that the Union was fully conversant with the procedure for acquiring United Kingdom citizenship, the petitioners explained that they wished neither British nor French nationality but wanted the status of Cameroons nationality to be recognized and looked forward to the time when the two Cameroons would achieve self-government.

They contended, on the basis of a statement by the representative of the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration to a general conference held to discuss the future system of government for Nigeria, that the people of that portion of the Cameroons shared their view that the Trust Territory had a political status distinct from that of Nigeria and had misgivings that the existing political trend might lead to complete integration of the Trust Territory with Nigeria. The petitioners contended that the people of both Cameroons desired unification of the two Trust Territories and claimed that a referendum would show the importance of unification to the frontier tribes. The stand taken by the Union was supported by Mr. Ngu.

The representatives of the United Kingdom explained (T/G2/SR.38) that careful consideration was being given to the possibility of adjusting the electoral law to give immigrants from the Cameroons under French administration the right to vote, but it was very doubtful whether the legal obstacles could be overcome. However, qualified immigrants who wished to apply would have ample time to obtain naturalization before the next elections, to be held in 1956. It was reiterated, on behalf of the Administering Authority, that, except for their disqualification from voting, immigrants from the French-administered Cameroons enjoyed full freedom of movement and did not suffer from any discrimination with respect to appointments to the public service and the granting of scholarships.

On 22 July 1952, by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention, the Trusteeship Council adopted a resolution (615(XI)) informing the petitioners that a United Nations Visiting Mission would visit the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration during November 1952¹¹² and decided that for the present no recommendation on its part was necessary.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS SEVENTH SESSION

The General Assembly, at its seventh session, received five requests from organizations and parties in the Trust Territory of the Cameroons under French Administration that their representatives be permitted to make oral presentations before the Fourth Committee. The Committee decided to grant the requests as follows:

At its 252nd meeting on 22 October 1952, the Committee, by a roll-call vote of 37 to 10, with 5 abstentions, granted the request of the Union des populations du Cameroun (A/C.4/205).

At its 265th meeting on 6 November, the Committee acceded to three further requests: (1) that of the Assemblée traditionnelle du peuple Douala (A/C.4/214), by 40 votes to 5, with 8 abstentions; (2) that of the Groupelements Musulmans du Cameroun (A/C.4/216), by 40 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions; (3) that of the Parti socialiste camerounais (A/C.4/215), by 40 votes to 5, with 8 abstentions.

At its 279th meeting on 19 November, the Committee decided, without objection, to grant the request of the Bloc démocratique camerounais (A/C.4/219).

Subsequently, the Assemblée traditionnelle du peuple Douala and the Bloc démocratique camerounais intimated that they would be unable to send representatives to appear before the Committee.

At the 309th meeting on 17 December, the Committee, accordingly, heard the statements by Reuben Um Nyobe, representing the Union des populations du Cameroun, and by Charles René Okala, representing the Parti socialiste camerounais. At the 310th and 311th meetings of the Committee, on 17 and 18 December, these representatives replied to questions of the members of the Committee.

Mr. Um Nyobe sought:

(1) immediate unification of the two Trust Territories of Cameroons now under British and French administration, with the establishment of an executive council having a majority of Cameroon members and legislative assembly chosen by universal suffrage;

(2) amendment of the Trusteeship Agreements under which the two Territories are currently administered, leaving the people of the Cameroons free to determine their political future;

(3) the establishment of a time limit for the granting of independence.

Senator Okala sought:

(1) wider powers for the Territorial Assembly;

(2) establishment of an executive council;

(3) preservation of indigenous customs and definition of the powers of the chiefs;

(4) controlled and selective immigration;

(5) participation of indigenous inhabitants in the negotiation of commercial agreements;

(6) reduction and decentralization of the powers of the Department of Overseas France, following the institution of the above reforms;

(7) progress towards independence as a goal, with Trusteeship under France as a means.

The representative of France said that the Cameroons under French administration had made gigantic strides between 1945 and 1952, and although it was not pretended that all was perfect in the 425,000-square-kilometre Trust Territory with its three million inhabitants, he was confident that a great future awaited that country. In deciding its own destiny, the Territory would have the last word. Meanwhile, its future would be better assured as a part of the French Union than in a solitary state with an illusory independence.

At the 310th meeting on 17 December, Argentina, Canada, China, Denmark, El Salvador and Thailand introduced a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.265), a revised text (A/C.4/L.265/Rev.1) of which was submitted at the 312th meeting on 18 December. In terms of this draft, the General Assembly would: (1) take note of the statements of the representatives of organizations in the Cameroons under French administration; and (2) decide to transmit these statements, together with the observations made by members of the Fourth Committee, to the Trusteeship Council with a request that these questions should be investigated and reported upon in the next report of the Council to the Assembly. The sponsors incorporated oral drafting amendments proposed by the representatives of the Dominican Republic and Guatemala.

Presenting the six-Power draft, the representative of El Salvador said that the sponsors felt that their proposal would help in achieving a solution to the problem. He said that concrete decisions should be reached; that the Committee had little time left; and that the Visiting Mission to West Africa would deal extensively with the matters being considered by the Fourth Committee when the Mission reported to the following session of the Trusteeship Council. Although many members of the Committee desired immediate results, it would be worth while waiting for results which would be effective.

At the 312th meeting on 18 December, three amendments to the revised joint draft resolution were put forward.

The first, by Syria (A/C.4/L.267), contained a series of five drafting amendments, one of which was subsequently withdrawn by the sponsor, who told the Committee that the purpose of these amendments was to avoid the impression created by the six-Power draft that the Fourth Committee had been wasting its time in hearing the petitioners and also to draw attention to the fact that, on some of the matters raised by the petitioners, the United Nations had already made recommendations. The four Syrian drafting changes were adopted in separate votes, ranging from 25 votes to 3, with 16 abstentions, to 42 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The second amendment to the revised joint draft resolution, presented by Poland (A/C.4/L.268), would: (1) add a recommendation that the Administering Authority take measures to put an end to anti-democratic practices in the Trust Territory and take measures also to create organs of government on democratic principles in the Territory; and (2) request the Trusteeship Council to submit a special report on its investigation of the question, instead of including such a report in its next annual report.

The representative of Poland, supported by the representative of the USSR, stated that it was clear that France, as Administering Authority for the Trust Territory, was violating the obligations of the United Nations Charter as well as the Trusteeship Agreement and resolutions of the General Assembly. These representatives charged racial discrimination and the denial to the indigenous inhabitants of their elementary rights. The first part of the Polish amendment was rejected by the Committee in a roll-call vote of 23 to 5, with 17 abstentions. The second part was adopted by a roll-call vote of 25 to 15, with 5 abstentions.

The third amendment to the revised six-Power draft, sponsored jointly by Indonesia and Iraq (A/C.4/L.269), would add a stipulation that reference of the matter to the Council was without prejudice to future requests for oral hearings before the Fourth Committee. This amendment was adopted by the Committee by 25 votes to none, with 17 abstentions.

The resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by the Committee (A/2342) at its 312th meeting on 18 December, by 37 votes to none, with 6 abstentions and came before the General Assembly at its 410th plenary meeting on 21 December.

Although the Assembly decided to vote on the question without discussion, the representative of France, in explaining his vote, stated that his delegation was reserving the detailed information which it could furnish concerning the petitioners' allegations for submission to the Trusteeship Council, as that body alone was competent to deal with such problems. He added that the allegations of the petitioners did not justify a special report by the Trusteeship Council and maintained that the petitioners had come before the Fourth Committee to air their pre-election disputes and to prepare the ground for future elections.

The Assembly decided to vote separately on the word "special", referring to the manner in which the Trusteeship Council would be requested to report on its investigation of the question. Twenty-eight votes were cast in favour of its adoption, 17 against, and 15 abstentions. The President ruled that as a two-thirds majority, required under the rules of procedure, had not been obtained, the word was not adopted. The Assembly adopted the resolution as a whole, as thus amended, by 48 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions as resolution 655 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having granted oral hearings to representatives of organizations in the Cameroons under French administration,

"Considering that the Trusteeship Council has not yet examined the reports of the Administering Authorities on the Trust Territories of the Cameroons under British and French administration for 1952, and also has not yet received the reports of the Visiting Mission to Trust Territories in West Africa, 1952, and that these reports may give a fuller account of the matter,

"Considering that on several of the more important matters raised by the petitioners the Trusteeship Council, and in some cases the General Assembly, has previously made observations and recommendations in the light of the considered views of the Administering Authority,

"1. Takes note of the statements of the representatives of organizations in the Cameroons under French administration, which constitute a valuable contribution to an understanding of the problems in the Trust Territory;

"2. Decides, without prejudice to future requests for oral hearings before the Fourth Committee, to transmit these statements, together with the observations made by members of the Fourth Committee, to the Trusteeship Council with a request that these questions be further investigated, in particular as to the implementation of recommendations already made on them, and that the Council report upon them in a report to the General Assembly at its eighth session."

4. Togoland, Administered by the United Kingdom

This Territory has a total area of 13,040 square miles and an African population enumerated at 383,563 in 1948, when the most recent census was taken.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

Togoland continued to be administered as an integral part of the Gold Coast, sharing a common constitution, budget, and administrative and technical services.¹¹³ In its annual report for 1951,¹¹⁴ the Administering Authority assured the Trusteeship Council that Togoland's interests had continued to receive full recognition in policies and programmes developed by the Gold Coast Government and that the Trust Territory would continue to participate in all phases of Gold Coast progress. In performing its supervisory functions, the Council in the past expressed concern at the difficulty it faced, due to the lack of separate data on Togoland, in examining conditions in the Trust Territory. During its eleventh session, it noted that the Administering Authority had made still further efforts to provide in its 1951 report special data concerning the Trust Territory. At the same time, the Council expressed the hope that in future annual reports the separate statistical data on Togoland would be further elaborated and that data applying to the Trust Territory and the Gold Coast would be clearly identified in order to avoid any possibility of misunderstanding.

At its ninth session in 1951, the Council was informed of the introduction of the new Gold Coast Constitution, promulgated on 29 December 1950, and of the establishment, under this Constitution, of executive and legislative organs which formulate government policy and enact legislation for Togoland as if it were part of the Gold Coast. Ultimate executive and legislative powers, however, were reserved by the Administering Authority. The administrative organization of the Trust Territory remained fundamentally unchanged under the new Constitution. The Northern Section of Togoland, where the frontier cuts across both tribal and administrative boundaries, continued to be integrated with the Northern Territories Gold Coast Protectorate, being subdivided to form parts of three districts lying in both territories. The Southern Section of Togoland continued throughout 1951 to be administered as a separate district of the Gold Coast Colony.

As constituted in 1951, the Gold Coast Executive Council is composed of eight African Ministers chosen by the Governor of the Gold Coast from the members of the new Legislative Assembly with its approval, and three ex officio Ministers—the senior colonial service officers responsible for the portfolios of defence and external affairs (which includes political administration), finance and justice. The Administering Authority indicated that while the powers of the Executive Council were limited by law, the Governor was required to act in most matters on its advice, thus enabling the Council to exercise real control over government policy.

The Legislative Assembly consists of a Speaker and 84 members, 75 of whom are elected by varying forms of suffrage. The Constitution requires that three of the elective members represent the Southern Section of Togoland: two of them being elected as "rural members" by electoral colleges which are in turn elected by universal adult suffrage; and one being elected by the Southern Togoland Council, an interim advisory council based on the Native Authorities. Legislative representatives for the whole of the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast, including Northern Togoland, however, are chosen by a single electoral college consisting of the members of the Northern Territorial Council and one delegate per 10,000 of the population nominated by existing district councils, which, in turn, are based on tribal authorities. In the 1951 elections, in addition to the three Togolanders elected from the Southern Section, two of the members elected from the Northern Territories Protectorate were Togolanders by birth and a third normally lived in Northern Togoland. The Administering Authority reported that the Convention People's Party, whose declared objective was to bring the Gold Coast as soon as possible to the status of a dominion within the British Commonwealth of Nations, had won 34 of the 38 rural seats in the Assembly, including one of the two filled by the Southern Section of Togoland. The Party's leader, Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, became Leader of Government Business (a title changed to that of Prime Minister by constitutional amendment during 1952). Following the Party's electoral success, Dr. Nkrumah's advice was sought in the choice of members of the new Executive Council and he and five other members of the Party became Ministers in that Council.

Report by Her Majesty's, Government in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the General Assembly of the United Nations on the Administration of Togoland under United Kingdom Trusteeship for the Year 1951 (H.M.S.O., London, 1952, Colonial No. 284). For detailed discussions of this report in the Trusteeship Council, see Trusteeship Council. Official Records. Eleventh Session (3 June to 24 July 1952); summaries of the observations of individual Council members are included in the Council's report to the General Assembly (A/2150). For general discussion in the Assembly concerning conditions in Trust Territories, see pp. 726-29.

A petition relating to the new constitutional developments, from the Togoland Congress (T/Pet.6/314), was examined by the Trusteeship Council during its eleventh session. The Congress has in the past objected to the integration of Togoland under United Kingdom administration with the Gold Coast because it felt this would prejudice the unification and independence of the two Togoland Trust Territories.¹¹⁵ Pointing out in its petition that the United Kingdom Government had approved the title of Prime Minister for the Leader of the Gold Coast Government, the Congress stated that that Territory had virtually attained dominion status. It claimed that the Minister of Defence and External Affairs had made an official statement on the policy and intentions of the Gold Coast Government, in which he declared that the annexation or integration of British Togoland in the Gold Coast was against the national interest and expressed wishes of the Trust Territory's inhabitants.

Commenting on the petition, the special representative of the Administering Authority (T/C.2/SR.33) denied that the Gold Coast had virtually attained dominion status. As to the statement of the Minister of Defence and External Affairs, it did not necessarily represent the official view of the Administering Authority and in any event it had simply drawn the attention of Togoland to the benefits to be derived from the continued association of their Territory with the Gold Coast and had expressed the hope that they would eventually wish to unite with the new nation being formed there.

By resolution 629 (XI), adopted on 18 July 1952 by 10 votes to 1, the Trusteeship Council called the attention of the Togoland Congress to the observations of the Administering Authority and to the Council's recommendation concerning the administrative arrangements between the Trust Territory and the Gold Coast.¹¹⁶

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, important changes in both the regional organization and in the system of local government were set in motion during 1951. The Administering Authority stated that it had been decided to establish the proposed Trans-Volta/Togoland Region, combining Southern Togoland with the Ewe-inhabited areas of Anlo, Peki and Tongu confederacy lying in the eastern part of the Gold Coast Colony. Commenting on a recommendation made by the Trusteeship Council in 1951 to the effect that consideration be given to establishing a region consisting of Southern Togoland alone, the Administering Authority observed in its annual report that Southern Togoland was too small to form a region by itself. It added that the decision on the regional organization had been reached in order to satisfy the demands of the Ewes for closer association and especially to permit better supervision of the proposed new district and local councils (see below). The decision, it stated, had been made after consultation with the Southern Togoland Council and the Ewe Native Authorities in the Gold Coast districts concerned. A council of representatives elected by local and district councils was to be established for the Trans-Volta/Togoland Region. This council, with headquarters at Ho in the Trust Territory, would take over the advisory functions exercised by the Southern Togoland Council with respect to Southern Togoland. Another body, consisting mainly of representatives of traditional office-holders of either Southern Togoland alone or of the whole new region, depending on a decision still to be made, the Administering Authority reported, would be set up to take over the elective function of the Southern Togoland Council. The Trusteeship Council was subsequently informed, during its eleventh session, that a regional officer responsible directly to the Governor and the central Government in Accra, Gold Coast, had been posted to Ho on 1 June 1952 to set up the headquarters of the new region.

Northern Togoland, the Administering Authority reported, would remain part of the Northern Territories region, and the existing Northern Territories Council—which includes representatives of the districts in which the various parts of Northern Togoland lie—would be reconstituted to the extent only that its members would be elected in future by the new district councils to be established rather than by existing Native Authorities. In connexion with the unification problem, the Administering Authority stated in its 1951 report that the people of Northern Togoland were demanding more firmly than ever that their area should be completely integrated into the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast.

Describing local government reforms, the Administering Authority stated that an Ordinance passed in 1951 by the Gold Coast Legislative Assembly provided for the establishment of modern and democratic local bodies throughout the Gold Coast and the Trust Territory. Local councils, being set up for areas corresponding in general to existing Native Authority areas, were to comprise members directly elected by all adult residents and members representative of the traditional authorities; the councils would normally contain a two-thirds majority of the former members. They would take over all the powers of the existing Native Authorities, and might be given a wide range of additional powers extending over the fields of public order, agriculture, forestry, regulation of trade and industry, operation and regulation of markets, land conservation, building and town planning, education and public health. Each council would finance its operations from an obligatory local basic rate or tax, from other rates or fees, from government grants, and from loans. These local councils (and similar urban councils to be set up only in the Gold Coast for the time being) would elect members to district councils having authority over wider areas. The district councils would have the same ratio of traditional to representative members, and would derive revenues by precept on the local councils, from government grants and by loan. The traditional "State Councils" (assemblies of chiefs, elders and others) would be entirely separated from the new local authorities and, under further legislation, would be empowered to discharge ceremonial and customary functions. In general, the Administering Authority stated, a notable feature of the reforms was the almost complete elimination of differences between the systems proposed originally for the northern and southern areas.

In order to train local government officials, a special school, offering twelve-week courses to 26 students, including two Togolanders, was opened in the Gold Coast. The Administering Authority stated that ten of the best students in each year would be offered scholarships in the United Kingdom on attachment to local authorities.

The Trusteeship Council was later informed, during its eleventh session, that the Administering Authority had undertaken consultations with the peoples concerned before establishing the new councils. In Northern Togoland the process had been completed by 1 July 1952 and this area would participate in four district councils, three of which extend into the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast, and in seventeen local councils, nearly all lying entirely within the Trust Territory. In Southern Togoland, the special representative of the Administering Authority stated, the discussions with the peoples concerned led to delay in finalizing the proposals and also to an increase in the expected number of local councils. There were to be fifteen of these, nine of which were expected to be in operation by August 1952 and the remainder before the end of the year. Two district councils would be established for the southern area.

In a petition (T/Pet.6/315) examined during the Trusteeship Council's eleventh session, the Head Chief of the Nawuris complained that the Administering Authority was using every means to absorb the Kpandai area into the Northern Territories Protectorate. He stated that over one thousand persons had been legally barred from taking part in the local council elections in the area and that over 5,000 indigenous inhabitants demanded immediate redress. It was explained by the special representative of the Administering Authority (T/C.2/SR.33) that the Nanjuro and Nawuri tribesmen had failed to register for the elections to the Kpandai local council until after the prescribed time limit, but that it had been decided to hold new elections in the two electoral wards predominantly inhabited by the two tribes. The petitioner, the Administering Authority added, represented at most some 500 Nawuris.

By resolution 630(XI), adopted on 18 July 1952 by 10 votes to 1, the Trusteeship Council noted the Administering Authority's decision with satisfaction and expressed the hope that the indigenous inhabitants concerned would cooperate with the Administering Authority by participating in the new election.

The Togoland Congress demanded (T/Pet.6/314) that immediate action be taken to implement the General Assembly's decision of January 1952 relating to the Ewe and Togoland unification problem.¹¹⁷ The chairman of the Congress stated (T/Pet.6/316) that the Congress and statutory bodies in Southern Togoland had submitted a resolution suspending registration for local government elections in the Trust Territory until such time as the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs referred to in the Assembly's resolution had been established. Tension was rising in the Trust Territory, the Congress stated (T/Pet.6/314), and its chairman observed (T/Pet.6/316) that the people were mobilized for any emergency.

In reply, the special representative of the Administering Authority pointed out (T/C.2/SR.33) that elections to the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs were to be held on 1 or 2 July 1952 and that no further elections of local councils were to be held until the middle of August, by which time the Joint Togoland Council would probably have held its first meeting. He added that no significant tension existed among the indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territory.

By resolution 631 (XI), adopted by 10 votes to 1 on 18 July 1952, the Trusteeship Council noted that the request of the chairman of the Togoland Congress had been largely met, and concluded that no recommendation on its part was therefore necessary. It also informed the Congress, in resolution 629(XI) referred to above, that a United Nations Visiting Mission would go to the Trust Territory in September 1952 to investigate conditions.

In its report to the General Assembly, the Trusteeship Council recalled the interest which it had previously expressed in the political reforms being undertaken in the Gold Coast and Togoland and commended the Administering Authority on the further progress made in bringing these reforms into effect. The Council noted with particular interest the satisfactory operation of the new executive and legislative organs, the reorganization of the regional administrative structure and the reform of the whole local government system. It attached particular importance to the formation of the new Trans-Volta/Southern Togoland administrative region and commended the Administering Authority on the steps being taken to establish a regional council for the area and on the posting of a regional officer to the headquarters at Ho, within the Trust Territory. Having in the past stressed the importance of developing effective local government organs as a means of promoting self-government, the Council commended the Administering Authority for initiating the establishment throughout the Trust Territory of the new, local government bodies based on universal adult suffrage and having wider powers than the Native Authorities which they replaced. The consultations with the peoples concerned in this respect and the establishment of facilities for training local government staff also met with the approval of the Council. It welcomed the extension of suffrage in the Northern Section of Togoland as a corollary to the establishment of the new councils. Finally, the Council expressed the hope that the process of establishing the new organs would be completed without undue delay and that both their powers and bases of representation would be progressively extended.

Reporting on developments in the joint civil service for the Gold Coast and Togoland, the Administering Authority stated that a Public Service Commission composed of three members, one an African, had been established to advise the Governor in controlling the service. Changes in the organizational and salary structures were made and the principles governing appointments were reaffirmed during 1951. In effect, these principles were designed to give preference to Africans of the Gold Coast (including Togoland), subject to qualifications, suitability and the public interest, and without implying the retrenchment of expatriates (for example, Europeans) in favour of local candidates. The Commissioner of Africanization, an African appointed in 1950, had the task of ensuring that the maximum number of qualified Africans became available for appointment to the higher grades. According to the Administering Authority's annual report, 470 Africans held senior posts at the end of 1951, nine of them citizens of Togoland. The Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council that in general there was a serious shortage of trained and qualified Africans suitable for immediate appointment to more responsible posts, but educational programmes had been reviewed with a view to increasing the number as rapidly as possible and it was also expected that the proportion of Togolandians in higher posts would increase considerably with the improvement of educational facilities. Apart from those being trained within the civil service departments, 263 Togolandians were receiving training for higher posts; 206 of these were students training to become teachers.

Noting the further development of the civil service with satisfaction, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to extend the training facilities and other measures for enabling Togolandians to become qualified for increasingly higher posts in the Administration.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The Trust Territory's economy is predominantly agricultural, there being no major industries and few small-scale industries. In the Northern Section, the inhabitants are engaged principally in growing foodstuffs and in stock raising. The production of cash crops for export is centred in the Southern Section of the Territory. Cocoa, the only important export crop, is produced by indigenous farmers and marketed by the statutory Gold Coast Cocoa Marketing Board. Similarly, the other cash crops—palm kernels and oil, copra, coffee and shea nuts—also produced by indigenous farmers, are marketed by the Gold Coast Agricultural Produce Marketing Board. The Southern Section of Togoland has a member on each of these Boards.

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, the Cocoa Board, the more important of the two, was reorganized in 1951 to give the cocoa producers more direct representation and to bring its policy and operations more closely under government control. The Board buys all Gold Coast and Togoland cocoa at a guaranteed price fixed in advance of crop seasons. In addition to accumulating reserves for its operations, for stabilizing the prices to be paid to producers, and for other purposes, the Board has made substantial net profits. For example, in the 1950-51 season, although the price paid to the farmer reached a record high of about £130 per ton, the average selling price was £270 per ton f.o.b.; and after allowing for costs and for export duties, which were greatly increased (over £13 million as compared to £3.5 million in the preceding year) in order to establish a special development fund, the Board's operations showed a surplus of over £20 million.

The stabilization reserve was originally set at £30 million but its target was progressively increased to £60 million; at the end of 1951 it stood at £51 million. Another reserve fund, for the rehabilitation of the industry, stood at £17.5 million, and the general trading reserve at £9 million; and insurance against riot and civil commotion had been increased by 50 per cent to £1.5 million. Togoland's contribution to the total production, normally amounting to somewhat less than 10 per cent, consisted in 1950-51 of the record quantity of 23,421 tons. The Board purchased this cocoa through commissioned buying agents at an estimated cost of £4.5 million, of which slightly more than £3 million went to the producers, and sold it for £6.3 million.

The Board's surplus on operations over and above its allocations to reserves are required by law to be devoted to any purposes likely to benefit cocoa producers, subject to government approval. Sums made available for such purposes included, during 1950 and 1951, a total of £375,000 for local development projects in the cocoa areas; of £40,000 actually paid out, Togoland's share was £18,000, which was made available to the Southern Togoland Rural Development Committee for the provision of services such as roads, wells and dispensaries for the benefit of cocoa farmers.

In a petition (T/Per.6/305) before the Trusteeship Council at its eleventh session, the Togoland National Farmers' Union announced that the Togoland farmers had decided to establish a separate Togoland Produce Marketing Board and to make their cocoa produce available for purchase by all nationals of the United Nations. In its observations on previously examined petitions expressing dissatisfaction with the existing marketing arrangements for Togoland cocoa, the Administering Authority maintained that Togoland was adequately represented on the Gold Coast Board and that this Board served the interests of Togoland farmers better than a small independent board for Togoland which would handle comparatively insignificant quantities of cocoa and could not meet with the same acceptance on the world market.¹¹⁸ Since it had made recommendations on the subject at earlier sessions, the Council took no action on the petition during its eleventh session.

In its report to the Assembly, however, the Council noted the substantial price stabilization reserves set aside by the Gold Coast Cocoa Marketing Board from the sale of Gold Coast and Togoland cocoa on the world markets and the additional funds reserved for development in the cocoa areas; the Council also recognized that in the future a smaller proportion of the difference between the world prices and those paid the farmers would accrue to the Board as a result of the new export duty imposed on cocoa to finance general development plans. The Council recommended that the Administering Authority, bearing in mind these considerations as well as the desirability of avoiding undue inflationary pressures, invite the Board to review the prices it paid to the producers in order to ensure that these prices were adequate in relation to world market prices and to prices paid cocoa producers in neighbouring territories.

According to estimates supplied by the Administering Authority, revenue accruing in the ¹¹⁸ See Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 735-36, 762.

Trust Territory during 1950-51 again exceeded expenditure, for the second year in succession, revenue amounting to £1,039,886 and expenditure to £1,036,804. The bulk of the revenue was derived from import duty (estimated at over £430,000, or 41.5 per cent, in 1950-51), and export duty (estimated at over £408,000, or 39 per cent, as compared to £70,000 in 1948-49). The above figures, it was stated, did not reflect the additional and much heavier tax imposed on cocoa in order to set up a special development fund. In addition to the combined Gold Coast and Togoland budget, the Native Authorities maintain their own treasuries. The six in the Southern Section of Togoland had a total revenue of some £79,359 in 1950-51, of which government grants provided 37 per cent and taxes, court and other fees and tolls yielded 54 per cent.

An over-all Development Plan for the Gold Coast and Togoland was revised and approved by the Legislative Assembly in 1951, the Administering Authority reported; it provided for an expenditure of £75 million as against £62 million in the original draft and its completion was no longer restricted to a fixed period of ten years. It was estimated that capital would be allocated approximately as follows: £13 million for economic and productive services; £26 million for communications; £24 million for social services; and £11 million for common services and general administration. The Administering Authority stated that it was not possible accurately to estimate the expenditure to be made in Togoland but it provided an extensive list of projects in that Territory. Water supplies, it reported, would continue to be developed as rapidly as possible in both Sections of the Trust Territory. Owing to the greater concentration of population in the Southern Section, the larger schemes and more obvious progress would inevitably be in that area, the Administering Authority explained. Nevertheless, the programme of village wells, ponds and other water supply facilities in the north would be pursued vigorously with ample funds provided for minor rural supplies in the Development Plan. A broad extension of the road system was also planned in the development programme. In 1951, according to the annual report, there were 302 miles of road maintained by the Administration, 292 miles of all-weather road maintained by the Native Authorities at the Administration's expense and 120 miles maintained by the Native Authorities at their own expense. The first objective of the road development programme was a main all-weather trunk road from Accra (Gold Coast) to Papase, the Administering Authority reported, and it would be possible to plan the extension of that road to the Northern Section of Togoland when a decision had been taken on the Volta River project and its implications were fully known.

Distinct from the general Development Plan, this project envisaged the damming of the Volta River to provide hydro-electric power for an aluminium plant and included concomitant plans for irrigation, wider distribution of electricity, and a new seaport in the Gold Coast as well as improved communications. The final report of the Government's consultants was issued in 1951. The Administering Authority stated that the success of the project, on which it submitted a detailed report, would greatly benefit the inhabitants of both the Gold Coast and the Trust Territory. Whether or not the project materialized, the Administering Authority added, estimated future traffic was sufficient to justify the construction of a harbour east of Accra and it had been decided to proceed with this construction.

Noting the inauguration of the Development Plan and the advanced stage reached in the planning of the Volta River project, the Trusteeship Council expressed its appreciation of the Administering Authority's action in submitting details on both projects and indicated that it awaited with interest further reports on the progress of their implementation. The Council expressed approval that the acceleration of the rural water programme was regarded in the Development Plan as a matter of the highest priority. It also noted the progress made in connexion with improving and extending the road system and urged upon the Administering Authority the desirability of constructing an all-weather road linking the Northern and Southern Sections of Togoland and of further improving access to the cocoa-growing areas in particular.

The Administering Authority continued to foster development on a local basis, it stated, through four local development committees designed to encourage community improvement through local initiative. During 1951 these committees, which function in both the Northern and Southern Sections, disposed of more than £10,000 in aid to village projects; this was the amount granted them under the Development Plan in each of the previous financial years. The Administering Authority reported that it would continue to pursue the aims of increased and more diversified agricultural production, as had been recommended by the Trusteeship Council. In the north, it stated, the main objective was the production of a reliable cash crop, groundnuts being thought to offer the best prospects. The output was described as already considerable, but not sufficient for overseas export. The Administering Authority considered, however, that a prerequisite was the assurance of food supplies and stated that the Government had concentrated its activities on the improvement of soil conservation and general agricultural methods.

The Administering Authority has found the northern farmers a conservative people, reluctant to adopt new methods and new crops. Nevertheless, it reported a continued extension in 1951 in the growing of maize, cassava, rice and vegetable crops and, in the Kusasi district, an increase in the number of Togoland members of the Agricultural Development Committee by 73 to a total of 157. The Administering Authority attached importance to the work of this Committee, which makes loans to farmers to enable each to buy a plough and two bullocks and demonstrates mixed farming methods, fertilizing, contour ploughing and produce handling; it also buys its members' groundnut crops, using the profits to pay off the farmers' loans. Two of the northern Native Authorities also had similar loan schemes for the purchase of equipment. The Administering Authority considered that the principal limitation to a widespread extension of mixed farming in the north was now the capital investment needed to buy bullocks and ploughs.

In Southern Togoland the improvement of agricultural methods was also considered to be the fundamental problem, but the importance of the cocoa crop required that particular attention be paid to cocoa farming. Four of the seven senior agricultural officers stationed in or near Southern Togoland in 1951, the Administering Authority reported, were survey officers chiefly concerned with the suppression of the swollen shoot disease which had ravaged wide areas of the Gold Coast. The disease is controlled by cutting out affected trees; this was previously done on a compulsory basis and met with a certain amount of resistance, but was made voluntary in 1951 and, under a "New Deal" for cocoa launched later in the year, the compensation rates were doubled (from 2s. to 4s. per tree) and grants for replanting increased from 6d. to 6s. per tree. The Administering Authority reported that at the end of the year five outbreaks remained untreated, and that an intensive propaganda campaign was being launched in 1952.

Noting the reorganization of the campaign to eliminate the swollen shoot disease from the cocoa-growing areas, and that outbreaks within Togoland itself had been on a relatively small scale, the Trusteeship Council emphasized the importance to the economy of the Trust Territory and its inhabitants of preventing the spread of infection and urged the Administering Authority to take all practical measures to ensure the co-operation of the cocoa producers in this task.

The Council expressed its satisfaction that the general economic situation of Togoland continued to be buoyant. Nevertheless, it drew attention to the fact that the territorial economy remained dependent largely upon the single commodity of cocoa. Emphasizing the importance both of diversifying primary production and of improving agricultural methods, the Council welcomed the Administering Authority's assurance that these questions were being given careful attention.

The Trusteeship Council, which has in the past encouraged the Administering Authority to promote the development of co-operative societies, was informed during its eleventh session that, by 1951, the number of co-operatives had increased to 26, from ten in 1947. Most of these were primary co-operatives for the marketing of cocoa, with a total membership of 3,866. A consumer co-operative had been established within the Territory at Jasikan, and an assistant co-operative officer and three inspectors of co-operative societies, all of whom had received special training, had been stationed in the Territory. Recalling its previous interest in the progress of the co-operative movement and noting the further progress achieved in the period under review, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to encourage this development.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority reported that the standard of living in the Southern Section continued to rise in 1951, due to continued increases in prices paid for cocoa and other agricultural products. In the Northern Section, the Administering Authority indicated, interest in cash crops was growing and mixed farmers were emerging as a prosperous class. Regular wage-earners formed a small minority of the population. Apart from labour seasonally employed on the cocoa farms, roughly estimated at 20,000 to 25,000, the Administration and the Native Authorities were the main employers of labour. Government wages, which were said to determine to a large extent the level of wages throughout the Territory, ranged in 1951, as in 1950, from £3 18s. per month for labourers to £11 17s. 1d. per month for the highest-paid carpenters; in addition, a 20 per cent temporary cost-of-living allowance was maintained during the year. The Administering Authority stated that the Legislative Assembly of the Gold Coast was to consider early in 1952 the adoption of new consolidated wage rates. In the case of labourers, these would amount to an increase of nearly 45 per cent in the Northern Section, and nearly 17 per cent in the Southern Section, of the basic wages plus the temporary allowance, thereby equalizing the wages paid in the two Sections. Similar increases were under consideration for semi-skilled workers and artisans. The Trusteeship Council was subsequently informed, during its eleventh session, that the increases had been approved and were being put into effect as rapidly as possible.

The seasonal workers on the cocoa farms, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, were usually employed: (1) under a caretaker system, receiving one third of the produce; (2) under a commission system, receiving a commission on each headload; or (3) at an annual contract rate ranging in 1951, as in 1950, from £12 to £20. In addition, they received board, lodging, tools and work clothes.

The Trusteeship Council recommended that the Administering Authority make a thorough study of seasonal labour movements, particularly in the cocoa industry, and of the conditions of seasonally employed labour.

Commenting on the status of women in the Territory, the Administering Authority stated that their status was in no way inferior to that of men. They had equality under the new electoral laws, it pointed out, and were being trained for various branches of the civil service; there were also women members of several Native Authorities. Noting with approval that women had equality with men under the new electoral laws, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would continue to encourage women to take a greater part in the Territory's civil and political life.

Reporting on corporal punishment, the complete abolition of which has been recommended by both the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly, the Administering Authority indicated that until 1951 the laws of the Territory permitted the award of such punishment to adults for rape, robbery with violence and similar offences, to boys under sixteen in all serious crimes and to prisoners for two types of offences. In the case of adults, no such sentence had been imposed by the courts for several years and the award of corporal punishment to juveniles had declined from fifteen cases in 1949 to six in 1950 and three in 1951. The Administering Authority stated that a legislative proposal by the Gold Coast Government to abolish corporal punishment as a court sentence for adults had been modified by the Legislative Assembly, which had decided to retain the punishment for housebreaking with weapons, as it felt that public opinion would not support abolition for this offence. The Administering Authority considered that, in view of the degree of constitutional development in the Gold Coast and Togoland, the desired end should be achieved only through persuasion and the utmost would be done by educative means to bring public opinion to accept total abolition. With regard to juveniles, the Administering Authority stated that cases involving corporal punishment should be reduced even further when probation services could be extended to the Trust Territory.

According to the annual report, a compulsory register is kept of all births and deaths occurring at the town of Ho. The Administering Authority stated, however, that although three Native Authorities in Southern Togoland had made rules for the compulsory registration of African births and deaths in 62 towns and villages, the rules had not been generally observed and it was decided to restrict their application to eleven of the larger centres. Once effective registration had been achieved, the Administering Authority added, it could be expected that the new local government authorities would wish to extend registration gradually to all areas in the Territory.

Noting the difficulties encountered in connexion with registration, the Trusteeship Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would take further steps to ensure that the registration of vital statistics was made applicable to the whole Territory.

As in the past, the medical services available in Togoland were provided by the Gold Coast Medical Department, the Native Authorities and to a lesser extent the missions. Government expenditure for public health increased from £47,330 in 1949-50 to £50,266, or 4.85 per cent of the estimated total expenditure, in 1950-51. The Southern Section of Togoland, the Administering Authority reported, was served by the central hospital at Accra in the Gold Coast, by district hospitals within the Trust Territory at Ho and Hohoe and by a mission hospital at Worawora. The Northern Section was served by a hospital at Yendi and two just outside the Territory at Bakwu and Salaga. Treatment was also provided by 21 dispensaries, two of them just outside the Territory; most of these were operated by Native Authorities. In addition, there were eight ante-natal and child welfare clinics in the Territory as well as a Native Authority maternity clinic and a mobile maternity and child welfare clinic, both in the south. The Territory also had one leper settlement and one leper clinic. During 1951 a health centre at Kpandu was completed, for use initially as a dispensary and maternity clinic. The total number of all medical personnel increased from 78 in 1950 to 89 in 1951, the government staff including three doctors, four midwives and 23 registered nurses. The number of doctors serving in the Territory was increased during 1951 to five, with the addition of two non-official registered physicians. The Administering Authority pointed to the increase in the number of doctors, the opening of an additional hospital at Worawora, the completion of the new Hohoe Hospital and the construction of the Kpandu health centre as the beginning of a marked improvement in health services. It added that the completion of further plans would raise the number of hospital beds from just over 100 in 1951 to about 180. As a result of recommendations made in connexion with an investigation into kwashiorkor undertaken in the Gold Coast in 1950 by experts of the World Health Organization and the Food and Agriculture Organization, the Administering Authority reported, skim milk was being used on a wider scale in hospitals generally, particularly when treating kwashiorkor, and its increased consumption in the home was being advocated.

While considering the progress achieved in the field of medical and health services satisfactory, the Trusteeship Council expressed the opinion that much remained to be done. It recommended in particular that the Administering Authority continue its efforts to recruit additional doctors, to expand facilities for training medical personnel, to provide adequate maternity and infant care, and to undertake more intensive measures to eliminate yaws, one of the principal diseases treated.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The educational system of Togoland is integrated with that of the Gold Coast. The Administering Authority reported that, effective January 1952, an Accelerated Development Plan for Education would supersede the Ten-Year Plan put into operation a few years before.

According to the annual report, primary education was available within the Trust Territory during 1951 at 287 infant-junior primary (5 to 11 years) schools, with an enrolment of 22,889 pupils, and at 51 senior primary (12 to 15 years) schools, with an enrolment of 5,986. These figures showed an increase of eighteen infant-junior schools as compared with 1950. Eleven of the schools, with 509 pupils at the infant-junior level and 68 at the senior level, were in the Northern Section. The rest of the schools in the Territory were in Southern Togoland.

There were no government schools in the Territory, those in the north being managed by Native Authorities and most of those in the south by missions. The government exercised control through the Education Department, however, and through the granting of financial assistance under prescribed conditions. Under the Accelerated Development Plan, no new primary school might be opened by a religious body or by persons with assistance from public funds without the prior approval of the appropriate local government authority, which would in time, according to the Administering Authority, take over the main responsibility for primary and middle education. The Plan provided that, as from January 1952, no fees were to be charged in any primary schools, but parents were to continue to pay for books, stationery and uniforms. The existing school structure would also be changed under the Plan. A basic primary course (the present infant-junior school) for all children at public expense would be followed either by a "middle school" course which would replace the senior primary course, or by direct promotion to a secondary school. Due to the shortage of teachers needed to improve the quality of the primary course, however, the Administering Authority did not expect that it would be possible to accelerate to any large degree the programme envisaged in the former Ten-Year Plan. Moreover, the Territory could not for some time to come support enough middle schools to accommodate all the expected 75 per cent of pupils who would be most suited to that course, which was less academic and of a more practical nature than the secondary school course. Steps were being taken to recruit untrained teachers, the Administering Authority stated, to tide the schools over until trained personnel became available, and it had been decided to raise the salary of uncertificated pupil-teachers, effective 1 January 1952, from £42 to £60 per year in order to attract the best possible personnel.

In addition to the primary schools, Togoland had three other schools, all managed by missions: a secondary school, at Ho, which had 198 pupils in 1951—its second year of operation—72 of them of Togoland origin; and two teacher-training colleges, one of which had 73 trainees from Togoland and the other 29 in 1951, as compared with 110 and 52, respectively, in 1950. The Administering Authority also reported that 166 Togoland pupils were enrolled at assisted secondary schools in the Gold Coast in 1951, as compared with 146 the year before, and a further 104 (100 in 1950) students from Togoland were enrolled at teacher-training colleges and 37 at technical education institutions in the Gold Coast. The Administering Authority stated that it intended to proceed as soon as possible with its plans for the construction of the teacher-training college in Pusiga, in the northern part of Togoland, and reported that another secondary school was planned for Kpandu, in Southern Togoland.

The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in its observations on educational conditions in the Trust Territory (T/1012) concluded that, bearing in mind the increased enrolment of Togoland students in secondary schools both in the Trust Territory and in the Gold Coast, together with the measures contemplated under the Accelerated Development Plan, the expansion of secondary education might be regarded as fairly rapid.

Although there were no institutions of higher learning in Togoland, qualified Togoland students were eligible, on exactly the same terms as those from the Gold Coast, according to the Administering Authority, for scholarships in the university colleges of West Africa and in the United Kingdom. In 1951, 25 Togoland students were attending university courses on scholarships, eighteen of them being among the 340 undergraduate student body at the University College of the Gold Coast. In addition, three students from Togoland were studying at colleges in the United States with ex gratia awards from the Administration.

The Trusteeship Council noted with approval that the decision that primary education should be free had been put into effect in January 1952 and expressed the hope that free primary education would be made universal in the shortest possible time. Nevertheless, the Council observed, much remained to be done in providing adequate educational facilities. In this connexion, it welcomed the adoption of the Accelerated Development Plan. Expressing particular concern at the continuing disparity between facilities in the Southern Section and the Northern Section, where only 1.5 per cent of school age children attended school in 1951, the Council again urged the Administering Authority to take steps to ensure that the local authorities which were responsible for education in the north adequately carried out this responsibility. In view of the predominantly agricultural nature of the economy, the Council also recommended that the Administering Authority consider the desirability of emphasizing the importance of agricultural education in the school curricula.

The Council endorsed UNESCO's opinion that the expansion of secondary education during the period under review might be regarded as fairly rapid.

The Administering Authority reported on the developments in mass education during 1951. Under an experimental scheme, initiated in the Southern Section of Togoland in 1948, a series of short courses was organized by mobile teams in outlying rural areas, based on mass literacy campaigns in the vernacular, first aid and hygiene, discussion group work, music, civics and other subjects. Several assistant mass education officers were trained and sent to the Territory to follow up the teams and visit the literacy class centres, some 120 of which were meeting at the close of 1951, each with an average membership of 40, mostly women.

In August of that year, the Administering Authority reported, a plan for mass education to cover both the Gold Coast and all of Togoland was presented to the Gold Coast Legislative Assembly and immediately incorporated as part of the general Development Plan. The basic concept of the campaign was that the attainment of literacy makes people aware of the need for social and economic improvements, and should have an intensely stimulating effect on village development and rural standards of living. Because of the political and constitutional position of the Gold Coast and Togoland, it was also recognized a literate electorate was of increasing importance.

For the Trust Territory, the plan—described as "a national adventure in social service"—would involve a staff of 80 and a rural training centre. The general procedure is for a three months' concentrated effort in one area after another, which should end in elementary literacy, and after that a follow-up period, village development, a secondary effort and then a repetition of the whole process the following year. During the secondary stages, in which concentration was to be on village improvement by self help, it was intended that the local development committees, the local government authority and the rural training centre were all to play their parts.

In the northern part of the Territory, mass education had not started in 1951 but the preliminary steps had been taken. During 1951, the Administering Authority stated, efforts were concentrated on carrying into practice proposals, made by a conference held in Tamale in 1950, for adapting mass education to the needs of the Northern Territories.

Evening classes for adult literates continued to be held in the Northern Section of the Territory in 1951. The Department of Extra-Mural Studies of the Gold Coast University College also continued and expanded its adult education work in the Territory. The use of mobile cinemas for public information work was continued, and the first radio rediffusion station in Togoland was opened at Ho, with 140 receivers; two other stations were planned for the immediate future.

The Trusteeship Council again expressed its particular interest in the adult education activities in the Trust Territory. Noting the expansion of the mass education programme and of the adult education programme of the Gold Coast University College, the Council urged the Administering Authority to continue to give every encouragement to extending activities of this kind.

5. Togoland, Administered by France

This Territory, with a total area of 55,000 square kilometres, had an indigenous population estimated at 1,013,204 in 1951, according to the Administering Authority's annual report.¹¹⁹ Europeans and "assimilated" persons numbered 1,465 and were mainly government officials, missionaries and trading company employees.

a. POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

Togoland continued during 1951 to form part of the French Union as an "Associated Territory". Accordingly, the Territory is granted the right of representation in each of the organs of the French Union, in which legislative powers and the right of political discussion are vested; it elects one representative to the French National Assembly, two to the Council of the Republic and one to the Assembly of the French Union.¹²⁰

Responsibility for local administration of the Territory is vested in the Commissaire de la République, who represents the President of the French Republic and is directly responsible to the Minister of Overseas France. He is assisted by the Conseil privé (Privy Council), which is composed of senior officials and appointed indigenous notables. The Administering Authority had informed the Trusteeship Council at its ninth session in 1951 that the replacement of the Conseil privé by a body organized on a more representative basis was being studied. Recalling this, the Council at its eleventh session urged the Administering Authority to expedite this reform and expressed the hope that the Conseil privé would gradually be transformed into an Executive Council having some organic connexion with the local Territorial Assembly.

The latter, formerly known as the Representative Assembly, was transformed by law of 6 February 1952 into the Territorial Assembly, the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council during its eleventh session. As before, the 30-member Assembly has powers of consultation and decision on specified questions, particularly territorial financial and administrative matters, but it may not initiate legislation. The Administering Authority had reported in 1950, following recommendations by the Trusteeship Council that the powers of the Assembly should be progressively extended, particularly in the field of legislation, that a draft law had been placed before the French Parliament to give the Assembly the power of decision on a number of questions on which only consultation was required. In its annual report for 1951, however, the Administering Authority stated that an even more liberal proposal was being studied.

Recalling its previous recommendations on the subject, the Trusteeship Council at its eleventh session expressed the hope that this more liberal draft law would be adopted in the near future and that it would provide for the grant of increased powers to the Territorial Assembly. The Council also requested that full information on the matter be provided in the next annual report.

The coming into being in 1951 of a new system of elective district councils, conseils de circonscription, was regarded by the Administering Authority as a most important step in the progress of Togoland towards autonomy. Created by an arrêté of 16 July 1951, the councils were designed to supplant the consultative conseils de notables, which were composed of administrative officers, chiefs and notables. The new councils, which are to meet normally twice a year at the summons of the Administration, must be consulted on nine categories of questions: the fixing, collection and use of the district tax; market-place fees; the fixing and collection of various other taxes and rates; the rate of the local tax (taxe vicinale); the planning and execution of public works; health and sanitation measures; the establishment of the draft budget for the district; the establishment of new schools, dispensaries and maternity centres; and the modification of sub-district and village boundaries. The councils may also be consulted on any question which the Administration deems useful, and may express their wishes on social, economic and general administrative questions. If a district council reaches an unfavourable opinion on a proposal of the Administration, it can be called upon to re-examine the matter; in the event of continued opposition, the Administration has the power of decision, subject to any powers of the Territorial Assembly in respect of the question at issue. There is one council for each administrative district and their membership varies from eight to 26 according to the size of the population.

Elections to the new councils were held in two stages in August and September 1951, the Administering Authority reported, and the councils held their first sessions in October. They showed a concern for the general well-being, the Administering Authority stated, and most of their proposals had been endorsed by the local Assembly (at that time the Representative Assembly) at its budget session at the end of the year. The Administering Authority added that legislation was in preparation which would vest the councils with much wider powers and introduce district budgets, thus enabling the councils to become real "regional representative assemblies" endowed with financial powers and entrusted with the management of local affairs.

Another development reported by the Administering Authority was the increase from two to five in the number of towns given the status of municipality (commune mixte) as of the end of 1951. Each of these towns, therefore, had a municipal commission elected by direct, universal suffrage and enjoyed real powers in budgetary and municipal administrative matters, the Administering Authority indicated.

The Trusteeship Council welcomed the development of district councils and the increase in the number of municipal councils. It also expressed satisfaction that important functions had been given the former councils by the arrêté of 16 July 1951 and expressed the hope that the draft law being prepared to confer still wider responsibilities on these councils would be enacted shortly so that opportunities for participation in local government by the indigenous inhabitants would be further expanded. The Administering Authority was asked to keep the Council fully informed on these matters.

The Administering Authority reported that elections to the French National Assembly and the Togoland Representative Assembly as well as to the new district and municipal councils were held during 1951. Although the traditional tribal institutions continued to play an important role in the Territory, especially in the north, the Administering Authority indicated that the elections were conducted largely on a political party basis. According to the annual report, there were three political parties in the Territory: the Comité de l'Unité togolaise, which favours the unification of the Ewe people or of the two Togolands¹²¹ and early self-government or independence as a means to that end; the Parti togolais du progrès and the Union des chefs et des populations du nord du Togo, both of which supported the maintenance of the French regime and the guidance of the Territory towards autonomy within the framework of the French Union. Pointing out that in all the elections, whatever the method of suffrage used, the Comité de l'Unité togolaise had won only a minority, even in the south and in the areas populated largely by Ewes, the Administering Authority adduced that this loss of popularity showed a considerable change in public opinion towards the unification problem.

Both for the elections to the French National Assembly and to the Representative Assembly, the two electoral colleges—one for French citizens and the other for indigenous inhabitants—were maintained. By a law of 23 May 1951, the categories of persons entitled to vote in the second college, the most numerous of whom were those able to read French or Arabic, were extended to include all heads of families and mothers of two children. In June, at the elections to the French National Assembly, to which Togoland elects one deputy through the combined first and second colleges, the electoral rolls stood at 32,496. Of these, the Administering Authority reported, 26,840 actually voted, and the election was won by the candidate of the Parti togolais du progrès. He received over 50 per cent of the votes cast in the south and over 70 per cent of those in the north, the candidate of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise, who had held office since 1946, receiving the balance. The latter organization, the Administering Authority reported, had demanded that the election should be nullified, but the National Assembly had validated the election of the new deputy.¹²²

In December 1951, the elections to the local Representative Assembly were held. The two electoral colleges voted separately. In the French citizens' college, according to the Administering Authority's annual report, all six seats involved were won by a single list of candidates pledged to "defend local interests". In the second college, ten of the twelve southern seats were won by the Parti togolais du progrès, one by the Comité de l'Unité togolaise, which had previously controlled the Assembly, and one by an independent. All twelve of the northern seats were won by the Union des chefs et des populations du nord. The annual report gave no details of the number of persons registered and voting, nor did it indicate the extent to which the various seats were contested. Shortly before the December elections, the Mouvement de la Jeunesse togolaise (Juvento) (T/Pet.7/292) and the Association des Nations Unies du Togo (T/Pet.7/293) petitioned for the postponement of the elections pending the complete revision of the electoral list and the adoption of a law being considered by the Council of the Republic to establish a single electoral body for Togoland. The Juvento also alleged that the Administration was interfering openly with the electoral machinery of the Territory. After the December elections the Juvento again petitioned (T/Pet.7/292/Add.1), requesting that the election results be declared void and stating that no resolution originating from the newly elected Assembly could be deemed binding on the peoples of Togoland.

In its observations (T/999 and 1015 and T/C.2/SR.34) on these petitions, the Administering Authority described the Juvento as a branch of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise with limited activities and the other petitioners as an un-influential organization with only about ten members. It maintained that the December elections had proceeded normally and pointed out that the new electoral law referred to was passed on 6 February 1952. This law, according to the Administering Authority, brought the Territory very close to universal suffrage. In addition to establishing a single electoral college, it further extended the electoral body to include all heads of households and contained provisions for the determination of electoral districts. Pursuant to this law, the Administering Authority indicated, another election was held on 30 March 1952 for members of the Territorial Assembly, as the Assembly was now called, on the basis of the single college system, the powers of the Assembly elected in December having expired on that date. The Trusteeship Council was further informed, during its eleventh session, that, since the revision of electoral lists was undertaken only after 1 December each year, the increase in electors provided by the law of 6 February 1952 had not yet been implemented. Nevertheless, the number of voters on the rolls under the earlier laws had risen by March to 50,915, of whom 82 per cent voted. According to the Administering Authority, the Comité de l'Unité togolaise won 10,650 of the votes actually cast, while the Parti togolais du progrès and the Union des chefs et des populations du nord registered 30,867 votes. Of the 30 members elected, 29 were Africans and one French.

In separate resolutions (634(XI) and 635 (XI)) on the above petitions, adopted on 22 July 1952 by 10 votes to 1 and 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention, respectively, the Trusteeship Council noted that the requests of the petitioners for the establishment of a single electoral college and the holding of new elections to the Territorial Assembly appeared to have been met.

The Council also examined three petitions (T/Pet.7/299-301)¹²³ protesting against the arrest during the March 1952 electoral campaign of Sam Klu, candidate of the Unite togolaise for the Territorial Assembly, and two of his electoral agents. The motive for the arrests was attributed by Augustino de Souza, the chairman of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise, to the desire to remove from the electoral race Mr. Klu, who had always been elected in the Palimé district by an overwhelming majority.

In its observations on these petitions, the Administering Authority reported (T/1015 and T/C.2/SR.34) that Mr. Klu, Mathias Apaloo and John Ball had been committed on 26 March on a charge of incitement to disorder, contempt of the authorities and spreading of false information; the case was pending before the court and the accused were being detained pending trial, the Administering Authority informed the Council. It added that the arrest of Mr. Klu in no way interrupted the electoral campaign of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise, whose two candidates, Dr. Martin Aku and Sam Klu, were elected.

By 8 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, the Trusteeship Council on 22 July 1952 adopted a resolution (639 (XI)) drawing the attention of the petitioners to the observations of the Administering Authority and requesting the latter to inform it of the results of the trial of the three persons accused.

¹²³ For names of petitioners, see Annex.

In its report to the General Assembly, the Trusteeship Council recalled its recommendations at several previous sessions with respect to the establishment of a single electoral college and universal suffrage. After commending the Administering Authority for introducing a single college system in all elections, including elections to the Territorial Assembly, and for the expansion of the electorate, the Council at its eleventh session urged the Administering Authority to intensify its efforts to enable all potential voters to qualify for registration and to encourage all registered voters to exercise their rights so that universal suffrage might become increasingly realized in practice.

Certain incidents which took place during 1951 were described in petitions examined by the Trusteeship Council during its eleventh session. A number of the petitions (T/Pet.7/264, 265 and Add.1, 266, 267 and Add.1, 268-284, 287) gave varying accounts of a disturbance between villagers and forces of order at Vogan, in the Anécho district, on 23 August 1951, in which seven persons were killed and others wounded. The principal petitioners were partisans of the Parti togolais du progrès and the Comité de l'Unité togolaise. The former accused the latter of instigating the disturbance, while the latter alleged that it arose from the insistence of the Administration in recognizing a chief not chosen according to custom. Similarly, differing versions were given (T/Pet.7/265 and Add.1 and T/Pet.7/269) of a previous incident in the village of Agbétiko, in the same district, on 10 August, when one man was killed in a disturbance, which also arose from a chieftainship dispute. Both disturbances had been called to the attention of the General Assembly during its examination of the Ewe and Togoland unification question at its sixth session.¹²⁴

The Vogan incident was further referred to in the Administering Authority's annual report as a serious one in which the police had been attacked by a band of rioters and forced to use their weapons. In subsequent detailed accounts (T/999 and T/C.2/SR.33) of the Vogan and Agbétiko disturbances and the events preceding them the Administering Authority stated that the incidents were provoked deliberately by the Comité de l'Unité togolaise. As a result of judicial inquiries, the Administering Authority added, 44 persons were being charged with crimes connected with the Vogan incident. With respect to the succession to the chieftaindom of Agbétiko, the Administering Authority stated that the dispute was settled with full respect for custom and law and the authority of the new chief was recognized by the great majority of the population.

Allegations that 62 or 65 inhabitants of the Mango district in northern Togoland were imprisoned in October 1951 after revolting against alleged abuses and exactions of the superior chief of the Tchokossis were made in two other petitions (T/Pet.6/312-7/290, and T/Pet.7/302) from the chairman of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise. In its observations on these petitions, the Administering Authority stated that 66 persons were arrested during the October incidents and arraigned before the judicial authorities in accordance with the law. It recalled, further, that the judicial authorities did not consider that there were any grounds for court action with respect to the matter of alleged extortions by the superior chief. In another petition (T/Pet.7/298 and Add.1), the chairman of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise protested against a decision of 15 March 1952 prohibiting any public or private meeting of the Comité in Mango. It was explained by the Administering Authority (T/1015 and T/C.2/SR.34) that this decision was based solely on a desire to ensure the maintenance of public order and security and was repealed early in April, as soon as the situation had improved.

Martin Aku, Sylvanus Olympio and S. G. Antor, all of whom had appeared before the Fourth Committee during the sixth session of the United Nations General Assembly on behalf of pro-unification groups in the two Togolands, cabled (T/Pet.7/294) protesting against the "intolerable restrictions" placed on all political demonstrations in the French-administered Trust Territory since the beginning of 1952. In a later cable (T/Pet.7/296), Mr. Antor stated that at Palimé on 16 March the French Government was "in arms" to prevent Togoland delegates to the United Nations General Assembly from reporting at a public rally on the Assembly's sixth session decision concerning the unification question¹²⁵ and that the population was thrown into panic and public order endangered. He demanded the immediate dispatch of a commission of investigation. In other petitions (T/Pet.7/295 and Add.1 and T/Pet.7/297), the chairman of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise asserted that the local administration was committing acts of provocation against the population. He alleged that during Mr. Olympio's lecture tour in the Atakpame district the police organized raids and seized the trade rifles, used by the villagers to fire welcoming shots during the reception in accordance with their customs and usage. Those who shouted "ablode" (freedom), he further alleged, were arrested and taken to police headquarters, where they were beaten.

Replying to these petitions, the Administering Authority pointed out (T/1015 and T/C.2/SR.34) that freedom of assembly in Togoland was subject to the same legislation as in France. It affirmed that the Administration had taken no general action to restrict public freedom since early 1952, but had merely enforced the law prohibiting meetings on the public highway and intervened in a number of particular cases when the projected demonstration was likely to disturb the peace. The police brutalities reported by the Chairman of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise, the Administering Authority stated, were figments of the imagination. As to the rifles, only those held by persons who had not complied with the regulations regarding the possession of these weapons had been confiscated pending compliance with the necessary formalities.

After examining the above petitions, the Trusteeship Council on 22 July 1952 adopted resolutions 632(XI), 633(XI), 640(XI), 638(XI), 636(XI) and 637(XI), each by a vote of 10 to 1. In these resolutions, the Council noted that it had been informed that the Administering Authority was taking steps to implement the General Assembly's resolution (555(VI)) relating to the Ewe and Togoland unification question and called the attention of all the petitioners to the fact that, pursuant to this resolution, a Visiting Mission would go to the Territory in September 1952 to investigate all aspects of the unification question. By resolution 632(XI), the Council requested the Administering Authority to inform it of the results of the trials of the 44 persons accused in connexion with the Vogan incident. With respect to the other petitions, the Council drew the attention of the petitioners to the relevant observations of the Administering Authority and decided that no recommendations by the Council were necessary in the circumstances.

In describing developments in the judicial system in the Territory, the Administering Authority pointed out in its annual report that the satisfactory results of the establishment of customary courts, composed exclusively of indigenous inhabitants, led to the organization in 1951 of four new courts of this kind and to a plan for establishing six others in 1952. This would bring the total to 25, thus covering almost all the districts and sub-districts of the Territory.

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, European employees of the Administration increased from 176 in 1950 to 188 in 1951, all except seven being in higher categories, while indigenous employees in higher categories increased from 185 to 223 and in lower categories decreased from 5,052 to 4,627. The Administering Authority stated that the integration of indigenous officials into the higher grades of the service, as earlier recommended by the Trusteeship Council, was on the way to realization. It cited a series of arrêtés issued or proposed during 1951 to this end, and listed 128 indigenous officials who at the end of the year were holding higher posts; these included three police commissioners, 34 midwives and nurses, 23 African doctors, sixteen overseers and bookkeepers, 23 teachers. It also listed 23 positions occupied by indigenous officials which had normally been occupied by Europeans, including chiefs of sections and offices, special agents and chiefs of sanitary sub-divisions.

Recalling its previous recommendation on the subject, the Trusteeship Council noted that some progress had been made towards increasing the number of indigenous personnel in the Administration and that all posts were open to indigenous inhabitants possessing the necessary diploma. At the same time, the Council noted that few indigenous inhabitants held senior posts in the Administration and it invited the Administering Authority to intensify the training of suitably qualified indigenous candidates for administrative and judicial posts and to study measures to encourage them to make a career of the public service. The inclusion of full information on the matter in the next annual report was sought by the Council.

b. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The Administering Authority's annual report indicated that the total volume of trade increased considerably. The most significant feature of the Territory's economy in 1951, it stated, was the favourable trade balance, the value of exports amounting to 2,698,840,000 francs¹²⁶ and imports to 2,331,240,000 francs, as compared to 1,528,141,500 and 1,624,020,366 francs, respectively, in 1950. The report stated that cocoa, coffee, cotton (ginned), copra, palm kernels and groundnuts, the staple products in the economy, accounted for 84 per cent of the total value of exports. The favourable balance of trade was noted with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council, which expressed the hope that this trend would be maintained.

The Administering Authority reported a further improvement in the food situation, stating that food production in the Territory as a whole was generally excellent, amounting to 665,516 tons in 1951 as against 642,698 tons in 1950. The annual report showed a considerable drop in the maize harvest, however, from 42,215 tons in 1950 to 38,740 tons in 1951; this was caused by severe outbreaks of blight, which were attributed in part to the gradual exhaustion of the soil. Successful efforts were made to mitigate the effects of these outbreaks, particularly by the introduction of alternative crops, the Administering Authority stated. The production of industrial crops showed a slight decrease—79,480 tons in 1951 as compared with 82,238 tons in 1950. A decline in the production of palm kernels (from 12,800 to 10,000 tons) and karite almonds (from 42,000 to 35,000 tons), which were chiefly responsible for the decrease, was due to less active trade, the Administering Authority indicated. On the other hand, copra production, as a result of the high prices obtained, rose from 4,950 to 7,000 tons, and coffee output increased to 3,500, almost three times the 1950 figure, as a result of a campaign against the scolytus beetle. There were also increases in the production of seed cotton (from 1,600 to 3,750 tons), seed kapok (from 275 to 1,000 tons) and groundnuts (from 10,570 to 12,000 tons, shelled).

In most areas, the indigenous inhabitants still practised extensive, and often shifting, cultivation, the annual report indicated, and the work of the agricultural services was designed to prepare a transition from ancestral methods to intensive farming and the rational utilization of livestock with a view to soil regeneration. The Administering Authority hoped that such a revolution would be achieved by means of propaganda and persuasion. Farm schools and pilot centres were working toward this transition. The work of improving and extending the farms of the Agricultural Service was either completed or continued in 1951, the Administering Authority reported. The farm at Glidji was specializing in research on soil erosion in the terres de barre; the Tové farm was working on the improvement of food crops, coffee trees and oil palms; the Sotouboua farm, in the densely populated Lama-Kara area, where the land was greatly impoverished by over-cultivation, was studying soil regeneration and anti-erosion measures, especially by using cattle; the Barkoissi pilot centre was designed to show the local indigenous farmers how to farm in a way which would conserve the soil; and the Atilakoutsé station was continuing its research into the best varieties of cinchona. The farm schools, the Administering Authority reported, had had to be completely reorganized and the students brought together at Tové; those at Glidji and Sotouboua had had to be closed because of the lack of enthusiasm for farming on the part of the young Togolandese. The work of these centres for specialized practical experimentation and instruction, assisted by the distribution of plants, seed, fertilizers and repeated experiments carried out on small plots of land made available to the farmers, was being supplemented by a plant protection campaign against diseases of the coconut palm, parasites of the palm tree, maize blight and the scolytus beetle, followed by the destruction of larvae, inspection of plantations, treatment, etc. Agricultural production was encouraged and maintained by means of the Local Agricultural Production Maintenance and Equipment Fund, financed by means of fees paid by the exporters, the annual report indicated. In addition, loans were granted to farmers by the Joint Fund of the provident societies; of sixteen loans, aggregating 7,685,000 francs, granted by this Fund during 1951, eight, totalling 2,985,000, were agricultural loans.

The quality of livestock raised a much greater problem than its quantity, which, according to the annual report, had reached its effective maximum. In addition to the prevention of epizootic diseases, the stock-breeding service was implementing a systematic selection and cross-breeding programme; despite the interest shown, however, this programme was meeting with psychological and social obstacles, the Administering Authority observed. The Lome stock-breeding centre, comprising a laboratory, a clinic and sanitary installations, came into operation early in 1951; the Dapango centre, badly damaged by a tornado in 1950, was repaired; and a programme of cattle protection measures and rural hydraulic projects was drawn up for commencement in 1952.

The Administering Authority reported that, of 637,100,000 francs allocated for agriculture under the Ten-Year Plan by the end of 1951, 142,700,000 francs had been used and 127,260,000 francs paid out, and, of 47 million francs allocated for stock-farming, 22 million francs had been used and 16,500,000 francs paid out.

The Trusteeship Council noted the paucity of natural resources and the poor quality of the soil and the fact that methods of mechanized cultivation might not be those most suitable to the soil conditions. The intensive study being given to promoting agriculture, particularly in the fields of research and experiment, was also noted by the Council, which expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would intensify its efforts to disseminate agricultural information to indigenous farmers, to ensure soil conservation and regeneration and to combat plant diseases. Finally, the Council requested that it be kept informed of the steps taken or contemplated to improve soil fertility and all other aspects of agriculture.

Most of the Territory's industrial installations, including cotton and kapok ginning mills, a soap factory and a grated coconut factory, were connected with the processing of agricultural produce. A palm oil extracting mill at Alokouegbé, set up and presented to the Territory by France, carried out its first trials in 1951 and was expected to come into operation in 1952, the Administering Authority stated.

The Territory's mineral resources are limited; chromite and, to a lesser extent, bauxite appeared to be the only exploitable minerals, according to the Administering Authority. A permit for the exploitation of the chromite deposits on Mount Ahito had recently been granted, the Administering Authority informed the Trusteeship Council during its eleventh session. With regard to bauxite, the Bauxites du Midi Company had a special authorization to prospect.

The advance in the development of secondary industries in the Territory was viewed with satisfaction by the Trusteeship Council, which expressed the hope that the existing trend would be maintained so that the economy might be developed on a more diversified basis.

According to the report, the 1951 budget totalled 1,024,500,000 francs, an increase of 158,399,000 francs over that of 1950, arising from a general revision of salaries, development of health and education services, the volume of public works and a general rise in prices; the budget was balanced by taking 120 million francs from the reserve fund. Few changes occurred during 1951 in the organization of the Territory's fiscal system; the budget received 144,500,000 francs from direct and similar taxes, and 557 million francs in contributions collected sur liquidation. The Administering Authority reported that, as part of a campaign against the increase in the consumption of alcohol, the Representative Assembly, at its November session, had substantially increased the rates of licences at both the wholesale and retail levels.

Expenditure under the Ten-Year Plan during the fiscal year 1950-51 totalled 425,789,828 francs, according to the annual report. By the end of 1951, in addition to the funds spent for agriculture and stock-farming, the Administering Authority indicated, considerable sums had been expended for railways (509,700,000 francs, of which 402,700,000 francs were paid out), roads and bridges (599,000,000 francs, of which 399,200,000 francs were paid out), ports (151,000,000 francs, of which 61,000,000 francs were paid out) and communications (117,250,000 francs, of which 44,400,000 francs were paid out). According to the annual report, the chief operations in progress, in particular the Lomé-Aneho highway and the Tokoin General Hospital, would not approach completion until 1952.

The Trusteeship Council urged the Administering Authority to press forward with the implementation of the Ten-Year Development Plan and, further, to take the necessary measures to improve statistical services so as to provide an increasingly detailed factual basis for future planning.

Commenting on earlier Trusteeship Council recommendations concerning the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the economy, particularly in policy-making and managerial activities, the Administering Authority reported that the Representative Assembly was consulted as required by law on the utilization of funds allocated under the Ten-Year Plan. This participation in policy-making was to be increased, it added. As regards participation by the indigenous inhabitants in managerial activities, the Administering Authority further stated, the only qualification was personal competence. In 1951, there were 800 indigenous merchants in Togoland, and one of the largest importing and exporting firms was managed by a Togolander. Moreover, under an arrêté of 3 December 1951, the posts of president and treasurer of the Chamber of Commerce were opened to indigenous inhabitants, as had been recommended by the Council. At its eleventh session, the Council commended the Administering Authority for having implemented this recommendation.

The Administering Authority also stated in its report that it was continuing to encourage the establishment of co-operatives. Two new production co-operatives had filed their articles in 1951, and a new consumers' co-operative was expected to start operating during 1952. Arrangements had been made for two indigenous agents of the co-operatives to attend an advanced training course in France in 1952. The report added that, although not many co-operative institutions had yet been legally established, in practice co-operative groups were formed by chiefs at the request of producers when products were sold.

After recalling its earlier recommendations on the subject, the Trusteeship Council again expressed regret that the development of co-operatives was still somewhat slow. It noted an assurance by the Administering Authority, however, that close attention would be given to the problem of encouraging their development and that everything possible would be done to increase the number of persons trained in the establishment and management of co-operatives.

According to the annual report, the Administering Authority considered the general introduction of land registration of vital importance for the economic development of an essentially agricultural territory such as Togoland. Improvements were dependent on credit, and mortgages could only be issued against property which had been registered in the Land Register. The Administering Authority reported that the desirability of possessing land titles guaranteeing ownership under the Civil Code was being more widely appreciated by the indigenous inhabitants, even by those who held customary titles of ownership, and in 1951 the number of registrations reached a record total of 226 for a one-year period. This brought the area held under registered title by Africans to 7,006 hectares, as compared with 6,814 hectares in 1950; an area of 565 hectares, the same as in 1950, was registered in the names of non-indigenous inhabitants. One obstacle to a more general practice of registration was its relatively high cost, due largely to the fees of private surveyors, and consideration was being given to draft regulations for establishing a schedule of fees. Meanwhile, under an arrêté of 23 May 1951, the services of an Administration surveyor could be obtained at the official fee.

The Territory's forest domain covered an area of 105,000 hectares, of which 66,500 hectares were classified during 1951, in all cases with the full approval of the population, the Administering Authority reported. In spite of the increase in the classified area, it was regarded as still low, as it represented only 1.9 per cent of the total area of the Territory and only 4.66 per cent of the wooded area. The low figure was to some extent accounted for by the newness of the forestry service and the former hostility of the local population, the customary owners of the land, to the classification of uncultivated land. The Administering Authority noted an increasing acceptance on the part of the local population in 1951, however, as a result of a propaganda campaign launched by the forestry service, and it indicated that preliminary plans for the classification of a further 80,000 hectares were studied in 1951, together with other soil regeneration measures. The Administering Authority also reported that, for the first time, a large number of blocks of artificial stands of teak were cleared, a portion of the felled timber being given to the indigenous communities; the Territory received the balance.

c. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

According to the Administering Authority's annual report, the labour force in 1951 totalled 44,600, among whom 34,000 were unskilled labourers, 4,000 semi-skilled and 3,000 skilled. Recommendations concerning the enactment of a labour code for the Territory had been made by the Trusteeship Council since 1947, when a draft code was presented to the French National Assembly; the Administering Authority stated, in its 1951 report, that the proposed labour code for the French overseas territories would probably be promulgated during 1952.

The Administering Authority pointed out that the Inspectorate of Labour did not report any cases of contraventions of existing labour regulations during 1951. It added that inspection was facilitated by the existence of staff representatives in all undertakings employing a staff of ten or more, and by the vigilance of trade unions, which had continued to expand during the year. Six employers' unions, 35 workers' unions and five professional associations were registered. The Togoland Federation of Trade Unions (Union des Syndicats confédérés du Togo) had a membership of 20 trade unions; nine were attached to the General Confederation of Christian Workers (Confédération générale des travailleurs chrétiens); and six were independent. The total membership of the workers' trade unions was 6,425, but less than half that number had paid dues. The Administering Authority reported that relations between employers and employees were normal during 1951. Discussions held in May, June and July between the various trade union representatives on the question of wage increases were completed to the satisfaction of the workers, the report indicated. Basic wage rates, calculated according to the minimum subsistence level, were established by the Advisory Labour Commission on the basis of (a) reports issued by the Inspectorate of Labour on the prices of basic commodities at Lome and in the various centres and (b) studies by workers' and employers' trade unions. Minimum wage rates were reviewed from time to time in order to compensate for increases in the cost of living, the Administering Authority stated, the latest adjustment having raised the minimum wage for unskilled labour to 144 francs a day on 1 July 1951, as compared to 82 francs a day as of 1 January 1950. This represented an index increase of 2,280 in relation to the base year 1938 (index 100) and of 380 in relation to the year 1947; minimum wage rates for daily-paid administrative employees in the lowest category had been increased from 53 francs in 1947 to 158 francs in 1951. The latest wage increases, the annual report indicated, had put real wages slightly above the increase in the cost of living and much higher outside Lome. A Territorial Labour Exchange had been established by an arrêté of 27 June 1951 to help workers find employment, the Administering Authority stated. It pointed out that there were no restrictions on the movement of workers within the Territory and that a number of individual workers continued to migrate, mainly to British and French Nigeria and the Gabon in French Equatorial Africa, for temporary work.

The Trusteeship Council, recalling its previous recommendations on the subject, indicated its regret that the labour code for the Territory had not yet been finally approved by the French Parliament and expressed the hope that action on this legislation would soon be completed. The Council also requested the Administering Authority to make a close study of the problems of migrant workers, especially of those going into neighbouring territories for the harvesting and transportation of the cocoa crops; the Administering Authority was asked to include in its study the question of the adequate supervision of such migratory movements. The Council further asked that full information on the matter be included in the next annual report.

The Juvento, in its petition (T/Pet.7/292/Add.1), condemned any system of forced labour intended to associate the illiterate or tyrannical chiefs in the exploitation or enslavement of the whole country. The Administering Authority observed (T/1015 and T/C.2/SR.34), however, that no system of forced labour existed in the Territory, and the Trusteeship Council, in its resolution (634 (XI)) on the petition, drew the attention of the petitioners to this observation.

With respect to town planning and housing, the Administering Authority reported that the town plan for the modernization of Lome was continued in 1951, and many modern villas were also built by Africans; the lighting system was being installed and a new slaughterhouse was completed. In the interior, building and town-planning was also in progress, notably at Sokodé, Palimé and Tsévié. The main schemes being carried out under the Ten-Year Plan were for water supply systems at populated centres, for well-sinking and for draining the Lome lagoon.

The civil registry system, which was being organized for the indigenous population, aimed at a simplification and extension of registration, the annual report stated. The report indicated that the civil registry centres, which increased from 246 in 1950 to 256 in 1951, had functioned satisfactorily during the year. It was hoped that in the south, particularly in the Lome, Klouto and Anécho districts, each village would soon have a civil registry centre; in the north, the Administering Authority pointed out, the problem was to find secretaries who were both literate and sufficiently reliable to be entrusted with the registry files.

With respect to public health, the annual report indicated that the indigenous medical assistance service, which maintains a permanent organization of hospitals, dispensaries and other facilities, extended its curative medical services during 1951 and modernized its public health units. The mobile medical and prophylactic service continued its public educational work in hygiene during the year in addition to performing its essential function as a mobile medical service. It was pointed out, to illustrate the improved situation in the Territory, that the proportion of the population suffering from sleeping sickness had been reduced in 20 years from 17 per cent to 0.2 per cent. The health service budget for 1951, the Administering Authority reported, was 205,920,000 francs, or 20 per cent of the local budget, compared with 186,686,000 francs in 1950. In addition, by the end of 1951, 471,900,000 of the 716,625,000 francs allocated for medical services under the Ten-Year Plan had been spent and 418,366,000 paid out. The following major work projects were begun during 1951: three new hospital buildings at Sokodé; two polyclinics, at Lama-Kara and Nango; three medical centres, at Dapango, Niamtougou and Vogan; six new dispensaries; preliminary work on the building of a 120-bed hospital at Anécho; and continuation of the work at the Lome General Hospital, part of which was already in use.

A total of 4,700,000 general consultations were given in 1951; cases admitted to hospitals during the year numbered 16,149 and days of treatment 523,134. The annual report indicated that the maternity and child welfare service was expanding to serve an increasingly large number of centres. In 1951, there were 7,236 births with medical attention (as compared with 4,412 in 1947), 46,641 pre-natal and 66,513 post-natal consultations, 413,875 consultations involving children under two years of age and 599,775 involving children from two to five years. The medical and educational authorities co-operated closely in the work of school medical inspections, the Administering Authority reported, and each child had a medical record book, kept up-to-date by quarterly inspections. The medical staff in the Territory included, among others, eleven fully qualified doctors, two of them Africans, sixteen locally trained "African doctors", 27 midwives, also locally trained, and 343 nurses. The annual report stated that twelve Africans were studying medicine in France, seven were studying pharmacy and one dental surgery. After a special competitive examination, members of the African medical staff could study in France for French State diplomas; in addition, on passing the baccalauréat, students could study medicine at the Dakar school, set up in October 1950, and train there for the State diploma.

The Trusteeship Council noted the further expansion of medical and health services during 1951 and especially the total of consultations and the reduction in the proportion of the population suffering from sleeping sickness. Nevertheless, it considered that a great deal remained to be done and expressed the hope, as at previous sessions, that the Administering Authority would continue its efforts to improve the medical facilities still further and, in particular, to expand the provisions for the full medical training of indigenous medical students. Noting also that the Administering Authority had given attention to the problem of infant mortality, the Council urged that further study be given to the problem and requested that full information on the matter be provided in the next annual report.

d. EDUCATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

As defined in the report for 1951, it is the educational policy of the Administering Authority to bring Togoland pupils as rapidly as possible to the competitive examination standards obtaining in Metropolitan France, so as to give them opportunities equal to those of their fellows in the French Union who seek posts filled by competitive examination. Generally speaking, the policy is pursued through the provision by government of completely free primary, secondary and higher education, and through a progressive extension of educational facilities.

Following recommendations of the Trusteeship Council, further efforts were made during 1951 with respect to using local languages in teaching. In June 1951, a widespread consultation of the leading experts in the various dialects was organized, but the Administering Authority reported that it was impossible to decide which among 22 important dialects were the dominant languages—Ewe, Mina, Cabrais or the Moba dialects. It was therefore decided that as far as possible teachers should work in their own districts and should give moral instruction, practical training and teaching in singing in the local dialect; that they would also teach adult classes; and that school books should be prepared in the local dialects. Such dialects would still be used in the elementary classes.

The Juvento, in a resolution adopted on 4 January 1952 (T/Pet.7/292/Add.1), a copy of which was transmitted to the Council, proclaimed its intention of using every legal means to ensure the establishment of cultural exchanges between the youth in the south, centre and north of Togoland. Commenting on this petition, the Administering Authority observed (T/1015) that it considered that such cultural interchanges would be most advantageous and had never obstructed their development.

The annual report indicated that the activities of the Educational Service during 1951 were directed in particular to reorganizing and improving teaching methods so as to achieve better results from school work. During previous years, enrolment had proceeded at such a rate that teachers had been faced with very large classes, sometimes as many as 150 pupils. The buildings had been hurriedly constructed and very scantily equipped. Efforts were therefore made in 1951 to increase the number of classes and to distribute the pupils so that no class should contain more than 55; to improve the ability of teachers; and to distribute school equipment. The Administering Authority hoped that by 1952 all the classrooms would be adequately equipped. As regards the construction of school buildings, the annual report indicated that, of 686,000,000 francs allocated under the Ten-Year-Plan, 233,500,000 francs had been committed and 116,140,000 francs disbursed as of the end of 1951. The two new large buildings of Lome college were completed. The teachers' training college at Atakpame and a primary school at Nyekonakpoé were opened early in 1951 and the girls' school in the latter town was being enlarged. In addition, work on a women's college, construction of which was approved by the Representative Assembly, was expected to begin in 1952. Allocations for education for 1951 in the territorial budget amounted to 156,800,000 francs, or 15 per cent of the whole budget, as against 113 million francs allocated and 142,516,000 francs spent in 1950. Subsidies from the local budget to Catholic and Protestant mission schools amounted to 37,123,850 francs.

According to the annual report, the number of government elementary school classes increased from 345 in 1950 to 399 in 1951 and the number of private school classes from 353 to 391. The total number of pupils in both government and private schools rose to 43,151 in 1951, as compared with 40,833 in 1950. In addition, 12,752 pupils attended non-subsidized mission establishments giving religious instruction and the elements of learning. Government secondary school classes numbered 21 in 1951, an increase of one over the year before, and private secondary school classes 15, a decrease of one. There were 955 secondary school pupils in 1951, as against 835 in 1950. Those receiving technical training included 63 in the commercial section of Lome college, 69 in the technical section of Sokodé college and 28 pupils and four internes in the domestic science section of the girls' school at Lome. Trainees were also admitted to the agricultural services and the various technical administrative services, and several hundred were given instruction at the Catholic mission vocational training school, in private undertakings and, especially, by many African craftsmen. Most of the pupils attending secondary and technical schools received maintenance grants, the Administering Authority indicated, and in 1951 a total of 343 scholarships were granted.

The Administering Authority stated that pamphlets giving information on the work, purposes, principles and organization of the United Nations were distributed in all schools. Lessons on these subjects were given in all government schools, and United Nations day was celebrated in all schools with discussions on the working of the United Nations and the Trusteeship Council.

According to the annual report, the teaching staff in the government secondary schools was composed in 1951 of one Academy inspector, fifteen certified professors, one assistant and six teachers. The teaching staff in the government primary schools consisted of 42 teachers of the metropolitan service, 93 teachers of the higher local grade and 292 pupil-teachers. This staff was trained in the schools and colleges of France, French West Africa, the secondary college at Lome, or the teachers' training college at Atakpame. The annual report stated that the first group of teachers who had received appropriate training from the school at Atakpame would graduate in 1952. In 1951, an effort was made to improve, by vocation courses, lectures and other means, the professional training of young teachers, 20 of whom were recommended for degrees. The report also indicated a considerable improvement in conditions for teaching staff during recent years, as a result of the construction of new schools and of comfortable living quarters.

The teaching staff in private schools was composed of seven certificated teachers, eleven assistant teachers, 29 instructors, 131 pupil-teachers and 243 assistant pupil-teachers.

While there are no higher educational facilities within the Trust Territory, students completing their secondary education are granted scholarships for university or higher technical schools in France; only one student chose to go to the University of Dakar in 1951. The Administering Authority reported that there were 82 scholarships for higher education in 1951 in the fields of the arts (7), science (16), medicine (15), pharmacy (7), law (5), dental surgery (3), and technical training (29); in addition, there were fifteen scholarships for education in secondary schools. There were also thirteen young Togoland students studying in France at local expense to complete their technical training.

Reporting on mass education, the Administering Authority stated that 135 courses for adults, the most popular form of mass education, were held in 1951. The elementary courses were directed by student teachers, and the more advanced courses by instructors. A total of 489 candidates who had attended those courses sat for the certificate, and 60 obtained it. The mobile cinema and library van made its rounds throughout the year and acquired fifteen more films. A youth hostel was organized at Tsévié, with a library, tennis courts and other amenities. The public libraries in Togoland included those of the Institut français d'Afrique Noire (IFAN) with 6,000 volumes and that of the Direction du Service de l'Enseignement with 2,170 volumes, and many libraries in primary and secondary schools. In 1951, a publishing firm sent a mobile library to tour the Territory and sold a large number of classical works, grammars and other books, the Administering Authority reported, and the Education Service decided to organize a circulating library system for home lending. It was also pointed out in the annual report that in 1951 the Representative Assembly, at the Administration's request, approved the funds necessary for an experiment in fundamental education similar to experiments carried out by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). The experiment would include, among other things, a school, a dispensary, a handicrafts workshop, a model garden, a water supply point and the organization of a regional fair with lectures, discussions, films and sporting events.

UNESCO, in its observations (T/1012) on educational conditions in the Territory, referred to the increases in school enrolment and in the number of teachers. However, it noted that only 3 per cent of the primary school pupils succeeded in obtaining the primary school certificate and that the entrance examination to secondary schools eliminated over 80 per cent of the candidates. Attention should be drawn to the severity of this elimination, it was felt. In this connexion, UNESCO found that the school systems and curricula, although inspired by those of France and reaching the same level, were tending to be adapted progressively to local conditions; it considered this a most important development. While the need for technical education was considerable, UNESCO stated, it appeared to be the weakest part of the educational system. On the other hand, UNESCO found the developments in fundamental education encouraging and indicated that it would welcome further information on the proposed fundamental education scheme.

The Trusteeship Council, while noting with satisfaction the further progress made in the field of education during 1951, nevertheless considered that an intensified effort should be made, particularly as regards teacher-training, technical and vocational training of workers and adult education. Moreover, the Council recommended, the Administering Authority should give preference to educational facilities in the north as a step towards equalizing educational advancement in the Territory. The Council also noted with interest UNESCO's comments on the Territory's educational advancement and requested the Administering Authority to give them careful consideration.

6. The Ewe and Togoland Unification Problem¹²⁷

The unification problem was first brought to the attention of the United Nations in 1947, when the All-Ewe Conference petitioned for the unification of the Ewe people living in the British Gold Coast Colony and the southern portions of Togoland under British administration and Togoland under French administration. The Comité de l'Unité togolaise associated itself with the objectives of the All-Ewe Conference, and both groups later joined in support of demands being made by the Togoland Union and the Togoland Congress for the unification and independence of the two Togolands, as distinguished from the unification of the Ewe-inhabited areas. Opposition to these unification movements was led by the Parti togolais du Progrès and the Union des chefs et des populations du nord du Togo, in Togoland under French administration, and by groups in Togoland under United Kingdom administration desiring closer association with the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast.

After establishing two successive consultative commissions to ascertain the real wishes and interests of the peoples of the two Trust Territories, the Administering Authorities in 1951 proposed in a joint memorandum to the Trusteeship Council the establishment of a Joint Council for Togoland Affairs to advise the Administering Authorities on matters of common concern to the two Togolands and to assist in harmonizing development in these Territories. This proposal was endorsed on 24 July 1951 by the Trusteeship Council, which recommended, however, that the scope of the Joint Council's functions be sufficiently broad to enable it to exercise its functions with respect to all questions of common concern to the people of the two Territories, including questions of political, economic, social, educational and cultural development. The Trusteeship Council also recommended that the Joint Council be so organized as to ensure, if possible, the participation of the major groups in both Territories (resolution 345(IX)).

The unification question was further considered during the sixth session of the General Assembly. By resolution 555(VI) of 18 January 1952, the Assembly urged the two Administering Authorities and the peoples involved to make every effort to reach a prompt, constructive and equitable settlement of the problem, taking fully into account the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned. It recommended that the Administering Authorities consult fully with the various parties and groups concerned with a view to devising satisfactory procedures for electing representatives to the Joint Council and that the Council's powers be extended to enable it to consider and make recommendations on all aspects of the Ewe and Togoland unification problem. The Trusteeship Council was asked, in view of the urgency of the problem, to devote more intensive attention to all its aspects. The Assembly further recommended that the Trusteeship Council arrange for a special mission to the two Territories or alternatively for its next regular Mission to devote sufficient time to the problem to study it thoroughly, including the functioning of the Joint Council. The Assembly asked that the Mission be directed to submit a detailed report to the Trusteeship Council with specific recommendations taking full account of the real wishes and interests of the peoples concerned. The Trusteeship Council was asked by the Assembly to prepare, in turn, a special report covering all aspects of the problem for submission to the Assembly at its seventh session.

After considering this resolution, the Trusteeship Council, on 3 March 1952, unanimously decided by resolution 424(X) that its next Visiting Mission to Togoland under United Kingdom administration and Togoland under French administration should leave New York in August so as to arrive in the Territories not later than 1 September 1952, that it should spend at least one month in these Territories, and that it should submit its report on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem in time for consideration by the Trusteeship Council at a second part of its eleventh session, to be convened not later than 7 November. The Council later decided on 27 March, by 10 votes to none, with 2 abstentions, that it would send only one Mission to West Africa and that this Mission should visit the two Cameroons as well as the two Togolands. It also decided, on 31 March, that the Mission should leave New York on 20 August and, after spending a month in the two Togolands, should start drafting its report on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem so as to have it completed by 15 October 1952.¹²⁸

The Mission left New York on 18 August, arriving in Togoland under French administration on 21 August. After visiting Lome, from 21 to 25 August, and Accra, Gold Coast, the seat of government of Togoland under United Kingdom administration, from 25 to 28 August, the Mission proceeded to the latter Trust Territory, where it stayed until 9 September, and returned to Togoland under French administration, from 9 to 25 September.

On 25 October 1952, the Mission unanimously adopted its special report to the Trusteeship Council on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem (T/1034 and Add.1).

a. REPORT OF THE VISITING MISSION

In accordance with its terms of reference, the Mission reported, it investigated as thoroughly as it could within the time available to it the three following problems: (a) the demands for unification in its various forms, (b) the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs and (c) the frontier difficulties caused by the international boundary between the two Togolands. Its conclusions on these problems are summarized below.

In addition, the Mission's report indicated, it received a considerable number of oral and written complaints alleging that, in Togoland under French administration, the Administration was taking measures to prevent supporters of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise and the Mouvement de la jeunesse togolaise (Juvento), pro-unification groups in the Territory, from approaching the Mission; that it prohibited the displaying of pro-unification insignia and the shouting of pro-unification slogans; and that it mistreated, arrested and imprisoned supporters of the Comité de l'Unité togolaise and Juvento. The Mission reported that a number of the allegations referred to past events. Others, it stated, were too vague to warrant or permit investigation. The Mission affirmed that, whenever it received a complaint which in its opinion warranted special investigation on the spot, it conducted as thorough an inquiry as it could within the time available; it requested specific observations from the local authorities and questioned the complainants in oral hearings when possible. Although the Mission considered that the questions raised should be dealt with in its general report on Togoland under French administration, it nevertheless annexed to its special report on the unification problem a summary of the most important allegations made and the relevant observations of the local authorities.

(1) Unification

In order to determine the views and real aspirations of the populations of the two Trust Territories regarding unification, the Mission reported, it devoted a large part of its time to conducting oral hearings. In each town it visited and in many villages along its route, it heard leaders of the main political parties, members of representative bodies, traditional chiefs and other individuals. The views of the population were further made known to the Mission through written communications, 2,899 of which were received, concerning the unification question. These, the report stated, were considered by the Mission as intended for its own information. The Mission indicated that approximately two thirds of the communications were in support of the views of the political parties, representative bodies and traditional chiefs and consisted of very brief signed statements, for example "Unification and Independence"; in one centre, it reported it received 325 such communications within a few minutes. In addition to conducting oral hearings and examining written communications, the Mission attended four mass meetings organized by political parties in Togoland under United Kingdom administration and held full discussions on the unification question with representatives of the local authorities in the two Trust Territories.

After giving an account of what it had seen, heard and learned in the two Togolands, the Mission presented its conclusions and recommendations on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem.

It noted that the request for unification had evolved from the original request by the All-Ewe Conference for Ewe unification to a request for the unification of both Trust Territories. From its findings on the spot, the Mission confirmed that in the south of the two Territories the demand for Togoland unification had become a live political issue with wide support and in certain localities was practically unanimous. The Mission was of the opinion that the general demand for a united Togoland as a political movement was gaining wider recognition in the sense that even the political parties which were in favour of their existing Administering Authorities found it politically wise to state that unification was a paramount wish or that it was equitable.

Thus, according to the Mission, it might be stated that, with the exception of certain groups in Togoland under United Kingdom administration, the people of the Trust Territories desired in principle unification of the two Trust Territories. The exceptions, as referred to by the Mission, were: the peoples of Northern Togoland under United Kingdom administration, where the Mamprusis, Dagombas and Nanumbas (whose tribes were divided between the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast and the Trust Territory) had expressed their desire for incorporation in the Gold Coast; the people of Krachi in the Southern part of the Trust Territory, who desired no change of administration; and several members of the Convention People's Party in some localities.

The fact that unification was desired in principle, however, should not be interpreted to mean that there was wide support for any one form of unification which would be acceptable to the majority of the inhabitants of the two Trust Territories, the Mission cautioned. The intensity of the demands for unification also differed greatly, the Mission pointed out.

The Mission reported that the All-Ewe Conference, the Togoland Union and its affiliated organizations, in Togoland under United Kingdom administration, and the Comité de l'Unité togolaise and Juvento in Togoland under French administration demanded, in a joint declaration of 22 August 1952, that the Trusteeship Agreements relating to both Togolands be amended forthwith so that the present Administering Authorities transfer to the United Nations the sovereignty they were exercising on behalf of the indigenous inhabitants. The memorandum asked that a United Nations High Commissioner be appointed with full powers of direct administration over the united Territory for a period of five years and made proposals for a five-year programme of accelerated political, social and economic development, at the end of which Togoland would be proclaimed an independent sovereign state.

The Parti togolais du progrès and the Union des chefs et des populations du nord du Togo, in Togoland under French administration, stated that their parties had always favoured the idea of the unification of the two Togolands, the Mission reported. They considered that justice called for the reconstitution of Togoland and that the efforts of all Togolese of good will should be directed towards the discovery of measures of unification which would respect the reciprocal interests acquired by the two parties. In their view, it was logical to integrate United Kingdom-administered Togoland in French-administered Togoland, which was capable of independent existence.

These two political parties requested the Administering Authority: (a) to extend the powers of the Territorial Assembly; (b) to set up an Executive Council; and (c) to promote the increasingly easy access of Togolese to responsible posts.

The Convention People's Party envisaged closer association of Togoland under United Kingdom administration with the Gold Coast but was not necessarily opposed to unification. The Convention People's Party, Southern Togoland region, being fully aware that it was a popular request in Togoland that the two Territories be unified with the ultimate aim of achieving self-government or independence, still considered the unification of both Togolands as a paramount demand, in so far as it was the expressed wish of the majority of the inhabitants of the two Trust Territories. The Party was strongly opposed to the Togoland Union which sought a unified and independent Togoland without United Kingdom administration. The entry of the Convention People's Party into the politics of Togoland under United Kingdom administration, the Mission observed, was a major factor in the attitude of the inhabitants of this Trust Territory towards the unification problem.

The Mission saw keen political battles being fought by the various political parties using modern campaign techniques. It pointed out that its presence in the Territories caused friction between some political parties which sought to demonstrate their strength and importance by holding mass rallies and by competing with each other in claiming the Mission's attention. In this connexion, the Mission expressed the hope that the leaders of all political parties would conduct their campaigns in such a way as to avoid public disorder and violence. It also reported that in Sokodé (Togoland under French administration), it had received 31 allegedly forged communications supporting the aspirations of one political party and expressed its regret that upon investigation it was found that some signatures were forged.

It was the view of the Mission that in seeking a solution to the unification problem an enlightened and sound public opinion was highly necessary. This depended very much upon the development of the two Trust Territories in the political, economic, social and educational fields, the Mission stated. In this connexion the Mission expressed its satisfaction with the lively and intelligent interest taken by the peoples of both Togolands in the progress and development of their respective Territories. With further advancement of education in the Territories, the Mission felt, the people would be in a position to express their real wishes as to their political future. This would call for an accelerated educational programme on the part of the two Administering Authorities, but it was not only the sole responsibility of the two Administrations, it was also the responsibility of their leaders and of the more advanced sections of the population. In this respect, the Mission considered that the two Territories were in need of political, economic and social stability.

The Mission observed that, in emphasizing the educational approach to the unification problem, it placed equal emphasis on the political, economic and social advancement of the two Trust Territories. For this reason, the Mission stated, its attention was drawn, not only to mass education schemes and schools, but also to the development of the local representative bodies, dispensaries, hospitals, agricultural research and experimental stations, veterinary services and the building of highways. The Mission was particularly impressed by Achimota University College in the Gold Coast, which was open to students of Togoland under United Kingdom administration, and by the dispensaries, agricultural research and experimental stations and, especially, the new Lome hospital in Togoland under French administration. The Mission stated that it visited the two Trust Territories at an interesting stage of their development, when rapid progress was being made in both Territories in reforming local government. It described as encouraging the progress in the establishment of local representative bodies in both Trust Territories. Having seen some of these bodies in action, the Mission observed that their members were aware of their responsibilities and the problems confronting the areas over which they had jurisdiction and those confronting their individual Territories as a whole.

The Mission concluded, with respect to the Ewe and Togoland unification problem, that, in the time available to it, it was not in a position to find out precisely which unification proposal enjoyed the widest support throughout the two Territories, but from the examination of the large mass of material available to it, it was of the opinion that there was not present in the two Territories wide enough support for any particular form of unification as to warrant alteration of the existing administrative arrangements.

(2) Joint Council for Togoland Affairs

The Mission reported that the Joint Council, composed of fifteen representatives from Togoland under French administration and six from Togoland under United Kingdom administration, was not in session during its stay in the two Territories. However, it had interviews with the Co-Chairmen and certain members of the Council in both Territories, ascertained the position of the main political parties through oral hearings and written communications and discussed the subject with representatives of the local authorities.

The Mission expressed regret that when it was in the Territories the Joint Council was not a working body. This was due, it reported, to the fact that only twelve representatives out of the 21 envisaged participated in the Council's work. No representatives from Togoland under United Kingdom administration were present and the only representatives from Togoland under French administration were members of the Parti togolais du progrès or the Union des chefs et des populations du nord du Togo. With respect to Togoland under United Kingdom administration, the Mission was informed that the Mamprusi, Dagomba and Nanumba areas did not elect any representative to the Joint Council; that the four remaining members representing the Gonja, Jasikan, Kpandu and Ho areas of the Trust Territory walked out of the Council at the third sitting after making strong protests concerning the lack of parity representation between the representatives from the two Trust Territories; and that no political parties participated in the election of representatives to the Joint Council. With respect to Togoland under French administration, the Mission was further informed that the Comité de l'Unité togolaise refused to send the representative to which it was entitled to the Joint Council and that the representatives of Klouto and Lome walked out of the Council in protest at the third sitting, with the four representatives from Togoland under United Kingdom administration.

The main objections to the Joint Council, the Mission was informed, were that its functions and powers were not broad enough, that the elections were not carried out on the basis of universal suffrage and that the principle of parity representation between the two Territories had not been accepted.

Although it was well aware of the fact that the Joint Council was empowered to discuss all political, economic, social and educational matters of common concern to the two Trust Territories, the Mission was of the opinion that such powers should nevertheless be specifically mentioned in the Council's terms of reference. Furthermore, it believed that the Council, so empowered, possessed the possibility of forming the nucleus of a legislative body for the two Togolands once they achieved self-government.

The Mission recalled the reasons given by the two Administering Authorities for not carrying out the elections to the Council on the basis of adult suffrage, but pointed out that with respect to Togoland under United Kingdom administration, the elections had been on the basis of adult suffrage.¹²⁹ Concerning parity of representation, the Mission recalled that the system of proportional representation had not always been adopted in the establishment of earlier joint bodies for the two Territories. It observed, moreover, that official participation in such joint bodies had diminished and that, until the last Council was established, the number of seats allotted to the two Trust Territories had never depended on the population figures of the two Territories.

The Mission recalled that both Administering Authorities showed evidence of willingness to make the work of the Joint Council successful by making funds and technical assistance available to it for development projects of concern to the two Trust Territories. It further pointed out that the Administering Authorities, all interested groups and political parties, with the exception of the Togoland Union and of the Mamprusi, Dagomba and Nanumba peoples in Northern Togoland under United Kingdom administration, stated that they were in general agreement that the Joint Council might be a valuable institution which could advise the Administering Authorities on matters of common concern to the two Trust Territories and could assist in harmonizing developments in the Territories. The Mission endorsed this view. It was aware that the full cooperation of both the Administering Authorities and of the political parties concerned was required for the Joint Council to become a properly functioning body which might solve political questions as well as alleviate frontier difficulties. It pointed out, however, that it was unable, after completing its visit to the two Territories, to discuss with the Administering Authorities and the parties concerned the possibility of gaining general agreement on the modifications required to make the Council an effective body. Recalling the General Assembly's recommendations (see above) on the extension of the Joint Council's functions and powers and on the procedures for electing the Council's representatives, the Mission suggested that the Administering Authorities, in order to enable the Council to operate efficiently in the future, should consult fully with each other and the representatives of the people concerned on the possible modifications which might be made in the Council to give general satisfaction to all concerned. Finally, the Mission expressed the hope that the Administering Authorities would assist in bringing about the necessary adjustments for the well-being of the peoples of both Trust Territories.

¹²⁹ The United Kingdom later pointed out, in its observations (T/1039) on the Mission's report, that it would be more strictly correct to describe the suffrage system as "a system virtually amounting to" adult suffrage.

(3) Frontier Problems

The Mission reported that it gave the most careful attention to the frontier difficulties caused by the international boundary between the two Togolands. It visited the headquarters of the customs services in both Territories, and the main customs posts, questioning the officers in charge, and consulting the customs seizure books. The Mission also sought the views of the inhabitants along the frontier and considered complaints regarding frontier difficulties.

It expressed the opinion that the frontier problem was not an economic but a political one and indicated that it was aware of the psychological effect which the existence of the boundary had created. In this regard, the Mission noted a statement by the Administering Authorities that no significant complaints of frontier difficulties were brought to their notice in 1951 and concluded that the frontier problems were in fact of secondary consideration and of no great significance. The real problem, in the Mission's opinion, was the very existence of the frontier, and that would depend on the solution of the unification problem.

While noting that much had been done by the Administering Authorities during recent years to satisfy the wishes of the people on both sides of the boundary, the Mission saw scope for further action. The complaints arising, the Mission stated, came mainly from the Southern areas, where nearly all the frontier posts were concentrated. The Mission was satisfied that no difficulties were experienced by persons wishing to cross the frontier. Its attention was drawn, however, to restrictions placed on the transport of certain goods across the frontier, particularly cocoa and coffee, and on the taking of currency from one Territory to the other. The Mission suggested that the Administering Authorities consider the possibility of abolishing restrictions on the transport of consumer goods such as sugar, salt and kerosene, of alleviating customs restrictions on manufactured goods, such as cotton piece goods and bicycles, and of increasing the amounts of their respective currencies allowed to be taken over the frontier. It further suggested that the Administering Authorities consider amending the provisions whereby lorries from Togoland under United Kingdom administration were prohibited from proceeding along certain roads in Togoland under French administration and from remaining there for more than 24 hours. Moreover, the Mission considered that more roads between the two Territories might be constructed and existing ones improved. It also made suggestions with respect to the operation of the frontier posts.

b. CONSIDERATION BY THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

The Visiting Mission's special report on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem (T/1034 and Add.1) was considered by the Trusteeship Council at the 457th and 458th meetings of the second part of its eleventh session, on 24 and 25 November 1952.

The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that his Government, as Administering Authority for one of the Trust Territories, had not yet been able to come to definite conclusions on the Mission's report, which he felt merited very thorough study by the Administering Authorities. In his opinion, one fact clearly emerged from the report—that "unification" was interpreted in several different ways and that no single unification programme would be supported by a majority in either Territory. In general, he stated, the United Kingdom would be disposed to endorse the Mission's conclusions. While the Council would obviously be unable to record any definite opinion without hearing the views of the Administering Authorities on the substance of the problem, he suggested, it might acknowledge the value of the Mission's report, give general endorsement to the conclusions, and ask the Administering Authorities to give the report their urgent attention.

The representative of France observed that it might be said, subject to a more detailed study of the report, that the Mission had reached the fundamental conclusion that no magical formula existed for the settlement of the unification problem. The question should be dealt with impartially and unhurriedly, he said, in compliance with the Charter and the peoples' wishes. A final and immediate solution would only hinder the peoples' free development. The Trusteeship Council should seek first to promote the peoples' advancement until they were prepared to choose the solution best befitting their interests. France was willing to increase further the share of the indigenous people in the administration of the affairs of Togoland under French administration, and both the United Kingdom and France had started negotiations to reduce the obstacles separating the two Togolands.

The representatives of Belgium and New Zealand also cautioned against hasty action on the unification problem. The latter, in addition, congratulated the Administering Authorities on setting up the Joint Council on Togoland Affairs, but felt that the failure of certain members to cooperate in the work of that Council would merely make the unification of Togoland more difficult.

The representative of the United States expressed the view that the Trusteeship Council should approve the broad outlines of the Mission's conclusions, and he introduced a draft resolution (T/L.332) to that effect.

The USSR representative stated that his delegation categorically opposed the Mission's conclusions. In particular, it was unable to accept the Mission's conclusion that no one form of unification had received sufficient support to justify a modification of the status quo; it was obvious from the Mission's own report, the USSR representative added, that the overwhelming majority in the two Territories favoured unification in the form of independence in a period of five years and the United Nations must meet the wishes of the people. The USSR representative also opposed the United States draft resolution which, he stated, advocated the maintenance of the status quo. Moreover, he contended, the United States, by stating in its draft resolution that the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs "might be" a valuable institution, was trying to divert the Trusteeship Council's attention from the fact that this body, because of its membership and existing powers, served no useful purpose. The Mission's statement that frontier difficulties were of secondary importance, the USSR representative argued, was belied by the complaints sent in by many petitioners and could only be intended to minimize the importance of unification.

The representative of Iraq recalled that ever since the Trusteeship Council had taken up the unification problem in 1947, his delegation had felt that the desire of the Ewe people for national unification was not only legitimate but represented a force in the two Territories which could not be disregarded if peace was to be maintained and the objectives of the Charter realized. Later developments had only confirmed that view and a genuine solution to the problem must be found. The Mission's final conclusions, the representative of Iraq considered, were somewhat baffling since the Mission's findings bore out the desire of the population as a whole for unification. The Mission's statement that it had not been in a position in the time available to it to find out precisely which unification proposal enjoyed the widest support appeared to indicate that it had failed to realize the importance of its task and responsibilities. The delegation of Iraq would abstain from voting on the unification question, however, since Iraq's term of membership in the Council expired at the end of 1952, and the question would be further considered in the Fourth Committee, when representatives of the Ewe people would be heard, the representative of Iraq explained.

The representative of China expressed regret that the Mission had been unable, for lack of time, to study the unification problem thoroughly and to make specific proposals for its solution. He explained that his delegation, although endorsing the findings set out in the Mission's report, considered that the Mission should have remained longer in the Territories.

Pointing out that, according to the Mission's report, the people of the southern part of both Trust Territories desired unification and that in certain areas that desire was unanimous, the representative of El Salvador maintained that all Members of the United Nations should try to find a solution which would satisfy the aspirations of the peoples of the two Trust Territories. The United Nations, not the peoples, he stated, should decide which form of unification best suited the Territories. As the peoples did not wish to remain divided, the United Nations must find a way to satisfy their aspirations, if necessary by organizing a plebiscite.

On the other hand, it was argued by the representative of Australia that the Trusteeship Council's task was to aid the two Administering Authorities and the leaders of the people to work out a solution of the problem rather than to impose any particular solution. He expressed his support of the United States draft resolution.

Three amendments (T/SR.458) to the United States draft resolution were submitted jointly by China and El Salvador.

The first of these would refer to the Mission's opinion that the demand for the unification of the two Togolands as a political movement was gaining wider recognition. In principle, this was accepted by the United States, and it was agreed to substitute such a statement in the existing second paragraph of the substantive part of the draft resolution (see below), in place of a statement to the effect that the people desired such unification in principle.

The second would note that the majority of the communications received by the Mission requested the immediate unification of the two Territories under United Nations administration. Reference was made by the representative of Australia, however, to the Mission's statement that it had considered communications as intended for its own information. He further observed that the Mission had not formulated any conclusions on the specific question of unification under United Nations administration and contended that it would certainly have done so if it had had the necessary data on which to base such conclusions. The representative of China then proposed that the amendment refer only to the "unification and independence of the two Territories" and this was accepted by the United States representative, who stated that in his opinion there was no doubt that most of the communications favoured unification and independence. Following objections by France, New Zealand and Belgium to the undue importance attached to written communications, the United States put forward a proposal, accepted by China, to specify in the amendment that no general consultation of the population had been made. The representatives of Australia, Belgium and France again expressed their opposition to the amendment as now altered. Put to the vote at the 458th meeting of the Council on 25 November, the amendment was adopted by 5 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions (see the third operative paragraph, below).

The third joint amendment proposed by China and El Salvador would add, before a reference in the United States draft resolution to the Mission's conclusion that there was not enough support for any particular form of unification to warrant changing existing arrangements, a statement noting that in the time available to it the Mission was not in a position to find out precisely which unification proposal enjoyed the widest support throughout the two Territories. A United States proposal, accepted by China, that the text of the relevant statement by the Mission be included instead was adopted by the Council by 7 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions (see the fourth operative paragraph below). The representative of Australia explained that he had abstained from voting on this paragraph because it implied that the Mission had not made a sufficiently thorough study.

The United States draft resolution as a whole was adopted, as amended, by 7 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions, at the 458th meeting of the Council on 25 November 1952.

The resolution (643 (XI)) read:

"The Trusteeship Council,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 555 (VI), which recommended, inter alia, that the Trusteeship Council arrange for the dispatch of either a special mission or its next periodic Visiting Mission to the two Trust Territories concerned to study thoroughly the Ewe and Togoland unification problem, including the functioning of the proposed Joint Council and submit to the Trusteeship Council a detailed report thereon, including specific recommendations, which shall take full account of the real wishes and interests of the peoples concerned,

"Recalling further that resolution 555 (VI) requested the Trusteeship Council to submit to the General Assembly at its seventh regular session a special report covering all aspects of the problem,

"Recalling its resolutions 424 (X) and 465 (XI) by which it decided to entrust the investigation of this problem to its next periodic Visiting Mission to the Trust Territories concerned, established the Visiting Mission's time-table, and requested it to submit a special report on the problem in time for consideration at a second part of its eleventh session,

"Having taken note of the special report of the United Nations Visiting Mission to Trust Territories in West Africa, 1952, on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem submitted in accordance with its resolutions 424(X) and 465(XI),

"1. Considers that this report represents an objective and detailed account of all aspects of the problem, and carefully sets forth the views of all sections of the population;

"2. Notes the Mission's conclusion that with certain exceptions, especially the peoples of the Northern Section of Togoland under British administration, the general demand for the unification of the two Togolands is gaining wider recognition, but that there is no one form of unification which would be acceptable to the majority of the inhabitants of the two Territories;

"3. Notes also that, although no general consultation of the population was made, the majority of the written communications received by the Mission were in favour of unification and independence;

"4. Notes that, in the time available to it, the Mission was not in a position to find out precisely which unification proposal enjoyed the widest support throughout the two Territories, but that, from the examination of the large mass of material available to it, it was of the opinion that there is not present in the two Territories wide enough support for any particular form of unification as to warrant alteration of the existing administrative arrangements;

"5. Notes the view of the Mission that in seeking a solution to the unification problem an enlightened and sound public opinion is highly necessary and the mission's consequent emphasis on an accelerated educational approach to the problem, as well as on the need for stable development in the political, economic and social fields, requiring unremitting efforts on the part of both the Administering Authorities and the more advanced sections of the populations;

"6. Notes with satisfaction that the view is widely held in the Territories that the Joint Council might be a valuable institution which could advise the Administering Authorities on matters of common concern to the two Trust Territories and could assist in harmonizing developments in the Territories;

"7. Concurs with the opinion of the Mission that the terms of reference of the Joint Council should specifically provide that the Council is empowered to discuss all political, economic, social and educational matters of common concern to the two Trust Territories;

"8. Invites the Administering Authorities to consult with each other and with the representatives of the peoples concerned with a view to bringing about possible modifications in the composition, functioning and powers of the Joint Council, necessary to realize its full potentialities;

Non-Self-Governing Territories and Trusteeship Questions

"9. Notes the Mission's conclusions that frontier difficulties are of secondary importance, that much has been done to eliminate or alleviate such difficulties, that there is scope for further action in this regard, as well as certain suggestions made by the Mission in this connexion;

"10. Considers that, in so far as the political aspects of this frontier problem are concerned, the primary responsibility of the Administering Authorities is not so much the devising of a solution as the development of such democratic indigenous institutions in both Territories that the various peoples involved can choose their own political associations; also that the Administering Authorities have in the meanwhile the responsibility to provide opportunities for co-operation between groups having common ties, even when they are separated by political boundaries;

"11. Considers that the indigenous leaders and the more advanced sections of the population can make an indispensable contribution to the effective realization of the popular will in this matter by devoting their best efforts to creating the conditions requisite to its exercise;

"12. Commends the report of the Visiting Mission, and especially its conclusions and recommendations, to the Administering Authorities and the inhabitants of the two Trust Territories concerned as a sound basis for working out political institutions that will permit the fullest self-expression of the various peoples involved within a framework of co-operation;

"13. Requests the Administering Authorities to report fully to the Council in advance of the next session of the General Assembly on all steps taken by them pursuant to this report;

"14. Transmits the Visiting Mission's report, along with this resolution, to the General Assembly as representing not only an objective appraisal of the diverse aspects of this problem but also suggesting the soundest approach to its solution consonant with the present diversity of views of the inhabitants of the two Trust Territories concerned."

As noted above, the Council had been asked by General Assembly resolution 555(VI) to submit a special report on all aspects of the Ewe and Togoland unification problem. A draft special report (T/L.334) informing the Assembly of the resolution adopted by the Council and transmitting the Mission's report on the unification problem was considered by the Council at its 459th and 460th meetings on 2 and 3 December. Proposals by the USSR representative—to insert in the special report (1) a statement (T/L.335) of views expressed by his delegation during the debate on the Mission's report, (2) the vote on the Council's resolution and (3) a statement that this resolution was adopted on the proposal of the United States—were rejected by the Council by 7 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, 9 votes to 1, and 8 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, respectively. It was decided, however, to append to the Council's special report a statement of the minority views of the representative of the USSR as follows:

"During the debate on the Visiting Mission's report, the representative of the USSR objected to the conclusions of the report and observed that the statements and memoranda of the most influential parties of Togoland, and the 2,479 individual petitions received by the Mission, proved that the vast majority of the Ewe people demand the unification of the Territories of Togoland and independence for their people.

"The representative of the USSR declared that he would vote against the draft resolution presented in connexion with the question under discussion, in so far as the resolution approves the conclusions of the Visiting Mission to Togoland, which are unacceptable to the delegation of the USSR."

The representative of the USSR informed the Council that he nevertheless intended to vote against the draft special report because it did not give an accurate account of the Council's discussions, did not specify the number of votes by which resolution 643(XI) had been adopted, and did not state the objections that some delegations had raised in that connexion.

The Council adopted its special report to the Assembly by 7 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, at its 460th meeting on 3 December 1952 (A/2289).

c. CONSIDERATION BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS SEVENTH SESSION

The special report of the Trusteeship Council on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem (A/2289) to the Assembly's seventh session was referred to the Fourth Committee, which considered it at the 300th to 308th meetings from 10 to 16 December.

(1) Consideration by the fourth Committee

Before discussing the Council's special report, the Fourth Committee considered requests for permission to make oral presentations to the Committee on the matter under consideration. At its 252nd, 263rd and 279th meetings, on 22 October, 4 and 19 November, it granted the requests. By a roll-call vote of 41 to 7, with 4 abstentions, it acceded to the request of the All-Ewe Conference. By a roll-call vote of 39 to 9, with 6 abstentions, the Committee decided to hear representatives of the Joint Togoland Congress, after rejecting, by a roll-call vote of 30 to 15, with 8 abstentions, an oral proposal by the United Kingdom that the Congress should be requested to address itself to the Trusteeship Council in the first instance. The Committee decided, without objection, to hear representatives of the Union des chefs et des populations du nord du Togo and the Parti togolais du progrès.

In addition to the special report of the Council, the Committee had before it, during its consideration of the question, the special report of the Visiting Mission (T/1034). In accordance with its decision at its 302nd meeting on 11 December, it also had before it an extract (A/C.4/223) from the memorandum of the All-Ewe Conference.¹³⁰

The Committee also had before it the observations of the United Kingdom (T/1039) on the Mission's report. These observations were transmitted to the Secretariat by letter of 9 December 1952.

The United Kingdom stated that it was impressed with the care and thoroughness of the Mission's investigations and its realistic and practical approach to its task. It considered that the Mission's report provided a valuable resume of the development of the unification question and an objective account of the state of opinion in Togoland under United Kingdom administration. In this connexion, it observed, the Mission's report revealed that about half the people of the Trust Territory actively desired integration in the Gold Coast; a further substantial number rejected unification of the two Trust Territories in any form; and, of the remainder, those who supported immediate unification of the Trust Territories, while vocal and active in propagating their views, found themselves in opposition, sometimes extending to violence, to a similarly vocal faction which considered unification a fairly long-term policy to be achieved with the assistance of the neighbouring Gold Coast. In the view of the United Kingdom, public opinion in the Trust Territory was not yet sufficiently clear as to the Territory's future to render it wise or right to take any steps at that stage committing the peoples of the Territory, perhaps irrevocably, to any future political organization. It could be clearly deduced from the Mission's report, the United Kingdom emphasized, that the people were not agreed, in principle or even in any expressed sentiment, as to what the future of their Territory should be.

The United Kingdom pointed out that it found itself in substantial agreement with the conclusions and suggestions made by the Mission and that it was prepared to accept those suggestions as a constructive contribution to assisting the peoples of the Togoland under United Kingdom administration to work out their own future by acquiring experience in the management of their own affairs.

(a) STATEMENTS BY THE PETITIONERS

At its 300th meeting on 10 December, the Committee heard statements by Silvanus Olympio, representing the All-Ewe Conference, and by

S. G. Antor and A. K. Odame, both representing the Joint Togoland Congress.¹³¹ At the 301st and 302nd meetings on 11 December, the representatives replied to questions of members of the Committee.

At the 304th and 305th meetings on 12 and 13 December, S. K. Kpodar, representing the Parti togolais du progrès and the Union des chefs du nord du Togo, made statements and replied to questions of members of the Committee.

Mr. Olympio told the Committee that, in January 1952, he had been asked by his party, the Comité de l'Unité togolaise, to tour the Ewe country and report on the action taken in connexion with the Ewe and Togoland unification problem by the General Assembly, whose sessions he had attended. In the French zone everything had been done by the local administration to make this tour difficult.

In March, he asserted, one of the most active secretaries of his party had been arrested, together with three others, on charges of spreading false news. In May, police broke into houses by night and conducted searches without warrants: men were arrested, locked in small cells for two days without water, then given a paper withdrawing their membership from the party, which they were told to sign. In August, a country-wide search of the houses of several active members of the unification movement was carried out. All documents and papers, including petitions prepared for the Trusteeship Council's Visiting Mission, were seized.

For the arrival of the Visiting Mission, in August, his party began to prepare for a big welcome rally which would confirm publicly to the Mission the ardent wish of the Ewe people to be united. The Governor of Togoland under French administration, however, warned that all public demonstrations were punishable by law, and the Administration began a process of intimidation designed to have the rally called off. To this end, military exercises were held within the perimeter of the town of Lome.

Mr. Olympio told the Committee that, at 3 a.m. on 21 August, the day the Mission was expected to arrive, police were out on all the main streets leading to the airport. They tore down banners from houses and called on householders to remove all unification slogans or signs of welcome from their walls. A double cordon of military personnel and gendarmes surrounded the airport and only about twenty of his party were allowed to reach it and stand outside the reception hall. The official cars were driven direct to the landing strip to prevent access to the Mission by the twenty men waiting. The procession route through the town was changed suddenly to avoid the crowd in the centre of the town and to bypass Government House. Truckloads of military units and gendarmes then arrived and attacked the crowds. For days afterwards military cars patrolled the streets, breaking up all gatherings. Householders were thrashed for writing "ablude" (freedom) on their walls.

¹³⁰ See p. 711.

¹³¹ At the 313th meeting on 19 December, after the Committee had concluded its discussion, Mr. Anku-Morny and Mr. Mbimadong, also representing the Joint Togoland Congress, made statements in which they thanked the Committee for giving consideration to the problems of Togoland.

Measures to prevent access to the Mission were taken in many parts of the Territory, Mr. Olympio alleged. He charged that these acts of intimidation and reprisal were calculated to make impossible an appraisal by the Mission of the strength and vigour of the unification movement. The Mission, however, could not ignore the fact that the majority of the Ewe people desired unification, he said.

The Ewe were a responsible people, placing their only hope of unification in the self-government or independence promised by the Charter of the United Nations, to which they now renewed their appeal. He asked the United Nations to grant independence to the Ewe people after a fixed period, which he suggested might be five years; during that time the Ewe country should be administered by a United Nations High Commissioner.

Mr. Antor said that his organization, the Joint Togoland Congress, had brought together all the political parties in Togoland under United Kingdom administration, comprising 295,000 members.

The Visiting Mission, he claimed, was unable during its ten-day stay in the Territory to meet any political party though some representatives did manage to meet the Mission despite the unco-operative attitude of the Administering Authority.

The independence and unification of Togoland was the one objective of the Congress, he said. Against the will of the majority, the Administering Authority had steadily been annexing British Togoland to the Gold Coast. Togoland would not be opposed in other circumstances to being associated with the Gold Coast in the march to self-government, provided there were certain guarantees, but the Ewe people on the French side of the frontier had to be considered. While it was the responsibility of the General Assembly to see that the separate status and identity of the Trust Territory of Togoland under United Kingdom administration was maintained, he said, the process of absorption by means of the administrative union was going on day after day and by one ordinance after another. The Visiting Mission was unable to achieve the purpose for which it had been sent; nevertheless, its report showed that the overwhelming majority of indigenous inhabitants in the Trust Territories wanted immediate reunification under direct United Nations administration for five years. The demand was for reunification. The manner in which this should be brought about was the business of the General Assembly.

Mr. Odame, also representing the Togoland Congress, charged that the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs, set up by the Administering Authorities primarily for harmonizing development policy in the two Trust Territories, had been deliberately rendered unworkable in order that it would be possible to contend that the people of Togoland lacked the maturity to handle their own affairs.

He contended, however, that, had the directives of the General Assembly been followed regarding the composition of the Joint Council and its functions, the Council could have achieved useful work.

The Administering Authorities had rejected demands for direct election of representatives and for equal representation for the two Territories on the Council. Its terms of reference had been whittled down, although the Assembly had specifically recommended their extension to consideration of all aspects of the unification question.

He supported charges of intimidation, arrests and attempts in French-administered Togoland to prevent contact with the Visiting Mission. The people desired unification but continuing obstruction under the current administration led them to ask that the two Territories be placed for a fixed period under direct United Nations administration until independence was granted.

Mr. Kpodar, representative of the Union des chefs du nord and Parti togolais du progrès said that he was not opposed to the unification of the two Trust Territories of Togoland, one under British administration and the other under French administration, but he considered that such unification should take place under French administration. The French-administered Trust Territory, he claimed, was more solid in its economic foundation and the only real independence was economic independence. The inhabitants of Togoland under French administration were prepared to accept some limitations of independence for the sake of the benefits of collectivity within the French Union. The framework of the French Union was sufficiently flexible to enable them to enjoy their aspirations. The vast majority wanted to live in peace within that framework.

He alleged that the All-Ewe Conference had committed acts of violence and disorder. Their proposal for the unification of the Ewe people was not shared by the majority in French-administered Togoland, particularly in the north. The Conference had changed its aim from one of the unification of the Ewe people to that of the unification of the two Togolands because it found that it no longer enjoyed popular support. Its real aim, he contended, was to achieve integration with the Gold Coast Colony.

Mr. Kpodar said that the two affiliated parties which he represented made up between 85 and 90 per cent of the total population. They did not support unification of the Ewe people; they wanted unification of the two Trust Territories of Togoland, training—under French administration—in self-government and progress towards independence. The people he represented hoped that the General Assembly would find an equitable solution to the problem. Economic independence was a prerequisite of political independence, and his people were eager to develop their productive capacity and markets for the goods produced. While big Powers were attempting to close their ranks and were agreeing to relinquish part of their sovereignty in federation, it would be Utopian to think that a very small state would survive on its own. Independence was compatible with membership of the French Union, he said.

Mr. Kpodar added that there had been all opportunities for contact with the Visiting Mission during its stay in French Togoland.

(b) STATEMENTS BY THE ADMINISTERING AUTHORITIES

At the 302nd and 303rd meetings on 11 and 12 December, statements were made by the representatives of the United Kingdom and France, Administering Authorities for the two Togolands.

The representative of the United Kingdom said that any proposal to amend the Trusteeship Agreements to establish a unified Togoland as a separate entity would be actively opposed by three quarters of the people of Togoland under British administration and that the United Kingdom could not possibly accept such a solution to the Ewe and Togoland unification problem. It was apparent beyond all doubt that about half the people of Togoland under United Kingdom administration desired complete integration with the Gold Coast. A further substantial number rejected unification—in any form—of that Trust Territory with the Trust Territory of Togoland under French administration. Of the remainder supporting unification, some found themselves in opposition, sometimes extending to violence, with a similarly active section of the population which considered unification to be a long-term policy to be achieved, if possible and desirable, without prejudice to continued close association with the neighbouring territory of the Gold Coast.

He added that the observations made by Mr. Antor had already been answered to a large extent by the observations of the United Kingdom Government on the special report on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem (T/1039). He rejected the contention of Mr. Antor that his party represented majority opinion throughout Togoland under United Kingdom administration. Moreover, the report of the Visiting Mission showed that it had received the fullest possible impression of the wishes and aspirations of the various parties and sections of the community in Togoland under British administration.

The Mission had concluded that northern Togoland under United Kingdom administration was strongly opposed to unification of the two Trust Territories and desired integration with the Gold Coast as soon as possible. This was the view of about half the total population. In the southern half of the Territory, unification of the two Togolands was opposed by the majority of the non-Ewe people. In the Ewe areas, the majority of the views recorded by the Mission in support of unification urged unification of the administration with the Gold Coast. The advocates of unification of the two Trust Territories in the Southern Section of British Togoland were sharply divided among themselves.

The United Kingdom representative considered that the failure of the Joint Council had been solely due to the refusal to give it a chance to fulfil its terms of reference, which were adequate.

The representative of France said that the Visiting Mission had had sufficient time to study the unification problem and that its report truthfully reflected the trends in the Territories. Its conclusions showed that the Ewe question was a real issue only within the United Nations and not in the Territories themselves. Three quarters of the population was hostile to the unification of the Ewes; they favoured the unification of the two Togolands, but not at the cost of absorption by a powerful neighbour. The majority rejected a form of trusteeship under the United Nations as against common sense and normal evolution. The possibility of giving more responsibility to the indigenous inhabitants of French Togoland was being considered and the only obstacle was the qualifications of the nominees.

He said that Togoland was prepared to sacrifice a certain amount of independence for the benefits to be derived from becoming a part of the French Union, within which the Territory could achieve economic independence—the only genuine independence. Togoland would appreciate an increased emphasis on economic and social development more than political powers which they could not properly exercise.

The movement for unification of the Ewe people, which, he stated, had been losing ground, had been broadened to involve the question of the unification of the two Togolands, in order to attract the attention of the United Nations. While all in Togoland were working for emancipation with self-government or independence the goal, they could not see the evolution of their country sacrificed to dreams of political independence. Temptation had been afforded those who wished merely to make personal publicity by the visit of Trusteeship Council Missions and international discussions within the General Assembly.

The representative of France stated further that the representatives of his Government in Togoland under French administration had desired to give the Mission complete freedom for their work. The Mission, however, had exercised elementary prudence and elementary good sense in not accepting an invitation to attend a rally which had been designed merely to exploit its presence for propaganda.

The French Parliament had done much in the interests of the people of Togoland. He claimed that agitation by the All-Ewe Conference clouded the benefits of French administration of the Trust Territory. Any refusal to participate in the proceedings of the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs on the grounds of disparity of representation constituted a rejection of an elementary principle of democracy—that majority interests should have majority representation.

(c) DISCUSSION IN THE FOURTH COMMITTEE

At its 305th to 308th meetings, from 13 to 16 December, the Fourth Committee held a general debate on the Ewe question.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR felt that the question involved the right of the Ewe people to existence, to self-determination and to independence. These representatives claimed that the artificial division of the Ewe people was obstructing their development in economic, social and cultural fields, contrary to the interests of the people themselves and to the principles of the United Nations Charter. The Administering Authorities were conducting a policy of attempting to divide and destroy this people. This policy of colonialism had been intensified during the last six years.

These representatives criticized the conclusions reached in the special report of the Visiting Mission. They asserted that the Mission had not devoted sufficient time to the study of the problem; that the Administering Authorities had taken measures of intimidation before the arrival of the Mission; that the Administering Authorities, further, encouraged organizations which represented the views of the colonial Powers and suppressed those which did not; and that the Mission itself refused all contact with the people to learn their wishes, adopting a subjective attitude in harmony with the policy of discrimination and thus becoming the mouthpiece of the Administering Authorities.

The representatives of Canada and New Zealand expressed the view that although the problems were manifold, responsibility for taking practical measures to meet those problems rested with the Administering Authorities. The representative of New Zealand said that an enlightened public opinion in the two Territories was essential to the solution of the problem of unification.

The representative of Venezuela, on the other hand, felt that, however eager the Administering Authorities might be to develop the economies of the Territories, their means were much less than those which international co-operation could furnish to an independent State. He advocated that the two Administering Authorities should concert their policies and endeavour to agree on a common attitude towards the administration of the two Territories, conforming to the principles and purposes of the Charter and to the Trusteeship Agreements.

The representative of Israel said that although the Committee had the warmest sympathy for the rightful aspirations of the Togoland, they should give proof of their political maturity. He suggested that their desire for unification might be demonstrated further by setting up joint voluntary institutions of an economic, social and cultural nature.

The representatives of Brazil, Guatemala, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, Syria, the United States and Yugoslavia were among those who also participated in the general debate. They made formal proposals for consideration by the Committee (see below).

(d) PROPOSALS BEFORE THE FOURTH COMMITTEE

A number of draft resolutions and amendments were presented to the Fourth Committee.

At the 306th meeting on 17 December, the United States introduced a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.256) whereby the General Assembly would:

(1) continue to urge, as set out in its resolution 555 (VI), that the two Administering Authorities concerned and the peoples involved should exert every effort to achieve a prompt, constructive and equitable settlement of the problem, taking fully into account the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned;

(2) express regret that the consultations undertaken by the Administering Authorities did not achieve the purpose set forth in that resolution, inasmuch as the election procedures devised did not result in the participation of all of the major groups in the two Trust Territories;

(3) recommend that the two Administering Authorities should carry on full and extensive consultations with the principal political parties in the two Territories and make every effort to bring about the re-establishment of the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs, or a similar body, on a basis which would enlist the co-operation of all major segments of the population so that it might be an effective and representative organ for the consideration, under broad terms of reference, of the common problems of the two Territories;

(4) urge all the principal parties in the two Territories to make every effort to assist constructively in these consultations;

(5) urge the two Administering Authorities to intensify their efforts to bring about the more rapid evolution of the northern parts of both Territories so that the peoples of these sections would be better qualified to play their role and express their views in the political development of the Territories;

(6) recommend that the two Administering Authorities concerned should examine further all the frontier difficulties complained of in the various petitions and communications on this matter sent to the Trusteeship Council and the Visiting Mission and that they should take all possible steps to reduce or eliminate them;

(7) note the view set forth in the observations of the United Kingdom (T/1039) that "during this period of trust the Administering Authority must provide political institutions, systems of education and information, and freedom of speech and political activity, which will enable the various political parties to place their programmes before the people of the Trust Territory and, by democratic methods, to seek to enlist the support of a majority of that people";

(8) recall statements of representatives of France in the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly to the effect that it was the policy of their Government to promote the development of representative political institutions and democratic political activity in the Trust Territories under French administration and that the people of these Territories would, when the period of trusteeship came to an end, have full freedom of choice as to the future political status of these Territories, whether in association with another political entity or otherwise;

(9) express its conviction that the implementation of such policies would provide conditions in which the inhabitants of the Trust Territories could determine their own political destiny;

(10) note that resolution 643 (XI), adopted at the eleventh session of the Trusteeship Council, requested the Administering Authorities to report fully to the Council in advance of the eighth session of the General Assembly on all steps taken by them pursuant to the special report of the 1952 Visiting Mission; and

(11) request the Administering Authorities to include in such reports steps taken by them pursuant to this resolution, as well as a full account of all factors affecting the unification question.

At the 308th meeting on 16 December, the United States submitted a revised draft resolution (A/C.4/L.256/Rev.1), which was further modified during the discussion. In its final form, the United States draft:

(1) Incorporated, as a paragraph of the revised draft, a draft resolution by Mexico (A/C.4/L.262), whereby the Assembly would invite the two Administering Authorities to give increasing attention to the possibilities of promoting and expediting the general development of the two Togolands through the United Nations Expanded Programme of technical assistance.

(2) Incorporated a Syrian amendment (A/C.4/L.263), whereby the Trusteeship Council would be requested to submit to the ninth session of the General Assembly a special report on the implementation by the Administering Authorities concerned of the current resolution and on the action taken by the Trusteeship Council in this connexion.

(3) Incorporated three further proposals, introduced by the United States representative himself:

(a) a paragraph recommending that the terms of reference of the Joint Council should enable it to make recommendations upon all political, economic, social and educational matters affecting the two Trust Territories, including the question of the unification of the two Territories; that membership of this body should fully reflect the views of all major groups in those Territories; and that any elections to this body should be conducted on a free and democratic basis;

(b) a paragraph, to which the sponsor accepted an oral drafting amendment by Iraq, recommending that the Administering Authorities take steps to promote common policies on political, economic and social matters of mutual concern to the two Trust Territories; and

(c) a revised paragraph to state that the Assembly considered that freedom of choice should be exercised through accepted democratic processes, in place of a paragraph which would express the Assembly's conviction that the implementation of the declared policies of the Administering Authorities would provide conditions in which the inhabitants of the Trust Territories could determine their own political destiny.

In the light of the revision of the original United States draft, two parts of a joint amendment by Brazil, Burma, Egypt, El Salvador, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Liberia, Pakistan and Yugoslavia (A/C.4/L.260) were withdrawn by the sponsors. The first would have recommended to the Administering Authorities that they extend the terms of reference of the Joint Council to enable it specifically and freely to discuss and make recommendations upon all political, economic, social and educational matters affecting the two Trust Territories, including the question of the unification of the two Territories. The other would have added a stipulation that accepted democratic processes should be the means by which the people in the Trust Territories should choose their future political status when the period of trusteeship came to an end.

When the Committee proceeded to vote, two amendments to the modified United States revised draft resolution remained:

(1) An amendment by Brazil, Burma, Egypt, El Salvador, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Liberia, Pakistan and Yugoslavia (A/C.4/L.260), whereby the Assembly would recommend that the Administering Authorities, with a view to bringing about modification in the composition, functioning and powers of the Joint Council indispensable to the realization of its full potentialities, reconstitute the joint Council by means of direct elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage exercised by secret ballot,

(2) An amendment by Guatemala (A/C.4/L.258) which would:

(a) Add to the preamble a statement that the Assembly bore in mind that the unification of the two Togolands was the manifest aspiration of all sections of the population of both Trust Territories (the representative of Guatemala later amended the text to read "the majority", instead of "all sections" of the population); and

(b) to add to the operative part a request to the Administering Authorities to enter into negotiations with a view to revising the Trusteeship Agreements relating to the two Togolands, with the object of making possible the unification of these two Territories under a single trusteeship administration, and to report to the Trusteeship Council on the outcome of their negotiations. (The representative of Guatemala, who had proposed this part of his amendment as a substitute for parts of the United States draft, accepted an oral suggestion that it be added, instead, to the United States draft).

(c) STATEMENTS BEFORE THE FOURTH COMMITTEE BY MEMBERS OF THE VISITING MISSION

The Chairman of the Visiting Mission to West Africa, 1952, R. A. Peachey (Australia), and a member of the Mission, Robert Scheyven (Belgium), made statements before the Fourth Committee when the Committee considered the draft report on its consideration of the Ewe and Togoland unification problem (A/C.4/L.266) to the General Assembly.

In his statement, Mr. Peachey said that certain criticisms of the Mission had been made during the debate on the Ewe and Togoland unification question casting reflections on members of the Mission.

While the Mission was in the two Trust Territories of Togoland, he said, it heard everyone who wished to address it and was always available to discuss the problems which political parties and other organizations, as well as individuals, wished to raise. The Mission insisted on being available to discuss problems with petitioners at all times.

The Mission had attended a large number of gatherings consisting of thousands of people, Mr. Peachey said, including one organized by the All-Ewe Conference. Referring to the claim that it had not accepted an invitation to attend a demonstration staged by the Conference at Lome on 23 August, he said that it was clear that the Mission was perfectly willing to attend mass demonstrations in Togoland under French administration, though not necessarily at the precise time suggested by the All-Ewe Conference. It attended all political rallies to which it was invited in Togoland under British administration. It seemed to some members of the Mission, he went on, that attendance at mass rallies was the least effective and most time-consuming method of work which it employed. The Mission rejected statements that it was influenced by the Administration, Mr. Peachey stated.

Regarding its non-attendance at a craft exhibition at Lome, he added, it was confirmed that this exhibition was a display of propaganda, and, in view of this misrepresentation, the Mission did not attend.

Mr. Scheyven said he was convinced that the Mission had served the interests of the indigenous inhabitants and the cause of the United Nations. The Mission had been accessible throughout its tour. The calumnies of the Mission during the debate, he stated, would not enhance the prestige of the United Nations in Africa.

(f) ACTION TAKEN BY THE FOURTH COMMITTEE

At its 308th meeting on 16 December, the Committee decided to vote separately on each paragraph of the revised United States draft and the amendments.

Twenty-six separate votes were recorded.

In a series of eight votes, varying from 43 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, to 48 votes to none, with one abstention, the Committee adopted the preamble. The Committee also adopted, by 33 votes to 2, with 13 abstentions, as an additional paragraph of the preamble, the relevant part of the Guatemalan amendment (A/C.4/L.258).

The ten-Power amendment recommending the reconstitution of the Joint Council by means of direct elections, based on universal adult suffrage exercised by secret ballot, was adopted by the Committee by a roll-call vote of 29 to 10, with 10 abstentions. The paragraph of the United States draft thus amended was adopted by 32 votes to 8, with 6 abstentions.

The Guatemalan amendment (A/C.4/L.258), requesting the Administering Authorities of the two Togolands to enter into negotiations aimed at a single trusteeship administration for these Territories, was adopted by the Committee on a roll-call vote of 18 votes to 13, with 18 abstentions.

The remaining paragraphs of the draft resolution were adopted in a series of votes ranging from 49 votes to none, to 43 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, and the draft resolution as a whole, as amended, by a roll-call vote of 30 votes to 11, with 9 abstentions.

Before the vote was taken on the draft resolution as a whole, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, the Dominican Republic, France, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States announced that, because of the adoption by the Committee of the two amendments, they would not be able to vote in favour of the resolution as amended.

(2) Consideration by the General Assembly in Plenary Session

The recommendation of the Fourth Committee (A/2335) was considered by the General Assembly at its 409th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952.

An amendment (A/L.139) to the draft resolution presented by the Committee was submitted jointly by Argentina and Venezuela. It would add to the recommendation concerning the reconstitution of the Joint Council the qualification that it should be re-established, as a first stage, as soon as possible.

Presenting the amendment, the representative of Venezuela said that the goodwill of the Administering Authorities concerned was essential to the peaceful solution of the problem. Any result achieved by other than peaceful methods raised far-reaching and serious problems. Adoption by the Assembly of the amendment would make the draft more effective, better balanced, and in closer conformity with the principle that efforts should be made to settle every dispute or difference peacefully, by negotiation and by reconciling the legitimate interests of the parties concerned. The representative of Venezuela added that his delegation felt little enthusiasm for that part of the draft which requested consideration by France and the United Kingdom of the possibility of considering revising the Trusteeship Agreements for the two Togolands under a single trusteeship administration.

The representative of Argentina, co-sponsor of the amendment, appealed to the Assembly to give full support to the amendment which, he said, represented a genuine compromise, presented with the objective of the co-operation of all Member States in achieving the aims and objectives of the Charter.

The representative of the United States recalled that although his delegation had initiated the original draft resolution in the Fourth Committee, certain amendments had been introduced which obliged him to vote against it in its existing form. Because he was anxious to see a concrete step taken in the matter, he welcomed the joint amendment. The United States representative supported the representative of Venezuela further in his criticism of that part of the draft which suggested consideration of the possibility of revising the Trusteeship Agreements. If the draft were amended in these two respects, he said, the United States would vote for the resolution.

The Assembly adopted, on a roll-call vote of 55 to none, with 4 abstentions, the joint Argentinian-Venezuelan amendment. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Liberia, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Turkey, Ukrainian SSR, Union of South Africa, USSR, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Belgium, Guatemala, Mexico, Yugoslavia.

In a separate roll-call vote, the Assembly, by 22 votes to 18, with 18 abstentions, rejected that part of the draft which would request the Administering Authorities to consider the possibility of uniting the two Togolands under a single trusteeship administration. Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Iran, Liberia, Mexico, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecudor, France, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Abstaining: Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Byelorussian SSR, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Greece, Iceland, Indonesia, Iraq, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, USSR.

The draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by the Assembly by roll-call vote of 55 to none, with 3 abstentions as resolution 652 (VII). Voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR, Union of South Africa, USSR, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Belgium, Norway, Peru.

The representative of France, explaining his vote in favour of the amended resolution, stated that he had done so only because of the attempt at realism reflected in the amendment. This amendment would make it possible, if the goodwill of the two Governments met with goodwill in other quarters, to put the Joint Council for Togoland Affairs into operation again as soon as possible, while the Governments concerned undertook the necessary consultations for the implementation of the resolution as a whole. Moreover, the French delegation did not wish to dissociate itself from the manifestation of a conciliatory spirit too remarkable and too rare to go unappreciated. He felt obliged, however, to recall the practical difficulties involved in putting into effect the recommendation even as amended. He expressed reservation with regard to the practical results of the complete, fair and thorough consultations with the peoples concerned which were to be undertaken as soon as possible.

Resolution 652 (VII) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having adopted at the sixth session resolution 555 (VI) on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem, which recommended, inter alia, that the Trusteeship Council arrange for the dispatch of either a special mission or its next periodic visiting mission to the two Trust Territories concerned to study thoroughly the Ewe and Togoland unification problem, including the functioning of the proposed Joint Council for Togoland Affairs and submit to the Trusteeship Council a detailed report thereon, including specific recommendations, which shall take full account of the real wishes and interests of the peoples concerned, and requested the Trusteeship Council to submit to the General Assembly at its seventh session a special report covering all aspects of the problem,

"Having received and examined the special report of the Trusteeship Council, including the resolution adopted by the Council at the second part of its eleventh session on 25 November 1952,

"Having similarly received and examined the special report of the United Nations Visiting Mission to Trust Territories in West Africa, 1952, on the Ewe and Togoland unification problem, transmitted to the Assembly by the Council with its aforementioned special report,

"Recalling statements of representatives of France in the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly to the effect that it is the policy of their Government to promote the development of representative political institutions and democratic political activity in the Trust Territories under French administration and that the people of these Territories will, when the period of trusteeship comes to an end, have full freedom of choice as to the future political status of these Territories, whether in association with another political entity or otherwise,

"Bearing in mind that the unification of the two Togolands is the manifest aspiration of the majority of the population of both Trust Territories,

"Desiring to promote the political advancement of the two Trust Territories and their freely expressed wishes in conformity with the basic objectives of the Trusteeship System as set forth in Article 76 of the Charter,

"10. Recommends that the two Administering Authorities, through the Joint Council or otherwise, take steps to promote common policies on political, economic, and social matters of mutual concern to the two Trust Territories;

"11. Notes that resolution 643(XI) of the Trusteeship Council requests the Administering Authorities to report fully to the Council in advance of the eighth session of the General Assembly on all steps taken by them pursuant to the special report of the 1952 Visiting Mission;

"12. Requests the Administering Authorities to include in such reports accounts of steps taken by them pursuant to the present resolution, as well as a full account of all factors affecting the unification question;

"13. Requests the Trusteeship Council to submit to the General Assembly at its next regular session a special report on the implementation by the Administering Authorities concerned of the present resolution and the action taken by the Council thereon."

F. GENERAL DISCUSSION OF CONDITIONS IN TRUST TERRITORIES

The general debate on the report of the Trusteeship Council (A/2150) took place at the 279th to 285th meetings of the Fourth Committee, from 19 November to 1 December 1952.

Speakers commented on conditions in the Trust Territories and on their administration, citing instances of particular Trust Territories. Comments and suggestions relating to the functioning of the International Trusteeship System and to the procedures and practices of the Trusteeship Council were also made. In addition, references were made to:

(1) administrative unions affecting Trust Territories; (2) the Ewe and Togoland unification problem; (3) the Wa-Meru land case in Tanganyika under United Kingdom Administration; and (4) the participation of indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the government of those Territories and in the work of the Trusteeship Council.¹³²

At the 279th meeting on 19 November, the Committee granted a request from the Italian Observer to the United Nations to participate in the discussion of the Council's report. At the 282nd meeting on 25 November, the representative of Italy outlined the work accomplished by the Italian Administration in Somaliland and plans for the administration of the Territory until it achieved independence in terms of General Assembly resolution 442(V). Italy's main objectives, he said, were to hasten, by all possible means, the economic and cultural advancement of Somaliland and to associate the indigenous inhabitants in the direction of public matters as soon as they attained the minimum qualifications.

The report of the Trusteeship Council was introduced in the Fourth Committee by the representative of Iraq, President of the Council. He pointed out that the purpose of the International Trusteeship System was the advancement of the people of the Trust Territories towards self-government and independence and that the Committee should be guided above all by consideration of the interests of those peoples. It was also necessary that there should be co-operation and understanding between the Administering and non-Administering Powers. Many non-Administering Powers took a special interest in the attainment of self-government by the Trust Territories because they themselves had spent long periods under colonial rule. They also believed that nationalism had become a potent world force and that national aspirations must be genuinely satisfied if peace were to be secured. The Administering Powers, he said, should make every effort to understand that view. The non-Administering Powers, on the other hand, should consider carefully the practicability of any recommendations they might wish to make.

The representatives of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom maintained that they were loyally carrying out policies in accordance with the aims and ideals of the Charter and that, although every obstacle could not be overcome as quickly as might be desired, they had been active in promoting progress in economic, social, educational and political fields. They felt that such progress had been considerable and affirmed that they would continue to pursue policies in the interests of the indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories. They gave an account of conditions in some of the particular Territories for the administration of which they were responsible. The representative of Denmark also expressed the view that the report of the Council showed that considerable progress had been made, particularly in the development of the economic life of the Territories, which, he said, was basic to a sound development of all other aspects of life.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR, on the other hand, maintained that Administering Members were systematically violating both the provisions of the Charter and the International Trusteeship System. In the economic field, those representatives held, the Territories were being exploited as sources of raw materials and as strategic bases; industrialization was merely for the benefit of the Metropolitan Powers; wages were low and the indigenous inhabitants were being used as a source of cheap labour; heavy taxes were imposed and living standards depressed; and land was being alienated in the interests of "settlers". In the social field, they held, discrimination was practised, trade unions discouraged and corporal punishment maintained. In education, services were poor and the development of national cultures stifled. Politically, they stated, the indigenous inhabitants were being deprived of their rights: representation was non-existent or inadequate; Administering Members were maintaining the tribal system and discouraging the establishment of democratic institutions, to the detriment of the indigenous inhabitants.

The representative of Yugoslavia, who approved of the report, said that progress in the Trust Territories was below the minimum which should have been attained. Economic conditions, he said, were not conducive to the promotion of economic independence; serious problems in the social and educational fields had not been solved; politically, the limited participation of indigenous inhabitants in the administration of their own affairs was a most disturbing factor.

Several delegations emphasized that self-government or independence should be granted to the Trust Territories at the earliest possible date under conditions of order and stability, with assurances of adequate standards of living. The representatives of Afghanistan, Burma, India, Indonesia and Syria stressed that national aspirations had to be taken into account if peace were to be safeguarded, as the desire for self-government could not be shelved. The representative of Afghanistan suggested that dates should be set by Administering Members, indicating when the Territories for whose administration they were responsible could be expected to achieve independence or self-government.

The representatives of Argentina, Brazil and China were among those who said that although good results had been achieved in some Territories, that progress was not enough. The representative of China appealed to the Administering Members for co-operation in bringing about accelerated development in the Trust Territories.

Regarding political progress generally, the representatives of Burma, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Syria felt that it was either lacking or insufficient. More posts in the administration of Trust Territories, the representatives of Burma and Syria urged, should be given to indigenous inhabitants. The representative of Pakistan stated that the development of political associations should be encouraged by Administering Members. The representative of Saudi Arabia contended that authority should be transferred more rapidly to local authorities in the Territories. The representative of Argentina asked Administering Members to introduce universal suffrage.

Referring to reported economic progress in some Territories, the representatives of Egypt, Indonesia and the Philippines questioned whether such progress had been to the benefit of the indigenous inhabitants. The representatives of Burma, India, Indonesia, Pakistan and Syria stressed that economic progress had been uneven. Further economic progress, the representative of Syria maintained, should have been shown. The representative of Pakistan felt that economic and political progress should keep an even pace.

In the social field, some representatives, including those of Argentina and Burma, emphasized the need to improve conditions of public health. Education and communications, the representative of Argentina felt, were fields closely linked to that of health. The abolition of discrimination in any form was urged by the representatives of Indonesia, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia.

Frequent reference was made by speakers to the responsibility of the General Assembly in respect of conditions in Trust Territories, particularly in the matter of recommendations and resolutions, as well as the role of the Trusteeship Council and the Council's Visiting Missions in the development and strengthening of the International Trusteeship System. Statements concerning the treatment of petitions to the United Nations were made both during the general debate on the Council's report and during the consideration of requests to the Fourth Committee for oral hearings.¹³³

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR contended that, although Administering Members were responsible for promoting the progressive development of the Trust Territories towards independence, there was also a responsibility on the part of the General Assembly to help the inhabitants of those Territories to achieve political and economic independence. The Assembly, accordingly, was called upon to take any action which would ensure the well-being of the indigenous inhabitants. The representatives of Egypt, the Philippines and Saudi Arabia also felt that no attempt should be made to curb the responsibilities of the Fourth Committee in favour of the Trusteeship Council. The representative of Yugoslavia expressed the view that it was the duty of all Member States to contribute to the common aims of the Trusteeship System.

The representative of Brazil said that equal representation of Administering and non-Administering Members on the Trusteeship Council had tended to make the Council conservative. The General Assembly, as a result, became impatient with the slow pace at which the Territories were advancing towards self-government or independence. The large number of petitions with which the United Nations was now confronted, he added, seemed to indicate dissatisfaction with the action of the Council. It was asserted by the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR, among others, that the Council was ignoring petitions of vital interest to the indigenous inhabitants. The Council, they contended, acted under pressure from Administering Members, who formed half the Council, and failed to prevail on Administering Members to fulfil their obligations. The representative of Yugoslavia said that his delegation was satisfied neither with the Council's approach to various problems, its handling of petitions, nor the manner in which it had tried to solve the problems within its competence under the Charter and those entrusted to it by the General Assembly.

A number of representatives emphasized that the Trusteeship Council should not become merely a "rubber-stamp", by receiving petitions, requesting Administering Members concerned for their views on the matters raised in the petitions, and handing down the views of the Administering Members to the petitioners concerned. The representative of India wondered whether the Trusteeship Council was providing the dynamic guidance required, or merely lapsing into a routine handling of petitions. It was the duty of the Trusteeship Council, he said, to ensure that the Administering Members were carrying out their obligations and the duty of the United Nations to assure petitioners that the United Nations was serious in its intentions in the examination of petitions. Among other representatives calling for improved procedure in the handling by the Council of petitions were those of Afghanistan, Egypt, Haiti, Pakistan and the Philippines. Several delegations, including China, the Dominican Republic and Saudi Arabia, urged the protection of the right of petition. The representative of Burma stated that the right of petition was insufficiently known in the Trust Territories. The representative of Indonesia urged that more publicity be given to the views of petitioners, in both the reports of the Trusteeship Council and those of the Visiting Missions.

The representatives of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom said that the work of the Council represented a conscientious approach to some of the most difficult problems of modern times. Its work was not routine performance and attacks on the Council for failing to fulfil its tasks were unwarranted. It was also unfounded to suggest that the non-Administering Members of the Council were too conciliatory in their attitude to the Administering Members, they said. The Council was faithfully performing the task to which it had been entrusted and proper consideration was being given to all petitions.

The representative of the Dominican Republic said that an analysis of trends in the Trusteeship System was extremely complex and involved numerous substantive, legal and humanitarian problems and many questions of political, economic and social policy. That, he said, should not be forgotten when criticisms were levelled at the Trusteeship Council and its work. He appealed for increased confidence in the Council and for a just and realistic appreciation of the difficulties.

On the question of the Visiting Missions, the representative of the Dominican Republic added that the latest report of a Visiting Mission—the Mission to West Africa (T/1034)¹³⁴—gave undoubted proof of the revitalized activities of one of the mainstays of the Trusteeship System.

The representatives of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom also supported the work of the Visiting Missions. Criticism alleging their partiality could not be accepted, they said.

Such criticism was made during the general debate by the representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR. The Visiting Missions, they held, were ineffective and failed to take into account the legitimate wishes of the indigenous inhabitants. Their reports were not sufficiently objective and they merely contained recommendations which reflected favourably on the Administering Members concerned.

The representatives of Egypt and Indonesia referred to the difficulties encountered by the Visiting Missions, including the fact that the Missions had too little time to accomplish their tasks. Participation by the indigenous inhabitants in the work of the Visiting Missions was urged by the representative of Brazil. The representatives of China, Haiti and Pakistan felt that the Assembly should be kept informed of any action taken by Administering Members on the basis of recommendations made by the Visiting Missions, together with information on the implementation by such Members of Assembly and Trusteeship Council resolutions and recommendations.

G. PARTICIPATION OF THE INDIGENOUS INHABITANTS OF THE TRUST TERRITORIES IN THE GOVERNMENT OF THOSE TERRITORIES AND IN THE WORK OF THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

By resolution 554(VI) of 18 January 1952,¹³⁵ the General Assembly, after setting forth several considerations concerning the desirability of directly associating the indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the work of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies, invited the Trusteeship Council to examine the possibility of associating the inhabitants of the Trust Territories more closely in its work and to report the results of its examination of the problem to the Assembly at its seventh session.

1. Consideration by the Trusteeship Council at its Tenth and Eleventh Sessions

At its tenth session, the Council considered the question at its 389th, 408th and 409th meetings on 3, 26 and 27 March.

Opening the discussion, the representative of the USSR introduced a draft resolution (T/L.239), by which the Council would decide that the populations of the Trust Territories had the right, in the name of their social, cultural and educational organizations and of their representative organs of self-government, to send their representatives to participate without vote in the consideration by the Council of the annual reports of Administering Authorities and of all other questions relating to the Trust Territories. He stated that according to the Charter the indigenous peoples of the Trust Territories were to play an active part in the administration of their own country and to share in the making of decisions of direct concern to their Territories. Participation of the indigenous peoples in the Council's work was therefore of primary importance.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium and France opposed the USSR draft and also criticized Assembly resolution 554(VI), stating that there were no provisions in the United Nations Charter, the Trusteeship Agreements or the rules of procedure of the Council which afforded a basis for the proposal contained in the Assembly resolution. They also maintained that the Administering Authorities alone had the right to decide the form of the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the Council's work as the Administering Authorities were the sole representatives of the people in the Trust Territories under their jurisdiction. They were opposed to the creation of "associate members" of the Council.

¹³⁴ See pp. 710-14.

¹³⁵ See Y.U.N., 1951, p. 791.

The representative of Iraq expressed the view that the Assembly resolution was not so radical or unconstitutional as it might appear; it did no more, he said, than invite the Council to study the possibility of associating the inhabitants of the Trust Territories more closely in its work. He felt that the views expressed could be reconciled, and he accordingly submitted a draft resolution (T/L.240/Rev.1) in terms of which the Council would recommend that the Administering Authorities associate—whether on their own initiative or on a request from the Council—members of indigenous organizations, of political, social or cultural character, with the work of the Council, whether as part of their delegations or in any other form which they deemed desirable. (This proposal, however, was later withdrawn.)

At the 408th meeting of the Council on 26 March, the representative of El Salvador stated that he considered that neither the draft resolution by Iraq nor that by the USSR exactly corresponded to the intention expressed by the Assembly in resolution 554 (VI), namely that the Council should consider the possibility of associating the indigenous inhabitants more closely with its work. The USSR draft, he said, proposed to grant the indigenous inhabitants a right which, under the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreements, belonged only to the Administering Authorities. While he was sympathetic with the idea that the indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories should acquire a greater knowledge of the work of the Council, he did not feel that the Assembly resolution called for direct and immediate action by the Council. He therefore submitted an oral draft resolution in terms of which the Council would appoint a six-member committee to study the question in the light of the Assembly resolution and the observations made and to report to the Council at its eleventh session. The Council, he added, would thus be able to report to the Assembly at its seventh session, in accordance with resolution 554(VI).

At the suggestion of the representative of Thailand, the representative of El Salvador agreed to add to his draft resolution the words: "and in the light of any observations the Administering Authorities may wish to make."

After the representatives of France, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States had expressed support for the draft resolution submitted by El Salvador, the Council, at its 408th meeting, adopted it by 8 votes to none, with 4 abstentions (resolution 426(X)), and, at its 409th meeting on 27 March, appointed as members of the Committee the representatives of El Salvador, France, Iraq,¹³⁶ Thailand, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Resolution 426(X) read:

"The Trusteeship Council

"1. Decides to establish a committee composed of six members to study the possibility of associating more closely the inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the work of the Council and to examine this question in the light of resolution 554(VI) of the General Assembly, the observations made by members of the Council during the discussion on this matter and in the light of comments which the Administering Authorities may care to make;

"2. Instructs the Committee to submit its report to the Council at its next session."

At its eleventh session, the Council considered the report of the Committee (T/L.317) at its 454th meeting on 23 July.

The Committee recommended the adoption by the Council of a draft resolution expressing the hope that the Administering Authorities would find it appropriate to associate suitably qualified indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the work of the Council, as part of their delegations or in any other manner which they might deem desirable.

The representative of the USSR, who opposed the recommendation of the Committee on the ground that it would not ensure the participation of the true representatives of the indigenous inhabitants in the work of the Council, re-submitted his draft resolution (T/L.239) which had been before the Council at its tenth session. The Council, however, by 9 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, rejected the Soviet draft and adopted the Committee's recommendation by 7 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions (resolution 466(XI)). It read:

"The Trusteeship Council,

"Having considered General Assembly resolution 554 (VI) of 18 January 1952, inviting the Trusteeship Council to examine the possibility of associating the inhabitants of the Trust Territories more closely in its work,

"Considering Article 76 of the Charter of the United Nations defining the essential objectives of the Trusteeship System,

"Considering Article 86 of the Charter of the United Nations fixing the composition of the Trusteeship Council,

"Recognizing that each Member of the United Nations has the unrestricted right to determine the composition of its delegations, ¹³⁶At its 414th meeting on 6 June the Council appointed the representative of the Dominican Republic as a member of the Committee, to replace the representative of Iraq, who had resigned.

Non-Self-Governing Territories and Trusteeship Questions

"Considering that it is desirable that the indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories be given every opportunity to develop their preparation in public affairs,

"Is of the opinion that the objective sought by General Assembly resolution 554(VI) could best be realized by the inclusion, where practicable and appropriate, of indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the respective delegations nominated to the Trusteeship Council by the Administering Authorities;

"Expresses the hope that the Administering Authorities will find it appropriate to associate suitably qualified indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the work of the Trusteeship Council as part of their delegations or in any other manner which they deem desirable."

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

At its 296th meeting on 8 December, the Assembly's Fourth Committee, during its discussion of the report of the Trusteeship Council (A/-2150), considered an eleven-Power proposal concerning the question of participation.

The draft resolution, presented by Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Guatemala, Indonesia, Syria, Yemen and Yugoslavia, (A/C.4/L.249 and A/C.4/L.249/Rev.1) would:

(1) express the opinion that the objects of Assembly resolution 554(VI) would be better achieved through the active participation of members of the indigenous population of the Trust Territories in the government of these Territories and in the work of the Trusteeship Council;

(2) request the Council to associate the indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories directly in its work by inviting one qualified member of the indigenous population of each Territory, with the right to speak but not to vote, to take part in the examination and discussion of the annual report of the Administering Authority, though not in discussions directed towards specific conclusions concerning the particular Territory, the said member to be duly selected from the leading political parties and from indigenous cultural, social or economic organizations; and

(3) invite the Administering Authorities to make such participation feasible by granting the necessary facilities and by co-operating to give effect to this resolution.

Support for the eleven-Power draft was expressed by the representatives of Mexico, Saudi Arabia and the USSR, among others. These representatives felt that the draft would provide an effective measure to ensure participation and bring closer the goal of self-government or independence for the inhabitants of the Trust Territories, thus contributing to the achievement of the aims and objectives of the Charter. There were no valid legal or constitutional objections to the proposals, these representatives maintained.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, China, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and the United States opposed the eleven-Power draft. They maintained that the draft was unconstitutional; that the Administering Authorities were responsible for deciding what was appropriate and practicable concerning their representation on the Trusteeship Council; that more time should be allowed for effecting the provisions of Trusteeship Council resolution 466(XI), of 23 July 1952 (see above), on participation; and that the Visiting Missions of the Council provided opportunity for all the inhabitants of Trust Territories to place their views before the United Nations.

At the 297th meeting on 8 December, the sponsors of the eleven-Power draft submitted a further revision (A/C.4/L.249/Rev.2) of their draft resolution. The revision would, among other things, after stating that the Assembly considered that its wishes (concerning participation) had not yet been met, amend the proposed request to the Trusteeship Council by asking it to allow representatives of the indigenous inhabitants of each Territory to participate, at their request, with the right to speak but not to vote, in the examination and discussion of the annual report of the Administering Authority, though not to take part in discussion directed to specific conclusions concerning the particular Territory.

The USSR submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.250) which would extend participation to all questions, and not limit it, as in the eleven-Power draft, to participation in questions other than discussions directed towards specific conclusions. The Soviet amendment would also ask that selection of the representatives be made, in addition, from representative organs of self-government where these existed in the Territory concerned. The USSR later revised (A/C.4/L.250/Rev.1) its amendment to make it applicable to revisions in the eleven-Power draft, but the Committee did not vote on the amendment as those parts which it sought to amend were not adopted (see below).

The United States presented an amendment (A/C.4/L.252) which would replace that part of the preamble of the eleven-Power draft stating that the Assembly considered that its wishes (concerning participation) had not yet been met, with the statement that the Assembly took into account the fact that there had not yet been opportunity for action to be taken pursuant to Trusteeship Council resolution 466(XI). The United States amendment would also delete all operative paragraphs of the eleven-Power draft, replacing them with provisions inviting the Administering Authorities to give careful attention to the hope expressed by the Council that the Administering Authorities would find it appropriate to associate suitably qualified indigenous inhabitants in the work of the Council as part of their delegations or in any other manner which they deemed advisable. The United States amendment would also request the Council to include in its reports to the Assembly information taken on action pursuant to resolution 466(XI) and the current resolution.

The representatives of Argentina, Israel and Uruguay, expressing support for the United States amendment, felt that its adoption would increase the possibilities of achieving the objectives desired.

The representative of Iraq stated that two tendencies, both natural and legitimate, were being manifested: one to secure the greatest participation of the indigenous inhabitants, the other, mainly on the part of Administering Authorities, to adhere to the Trusteeship Agreements. The representative of Venezuela proposed orally that the provisions of both the eleven-Power draft and the United States amendment be combined in a single resolution. The representative of the United States, however, said that there were certain fundamental difficulties, which the Venezuelan proposal did not remove.

By a roll-call vote of 22 to 19, with 9 abstentions, the Committee, at its 299th meeting on 9 December, adopted the United States amendment to the preamble of the eleven-Power draft. The remainder of the preamble was adopted by 44 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. In terms of the amended preamble, the Assembly would state that it took into account the fact that there had not yet been opportunity for action pursuant to Trusteeship Council resolution 466 (XI).

By 33 votes to 12, with 4 abstentions, the Committee adopted that part of the eleven-Power draft which expressed the opinion that the objects of Assembly resolution 554(VI) on participation would be better achieved through the active participation of members of the indigenous population of the Trust Territories in the government of those Territories and in the work of the Trusteeship Council.

The Committee adopted, by 25 votes to 21, with 4 abstentions, the United States proposals as substitute provisions for the remainder of the draft. The United States provisions were that the Administering Authorities be invited to consider associating suitably qualified indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the work of the Council.

The joint draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by the Committee by a roll-call vote of 25 to 1, with 24 abstentions, and by the General Assembly, without discussion, at its 410th plenary meeting on 21 December, by 36 votes to 1, with 19 abstentions (resolution 653(VII)). It read.

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolution 554(VI) of 18 January 1952 inviting the Trusteeship Council to examine the possibility of associating the inhabitants of the Trust Territories more closely in its work,

"Bearing in mind the basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System enumerated in Article 76 of the Charter,

"Considering it both desirable and necessary that the indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories should have every opportunity of developing their ability to take charge in due course of the public affairs of their Territories,

"Noting the consideration given to this question by the Trusteeship Council at its tenth and eleventh sessions, and resolution 466(XI) adopted by the Council on 23 July 1952,

"Taking into account the fact that there has not yet been opportunity for action to be taken pursuant to this resolution,

"1. Expresses the opinion that the objects of resolution 554(VI) would be better achieved through the active participation of members of the indigenous population of the Trust Territories in the government of those Territories and in the work of the Trusteeship Council;

"2. Shares the hope expressed by the Trusteeship Council in resolution 466(XI) that the Administering Authorities will find it appropriate to associate suitably qualified indigenous inhabitants of the Trust Territories in the work of the Trusteeship Council as part of their delegations or in any other manner which they deem desirable;

"3. Invites the Administering Authorities to give careful attention to Trusteeship Council resolution 466 (XI) and to the present resolution with a view to giving effect to the suggestions contained therein;

"4. Requests the Trusteeship Council to include in its reports to the General Assembly information on action taken pursuant to resolution 466(XI) and to the present resolution."

H. ADMINISTRATIVE UNIONS AFFECTING TRUST TERRITORIES

By resolution 536(VI)¹³⁷ adopted on 18 January 1952, the General Assembly requested the Trusteeship Council to submit to the seventh Assembly session a special report containing a complete analysis of each of the administrative unions to which a Trust Territory is a party,¹³⁸ and of the status of the Trust Territories of the Cameroons and Togoland under French Administration, arising out of their membership in the French Union.

The Assembly further requested that the analysis should have special reference to:

(1) the compatibility with the United Nations Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement of the arrangements already made; and (2) certain considerations enumerated in an earlier Assembly resolution concerned with administrative unions (resolution 326(IV)).¹³⁹ These considerations, among other things, related to the desirability of: (a) having the Administrative Authorities inform the Council before they created new administrative unions or extended the scope of existing administrative unions; (b) partial Council supervision, with concurrence of the Administering Authority, over the unified administration in cases in which, as a consequence of an administrative union, it was impossible to furnish clear and precise data relating to a Trust Territory; (c) the establishment of separate judicial organizations in each Territory and of establishing a separate legislative body with increasing powers and with headquarters within the Trust Territory; and (d) taking into account the freely expressed wishes of the inhabitants of a Trust Territory before forming or extending any administrative, customs or fiscal union.

1. Consideration by the Trusteeship Council and the Committee on Administrative Unions

The Council referred the question to its Standing Committee on Administrative Unions, which submitted to the Council, at its 454th meeting on 23 July 1952, its regular reports on the operation of administrative unions affecting New Guinea (T/969 and Corr.1), Ruanda-Urundi (T/1011), Tanganyika (T/1017 and Corr.1), Togoland under United Kingdom Administration (T/1020 and Corr.1), and Cameroons under United Kingdom Administration (T/1022 and Corr.1), as well as a draft report (T/1026 and Add.1) paying special attention to the considerations mentioned in Assembly resolution 563(VI) and to the compatibility of the arrangements with the interests of the inhabitants of the Trust Territories concerned.

On the basis of recommendations contained in the draft report by its Standing Committee, the Council, at the same meeting, adopted a special report to the Assembly (A/2151), after rejecting, by 7 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions, a proposal by the USSR that the Council should instead adopt a resolution recommending the Administering Authorities of Tanganyika, New Guinea, Ruanda-Urundi, Togoland and the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration and Togoland and the Cameroons under French administration to establish in the above-mentioned Trust Territories legislative and administrative organs not subordinate to any organs established on the basis of a union of Trust Territories with colonies, and for that purpose to take legislative and other measures to ensure the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the legislative, executive and judicial organs of the Trust Territories.

Also in terms of resolution 563(VI), the General Assembly had established a committee composed of Belgium, Brazil, India and the United States to make a preliminary examination of the special report of the Council and to present its observations to the Assembly at its seventh session. The Committee on Administrative Unions thus established by the Assembly held eleven meetings, from 23 September to 7 October 1952 and reported (A/2217) accordingly. The observations and recommendations of the Council and of the Committee concerning particular Territories are given below under their respective headings. An account of the general observations of the Committee and the draft resolution it recommended for adoption by the Assembly is given separately.

a. THE ADMINISTRATIVE UNION AFFECTING THE TRUST TERRITORY OF TANGANYIKA

In its report on the Trust Territory of Tanganyika (T/1017 and Corr.1), the Council's Standing Committee on Administrative Unions noted that certain petitions (T/Pet.2/120 and 130)¹⁴⁰ alleged, among other things, that discrimination against inhabitants of Tanganyika existed in the amalgamated services of the East Africa Inter-Territorial Organization in the matter of wages, positions and dismissals. The Standing Committee took note of the observations of the Administering Authority (T/953/Add.4), in which it stated:

¹³⁷ See Y.U.N., 1951, p. 782.

¹³⁹ See Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 777-78.

¹⁴⁰ For names of petitioners, see Annex.

(1) that express provision was made in those services for promotion on grounds of personal qualifications; (2) that there were differences between salary scales in the High Commission services and those in the Tanganyika departmental services, but generally the actual scales were not very dissimilar; (3) that, whereas in the Tanganyika departmental organization the service was on a non-racial basis, with salary scales varying according to the nature of the post, the scales applicable to the High Commission services retained a racial element; and (4) that, in the interests of greater efficiency, certain redundant services had been discontinued or amalgamated but none of the employees affected had had any difficulty in transferring to other employment.

The Council felt that the Administering Authority should take all possible steps to ensure that the employment conditions prevailing for the inhabitants of Tanganyika in the services of the High Commission were no less favourable than those enjoyed by the inhabitants in the service of the Government of Tanganyika.

The Assembly's Committee on Administrative Unions, noting this part of the Council's report, observed that the Council should be requested to pay further attention to this problem and to continue to urge the Administering Authority in the manner indicated.

The Administering Authority observed (T/997) that the question of industrial licensing in the administrative union affecting Tanganyika was kept constantly under review to ensure that the system did not operate to the disadvantage of the Territory or discourage local initiative. The current system of licensing, with which the East African Industrial Council was concerned, had exercised no influence on the economic development of Tanganyika and there was no intention at that time of widening the scope of the system, the Administering Authority stated. Existing territorial legislation on the subject was not considered satisfactory and the draft of a new Ordinance was under consideration.

The Trusteeship Council, noting the statement, felt that, as long as it did not have sufficient information concerning the operation of the Industrial Council, it was unable to assess properly the activities of that body. It expressed the hope that the minutes of the Industrial Council would be made available. The Trusteeship Council also noted that, as far as it was aware, the Industrial Council had confined its activities to licensing only. It is expressed the hope that the Administering Authority, in preparing the draft of a new Ordinance, would take all possible steps to ensure that the future economic interests of the Trust Territory were fully safeguarded and that consideration would be given to adequate participation in the activities of the Industrial Council of suitably qualified representatives of the indigenous population of the Trust Territory.

The Assembly's Committee on Administrative Unions, in turn, observed that this important matter should be kept under constant review by the Trusteeship Council and that the Administering Authority should be invited to give particular attention to the recommendations of the Council on this subject.

At its eleventh session, the Council noted the provisions of the East Africa (High Commission) (Amendment) Order-in-Council, 1951, continuing the operation of the East Africa Central Legislative Assembly until 31 December 1955, and expressed the opinion that this extension for a further four years might not be disadvantageous to the development of the Trust Territory. The Council also noted:

(1) that the African representatives on the Legislative Council of Tanganyika had supported the proposal for continuation; (2) the statement of the special representative of the Administering Authority, made to the Standing Committee on 11 June 1952, that all administrative officials had been instructed to explain the question of continuation to the African people and that no unfavourable reaction had been elicited; and (3) that a number of petitions (T/Pet.2/113, 120, 130 and 134) had raised objections concerning the Inter-Territorial Organization.

The Council expressed the opinion that it was not yet fully informed concerning the means taken by the Administering Authority to ascertain the freely expressed wishes of the people and hoped that the Administering Authority would take all possible steps to inform the people concerning the operations and implications of the administrative union and consult with them before any review of the current arrangements was undertaken. It requested the Administering Authority to furnish it regularly with detailed information on the actions taken in this respect.

The Assembly's Committee on Administrative Unions, noting the observations of the Trusteeship Council, observed that the Administering Authority should be requested to inform the Council before undertaking any further extension or modification of the existing arrangements which might affect the status of the Trust Territory. It also observed, in this connexion, that the Trusteeship Council should be requested to continue to study further this question and that the Administering Authority should be requested to consider the possibility of devising procedures to enable the inhabitants to express, in as democratic a manner as possible, their opinion concerning the East Africa Inter-Territorial Organization.

Regarding the Assembly's request to the Council to make particular reference in its special report to the compatibility with the provisions of the United Nations Charter and the Trusteeship Agreement of arrangements already made, the Council, at its eleventh session, recognized that the common customs, fiscal and administrative services organized on an inter-territorial basis might have definite advantages to the individual Territories participating in such arrangements. It also recognized that such arrangements should not, in any way, interfere with the progressive development of a Trust Territory and that its interests should not be subordinated to the interests of any of the other Territories participating in the administrative union. With these observations, the Council expressed the opinion that the instruments establishing the Inter-Territorial Organization did not appear to be incompatible with the United Nations Charter and with the Trusteeship Agreement for Tanganyika. It was not firmly convinced, however, that some of the operations under the East African Territorial Organization, including the operations of the East African Industrial Council, might not prejudice the future economic development of the Trust Territory. It remained, therefore, of the opinion that all the operations of the administrative union affecting Tanganyika should be continually examined so as to ensure that the inter-territorial arrangements did not interfere with the objectives of the Trusteeship System.

The Council, in resolution 293 (VII)¹⁴¹ of 17 July 1950, had enumerated certain safeguards which it considered necessary to assist the Council in discharging its functions and to avoid the possibility of any administrative union operating in such a manner as to prejudice the objectives of the Trusteeship System. These safeguards required, with respect to any Trust Territory participating in an administrative union:

(1) that the Administering Authority furnish clear and precise separate financial and statistical and other data relating to the Trust Territory; (2) that Visiting Missions be allowed access to any information necessary on an administrative union to enable it to report fully on the Trust Territory; (3) that the boundaries, separate status and identity of the Trust Territory be maintained; and (4) that expenditures on the administration, welfare and development of a Trust Territory for a given year amount at least to the total public revenue derived from the Territory in that year.

At its eleventh session, the Council made observations concerning the general safeguards in respect of Tanganyika. The Council:

(1) noted that some services under the East Africa High Commission were so closely integrated that it was impracticable to give separate financial figures for the Trust Territory of Tanganyika alone; (2) noted a statement made by the representative of the United Kingdom to the Council's Standing Committee on Administrative Unions that the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Administrator of the East Africa High Commission would always be pleased to receive future Visiting Missions to Tanganyika; (3) observed that no information existed which would suggest that the boundaries of Tanganyika had not been maintained; and (4) noted that the expenditures on the administration, welfare and development of Tanganyika for 1950, 1951 and 1952 would amount to not less than the total amount of revenue derived from that Territory during those years.

The Council further expressed the hope that, with regard to the operations of the Railways and Harbour Administration, which, with other departments and services, had been converted into amalgamated services, the Administering Authority would continue to take all steps to safeguard the economic interests of Tanganyika. With regard to customs arrangements, which it considered closely connected with the operations of the administrative union, the Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would take all necessary precautions to ensure that the financial interests of the Trust Territory were in no way subordinated to the other Territories participating in the administrative union, and to ensure that the appropriate organs of Tanganyika were given full opportunity to express their views on all matters relating to customs arrangements.

b. THE ADMINISTRATIVE UNION AFFECTING THE TRUST TERRITORY OF RUANDA-URUNDI

At its eleventh session, the Trusteeship Council endorsed the opinion expressed by the 1951 Visiting Mission to East Africa (T/948)¹⁴² to the effect that, while the existing practical arrangements linking the Belgian Congo and Ruanda-Urundi did not impair the separate status and identity of the Trust Territory, and while it appeared that, under existing practices, the Administration of the Trust Territory exercised considerably more independence of action than would be indicated under a strict reading of the instruments establishing the administrative union, nevertheless a higher degree of formal independence on the part of the Administration of Ruanda-Urundi was warranted.

The Council stated further that it considered that the law of 21 August 1925 establishing the administrative union between Ruanda-Urundi and the Belgian Congo was not fully consistent with existing administrative practices and not sufficiently precise with regard to the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement. It expressed the opinion, however, that there was no evidence to indicate that the practical operation of the administrative union was incompatible with the provisions of the United Nations Charter or with the Trusteeship Agreement for Ruanda-Urundi; nevertheless, it was of the opinion that the Government of Belgium should give further consideration to bringing the 1925 law into accord with current practices. The Council also noted the statement of the representative of the Administering Authority, made to the Council's Standing Committee on Administrative Unions on 6 June 1952, to the effect that the advisability of taking legal action had been closely studied by his Government, which had decided that no action was necessary since the law governing the administrative union did not conflict with existing administrative practices.

¹⁴¹ See Y.U.N., 1950, p. 795.

¹⁴² See also pp. 610 S.

The Assembly's Committee on Administrative Unions endorsed the observations of the Council and expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would give further consideration to bringing the 1925 law into accord with current practices.

Regarding the general safeguards enumerated in Council resolution 293(VII),¹⁴³ the Council observed:

(1) that the annual reports by the Administering Authority on the administration of Ruanda-Urundi contained separate financial, statistical and other data relating to the Trust Territory; (2) that neither the Committee on Administrative Unions nor the Trusteeship Council had expressed any doubts concerning the willingness of the Belgian Government to facilitate the access of Visiting Missions to such information on the administrative union as might be necessary to report fully on the Trust Territory; (3) that there existed no information which would suggest that the boundaries of the Trust Territory had not been maintained; and (4) that the expenditures on the administration, welfare and development of Ruanda-Urundi during 1949, 1950 and 1951 were not less than the total amount of revenue derived from the Territory during those years.

The Council also referred to the statements by the representative of Belgium in the Standing Committee on Administrative Unions on 6 June 1952 to the effect that no judicial union existed between Ruanda-Urundi and the Belgian Congo and that the Trust Territory had its own subordinate tribunals and Court of Appeal and that the people of the Trust Territory were satisfied with the administrative union and wished it to be continued. It expressed the hope that the Belgian Government would continue to apply to the Trust Territory educational measures specially and distinctively designed for the particular requirements of the Territory.

c. THE ADMINISTRATIVE UNION AFFECTING TOGOLAND UNDER UNITED KINGDOM ADMINISTRATION

At its eleventh session, the Trusteeship Council, on the recommendation of its Standing Committee, observed that, having further examined the question of the current administrative, legislative and political arrangements between the Gold Coast and the Trust Territory of Togoland under United Kingdom administration, it had no further comments to make but would continue to keep these matters under review.

The Council stated that it realized that it should reserve its final opinion concerning the effect of the new constitutional arrangements on the Trust Territory, promulgated on 29 December 1950, until it had considered the Ewe and Togoland Unification problem,¹⁴⁴ on which a special report would be made to the General Assembly at its seventh session. The Council further recognized:

(1) that the Trust Territory formed a narrow, strip of land inhabited by people who, for the most part, had close ethnic and cultural relations with the inhabitants of the adjacent districts of the Gold Coast; (2) that the current arrangements associating the administration of the two Territories had been in effect for some 30 years; and (3) that the introduction of the Gold Coast Constitution gave to the inhabitants of Togoland in association with the inhabitants of the Gold Coast a considerable degree of participation in self-governing institutions.

The Council expressed the opinion that the current administrative arrangements for Togoland, although perhaps prejudicing the progressive development of the Territory towards a separate independent status, were nevertheless conducive to the attainment of the objectives set forth in Article 76 of the Charter, and were capable of accelerating the progressive development of the Territory towards self-government within the wider framework of the political future of the Gold Coast. It further expressed the opinion that the Administering Authority should continue to carry out its obligations under the Trusteeship Agreement and that, until the freely expressed wishes of the peoples of the Trust Territory concerning its future status had been ascertained in accordance with Article 76 of the Charter, the operation of the current administrative union should be kept under constant review.

¹⁴⁴ See pp. 714-17.

The Assembly's Committee on Administrative Unions, noting the observations of the Council, itself noted in particular that the question of the administrative union affecting Togoland under United Kingdom administration was closely related to the Ewe and Togoland unification question which would be examined at the seventh session of the General Assembly. It recognized that the existing arrangements had practical benefits for the Trust Territory from the standpoint both of economic conditions and of participation in politically developed institutions, but observed, however, that the Territory was being constitutionally directed as an integral part of the Gold Coast, having no legislative, judicial or budgetary autonomy, and that the current arrangements were clearly more than administrative in character. It observed further that the operation of the current administrative union should be kept under constant review in order to ensure that the process of amalgamation of institutions did not prejudice the possibility of the final status of the Trust Territory being determined by the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned, as envisaged in Article 76 of the Charter.

With respect to the four general safeguards enumerated in Council resolution 293(VII),¹⁴⁵ the Council observed:

(1) that the annual report on the administration of the Trust Territory for 1951 provided estimates of the Territory's revenue and expenditure—the report stating that this had been done because it was impracticable to provide exact figures, and the representative of the Administering Authority stating in the Standing Committee that ways would be found, with experience, of improving the accuracy of the data; (2) that no Visiting Mission had entered Togoland during the year under review (1951); (3) that there existed no information which would suggest that the boundaries of Togoland had not been maintained; and (4) that the estimates of expenditures on the administration, welfare and development of Togoland for the last three fiscal years were not less than the estimates of total public revenue derived from the Territory during those years.

The Council also observed that, with respect to the desirability of establishing a separate judicial and legislative organization in each Trust Territory, it was of the opinion that existing arrangements in Togoland under United Kingdom administration were not disadvantageous to the Territory but, nevertheless, deserved the constant attention of the Council. The Council referred to the assurances of the representative of the Administering Authority in the Standing Committee that it was the Administering Authority's intention to have regard for the freely expressed wishes of the inhabitants in all matters and that any important departure from the current arrangements would be brought to the attention of the Council at a formative stage.

d. THE ADMINISTRATIVE UNION AFFECTING THE CAMEROONS UNDER UNITED KINGDOM ADMINISTRATION

The Trusteeship Council at its eleventh session made recommendations in respect of the Trust Territory of the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration, which participates in an administrative union with Nigeria, similar to those recommendations in respect of the Trust Territory of Togoland under United Kingdom administration.

The Council recognized that the Cameroons formed a narrow strip of land inhabited by people who, for the most part, had close ethnic and cultural relations with the inhabitants of the adjacent districts of Nigeria, and recognized further that the current arrangements associating the administration of both Territories had been in effect for some 30 years. It also recognized that the new Nigerian Constitution, promulgated in 1951, gave the inhabitants of the Cameroons in association with the inhabitants of Nigeria a considerable degree of participation in self-governing institutions. The Council expressed the opinion that the current administrative arrangements for the Cameroons, although perhaps prejudicing the progressive development of the Territory towards a separate independent status, were nevertheless conducive to the attainment of the objectives set forth in Article 76 of the Charter and were capable of accelerating the progressive development of the Territory towards self-government within the wider framework of the political future of Nigeria. It was further of the opinion that the Administering Authority should continue to carry out its obligations under the Trusteeship Agreement, and that, until the freely expressed wishes of the people of the Trust Territory concerning its future status had been ascertained in accordance with Article 76 of the Charter, the operation of the present administrative union should be kept under constant review.

The Council also took into consideration that the Royal Instructions of 27 November 1951 to the Governor of Nigeria provided, inter alia, that the Governor would not assent to any Bill the provisions of which appeared to him to be inconsistent with obligations imposed upon the United Kingdom Government by treaty or other international agreement including the Trusteeship ¹⁴⁵ See p. 735.

Agreement. The Council was of the opinion that the existence of that instruction adequately protected the interests of the inhabitants of the Trust Territory in regard to the new Constitution. The Council felt, however, that in view of the special status of the Trust Territory in international law, it should keep under constant review the practical implementation of the new arrangements.

The Council further noted that, in the process of formulating the new Constitution, the inhabitants of the Trust Territory took part in the various local and provincial meetings and regional conferences at which proposals for that instrument were considered. It felt that the existing arrangements were not disadvantageous to the Trust Territory, but that they deserved, nevertheless, the constant attention of the Council.

The Assembly's Committee on Administrative Unions, noting the observations of the Council, recognized that the existing arrangements had practical benefits to the Trust Territory from the standpoint both of economic conditions and of participation in politically developed institutions. It observed, however, that the Territory, which consisted of two separate geographical units, was being constitutionally directed as an integral part of Nigeria, having no legislative, judicial or budgetary autonomy, and that the current arrangements were clearly more than administrative in character. It further observed that the operation of the current administrative union should be kept under constant review in order to ensure that the process of amalgamation of institutions did not prejudice the possibility of the final status of the Trust Territory being determined by the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned, as envisaged in Article 76 of the Charter.

Concerning the four safeguards enumerated in Council resolution 293(VII),¹⁴⁶ the Council noted:

(1) that the annual reports for 1950 and 1951 on the administration of the Cameroons contained information on the total revenue attributable to the Trust Territory, as well as a statement by the Administering Authority that it had improved and would endeavour to improve further the statistical and other data on the Trust Territory;

(2) that no Visiting Mission went to the Trust Territory in 1950 or 1951;

(3) that no information existed which might suggest that the boundaries of the Territory had not been maintained; and

(4) that it would appear that for the years 1946 to 1949 expenditures on the administration, welfare and development of the Trust Territory were not less than the total revenue attributable to the Territory.

e. THE ADMINISTRATIVE UNION AFFECTING THE TRUST TERRITORY OF NEW GUINEA

At its eleventh session the Council recalled that section 8 of the Papua and New Guinea Act of 1949 declares it to be the intention of the Australian Parliament that the Territory of Papua and the Territory of New Guinea should continue to be Territories under the authority of the Commonwealth of Australia and that the identity and status of the Territory of New Guinea as a Trust Territory should continue to be maintained.

The Council also recognized that common customs, fiscal and administrative services organized on an inter-territorial basis might have advantages for the individual Territories participating in such arrangements, particularly under the economic and social conditions prevailing in Territories like Papua and New Guinea. It considered that complete integration of the political institutions of a Trust Territory and a Non-Self-Governing Territory not subject to Trusteeship provisions might hinder the separate development of the Trust Territory as a separate entity. The Council was of the opinion that, with regard to the operation of the administrative union, the Administering Authority should continue to provide adequate formal protection of the interests of the Trust Territory, in particular with relation to the possibility of the promulgation of legislation which might not be in conformity with the Trusteeship Agreement and the Principles of the Charter.

The Assembly's Committee on Administrative Unions expressed the opinion that these observations of the Council were not conclusive on certain points.

The Council, at its ninth session, had adopted a statement that, as it had no further information on the implementation of economic, social and educational programmes for the Territory of Papua and New Guinea, it was of the opinion that, since these programmes were still in a large part in the formulative stage, there was at that time nothing to report regarding the preservation of the separate interests of the Trust Territory and its inhabitants. At its eleventh session the Council recalled this statement and decided to keep these aspects under consideration, expressing the hope that full information would be forthcoming in the following annual report.

Regarding Native labour, the Council, having decided at its ninth session to keep the operation of the Native Labour Ordinance, 1950, under review, noted that, according to the annual report on the administration of the Territory of New Guinea for 1950-51, an increasing number of indigenous inhabitants from the Central Highlands District were seeking employment and that 5,363 workers from the District were employed in the Territory of New Guinea and 1,784 in the Territory of Papua. The Council further noted that, according to the same annual report, the supply of labour in New Guinea was still not equal to the demand and that a labour shortage of 2,100 was estimated for the year 1950-51.

In reply to an inquiry by the Standing Committee concerning the removal of labour from the Trust Territory to Papua, the special representative had stated that this removal of labour was not in any way detrimental to the economic development of the Trust Territory. He explained that the labour shortage of New Guinea had progressively decreased and that it was expected that there would be soon no significant shortage. The special representative had also stated that the workers from the Central Highlands employed in Papua were mainly engaged either on rubber plantations near Port Moresby or in areas where drilling for oil was in progress.

The Council was of the opinion that the operation of this Ordinance should be kept under review.

With regard to the four safeguards,¹⁴⁷ the Council noted:

(1) that the annual report on the administration of New Guinea for 1949-50 contained separate financial, statistical and other data relating to the Territory of New Guinea; and (2) that no Visiting Mission had visited the Territory during the year under review.

It also noted that there existed no information which would suggest that the boundaries of the Trust Territory had not been maintained, although it was of the opinion that the implementation of Administrative District Ordinance, 1951, which had been promulgated, according to the Administering Authority, in order to obtain uniformity in the system of designation of administrative divisions in the joint Territory of Papua and New Guinea, might create a situation which would make difficult the preservation of the separate identity and status of the Territory of New Guinea as a Trust Territory. The Council, accordingly, expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would promptly inform it of the establishment of any districts which might involve the boundaries established by article 1 of the Trusteeship Agreement. The Council further noted that the expenditures on the administration, welfare and development of the Trust Territory for 1950-51 had not been less than the total amount of revenue derived from the Territory.

The Council also welcomed the formal establishment of the Legislative Council for Papua and New Guinea in 1951, observing, however, that in view of the short time which had elapsed since the inauguration of the Legislative Council, the Trusteeship Council could not yet form an opinion concerning the operation of the Legislative Council and could not yet evaluate to what extent a joint legislative council for the two Territories operated in the best interest of the Trust Territory. It expressed the hope that the Administering Authority would make available to the Trusteeship Council minutes of the meetings of the Legislative Council, as well as any ordinances it might make.

f. THE STATUS OF THE CAMEROONS AND TOGOLAND UNDER FRENCH ADMINISTRATION ARISING OUT OF THEIR MEMBERSHIP IN THE FRENCH UNION

At its eleventh session the Trusteeship Council, in its report, among other things:

(1) noted that, according to the Constitution of the French Republic promulgated on 27 October 1946, establishing the French Union, the latter is composed, on the one hand, of the French Republic (Metropolitan France and the Overseas Departments and Territories) and, on the other hand, of the Associated Territories and States; (2) noted that the Trust Territories of the Cameroons and Togoland under French administration are "Associated Territories" in the meaning of article 60 of the Constitution of the French Republic; (3) noted further that, according to article 26 of that Constitution, diplomatic treaties duly ratified and published would have the force of law even when they were contrary to internal French legislation; they would require for their application no legislative acts other than those necessary to ensure their ratification; (4) noted the statement of the representative of France, made in the Standing Committee on 2 July 1952, that, irrespective of any other provisions of the French Constitution, article 26 safeguarded the full application of the Trusteeship Agreement; and (5) noted in particular the statements of the representative of France, made at the same meeting of the Standing Committee, that, with regard to political emancipation, it was self-evident that, when the Trusteeship System came to an end, the population under Trusteeship would have the option, if they so desired, to achieve their aspirations outside the French Union.

The Council expressed the opinion that there was no evidence to indicate that the practical operation of the administrative arrangements affecting the Trust Territories under French administration and the French Union were incompatible with the Charter of the United Nations and the Trusteeship Agreements concerned. It was further of the opinion that the interpretations by the French representative of the relationship of the two Trust Territories to the French Union would appear to be consistent with the provisions of the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreements. In addition, the Council stated that it did not feel itself competent to appraise the theories of constitutional law which might underlie the arrangements between the Trust Territories under French administration and the French Union.

The Assembly's Committee on Administrative Unions expressed the opinion that these observations of the Trusteeship Council were not finally conclusive on certain points.

The Council, in discussing the special considerations which it was asked to take into account in terms of General Assembly resolution 326(IV), experienced certain difficulties in fully applying that resolution to the arrangements affecting Togoland and the Cameroons under French administration within the framework of the French Union. The Council realized that, since General Assembly resolution 326(IV) was concerned with administrative arrangements between a Trust Territory and an adjacent territory under the same administration, some of its provisions did not apply to the separate question of the status of the two Territories.

The Council, however, referred to the statements made by the representative of France in the Standing Committee to the effect that the French Government had no intention of modifying the existing status of the two Territories in the sense indicated in the Assembly resolution and that it would not fail to comply with the wishes of the General Assembly if it should contemplate any such modification; that there was nothing to prevent the Administering Authority from furnishing separate financial and statistical data for the Territories; that the Cameroons possessed an entirely separate judicial organization and that, in the case of Togoland, the Government of France had not thought it desirable, in the interests of the inhabitants themselves, to set up a Court of Appeals at Lome and that, so far as the Cameroons were concerned, the Territory's incorporation into the French Union had not given rise to any persistent opposition but in the case of Togoland, however, difficulties relating to the Ewe problem had arisen.

It also noted that there were representative assemblies in the Cameroons and Togoland with headquarters in the respective Territories, that both Trust Territories were represented in the various legislative bodies of the French Union and that, according to the statement by the representative of France, neither Togoland nor the Cameroons had a legislative body properly so called, though it was the intention of the Government of France to broaden the powers of the assemblies.

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

During its seventh session, the General Assembly considered the question at the 292nd to 295th meetings of the Fourth Committee from 4 to 6 December and at the 409th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952. The Fourth Committee had before it both the special report of the Trusteeship Council on administrative unions (A/2151) and the report of the Assembly's Committee on Administrative Unions (A/2217). In its report, the Assembly's Committee on Administrative Unions observed that the special report of the Trusteeship Council was a valuable study of a complicated question and noted that it presented additional information completing the analysis of the problem contained in the Trusteeship Council's report to the Assembly's fifth session (A/1306). The Committee called attention to chapter II of the special report, in which it was pointed out that the terms of the Trusteeship Agreements for all the Territories concerned authorize the Administering Authorities to establish customs, fiscal or administrative unions or federations and, in addition, authorize the Administering Authorities respectively to administer Togoland and the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration as an integral part of United Kingdom territory, Ruanda-Urundi as an integral part of Belgian territory, New Guinea as if it were an integral part of Australia, and the Cameroons and Togoland under French administration as an integral part of France. Chapter II of the special report also included the assurance given by the delegations of Australia, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom, during the consideration of the draft Trusteeship Agreements, that they did not consider that the above-mentioned provisions gave powers to the Administering Authorities to establish any form of political association between the Trust Territories and adjacent territories which would involve the annexation of the Trust Territories in any sense or would have the effect of extinguishing their status as Trust Territories.

The Committee on Administrative Unions recommended the adoption by the Assembly of a draft resolution, in terms of which the General Assembly would:

(1) take note of the special report by the Council and the observations by the General Assembly Committee on Administrative Unions; (2) call to the attention of the Administering Authorities the observations and conclusions contained in the special report and the observations of the Committee; (3) request the Administering Authorities to continue to transmit promptly to the Council information as complete as possible concerning the operation of the administrative unions affecting Trust Territories under their administration; (4) express the hope that the Administering Authorities concerned would take into account the freely expressed wishes of the inhabitants before establishing or extending the scope of administrative unions; (5) express the hope that the Administering Authorities concerned would consult with the Council concerning any change in or extension of existing administrative unions, or of any proposal to establish new administrative unions; and (6) request the Council to continue its regular examination of each administrative union affecting a Trust Territory, and to study these administrative unions, not only with regard to the four safeguards enumerated in Trusteeship Council resolution 293 (VII),¹⁴⁸ but also with regard to the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory and the terms of the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreements as well as any other matters which the Council might deem appropriate.

During the general debate, the representative of Brazil expressed the view that the International Court of Justice might be asked for an advisory opinion on the question of whether administrative unions were compatible with the United Nations Charter and the Trusteeship Agreements concerned. He stated that some administrative unions were more than purely administrative in character and, in fact, involved the amalgamation of a Trust Territory with a neighbouring territory. An advisory opinion from the Court would not only clarify some important legal points, but would also be useful to the Administering Authorities. He was supported in his view by the representatives of the Dominican Republic, India, Israel and Iraq. The representatives of Guatemala, Mexico and Venezuela, among others, however, were not convinced of the advantage to be gained from a reference to the International Court at that time.

The representatives of Czechoslovakia, Poland and the USSR asserted that the colonial Powers were consolidating their regime in the Trust Territories under the pretext of establishing administrative unions between these Territories and other territories under their control. Their action involved the political and economic integration of the Trust Territories with the neighbouring territories, constituted a violation of the United Nations Charter, hampered the development of the indigenous inhabitants and undermined the Trusteeship System.

Appeals for a regular and close study of administrative unions were made by a number of representatives, including those of Argentina, Haiti and Yugoslavia.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, France and the United States, among others, said that fears expressed about the future of the Trust Territories were groundless. The administrative unions, they held, did not conflict with the Charter. The problem of independence could be solved under existing provisions but the status of the Trust Territories should be maintained until the objectives of the Charter had been fulfilled.

Brazil and Iraq submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.246) proposing the addition of a new operative paragraph to the draft resolution of the Committee on Administrative Unions (A/2217). The new paragraph would direct the Trusteeship Council to refer the question of the administrative unions affecting Tanganyika, Ruanda-Urundi, Togoland under United Kingdom administration, the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration, and New Guinea, and the status of the Cameroons and Togoland under French administration arising out of their membership in the French Union, to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion on the question of their compatibility with the Charter of the United Nations and the Trusteeship Agreements concerned. The sponsors accepted two oral drafting amendments by Belgium and Indonesia but later withdrew their proposal.

Argentina, Bolivia, El Salvador and Guatemala submitted an amendment (A/C.4 L.248) to the draft resolution (A/2217), whereby the Administering Authorities would be requested to submit a report to the Trusteeship Council, indicating what benefits and advantages would, in their opinion, be derived by the inhabitants of the Trust Territories from administrative unions. The sponsors, after accepting an oral drafting amendment proposed by the representative of Australia, subsequently made further drafting changes and this amendment was accepted by the members of the Committee on Administrative Unions. The Fourth Committee, accordingly, did not vote separately on the four-Power amendment.

The USSR submitted a draft resolution (A/G.4/L.247) which, in its preamble, would declare the importance of the question of administrative unions for the progressive development of the Trust Territories towards self-government or independence. In its operative part, the Soviet draft would recommend to the Administering Authorities that they establish in the Trust Territories administrative organs not subordinate to any organs established on the basis of a union of Trust Territories with colonies, and that they take legislative and other measures for that purpose. The preamble was adopted by the Committee at its 295th meeting on 6 December by 29 votes to 7, with 15 abstentions. The operative paragraph, however, was rejected by 21 votes to 5, with 24 abstentions and, in accordance with the rules of procedure, the draft resolution as a whole was considered to have been rejected.

In a series of thirteen separate votes, three of which were by roll call, the Committee adopted the draft resolution proposed by its Committee on Administrative Unions, as amended, the votes ranging from 50 to none, to 38 to 6, with 5 abstentions. The Committee adopted the draft resolution as a whole, as amended, by roll-call vote of 43 to 5, with 5 abstentions. The resolution adopted by the Committee (A/2337) came before the General Assembly at its 409th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952.

In explanation of their votes, the representatives of Czechoslovakia and the USSR repeated the stand that they had taken in the Fourth Committee, declaring that the Administering Authorities, under the pretext of forming administrative unions, had effected the unification of certain Trust Territories under their administration with the adjacent colonies. This, in fact, amounted to an annexation of the Trust Territories, these representatives maintained, and set up a system of colonial administration subordinate to the administrative organs of the adjacent colonies. Such action constituted a violation of the Charter and of the General Assembly resolutions on the question, as well as of the Trusteeship Agreements. They held that the United Nations, under whose jurisdiction the Trust Territories had been placed and to which the Administering Authorities were responsible for the administration of those Territories, was bound to adopt decisions which would prevent such violations by Administering Authorities.

The General Assembly adopted, by 49 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, the draft resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee (resolution 649(VII)). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling that the Trusteeship Agreements for the Trust Territories concerned authorize the Administering Authorities to establish customs, fiscal or administrative unions or federations,

"Recalling its resolution 224(III) of 18 November 1948, recommending that the Trusteeship Council should investigate the question of administrative unions in all its aspects, and resolution 326(IV) of 15 November 1949, recommending that the Trusteeship Council should complete the investigation,

"Recalling, further, that in resolution 326(IV) it noted that the Trusteeship Agreements do not authorize any form of political association which would involve annexation of the Trust Territories in any sense, or would have the effect of extinguishing their status as Trust Territories, and affirmed the view that measures of customs, fiscal or administrative union must not in any way hamper the free evolution of each Trust Territory toward self-government or independence,

"Recalling its resolution 563(VI) of 18 January 1952, requesting the Trusteeship Council to submit to it, at its seventh session, a special report containing a complete analysis of each of the administrative unions to which a Trust Territory is a party, and of the status of the Cameroons and Togoland under French administration arising out of their membership in the French Union,

"Recalling the studies on administrative unions undertaken by the Trusteeship Council in 1949 and 1950, and in particular the important analysis of administrative unions contained in resolution 293 (VII) adopted by the Council on 17 July 1950,

"Recalling the regular annual reports adopted by the Trusteeship Council in 1951 and 1952 on each of the Trust Territories participating in an administrative union,

"1. Takes note of the special report submitted by the Trusteeship Council in compliance with General Assembly resolution 563 (VI), and the observations made thereon by the General Assembly Committee on Administrative Unions;

"2. Calls to the attention of the Administering Authorities the observations and conclusions contained in the special report of the Trusteeship Council and the observations of the General Assembly Committee on Administrative Unions;

"3. Requests the Administering Authorities to continue to transmit promptly to the Trusteeship Council information as complete as possible concerning the operation of the administrative unions affecting Trust Territories under their administration, indicating the benefits and advantages derived by the inhabitants of the Trust Territories from administrative unions;

"4. Expresses the hope that the Administering Authorities concerned will take into account the freely expressed wishes of the inhabitants before establishing or extending the scope of administrative unions;

"5. Expresses the hope that the Administering Authorities concerned will consult with the Trusteeship Council concerning any change in or extension of existing administrative unions, or concerning any proposal to establish new administrative unions;

"6. Requests the Trusteeship Council to continue its regular examination of each administrative union affecting a Trust Territory, and to study these administrative unions, not only with regard to the four safeguards enumerated in Trusteeship Council resolution 293 (VII), but also with regard to the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory and the terms of the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreements, as well as any other matters which the Council may deem appropriate."

I. RURAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT IN TRUST TERRITORIES

In accordance with a recommendation of the General Assembly (resolution 438(V) of 2 December 1950),¹⁴⁹ the Trusteeship Council on 16 March 1951 established a Committee on Rural Economic Development to carry out a study of the prevailing policies, laws and practices in the Trust Territories relating to land, land utilization and the alienation of land. By resolution 561(VI) of 18 January 1952,¹⁵⁰ the Assembly recommended that the Council should consider inviting the appropriate specialized agencies, particularly the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) and the International Labour Organisation (ILO), as well as other experts if necessary, to assist it in its study. Accordingly, on 28 February 1952, by 11 votes to none, with 1 abstention, the Council adopted a resolution (421(X)) authorizing the Committee on Rural Economic Development to invite the specialized agencies and other experts to contribute to or participate in its study.

The Committee presented its second progress report (T/1004) to the Council at the eleventh session referring to the additional information on land tenure and alienation and on methods of land utilization received from the Administering Authorities since its first progress report (T/926), which had been considered by the Council in 1951. The Committee reported that, in accordance with Council resolution 421(X), it had requested the Secretary-General to invite FAO, which the Committee felt could at that stage of its work be of more direct assistance than the other specialized agencies, to make available an official familiar with land problems to assist in the preparation of its final report. The Committee had also asked the Secretary-General to invite ILO, the United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the World Health Organization (WHO) each to consider the type and manner of assistance which it might give. Following the invitation, FAO sent an official to New York from its headquarters in Rome for a period of two months.

The Committee invited the FAO expert to prepare a draft of part I of its report containing an analysis of general problems and features of land tenure, relationship of land tenure to land use and land utilization. The remainder of the final report, according to an outline approved in principle by the Committee (T/AC.36/L.46 and Corr.1), would consist of a second part containing a detailed description of land, land utilization and land alienation in each of the Trust Territories, and a third part containing the conclusions of the Committee as to general objectives and principles, together with any conclusions and recommendations on specific Territories which it might consider necessary.

The Committee's second progress report (T/1004) was considered by the Council at its 413th meeting on 4 June 1952. By 11 votes to 1, the Council took note of the report.

J. SOCIAL ADVANCEMENT IN TRUST TERRITORIES

Following a General Assembly recommendation (resolution 323(IV) of 15 November 1949),¹⁵¹ that the Trusteeship Council should adopt measures for solving such important social problems as migrant labour and penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts by indigenous inhabitants, the Council, by resolution 127(VI) of 28 March 1950,¹⁵² sought the expert advice of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) on these questions.

At its eleventh session, the Council had before it reports of the consequent action taken by ILO concerning migrant labour (T/984 and Add.1) and penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts by indigenous inhabitants (T/985). These reports incorporated the reports on both questions by the ILO Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories, which met in Geneva from 26 November to 8 December 1951. The Council also heard, at its 449th meeting on 17 July 1952, a statement by the Assistant Director-General of ILO.

The ILO Committee reached a series of conclusions relating to migrant labour, calling on the governments concerned to intensify the efforts that they were already making to improve social and economic conditions in rural areas and, where necessary, to invite regional or international organizations, including ILO, to co-operate in the study of the problems, in working out solutions and in their implementation by providing technical and financial assistance. The Committee then enumerated a series of points which should be given full consideration in connexion with any policies designed to raise the economic and social level of the rural communities from which the migrant workers come.

In addition, the Committee considered that further steps should be taken for the protection of migrant workers on their journeys and during their periods of employment. It accordingly adopted a series of conclusions which called for intensive and continuous regional, bilateral and unilateral consideration by governments of the problems of migrant workers with a view to appropriate regulation of migration and adequate provision for migrant workers and their families, whether recruited in their own districts or otherwise engaged on contract, or presenting themselves voluntarily at the place of employment. The points to be covered were to include measures for the welfare of workers on their journeys, for medical examination before and after employment, for satisfactory wages and conditions, for welfare arrangements, for provision for remittances to the worker's family, for deferred pay and for the return of the worker to his home.

The Committee considered that the special question of migrations which were not subject or amenable to control should be dealt with unilaterally, bilaterally or regionally with a view to achieving a progressive limitation thereof; but that meanwhile the workers concerned should, as far as practicable, receive protection similar to that afforded to other migrant workers. The general aim of policy should be that "workers should wherever practicable be established permanently in residence with their families at or near their places of employment, except where permanent employment is clearly against the interest of the workers and of his family, or of the economies of the Territories concerned." Governments should consider the advisability of such measures as development of town planning and housing programmes; further steps for the fixing and protection of wages; setting up public employment service systems where appropriate; further development of vocational and technical training, including apprenticeship schemes and in-plant training; further provisions for the access of indigenous workers to skilled employment; full rights of association of indigenous workers and freedom for all legitimate trade-union activities; further development of welfare measures for workers and their families; development of co-operative undertakings; initial measures of social security; and measures to promote permanent settlement.

The Committee suggested that the Governing Body of ILO should examine the possibility of submitting its conclusions in regard to the protection of migrant workers on their journeys and during their periods of employment to a future session of the International Labour Conference with a view to the adoption of a recommendation on the subject.

The report of the Committee of Experts on the question of penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts by indigenous workers contained an account of the present position in law and practice in the countries concerned, together with recommendations for further action. The Committee recommended that:

(1) the Governing Body should address to the Member States concerned a communication (a) inviting countries which had not ratified the 1939 ILO Convention on penal sanctions to reconsider the possibility of doing so at an early date; (b) directing attention to the advances made in many Territories since the 1939 Convention was adopted, and to the evidence which they provide that the abolition of penal sanctions was now practicable; and (c) directing attention to the strong collective view of the Committee that penal sanctions were wrong on moral grounds, ineffective in practice and that very cogent reasons existed for their immediate and general abolition;

(2) the Governing Body should consider whether the 1939 Convention might be supplemented by a recommendation providing for (a) the immediate abolition of sanctions of a penal nature in connexion with women workers and certain other categories of workers and with respect to certain types of breaches of contract; (b) the abolition of all penal sanctions not later than 31 December 1955; and (c) periodic reports and statistics to ILO as to the progress being made towards abolition of all penal sanctions.

The Committee's reports on migrant labour and penal sanctions were considered by the ILO Governing Body at its 118th session in March 1952. The Governing Body authorized the Director-General of ILO to communicate the Committee's conclusions and recommendations to the governments of the Member States concerned and to the Trusteeship Council. It also agreed that the question of the protection of migrant workers on their journeys and during their periods of employment and the question of penal sanctions should be brought again to its attention when it proceeded to consider the agenda of the 37th session of the International Labour Conference (1954).

At its 450th meeting on 18 July 1952 the Trusteeship Council decided, by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention, to take note of the reports of the Committee of Experts and to take into consideration the Committee's proposals in connexion with its own future annual reports. The Council also noted a statement by the Assistant Director-General of ILO that the recommendations dealing with the protection of migrant workers on their journeys and during their periods of employment and with penal sanctions for breach of labour contracts would be on the agenda for the 37th session of the International Labour Conference.

K. EDUCATIONAL ADVANCEMENT IN TRUST TERRITORIES

By resolution 557(VI) of 18 January,¹⁵³ the General Assembly invited Members of the United Nations to make available, to qualified students from Trust Territories, fellowships, scholarships and internships, and to notify the Trusteeship Council concerning the availability of such fellowship, scholarships or internships in public as well as private institutions. It invited the Council to request the Secretary-General, having in mind the procedures of the Expanded Programme of technical assistance and the machinery of the Technical Assistance Administration, to make such arrangements as might be necessary to ensure the efficient administration of all such offers that might be made. It requested, further, that the Council should invite the Administering Authorities concerned to avail themselves of such scholarships, fellowships and internships in accordance with procedure to be devised, and to give full publicity with regard thereto in their respective Trust Territories. It also invited UNESCO to give all appropriate assistance in the implementation of the resolution.

At its 388th meeting on 29 February 1952 the Council requested the Secretary-General to present a report containing proposals for the efficient administration of any offers that might be made of fellowships, scholarships and internships for inhabitants of Trust Territories.

In his report (T/974), which was approved by the Council at its 410th meeting on 31 March, the Secretary-General indicated that it would not be practicable to assimilate the proposed new project into existing technical assistance programmes. After considering the various factors upon which the efficiency of the proposed project must depend, the Secretary-General recommended the administrative arrangements which should be made in connexion with the proposed project.

The Secretary-General proposed further to make arrangements with UNESCO to include in its periodical Study Abroad information on offers of facilities made under the Assembly resolution.

Subsequently, the Secretary-General reported (T/1024) to the Trusteeship Council that two Governments, Yugoslavia and India, had offered fellowships and scholarships and that these offers had been transmitted to the Administering Authorities of Trust Territories. Yugoslavia offered five fellowships and five scholarships to students from Trust Territories in Africa. The scholarships were for regular studies of medicine, pharmacy, physics, chemistry and arts at the universities of Belgrade, Zagreb and Ljubljana, and for geology and mining at the university of Belgrade. The fellowships were for specialized training in social medicine, hygiene, forestry, housing, mining and ferrous metallurgy; they would be granted to persons with university or technical school training, and would cover the period of time required for a programme of special training—normally six months to one year. The Yugoslav Government would pay candidates' travel expenses, both ways, from Cairo, Alexandria or Casablanca to Belgrade, Zagreb or Ljubljana. India offered four scholarships, one to be allotted to an African from Tanganyika, a second to an African from Ruanda-Urundi, and a third preferably to a student from Somaliland under Italian administration. The terms of the scholarships were the same as those offered under the Government of India Cultural Scholarships Scheme intended for students from other countries in Asia and Africa, under which scholars receive Rs. 200 a month plus capitation, tuition and examination fees. The Secretary-General reported that he was later informed that the Government of India had received from the Joint Togoland Congress an application for the fourth scholarship on behalf of a student in Togoland under United Kingdom administration. The Secretary-General notified the United Kingdom accordingly.

At its 450th meeting on 18 July the Council took note of the Secretary-General's report.

L. DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION ON THE UNITED NATIONS AND ON THE INTERNATIONAL TRUSTEESHIP SYSTEM IN TRUST TERRITORIES

By resolution 556(VI) of 18 January 1952,¹⁵⁵ the General Assembly recommended that the Administering Authorities of Trust Territories should take all appropriate steps to disseminate information on the United Nations, and on the International Trusteeship System in particular, among the populations and in the schools of Trust territories, and report the details of such steps to the Secretary-General.

The Council considered the resolution at its 387th to 389th meetings, from 28 February to 3 March 1952. At the last of those meetings, it adopted, by 9 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, resolution 423(X). By this resolution, the Council:

(1) reaffirmed its earlier resolution 36(III) requesting the Secretary-General and the Administering Authorities to co-operate in ensuring an adequate flow of suitable information of the required kind to the inhabitants of the Trust Territories; and (2) requested the Secretary-General to co-operate with the Administering Authorities in the implementation of General Assembly resolution 556(VI) by providing suitable and adequate information on the United Nations, and the International Trusteeship System in particular, and by undertaking further efforts to ensure the dissemination of that information among the inhabitants and in the schools of the Trust Territories.

At its eleventh session, the Council had before it a report (T/1028) by the Secretary-General giving an account of the extent of the action taken by him and by the various Administering Authorities since the eighth session under Council resolution 36(III).¹⁵⁶ On 23 July 1952, the Council took note of the report.

ANNEX. PETITIONS DEALT WITH BY THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL DURING 1952

The Trusteeship Council dealt with a record number of 375 petitions during 1952 and postponed to a later session eighteen petitions which had not been received within the time limit prescribed by its rules of procedure. The Council referred the preliminary examination of all petitions to its Standing Committee on Petitions. This Committee submitted 22 reports to the Council—seven at the tenth session and fifteen at the eleventh session. It recommended draft resolutions for adoption by the Council with respect to 244 of the petitions.

These resolutions, some with amendments, were adopted by the Council on the following dates: During the tenth session:

- 26 March—428 (X)
- 31 March—329(X)-448(X)
- 1 April—449(X)-462(X)

- 22 July—468(XI), 494(XI), 615(XI)-628(XI)
632(XI)-640(XI)

The Standing Committee decided not to apply the established procedure for the examination of the remaining 131 petitions, which, it observed, wholly concerned general problems to which the attention of the Council had already been called and on which it had previously taken decisions or made recommendations. In the opinion of the Committee the most desirable forum for the discussion of such general problems was the Council in plenary session during its examination of the annual reports on the Territories concerned. To facilitate reference by Council members to the general problems raised in the 131 petitions, the Committee annexed to its eighth report (T/L.268) a topical index showing, with respect to each subject, the document numbers of the relevant petitions and of the pertinent observations of the Administering Authority concerned. The Committee recommended that the Secretary-General should be requested to reply individually to the petitioners, with respect to their petitions raising general questions, that the problems mentioned had been brought to the attention of the Council for the use of its members in connexion with the examination of conditions in the Trust Territories concerned, and to inform them of the action, if any, taken by the Council on those questions.

The report was approved by the Council at its 414th meeting on 6 June 1952.

A list of all the petitions dealt with by the Council during 1952 is given below. Summaries of the petitions, other than the 131 petitions listed in the Standing Committee's eighth report (T/L.268), are included in the reports of the Standing Committee. These reports, identified below, also contain summaries of the observations of the Administering Authorities and document references to these observations and to the Committee meetings during which the relevant petitions were discussed.

V. Legal Questions

A. THE ANGLO-IRANIAN OIL COMPANY CASE

On 26 May 1951 the United Kingdom addressed an Application¹ to the International Court of Justice instituting proceedings against Iran in the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company Case. The Application was communicated to Iran as well as to the States entitled to appear before the Court. It was also transmitted to the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

The Memorial of the United Kingdom was filed within the time-limit fixed by Order² of 5 July 1951, and subsequently extended at the request of that Government by Order³ of 22 August 1951. Iran, within the time-limit fixed for the presentation of its Counter-Memorial as finally extended to 11 February 1952 by Order⁴ of 20 December 1951, at the request of that Government, filed a document entitled "Preliminary Observations: Refusal of the Imperial Government to recognize the jurisdiction of the Court."

The filing of the Objection having suspended the proceedings on the merits, an Order⁵ dated 11 February 1952, fixed 27 March as the time-limit within which the United Kingdom might submit a written statement of its observations and submissions in regard to the Objection. The States entitled to appear before the Court were informed of the filing of the Objection. The Members of the United Nations were informed that, in its Objection, Iran relied, inter alia, upon its interpretation of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter of the United Nations, which precludes the United Nations from intervening in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State.

The Observations of the United Kingdom in regard to the Objection were deposited within the specified time-limit and the case, as far as the Preliminary Objection was concerned, was ready for hearing.

As the Court included upon the Bench a Judge of the nationality of one of the parties, the other party—Iran—by virtue of the Court's Statute, appointed Dr. Karim Sandjabi, Professor and former dean of the Law Faculty of Teheran, Member of Parliament and former Minister, to sit as a Judge ad hoc.

As the President of the Court was a national of one of the parties, he transferred the Presidency for the case to the Vice-President, in accordance with the Rules of the Court.

Public hearings were held on 9 to 11, 13 to 14, 16 to 19, 21 and 23 June 1952. The Court heard on behalf of Iran: Hossein Navab, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Iran to the Netherlands, as Agent; Dr. Mossadegh, Prime Minister; and Henri Rolin, Professor of International Law at Brussels University, former President of the Belgian Senate, as Advocate. On behalf of the United Kingdom, the Court heard Sir Lionel Heald, Attorney-General and Sir Eric Beckett, Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office, as Agents.

The Court delivered its Judgment on the Preliminary Objection on 22 July 1952.⁶

1. Judgment of the Court

The Court's Judgment began by recapitulating the facts. On 29 April 1933, an agreement (the Concession Contract) was concluded between the Government of Iran and the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, a company incorporated in the United Kingdom. This agreement was ratified by the Iranian Majlis on 28 May 1933, and came into force on the following day.

On 15 and 20 March 1951, the Iranian Majlis and Senate, respectively, passed a law enunciating the principle of nationalization of the oil industry in Iran. On 28 and 30 April 1951, they passed another law concerning the procedure for enforcement of this principle. These two laws received the Imperial assent on 1 May 1951.

As a consequence of these laws, a dispute arose between the Government of Iran and the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. The Government of the United Kingdom adopted the cause of the latter and, by virtue of its right of diplomatic protection, instituted proceedings before the Court. Iran disputed the Court's jurisdiction.

On 22 June 1951 the United Kingdom submitted a request that the Court should indicate provisional measures in order to preserve its rights. In view of the urgent nature of the request, the Court, by Order of 5 July 1951,⁷ indicated certain provisional measures. It stated expressly that "the indication of such measures in no way prejudices the question of the jurisdiction of the Court to deal with the merits of the case and leaves unaffected the right of the Respondent to submit arguments against such jurisdiction."

In its Judgment of 22 July 1952, the Court stated that, while it derived its power to indicate these provisional measures from the special provisions contained in its Statute, it must derive its jurisdiction to deal with the merits of the case from the general rules laid down in Article 36⁸ of the Statute. These general rules, it explained, are based on the principle that the Court's jurisdiction to deal with and decide a case on the merits depends on the will of the parties. Unless the parties had conferred jurisdiction on the Court in accordance with Article 36, the Court lacked such jurisdiction.

In the present case, observed the Court, its jurisdiction depended on the Declarations made by the parties under Article 36, paragraph 2, on condition of reciprocity, which were, in the case of the United Kingdom, signed on 28 February 1940, and, in the case of Iran, signed on 2 October 1930 and ratified on 19 September 1932. By these Declarations jurisdiction was conferred on the Court only to the extent to which the two Declarations coincided in conferring it. As the Iranian Declaration was more limited in scope than that of the United Kingdom, it was the former on which the Court must base itself.⁹

According to the Iranian Declaration, the Court had jurisdiction only when a dispute related to the application of a treaty or convention accepted by Iran. Both parties, said the Court, were in agreement on this point. But they disagreed on the question as to whether this jurisdiction was limited to the application of treaties or conventions accepted by Iran after the ratification of the Declaration, or whether it comprised the application of treaties or conventions accepted by Iran at any time. Iran contended that, according to the actual wording of the text, the jurisdiction was limited to treaties subsequent to the Declaration. The United Kingdom maintained, on the contrary, that it might also be applied to earlier treaties.

In the view of the Court, if the Declaration were considered from a purely grammatical point of view, both contentions might be regarded as compatible with the text, but the Court could not base itself on a purely grammatical interpretation of the text. It must seek the interpretation which was in harmony with a natural and reasonable way of reading the text, having due regard to the intention of Iran at the time when it accepted the Court's compulsory jurisdiction. Such a way of reading the text led to the conclusion that it applied only to treaties subsequent to the ratification of the Iranian Declaration. The Court stated that in order to reach an opposite conclusion special and clearly established reasons would be required, but the United Kingdom had not been able to produce them. On the contrary, it was apparent that Iran had special reasons for drafting its Declaration in a very restrictive manner and for excluding the earlier treaties.

On 10 May 1927, the Court recalled, Iran denounced all treaties with other States relating to the regime of capitulations, the denunciation to take effect one year thereafter, and it commenced negotiations with these States with a view to replacing the denounced treaties by new treaties based on the principle of equality. At the time when the Declaration was signed in October 1930, these negotiations had been concluded with some States but not with all. Iran considered all capitulatory treaties as no longer binding, but was uncertain as to the legal effect of its unilateral denunciations. It was unlikely, asserted the Court, that Iran, in such circumstances, should have been willing on its own initiative to agree that disputes relating to such treaties might be submitted for adjudication to an international court of justice

⁹ The conditions of the Iranian Declaration were that it was effective without special agreement in relation to any other State accepting the same obligation "in any disputes arising after the ratification of the present declaration with regard to situations or facts relating directly or indirectly to the application of treaties or conventions accepted by Persia and subsequent to the ratification of this declaration," with the exception of:

(1) disputes relating to the territorial status of Persia, including those concerning the rights of sovereignty of Persia over its islands and ports;

(2) disputes in regard to which the parties have agreed or shall agree to have recourse to some other method of peaceful settlement;

(3) disputes with regard to questions which, by international law, fall exclusively within the jurisdiction of Persia;

(4) subject to the condition that Persia reserves the right to require that proceedings in the Court shall be suspended in respect of any dispute which has been submitted to the Council of the League of Nations. For text of the declaration, see I.C.J. Yearbook 1946-47, p. 211.

by virtue of a general clause in its Declaration. Moreover, the Iranian law by which the Majlis approved the Declaration, before it was ratified, provided a decisive confirmation of Iran's intention, for it stated that the treaties and conventions which came into consideration were those which "the Government will have accepted after the ratification of the Declaration". The Court therefore concluded that the Iranian Declaration was limited to disputes relating to the application of treaties or conventions accepted by Iran after the ratification of the Declaration.

The United Kingdom, the Court observed, contended, however, that, even if the Court were to hold that the Declaration applied only to disputes relating to the application of treaties or conventions accepted by Iran after the ratification of the Declaration, it would still have jurisdiction in the present case. The contention of the United Kingdom was that the acts of which it complained constituted a violation by Iran of certain of its obligations to the United Kingdom resulting from treaties or conventions accepted by Iran after the ratification of the Declaration. The treaties and conventions relied upon in this connexion were: the Treaty of Friendship, Establishment and Commerce concluded between Iran and Denmark on 20 February 1934; the Establishment Convention concluded between Iran and Switzerland on 25 April 1934; and the Establishment Convention concluded between Iran and Turkey on 14 March 1937. By these treaties, Iran undertook to treat nationals of those Powers in accordance with the principles and practice of ordinary international law. The United Kingdom claimed that the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company had not been treated in accordance with those principles and that practice. In order to rely on the above-mentioned Treaties, though concluded with third parties, the United Kingdom relied on the most-favoured-nation clause contained in two instruments which it concluded with Iran: the Treaty of 4 March 1857 and the Commercial Convention of 9 February 1903.

The Court found, however, that the United Kingdom was not entitled, for the purpose of bringing its present dispute with Iran under the terms of the Iranian Declaration, to invoke its Treaties of 1857 and 1903 with Iran, since those Treaties were concluded before the ratification of the Declaration. It further found that the most-favoured-nation clause contained in those Treaties could not thus be brought into operation on the question of jurisdiction, and that, consequently, no treaty concluded by Iran with any third party could be relied upon by the United Kingdom in the case.

The Court then considered whether the settlement in 1933 of the dispute between Iran and the United Kingdom relating to the D'Arcy Concession, through the mediation of the Council of the League of Nations, resulted, as was claimed by the United Kingdom, in an agreement between the two Governments which might be regarded as a treaty or convention within the meaning of this expression as contained in the Iranian Declaration.

In November 1932, the Court recalled, Iran decided to cancel the D'Arcy Concession. On 19 December 1932 the United Kingdom, having protested to Iran without avail, submitted the case to the Council of the League of Nations. The Council placed the question on the agenda and appointed a Rapporteur. On 3 February 1933 the Rapporteur informed the Council that Iran and the United Kingdom had agreed: to suspend all proceeding before the Council; that the Company should immediately enter into negotiations with Iran, the respective legal points of view being entirely reserved; and that, in the event that the negotiations should fail, the question should go back to the Council. After prolonged discussion between the representatives of Iran and the representatives of the Company, an agreement—the Concession Contract—was signed by them at Teheran on 29 April. It was subsequently ratified by Iran. On 12 October the Rapporteur submitted his report together with the text of the new concession to the Council, declaring that "the dispute between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the Imperial Government of Persia [Iran] is now finally settled". The representatives of Iran and the United Kingdom at the Council each expressed his satisfaction at the settlement thus reached and the question was removed from the Council's agenda.

The United Kingdom maintained that, as a result of these proceedings, Iran undertook certain treaty obligations towards the United Kingdom. It contended that the agreement signed by Iran with the Company on 29 April 1933 had a double character, being at once a concessionary contract between Iran and the Company and a treaty between the two Governments.

The Court could not accept this view; it held that the contract was purely a concessionary contract between a government and a foreign corporation. The United Kingdom, it said, was not a party to the contract, which did not constitute a link between the two Governments or in any way regulate the relations between them. Under the contract, Iran could not claim from the United Kingdom any rights which it might claim from the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, nor could it be called upon to perform towards the United Kingdom any obligations which it was bound to perform towards that Company.

The Juridicial situation, the Court went on to state, was not altered by the fact that the concessionary contract was negotiated and entered into through the good offices of the Council of the League of Nations, acting through its Rapporteur. The United Kingdom, in submitting its dispute with Iran to the League Council, was only exercising its right of diplomatic protection in favour of one of its nationals. It was seeking redress for what it believed to be a wrong which Iran had committed against a juristic person of British nationality. The final report by the Rapporteur to the Council on the successful conclusion of a new concessionary contract between Iran and the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company gave satisfaction to the United Kingdom. The efforts of the United Kingdom to give diplomatic protection to a British national had thus borne fruit, and the matter came to an end with its removal from the agenda.

The conclusion of the new concessionary contract, said the Court, removed the cause of a complaint by the United Kingdom against Iran. It did not regulate any public matters directly concerning the two Governments. It could not possibly be considered to lay down the law between the two States. It was thus clear to the Court that the proceedings before the Council of the League of Nations which led up to the settlement in 1933 of the dispute between the United Kingdom and Iran relating to the D'Arcy Concession did not result in the conclusion of any treaty or convention between the two countries.

The Court thus found that the United Kingdom was not entitled to invoke any of the treaties concluded by Iran with Denmark and Switzerland in 1934 and with Turkey in 1937, and that no treaty or convention was concluded in 1933 between Iran and the United Kingdom. No other treaties having been relied upon by the United Kingdom as treaties or conventions subsequent to the ratification of the Iranian Declaration, the Court concluded that the dispute brought before it by the United Kingdom was not one of those disputes arising "in regard to situations or facts relating directly or indirectly to the application of treaties or conventions accepted by Persia and subsequent to the ratification of this Declaration". Consequently, the Court, by 9 votes to 5, found that it had no jurisdiction in the case. In its Judgment, the Court declared that its Order of 5 July 1951 ceased to be operative and that the provisional measures indicated therein lapsed at the same time.¹⁰

The Court's Judgment was followed by a separate opinion by Sir Arnold McNair, President of the Court, who, while concurring in the conclusion reached in the Judgment, for which he had voted, added some reasons of his own which had led him to that conclusion. The Judgment was also followed by four dissenting opinions by Judges Alvarez, Hackworth, Read and Levi Carneiro.

2. Individual Opinion of President McNair

The principal question before the Court, in the opinion of President McNair, was the meaning of the reference in the Iranian Declaration of 2 October 1930, ratified on 19 September 1932, to treaties or conventions. President McNair asked whether this reference denoted treaties or conventions accepted by Iran regardless of the date of their acceptance, as the United Kingdom contended, or only treaties or conventions accepted by Iran after the date of the ratification of the Declaration, as Iran contended. The importance of this matter, he emphasized, lay in the fact that the United Kingdom relied, at any rate as a basis for the Court's jurisdiction, upon certain treaties accepted by Iran before 19 September 1932.

President McNair agreed that both interpretations were grammatically possible, and both were possible as a matter of substance. In short, there was a real ambiguity in the text, and, for that reason, it was both justifiable and necessary to go outside the text and see whether any light was shed by the circumstances.

After the Assembly of the League of Nations launched a campaign in 1928 for securing more acceptances of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court, Iran deposited with the Court its Declaration accepting, but in a limited manner, the Court's compulsory jurisdiction. This limitation of Iran's acceptance to situations and facts relating directly or indirectly to treaties or conventions, declared President McNair, was unique, and led one to inquire whether there was any reason for this unusually restrictive attitude, and whether there was anything that indicated which of the two possible interpretations was the correct one.

Iran on 10 May 1927 formally notified all States holding capitulatory privileges in Iran (believed to number at least thirteen) that those privileges would be abolished on 10 May 1928. As a sequel to this denunciation it became necessary for Iran to overhaul its treaty system, to revise its treaties and to replace the former capitulatory system by a series of treaties of commerce and establishment befitting the new status of legal equality which it had asserted and acquired. In consequence, the years 1928 to 1932 were marked by intense activity on the part of Iran in the negotiation of new treaties of friendship or commerce or establishment.

From the point of view of a State which had been subject to a system of capitulations for at least a century and had only recently denounced them and emerged into a new status, it would be surprising, said President McNair, if the most-favoured-nation principle was not regarded as an obnoxious concomitant of that system. Such a State, while still engaged in negotiating a new treaty regime restricting the most-favoured-nation principle to normal commercial intercourse, would naturally be shy of accepting any compulsory jurisdiction in terms wide enough to expose itself to the invocation of any part of its old treaty system that might still survive.

These historical considerations made it easier to understand why the Iranian Government should desire to start with a clean slate in regard to the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court and to limit its obligations in that regard to treaties and conventions accepted by it after 19 September 1932.

President McNair concluded that Iran's interpretation of its Declaration was preferable to that of the United Kingdom and that the Declaration referred only to situations or facts relating directly or indirectly to the application of treaties or conventions accepted by Iran after 19 September 1932 (and then only subject to the reservations contained in the Declaration, which were not then in question). In reaching this conclusion President McNair did not rely on the Iranian law of 1931 authorizing ratification of the Declaration; he would have preferred that this law should be excluded from the consideration of the Court.

Turning to the question as to whether there were any treaties ratified by Iran after 19 September 1932 upon which the United Kingdom could rely in order to establish the jurisdiction of the Court, President McNair said that the United Kingdom's first claim to be able to do this rested on what was described as "the international engagement between Persia (Iran) and the United Kingdom to observe the terms of the Concession Convention of 1933." On this point he accepted the finding of the Court and the reasoning which supported it.

The United Kingdom's second claim rested upon treaties concluded by Iran with Denmark (1934), Switzerland (1934) and Turkey (1937), upon the provisions of which the United Kingdom contended it was entitled to rely by virtue of most-favoured-nation clauses in the treaties of 1857 and 1903 between the United Kingdom and Iran. In this connexion, President McNair considered the Iranian-Danish Treaty of 1934 and the Anglo-Persian Treaty of 1857, pointing out two obstacles to the United Kingdom contention: (1) that the United Kingdom could rely on no treaty between itself and Iran ratified after 19 September 1932, the date of the Iranian Declaration; and (2) that the United Kingdom, before it could base its claim on the Iranian-Danish Treaty, must establish a connexion with it, and this it had attempted to do by invoking article 9 of the Anglo-Persian Treaty of 1857—a treaty which antedated the Iranian Declaration. In order to accept this contention of the United Kingdom, it would be necessary for the Court to hold that the United Kingdom could: (a) not only invoke a treaty of 1934 between Iran and a third State; but also (b) telescope together that treaty and a treaty between Iran and itself of 1857 by invoking a most-favoured-nation clause contained in the last-mentioned treaty.

President McNair did not believe that either treaty alone, or both of them together, could be called a treaty or convention accepted by Iran after 19 September 1932, within the meaning of the Declaration. Nor did he consider that the words "directly or indirectly" helped the United Kingdom, because those words, in his opinion, qualified the relation between the situations or facts and the application of the treaty, and were not apt to cover the indirect operation of a most-favoured-nation clause in connecting a treaty of 1857 with a treaty of 1934 for the purpose of satisfying the formula contained in the Iranian Declaration. He was thus unable to accept the United Kingdom's claim to base the jurisdiction of the Court upon the treaties with Denmark, Switzerland and Turkey accepted by Iran after 19 September 1932. Accordingly, he concluded the Court had no jurisdiction in this case.

3. Dissenting Opinions

a. DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE ALVAREZ

Judge Alvarez considered that there were four important questions which had to be taken into account by the Court, namely:

(1) What is the scope of the Declaration by which Iran accepted the provisions of Article 36,¹¹ paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Court, or rather, how is this Declaration to be construed?

(2) Is the nationalization by Iran of the oil industry, which directly affected the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, a measure solely within the reserved domain of Iran, and thus outside the jurisdiction of the Court?

(3) What is the nature of the United Kingdom Government's intervention in this case?

(4) What is the scope of Article 36, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Court? Is the Court competent to deal with questions other than those expressly specified in the said Article?

As a result of recent profound and sudden transformations in the life of peoples, it was necessary, said Judge Alvarez, to consider in respect of the above questions, first the way they had been settled until recent times, that is to say, in accordance with classical international law, and secondly, how they are settled today, that is to say, in accordance with the new international law.

There was a fundamental difference between the two, he considered. Classical international law was static, because the life of peoples had in the past been subject to few changes; moreover, this law was based on the individualistic regime. The new international law, on the other hand, was dynamic; it was subject to constant and rapid transformations in accordance with the new conditions of international life which it had to reflect. This law was constantly being created; moreover, it was based upon the regime of interdependence which had brought into being the law of social interdependence.

The Iranian Declaration, Judge Alvarez stated, should not be construed by the methods hitherto employed for the interpretation of unilateral instruments, conventions and legal texts, but by methods more in accordance with the new conditions of international life. A legal institution, a convention, once established, acquired a life of its own and evolved not in accordance with the ideas or the will of those who drafted its provisions, but in accordance with the changing conditions of the life of peoples. Iran's Declaration should therefore be interpreted as giving the Court jurisdiction to deal with the present case; its scope should not be restricted by giving too great an importance to certain grammatical or secondary considerations.

Iran, Judge Alvarez noted, had expressly asserted that the nationalization of its oil industry was a measure exclusively within its reserved domain and that the Court therefore had no jurisdiction' to deal with this case. Examining the nature of the reserved domain, its origin and its current state, he noted that it had been established by classical international law as a natural consequence of the individualistic regime and of the absolute sovereignty of States upon which this law was founded. The reserved domain had covered a wide field.

As a result of the new regime of interdependence and various other factors, the reserved domain of States, he argued, had, however, been modified and considerably reduced; in many cases it was now possible to present a claim against a state relating to matters which it alleged to be within its reserved domain.

The United Kingdom Government was not appearing in this case in defence of its own interests, but to protect the interests of its nationals, which was a very different matter. Diplomatic protection, according to the new international law, might assume three different forms which depended upon the organ before which that protection was exercised: (a) direct protection or claim against a state; (b) protection before the Security Council of the United Nations; (c) protection before the International Court of Justice.

In the view of Judge Alvarez, the crucial point of the case was whether the Court was competent to deal with matters other than those specifically indicated in Article 36, paragraph 2, of its Statute.

Article 36, he explained, referred to disputes which might arise between States; these related to rights flowing from agreements concluded between these States or from rules established by international law with regard to given questions (land domain, maritime domain, etc.). But in addition to such rights there were others, directly established by international law, which did not result from the will of States or from other Judicial acts, but from the conscience of the people. These rights did not create direct obligations between States; their existence might not be disputed but had to be protected in the event of their violation. Among these rights, it was necessary to mention in particular those which were said to be fundamental rights of States (the right to independence, to sovereignty, to equality, etc.), as well as certain other rights conferred by the law of nations, such as that of the protection of nationals, the right to be indemnified for injuries, and so forth.

Article 36 of the Court's Statute, he continued, did not refer to the rights falling within this second category, for they did not give rise to disputes; but this Article did not exclude them from the Court's jurisdiction. If such had been the intention, it would have been stated expressly. In accordance with the new international law, and in particular with the spirit of the Charter, all disputes between States, argued Judge Alvarez, must be resolved by peaceful means, and all the rights recognized by the law of nations must be respected and must have a sanction. If the Court should hold that it lacked jurisdiction whenever rights of the second category were concerned, very important cases might occur in which such a decision would cause disappointment and would considerably damage the Court's prestige.

Judge Alvarez drew the following conclusions:

(1) The Court had jurisdiction to deal with the claim presented against Iran by the United Kingdom by reason of the Iranian Declaration.

(2) The Court had jurisdiction, in particular, because the United Kingdom was not acting in the present case in defence of its own interests, but to protect the interests of one of its nationals, the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. Therefore its contention could not be met with arguments as to the scope of the Iranian Declaration, because what was involved was not a dispute between these two countries, but the exercise of a right recognized by the law of nations.

(3) In view of the nature of the reserved domain at the present day, the Court's jurisdiction could not be limited by the Iranian contentions with regard to this domain.

(4) The Court had a very wide jurisdiction for the protection of rights directly conferred upon states by international law (those relating to the protection of nationals, to repatriation for injury unjustly suffered, to denials of justice, to abus du droit, etc.). Its jurisdiction in this connexion could not be limited by the non-adherence of the State against which the claim was made to the provisions of Article 36, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Court.

The exercise of some of these rights might, however, constitute a dispute, and thus come within the jurisdiction of the Court.

b. DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE HACKWORTH

In his dissenting opinion, Judge Hackworth declared that he agreed with the Court's conclusion that the Iranian Declaration applied only to treaties and conventions accepted by Iran subsequent to its ratification. In reaching such a conclusion, the International Court, he argued, must look to the public declarations by States made for international purposes, and must not resort to municipal legislative enactments such as an Iranian Parliamentary Act to explain ambiguities in international acts.

Judge Hackworth also agreed with the Court that the Concession Agreement of 1933 between Iran and the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company could not be regarded as a treaty or convention in the international law sense, and consequently could not be regarded as coming within the purview of the Iranian Declaration.

He could not, however, agree with the conclusion of the Court that the United Kingdom was not entitled for jurisdictional purposes to invoke, by virtue of the most-favoured-nation clauses in earlier treaties between that country and Iran, provisions of treaties concluded by Iran with other countries subsequent to the ratification of its Declaration.

The provisions with respect to the application of the principles of international law, he said, were not to be found in the most-favoured-nation clause of the earlier treaties of 1857 and 1903 between Iran and the United Kingdom, but were embodied in the later treaties between Iran and Denmark of 1934, between Iran and Switzerland of that same year, and between Iran and Turkey of 1937. It was to these treaties and not to the most-favoured-nation clause that the International Court must look in determining the rights of British nationals in Iran.

It was apparent to Judge Hackworth, using the Danish Treaty as the criterion, that Danish nationals in the territory of Iran and their property were entitled by article IV of the Treaty of 1934 to be treated "in accordance with the principles and practice of ordinary international law". Similar provisions, he said, were contained in Treaties between Iran and Switzerland (1934) and between Iran and Turkey (1937). The United Kingdom was therefore entitled, by virtue of the most-favoured-nation provisions, to claim for British nationals in Iran no less favourable treatment than that promised by Iran to Danish nationals. The United Kingdom contended that the treatment accorded by Iran to the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company was not in keeping with the requirements of international law, and had invoked the Danish Treaty.

The Court, he declared, was not called upon to say whether this contention was or was not warranted. It needed only to say, for present purposes, whether these treaty provisions to which Iran had subscribed brought the case within the purview of the Iranian Declaration accepting compulsory jurisdiction of the Court.

Judge Hackworth found nothing in the Iranian Declaration to suggest that it was necessary that action under it should be premised exclusively on a single treaty. He found nothing to suggest that it was necessary that such an action should be based on a treaty between the plaintiff State and the defendant State. The Declaration, though drafted with meticulous safeguards, he said, did not specify any such condition, nor did it specify that, in considering a dispute as to the application of a treaty or convention accepted by Iran subsequent to the ratification of the Declaration, an earlier treaty might not be drawn upon. All that the Declaration required, in order that the dispute should fall within the competence of the Court, was that it should relate to the application of treaties or conventions accepted by Iran subsequent to the ratification of the Declaration.

In the opinion of Judge Hackworth, the Danish Treaty answered this description. It was in that Treaty and not in the most-favoured-nation clause that the substantive rights of British nationals were to be found. Until that Treaty was concluded, the most-favoured-nation clauses in the British-Persian Treaties were but promises of non-discrimination. But when Iran conferred upon Danish nationals by the Treaty of 1934 the right to claim treatment "in accordance with the principles and practice of ordinary international law," the right thereupon ipso facto became available to British nationals.

In summarizing, Judge Hackworth stated that the United Kingdom had a right to claim the benefits of the Danish Treaty of 1934. It did not matter that that right was acquired through the operation of a most-favoured-nation clause of a treaty anterior to the ratification of the Iranian Declaration. The important thing was that it was a right acquired subsequent to ratification of that Declaration. A conclusion that jurisdiction did not lie, amounted, in his judgment, to giving to the restrictive features of the Iranian Declaration a more far-reaching scope than was warranted by the language there used.

c. DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE READ

Judge Read stated that he was unable to concur in the Judgment of the Court in this case, and he concluded that Iran's objections to the Court's jurisdiction should be overruled.

Judge Read rejected the idea of restrictive construction to the provisions of the Iranian Declaration accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court. He stated that the making of a declaration was an exercise of State sovereignty, and not, in any sense, a limitation thereof. It should therefore be construed in such a manner as to give effect to the intention of the State, as indicated by the words used and not be a restrictive interpretation, designed to frustrate the intention of the State in exercising this sovereign power. He also stated that he had been unable to find any case in which either the Permanent Court of International Justice or the present International Court relied upon a restrictive interpretation to a jurisdictional clause as a basis for its Judgment. Indeed, both Courts, he said, had given to jurisdictional clauses liberal interpretations designed to give full effect to the intentions of the parties concerned.

Judge Read next considered whether Iran by virtue of its Declaration, had consented to the exercise of jurisdiction by the Court in the sort of case which had been brought by the United Kingdom.

The United Kingdom, he said, had invoked the provisions of the most-favoured-nation clause of the Treaty of 1857. It based its case on the provisions of three treaties concluded by Iran, with Denmark and Switzerland in 1934 and by Iran with Turkey in 1937. Dealing with the treaty with Denmark, he declared that there could be no doubt that legally, by virtue of the invocation of the provisions of this treaty, Iran was under a treaty obligation to treat British nationals "in accordance with the principles and practice of ordinary international law."

There were two considerations, stated Judge Read, that strongly supported the interpretation which was based on what he termed the natural and ordinary meaning of the words used. The first was that Iran was certainly aware, at the time of the Declaration, of the existence of the most-favoured-nation clause referred to above. There could be no doubt that Iran envisaged a system of compulsory jurisdiction which would be broad enough to include disputes arising which would relate directly to the application of such clauses and indirectly to the application of subsequent treaties or conventions.

The second consideration was that the arguments which had been advanced as leading Iran to exclude the older treaties from the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court could have no conceivable application to those modern treaty provisions which had nothing to do with the regime of capitulations indirectly applicable through the medium of most-favoured-nation clauses. It must be borne in mind, he emphasized, that, at the date of the Declaration, article IX of the Treaty of 1857 (relating to the most-favoured-nation clause) no longer had the character of a provision of an old treaty of the regime of capitulations. Originally, it possessed that character; but in 1928 the United Kingdom concurred in a denunciation of the objectionable provisions of the Treaty. The two States agreed, by an exchange of notes, to maintain the most-favoured-nation clause, article IX, pending the negotiation and conclusion of a new treaty of commerce and navigation. In reality, the most-favoured-nation clause relied upon by the United Kingdom was founded, Judge Read said, upon a new agreement, accepted by Iran before the ratification but after the disappearance of the regime of capitulations.

Further, the most-favoured-nation clauses were reciprocal in character and entirely consistent with the new and independent status resulting from the denunciation of capitulations.

In view of those considerations, he reached the conclusion that the United Kingdom was entitled to invoke the provisions of the Danish Treaty as a basis for the jurisdiction of the International Court. He wished it understood, however, that, in reaching this conclusion, he did not want to prejudge the merits of the case. He could not consider, in a preliminary proceeding, whether the subject-matter of the dispute came within the scope of these provisions, because this question had not been discussed by counsel and because it was essentially a part of the merits. Accordingly and subject to this reservation, he concluded that the present claim was one which was based indirectly on the application of the Danish Treaty, which was accepted by Iran after the date of the Declaration. The Iranian Objection to the Court's jurisdiction as regards this part of the case, should accordingly be overruled, or at most joined to the merits.

In view of the foregoing conclusion, he declared that it was unnecessary for him to discuss that part of the Judgment of the Court which upheld the Iranian Objection on the ground that the Declaration limited the jurisdiction of the Court to disputes relating to treaties or conventions accepted by Iran after the date of the Declaration.

Judge Read then discussed the part of the Court's Judgment which related to the 1933 Agreement—the Concession Convention concluded by Iran with the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company in 1933, through the mediation of the Council of the League of Nations. The United Kingdom had contended that this Concession embodied an implied agreement between it and Iran to the effect that Iran undertook to observe the provisions of its concessionary convention with the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. It was clear to Judge Read that the question as to whether such an implied agreement arose between the two Governments in 1933, one fully operative as creating an obligation in international law, was an essential element of the United Kingdom claim on the merits.

It was impossible to overlook the grave injustice which would be done to an applicant State by a Judgment upholding an objection to the jurisdiction and refusing to permit adjudication on the merits, and which, at the same time, decided an important issue of fact or law, forming part of the merits, against the applicant State said Judge Read. The effect of refusal to permit adjudication would be to remit the applicant and respondent States to other measures, legal or political, for the settlement of the dispute. Neither the applicant nor the respondent should be prejudiced, in seeking an alternative solution of the dispute, by the decision of any issue of fact or law that pertained to the merits of the case.

Judge Read therefore concluded that the Court was not competent, in preliminary proceedings and under its Statute and Rules, to decide whether or not an international agreement arose between the two Governments in 1933, one fully operative as creating an obligation in international law. He concluded that the aspect of the Objection relating to the existence and scope of the alleged international agreement should be joined to the merits.

d. DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE LEVI CARNEIRO

In his dissenting opinion, Judge Levi Carneiro stated that it was necessary, in determining the jurisdiction of the International Court in the present case, to examine certain questions, or certain facts which might be related to the merits and which were not disputed.

He stated that, as the Concession Agreement of 1933 was not a treaty, it followed that the dispute in regard to its execution did not constitute a ground for the Court's jurisdiction. He hoped, however, that the Court's jurisdiction would evolve in the direction of considering such a contract as the Concession Agreement as a convention of an international scope, even though it was not itself international; the dispute would then fall within the Court's jurisdiction.

Judge Levi Carneiro admitted that the Iranian Declaration accepting compulsory jurisdiction of the Court only accepted the Court's jurisdiction as to disputes arising from treaties subsequent to 19 September 1932. It was therefore necessary to consider whether the treaties with Denmark complied with that condition and were applicable to British nationals, and also whether the United Kingdom Government had reasonable grounds for complaining of a breach of Iran's obligation in regard to the treatment of British nationals.

In the course of the oral arguments, two objections had been put forward. It was contended that the duty of conforming to general international law in the treatment of British nationals did not arise from the Treaties of 1934 and 1937, but from much earlier treaties—the Treaties of 1857 and 1903—which contained the most-favoured-nation clause; the latter Treaties were said to be the principals, the others only accessories. It was further contended that the Act nationalizing the exploitation of oil did not contravene any rule of general international law; in other words, that the Government of Iran, though bound to accord the guarantees of general international law to British nationals, was not debarred from nationalizing the exploitation of oil, in regard to which it had concluded a contract in 1933 with a British company. Judge Levi Carneiro said he was unable to accept either of these two objections.

The manner in which a most-favoured-nation clause operated, said Judge Levi Carneiro, was well known. It did not take effect by itself alone; it operated in due course upon the later treaty which granted some advantage to another nation, and it immediately extended the same advantage to the favoured nation. It could be seen, he said, that it was Iran's treaties with Denmark, Turkey and Switzerland, in 1934 and 1937, and not the treaties of 1857 and 1903 with the United Kingdom, which gave British nationals, in respect of their persons and their property, the guarantee of the general principles of international law. The present dispute related to the violation of these guarantees, that is to say it had direct reference to the application of treaties subsequent to the ratification of Iran's Declaration. For this reason, he argued, even accepting the Iranian construction of this Declaration, the present case was within the Court's jurisdiction.

There had been a breach of the provisions of a treaty in reliance upon which British nationals had invested large sums of money in the territory of Iran, sums which had indeed brought them immense profits, of which they were now dispossessed without any immediate compensation. This, declared Judge Levi Carneiro, was a breach of the fundamental principles of modern international law, of principles recognized by the legal systems, the decisions and the jurisprudence of civilized countries.

The first duty of the International Court, Judge Levi Carneiro stated, was to ensure the observance of international law and to further its development. Upon an initial examination of the present case, he could not exclude at least the possibility that Iran had violated "the principles and practice of ordinary international law" which it had undertaken to observe in relation to British nationals, and indeed he considered that there were strong indications of such a violation.

He agreed that it was necessary, in order to establish the jurisdiction of the Court, to ascertain whether it was advisable to invoke the "principles of international law" guaranteed by the treaties to which reference had been made. Judge Levi Carneiro deemed it essential to note the violation or, at least, the apparent violation, of the general principles of ordinary international law, by a denial of justice, consisting in the failure to honour the indisputable guarantees granted to British nationals in Iran.

The Iranian Government, he said, had stated expressly that it refused to appoint an arbitrator and to accept the procedure laid down in article 22 of the 1933 Concession. It had justified this decision by the contention that the concession granted to the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company was null and void. This contention, Judge Levi Carneiro, argued, appeared to be ill-founded because neither the Iranian laws of 15 and 20 March 1951, nor that of 1 May of the same year (concerning nationalization), provided for the dissolution of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company or the annulment of its contract, nor could they, in fact, do so. Even if the annulment of the contract could have been decreed, for the purpose of nationalizing the oil industry, by the unilateral act of one of the parties to the contract—the Iranian Government—it would not follow that this act would exclude the jurisdiction of the arbitral tribunal provided for in article 26 of this contract. The refusal to set up this tribunal, he declared, constituted a denial of justice on the part of the Iranian Government.

In spite of certain proposals and attempts to find a solution, Judge Levi Carneiro declared, the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company had been dispossessed of its concession and of all its property. The Iranian Government considered that, by its own arbitrary authority, the Company had been dissolved and the concession had ceased to exist, without any money having been paid by way of compensation. Provision had merely been made in the law, on paper, for the establishment of a fund for compensation—nobody knew whether any money at all had yet been paid into this fund; it was impossible to foresee how long it would take for this fund to reach the amount, as yet undetermined, required for compensation; the amount of compensation had not yet been fixed, nor had any adequate procedure been laid down to provide for a just assessment of this amount. The arbitration tribunal provided for in the contract had been ignored and a Parliamentary commission had been substituted for it. All this, he said, gave the impression of disguised confiscation. He considered that the most advanced tendencies of public law had not yet reached the stage where such treatment of a foreign concession and such provisions directed against the rights and property of foreign nationals could be accepted.

To sum up, he was of the opinion that, even if nationalization itself was considered not to be the concern of international law, the circumstances surrounding the action of Iran in the present case were such that they appeared to indicate a very grave violation of the principles of international law. His first impression was that there had been very serious violations of principles, the observance of which had been guaranteed to British nationals in Iran by three treaties subsequent to the ratification of the Iranian Declaration accepting the jurisdiction of the International Court. He therefore considered that the objection to the jurisdiction should be overruled and held that the Court had jurisdiction to decide as to the submission of the dispute to the arbitration tribunal in accordance with the submission of the United Kingdom.

B. THE AMBATIELOS CASE

This case was brought before the Court by Greece by an Application of 9 April 1951,¹² instituting proceedings against the United Kingdom regarding the claim of one of its nationals, the shipowner Nicolas Ambatielos, against the United Kingdom. Mr. Ambatielos was alleged to have suffered considerable loss as a result of a contract which he concluded in 1919 with the British Government (represented by the Ministry of Shipping) for the purchase of nine steamships which were then under construction, and in consequence of certain adverse judicial decisions in the English courts in connexion therewith.

In its Application and its Memorial, filed within the time-limits fixed by the Court's Orders of 18 May and 30 July 1951, Greece asked the Court to declare that it had jurisdiction; that the claim of Mr. Ambatielos against the United Kingdom Government must be submitted to arbitration, either by the procedure instituted by a Protocol of a Greco-British Treaty of Commerce and Navigation of 1886 or, alternatively, by that of a Treaty of Commerce of 1926; and that Greece was entitled to seize the Court of the merits of the dispute.

The United Kingdom, in its Counter-Memorial, filed on 9 February 1952, within the time-limits fixed by the Court's Orders of 30 July and 9 November 1951 and 16 January 1952,¹³ while setting out its arguments and submissions on the merits of the case, contended that the Court lacked jurisdiction in the case and expressly presented this contention as a Preliminary Objection under the Rules of the Court.

The filing of the Preliminary Objection suspended the proceedings on the merits of the case, and the Observations and Submissions of Greece on the Objection were filed on 4 April, the time-limit fixed by the Court by its Order of 14 February.¹⁴

Public hearings on the Preliminary Objection were held on 15 to 17 May 1952. As the Court included on the Bench a judge of the nationality of one of the parties, the other party, Greece, availing itself of its right under the Court's Statute, appointed Jean Spiropoulos to sit as judge ad hoc. The United Kingdom was represented by V. J. Evans, Agent, and Sir Eric Beckett, D.H.N. Johnson and J.E.S. Fawcett, Counsel. Greece was represented by N. G. Lély, Agent, and Sir Hartley Shawcross, C. J. Colombos, Henri Rolin and Jason Stavropoulos, Counsel.

1. Judgment of the Court

The Court delivered its Judgment on the Preliminary Objection on 1 July 1952.¹⁵

In its Judgment the Court referred to the treaty provisions relied on by both parties. These were, in particular:

(1) the Protocol annexed to the Treaty of 1886 which provided that controversies concerning the interpretation or execution of the Treaty or the consequences of violations of it were to be submitted to the decisions of commissions of arbitration to be established in accordance with a procedure outlined in the Protocol;

(2) Article 29 of the 1926 Treaty which provided that any dispute concerning the interpretation or application of that Treaty was to be referred for arbitration to the Permanent Court of International Justice unless in any particular case the contracting parties agreed otherwise; and

(3) the Declaration accompanying the 1926 Treaty which stated that this Treaty did not prejudice claims based on the 1886 Treaty and that differences in respect of such claims were to be submitted to arbitration in accordance with the Protocol of 1886.

The Court noted that the commercial relations between Greece and the United Kingdom had been regulated in accordance with the 1886 Treaty until the 1926 Treaty came into force. Although the 1886 Treaty had been denounced by Greece in 1919 and 1924, it was continued in force by successive agreements and exchanges of notes and it was finally agreed that it would lapse on the date the 1926 Treaty came into force.

The Court reviewed the submissions of the parties as they were developed during the proceedings. It stated that it was evident that both parties asked the Court to decide as to its jurisdiction to declare whether there was an obligation to submit the difference to arbitration. It was also evident that both parties envisaged that the Court itself might undertake the function of arbitration, but there appeared to be some doubt as to the conditions upon which the United Kingdom would be prepared to agree to this. In the absence of a clear agreement between the parties on the matter, the Court held that it had no jurisdiction to go into all the merits of the case as a commission of arbitration could do. It held that the question raised in the United Kingdom Counter-Memorial as to whether Greece was precluded by lapse of time from submitting the claim was a point to be considered with the merits and not at the current stage of proceedings.

The Court then examined the seven main arguments advanced by the United Kingdom in support of its Preliminary Objection and those put forward by Greece in reply.

The United Kingdom submitted:

(1) that the jurisdiction of the Court, if it existed at all, must be derived from article 29 of the Treaty of 1926; and

(2) that this Treaty only conferred jurisdiction on the Court to deal with disputes relating to the interpretation or application of the provisions of this Treaty itself.

The Court noted that since Greece had not accepted the Court's compulsory jurisdiction it could only invoke the Court's jurisdiction by virtue of a special agreement or the provisions of a treaty. Article 29 of the 1926 Treaty, on which Greece relied, provided for reference of disputes concerning its interpretation or application to the Permanent Court of International Justice and Article 37 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice provided that references in treaties to the Permanent Court should be construed as references to the International Court. Thus, any dispute as to the interpretation or application of any of the provisions of the 1926 Treaty were referable by either party to the International Court.

The third and fourth points raised by the United Kingdom related to the question of the retroactive operation of the Treaty of 1926. In this connexion, Greece advanced a "similar clauses theory", to the effect that where in the 1926 Treaty there were substantive provisions similar to substantive provisions of the 1886 Treaty, then under article 29 of the 1926 Treaty the International Court could adjudicate upon the validity of a claim based on an alleged breach of any of the similar provisions, even if the breach took place before the new Treaty came into force. The United Kingdom maintained that the 1926 Treaty came into force only in July 1926 and its provisions were not applicable to events prior to that date, whether or not the 1886 Treaty and the 1926 Treaty contained similar provisions. The acts on which the Greek Government's claim was based took place in 1922 and 1923 and therefore the 1926 Treaty did not apply to them.

The Court held that the 1926 Treaty had no retroactive effect. Article 32 of that Treaty stated that the Treaty would come into effect upon ratification and there was no special clause or special object necessitating retroactive interpretation. Moreover, the Declaration accompanying the Treaty of 1926 made no distinction between claims based on one class of provisions of the 1886 Treaty and those based on another class; there was no justification for concluding that differences concerning claims based on provisions of the 1886 Treaty which were similar to provisions of the 1926 Treaty should be arbitrated according to the procedure provided in the latter Treaty, while differences relating to other claims under the 1886 Treaty should be arbitrated according to the Protocol of the earlier Treaty.

The fifth point raised by the United Kingdom was that the Declaration which was signed at the same time as the 1926 Treaty was not a part of that Treaty, and that the provisions of the Declaration were not provisions of the Treaty within the meaning of article 29. Both parties, the Court observed, agreed that this was the most important issue in the case.

The Court observed that the United Kingdom, in support of its contention, argued that the Declaration was signed separately from the Treaty proper, though by the same signatories and on the same day. The Declaration referred not to "this Treaty" or "the present Treaty" but to "the Treaty . . . of to-day's date", thereby indicating that the Treaty had already been completed and signed. Moreover, the Declaration did not state that it was to be regarded as a part of the Treaty, in contrast to a similar Declaration annexed to a Greco-Italian Commercial Treaty of 24 November 1926.

The Court, however, did not share the United Kingdom view. It noted that the Treaty, the Customs Schedule annexed to it (which was undoubtedly part of the Treaty) and the Declaration were included in a single document, published in the same way in the British Treaty Series and registered under a single number with the League of Nations. Further, the instruments of ratification cited the three texts without making any distinction between them. The text of the United Kingdom ratification even declared that the "Treaty is, word for word, as follows"; after which it cited the three texts in their entirety.

The Court held also that the nature of the Declaration pointed to its being a part of the 1926 Treaty. It recorded an understanding arrived at by the parties before the 1926 Treaty was signed as to what that Treaty—or the replacement of the Treaty of 1886 by that of 1926—would not prejudice. The intention of the Declaration was to prevent the new Treaty from being interpreted as wiping out all the provisions of the 1886 Treaty and thus prejudicing claims based on the older Treaty and the remedies provided for them. Thus the Declaration was in the nature of an interpretation clause and, as such, should be regarded as an integral part of the Treaty even if this was not specifically stated.

The Court, therefore, held that the provisions of the Declaration were provisions of the Treaty within the meaning of article 29, and that it had therefore jurisdiction to decide any dispute as to the interpretation or application of the Declaration and, in a proper case, to judge that there should be a reference to a commission of arbitration. Any differences as to the validity of the claims involved would, however, have to be arbitrated, as provided in the Declaration itself, by the commission. The Court considered that there would be no possibility of a conflict between a decision of the Court and an eventual decision by a commission of arbitration. The Court would decide as to whether there was a difference between the parties within the meaning of the Declaration of 1926 and therefore an obligation to submit the difference to a commission of arbitration; the commission would decide on the merits of the difference. The Declaration, in laying down a special arbitral procedure, merely excluded the Court from functioning as the commission of arbitration.

The sixth United Kingdom argument was that the Declaration only covered claims formulated before it was signed, and the Greek Government had not formulated any legal claim in respect of Mr. Ambatielos until 1933, nor any legal claim under the 1886 Treaty until 1939.

The Declaration, however, the Court observed, contained no reference to the date of formulation of the claims; its only requirement was that they should be based on the 1886 Treaty. Moreover, if the United Kingdom interpretation were accepted, claims based on the 1886 Treaty but brought after the conclusion of the 1926 Treaty would be left without solution. They could not be arbitrated under either Treaty, although the provision on whose breach the claim was based might appear in both Treaties. The Court stated that it could not accept an interpretation which would have a result obviously contrary to the language of the Declaration and the continuous will of the parties to submit all differences to arbitration.

The final United Kingdom argument was to the effect that the 1886 Treaty contained no provisions incorporating the general principles of international law regarding the treatment of foreigners, and therefore it could not be said that an alleged denial of justice, considered merely as a breach of the general principles of international law, was a breach of that Treaty. The Court stated that as this point had not been fully argued by the parties it could not be decided at that stage.

For these reasons, the Court found, by 13 votes to 2, that it was without jurisdiction to decide on the merits of the Ambatielos claim; and by 10 votes to 5, that it had jurisdiction "to decide whether the United Kingdom is under an obligation to submit to arbitration, in accordance with the Declaration of 1926, the difference as to the validity of the Ambatielos claim, in so far as this claim is based on the Treaty of 1886."

The Court decided that the time-limits for the filing of a Reply and a Rejoinder should be fixed by subsequent Order.¹⁶

Judge Levi Carneiro and Mr. Spiropoulos, Judge ad hoc, appended their individual opinions to the Judgment. President Sir Arnold McNair, and Judges Basdevant, Zoricic, Klaestad and Hsu Mo appended to the Judgment statements of their individual dissenting opinions.

Judge Alvarez declared that there were in the case sufficient grounds for holding that the Court had jurisdiction to deal with the merits of the Ambatielos claim.

2. Individual Opinions

Judge Carneiro in his individual opinion stated that he accepted the conclusions of the Judgment, but drew attention to some secondary differences of view and referred to certain considerations influencing him which had not been dealt with in the Judgment.

He considered that in order to establish the Court's jurisdiction it should have been decided that the Ambatielos claim was "based" on the 1886 Treaty. This, he held, could be inferred from the declarations of the parties. It meant that the dispute was within the framework of the Declaration of 1926 and the Court's jurisdiction resulted from this fact.

He had been in favour of affirming or denying at the current stage of the proceedings the obligation to submit the claim to arbitration, but recognized that the Judgment dealt solely with the Preliminary Objection. He agreed that the Court was not invested with jurisdiction to decide on the merits by the declarations of the Agents or Counsel of the parties. It should, he considered, be expressly stated that the Court could assume the function of the arbitral commission as a result of a special agreement between the two Governments.

One of the points which would have to be decided at the second stage of the proceedings concerned the United Kingdom's final argument that the alleged denial of justice committed in violation of the general principles of international law did not constitute a violation of the 1886 Treaty because that Treaty did not incorporate those principles. The reason for deferring a decision on this argument was not that it had not been sufficiently argued, but that it belonged to the merits of the case.

Judge Carneiro emphasized the juridical nature of the 1926 Declaration as being of an interpretative nature and therefore an integral part of the 1926 Treaty. Unless this interpretation were adopted there would be no pre-established procedure for the settlement of disputes concerning the interpretation and application of the Declaration, a situation all the more unacceptable because international law was above all directed to the pacific settlement of disputes and the interpretation and application of treaties was the special domain of arbitration.

Finally, as regards the retroactive application of provisions relating to jurisdiction, Judge Carneiro held, such an application could only be allowed when expressly provided for. In the 1926 Treaty it had been expressly excluded.

Mr. Spiropoulos, in his individual opinion, confined himself to the points on which he disagreed with the wording of the paragraph of the Judgment in which the Court established its jurisdiction to adjudicate on the merits of the case.

This paragraph, he stated, appeared to impose on the applicant State the duty of establishing that the Ambatielos claim was based on the 1886 Treaty. But it was well recognized that an arbitral tribunal decides on its own jurisdiction. In this case, if the United Kingdom had accepted recourse to arbitration, it would have been for the commission of arbitration to decide whether the Ambatielos claim was, or was not, based on a provision of the Treaty of 1886; the obligation of the United Kingdom to accept arbitration was independent of whether the claim was so based, and would exist even if the claim was not based on that Treaty.

Moreover, since the Court was at this time only deciding on the objection to its jurisdiction, it could not, for procedural reasons, now pass on the validity of the Greek claim that the United Kingdom was obliged to arbitrate; such a decision would require a preliminary finding that the Court had jurisdiction.

When a State bound itself by a compulsory arbitration clause, such as that contained in the 1886 Protocol, it could not, unless in very exceptional circumstances, have any ground for refusing an offer to arbitrate, Mr. Spiropoulos stated.

The Court, therefore, in his opinion should have limited itself to a finding that it had jurisdiction to decide whether the United Kingdom

¹⁶ In an Order of 18 July 1952, the Court fixed 3 October as the date of expiry of the time-limit for the filing of the Greek Reply and 6 January 1953 as the date of expiry for the filing of the United Kingdom Rejoinder. (I.C.J. Reports 1952, p. 90.)

had an obligation to submit the difference concerning the Ambatielos claim to arbitration in accordance with the Declaration of 1926 and should not have referred to the Treaty of 1886.

3. Dissenting Opinions

President McNair, in his dissenting opinion, maintained that the Court had no jurisdiction in the case, either on the merits of the claim or on the obligation to arbitrate. In particular, he held that the 1926 Declaration was not an integral part of the 1926 Treaty within the meaning of article 29 of that Treaty on which the Court's jurisdiction was based.

Both in the British Treaty Series and in the League of Nations Treaty Series, he pointed out, the 1926 Treaty was followed by the Schedule and afterwards by the Declaration. The Schedule was specifically incorporated in the Treaty; the Declaration was not. The United Kingdom instrument of ratification embodied all three documents, therefore it was necessary to hold that the Declaration, although it did not require ratification, had been ratified at the same time as the Treaty with its Schedule. But this did not make all the documents comprised in the ratification parts of the same Treaty unless so incorporated by virtue of the intention of the parties. This was often expressly stipulated, or else it was implied from the judicial nature of the document and its relation to the Treaty.

President McNair did not agree that it could be inferred from the expression "which treaty is, word for word, as follows" that all the documents which followed must be regarded as forming one treaty. This was a traditional routine formula which had been in use for at least 600 years, and which was therefore not a guide to the intention of the parties. Moreover, although articles in the Treaty referred to "the present Treaty" or "this Treaty", the Declaration referred to "the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between Great Britain and Greece of to-day's date". It might thereby be inferred that the signatories of the Declaration did not regard it as part of the 1926 Treaty; had they done so they would have been unlikely to have used the expression "Our two Governments", more appropriate to an exchange of assurances than to a treaty.

As regards the juridical nature of the Declaration and its relation to the Treaty, President McNair stated that the reason for the 1926 Declaration was that claims under the 1886 Treaty should not be adversely affected through the lapse of the arbitral procedure provided for in the Protocol of 1886 upon the expiry of the 1886 Treaty by reason of its denunciation by the Greek Government. The Declaration did not, therefore, concern anything contained in the 1926 Treaty but related to something external and collateral to it.

The other factors, he held, supported the conclusion that the Declaration was not part of the 1926 Treaty:

(1) that there was a difference in the periods of duration of the Treaty and the Declaration; and

(2) that the Declaration contained its own machinery for the settlement of disputes concerning claims based on the 1886 Treaty independent of the machinery provided in article 29 of the 1926 Treaty.

Even if the provisions of the Declaration were among the provisions of the 1926 Treaty, President McNair considered, the existence of special machinery for dealing with disputes contained in the Declaration excluded the application of the general provisions of article 29.

Judge Basdevant, in his dissenting opinion, considered the Greek submissions: (1) that the Court should deal with the merits of the Ambatielos claim; and (2) that it should decide as to the obligation to refer this claim to the arbitration provided for by the 1886 Protocol. He also dealt with the United Kingdom objection to these submissions.

As regards the merits of the case, he stated that the facts on which Greece based its complaint occurred before the conclusion of the 1926 Treaty and therefore article 29 of that Treaty, which gave the Court jurisdiction over disputes "as to the proper interpretation or application of the present Treaty", was not applicable to them. The fact that there were similar provisions in the 1886 and 1926 Treaties could not make the latter Treaty applicable to facts occurring before it came into force. This was clear from the 1926 Declaration which provided that differences regarding claims based on the 1886 Treaty should be settled by the arbitral procedure created by the 1886 Protocol; it did not substitute for that procedure judicial proceedings before the court. Judge Basdevant therefore held that the Court had no jurisdiction to deal with the merits of the Ambatielos claim.

As regards the Court's jurisdiction to decide on the obligation to refer the claim to arbitration, Judge Basdevant held that the 1926 Declaration was distinct from the 1926 Treaty and not a clause or provision of that Treaty. The drafting and signature of a treaty, he observed, were the acts by which the will of the contracting States were expressed; the will so expressed was confirmed by ratification. The details of recording these acts in instruments, which usually followed a form derived from tradition, were not a determining influence in determining the true meaning of the agreement. Those responsible had chosen to give the agreement concerning the 1886 Treaty the form of a provision separate from the 1926 Treaty; they had given it the title of a Declaration, not that of an additional article, had signed it separately from the Treaty, and had made no reference to it in the Treaty, in contrast to the Schedule. The ratifications merely confirmed the agreements reached by the respective plenipotentiaries. The independent character of the Declaration, he considered, was also shown by its substance. It did not explain any clause of the Treaty of 1926, but was an agreement relating to one of the effects of the lapsing of the 1886 Treaty through its denunciation. Therefore, he held, article 29 of the 1926 Treaty was not applicable to the Declaration.

The Declaration was designed to preserve the regime of the Protocol of 1886 as it stood; under that regime arbitration could be frustrated by the refusal of a party to appoint an arbitrator. If the framers of the Declaration had intended to remedy this defect they could have substituted the Court's jurisdiction for the arbitral procedure provided for in 1886. Moreover, the obligation to arbitrate, if it existed, rested on the Treaty and Protocol of 1886, and the dispute concerning the existence of such an obligation was a dispute concerning the interpretation and application of that Treaty and Protocol. Article 29 of the 1926 Treaty did not confer on the Court jurisdiction to adjudicate such a dispute.

Judge Basdevant concluded that the Court had not been given jurisdiction to decide whether there was an obligation to submit the claim to arbitration.

Judge Zoricic in his dissenting opinion considered that the contents of the Declaration were chiefly important in deciding if it was a part of the 1926 Treaty. The Declaration had been drawn up and signed as a separate instrument with a title of its own and neither the Treaty nor the Declaration mentioned the Declaration as part of the Treaty, although specific mention was made in the Treaty of the Customs Schedule. Ratification of the documents meant that they were part of a simultaneous agreement, but this did not prove that the Declaration was a part of the Treaty. It was drawn up subsequently to and independently of the Treaty. But the point of real importance was the terms of the text, the intentions of the parties and the purposes which the text was to serve. The purpose of the Declaration was to safeguard rights founded on the 1886 Treaty not to interpret the 1926 Treaty or form a reservation to it; it did not explain anything in the 1926 Treaty. The Declaration was a partial prolongation of the 1886 Treaty; the only relation between it and the 1926 Treaty was a coincidence of dates resulting from a special agreement. The Declaration was, therefore, not a provision of the 1926 Treaty within the meaning of article 29. When drawing up the Treaty the parties could not have had in mind the Declaration which was prepared subsequently to the Treaty and relating to a subject foreign to it.

Further, the 1886 arbitration system was the only one applicable to disputes mentioned in the Declaration. The parties would not have intended to introduce a system of dual jurisdiction which could only lead to complications, since it would be impossible to draw a demarcation line between the jurisdiction of the Court and that of the commission of arbitration. Both article 29 and the Declaration conferred jurisdiction without qualification. Either the Court had jurisdiction to interpret and apply the Declaration or it had not, and if it had jurisdiction it would have to decide at least whether the claim satisfied the conditions of the Declaration, a question pertaining to the merits of the case. But, according to the Declaration, the commissions of arbitration were to decide not only on the validity of the claims but also on the applicability of the conditions of the Declaration. This would lead to much overlapping and confusion between the Court's jurisdiction and that of the commissions of arbitration clearly not intended by the parties. Judge Zoricic therefore held that the Declaration could not be regarded as a provision of the 1926 Treaty within the meaning of article 29 and that in consequence the Court was without jurisdiction in the case.

Judge Klaestad in his dissenting opinion stated that the facts invoked by Greece related to the period 1919-23 and could not be held to be a breach of the 1926 Treaty which did not at that time exist. It made no difference in this regard that the 1886 Treaty and the 1926 Treaty contained similar provisions; the two Treaties were independent legal instruments, governed by different arbitration clauses.

As regards the contention that the Declaration was a provision of the 1926 Treaty, Judge Klaestad considered that, in regard to form, the two documents were separate instruments drafted and issued as separate documents and signed separately. Although both documents were signed at the same time by the same signatories and the Declaration was ratified by both Governments together with the Treaty, this did not mean that they were necessarily part of the same document. As to substance, nothing in the Treaty or in the Declaration indicated that the Declaration was to be regarded as part of the Treaty. The Declaration was not an interpretation or application of the provisions of the Treaty, nor did it modify the Treaty. It only kept alive claims under the 1886 Treaty when that Treaty disappeared. He concluded that the Declaration did not form part of the Treaty.

The Declaration provided that particular claims based on the 1886 Treaty were to be referred to arbitration in accordance with the 1886 Protocol—this special arbitration clause prevailed over the general arbitration clause contained in article 29 of the 1926 Treaty. In fact, the two methods of arbitration were preserved side by side, and article 29 did not cover disputes mentioned in the Declaration.

If the Declaration formed part of the 1926 Treaty and the Court had jurisdiction to interpret and apply it, it followed that the Court would have to determine the conditions under which the dispute would have to be submitted to arbitration and to ascertain whether they were fulfilled. But the merits of the dispute could not be referred to the Court since it was expressly provided in the Declaration that claims based on the 1886 Treaty should be referred to the arbitral commission. Thus there would be established a dual arbitration procedure for two parts of the same dispute so time-wasting and unusual that it could hardly have been contemplated. The Declaration had in fact only provided that disputes based on the 1886 Treaty would be referred to arbitration in accordance with the 1866 Protocol. Moreover, it was for an international tribunal to determine its own competence, failing provisions to the contrary, so it would be for the arbitral commission, not for the Court, to determine the competence of that commission. Such a function could hardly have been given to both bodies since they might arrive at different results.

Judge Klaestad therefore held that the Court lacked jurisdiction in the case. This, he considered, was borne out by the note from Greece to the United Kingdom of 6 August 1940 in which it was stated that the "Arbitral Committee provided for by the final Protocol of the Greco-British Commercial Treaty of 1886 is the only competent authority in the matter . . ."

Judge Hsu Mo in his dissenting opinion considered that the dispute was, in effect, one concerning the interpretation and application of the Declaration. The fact that the Declaration appeared at the end of the 1926 Treaty and was signed on the same day, and that the different instruments might be considered to have been ratified together merely meant that the documents had an equal importance in law and not that the Declaration was an integral part of the 1926 Treaty, within the meaning of article 29. The function of the Declaration was to keep alive provisions of the 1886 Treaty in order to deal with claims based on that Treaty. It did not affect the operation of the 1926 Treaty; both were separate agreements with their own field of operation. The independent nature of the Declaration was confirmed by the fact that the Declaration and article 29 of the 1926 Treaty provided distinctive methods of arbitration, the one to apply to disputes concerning the 1886 Treaty, the other to disputes concerning the new Treaty. It was difficult to believe that the parties wished to divide the process of settling claims under the 1886 Treaty into two stages, under which (1) disputes concerning the obligation to submit differences to arbitration would first be decided by the Permanent Court of International Justice which would therefore have to decide the existence or non-existence of a claim and whether it was based on the 1886 Treaty, etc. and (2) the commission of arbitration would then have to decide on the validity of a claim. Had the parties so wished they could have stipulated that the procedure set out in article 29 of the 1926 Treaty should be substituted for that of the Protocol of 1886.

Even were the Declaration an integral part of the 1926 Treaty, it contained a specific arbitration clause which would, in accordance with established practice, have to prevail over the general arbitration provision contained in article 29 of that Treaty.

Judge Hsu Mo therefore held that the Court lacked jurisdiction in the case.

C. CASE CONCERNING RIGHTS OF NATIONALS OF THE UNITED STATES IN MOROCCO (FRANCE vs. UNITED STATES)

On 28 October 1950 France filed in the Registry of the International Court of Justice an Application instituting proceedings before the Court against the United States, concerning the rights of nationals of the United States in Morocco.

The Application was communicated to the United States as well as to the States entitled to appear before the Court; it was also transmitted to the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

France in its Memorial of March 1951 quoted several provisions of the General Act of the International Conference of Algieras of 7 April 1906 and drew conclusions from it as to the rights of the United States. As the construction of a convention to which States other than those concerned in the case were parties was in question, the Court's Registrar, in conformity with the Statute of the Court, on 6 April 1951 notified the following States: Belgium, Spain, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, the United Kingdom and Sweden.

On 25 June 1951 the United States filed a Preliminary Objection. The proceedings on the merits were thereby suspended. The proceedings instituted by the Preliminary Objection were, however, terminated following a declaration by the United States that it was prepared to withdraw its objection because of the explanations given by France. France had explained¹⁷ that it was proceeding in the case both on its own account and as Protecting Power in Morocco, the Judgment of the Court to be binding upon France and Morocco. As France did not oppose this withdrawal, the Court, in an Order of 31 October 1951, placed on record the discontinuance, recorded that the proceedings on the merits were resumed, and fixed new time-limits for the filing of the Counter-Memorial, Reply and Rejoinder.

The Counter-Memorial and Reply were filed within the time-limits fixed. The time-limit for the Rejoinder, at the request of the United States, was extended; it was filed on 18 April 1952. Public hearings were held on 15 to 17, 21 to 24 and 26 July 1952, during which the Court heard Andre Gros and Paul Reuter on behalf of France, and Adrian S. Fisher and Joseph M. Sweeney on behalf of the United States.

At the conclusion of the argument before the Court, the parties presented their submissions. These related to the following principal points:

(1) The application to nationals of the United States of a Residential Decree of 30 December 1948, issued by the Resident General of the French Republic in Morocco, by which imports without official allocation of currency (including such imports from the United States) were, in the French Zone of Morocco, subjected to a system of licensing control, while imports from France or the French Union were exempt from such control.

(2) The extent of the consular jurisdiction which the United States may exercise in the French Zone of Morocco.

(3) The right to levy taxes on nationals of the United States in Morocco (the question of fiscal immunity); with particular reference to the consumption taxes provided for by a Shereefian Dahir (Decree of the Sultan of Morocco) of 28 February 1948.

(4) The method of assessing the value, under Article 95 of the General Act of Algieras of 1906, of goods imported into Morocco.

1. Judgment of the Court

On 27 August 1952 the Court delivered its Judgment.¹⁸

The Court first dealt with the dispute relating to the Decree of 30 December 1948 issued by the Resident General of the French Republic in Morocco, concerning the regulation of imports not involving an allocation of currency into the French Zone of Morocco. The effect of this Decree was to subject imports without official allocations of currency to a system of licensing control; however, imports from France and other parts of the French Union were not subject to the regulations, but remained free.

France submitted that this Decree was in conformity with the treaty provisions which were applicable to Morocco and binding on France and the United States.

The United States disputed the French submissions. It submitted that its treaty rights in Morocco forbade Morocco to impose prohibitions on American imports, save those specified by the treaties, and that these rights were still in full force and effect. The Decree of 30 December 1948 was therefore, it submitted, in direct contravention of the treaty rights of the United States which forbade prohibitions on American imports. American nationals could not legally be submitted to this Decree, without the prior consent of the United States, it contended.

In its Judgment the Court stated that it was common ground between the parties that the characteristic of the status of Morocco, as resulting from the General Act of Algeciras, was respect for the three principles stated in the Preamble of the Act, namely: "the sovereignty and independence of His Majesty the Sultan, the integrity of his domains, and economic liberty without any inequality."

By the Treaty of Commerce with Great Britain of 9 December 1856, as well as by treaties of 20 November 1861 with Spain and of 1 June 1890 with Germany, the Sultan of Morocco, the Court noted, guaranteed certain rights in matters of trade, including imports into Morocco. These States, together with a number of other States, including the United States, were guaranteed equality of treatment by virtue of most-favoured-nation clauses in their treaties with Morocco. On the eve of the Algeciras Conference, the three principles mentioned above, including the principle of "economic liberty without any inequality", were expressly accepted by France and Germany in an exchange of letters of 8 July 1905 concerning their attitude with regard to Morocco. This principle, in its application to Morocco, the Court emphasized, was thus already well established when it was reaffirmed by that Conference and inserted in the Preamble of the Act of 1906. Considered in the light of these circumstances, it seemed clear to the Court that the principle was intended to be of a binding character and not merely an empty phrase.

The establishment of the French protectorate over Morocco by the Treaty of 30 March 1912, between France and Morocco, the Court said, did not involve any modification in this respect. Commercial or economic equality in Morocco was assured to the United States, not only by Morocco, but also by France as the Protecting State. The rights of France in Morocco, the Court asserted, were defined by the Protectorate Treaty of 1912. In economic matters France was accorded no privileged position in Morocco. Such a privileged position, in the opinion of the Court, would not be compatible with the principle of economic liberty without any inequality, on which the Act of Algeciras was based.

It followed from these considerations, the Court declared, that the provisions of the Decree of 30 December 1948 contravened the rights which the United States had acquired under the Act of Algeciras, because they discriminated between imports from France and other parts of the French Union, on the one hand, and imports from the United States on the other. France was exempted from control of imports without allocation of currency, while the United States was subjected to such control. This differential treatment, the Court said, was not compatible with the Act of Algeciras, by virtue of which the United States could claim to be treated as favourably as France as far as economic matters in Morocco were concerned.

This conclusion, the Court indicated, could also be derived from the Treaty between the United States and Morocco of 16 September 1836, article 24, where it was "declared that whatever indulgence, in trade or otherwise, shall be granted to any of the Christian Powers, the citizens of the United States shall be equally entitled to them". Having regard to the conclusion already arrived at on the basis of the Act of Algeciras, the Court limited itself to stating as its opinion that the United States, by virtue of this most-favoured-nation clause, had the right to object to any discrimination in favour of France in the matter of imports into the French Zone of Morocco.

The Court stated that it did not consider it necessary to pronounce upon the French contentions purporting to demonstrate the legality of exchange control. Even assuming this legality, the fact nevertheless remained that the measures applied by virtue of the Decree of 30 December 1948 involved a discrimination in favour of imports from France and other parts of the French Union. This discrimination could not be justified by considerations relating to exchange control.

For these reasons, the Court in its Judgment unanimously rejected the French submission that the Decree of 30 December 1948 was in conformity with the economic system which was applicable to Morocco. The Court said that it was not called upon to consider and decide the general question of the extent of the control over importation that might be exercised by the Moroccan authorities.

The Court next considered the extent of the consular jurisdiction of the United States in the French Zone of Morocco. The French submission in this regard read as follows:

"That the privileges of the nationals of the United States of America in Morocco are only those which result from the text of Articles 20 and 21 of the Treaty of September 16th, 1836, and that since the most-favoured-nation clause contained in Article 24 of the said Treaty can no longer be invoked by the United States in the present state of the international obligations of the Shereefian Empire, there is nothing to justify the granting to the nationals of the United States of preferential treatment which would be contrary to the provisions of the treaties."¹⁹

The United States submission concerning consular jurisdiction read as follows:

¹⁹ I.C.J. Reports 1952, p. 186.

"3. The jurisdiction conferred upon the United States by the Treaties of 1787 and 1836 was jurisdiction, civil and criminal, in all cases arising between American citizens.

"In addition, the United States acquired in Morocco jurisdiction in all cases in which an American citizen or protege was defendant through the effect of the most-favoured-nation clause and through custom and usage.

"Such jurisdiction was not affected by the surrender by Great Britain in 1937 of its rights of jurisdiction in the French Zone of Morocco.

"Such jurisdiction has never been renounced, expressly or impliedly, by the United States."²⁰

The Court stated that it was common ground between the parties that the present dispute was limited to the French Zone of Morocco. The Court could not, therefore, pronounce upon the legal situation in other parts of Morocco.

In order to consider the extent of the rights of the United States relating to consular jurisdiction, the Court said that it was necessary to examine three groups of treaties. The first group included the bilateral treaties of Morocco with France, the Netherlands, Great Britain, Denmark, Spain, the United States, Sardinia, Austria, Belgium and Germany, which covered the period from 1631 to 1892. These treaties, which were largely concerned with commerce, including the rights and privileges of foreign traders in Morocco, dealt with the question of consular jurisdiction. Under this group, the most extensive privileges of consular jurisdiction were granted by Morocco in treaties with Great Britain in 1856 and Spain in 1861, which ensured the rights of nationals of those countries, even when defendants, to be judged by their own consular courts. The Court stated that when these privileges were granted to Great Britain and to Spain, they were applied automatically and immediately to the benefit of the other Powers by virtue of the operation of the most-favoured-nation clauses in treaties between those Powers and Morocco.

The second group, which consisted of multi-lateral treaties such as the Madrid Convention of 1880 and the Act of Algeciras of 1906, imposed an element of restraint upon the interested Powers. Accordingly, the rights of protection were restricted, and some of the limitations on the powers of the Sultan of Morocco as regards foreigners, which had resulted from the provisions of the earlier bilateral treaties, were abated.

The third group of treaties concerned the establishment of the protectorate by France over Morocco. It included the agreements which preceded the assumption by France of a protectorate over Morocco, and the Treaty of Fez of 1912. Under this Treaty, Morocco remained a sovereign States but it made an arrangement whereby France undertook to exercise certain sovereign powers in the name and on behalf of Morocco, and, in principle, all of the international relations of Morocco. France, the Court said, in the exercise of this function, was bound not only by the provisions of the Treaty of Fez, but also by all treaty obligations to which Morocco had been subject before the protectorate and which had not since been terminated or suspended by arrangement with the interested States.

The establishment of the protectorate, and the organization of the tribunals of the protectorate which guaranteed judicial equality to foreigners, brought about a situation essentially different from that which had led to the establishment of consular jurisdiction under the earlier treaties. Accordingly, the Court explained, France initiated negotiations designed to bring about the renunciation of the regime of capitulations by the Powers exercising consular jurisdiction in the French Zone. In the case of all the Powers except the United States, these negotiations led to a renunciation of capitulatory rights (rights of sovereignty capitulated by one country to another) and privileges which, in the case of Great Britain, was embodied in the Convention of 29 July 1937. The United States, however, reserved its treaty rights in all negotiations.

The French submission, the Court noted, was based upon the Treaty between the United States and Morocco of 16 September 1836, and it was common ground between the parties that the United States was entitled to exercise consular jurisdiction in the case of disputes arising between its citizens or proteges. There was therefore no doubt as to the existence of consular jurisdiction in this case, the Court stated. The only question to be decided was the extent of that jurisdiction in 1950, when the Application was filed.

The first point raised by the submissions, the Court stated, related to the scope of the jurisdictional clauses (20 and 21) of the Treaty of 1836, which provided, inter alia, that "If any of the citizens of the United States, or any persons under their protection, shall have any dispute with each other, the Consul shall decide between the parties . . ." The United States argued that these clauses should be construed as giving consular jurisdiction over all disputes, civil and criminal, between United States citizens and proteges. France, on the other hand, contended that the word "dispute" was limited to civil cases. The Court construed the word "dispute" as referring both to civil disputes and to criminal disputes, in so far as they related to breaches of the criminal law committed by a United States citizen or protege upon another United States citizen or protege.

The second point arose out of the United States submission that consular jurisdiction was acquired "in all cases in which an American citizen or protege was defendant through the effect of the most-favoured-nation clause and through custom and usage" and that such jurisdiction was not affected by the surrender by Great Britain in 1937 of its rights of jurisdiction in the French Zone and had never been renounced expressly or impliedly by the United States.

As a result of the treaty of Morocco with Great Britain of 1856 and of Morocco with Spain in 1861, the Court explained, the United States, by virtue of the most-favoured-nation clauses, acquired civil and criminal consular jurisdiction in all cases in which United States nationals were defendants. The controversy between the parties with regard to consular jurisdiction resulted from the renunciation of capitulatory rights and privileges by Spain in 1914 and by Great Britain in 1937. The renunciation by Spain in 1914 had no immediate effect upon the United States position because it was still possible to invoke the provisions of the Treaty of 1856 with Great Britain. After 1937, however, no Power other than the United States had exercised or been entitled to exercise consular jurisdiction in the French Zone of Morocco.

France contended that, from the date of the renunciation of the right of consular jurisdiction by Great Britain, the United States was not entitled, either through the operation of the most-favoured-nation clauses of the Treaty of 1836 or by virtue of the provisions of any other treaty, to exercise consular jurisdiction beyond those cases covered by the jurisdictional clauses (articles 20 and 21) of the Treaty of 1836.

The Court dealt individually with a series of six contentions, upon which the United States submission was based.

The first contention was based upon article 17 of the Madrid Convention of 1880, which stated that the "right to the treatment of the most-favoured-nations is recognized by Morocco as belonging to all the Powers represented at the Madrid Conference".

The Court declared that even if it could be assumed that this article operated as a general grant of most-favoured-nation rights to the United States and was not confined to the matters dealt with in the Madrid Convention, it would not follow that the United States was entitled to continue to invoke the provisions of the British and Spanish Treaties, after they had ceased to be operative as between Morocco and the two countries in question.

The provisions of article 17 of the Madrid Convention, in the view of the Court, were clearly based on the maintenance of equality. The United States contention, said the Court, would run contrary to the principle of equality and it would perpetuate discrimination. The Court could not support such a contention.

The second United States contention was based upon the geographically limited character of the renunciation of consular jurisdiction by Great Britain. This was restricted in its scope to the French Zone.

The United States argued that Great Britain retained its jurisdictional rights in the Spanish Zone and it further argued that "the United States, which still treats Morocco as a single country, is entitled under the most-favoured-nation clause in article 24 of its treaty to the same jurisdictional rights which Great Britain today exercises in a part of Morocco by virtue of the Treaty of 1856."

The Court declared that it was not called upon to determine the existence or extent of the jurisdictional rights of Great Britain in the Spanish Zone. It was sufficient to reject this argument on the ground that it would lead to a position in which the United States was entitled to exercise consular jurisdiction in the French Zone notwithstanding the loss of this right by Great Britain. This result would be contrary to the intention of the most-favoured-nation clauses to establish and maintain at all times fundamental equality without discrimination as between the countries concerned. The Court could not, therefore, accept this second contention.

The third contention was based upon the nature of the arrangements which led to the termination of Spanish consular jurisdiction in the French Zone. The United States contended that it was entitled, by virtue of the most-favoured-nation clauses, to invoke in respect of the French Zone those provisions of the Spanish Treaty of 1861 which concerned consular jurisdiction.

By a Convention between France and Spain of 27 November 1912, the Court recalled, provision was made for the exercise by Spain of special rights and privileges in the Spanish Zone. By a bilateral Declaration between France and Spain of 7 March 1914, Spain surrendered its jurisdictional and other extra-territorial rights in the French Zone, and provision was made for the subsequent surrender by France of similar rights in the Spanish Zone. This was accomplished by a bilateral Declaration between France and Spain of 17 November 1914.

The United States contended that, as both the Convention of 1912 and the two Declarations of 1914 were agreements between France and Spain, and as Morocco was not named as a party to either agreement, the rights of Spain under the earlier 1861 Spanish Treaty still existed de jure, notwithstanding that there might be a de facto situation which temporarily prevented their exercise.

Even if this contention were accepted, the Court stated, the position was one in which Spain had been unable to insist on the right to exercise consular jurisdiction in the French Zone since 1914. The rights which the United States would be entitled to invoke by virtue of the most-favoured-nation clauses would therefore not include the right to exercise consular jurisdiction in 1950.

The Court concluded that the Spanish Declaration of 7 March 1914 brought about the surrender or renunciation of all Spanish jurisdictional or other extra-territorial rights in the French Zone, and an abrogation of those provisions of the Spanish Treaty of 1861 which concerned the rights and privileges arising out of the regime of capitulations. The Court could therefore not accept the third United States contention.

The fourth contention of the United States was that the extensive consular jurisdiction as it existed in Morocco in 1880 was recognized and confirmed by the provisions of the Madrid Convention, and that the United States, as a party to that Convention, thereby acquired an autonomous right to the exercise of such jurisdiction independently of the operation of the most-favoured-nation clauses.

The Court stated that there could be no doubt that the exercise of consular jurisdiction in Morocco in 1880 was general, or that the Convention presupposed the existence of such jurisdiction. It dealt with the special position of proteges and contained provisions for the exercise of jurisdiction with regard to them. On the other hand, it was equally clear that there were no provisions of the Convention which expressly brought about a confirmation of the then existing system of consular jurisdiction, or its establishment as an independent and autonomous right. The Court declared that it could not adopt a construction by implication of the provisions of the Madrid Convention which would go beyond the scope of its declared purposes and objects.

Further, the United States contention would involve radical changes and additions to the provisions of the Convention. The Court emphasized that it was its duty "to interpret the Treaties, not to revise them". It therefore rejected the United States contention.

The fifth United States contention was that the consular jurisdiction in Morocco was recognized and confirmed by various provisions of the Act of Algeciras, and that the United States acquired an autonomous right to exercise such jurisdiction independently of the operation of the most-favoured-nation clauses.

The Court explained that in 1906 the interested Powers at Algeciras all exercised capitulatory rights and privileges to the extent that they were prescribed either by the General Treaty with Great Britain of 1856 or by the Spanish Treaty of 1861. They did so by virtue of a direct treaty grant, as in the case of Great Britain or Spain; or by virtue of most-favoured-nation clauses, as in the case of the United States; or without treaty rights, but with the consent or acquiescence of Morocco, as in the case of certain other States. Accordingly, the Act of Algeciras presupposed the existence of the regime of capitulations, including the rights of consular jurisdiction, and many of its provisions assigned particular functions to the then existing consular tribunals.

Since 1937, the Court said, the position had been that eleven of the interested Powers had abandoned their capitulatory privileges and their consular jurisdiction had ceased to exist. Accordingly, Morocco had been able to make laws and to provide for the trial and punishment of offenders who were nationals of these eleven countries. The position of the United States, however, was different.

Taking into account the various articles of the Act of Algeciras referring to consular tribunals and the purposes of that Act, the Court found that neither its express provisions nor the intention of the parties offered any basis for the contention that the Act established consular jurisdiction or confirmed the rights and privileges of the regime of capitulations which were then in existence.

The Court declared that the consular jurisdiction of the United States continued to exist to the extent that might be necessary to render effective those provisions of the Act of Algeciras which depend on the existence of consular jurisdiction. The Court held that this interpretation in some instances led to results which might not appear to be entirely satisfactory, but that was an unavoidable consequence of the manner in which the Algeciras Conference had dealt with the question of consular jurisdiction. The Court could not, by way of interpretation, derive from the Act a general rule as to full consular Jurisdiction not contained therein; on the other hand, it could not disregard particular provisions involving a limited resort to consular jurisdiction, which were in fact contained in the Act and which were still in force as far as relations between the United States and Morocco were concerned.

The sixth contention of the United States was that its consular jurisdiction and other capitulatory rights in Morocco were founded upon "custom and usage". The Court, however, rejected this contention on two considerations. The first was that from 1787 to 1937 the United States consular jurisdiction was in fact based, "not on custom or usage, but on treaty rights". The second was that there was not sufficient evidence that a right to exercise consular jurisdiction founded upon custom or usage had been established in such a manner that it had become binding on Morocco.

In its decision on the extent of the consular jurisdiction of the United States in the French Zone of Morocco, the Court unanimously found that the United States was entitled, by virtue of the provisions of its Treaty with Morocco of 16 September 1836, to exercise in the French Zone of Morocco consular jurisdiction in all disputes, civil or criminal, between citizens or proteges of the United States.

By 10 votes to 1, the Court found that the United States was also entitled, by virtue of the General Act of Algeciras of 7 April 1906, to exercise in the French Zone of Morocco consular jurisdiction in all cases, civil or criminal, brought against citizens or proteges of the United States, to the extent required by the provisions of the Act relating to consular jurisdiction.

By 6 votes to 5, the Court rejected the other submissions of the United States relating to consular jurisdiction. The United States, the Court declared, was not entitled to exercise consular jurisdiction in other cases in the French Zone of Morocco. Its rights in this connexion, which were acquired solely by the effect of the most-favoured-nation clause, came to an end, the Court declared, with the termination of "all rights and privileges of a capitulatory character in the French Zone of the Shereefian Empire" by Great Britain, in pursuance of the provisions of the Franco-British Convention of 1937.

The Court next considered the claim that United States nationals were not subject, in principle, to the application of Moroccan laws, unless they had first received the assent of the United States Government. The Decree of 30 December 1948, not having been submitted to the prior assent of the United States Government, could not, the United States argued, be made applicable to United States citizens.

In this regard France submitted that the United States was not entitled to claim that the application of all laws and regulations to its nationals in Morocco required its express consent. The nationals of the United States, France argued, were subject to the laws and regulations in force in the Shereefian Empire and in particular to the regulation of 30 December 1948, without the prior consent of the United States Government.

The claim that Moroccan laws were not binding on United States nationals, unless assented to by the Government of the United States, the Court declared, was linked with the regime of capitulations. The Court stated that there was no provision in any of the treaties under consideration in this case conferring upon the United States any such right. The so-called "right of assent" was merely a corollary of the system of consular jurisdiction. The consular courts applied their own law and they were not bound in any way by Moroccan law or Moroccan legislation. Before a consular court could give effect to a Moroccan law it was necessary for the foreign Power concerned to provide for its adoption as a law binding on the consul in his judicial capacity. This was usually done by embodying the law either in the legislation of the foreign State or in ministerial or consular decrees of that State issued in pursuance of delegated powers; the foreign State could do this or could refuse to provide for the enforcement of the law. There was a "right of assent" only to the extent that the intervention of the consular court was necessary to secure the effective enforcement of a Moroccan law as against the foreign nationals.

The Court considered three ways in which the problem of the "right of assent" might arise. The first was in cases where the application of a Moroccan law to United States nationals would be contrary to the treaty rights of the United States. In such cases, said the Court, the application of Moroccan laws directly or indirectly to these nationals, unless assented to by the United States, would be contrary to international law, and the dispute which might arise therefrom would have to be dealt with according to the ordinary methods for the settlement of international disputes. These Considerations applied to the Decree of 30 December 1948, which the Court found to be contrary to treaty rights of the United States.

The second instance was in cases in which the co-operation of the consular courts was required in order to enforce the Moroccan legislation. In such cases, regardless of whether the application of the legislation would contravene treaty rights, the assent of the United States, the Court asserted, would be essential to its enforcement by the consular courts.

Thirdly, the question might arise in cases where the application to United States nationals, otherwise than by enforcement through the consular courts, of Moroccan laws which did not violate any treaty rights of the United States was in question. In such cases, declared the Court, the assent of the United States authorities was not required.

In its Judgment, the Court unanimously found that "the United States of America is not entitled to claim that the application to citizens of the United States of all laws and regulations in the French Zone of Morocco requires the assent of the Government of the United States, but that the consular courts of the United States may refuse to apply to United States citizens laws or regulations which have not been assented to by the Government of the United States."

The Court then took up that part of the Counter-Claim of the United States which related to the question of immunity from Moroccan taxes in general, and particularly from the consumption taxes provided by the Shereefian Dahir (Decree) of 28 February 1948. This Decree provided for the payment of consumption taxes on all goods, whether imported into Morocco or produced there.

The United States contended that its treaty rights in Morocco conferred upon United States nationals an immunity from taxes except those taxes specifically recognized and permitted by the treaties. Such immunity had been conferred on nationals of Great Britain and Spain by treaties between those countries and Morocco and the United States claimed that its nationals had the same immunity by virtue of the most-favoured-nation clauses in its treaties with Morocco.

The Court declared that when provisions granting fiscal immunity in treaties between Morocco and third States had been abrogated or renounced, these provisions could no longer be relied upon by virtue of a most-favoured-nation clause. This, it held, was the case with regard to the provision of the General Treaty between Great Britain and Morocco relating to tax immunity, which had been abrogated with the coming into force of the Franco-British Convention of 29 July 1937

Similarly, the effect of the Declaration made by France and Spain, of 7 March 1914, was an unconditional renunciation by Spain of all the rights and privileges arising out of the regime of capitulations in the French Zone, including the right of its nationals to immunity from taxes under its Treaty with Morocco of 1861. The right to tax immunity under that Treaty could therefore, the Court said, no longer be invoked by the United States by virtue of a most-favoured-nation clause.

The United States further contended that it had an independent claim to tax immunity by virtue of being a party to the Convention of Madrid and the Act of Algeciras. It contended that by these instruments a regime as to taxes was set up, which continued the tax immunity in favour of the nationals of foreign States, thereby confirming and incorporating this pre-existing regime. The United States held that this regime was still in force except for the States which had agreed to give it up.

The Court, however, expressed the opinion that the Madrid Convention did not confirm and incorporate the then existing principle of tax immunity. It merely presupposed the existence of this principle and curtailed it by exceptions in certain articles without modifying its legal basis. It did not provide a new and independent ground for any claim of tax immunity. Similar considerations, said the Court, applied to the Act of Algeciras, which further curtailed the regime of tax immunity by exceptions in certain articles. It did not provide any new and independent legal basis for exemption from taxes.

In its Judgment, the Court, by 6 votes to 5, rejected the submissions of the United States relating to exemption from taxes. It declared that no treaty provided any basis for the claim of the United States to fiscal immunity for its citizens. Nor could such an immunity, capitulatory in origin, be justified by the effect of the most-favoured-nation clause, since no other State enjoyed it for the benefit of its nationals.

The remaining submissions of the United States under its Counter-Claim related to the consumption taxes imposed by the Decree of 28 February 1948, and to the valuation of imported goods. The United States contended that its citizens were exempt from paying consumption taxes. It also contended that it was a violation of the Act of Algeciras for the customs authorities to determine the value of imported merchandise for customs purposes by relying on the value of the imported merchandise on the local Moroccan market.

The Court, in its Judgment, by 7 votes to 4, rejected the United States submissions concerning the consumption taxes imposed by the Decree of 28 February 1948. As those taxes were payable on all goods, whether imported into Morocco or produced there, they were not within the classes of taxes described in a British-Moroccan Treaty of 1856, which was invoked by the United States by virtue of its most-favoured-nation clauses.

The Court, in its Judgment, by 6 votes to 5, found that in applying the Act of Algeciras customs authorities must take into account both the value of the merchandise in the country of origin and its value in the local Moroccan market. That Act laid down no strict rules for valuation of imported goods. A study of the practice since 1906, when the Act came into effect, and of the preparatory work of the Conference of Algeciras, which drew up the Act, led the Court to the view that the relevant article required flexible interpretation. The power of making the valuation, said the Court, rested with the Customs authorities, but "it is a power which must be exercised reasonably and in good faith".

2. Declaration of Judge Hsu Mo

Judge Hsu Mo appended a declaration to the Court's Judgment stating that, in his opinion, the United States was not entitled to exercise consular jurisdiction in cases involving the application to United States citizens of those provisions of the Act of Algeciras which carried certain sanctions for their enforcement. He argued that when consular jurisdiction in its full form ceased to exist in respect of all the signatory States to the Act of Algeciras, the basis for the application by the various consular tribunals of the measures of sanction provided in that Act disappeared, and the ordinary rules of international law came into play. Consequently, such sanctions should thenceforth be applied by the territorial courts, in the case of United States citizens as well as in the case of all other foreign nationals.

3. Joint Dissenting Opinion

A joint dissenting opinion, signed by Judges Hackworth, Badawi, Levi Carneiro and Sir Benegal Rau, was also appended to the Court's Judgment. The four Judges dissented from the Court on the conclusions relating to consular jurisdiction, fiscal immunity and the interpretation of the Act of Algeciras relating to the valuation of imported goods.

So far as the United States was concerned, none of the provisions of the Act of Algeciras, in the opinion of the four Judges, had been abrogated or renounced. They explained that the Act of Algeciras was a great multilateral convention directly binding upon Morocco and the United States as well as the other signatory Powers. Its status in regard to the old bilateral treaties, as an independent and superior Act, was formally expressed in its article 123. The Act of Algeciras adopted the system of full consular jurisdiction which had previously been acquired by all of its signatories, and even extended that jurisdiction. This adoption was not so much by express provision as by necessary implication. To give effect to the bare provisions of the Act, however, and to ignore this basic implication in respect of all other cases of the exercise of consular jurisdiction would result in curious anomalies. If the Act was to be maintained as a logical and coherent structure, the full consular system embedded in it—that is, consular jurisdiction in all cases involving United States nationals—must be recognized.

The Madrid Convention, in their opinion, was likewise still in force so far as the United States was concerned. The provisions of that Convention necessarily implied that any civil suits and prosecutions against the proteges of any signatory of the Convention would normally be tried by the consular courts of that Power; and if such was the position of United States proteges, who were Moroccan subjects, a fortiori it must be the position of United States nationals. At the date of the Madrid Convention, the signatory Powers, the four Judges stated, were entitled independently of the Convention to claim full consular jurisdiction for their nationals and therefore it was not necessary to mention this right separately in the Convention itself. But even where the external sources of the right had ceased, the right continued to flow from the express provisions which had been inserted in the Convention itself in respect of proteges.

The Court had rejected the contention of the United States, basing its claim to consular jurisdiction and other capitulatory rights in Morocco on "custom and usage". The rejection, they said, appeared to proceed on the ground that sufficient evidence had not been produced in support of the claim. The four Judges considered that the evidence available was sufficient. They cited examples to prove their contention, such as the fact that even after 1937 when, according to the French Government, the benefits of the capitulatory provisions of the Treaties of 1856 and 1861 were no longer available to the United States, the French Government had been transmitting Moroccan taxation and other laws to the United States Government in order to have them made applicable to United States nationals in the French Zone.

The four Judges did not consider as "accurate" the statement that the United States was now the only Power that had not renounced its capitulatory rights in Morocco. The renunciation by Great Britain in the Anglo-French Convention of 1937, they explained, was confined to the French Zone; so too was the renunciation by Spain in the Franco-Spanish Declaration of 1914. Neither of these renunciations, in their view, extended to the whole of Morocco which the United States still treated as a single country.

The four Judges concluded that the submission of the United States relating to its jurisdictional privileges must be accepted, even apart from the effect of the most-favoured-nation clauses in its Treaty of 1836 with Morocco.

On the question of fiscal immunity, the four Judges declared that the right to tax implied the right to take coercive measures in case of non-payment. It followed from what they said on the issue of consular jurisdiction, they argued, that no coercive measures could be taken against the person or property of nationals of the United States except with the aid of the consular courts of the United States, which, in the ultimate analysis, meant the assent of the United States.

The four Judges concluded that United States nationals were entitled to a general immunity from taxes save those specifically recognized by the Convention of Madrid, the Act of Algeciras and any other relevant treaty or agreement. They were consequently of the opinion that the consumption taxes provided for in the Decree of 28 February 1948 were wrongly levied on United States nationals.

In the view of the four Judges, in applying article 95 of the Act of Algeciras—relating to the valuation of imported goods—the only value to be taken into account was the value in the country of origin plus expenses incident to transportation to the custom house in Morocco.

D. THE QUESTION OF DEFINING AGGRESSION

At its sixth session, the General Assembly, in resolution 599(VI),²¹ among other things, instructed the Secretary-General to submit to it, at its seventh session, a report in which the question of defining aggression would be thoroughly discussed in the light of the views expressed in the Sixth Committee at the sixth session of the Assembly and which would take into account the draft resolutions and amendments submitted concerning this question.

1. Report of the Secretary-General

In compliance with the resolution the Secretary-General submitted a report (A/2211) to the General Assembly. The first part of this report contained a history of the question of defining aggression; the second part consisted of a study of the general question of defining aggression and described the various schools of thought on the matter and the arguments they used.

The report found that despite the changes in the international situation and the replacement of the League of Nations by the United Nations, the problem of defining aggression remained fundamentally unchanged, at least in its theoretical aspect. The terms of the definitions of aggression currently proposed were largely the same as those proposed in the past and there was relatively little change in the arguments advanced in support of one or other school of thought. The report emphasized, however, that it would be wrong to believe that no more was needed than to repeat what had already been said, as international developments since the establishment of the United Nations gave new importance to and increased the complexity of the problem of aggression.

The report pointed out that those in favour of defining aggression emphasized that such a definition was not only possible but desirable. Those opposed to defining aggression maintained that aggression, by its very nature, was incapable of definition; they also felt that to define aggression would serve no useful purpose and above all would be dangerous.

From the point of view of form, the report distinguished between three categories of definitions: enumerative (analytical), general (synthetic) and combinations of the two.

The enumerative definitions gave a list of the acts regarded as acts of aggression. In most cases, the authors of these definitions regarded it as essential that the enumeration should be exhaustive, that is, that only the acts enumerated constituted acts of aggression. Some authors, however, proposed that the international organs should be empowered to treat as acts of aggression acts other than those enumerated in the definition.

The general definitions, instead of listing the acts of aggression, were couched in general terms which covered the entire class of cases to be included. It was left to the international organs to determine the scope of the terms of the definition when specific cases were brought before them.

The combined definitions contained, first, a definition in general terms and, second, a list, but a list which was not exhaustive but was intended merely to describe the principal forms of aggression.

2. General Discussion in the Sixth Committee

The Sixth Committee discussed the question of defining aggression at its 329th to 346th meetings from 19 November to 10 December 1952.

The main difference of opinion was between the representatives in favour of defining aggression and those opposing such a definition, at least for the present. Some representatives favoured a definition, provided that certain conditions were fulfilled, while others stressed the difficulties to be solved before adopting a definition. The form a definition should take was discussed and also the procedure to be followed for its adoption. Various representatives supported the idea of creating a special committee to study the question further and to present one or more draft definitions to the General Assembly.

The representatives who were, in general, in favour of a definition of aggression included those of Afghanistan, the Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, France, Indonesia, Iran, Mexico, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and Yugoslavia. In their opinion such a definition was possible and desirable, as the General Assembly had recognized in resolution 599 (VI). The USSR representative, in particular, pointed out that a definition was already included in some treaties, as for instance in eleven treaties concluded between the USSR and various other States.

It was argued that the adoption of a definition would constitute a declaration to the world of what was meant by aggression, and the very existence of such a definition would be useful. It was essential that crimes condemned by law should be defined. A definition would further help all governments, in particular those which might be called upon to decide whether they were justified in exercising the right of individual or collective self-defence. It would also be of considerable assistance to the organs of the United Nations responsible for the maintenance of peace and the application of collective security. In the view of these representatives, it was necessary to formulate directives for such international organs as might be called upon to determine which party was guilty of aggression.

Although an analytical definition, it was remarked, could not list all cases of direct or indirect aggression, it was better to have a definition than to have none.

A definition, it was felt, was particularly needed in the present tense situation of the world. It would be a factor in discouraging potential aggressors. It would also serve as a guide to public opinion and would constitute a step forward in the development of international law. The fact that a definition had not been agreed upon was not a reason sufficient in itself to discourage further efforts.

Other representatives, in particular those of Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Denmark, Greece, Haiti, India, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, the Netherlands, Norway, New Zealand, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Sweden, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom, the United States, Uruguay and Venezuela, on the other hand, considered that in view of the existing political situation of the world, it would be wiser not to attempt to formulate any definition of aggression at this time. There was not enough experience in applying rules concerning aggression to proceed with a codification of the law on the subject. A definition could be interpreted differently by Member States and therefore would not be effective, while at the same time it could be used in such a way as to defeat its purpose.

In any analytical definition, in the view of these representatives, there was always a danger of omitting some type of action which ought to be considered as aggression and, if a definition did not cover all possible acts of aggression, it would in fact constitute a declaration of impunity for the acts not included. A synthetic definition, on the other hand, could only be vague and imprecise or would merely reproduce what was already contained in the Charter.

In any case, it was very doubtful that a definition, if adopted, would prevent aggression. An aggressor could only be determined by the general impression created by its behaviour and policies. Some representatives, in particular the representative of Argentina, thought that the "animus aggressionis" was a subjective element, and therefore the determination that an act of aggression had been committed would have to be made primarily by the State victim of the aggression. This element, it was added, would not be taken into consideration if a definition was to be applied automatically.

Representatives opposing the adoption of a definition also contended that the concept of aggression changed with time; therefore, a rigid definition could serve no useful purpose and would not facilitate the task of the United Nations organs which had the responsibility under the Charter for determining the existence of acts of aggression and for taking measures against them. On the contrary, a definition of aggression would delay the action of such organs. Furthermore, the Charter provided adequate procedures for the determination of the aggressor by the Security Council and by the General Assembly.

The representative of Iraq stated that his delegation, in the belief that no definition would succeed in preventing aggression in the future, would not declare itself for or against definitions that might be proposed.

Other representatives, including, in particular, those of Thailand, Lebanon, Chile, Israel and Mexico, concluded that it was necessary to proceed with further studies on the question and not to show undue haste.

Certain representatives, including, among others, those of Afghanistan, Indonesia, Iran, Cuba, Chile and China, declared that they would favour the adoption of a definition only if it included cases of indirect aggression, and they mentioned the possibility of economic, cultural or ideological aggression. The representatives of Afghanistan, Cuba and Iran, in particular, stressed the importance of economic aggression as a form of indirect aggression. While all States were equal in law, they stated, there was no equality in the economic sphere and economically powerful States were thus able to exercise pressure which in fact amounted to aggression. In such cases there was certainly no direct attack, but the end in view was the same as that of any aggression: to force the victim to yield to the aggressor's will.

Some representatives, for example the representative of China, while in principle favouring the adoption of a definition, stressed the necessity of ensuring that a victim should never be prevented from exercising the right of self-defence in cases of direct aggression, or "reprisal" in cases of indirect aggression.

It was the view of the representatives of France, Sweden and the Union of South Africa, among others, that a definition should be linked with the development of international criminal law, in particular with the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind and the creation of an international criminal jurisdiction.

The representatives of France, Greece, Israel and the Netherlands, among others, stressed the difficulties which had to be solved before a definition of aggression could be adopted. It would first be necessary, in their opinion, to ascertain whether a definition could be included within the framework of the Organization and to determine what effect it might have on the application of Articles 39 and 51 of the Charter.²²

It was also stated, in particular by the Netherlands representative, that the new notion of indirect aggression raised a difficult problem as, although it could readily be contrasted with armed aggression, there was no common agreement on what it meant. Economic aggression, the representative of the United Kingdom emphasized, was a vague concept which was bound to involve the question of what measures constituted legitimate economic self-defence. Moreover, the representative of Bolivia pointed out, there was no economic equality between States and it would therefore be difficult to apply such a doctrine.

The representative of Argentina emphasized the relationship between aggression and intervention in the domestic affairs of other States, while other representatives, in particular the representative of Greece, stressed the relationship between aggression, self-defence and collective action by the United Nations.

The representative of the Netherlands cited the following specific questions to be studied in connexion with the definition of aggression: the meaning of aggression as referred to in the United Nations Charter, the Judgment of the Nürnberg Tribunal and the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind; the purpose of the definition—whether it was to be used by political or judicial organs; the relationship between aggression, self-defence and collective action by the United Nations; and the possible existence of other forms of aggression besides those mentioned in the Charter and in the draft Code.

As to the kind of definition to be drafted, some representatives stressed the advantages of an analytical definition. The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, in particular, thought it desirable to enumerate all the objective acts which constituted aggression, to specify the circumstances which could not be used to justify attacks, and to list the measures which might be taken by a State threatened with an attack. The representative of the USSR explained that it was, of course, impossible for any definition to list every case of direct, indirect or concealed acts of force, just as it was impossible for any criminal code to list all the possible cases of murder, offences against the person and so forth. It was, however, sufficient to indicate the most widespread, typical and important cases. A definition which was otherwise satisfactory should not be rejected merely because it did not contain an exhaustive list of all the possible cases of aggression. It should be remembered, he said, that any a priori scientific definition would necessarily be less precise and less valuable than a definition based on experience.

The representative of Colombia likewise declared that the only definition warranted was an analytical one which, although not claiming to be exhaustive, would give examples and could be amended in the light of experience and in keeping with the development of international law. Such a definition, he said, would be an extension of the principles of the Charter.

The representative of El Salvador did not consider it possible to define aggression, but, he thought, the Sixth Committee could and should explain the "idea" or "concept" of aggression. Once the principle had been laid down, he said, a potential aggressor might not be deterred from his criminal action, but he would be subject to world-wide opprobrium. If, however, an all-embracing and fitting definition of aggression were to become possible in the future, the Salvadorean delegation would support it.

A number of representatives, including those of China, Afghanistan, Iran, Thailand, Egypt, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, Indonesia, Ecuador and Yugoslavia, declared themselves in favour of a combined method which would consist of a general formula followed by a list of the principal acts of aggression. It was suggested that such a list should not be restrictive, and that it should be stated that the Security Council and the General Assembly could determine the existence of aggression in cases other than those listed.

Different views were expressed during the debate concerning the procedure to be followed in adopting a definition. Some contended that it was necessary to amend the Charter for that purpose; others held that it was sufficient for the General Assembly to adopt a resolution defining aggression. A few representatives stressed the necessity of approval by a large majority of Members in order to make a definition legally binding.

The representative of Belgium stated that neither the General Assembly nor the Security Council had the power to adopt a definition of aggression binding either upon itself or upon the other organ, or upon Member States; such a binding effect could be obtained only by amending the Charter. In his opinion, it would be idle to attempt to work out an authoritative definition of aggression by amending the Charter, for such a method required ratification by two-thirds of the Member States, including all the permanent members of the Security Council. The representative of Liberia also felt that for a definition of aggression to be adopted it would be necessary to amend the Charter.

A definition of aggression adopted by the General Assembly, in the view of the representative of Mexico, could serve as a useful guide for the Security Council; if it became part of international law it would naturally be binding on the Security Council.

The representative of the Netherlands felt that the principal purpose of a definition was that it should serve as a guide for the competent organs of the United Nations. In his opinion, however, a General Assembly resolution containing such a definition would not be binding on those organs. A definition of that kind would admittedly contribute to the development of international law, but it would not create new rules of law which could be cited against the Security Council or the General Assembly.

The USSR representative, on the other hand, considered that a definition of aggression, like the definition of any other notion contained in the Charter, was in no way a general interpretation of the Charter. To define aggression was merely to describe its characteristics, to point out its constituent elements. And since the General Assembly was empowered, under the Charter, to consider the general principles of co-operation in the maintenance of international peace and security, it certainly had the power to consider the general principles relating to aggression. An amendment of the Charter was needed to modify the principles it expressed, to incorporate a new principle or to effect a change in the powers it conferred upon the various organs of the United Nations. But the definition of aggression involved nothing of the sort, he argued.

The representative of France stated that a definition of aggression could not but have a strong repercussion on world public opinion. That was why it was essential for the definition to be acceptable to a large number of States, representing as large a part of world opinion and of effective political power as possible. It was also necessary for such a decision to be taken by a two-thirds majority vote of the General Assembly. The representative of Greece likewise felt that a definition of aggression would need the support of a substantial majority if it was to have any value.

Whatever the definition of aggression, it required acceptance by all the States Members of the United Nations, said the representative of Pakistan. Without such initial acceptance there was little hope of successful action in the face of a real test when the conduct of any nation or group of nations was called into question.

The representative of Iran suggested that a special committee should be created to study further the problems which had been raised and to present draft definitions to the General Assembly at a future session.

3. Draft Resolutions before the Sixth Committee

The following draft resolutions and amendments were submitted to the Sixth Committee.

a. USSR DRAFT RESOLUTION

A draft resolution²³ submitted by the USSR (A/C.6/L.264) in its operative part: (1) provided that the General Assembly should declare that in an international conflict that State should be declared the attacker which first committed one of a list of enumerated acts; (2) listed arguments and circumstances which could not be used as justifications for attack; and (3) described the rights of a State which was threatened by the mobilization or concentration by another State of considerable armed forces near its frontier.

At the 345th meeting of the Sixth Committee on 9 December 1952, the USSR representative stated that, while his delegation considered it necessary and possible at this stage to adopt a definition of aggression based on the generally accepted principles of international law, it was ready to support the proposal to establish a special committee. The USSR would not therefore press for a vote on its draft, bearing in mind also that the special committee would consider the definition of aggression contained in its draft resolution. The Chairman declared that he regarded this as a withdrawal of that draft resolution in conformity with the established procedure.

b. UNITED STATES MOTION

At the 336th meeting of the Committee on 26 November, the representative of the United States stated that he intended to submit at the end of the general debate a motion (A/C.6/L.266/Rev.1) to adjourn the debate on the item under discussion. Later, however, at the 342nd meeting on 5 December, the Chairman stated his understanding that the United States had decided not to submit the motion.

c. JOINT DRAFT RESOLUTION AND AMENDMENTS

A draft resolution (A/C.6/L.265), later revised (A/C.6/L.265/Rev.1) was presented jointly by Afghanistan, Bolivia, Chile, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Iran, the Netherlands, Peru and Yugoslavia. The revised draft would state in its preamble that the discussions of the General Assembly and the International Law Commission had revealed, inter alia, the need for a detailed study of various problems concerning the question of defining aggression, including the connexion between a definition of aggression and, on the one hand, the maintenance of international peace and security, and on the other, the development of international criminal law. The operative part provided for the establishment of a special committee of fifteen members to meet at Headquarters in 1953, to submit to the General Assembly at its ninth session draft definitions of aggression or draft statements of the notion of aggression, and to study all the problems referred to in the preamble on the assumption of a definition being adopted by a resolution of the General Assembly.

Amendments to the joint draft resolution were submitted by Turkey (A/C.6/L.267), France (A/C.6/L.268 and Corr.), by Colombia, Egypt, Mexico and Syria jointly (A/C.6/L.269/Rev.1 and Rev.1/Corr.1), by Indonesia (A/C.6/L.270), by Poland (A/C.6/L.272) and by Czechoslovakia (A/C.6/L.275/Rev.1). In addition, sub-amendments to the joint amendment were submitted by Poland (A/C.6/273) and Yugoslavia (A/C.6/L.274).

²³ The USSR draft resolution was identical to the one submitted in 1951; for text, see Y.U.N., 1951, p. 837.

The amendment by Turkey (A/C.6/L.267) proposed altering the first operative paragraph of the joint draft resolution so that members of the special committee would "be designated by the President of the General Assembly in consultation with the Chairman of the Sixth Committee". By a roll-call vote of 21 to 19, with 16 abstentions, the Committee rejected the words "by the President of the General Assembly in consultation with". As a result of this vote, no further vote was taken on the Turkish amendment.

The amendment by France (A/C.6/L.268 and Corr.1) proposed: (1) the deletion in the preamble of the joint draft of the reference to the need for a study of the connexion between a definition of aggression and the development of international criminal law; (2) the insertion of a new sub-paragraph in the preamble referring to the problems raised by the inclusion of a definition of aggression in the Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind and by its application within the framework of international criminal jurisdiction; and (3) the replacement of the second operative paragraph by a request to the special committee to study and report on all the problems raised by the adoption of a definition of aggression under a resolution of the General Assembly. The first part of the amendment was adopted by 20 votes to 15, with 19 abstentions, and the second by 23 votes to 16, with 15 abstentions; the third part was rejected by a roll-call vote of 24 to 23, with 9 abstentions.

The joint amendment of Colombia, Egypt, Mexico and Syria (A/C.6/L.269/Rev.1 and Rev.1/Corr.1) proposed to delete the part of the preamble relating to the problems to be studied. It also proposed to amend the second operative paragraph to instruct the special committee:

(1) to submit to the General Assembly at its eighth session a number of draft definitions of aggression, one of which should include: (a) a synthetic definition, (b) a statement of cases of aggression, and (c) an enumeration of the circumstances which might not be invoked as justification for aggression; and

(2) to instruct the special committee to study in the light of the definitions it had drafted: (a) the connexion between a definition of aggression and, on the one hand, the maintenance of international peace and security, and, on the other, the development of international criminal law; and (b) the effect of a definition on the exercise of the jurisdiction of the various United Nations organs.

Drafting amendments to the joint amendment were proposed orally by the representatives of Syria and Mexico and were accepted by the sponsors.

The Yugoslav sub-amendment (A/C.6/L.274) to the joint amendment proposed to have the special committee furnish a "non-exhaustive enumeration" of cases of aggression instead of "statement" of cases of aggression. It was adopted by 33 votes to 11, with 9 abstentions.

The Polish sub-amendment (A/C.6/L.273) proposed: (1) to have the special committee submit a draft definition rather than a number of draft definitions; (2) to delete the reference to a synthetic definition of aggression; (3) to have the committee furnish "an enumeration" rather than "a statement" of the cases of aggression; and (4) to have it enumerate the circumstances which might not be invoked as justification for "an attack (aggression) of one state against another", rather than simply as "justification for aggression".

The first, second and fourth parts of this sub-amendment were rejected by 35 votes to 5, with 11 abstentions; 35 votes to 6, with 13 abstentions; and 32 votes to 6, with 15 abstentions, respectively; the third part was not voted upon as a consequence of the adoption of the Yugoslav sub-amendment.

The first part of the joint amendment (providing for the deletion of the part of the preamble relating to the problems to be studied) was rejected by 30 votes to 16, with 8 abstentions.

Following the rejection, in a separate vote of 30 to 16, with 5 abstentions, of the word "eighth" (calling for the submission of definitions to the eighth session of the Assembly), the part of the joint amendment calling upon the proposed special committee to submit to the Assembly a number of draft definitions of aggression was adopted by 26 votes to 21, with 7 abstentions. The clause stating that one of the definitions should include a synthetic definition was rejected by 25 votes to 20, with 8 abstentions, and that clause providing for the inclusion of an enumeration of the circumstances which might not be invoked as justification for aggression—as amended orally by the sponsors—was rejected by 30 votes to 15, with 10 abstentions. The part of the amendment referring to the submission of definitions—as amended by the Yugoslav sub-amendment—was rejected, as a whole, by 26 votes to 23, with 5 abstentions. A proposal to take a new vote by roll-call on this sub-paragraph was rejected by 26 votes to 22, with 6 abstentions.

The Committee then decided, by 30 votes to 10, with 10 abstentions, not to take any further votes on the joint amendment.

The Indonesian amendment (A/C.6/L.270) proposed to add to the preamble of the joint draft resolution a paragraph stating that continued and joint efforts should be made to formulate a generally acceptable definition of aggression with a view to promoting international peace and security and to developing international law. The word "generally", which was separately voted upon, was adopted by 24 votes to 16, with 14 abstentions. The amendment as a whole was adopted by 22 votes to 15, with 18 abstentions.

The Polish amendment (A/C.6/L.272) to the joint draft proposed: (1) to have the special committee submit definitions to the eighth rather than to the ninth session of the Assembly; (2) to have it submit a draft definition rather than draft definitions; and (3) to delete the statement that it might alternatively submit "draft statements of the notion of aggression". The first part was rejected by 31 votes to 13, with 7 abstentions, the second by 32 votes to 7, with 12 abstentions, and the third by 23 votes to 13, with 4 abstentions.

The Czechoslovak amendment (A/C.6/L.275/Rev.1) proposed to increase the membership of the special committee from fifteen to eighteen, and to list the States which should be members. The proposal to increase the membership was rejected by 29 votes to 19, with 7 abstentions. As a result of this vote no further vote was taken on the Czechoslovak amendment.

The Sixth Committee adopted the joint draft resolution, as amended, in paragraph-by-paragraph votes and then as a whole:

The second paragraph of the preamble, as amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 35 to 8, with 12 abstentions.

The phrase "on the assumption of a definition being adopted by a resolution of the General Assembly" at the end of sub-paragraph 2 (b) of the operative part (see below), which was voted upon separately, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 20 to 15, with 19 abstentions.

Sub-paragraph 2 (b) of the operative part was adopted, as a whole, by a roll-call vote of 26 to 6, with 22 abstentions.

Paragraph 3 of the operative part was adopted by 40 votes to none, with 13 abstentions.

The joint draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 36 to 9, with 9 abstentions.

At the 346th meeting of the Committee on 10 December, representatives of Greece, Burma, Sweden and the Philippines gave explanations of their votes, and at the 347th meeting on 11 December, the Chairman announced the proposed composition of the special committee.²⁴

4. Resolution Adopted by the General Assembly

The General Assembly, at its 408th plenary meeting on 20 December 1952, considered the Sixth Committee's draft resolution (A/2322 and Corr.1) and an amendment (A/L.136) to it proposed by Poland.

The Polish amendment, which would have the special committee report to the Assembly at its eighth rather than ninth session, was rejected by 31 votes to 11, with 5 abstentions.

Separate votes on three parts of the draft resolution were then taken. Paragraph 2 of the preamble, beginning with the words "Considering that the discussion of the question" and ending with the words "any other problem which might be raised by a definition of aggression", was adopted by 28 votes to 8, with 12 abstentions.

Paragraph 2 (a) (see below) was adopted by 29 votes to 8, with 10 abstentions.

Paragraph 2 (b) was adopted by 23 votes to 7, with 20 abstentions.

The resolution as a whole was adopted by 37 votes to 2, with 13 abstentions.

Representatives of Bolivia, the Byelorussian SSR, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Pakistan, Poland, Syria, the Ukrainian SSR, the USSR and the United Kingdom explained their votes.

Representatives of Pakistan and the United Kingdom, who had abstained in the vote, did not consider it wise or useful at present to define aggression. While expressing the opinion that a definition of aggression was possible in the future, the representative of Pakistan, in view of the sharp differences of opinion expressed, felt that the present time was not propitious for any attempt to define aggression. Although the representative of the United Kingdom in the Sixth Committee had voted against the resolution just adopted, he had abstained, he explained, because his country was willing to co-operate to the best of its ability and resources in studying the question, if a majority of the Assembly so wished.

²⁴ As India declared itself unable to serve on the committee, it was replaced by Pakistan. For membership of committee, see p. 33.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR declared that they were in favour of defining aggression—the USSR first proposing its definition of aggression as early as 1933 in the League of Nations—because they felt that the adoption of a definition of aggression would be an important step in strengthening the peace and security of nations. While realizing that the mere existence of a definition would not in itself prevent aggression, it would, in their opinion, constitute a sharp warning to aggressors. A definition, they said, would serve as an effective instrument of the organs of the United Nations, assisting them to fulfil the tasks entrusted to them by the Charter for the maintenance of peace.

They went on to state that the majority of delegations, however, while recognizing the desirability and possibility of a definition of aggression, expressed a desire that studies and work which would ultimately lead to the formulation of a definition should be continued. In a spirit of co-operation, they had voted for the draft resolution, despite the fact that the Polish amendment was rejected and even though certain parts of the draft, in their opinion, were not favourable.

For example, they saw no reason to postpone defining aggression for two years. The special committee, in their opinion, should not be asked to do anything but deal specifically and directly with the question of defining aggression; it should not be asked to deal with the problems raised by the inclusion of a definition of aggression in the Code of Offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind, nor should it be asked to deal with any other problem which might be raised by a definition of aggression.

The representative of Syria felt that a definition of aggression was necessary in order to lessen international tension and to develop international law and international penal justice.

The representative of Colombia explained that he had voted in favour of the draft resolution on the understanding that it would contribute, through the establishment of a special committee, to the task of deciding whether a definition of aggression was in the interests of international peace. The special committee which had just been established, the representative of Bolivia observed, was to study the problem as a whole, not merely from one country's point of view.

The resolution adopted by the Assembly (688 (VII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having regard to its resolution 599(VI) of 31 January 1952,

"Considering that the discussion of the question of defining aggression at the sixth and seventh sessions of the General Assembly and in the International Law Commission has revealed the complexity of this question and the need for a detailed study of:

"(a) The various forms of aggression,

"(b) The connexion between a definition of aggression and the maintenance of international peace and security,

"(c) The problems raised by the inclusion of a definition of aggression in the Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind and by its application within the framework of international criminal jurisdiction,

"(d) The effect of a definition of aggression on the exercise of the jurisdiction of the various organs of the United Nations,

"(e) Any other problem which might be raised by a definition of aggression,

"Considering that continued and joint efforts shall be made to formulate a generally acceptable definition of aggression, with a view to promoting international peace and security and to developing international law,

"1. Decides to establish a Special Committee of fifteen members, each representing one of the following Member States: Bolivia, Brazil, China, Dominican Republic, France, Iran, Mexico, Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Poland, Syria, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, to meet at the Headquarters of the United Nations in 1953;

"2. Requests the said Special Committee:

"(a) To submit to the General Assembly at its ninth session draft definitions of aggression or draft statements of the notion of aggression;

"(b) To study all the problems referred to above on the assumption of a definition being adopted by a resolution of the General Assembly;

"3. Requests the Secretary-General to communicate the Special Committee's report to Member States for their comments and to place the question on the provisional agenda of the ninth session of the General Assembly."

E. THE INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMISSION

1. Report of the Commission's Fourth Session

The International Law Commission (ILC) held its fourth session at Geneva, Switzerland, from 4 June to 8 August 1952. It elected for a term of one year the following officers: Chairman—Ricardo J. Alfaro; First Vice-Chairman—J. P. A. François; Second Vice-Chairman—Gilberto Amado; Rapporteur—Jean Spiropoulos.

The Commission took note of the casual vacancies in its membership arising from the resignation of James Leslie Brierly, Vladimir M. Koretsky and Sir Benegal N. Rau. It elected F. I. Kozhevnikov (USSR), H. Lauterpacht (United Kingdom) and Radhabinod Pal (India) to fill these vacancies.

a. ARBITRAL PROCEDURE

A Second Report on Arbitration Procedure (A/CN.4/46), presented by the special rapporteur on the subject, Georges Scelle, to the Commission's third session was considered at the fourth session, as well as a Supplementary Note to the Second Report on Arbitration Procedure (A/CN.4/57) presented by Mr. Scelle. The Commission adopted a "Draft on Arbitral Procedure", consisting of 32 articles, with comments. In accordance with its Statute, it decided to transmit this draft, through the Secretary-General, to governments for comments. The Commission would then draw up a final draft on arbitral procedure at its next session and submit it to the General Assembly. It was also decided that the final draft should be accompanied by a detailed commentary giving an account and an analysis of the relevant practice, including arbitration treaties and compromissory clauses, arbitral decisions and the literature on the subject. That commentary, to be prepared by the Secretariat under the direction of and in consultation with a special rapporteur, was to be available to the Commission at its next session.

In its report the Commission pointed out that, while bearing in mind the distinction between the codification of existing practice and the development of international law on the subject, it had had to take both methods into account in preparing its draft. It considered that it had codified existing practice since it based the draft on the principle that arbitration is a method of settling disputes between States in accordance with law, as distinguished from the political and diplomatic procedures of mediation and conciliation.

On the other hand, in order to render the arbitration procedures as effective as possible, it had sought to introduce new methods for solving difficulties with respect to the drafting of a compromis and the constitution of an arbitral tribunal. Similarly, it had tried to safeguard the effectiveness of the process of arbitration and the independent standing of arbitral tribunals in their capacity as international organs, by provisions relating to the continuity of arbitral tribunals once constituted. In the interests of the effectiveness of the arbitration process it had elaborated provisions based on the generally accepted principle that the arbitral tribunal has the legal power to determine its jurisdiction in conformity with the instrument creating it and to decide on its procedure. While adopting the principle that arbitral awards are final and without appeal, the Commission also had included in the draft articles concerning revision and annulment of the award, limiting to three the causes justifying annulment.

The Commission stated that it had tried to strike a balance between the consideration that the parties must be in a position to adapt the arbitration procedure to the requirements of a particular dispute and the necessity, arising from the character of arbitration as a judicial process distinct from methods of political adjustment and conciliation, that some provisions, such as those relating to revision and annulment, must be mandatory.

During the discussions two points of view were expressed: (1) that the agreement of the parties was essential not only in the original obligation to have recourse to arbitration but also at every stage of the process; and (2) that provision must be made to safeguard the efficacy of the obligation to arbitrate when the subsequent attitude of the parties threatened to render nugatory the undertaking to arbitrate. The second conception had prevailed in the draft.

The articles of the Draft on Arbitral Procedure read:

Chapter I

The Undertaking to Arbitrate

Article 1

"1. An undertaking to have recourse to arbitration may apply to existing disputes or to disputes arising in the future.

"2. The undertaking shall result from a written instrument.

"3. The undertaking constitutes a legal obligation which must be carried out in good faith, whatever the nature of the agreement from which it results.

Article 2

"1. If, prior to the constitution of an arbitral tribunal, the parties to an undertaking to arbitrate disagree as to the existence of a dispute, or as to whether an existing dispute is within the scope of the obligation to have recourse to arbitration, the question may, in the absence of agreement between the parties upon another procedure, be brought before the International Court of Justice on an application by either party. The judgment rendered by the Court shall be final.

"2. In its judgment on the question, the Court may prescribe the provisional measures to be taken for the protection of the respective interests of the parties pending the constitution of the arbitral tribunal.

Chapter II

Constitution of the Tribunal

Article 3

"1. Within three months from the date of the request made for the submission of a dispute to arbitration, or from the date of the decision of the International Court of Justice in conformity with article 2, paragraph 1, the parties to an undertaking to arbitrate shall constitute an arbitral tribunal by mutual agreement. This may be done either in the compromis referred to in article 9, or in a special instrument.

"2. If the appointment of the members of the tribunal is not made by the parties within the period of three months as provided in the preceding paragraph, the parties shall request a third State to make the necessary appointments.

"3. If the parties are unable to agree on the selection of the third State within three months, each party shall designate a State, and the necessary appointments shall be made by the two States thus designated.

"4. If either party fails to designate a State under the preceding paragraph within three months, or if the governments of the two States designated fail to reach an agreement within three months, the necessary appointments shall be made by the President of the International Court of Justice at the request of either party. If the President is prevented from acting or is a national of one of the parties, the appointments shall be made by the Vice-President. If the Vice-President is prevented from acting or is a national of one of the parties, the appointments shall be made by the oldest member of the Court who is not a national of either party.

Article 4

"1. The parties having recourse to arbitration may act in whatever manner they deem most appropriate; they may refer the dispute to a tribunal consisting of a sole arbitrator or of two or more arbitrators as they think fit.

"2. With due regard to the circumstances of the case, however, the sole arbitrator or the arbitrators should be chosen from among persons of recognized competence in international law.

Article 5

"1. Once the tribunal has been constituted, its composition shall remain unchanged until the award has been rendered.

"2. A party may, however, replace an arbitrator appointed by it, provided that the tribunal has not yet begun its proceedings. An arbitrator may not be replaced during the proceedings before the tribunal except by agreement between the parties.

Article 6

"Should a vacancy occur for reasons beyond the control of the parties, it shall be filled by the method laid down for the original appointment.

Article 7

"1. Once the proceedings before the tribunal have begun, an arbitrator may not withdraw, or be withdrawn by the government which has appointed him, save in exceptional cases and with the consent of the other members of the tribunal.

"2. If, for any reason such as previous participation in the case, a member of the tribunal considers that he cannot take part in the proceedings, or if any doubt arises in this connexion within the tribunal, it may decide, on the unanimous vote of the other members, to request his replacement.

"3. Should the withdrawal take place, the remaining members shall have power, upon the request of one of the parties, to continue the proceedings and render the award.

Article 8

"1. A party may propose the disqualification of one of the arbitrators on account of a fact arising subsequently to the constitution of the tribunal; it may propose the disqualification of one of the arbitrators on account of a fact arising prior to the constitution of the tribunal only if it can show that it was unaware of the fact or has been a victim of fraud. In either case, the decision shall be taken by the other members of the tribunal.

"2. In the case of a sole arbitrator, the decision shall rest with the International Court of Justice.

Chapter III

The Compromis

Article 9

"Unless there are prior provisions on arbitration which suffice for the purpose, the parties having recourse to arbitration shall conclude a compromis which shall specify, in particular:

(a) The subject of the dispute, defined as precisely and as clearly as possible;

(b) The selection of arbitrators, in case the tribunal has not already been constituted;

(c) The appointment of agents and counsel;

(d) The procedure to be followed, or provisions for the tribunal to establish its own procedure;

(e) Without prejudice to the provisions of article 7, paragraph 3, if the tribunal has several members, the number of members constituting a quorum for the conduct of the proceedings;

(f) Without prejudice to the provisions of article 7, paragraph 3, the number of members constituting the majority required for an award of the tribunal;

(g) The law to be applied by the tribunal and the power, if any, to adjudicate ex aequo et bono;

(h) The time limit within which the award shall be rendered; the form of the award, any power of the tribunal to make recommendations to the parties; and any special provisions concerning the procedure for revision of the award and other legal remedies;

(i) The place where the tribunal shall meet, and the date of its first meeting;

(j) The language to be employed in the proceedings before the tribunal;

(k) The manner in which the costs and expenses shall be divided.

Article 10

"1. If the parties cannot agree on the contents of the compromis, they may request the good offices of a third State which shall appoint a person, or a body of persons, to draw up the compromis.

"2. If the parties are bound by an undertaking to arbitrate, and when the tribunal has been constituted, then, in the event of the failure of the above procedure for drawing up the compromis, the tribunal shall draw up the compromis within a reasonable time which it shall itself determine.

Chapter IV

Powers of the Tribunal

Article 11

b. NATIONALITY INCLUDING STATELESSNESS

As regards the topic of nationality including statelessness, the special rapporteur on the subject, Manley O. Hudson, appointed by the Commission at its third session, submitted a report (A/CN.4/50) to the Commission's fourth session. Several documents prepared by the Secretariat were also made available to the Commission, including a consolidated report entitled The Problem of Statelessness (A/CN.4/56), Nationality of Married Women (E/CN.6/126/Rev.1 and E/CN.6/129/Rev.1) and A Study of Statelessness (E/1112 and Add.1).

In his report, the special rapporteur made a survey of the subject of nationality in general, and presented two working papers, one containing a draft of a convention on nationality of married persons, following closely the terms proposed by the Commission on the Status of Women and approved by the Economic and Social Council. The special rapporteur suggested that the ILC should agree to the request to draft a convention embodying those terms without expressing its own views. The Commission, however, did not agree with this view, and considered that the question of nationality of married women could only be considered as an integral part of the whole subject of nationality, including statelessness. The other working paper dealt with statelessness, listing nineteen points for discussion. The Commission considered that draft conventions on the elimination of statelessness and on the reduction of future statelessness should be prepared for its next session. To guide the special rapporteur as to the content of the proposed draft conventions it gave general directions, to which, however, three members of the Commission were opposed.

The Commission decided on 25 July 1952 to invite Ivan S. Kerno to serve, after his resignation from the Secretariat of the United Nations,²⁵ as an individual expert of the Commission to work on the question of elimination or reduction of statelessness. It elected Roberto Cordova to succeed Manley O. Hudson who resigned on 1 August as special rapporteur on the topic of nationality including statelessness.

c. OTHER DECISIONS

J. P. A. François, special rapporteur on the regime of the territorial sea, appointed at the Commission's third session, submitted a report (A/CN.4/53) to the fourth session containing a ²⁵ Dr. Kerno's resignation as Assistant Secretary-General for Legal Affairs became effective on his attaining the age of 61 on 26 September 1952.

"Draft Regulation", consisting of 23 articles together with comments. The Commission decided, as suggested by the special rapporteur, to use the term "territorial sea" instead of "territorial waters" since the latter expression had sometimes been taken to include inland waters. It also discussed the question of the juridical status of the territorial sea, of its bed and subsoil, and of the air space above it; the breadth of the territorial sea; base line; and bays. It decided that governments should be asked to furnish the Commission with information on their practice on the delimitation of the territorial sea of two adjacent States, and that experts should be consulted on technical aspects of the problem. It asked the special rapporteur to present to its fifth session a further report with a revised draft and commentary.

The Commission had before it the third report (A/CN.4/51) of J. P. A. François, the special rapporteur, on the regime of the high seas as well as comments from governments (A/CN.4/55 and Add. 1 to 4) on its "Draft Articles on the Continental Shelf and Related Subjects". It deferred consideration of the rapporteur's report until its fifth session. It invited governments which had not yet submitted comments on the "Draft Articles" to do so, and asked the special rapporteur to study replies from governments and other comments, and to submit to the Commission's fifth session a final report on the continental shelf and related subjects, so that the Commission might adopt a report for submission to the General Assembly.

Following the resignation of James L. Brierly, who had been special rapporteur on the law of treaties, the Commission did not discuss his "Third Report on the Law of Treaties" (A/CN.4/54) which was placed before it at its fourth session. It elected H. Lauterpacht to succeed Mr. Brierly, and asked him to take into account the work that had been done by the Commission, as well as that by Mr. Brierly, on this subject and to present a report to the Commission's fifth session.

2. Resolution Adopted by the General Assembly

At its seventh session, the General Assembly referred the report of the International Law Commission (A/2163) to the Sixth Committee which considered it at its 312th meeting on 28 October.

At the outset of the Committee's consideration of the item, the representative of Iran suggested that, since the report of the International Law Commission was in the nature of a progress report submitted to the General Assembly for its information, the Sixth Committee should not discuss questions on which the Commission had not yet completed its action. He accordingly submitted a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.241) by which the General Assembly, pending its consideration of the questions dealt with in the report of the Commission, would note the progress of the Commission's work on those questions.

The representative of Peru considered that the Committee should discuss the substance of the report. He stated that some of the questions dealt with in it were controversial and it might prove helpful to the Commission to have the comments of representatives on some of those points.

Other representatives, on the other hand, including those of Canada, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, Pakistan, Panama, Sweden, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia, did not think it appropriate to discuss the substance of the report, since it contained no finished work for the Assembly's consideration.

The representative of Iran accepted an oral amendment by El Salvador to add the words "in due course" after the words "pending its consideration". The representative of El Salvador explained that this was intended to convey the idea that the General Assembly would, in time, consider the questions dealt with in the Commission's report.

The representative of Syria proposed orally that a clause be added by which the Assembly would note the decisions taken by the Commission during its fourth session. He withdrew the proposal in favour of a Brazilian oral amendment according to which the Assembly would take note of the report. The Brazilian amendment was accepted by the representative of Iran.

The amended Iranian draft resolution was adopted by 42 votes to none, with 7 abstentions (A/2248). It was adopted by the General Assembly at its 391st plenary meeting on 6 November 1952 without objection or discussion as resolution 683 (VII).

F. WAYS AND MEANS FOR MAKING THE EVIDENCE OF CUSTOMARY INTERNATIONAL LAW MORE READILY AVAILABLE

1. Report by the Secretary-General

In accordance with the General Assembly's resolution 602 (VI)²⁶ of 1 February 1952 on the question of ways and means for making the evidence of customary international law more readily available, the Secretary-General submitted a report (A/2170) to the seventh session of the Assembly containing detailed plans on the form, contents and budgetary implications in regard to the possible publication of: (1) a United Nations juridical yearbook, (2) a consolidated index to the League of Nations Treaty Series, (3) a list of treaty collections supplementary to those already existing, and (4) a volume containing a repertoire of the practice of the Security Council.

The Secretary-General, in his report, expressed doubts as to whether the usefulness of a juridical yearbook would be sufficient to justify the expense and labour involved. The collection of the material to be included would require the highest technical skill, he said, and would be made more difficult by the degree of completeness and accuracy which would be expected of an official United Nations publication. Moreover, it would be difficult to avoid duplication with existing publications, such as the Legislative Series or the Reports of International Arbitral Awards.

With respect to the League of Nations Treaty Series, the Secretary-General stated that the work of preparation of a consolidated index to the 205 volumes could not be accomplished with the present personnel. The cost of two volumes of consolidated index covering all three sections of the nine existing index volumes of the League of Nations Treaty Series was estimated at $69,200 (gross); the cost of one volume containing the English and French version of a consolidation of the alphabetical part only of the nine index volumes was estimated at $62,400 (gross).

A list of treaty collections, also, it was stated, would not necessitate fresh appropriations for personnel but could be compiled by the existing staff. It was estimated that a United Nations list would be approximately 400 pages and an edition of 2,200 copies (in English and French) would cost $2,900. It was estimated that revenue from the sale of such a list would be $1,040.

A volume containing a repertoire of the practice of the Security Council based on the Official Records through December 1951, the Secretary-General estimated, would probably not exceed 500 pages, and would be available by the end of 1953. On this assumption, the cost of printing 2,100 copies in English and 750 copies in French would not exceed $11,150 on the basis of current prices. If the methods outlined in the report were accepted, the Secretary-General envisaged that no additional personnel would be required to carry out the work.

2. Consideration by the General Assembly at its Seventh Session

The Secretary-General's report was considered at the Assembly's seventh session at the 317th to 320th meetings of the Sixth Committee from 3 to 5 November 1952.

It was generally agreed that all the four publications envisaged in the Assembly resolution and surveyed in the report of the Secretary-General had considerable intrinsic usefulness. In view, however, of budgetary and other practical considerations the Sixth Committee could take decisions only by weighing their relative value against the estimated costs given in the report. The following were some of the points raised with respect to each of the four proposed publications.

Publication of a consolidated index to the League of Nations Treaty Series—It was generally agreed that, since there existed nine index volumes to the League of Nations Treaty Series, and in view of the cost involved as estimated in the report of the Secretary-General, the publication of a consolidated index should not be undertaken for the time being.

Publication of a list of treaty collections—Members of the Sixth Committee were agreed that the publication of a list of treaty collections would be of great value, not only as evidence of customary international law but also as likely to assist the work of the United Nations. The cost involved, as estimated by the Secretary-General in his report, they emphasized, would be relatively small.

The representative of Israel noted, however, that the Secretary-General's report was based on the assumption that the Manual of Collections of Treaties and of Collections relating to Treaties by Denys P. Myers (1922) was readily available.

²⁶ See Y.U.N., 1951, p. 851.

In actual fact, he pointed out, the Manual was out of print and it was extremely difficult to obtain a copy. It was therefore useless to suggest the publication of a supplement to a manual which was not itself available. In any event, the Manual prepared by Myers did not cover treaties exclusively; it contained a great deal of material which was of more use to the scientific researcher than to the legal practitioner. Some of the collections it listed were of purely historical interest. He therefore suggested that instead of publishing a supplement to Myers' Manual, the Secretariat should publish a new list omitting the material contained in the work by Myers which was not strictly required by the legal practitioner, and adding any new collections issued since 1922.

Publication of a repertoire of the practice of the Security Council—Most of the representatives participating in the discussion supported the publication of such a repertoire on the grounds of its practical usefulness and of the low cost involved. It was pointed out that such a repertoire would be of great value to Member States as well as to students and publicists of international law, and it would be very useful if a conference were called to review the United Nations Charter in 1955.

Some representatives expressed the opinion that it also would be useful eventually to have a repertoire of the practice of other organs of the United Nations. In this connexion, the Committee heard the representative of the Secretary-General who stated that the proposed repertoire of the practice of the Security Council would, of course, cover only a limited part of the work of the United Nations. If the General Assembly decided that that part was required first, the efforts of the Secretariat could be concentrated upon it without prejudice to the other work, but the combined results would in due course be made available to the General Assembly.

Publication of a United Nations juridical yearbook—Most of the discussion in the Sixth Committee centred around the proposal to publish a United Nations juridical yearbook.

Some representatives, including those of Afghanistan, Bolivia, Colombia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Egypt, Haiti, Honduras, Iran, Israel, Liberia, Pakistan, Panama and Yugoslavia, who were in favour of this publication, considered its intrinsic value as being worth the expenditure it would entail as estimated in the Secretary-General's report. It was emphasized that such a publication would provide a valuable means of following legal developments in the world and would form a link between theory and practice, thus exerting a favourable influence on legal decisions taken in the United Nations. The impact of the United Nations on international law and certain far-reaching developments in recent years, which greatly extended the applicability of international law, consequent upon the emergence of a number of independent States and the establishment of various intergovernmental organizations, were said to render the publication of a United Nations juridical yearbook an urgent necessity. In the view of some representatives, in particular those of Ecuador, Egypt and Honduras, such a publication would be especially useful in countries which do not at present possess libraries well stocked with material on international law.

On the other hand, some representatives, including those of Argentina, Denmark, Poland and the USSR, pointed to the difficulties inherent in the publication of a United Nations juridical yearbook. To be comprehensive, they said, it would in part duplicate existing publications, such as the United Nations Legislative Series, the Yearbook on Human Rights, the Yearbook of the International Court of Justice, the Yearbook of the United Nations and the Annual Digest and Reports of Public International Law Cases edited by Professor H. Lauterpacht. If, however, matters covered by existing publications were to be eliminated, there would probably remain an insufficient flow of material to warrant an annual publication. In their opinion such a publication would not be worth the relatively high cost envisaged.

The representatives of, among others, Australia, India, Iraq, the United Kingdom and Venezuela, expressed the opinion that further study was required concerning the publication of a juridical yearbook and that the project should not be undertaken immediately. It was emphasized, however, that this did not imply a complete abandonment of the proposition.

In answer to those representatives who stressed the possibility of duplication if a juridical yearbook were published, the representatives of Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Iran, Israel and Yugoslavia, among others, contended that the fear of duplication should not be over-emphasized. It was pointed out that existing publications similar to the proposed juridical yearbook were scattered; what was needed was a systematic compilation. Moreover, duplication could be overcome, they argued, by, for example, avoiding the reproduction in extenso of matter that had already appeared in official documents of the United Nations or the specialized agencies. For the sake of completeness, reference could be made to such documents, noting where they were to be found. The representatives of Ecuador and Iran, among others, stressed the fact that the costs involved in the publication of a juridical yearbook might perhaps be diminished by reducing the scope of the yearbook. They felt that the utility of the publication was commensurate with the costs involved.

The draft resolution eventually adopted by the Sixth Committee represented a compromise between those representatives who advocated immediate publication of a juridical yearbook and those who thought the publication undesirable at the present time.

The Sixth Committee, at its 320th meeting on 5 November, voted on the proposals before it. The only draft resolution before it was that submitted jointly by Australia, Canada, Denmark, the Netherlands, Sweden, Syria and the United Kingdom (A/C.6/L.255), which was later revised orally; and amendments to it:

(1) by Egypt (A/C.6/L.256); (2) jointly by Afghanistan, Bolivia, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, El Salvador, Haiti, Honduras, Iran, Israel, Liberia, Pakistan, Panama, the Dominican Republic and Yugoslavia (A/C.6/L.257) (which superseded an oral amendment by the representative of Ecuador on behalf of his delegation as well as those of Afghanistan, Bolivia, Cuba, El Salvador, the Dominican Republic, Honduras, Iran, Israel, Pakistan and Yugoslavia); and (3) by Iran (A/C.6/L.258).

The joint draft resolution provided in its operative part that the General Assembly would authorize the Secretary-General to undertake, as soon as feasible, the publication of:

(1) a list of treaty collections supplementary to those already existing; and (2) a repertoire of the practice of the Security Council. It would also request the Secretary-General to prepare and circulate to Member Governments "a report containing detailed plans as to form, contents and budgetary implications in regard to the expansion of existing United Nations publications and the launching of new special publications of limited scope . . ."

To meet the point raised by the representative of Israel during the discussion, the United Kingdom representative, on behalf of the sponsors, revised orally the clause concerning a list of treaty collections to provide for the compilation of such a list "taking into account the suggestions made during the debate in the Sixth Committee".

The Egyptian amendment related to the preamble of the joint draft. The first part of the amendment, which altered the terms of the Assembly's reference to the Secretary-General's report from "having considered" to "considering" was adopted by 27 votes to 1, with 21 abstentions. The second part, which would have deleted the second paragraph of the preamble (see below), was rejected by 27 votes to 10, with 13 abstentions.

The joint amendment proposed:

(1) to authorize the Secretary-General to undertake, as soon as feasible, the publication of a juridical yearbook, limited in scope, in addition to the publication of a list of treaty collections and a repertoire of the practice of the Security Council; and

(2) to delete the paragraph of the joint draft calling for a report containing plans for expanded and new publications. The first part of the amendment was rejected by 25 votes to 17, with 10 abstentions, and the second part was thereupon withdrawn by the sponsors.

The Iranian amendment, explained its author, was aimed at reaching a compromise solution. It proposed to reword the paragraph calling for a report on expanded and new publications; according to the Iranian amendment the Secretary-General would prepare and circulate to Member Governments a comparative study of the extent to which developments in customary international law and selected legal activities of the United Nations could usefully be covered by United Nations publications, including a juridical yearbook (for text, see paragraph 2 of resolution, as adopted, below). This amendment was adopted by 41 votes to none, with 10 abstentions.

The first paragraph of the operative part of the joint draft resolution, as revised by its sponsors, was put to the vote in parts. The first phrase "A list of treaty collections" was adopted by 45 votes to none, with 3 abstentions. The second phrase "to be compiled, taking into account the suggestions made during the debate in the Sixth Committee" was adopted by 20 votes to 14, with 14 abstentions.

The joint draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

The draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee (A/2258) was considered by the General Assembly at its 400th plenary meeting on 5 December. The Assembly also had before it a report of the Fifth Committee (A/2280) which informed the Assembly that adoption of the Sixth Committee's proposed resolution would involve expenditure in 1953 which could be reasonably estimated at $14,100 on a gross basis. The Fifth Committee also recommended that, in the event of the adoption of the proposed resolution by the General Assembly, the necessary provision of $14,100 should be met out of the global appropriation already recommended by the Fifth Committee for publications.

The draft resolution proposed by the Sixth Committee was adopted, without discussion, by 44 votes to none, with 5 abstentions, as resolution 686(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering the report of the Secretary-General on ways and means for making the evidence of customary international law more readily available submitted in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 602(VI) of 1 February 1952,

"Having regard to the detailed plans in the report as to the form, contents and budgetary implications of certain publications referred to in the aforesaid resolution and to the conclusions of the Secretary-General stated in the report,

"1. Authorizes the Secretary-General to undertake, as soon as feasible, the publication of:

"(a) A list of treaty collections, to be compiled taking into account the suggestions made during the debate in the Sixth Committee;

"(b) A repertoire of the practice of the Security Council;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to prepare and circulate to the governments of Member States a comparative study of the extent to which developments in the field of customary international law and selected legal activities of the United Nations can usefully be covered by an expansion of existing United Nations publications, by the launching of new special publications of limited scope and by a United Nations juridical yearbook; such study shall cover form, contents and budgetary implications."

G. QUESTION OF THE CODIFICATION OF "DIPLOMATIC INTER-COURSE AND IMMUNITIES" BY THE INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMISSION

The item "Giving priority to the codification of the topic 'diplomatic intercourse and immunities' " was placed on the agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly at the request of Yugoslavia (A/2144).

In an explanatory memorandum (A/2144/Add.1) accompanying the request for its inclusion, Yugoslavia stated that diplomatic envoys had, from the earliest times, been granted certain immunities which were deemed essential to the accomplishment of the concrete tasks they had been assigned. However, in view of the fact that violations of international law in the field of diplomatic intercourse and immunity had "not only become more frequent, but are assuming an increasingly serious character and are tending to become a more or less established feature of international relations, thus imperilling the maintenance of normal relations among States", Yugoslavia considered that this problem should be studied by the International Law Commission without delay as one of "obvious international urgency".

The memorandum stated that the confirmation of the existing rules of international intercourse and immunities by the International Law Commission would in itself mean a substantial contribution to the elimination of "such unhealthy international practices" and would lead to a better observance of the basic rules of diplomatic intercourse.

Yugoslavia felt compelled to propose the codification of this topic, the memorandum said, because the country had itself "been a victim of such practices" and had thus come to the conviction that "their continuance would further impair international relations". The item was considered by the Sixth Committee during its 313th to 317th meetings, held from 29 October to 3 November 1952.

Introducing the question in the Sixth Committee, the representative of Yugoslavia stated that the rules of law concerning diplomatic intercourse and immunities constituted one of the oldest and least controversial parts of international law.

Although the need for codification of these rules had not been felt in the past, certain steps had nevertheless been taken in that direction in both the League of Nations and the United Nations. One of the earliest tasks of the Sixth Committee had been to draft a general Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations and, in the report covering the work of its first session, the International Law Commission had provisionally selected diplomatic intercourse and immunities as a topic suitable for codification.

This question, he said, had now become more urgent because of the continuing and increasing violation on the part of the "States of the Soviet bloc" of the fundamental rules of law relating to diplomatic intercourse. These countries had for years been pursuing a policy of aggressive pressure against Yugoslavia and their policy had resulted in Yugoslav representatives being subjected to flagrant violations of privileges and immunities which included: discourtesy; maltreatment and physical attacks; arrest; restriction of travel; denial of medical aid and various services; difficulties concerning food supplies; refusal of exit visas; illegal entry into the embassies and legations; the prevention of official contact; censorship and refusal of permission to receive mail and newspapers.

Such violations, he said, were threatening to place the relations between States at the mercy of arbitrary action which was a matter of international concern. It should be considered by the United Nations, whose duty it was to safeguard the maintenance of international peace and security and the development of good-neighbourly relations between peoples.

The codification of rules concerning diplomatic intercourse and immunities by the International Law Commission, he submitted, would exert a positive influence on the application of and respect for the traditional rules of diplomacy by facilitating the determination of the offences committed and by serving as a warning to any who were disposed to commit them. The codification would mobilize world public opinion against aggressive machinations in general and against the activities he had mentioned in particular. World tension would certainly be relieved thereby.

Yugoslavia, he said, was of the opinion that the International Law Commission should give priority to this topic, as article 18 of its statute authorized it to do. He submitted a draft resolution (A/C.6/L248) to that effect.

In the course of the debate, most representatives expressed themselves in favour of requesting the International Law Commission to undertake the codification of the topic "diplomatic intercourse and immunities". They considered that, apart from the reasons mentioned by the Yugoslav representative, the topic was in itself sufficiently important to warrant its early codification. The fact that a growing number of international organizations were seeking immunity for the members of their staff made the matter even more pressing. Denmark was in favour of leaving the question to an international conference but a prior study of the question by the International Law Commission would be helpful.

The representative of the United States said that United States diplomats and citizens had also suffered at the hands of the "Cominform regimes" maltreatment similar to that described by the representative of Yugoslavia. Such treatment, the United States representative argued, infringed the basic precepts underlying the Charter and threatened the maintenance of peace. Therefore, to encourage agreement on the rules and practice governing the treatment of diplomatic officials was obviously a step in the right direction. The representative of the United States, supported by the representatives of Colombia and Lebanon, suggested that the Yugoslav draft resolution should be broadened so as to refer to consular as well as to diplomatic privileges and immunities. The two subjects, in their opinion, were so closely related that it seemed desirable and practical to have them treated together.

Some representatives, including those of Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, China, France, Greece, the United Kingdom and the United States, while in agreement with the main purposes of the Yugoslav proposal, were willing to support it on the understanding that it would not in any way have the effect of disrupting the work of the International Law Commission and that the Commission would have complete freedom of action.

The representative of Colombia, supported by representatives of Argentina, Bolivia, Cuba and El Salvador, considered that the topic "diplomatic asylum" was closely linked to that of "diplomatic intercourse and immunities", and should be added to the topic for which priority was requested. They maintained that the efforts of the American countries and the many jurists of all nations who had contributed to the defence of the human right of asylum clearly indicated that the time was ripe for the codification of this topic and that the circumstances justified its being placed on the Commission's list of priorities.

A number of representatives, however, including those of Afghanistan, Australia, Brazil, Chile, Egypt, India, Liberia, Norway, Panama, Peru, the Philippines, Sweden, Syria and the United Kingdom, admitted that while the topic "right of asylum" was closely related in some respects to the topic "diplomatic intercourse and immunities", it was, in fact, a separate topic and should be treated as such. A few representatives, in particular those of Australia, Brazil, Chile and Sweden, also felt that consular immunity was a topic separate from diplomatic immunity.

The representative of Turkey observed that the object of diplomatic asylum was to ensure to diplomatic agents the inviolability of their person and residence, so that they could carry out their duties. In Europe, the inviolability of the diplomat's residence was an unwritten but generally recognized rule. In Latin America, there were written rules which formed part of conventions separate from those relating to diplomatic agents. There were thus two different conceptions, which should be harmonized in a single clear statement. The International Law Commission had planned to codify diplomatic immunity and the right of asylum under different headings. He thought that the difficulties might be avoided by the addition of the words "including the inviolability of embassies and diplomatic residences", for in that way the scope of the topic would be limited and at the same time the right of asylum would not be dropped from the Commission's list.

The representative of Iran explained that the prevailing concept in modern times was that the purpose of diplomatic immunity was to enable diplomats to carry out their functions. In his opinion, it was questionable whether the right of asylum was a prerequisite for carrying out diplomatic functions. By adopting the Colombian viewpoint, the General Assembly, he argued, might give the impression that it had endorsed the controversial principle of the right of asylum.

The representatives of the USSR and Poland expressed the view that the discussion in the Sixth Committee had gone far beyond the scope of the item on the agenda. The question before the Committee, they said, concerned only the priority to be given to a certain topic, and there was no justification for discussing the substance of that topic. The discussion, in their opinion, had clearly shown that the item had been artificially created by the United States and Yugoslavia as a propaganda manoeuvre. There was no real need to recommend the topic "diplomatic intercourse and immunities" to be treated as a priority topic by the International Law Commission, because it was already included in the Commission's programme of work, which contained only priority topics. Consequently the Yugoslav proposal could be of value only if there were evidence that the International Law Commission had refused to carry out the General Assembly's earlier request, and there was in fact no such evidence. Moreover, they argued, article 18 of the statute of the International Law Commission, on which the Yugoslav proposal was based, did not apply since this article concerned only new topics referred to the Commission.

These representatives maintained that the charges made of failure to observe diplomatic privileges and immunities were without any foundation. The USSR representative charged the Yugoslav and United States Governments with attempts to carry out, through their diplomatic representatives, diversionist and espionage activities in the people's democracies. In particular, he cited the United States Mutual Security Act.

Voting on the Yugoslav proposal and the amendments to it took place at the Sixth Committee's 316th meeting on 31 October.

The original Yugoslav proposal (A/C.6/L.248) provided that the General Assembly "recommends the International Law Commission to undertake the codification of the topic 'diplomatic intercourse and immunities' as a matter of priority".

Drafting amendments to this proposal were submitted by France (A/C.6/L.249), and oral amendments were proposed by Australia, Belgium, El Salvador, Iran and the United Kingdom.

At the suggestion of the Committee Chairman, a drafting sub-committee, composed of the representatives of Australia, Colombia, El Salvador, France, Iran, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia, was set up to draw up an agreed text for the consideration of the Committee. As a result, Yugoslavia submitted a revised draft resolution (A/C.6/L.250 and Corr.1), which embodied most of the drafting amendments. The revised draft provided that the General Assembly "requests the International Law Commission, as soon as it considers it possible, to undertake the codification of the topic 'diplomatic intercourse and immunities', and to treat it as a priority topic".

To this revised draft resolution, an amendment was submitted by Colombia (A/C.6/L.251) and oral amendments were proposed by Argentina, Australia, Colombia, Egypt, Haiti, Indonesia and Lebanon.²⁷

Some of the amendments, of a drafting character, were accepted by the representatives of Yugoslavia.

The only amendment adopted by the Committee was that of Argentina and Egypt to delete the reference to the provisions of the Statute of the International Law Commission concerning requests for priority by the General Assembly.

The Committee rejected, by 26 votes to 11, with 16 abstentions, and by 30 votes to 7, with 13 abstentions, respectively, an amendment by Argentina and Indonesia to delete the first paragraph and an amendment by Argentina to delete the fourth paragraph (see below). A further amendment by Argentina, which would have deleted from the operative paragraph the provision that the Commission should undertake the codification "as soon as it considers it possible", was rejected by 28 votes to 13, with 8 abstentions.

The amendment of Lebanon, which would have referred to the treatment of "consular" as well as "diplomatic" representatives, was rejected by 24 votes to 13, with 13 abstentions.

The amendment of Colombia, which would have included "diplomatic asylum" as an aspect of the topic to be codified, was rejected by 24 votes to 17, with 10 abstentions.

The amended draft resolution as a whole was adopted by 42 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions.

²⁷ These amendments, with the exception of the Australian amendment, which was submitted later, were tabulated in a working paper (A/C.6/L.251).

Explanations of voting were given by the representatives of Czechoslovakia and India at the Committee's 317th meeting on 3 November.

The representative of Czechoslovakia had voted against the resolution because, in its final form, he said, it left the International Law Commission completely free to decide when it should discuss the topic in question and consequently did not in any way alter the situation as established under a previous General Assembly resolution (373(IV)). In addition, the discussion had shown that the real purpose of submitting the item had been to give the representatives of Yugoslavia and the United States an opportunity to carry out hostile propaganda against the USSR and the people's democracies. He had not replied to the accusations of the United States representative because those accusations had been irrelevant to the item under discussion, and because there would be ample opportunity to discuss the "hostile activity of the United States against Czechoslovakia" when the General Assembly would take up the item submitted by Czechoslovakia which dealt with the "interference of the United States" in the "internal affairs of other States".

The representative of India said he had voted in favour of the resolution, but his vote should not be interpreted as an endorsement of any of the arguments used in the course of the discussion.

The draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee (A/2252) was adopted by the Assembly, without discussion, at its 400th plenary meeting on 5 December by 42 votes to 5 as resolution 685 (VII). The representative of Venezuela later requested that though he had been unable to vote, his vote should be considered as affirmative. The resolution read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the purposes of the United Nations and the provision of the Preamble of the Charter according to which the 'peoples of the United Nations' are determined 'to practise tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbours',

"Expressing its desire for the common observance by all governments of existing principles and rules and recognized practice concerning diplomatic intercourse and immunities, particularly in regard to the treatment of diplomatic representatives of foreign States,

"Considering that early codification of international law on diplomatic intercourse and immunities is necessary and desirable as a contribution to the improvement of relations between States,

"Noting that the International Law Commission has included the topic 'Diplomatic intercourse and immunities' in the provisional list of topics of international law selected for codification,

"Requests the International Law Commission, as soon as it considers it possible, to undertake the codification of the topic 'Diplomatic intercourse and immunities', and to treat it as a priority topic."

H. INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL JURISDICTION

The Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction met at Geneva from 1 to 31 August 1951 and prepared a draft statute for an international criminal court (A/2136). As requested by the Assembly, the Committee's report was communicated by the Secretary-General to Member Governments for their observations and the question was placed on the provisional agenda of the Assembly's seventh session. By 23 September 1952, eleven Governments—Australia, Chile, China, Denmark, France, Israel, the Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom—had submitted their observations (A/2186 and A/2186/Add.1). Also, India in May 1952 informed the Secretary-General that it did not wish to make any comments at present, and Iraq in June 1952 stated that it had no comments. The observations of the eleven Governments were submitted to the General Assembly.

The Sixth Committee considered the item at its 321st to 328th meetings from 7 to 17 November 1952.

The discussions in the Committee were concerned:

(1) with the question of substance, as to whether, in the light of the report of the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction and of its draft statute for an international criminal court, such a court should be established; and (2) with the question of procedure, as to whether the question should be studied further or whether its consideration should be postponed.

Arguments were advanced again, as they had been in the International Law Commission and in the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction and, during 1950, in the Sixth Committee²⁸ both in favour and against the establishment of an international criminal court.

²⁸ See Y.U.N., 1950, pp. 857-61; Y.U.N., 1951, pp. 852-54.

Those in favour of establishing the court included, in particular, the representatives of France, Iran and the Netherlands. Among the arguments put forward in favour of establishing the Court were:

(1) that the individual had become a subject of international law and the concept was becoming accepted of the establishment of personal criminal responsibility in an international sense; (2) it was desirable that criminals should be tried by a court already in existence before the crime was committed rather than by an ad hoc tribunal such as that of Nürnberg; (3) the existence of a permanent international criminal court would be a deterrent to crimes; (4) it would contribute to the establishment of a body of precedents in international law; and (5) the court would have many functions to perform and could deal with the lesser as well as the graver crimes of international concern.

Those opposing the establishment of the court included, in particular, the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR. Among the arguments they advanced were:

(1) that since criminal jurisdiction was part of the sovereign rights of States, the establishment of such a court would infringe upon the sovereignty of States; (2) it would result in interference in the domestic affairs of States, thereby violating Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter; (3) it was incompatible with the principle of territorial jurisdiction; and (4) it would not contribute to the maintenance of international peace.

The representatives of Egypt, Iraq and Venezuela pointed to the obstacles involved, especially with respect to restrictions upon the concept of state sovereignty. Other objections were:

(1) that the court might simply be used as a forum for propaganda; (2) that it could only meet with success if unusually good relations prevailed among nations whereas relations at present were somewhat strained; and (3) that it might well increase international tension.

Several representatives took the position that it was impracticable in existing circumstances to establish an international criminal court. These included the representatives of Argentina, Brazil, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and Venezuela. They emphasized that it was essential that such a court should have the necessary powers to function effectively. Some of these representatives considered that the court envisaged in the draft statute prepared by the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction would be unable to function. For example, it was stated that the draft statute imposed no obligations upon States and left such questions as bringing the accused and witnesses before the court and the execution of sentences passed by the court to be dealt with by separate conventions.

In the opinion of the United Kingdom representative, in particular, there was no need for an international criminal court. In his view, war crimes could be dealt with reasonably well by national tribunals, or by ad hoc international tribunals such as those of Nürnberg and Tokyo; these latter tribunals, he said, were more effective than a permanent international court. Judges of neutral nationalities could be appointed in order to overcome the objection that judges of an ad hoc tribunal were often persons of the nationality of the victors. He argued further that the existence of a permanent international criminal court would not constitute a deterrent to crimes against peace and against humanity, since those who committed them relied on the protection of their government and no government would ever start a war unless it expected to win.

Some representatives, including those of Argentina, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, Iraq, India and Indonesia, expressed the opinion that it would be premature to take a final decision for the establishment of an international criminal court until general agreement had been reached on the law to be applied by the proposed court. It would be a contradiction of criminal justice to set up a court without clearly and explicitly defining the law it was to apply. The code of offences against the peace and security of mankind, prepared by the International Law Commission, had not yet been adopted by the General Assembly, and aggression, in particular, had not yet been defined.

The fact that no delegation had as yet declared that its government would agree, at the moment, to recognize the jurisdiction of an international criminal court was also said to militate against the immediate establishment of such a court.

On the question of procedure, most of the representatives, including all of those who were in favour of the establishment of an international criminal court, considered that further study was necessary before a final decision on the matter could be taken. These representatives included, among others, those of Afghanistan, Australia, Canada, Chile, China, Cuba, Denmark, Greece, Haiti, Israel, Liberia, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Turkey and the United States. They felt that the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction had left unsolved many questions relating to the proposed court. In their opinion, a special committee to undertake a further study of the matter should be established.

It was felt that directives to such a committee should not imply either favour or disfavour of the idea of an international criminal court, nor should the committee be expected to decide whether the establishment of such a court was feasible; all such questions of policy must be left to the decision of the Sixth Committee. The task of the committee would be to assemble and consider all that had been said regarding the report and the draft statute submitted by the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction and to report back to the Sixth Committee regarding the type of statute that could take into account the comments and criticisms which the 1951 report had evoked.

Some representatives, in particular those of Israel, Sweden and Venezuela, noted that only eleven Governments had submitted their observations on the report of the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction. The representative of Sweden argued that the views of more governments must be ascertained before any further steps were taken to prepare drafts for the establishment of an international criminal court. As only a small minority of the eleven governments which had submitted their observations favoured the establishment of an international criminal court, he considered that the majority of States were not at present inclined to favour the establishment of such a court. He was in favour of postponing indefinitely the consideration of this question.

The Sixth Committee had before it two draft resolutions—one submitted jointly by Cuba, El Salvador, France, Iran, Israel, the Netherlands and the United States (A/C.6/L.260), which was later revised (A/C.6/L.260/Rev.1); and the other submitted by Sweden (A/C.6/L.261), which was likewise later revised (A/C.6/L.261/Rev. 1 and Rev.1/Corr.1).

Amendments to the original joint draft were submitted by the United Kingdom (A/C.6/L.262). These were, however, withdrawn by the sponsor at the 328th meeting of the Sixth Committee on 17 November, in view of the submission of a revised text of the original joint draft. Oral amendments to the original Swedish draft were proposed by the representatives of Panama and Egypt. These oral amendments were accepted by Sweden at the 327th meeting of the Committee on 14 November and were incorporated in the revised draft resolution.

The revised joint draft resolution (A/C.6/L.260/Rev.) provided, inter alia, for the appointment of a seventeen-member committee which would meet in Geneva in August 1953 and, in the light of suggestions made before 1 June 1953 by governments in their written observations, as well as of those made during the debates in the Sixth Committee, would:

- (1) explore the implications and consequences of establishing the international criminal court and of the various manners by which this might be done;
- (2) study the relationship between such a court and the United Nations and its organs;
- (3) re-examine the draft statute prepared by the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction; and
- (4) report to the Assembly at its ninth session.

The draft would also request the Secretary-General to communicate to Members the report of the proposed committee and to place the question of international criminal jurisdiction on the provisional agenda of the Assembly's ninth session.

The representative of the United Kingdom explained that he had submitted amendments to the original joint draft because he felt that its wording should in no way prejudice the question of the possibility of establishing an international criminal court. As it originally stood, the joint draft seemed to take for granted that establishment of such a court was possible, since it instructed a special committee to study the various methods of establishing it, and not the question of principle, that is, whether or not such a court should be established. The special committee, he said, like its predecessor, the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction, might decide that the question of principle was not within its competence; but if its terms of reference were drafted as proposed by the United Kingdom, it would be competent to study the question of principle. Since the revised joint draft, in his opinion, came closer to the United Kingdom position by providing for the proposed committee not only to examine way and means of establishing an international criminal court but also to consider the fundamental preliminary question, he withdrew his amendments.

The effect of the oral amendments proposed by the representatives of Panama and Egypt to the revised Swedish draft (A/C.6/L.261/Rev.1 and Corr.1) was to have the General Assembly decide to postpone the consideration of the question of international criminal jurisdiction for one year (instead of indefinitely as provided for in the original draft) in order to give sufficient time to Member States to present their observations. In addition, the draft would have the Assembly urge the Member States which had not yet done so to make their comments and suggestions on the draft statute, in particular if they were of the opinion that further action should be taken by the General Assembly with a view to the establishment of an international criminal court.

It would also request the Secretary-General to publish the comments and suggestions received from governments for such use as the General Assembly might find desirable at a later stage and to place the question on the provisional agenda of the Assembly's eighth session.

Voting on the two proposals took place at the Committee's 328th meeting on 17 November. The representative of Sweden stated that, since his revised draft would have the effect of postponing a decision on the establishment of a new committee to consider the subject, it would be reasonable for it to be voted upon before the revised joint draft, which provided for the immediate establishment of a committee. On his motion, the Committee decided, by 21 votes to 13, with 19 abstentions, to vote first upon his revised draft.

The various parts of the revised Swedish draft were first voted upon and adopted by votes ranging from 21 to 18, with 5 abstentions, to 14 to 11, with 19 abstentions. The revised draft as a whole was adopted by a roll-call vote of 23 to 16, with 7 abstentions.

In view of the adoption of the revised Swedish draft resolution, the Sixth Committee did not vote upon the revised joint draft resolution.

The draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee (A/2275) was considered by the General Assembly at its 400th plenary meeting on 5 December. To this draft, the representative of the Netherlands submitted a number of amendments (A/L.119). These, in effect, would have the Assembly appoint a seventeen-member committee to meet at United Nations Headquarters sometime in 1953 to explore the implications and consequences of establishing an international criminal court, to study the relationship between such a court and the United Nations and its organs, and to report to the Assembly.

The representative of the Netherlands, supported by the representatives of Belgium, New Zealand, Pakistan and Yugoslavia, spoke in support of the amendments and the representatives of Poland and Sweden opposed them. They repeated the arguments which had been put forward previously in the Sixth Committee.

The Netherlands amendments were voted upon first, and adopted by votes ranging from 32 to 7, with 11 abstentions, to 28 to 12, with 7 abstentions. The draft resolution submitted by the Sixth Committee, as amended and as a whole, was adopted by 33 votes to 9, with 8 abstentions.

The resolution (687(VII)) read:

"The General Assembly,

"Bearing in mind that, by resolution 489 (V) of 12 December 1950, the General Assembly established a Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction, consisting of representatives of seventeen Member States, charged with the task of preparing one or more preliminary draft conventions and proposals relating to the establishment of an international criminal court,

"Recalling that, by the same resolution, the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to communicate the report of the Committee to the governments of Member States so that their observations could be submitted not later than 1 June 1952, and to place the question on the agenda of the seventh session of the General Assembly,

"Noting that the Committee, meeting in August 1951, has prepared a report containing a draft statute for an international criminal court and that the Secretary-General, by a letter of 13 November 1951, has transmitted the Committee's report to the governments of Member States requesting their observations thereon,

"Considering, however, that the number of States which have given their comments and suggestions is very small,

"Considering that there is need for further study of problems relating to an international criminal jurisdiction,

"1. Expresses to the Committee on International Criminal Jurisdiction its appreciation for its valuable work on the draft statute;

"2. Urges the Member States which have not yet done so to make their comments and suggestions on the draft statute, in particular if they are of the opinion that further action should be taken by the General Assembly with a view to the establishing of an international criminal court;

"3. Decides to appoint a Committee composed of one representative each of seventeen Member States, which States shall be designated by the President of the General Assembly in consultation with the Chairman of the Sixth Committee, and directs that this Committee shall meet at the Headquarters of the United Nations in 1953, the exact date to be determined by the Secretary-General, with the following terms of reference:

"(a) In the light of the comments and suggestions on the draft statute submitted by governments, as well as of those made during the debates in the Sixth Committee,

"(i) To explore the implications and consequences of establishing an international criminal court and of the various methods by which this might be done;

"(ii) To study the relationship between such a court and the United Nations and its organs;

"(iii) To re-examine the draft statute;

"(b) To submit a report to be considered by the General Assembly at its ninth session;

"4. Requests the Secretary-General to provide all the necessary services and facilities for the meetings of the Committee."

In accordance with the terms of the resolution, the President of the General Assembly announced, at the 407th plenary meeting on 19 December 1952, that, in consultation with the Chairman of the Sixth Committee, he had designated the following as members of the new committee: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, China, Denmark, Egypt, France, Israel, the Netherlands, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the United States, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

I. QUESTION OF THE REVISION OF THE CHINESE TEXT OF THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

The permanent representative of China, concurrently with the deposit, on 19 July 1951, of China's ratification of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, requested the Secretary-General to revise the Chinese text of the Convention. He transmitted a new text incorporating the amendments desired by his Government with a view to bringing the Chinese text into greater conformity with the other authentic texts of the Convention. The Secretary-General replied that, since all five official texts adopted by the Assembly were equally authentic, he had no authority to undertake, by himself, the revision of the Chinese text.

The permanent representative of China confirmed that his request should be considered an official request for revision in accordance with article XVI of the Convention.

The Chinese request was discussed by the Assembly at its sixth session. By resolution 605 (VI)²⁹ of 1 February 1952, the Assembly decided that as the elements necessary for the discussion of the question were not yet at its disposal, the item should be included in the provisional agenda of its seventh session.

At the Assembly's seventh session, the Czechoslovak and USSR representatives, at the 79th meeting of the General Committee on 15 October, and the representative of the Ukrainian SSR, at the 380th plenary meeting of the Assembly on 16 October, objected to the inclusion of this item in the agenda. They argued that the request for the revision of the Chinese text of the Convention had been submitted, "not by the legitimate government of the People's Republic of China, which alone is entitled to make such a request, but by the representative of the Kuomintang group, which has been expelled by the Chinese people and occupies a place in the United Nations illegally". After the representative of China, in both instances, had declared that the objections regarding the right of his delegation to make proposals was contrary to the provisions of the Charter and to the rules of procedure and, consequently, out of order, the General Committee, by 10 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions, decided to recommend the inclusion of this item in the agenda; the General Assembly, by 37 votes to 6, with 10 abstentions, rejected a Ukrainian SSR proposal to exclude the item.

The Assembly, at its 382nd plenary meeting on 17 October, decided to consider the item in plenary meeting without reference to a committee.

The Assembly had before it a memorandum (A/2221) by the Secretary-General which stated that the Language Services Division of the Secretariat had made a comparative study of the original Chinese text of the Convention and the revised text submitted by the Government of China, annexed to the memorandum. The revised Chinese text, it was stated, appeared to introduce in the main only linguistic revisions and not to alter in any sense the substance or meaning of the Convention as expressed in the other four official texts. It was suggested that the Assembly might give effect to any alterations it desired in the Chinese text either by (1) drawing up a protocol listing the alterations agreed upon, which would thereafter have to be formally accepted by the States parties to the Convention, or (2) adopting such alterations by resolution.

The item was considered at the 400th plenary meeting of the Assembly on 5 December 1952. The representative of China submitted a draft resolution (A/L.116) which, in its preamble, would have the Assembly:

(1) refer to the Chinese request for revision of the Genocide Convention; (2) state that the revised Chinese text introduced revisions which, in the main, were of a linguistic nature; (3) declare that official texts in different languages should be in as close harmony as possible; (4) state that the revised Chinese text was in closer harmony than the existing Chinese text; and (5) refer to article XVI, paragraph 2, of the Convention, under which the General Assembly is empowered to decide upon the steps, if any, to be taken in respect of any request for the revision of the Convention.

In its operative part, it would have the Assembly:

(1) approve the revised Chinese text of the Genocide Convention submitted by China;

(2) recommend that States signatories of, or parties to, the Convention accept the revised Chinese text as the official Chinese text, in lieu of the existing Chinese text of the Convention;

²⁹ See Y.U.N., 1951, p. 859.

(3) request the Secretary-General to transmit, in accordance with article XVII of the Convention, a certified copy of the revised Chinese text, as well as a copy of the resolution adopted by the Assembly, to all Members of the United Nations and to the non-member States contemplated in article XI, and to request States already signatories of or parties to the Convention to notify him, within 90 days from the date of transmission, of their acceptance of or objection to the revised Chinese text. The draft resolution would state that it was understood that States failing to signify their objection within this period would be deemed to have accepted the revised Chinese text.

The representatives of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua submitted a joint draft resolution (A/L.123) proposing that the item be referred to the Sixth Committee during the current session.

The USSR representative opposed the consideration of the draft resolution on the same grounds he had advanced in the General Committee. Any decision to alter the Chinese text of the Genocide Convention that the Assembly might adopt on the basis of the application by the representative of the "Kuomintang clique" would, he said, have no legal basis and would consequently have no legal effect.

The joint draft resolution, being of a procedural nature, was put to the vote first and was adopted by 30 votes to 16, with 3 abstentions. The Chinese draft resolution was, therefore, not voted upon.

The Sixth Committee considered the item at its 354th to 357th meetings, on 18 and 19 December 1952.

The representative of China stated that the sole purpose of his Government's request for revision of the existing Chinese text of the Genocide Convention was to bring the text into greater conformity with the other authentic texts of the Convention. He contended that the existing Chinese text was defective and gave several examples to substantiate his contention. The Chinese text submitted by his Government (A/2221, annex III) would, in the opinion of experts in China, remove such defects. He submitted a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.283), the text of which was identical with that of the draft (A/L.116) introduced by China in the Assembly's plenary meeting.

Some representatives, including, among others, those of Egypt, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, expressed themselves in favour of accepting in principle the Chinese request. They emphasized that the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide did not grant any rights but only imposed obligations on parties to it. In requesting revision of the Chinese text, the Government of China could not be suspected of seeking advantage from the Convention. It was motivated solely by a desire to rectify some inaccuracies in the Chinese text and its good faith was beyond question. The Secretary-General's memorandum had stated that the changes suggested were only of a linguistic nature and did not alter the substance of the Convention. The Chinese request should therefore be acceded to, the more so as its refusal could not fail to harm the Convention, since the Government of China would then be unable to enforce it.

In the light of the advisory opinion³⁰ of 28 May 1951 of the International Court of Justice on Reservations to the Convention on Genocide, the General Assembly, in the opinion of these representatives, was undoubtedly competent to deal with such a question as that raised in the request of China, even if that request were not in the nature of one for revision within the meaning of article XVI of the Convention. This was so because it was the General Assembly that had prepared and approved the Convention and had proposed it for signature and ratification or accession. It would, therefore, be appropriate for the Secretary-General to transmit the text submitted by China to all the parties to the Convention, which would be free to accept or reject it.

Some representatives, including, in particular, those of Afghanistan and Sweden, stated that, since their Governments had recognized the Central People's Government of China, they felt that that Government should have an opportunity to consider any revision of the Chinese text of the Convention.

The representative of India said that he deplored the absence of any "representative of the 400 million Chinese people" and considered that the matter before the Sixth Committee should be deferred until the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations had been realistically and equitably settled. He therefore urged that there should be no further discussion of the Chinese Government's request at the current session.

The representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, Czechoslovakia, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR and the USSR declared that they could not entertain a request submitted by a Government which their Governments did not recognize as the Government of China. They added that they would not participate in the discussion of the item, would vote against the draft resolution before the Committee and would not consider as legally valid any decision reached without the participation of the People's Republic of China.

In reply, the representatives of Chile, China, the United Kingdom and the United States stated that it was out of order to raise the question of China, since the General Assembly by resolution 609 A (VII)³¹ of 25 October 1952, had decided to postpone for the duration of its seventh session consideration of that question.

As to the substance of the Chinese draft resolution, certain representatives pointed to the legal difficulties involved. The representative of France pointed out that the Convention was binding on its 40 signatories, eleven of which were not Members of the United Nations and stated that the utmost caution must be used in deciding what action the Assembly could take in connexion with a text already binding upon non-member States.

The representative of Mexico declared that the States parties to the Convention were not bound to adopt the revised text submitted by China. It might well be that that text would be accepted by some States and rejected by others, which would result in great confusion.

Some representatives, including, among others, those of Israel and Peru, questioned whether the request of China under consideration constituted one for revision within the meaning of article XVI of the Genocide Convention. In the law of treaties, it was explained, revision was usually construed to mean modification of substance or such modifications of language as were substantive in nature. Accordingly, it was suggested that the Chinese draft resolution should refer to "correction" instead of "revision" and any reference therein to article XVI of the Convention should be omitted. This suggestion was accepted by the representative of China, who withdrew the paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution which had referred to article XVI of the Convention.

It was also contended by the representatives of Belgium, Colombia, Israel and the Philippines, among others, that, as most members of the Sixth Committee were not well versed in the Chinese language and therefore could not appraise the text submitted by China, the Committee could not, as provided in the first two operative paragraphs of the Chinese draft, recommend that the General Assembly "approve" the text nor ask the Assembly to recommend that States signatories of or parties to the Convention accept the text. Nor could the Committee, as provided in the fourth paragraph of the preamble, assert that the text submitted by China was in closer harmony with the other authentic texts of the Convention than the existing Chinese text. As to the third paragraph of the preamble, stating that the official texts in different languages of a convention should be in as close harmony as possible, that was said to be a truism which it was superfluous to affirm. In view of these objections, the representative of China withdrew all these paragraphs.

Objections were also expressed to the provision in the third operative paragraph that consent would be presumed where a State signatory of or party to the Convention failed to signify its objection within 90 days. The representative of Belgium said that the General Assembly had, in principle, only powers of recommendation; its recommendations were not binding on States. He considered, therefore, that the Assembly would not be competent to declare, with binding effect, that contracting States would be deemed to have accepted the revised Chinese text unless they had signified objections, thereby subjecting those States to changes in the text of a treaty already in force.

The time-limit of 90 days provided in the same paragraph was criticized as too rigid by, among others, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Colombia, Israel, the Philippines and the United Kingdom. Replies from governments in a treaty matter, they held, often required a longer period. It was also suggested that replies called for under the draft resolution should not be restricted to relate only to "the revised Chinese text", which phrase should be omitted; States should be at liberty to comment not only on the text but also on the procedure and the principle involved. All the passages to which objections had been raised were withdrawn by the representative of China.

As a result of the suggestions accepted by the representative of China, the Chinese draft resolution was revised twice by its author. The first revised text (A/C.6/L.283/Rev.1) was submitted at the 355th meeting on 18 December and the second revised text (A/C.6/L.283/Rev.2) at the following meeting on 19 December.

The second revised text would refer in the preamble to: (1) the Chinese request for a correction of the existing Chinese text of the Genocide Convention, and (2) the Secretary-General's memorandum (A/2221) in which it was stated that the revised Chinese text introduced only corrections which in the main part were of a linguistic nature. In its operative part, it provided that the Assembly request the Secretary-General to transmit a certified copy of the corrected Chinese text of the Convention to the States concerned and to request States signatories of or parties to the Convention to notify him of their acceptance or objection.

The representative of China accepted an oral amendment to this text proposed by the representative of France to refer, in the first paragraph of the preamble, to the "authentic Chinese text" and "the other authentic texts", rather than the "official" Chinese and other texts.

He also accepted a suggestion of the Chairman to delete from the second paragraph of the preamble the reference to the statement of the Secretary-General to the effect that the proposed new Chinese text introduced corrections only of a "linguistic nature" and that it did not in any sense "alter the substance or meaning" of the Genocide Convention as expressed in the other four official texts.

The representative of China also accepted another French oral amendment to delete the last five words of the operative paragraph, which repeated a reference to the "corrected" Chinese text.

The Sixth Committee, at its 356th meeting on 19 December, voted on the second revised draft, as further revised by the representative of China.

It adopted the two paragraphs of the preamble, by 24 votes to 12, with 5 abstentions, and 23 votes to 16, with 3 abstentions, respectively.

The operative paragraph was adopted by 24 votes to 14, with 4 abstentions.

The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted by 24 votes to 16, with 1 abstention.

The representative of the USSR, at the Committee's 357th meeting on 19 December, declared that he had voted against the draft resolution because he considered that draft irregular for reasons he had explained previously. Accordingly, the USSR, he said, would not attach any legal validity to that draft resolution as regards either the item to which it related or any other item in which it might be invoked as a precedent.

The draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee (A/2351) was considered by the Assembly at its 411th plenary meeting on 21 December.

The representatives of China and the United States spoke in support of the resolution and the USSR representative against it; they expressed the views that had previously been advanced in the Sixth Committee.

The representative of Pakistan, stating that he would abstain from voting, said that he entertained some doubts as to the soundness of the resolution, even in its amended form. In his opinion, the proposed new Chinese text sought to introduce into the concept of genocide two new elements, by injecting "ruthlessness" as an inseparable attribute of the crime and by including any kind of human group in the existing definition. If that were so, he said, then the proposed Chinese revision would in effect change the essence of the concept of genocide, and Pakistan was against such a change.

The representative of China deplored that the question of Chinese representation had been raised. As long as his delegation was recognized by the General Assembly, it represented China, he argued. His Government, he explained, needed a satisfactory Chinese text for implementing its obligations under the Genocide Convention, and the Sixth Committee had discovered a formula that would meet that need without causing harm or inordinate inconvenience to anybody. He appealed to the Assembly to accept that formula.

The draft resolution was adopted by 31 votes to 13, with 10 abstentions, as resolution 691(VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that the Government of China has made a request for correction of the authentic Chinese text of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, with a view to bringing the Chinese text into greater harmony with the other authentic texts of the Convention, and had for this purpose submitted a corrected text,

"Considering the memorandum submitted to the General Assembly by the Secretary-General,

"Requests the Secretary-General to transmit a certified copy of the corrected Chinese text of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, as well as a copy of the present resolution, to all Members of the United Nations and to the non-member States contemplated in article XI of the Convention, and to request States signatories of or parties to the Convention to notify him of their acceptance or objection."

J. USE OF THE CITATION "DIED FOR THE UNITED NATIONS"

France, in July 1952, requested the inclusion of the following item in the provisional agenda of the Assembly's seventh session: "Use of the citation 'Died for the United Nations' in respect to persons who, in certain circumstances, are killed in the service of the United Nations."

In an explanatory memorandum (A/2145/Rev.1), France referred to General Assembly resolution 483(V)³² of 12 December 1950 which provided for the issue of a United Nations ribbon for personnel participating in Korea in the defence of the principles of the Charter.

In France, and doubtless in other countries, the memorandum stated, those who in certain circumstances fell in the defence of their national territory or during hostilities in which their country was engaged, were declared to have "died for their country" and a notation to that effect was made on their death certificate. France believed that measures similar to those adopted on the national level in certain countries could be adopted by the United Nations to honour those who were killed in its service. Each State could, of course, make domestic arrangements to render such honour, but the tribute, it appeared to France, would rest on a firmer legal basis and would carry greater prestige if it were the outcome of a United Nations decision and were rendered by that Organization.

The French Government had in mind not only men on active service under the flag of the United Nations, as in Korea, but also, in certain cases, those entrusted by the United Nations with missions as mediators or observers in connexion either with measures of pacification or efforts to settle a dispute or a situation and to prevent them from degenerating into hostilities.

In the opinion of the French Government, the conferring of such a citation should not carry with it any material consequences, so that there would be no change in the practice already followed for compensation in respect of persons who had died in the service of the United Nations.

The General Committee at its 79th meeting on 15 October considered the French request. The representative of France explained that the only purpose of the proposal was to pay a tribute to all those who had fallen in the service of the United Nations in the fight against aggression.

The United States supported the inclusion of the item in the agenda, stating that the time had now come to pay a tribute to those who had sacrificed their lives in defence of the principles of the Charter.

The USSR representative declared that the French proposal was the outcome of the current situation in Korea which had been brought about by the aggressive policy of the United States and the States which supported that policy. An attempt, he argued, was being made to involve the United Nations in that policy under cover of the United Nations flag. The USSR, he stated, refused to be associated with such a plan and opposed the inclusion of the item in the agenda.

The General Committee decided to recommend the inclusion of the item in the agenda.

The General Assembly, at its 380th plenary meeting on 16 October, considered the recommendation of the General Committee. The representative of Czechoslovakia proposed the deletion of the item, advancing arguments similar to those the USSR representative had put forward in the General Committee. The representatives of France and the United States spoke in support of its inclusion. The Assembly, by 48 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, rejected the Czechoslovak proposal, and placed the item on its agenda.

It decided to consider the item directly in plenary session without reference to a Committee.

The Assembly discussed the question at its 401st plenary meeting on 5 December 1952. It had before it a draft resolution (A/L.121 and Corr.1) submitted by France which would have the Assembly declare to have "Died for the United Nations" all those killed in the course of an action or mission on behalf of the Organization in connexion with the maintenance of international peace and security, the prevention, or ending of hostilities, or the suppression of aggression.

The representative of France explained that the only purpose of the draft resolution was that of paying a tribute internationally, and quite impartially, to those who die in the service of the United Nations in order to ensure the victory of the Charter's main aim of maintaining international peace and security. It was true that most of those who were now laying down their lives in defence of this aim are falling in Korea. The draft resolution, however, was intended to have a general application, not only to the present, but also to the past and the future. Men had fallen in Greece, in Palestine and elsewhere, and they deserved that their memory should be honoured.

In days gone by, he noted, men had died for just causes; but today, for the first time, they were dying for a peaceful world organization. Through its proposal, France wished to pay a tribute to the soldiers of the United Nations ideal; it also wished in this solemn manner to set a seal upon the United Nations commitment and determination to defend a future in which aggression would be as inconceivable as were the human sacrifices of the past.

The representatives of Belgium, Colombia, Greece, Turkey, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States supported the French draft resolution. They stated that it was appropriate that the United Nations should by this gesture pay tribute to those who have made the supreme sacrifice under its flag and in defence of its ideals. Furthermore, the United Nations in honouring men who had rendered such outstanding services would be honouring itself.

They pointed out that since the United Nations was established many people had laid down their lives in action or on missions on behalf of the Organization and in connexion with the maintenance of international peace and security, the prevention or termination of hostilities, or the suppression of aggression. United Nations actions in Korea was emphasized. The achievements there, the efforts and sacrifices which had been made, far surpassed anything previously undertaken by any international organization in the world's history, it was stated. Special distinctions had been provided for the soldiers defending the United Nations cause in Korea, but the draft resolution now before the Assembly would add a further mark of appreciation for those who lost their lives for the United Nations.

The representative of Greece took the opportunity of paying tribute to the members of the United Nations Special Committee on the Balkans who had died or had been wounded while performing their duty to the United Nations; the representative of the United Kingdom recalled also those who had died in Palestine and Kashmir.

At the end of the discussion, the draft resolution was adopted by 43 votes to 5 as resolution 699 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolutions 92 (I) of 7 December 1946 regarding the official seal and emblem of the United Nations, 167 (II) of 20 October 1947 regarding the United Nations flag, and 483 (V) of 12 December 1950 providing for a United Nations distinguishing ribbon or other insignia for personnel having participated in Korea in the defence of peace and of the Principles of the Charter,

"Considering that, together with those killed in ensuring that defence under the United Nations Command, others have met or may meet their death in the service of the United Nations in connexion with actions for the suppression of aggression, or missions the aim of which is the cessation of hostilities, or efforts to prevent a dispute or a situation from deteriorating into hostilities,

"Considering that it is proper to recognize the sacrifice of each and every person in the international cause by rendering to their memory such tribute as will keep alive the remembrance of that sacrifice,

"1. Declares to have 'Died for the United Nations' all those who are killed in the course of an action or a mission on behalf of the Organization in connexion with the maintenance of international peace and security, the prevention or ending of hostilities, or the suppression of aggression;

"2. Requests the Secretary-General to indicate in each case the actions or missions, past, present or future, coming within the scope of the present resolution."

In accordance with the resolution, the Secretary-General submitted to the General Assembly a list (A/2362), by geographical areas and in the chronological order of the date of their establishment of those past actions or missions of the United Nations in the course of which fatal casualties had occurred, and those actions or missions of the United Nations which were still operational, and which in his opinion came within the scope of this resolution, as follows:

K. STATUS OF CLAIMS FOR INJURIES INCURRED IN THE SERVICE OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The General Assembly, on 1 December 1949, adopted resolution 365(IV),³³ concerning reparation for injuries incurred in the service of the United Nations, under which the Secretary-General was authorized to present an international claim against the government of a State, Member or non-member of the United Nations, alleged to be responsible, with a view to obtaining the reparation due in respect of the damage caused to the United Nations and to the victim or to persons entitled through him. The Secretary-General was authorized to submit to arbitration such claims as could not be settled by negotiations. The resolution also requested the Secretary-General to submit an annual report to subsequent sessions of the Assembly on the status of such claims.

The Secretary-General, accordingly, submitted to the seventh session of the General Assembly a report (A/2180) informing it of the action taken in connexion with the death in Palestine of one member of the Secretariat and four French military observers and the injury suffered by one French military observer.

In reply to a letter sent by the Secretary-General in May 1951, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Jordan had disclaimed responsibility for the death in Palestine in July 1948 of Ole Helge Bakke, member of the Secretariat. While expressing its regret and condemnation of the incident, the Jordan Government stated that the shooting had started from the Israel side during the passage of the United Nations convoy which included the jeep driven by Mr. Bakke, that he had been hit by a stray bullet, and that the shot had not been fired by a member of the Arab Legion. The Jordan Government had expressed the hope that it would be relieved of all financial claims connected with the incident.

The Secretary-General reported that, on the basis of the information available to the United Nations, he was unable to release the Jordan Government from all financial liability in connexion with the matter and had proposed in January and again in June 1952 that the claim be submitted to arbitration. The Jordan Government had informed him that it could not agree to this proposal. The Secretary-General stated that in view of the "unwillingness of the Jordan Government to settle this claim by negotiation or by arbitration in accordance with General Assembly resolution 365 (IV)", he sought guidance from the Assembly regarding any future steps which might be taken in the prosecution of the claim.

On 11 September 1952 the Secretary-General requested Israel to pay $25,233 to the United Nations as reparations for the monetary damage borne by the Organization in connexion with the death of Colonel Andre Sérot, a United Nations observer of French nationality, who was assassinated with the United Nations Mediator Count Folke Bernadotte in Jerusalem on 17 September 1948. Although the claim had not been answered, the Secretary-General recalled that Israel had substantially complied with the United Nations claim for the death of Count Bernadotte.

On 5 September 1952 the Secretary-General requested Egypt to pay $52,874.20 to the United Nations as reparation for the damage caused to the Organization as a consequence of the deaths on 28 August 1948 of Lt. Colonel Queru and Captain Pierre Jeannel, United Nations military observers of French nationality. The Secretary-General in his letter to the Egyptian Government recalled that the two observers were attacked and killed by Saudi Arabian troops under Egyptian command after leaving their plane which had landed at the Gaza airfield after being the object of Egyptian anti-aircraft fire. Egypt, he reported, disclaimed all responsibility for the deaths of the two observers. In the event that Egypt maintained this position, he recommended the matter to be submitted to arbitration.

The Secretary-General reported that an examination by him of the circumstances of the incident in which Commander René de Labarrière (France) was killed and Commander Etienne de Canchy (France) was wounded on 6 July 1948 in the Nazareth region of Palestine led him to the conclusion that this incident was caused by the explosion of land mines accidentally set off by Commander de Canchy and by a Franciscan Father who was with the two United Nations military observers. The Secretary-General therefore determined that this incident did not involve the international responsibility of any government, and he did not intend to take any further action in the matter.

The report of the Secretary-General was considered at the 357th meeting of the Sixth Committee on 19 December 1952.

The representative of France stated, with reference to the claims in respect of the death of two French officers, that her Government, acting in pursuance of resolution 365 (IV), had concluded an agreement with the Secretary-General whereby the United Nations alone would submit the international claim. The French Government, for its part, had not presented any claim to the governments alleged to be responsible.

The representative of Egypt disclaimed any responsibility of his country for the death of the two French officers on the ground that the aircraft had failed to observe regulations on flights of aircraft over the Egyptian front.

The representative of the Secretary-General gave further details of the Secretary-General's position.

The representative of Sweden introduced a draft resolution (A/C.6/L.288) which, in its operative paragraph, provided that the General Assembly "Urges those governments to which claims have been presented to negotiate a settlement with the Secretary-General, or, if no settlement can be reached, to agree to arbitrate the questions at issue on the basis of a mutually acceptable procedure." He said that he recommended recourse to arbitration as the method of settlement, inasmuch as there were legal questions involved which it had been impossible to settle by negotiation.

The representatives of Greece, the Netherlands, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States were, in principle, in agreement with the Swedish proposal. The Sixth Committee, they stated, was called upon to give the Secretary-General guidance regarding the procedure to be followed to obtain settlement of certain claims and not to pronounce on the merits of the cases referred to in the Secretary-General's report.

They saw no reason why anyone should contest the General Assembly's competence to do what any party to a dispute had a right to do, namely, to request the other party to have recourse to arbitration, a procedure admitted both by international practice and by General Assembly resolution 365 (IV).

The representative of Sweden argued that the acceptance of arbitration was not an admission of responsibility and did not prejudge the substance of the case. Furthermore, these were international claims and could not be brought before national courts.

The representatives of Egypt, Iran, Mexico, Syria and the USSR opposed the Swedish proposal on the following main grounds:

(1) the cases in question involved the United Nations directly, and the Organization should not be judge and party at the same time; (2) the claims presented by the Secretary-General were for damages under private law and should be brought before national courts; (3)

the General Assembly could not impose arbitration on States unwilling to agree to it and could not even recommend to States to submit to arbitration their controversies with the Secretary-General; and (4) the submission to arbitration presupposed an admission of responsibility on the part of a State against which the Secretary-General had brought a claim.

The representative of Mexico, in particular, stated that his delegation could not accept the principle of responsibility of States towards the United Nations. That principle, he argued, would in fact add to and overlap the diplomatic responsibility of States towards the country of which the injured person was a national.

The representatives of Brazil and Yugoslavia felt that the Assembly should perhaps have further information regarding each of the cases mentioned in the Secretary-General's report before inviting the States concerned to submit the Secretary-General's claim to arbitration.

In the course of the discussion, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that arbitration was not the sole method which could be used by the Secretary-General and the States alleged to be responsible; under Assembly resolution 365(IV) they might, for example, conclude an agreement to institute an investigation into the facts. In order that there should be more latitude in the choice of methods likely to lead to a settlement of the claims, he proposed orally that the Swedish draft be amended so as to: (1) delete the third paragraph of the preamble, which would have stated that it was highly desirable that the claims should be settled by direct negotiation or by recourse to arbitration; and (2) replace the operative paragraph by the phrase "Recommends that such claims be settled by the procedures envisaged in resolution 365(IV)."

The representative of France felt that the wording of the Swedish draft was open to misinterpretation; it might be thought that to speak of negotiating a settlement implied an admission that there was something to be settled. Moreover, while the Secretary-General should be encouraged to continue his efforts to reach agreement with the governments in question, those efforts did not necessarily have to be directed exclusively towards arbitration; other means of settlement existed. She therefore supported the United Kingdom proposal.

The representative of the Philippines proposed orally that the words "alleged to be responsible" should be omitted from the second paragraph of the preamble, which referred to the claims presented to Governments alleged to be responsible and the operative part should be redrafted to read: "Invites those governments to which claims have been presented to consider a just settlement of the question at issue."

The representative of Iran introduced an amendment (A/C.6/L.290) to: (1) delete the third paragraph of the preamble; and (2) replace the operative paragraph by the following: "Invites the Secretary-General to continue his efforts, in pursuance of resolution 365 (IV), to obtain reparation for injuries incurred."

The representative of Sweden stated that he could accept the oral amendments of the United Kingdom and the Philippines, and a modified version of the Swedish draft, incorporating the United Kingdom's amendments and the first Philippine amendment, was presented to the Committee. In view of the acceptance of the United Kingdom proposal to delete the third paragraph of the preamble it became unnecessary to vote on the first part of the Iranian amendment. The second part was rejected by a roll-call vote of 22 to 15, with 5 abstentions.

The Swedish draft, as revised, was then voted on. The preamble was adopted by 22 votes to 7, with 7 abstentions; and the operative paragraph was adopted by a roll-call vote of 22 to 10, with 10 abstentions. The revised draft resolution as a whole was adopted by 21 votes to 11, with 7 abstentions.

The draft resolution recommended by the Sixth Committee (A/2353) was adopted by the General Assembly, without discussion, by 40 votes to 10, with 4 abstentions, at its 410th plenary meeting on 21 December as resolution 690 (VII). It read:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the report of the Secretary-General on the status of claims for injuries incurred in the service of the United Nations.

"Noting that the Secretary-General, pursuant to General Assembly resolution 365(IV) of 1 December 1949 has presented international claims for reparation to governments in connexion with the death of agents of the United Nations,

"Recommends that such claims be settled by the procedures envisaged in resolution 365 (IV)."

During 1952, three instruments of accession, two with reservations, to the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies were deposited with the Secretary-General; the reservations were submitted to the States and specialized agencies concerned. Four notifications from States already parties to the Convention, namely—Haiti, Luxembourg, Netherlands and Yugoslavia—extending the application of the Convention to further specialized agencies, were also received during 1952.

By 31 December 1952, sixteen States (including two States not Members of the United Nations) had acceded to the Convention; in addition, two States, Egypt and Italy, had submitted instruments subject to reservations. A Handbook on the Legal Status, Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations (ST/LEG/2) was issued in mimeographed form on 19 September 1952. It was planned to publish the Handbook as a printed document after experience has been gained regarding the effectiveness of its form and content. The Handbook, which serves as a source of reference, contains such material as the texts of the various agreements on privileges and immunities between the United Nations and Member and non-member States, and the texts of national laws, including those of the host State—the United States—regarding privileges and immunities and related matters.

N. REGISTRATION AND PUBLICATION OF TREATIES AND INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

During 1952, a total of 753 treaties and agreements were registered with the Secretariat—95 ex officio, 476 by seventeen governments, and 182 by six specialized agencies. A total of 130 treaties and agreements were filed and recorded—30 by the United Nations, 89 at the request of a government and eleven at the request of a specialized agency.³⁷

This brought to 3,273 the total of treaties and agreements registered or filed and recorded by the end of 1952.

The texts of treaties and agreements registered or filed and recorded are published by the Secreariat in the United Nations Treaty Series in the original languages, followed by translations in English and French. Twenty volumes (62 to 81) of the Treaty Series were published in the course of 1952.

In order to facilitate reference to the United Nations Treaty Series the Secretariat publishes a General Index. Three volumes of the General Index were published by the end of 1952: No. 1 covering the first fifteen volumes of the Treaty Series, No. 2—volumes 16 to 30, and No. 3—volumes 31 to 50. General Index No. 4 covering volumes 50 to 75 of the Treaty Series was being prepared.

O. PROCEEDINGS IN NATIONAL COURTS

The capacity of the United Nations to institute legal proceedings is governed by Article 104 of the Charter and by article I of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations. With respect to the United States, which has not yet acceded to the Convention, the International Organization Immunities Act of 1945 provides that international organizations, including the United Nations, shall possess the capacity to institute legal proceedings.

Under this authority the United Nations has brought a number of legal actions of a private law character in the courts of several countries. Some of these actions were brought by the United Nations on its own behalf, others on behalf of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF) or the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWAPRNE). For instance, the United Nations undertook to take the necessary steps for the collection of certain maritime and other claims assigned by the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA) to the United Nations for the benefit of UNICEF. In the prosecution of these claims the United Nations brought legal actions in the courts of several countries including the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom. Other types of action included the legal proceedings instituted by the United Nations in New York courts in connexion with traffic accidents involving United Nations vehicles, a petition brought in a California court in connexion with the distribution of an estate, and an action instituted in France by the United Nations on behalf of UNICEF and UNRWAPRNE in connexion with the substitution of blankets purchased by UNICEF as agent for UNRWAPRNE.

During 1952 the United Nations continued to be engaged in legal proceedings before the courts of various countries.

The legal status of the United Nations was discussed in the two following actions which were commenced in Belgium and Canada respectively by the United Nations as the assignee of claims transferred by UNRRA to the United Nations for the benefit of UNICEF.

United Nations vs. Brandes, Tribunal de Bruxelles, Belgium, (Seventh Chamber), judgment of 27 March 1952. This action was for reimbursement of over-payments made by UNRRA to a former staff member. The defendant contended that the United Nations was not entitled to the rights of UNRRA, and that neither UNRRA nor the United Nations had legal personality. The Tribunal held that UNRRA and the United Nations, having been established by international conventions ratified by Belgian law, were recognized under Belgian law as public international organizations and had legal personality in Belgium. The Tribunal also decided that the United Nations was entitled to exercise the rights of UNRRA under the terms of the assignment of claims made by UNRRA to the United Nations for the benefit of UNICEF.

United Nations vs. Canada—Asiatic Lines Ltd., et al, Superior Court of Montreal, Canada (No. 317814), judgment of 26 September 1952. This was an action for over-payment of freight paid by UNRRA in connexion with the shipment of supplies to countries receiving UNRRA assistance. The defendant contended that the United Nations had no right to institute legal proceedings. The Court held that, under Canadian law, the United Nations possessed Juridicial personality and had the capacity to institute legal proceedings.

A number of actions against sub-tenants under leases concluded by the United Nations, commenced by the United Nations before New York courts, went to trial during the year under review.

Part Two: The Specialized Agencies

A. The International Labour Organisation (ILO)¹

1. Introduction

The International Labour Organisation was established on 11 April 1919 as an autonomous institution associated with the League of Nations. Its original Constitution was adopted as part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles and formed part of other treaties of peace.

The preamble of the ILO Constitution stated that peace could be established only if based upon social justice and that it was necessary to improve labour conditions, for example: by the regulation of the hours of work and of the labour supply; the prevention of unemployment; the provision of an adequate living wage; the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment; the protection of children, young persons and women; provision for old age and injury; protection of the interests of workers when employed outside their own country; recognition of the principles of equal pay for equal work and freedom of association; and the organization of vocational and technical education and other measures.

Throughout the years between its establishment and the outbreak of the Second World War, ILO, with headquarters in Geneva, played a leading role in promoting the improvement of labour conditions throughout the world.

In 1940, in order to ensure that the International Labour Office should be able to continue to function freely, a working centre was established at Montreal. The transfer back to Geneva of the services temporarily located in Canada was completed in 1948.

During the war years, ILO devoted its energies to assisting the cause of the Allies. Regular sessions of the General Conference were resumed in 1944, after a five-year interval, with the 26th session, held in Philadelphia. At this session, ILO considered its post-war status, policy and programme, and adopted the Declaration of Philadelphia, which re-defined the aims and purposes of ILO.²

It reaffirmed the fundamental principles on which ILO is based, and affirmed that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity", and that the central aim of national and international policy must be to attain conditions making this possible. It recognized ILO's obligation to promote programmes to achieve full employment, the raising of standards of living, the recognition of the right of collective bargaining, the extension of social security, etc.

An Agreement bringing ILO into relationship with the United Nations, approved by the 29th session of the General Conference on 2 October 1946, came into force on 14 December 1946 upon its approval by the General Assembly of the United Nations.³

ILO gradually brought its activities back to their pre-war level; it again began working towards the improvement of the working conditions of seafarers, agricultural and industrial workers, salaried employees and professional workers and towards the improvement of conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. ILO also found it necessary to extend its activities to meet regional needs. It began to hold regional conferences to deal with the special problems of the American continent, and especially of Latin America, as early as 1936, and in 1947 began to develop its regional activities in Asia and the Far East and in the Near and Middle East.

ILO recognized the need for new machinery to deal with the specific labour and social problems of individual industries of great international importance. It decided in 1945 to set up industrial committees for the world's leading industries. The committees bring together representatives of governments, management and labour to discuss the specific problems of these industries.

Since 1948 considerably greater emphasis has been placed on the operational activities of ILO, especially in the field of migration and in the development of manpower resources through vocational training and the organization of employment services.

ILO had carried on many of these activities from its early days but their importance has been greatly increased by the Expanded Programme of technical assistance for economic development and other special programmes.

2. Organization

The organs of ILO are the General Conference of representatives of the Members, the Governing Body and the International Labour Office, which is controlled by the Governing Body.

The General Conference meets at least once a year. It is composed of four representatives of each Member State, of whom two are government delegates and the other two are delegates representing, respectively, the employers and the workers of each Member. The non-government delegates are appointed in agreement with the organizations which are most representative of employers and workers. Each delegate may be accompanied by not more than two advisers for each item on the agenda of the session.

New Members are admitted into ILO, if they are Members of the United Nations, by communicating to the Director-General of ILO their formal acceptance of the obligations of the ILO Constitution. Other States, to become Members of ILO require, in addition, a two-thirds vote of the delegates to the Conference, including two thirds of the votes cast by the government delegates.

Each delegate has one vote in the Conference. Except as otherwise provided by the ILO Constitution, the Conference makes decisions by a simple majority of the votes cast. Its decisions mainly take the form of Conventions and Recommendations, which require a two-thirds majority of the Conference for adoption. Under the ILO Constitution, a Member is required to bring a Convention adopted by the Conference to the attention of its competent national authority for ratification. If a country ratifies a Convention it assumes an obligation to apply the provisions of that Convention to all the territories under its administration, including Non-Self-Governing Territories; it also assumes an obligation to report annually on the measures it has taken to bring its legislation into line with these provisions. Supervisory machinery available within ILO provides not only for measures to promote the ratification of Conventions, but also for a complaint procedure in the event of violations of a Convention. With regard to Recommendations, Members of ILO are under the obligation to consider them with a view to giving effect to their provisions by legislation or other action. Member States are further required to report periodically on the position of their law and practice in relation to unratified Conventions and Recommendations. Collectively, the Conventions and Recommendations form an International Labour Code,⁴ which embodies international standards of policy.

The Governing Body is composed of 32 members—sixteen representing governments, eight the employers and eight the workers. Eight of the sixteen government representatives are appointed by the eight Member States of chief industrial importance, and eight are appointed by Member States chosen by the other government delegates to the Conference in an election held every three years. The employer and worker members are elected, respectively, by the employer and worker delegates to the Conference. The Governing Body's responsibilities include the selection of items for the agenda of the Conference, the appointment of the Director-General of the International Labour Office, the general supervision of the Office and of the various committees and commissions of ILO, and the consideration of proposals for ILO's budget.

The International Labour Office provides the secretariat of the Conference and of the Governing Body, prepares documents on the items of the agenda of the Conference and of the Governing Body, and collects and distributes information on all subjects within ILO's competence. It assists governments in the drafting of legislation and regulations, provides technical assistance to governments in fields within ILO's competence, conducts such special investigations as may be ordered by the Conference or by the Governing Body, and provides machinery to assist in ensuring the effective application of Conventions. It issues a variety of periodical and other publications dealing with problems of industry and employment. The Office also acts as the secretariat for the Inter-American Conference on Social Security, organized in 1940 to promote social security in the Americas, and for the International Social Security Association, a private international association of social security institutions founded in 1927 with the support of the International Labour Office.

A number of commissions and committees exists to further the work of ILO in specific fields. These include, for example, bodies⁵ dealing with: the application of Conventions; maritime questions; agriculture; salaried employees and professional workers; social security; accident prevention; industrial hygiene; women's work; juvenile work; recreation; social policy in non-Metropolitan territories; migration; statistics; indigenous labour; and work in plantations. There are industrial committees for the following eight industries: coal mines; textiles; building, civil engineering and public works; metal trades; iron and steel production; inland transport; petroleum production and refining; and chemicals.

In addition to the principal working centre of the International Labour Office at Geneva, ILO maintains a liaison office with the United Nations in New York, branch offices in Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, India, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States, and field offices in Bangalore, India, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, and Istanbul, Turkey.

Correspondents or agents for the sale of publications are maintained in Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium-Luxembourg, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, Finland, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Indonesia, Iran, Ireland, Israel, Japan, Lebanon, Mexico, the Netherlands, Norway, Pakistan, Peru, the Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, the Union of South Africa, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yugoslavia. The correspondents' offices serve as information centres, and they distribute and sell publications.

3. Activities during 1952

During 1952 the membership of ILO increased to 66 States with the admission of the new Kingdom of Libya.

The General Conference, at its 35th session held from 4 to 28 June at Geneva, adopted three International Labour Conventions and three Recommendations, bringing the total of Conventions to 103 and the total of Recommendations to 95. The session was attended by 654 government, employer and worker delegates—a record number—from 60 countries.

The Conventions established international minimum standards governing (1) social security (2) the protection of maternity, and (3) holidays with pay in agriculture. Supplementary Recommendations were adopted on the two latter subjects. The third Recommendation dealt with co-operation between employers and workers at the level of the undertaking.

During the year States Members deposited the record number of 102 ratifications of International Labour Conventions, bringing to 1,346 the total of registered ratifications as of 31 December. By the end of the year, 73 of the 103 Conventions had received a sufficient number of ratifications to bring them into force, and six other Conventions had received a sufficient number of ratifications to bring them into force in 1953.

In addition to the General Conference, a large number of ILO's organs held meetings during the period under review. The Governing Body held the following sessions: 118th session, 11 to 14 March; 119th, 30 and 31 May and 27 June; 120th, 24 to 28 November.

At its 120th session the Governing Body decided to place on the agenda of the 1953 session of the General Conference a proposal that the membership of the Governing Body be increased from 32 to 40. Under this proposal, ten of the 40 seats would be held by the States of chief industrial importance, ten by other governments chosen by election, ten by employer representatives and ten by worker representatives.

Other meetings held during the year included the following: second session of the Advisory Committee on Salaried Employees and Professional Workers, Geneva; fourth session of the Metal Trades Committee, Geneva; fourth session of the Iron and Steel Committee, Geneva; Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, Geneva; Fifth Conference of the American States Members, Petropolis, Brazil; seventeenth session of the Joint Maritime Commission, Geneva; third session of the Chemicals Committee, Geneva; fourth session of the Petroleum Committee, Scheveningen, the Netherlands; Technical Meeting on the Protection of Young Workers in Asian Countries with Relation to their Vocational Preparation, Kandy, Ceylon; Meeting of Experts on Productivity, Geneva; Meeting of Experts on the Prevention and Suppression of Dust in Mining, Tunnelling and Quarrying, Geneva; fourth session of the Asian Advisory Committee, Geneva; Meeting of Experts on the Accommodation and Welfare of Migrants on Board Ship, Geneva; Latin American Manpower Technical Conference, Lima, Peru.

Meetings held in co-operation with the ILO included the second session of the Joint World

⁵ For titles of these bodies, see Y.U.N., 1950, p.

Health Organization—ILO Committee on Occupational Health, Geneva, and the fourth session of the Inter-American Conference on Social Security, Mexico City.

During 1952 the various activities of ILO reflected an increasing emphasis on efforts to contribute to the raising of labour productivity and to combating under-employment and promoting economic development in the under-developed countries.

a. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

In the period under review ILO expanded considerably its technical assistance to its Member States. Much of this aid was provided under the Expanded Programme of technical assistance of the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

By the end of the year, a total of 208 experts had been engaged by ILO for assignment to various national and regional projects designed to assist in economic and social development. Of these, 106 experts had completed their assignments by 31 December.

In response to requests from governments, assistance was given to countries in Asia, Africa, the Middle East, Latin America and Europe, principally for vocational and technical training. Other fields in which aid was given were social security, co-operatives and handicrafts, employment service organization, labour surveys, productivity and payment by results, labour statistics, labour legislation and industrial relations, migration, and industrial safety and hygiene.

In addition to the assistance provided through experts, technical aid was also given in the form of seminars and the granting of fellowships for study abroad. Under the Expanded Programme 134 fellowships were granted, while another 25 were provided under the ordinary budget of ILO. Twelve internships were also awarded for the study of ILO itself.

In addition, more than 160 worker-trainees were placed in industrial jobs in foreign countries for periods averaging six months so that they might improve their skills by on-the-job training.

The operational activities financed under the Expanded Programme were accompanied by others conducted under ILO's regular budget. Most of the latter related to manpower questions, and for the most part were carried out through regional field offices at Bangalore, India, Sao Paulo, Brazil, and Istanbul, Turkey.

b. PRODUCTIVITY

The Meeting of Experts on Productivity, held late in the year at Geneva, agreed that the work of ILO in the field of productivity should have three main objectives:

(1) to promote a wider understanding of the meaning of higher productivity and the results which might be expected from it; (2) to examine and to try to promote agreement on the measures that might be needed to ensure that increases in productivity would in fact lead rapidly to improvements in economic and social welfare for the community in general and, in particular, for those working in undertakings where productivity is raised; and (3) to provide technical assistance and advice on the raising of productivity. Their conclusions were to be considered by the Governing Body in 1953.

ILO undertook activities of these three types during 1952. For example, a general study based on the report of the experts was initiated, and a study on productivity in the metal trades was published.⁶ At the request of the United Nations, work was begun on a report on the role of labour in any programme for increasing productivity. The Chemical Industries Committee considered the organization of shift work, a question with a direct bearing on the efficiency of production.

Certain of the technical assistance projects undertaken during the year dealt specifically with productivity. A mission assisted the Israel Productivity Institute in training the Institute's staff and in training factory personnel in work study methods. Another mission provided assistance with a view to raising productivity and increasing workers' earnings in the Indian textile and engineering industries.

c. MANPOWER

In the field of manpower, the main emphasis during the year continued to be placed on technical assistance directed toward the solution of immediate national problems.

The Latin American Manpower Technical Conference at Lima, Peru, examined problems relating to the utilization of available manpower, explored the desirability and practicability of national public employment services, and considered methods of dealing with mass movements of unskilled labour.

ILO continued to promote manpower surveys and the establishment of machinery for obtaining employment information. Pilot employment service projects were established in Guatemala and Peru, and an Asian regional employment service institute was held at Tokyo. Technical assistance on employment service questions was given to a large number of countries.

⁶ International Labour Office. International Labour Organisation, Metal Trades Committee, Fourth Session. Factors affecting productivity in metal trades: Report III (Geneva, 1952).

An International Classification of Occupations for Migration and Employment Placement was published. The classification is designed to facilitate the geographical and occupational mobility of labour and thereby assist in overcoming manpower shortages impeding increased production. A handbook describing the United Kingdom Employment Service was also published.⁷

Vocational training activities increased during the year, and technical assistance in this field was given to a large number of individual countries. Regional training projects were also undertaken. A technical meeting on the protection of young workers in Asian countries dealt particularly with the vocational preparation of young workers, and an apprenticeship training institute for Asian countries was organized at the end of the year. A seminar was organized jointly by ILO and the Organization of American States, with the co-operation of the United States Department of Labour, the Institute of Inter-American Affairs, and the University of Maryland.

An extensive project for assistance to Yugoslavia, which was launched in 1951, was continued throughout the year. By the end of December, 31 foremen instructors had been sent to Yugoslavia and more than 200 Yugoslav worker-trainees had been placed in 61 industrial establishments elsewhere in Europe.

The Latin American regional vocational training project, for which plans were made in 1951, was put into operation. The project employs the facilities of SENAI (National Industrial Apprenticeship, Service), a training institution organized by Brazilian employer groups.

As regards migration, ILO was chiefly concerned with building up an information service. A series of memoranda on national migration policies and regulations which will cover 26 countries was in course of preparation, and a new bi-monthly periodical, Migration, was issued, beginning in January-February.

d. WAGES

In this field, ILO activities were connected in particular with: (1) the relationship of wages to the increasing of productivity and (2) problems of wage policy affecting particular groups of workers and particular regions.

The technical assistance missions to Israel and India mentioned above included within their terms of reference work on incentive wage systems. The Fifth Conference of American States Members, held at Petropolis, Brazil, from 17 to 29 April, examined the question of methods of remuneration of salaried employees, and a report on wage regulation in Latin American countries was completed. Aspects of wage policy in their particular industries were considered by the Chemical Industries Committee and the Petroleum Committee.

A study of general problems in connexion with the guaranteed wage was continued, and preparations were made for this question to be considered at the 1953 meeting of the Textiles Committee.

e. INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

As noted above, the subject of co-operation between employers and workers at the level of the undertaking was dealt with in a Recommendation approved by the General Conference. The Recommendation called for appropriate steps to promote such co-operation on matters of mutual concern not within the scope of collective bargaining machinery. Consultation and co-operation, it was suggested, should be facilitated by the encouragement of voluntary agreements or the establishment by laws or regulations of bodies for consultation and co-operation, or a combination of these methods. The Metal Trades Committee considered human relations in metal working plants, and proposed that the subject of human relations in industry should be brought before an early session of the Conference. Technical assistance in industrial relations problems was given to several countries.

f. WELFARE FACILITIES AND SOCIAL SERVICES

Recommendations regarding welfare and social services were made by the Iron and Steel Committee and the Petroleum Committee, and preparations were made for the consideration of problems of workers' welfare by other ILO bodies.

g. HOUSING

Preparations were made for consideration of the question of workers' housing at the Asian Regional Conference of the ILO to be held in 1953. A survey of building research and experimentation in Asia was conducted for a UNESCO meeting on scientific aspects of tropical housing.

h. OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

The protection of the health of workers in places of employment was considered by the General Conference, which decided to adopt international regulations on the subject at the 1953 session.

⁷ International Labour Office. National Employment Services: Great Britain (Geneva, 1952).

The Meeting of Experts on the Prevention and Suppression of Dust in Mining, Tunnelling and Quarrying adopted a series of more than 100 recommendations, and expressed the hope that the ILO would serve as a centre for the exchange of information on the subject. A technical study was made of dust problems in foundry operations.

The joint ILO-WHO Committee on Occupational Health, meeting in October, discussed the contribution of public health and occupational health authorities and services in promoting and maintaining the health of workers.

Work was continued on a revision of a study on safety in coal mines and other studies concerning railway coupling operations, and statistics of electrical occupational accidents were in preparation. A report was prepared on the law and practice relating to the safety of dockers.

A large number of technical assistance projects on health and safety questions were undertaken. The quarterly Occupational Health and Safety continued to be published, and a new edition of the Catalogue of Occupational Health and Safety Films was issued.

i. SOCIAL SECURITY

Under the Convention adopted by the General Conference in 1952, ratifying countries will be required to assure a certain minimum standard of social security protection to their populations. The Convention divides social security into nine branches: medical care, sickness, unemployment, old-age, employment, injury, family, maternity, invalidity and survivors' benefits, and provides that ratifying countries shall observe the minimum standards laid down in at least three of these branches, the three to include unemployment, old-age, employment injury, invalidity or survivors' benefits.

The Regional Conference of American States Members made a number of recommendations bearing upon the particular social security problems of the Latin American countries. The third of a series of Latin American social security seminars was held in Brazil in September and October. Assistance continued to be given in the technical work of the Permanent Inter-American Committee on Social Security, and a series of technical questions were discussed by the fourth session of the Inter-American Conference on Social Security at Mexico City.

Technical assistance on social security questions was given to a large number of countries in Latin America, Asia and the Near and Middle East. Support continued to be given to the International Social Security Association, which convened several meetings of experts during the year.

Studies carried out during the year included a survey of the cost of social security in 24 ILO Member countries.⁸

j. EMPLOYMENT

The Iron and Steel Committee requested that a study of the problem of maintaining a high and stable level of employment in that industry be undertaken, and the Metal Trades Committee asked that study of the regularization of production and employment in the metal trades be continued.

The Asian Advisory Committee considered the problem of under-employment in Asia, and made a number of recommendations to deal with it.

k. LAND REFORM

Problems relating to land reform were considered by the Fifth Conference of American States Members, which adopted a resolution drawing the attention of governments to the importance of the efficient use of land resources and to land reform as a positive means of providing security of employment, of checking rural exodus, of increasing productivity and real incomes, and of raising living standards in the rural areas.

ILO participated with representatives of the United Nations, FAO and UNESCO in a working group on land reform.

l. CO-OPERATION AND HANDICRAFTS

In this field, also, technical assistance activities occupied a prominent place in the work of ILO during the year. A field mission to aid the countries of Asia and the Far East in the development of the co-operative movement was opened at Lahore, Pakistan, with a staff of experts in the principal types of co-operatives. Individual technical assistance projects were carried out in a number of countries.

Continuing its work as a centre for information on co-operative and handicrafts questions, ILO published a manual entitled Introduction to Co-operative Practice, and a manual on Model Smithies and Carpenters' Shops. Work was begun on a survey of the co-operative movement in Latin America.

⁸ International Labour Office. The cost of social security (Geneva, 1952). Reprinted from the International Labour Review, Vol. LXV, No. 6, June 1952.

m. AGRICULTURAL LABOUR

The question of the application and supervision of labour legislation in agriculture was considered by the Fifth Conference of American States Members, and a series of principles for the guidance of governments was adopted.

The Convention on this question adopted by the General Conference in 1952 establishes the principle that agricultural workers shall have the right to a holiday after a period of continuous service with the same employer.

A study of the working and living conditions of forestry workers was completed, and preparations were made for a meeting in 1953 of the Permanent Agricultural Committee.

n. MARITIME LABOUR

ILO's programme for the improvement of working conditions at sea was reviewed at a meeting of the Joint Maritime Commission in May. On the Commission's recommendation, the Governing Body decided to convene an Asian Maritime Conference in 1953. It was also decided to convene a 1953 meeting of government, ship-owner and seafarer representatives to consider certain problems of seafarers in the short-sea trades of North-West Europe. After considering the report of an expert committee, the Governing Body authorized the Director-General to consult governments on the question of establishing international standards governing the accommodation and welfare of migrants on board ship.

o. WOMEN WORKERS

The General Conference in June adopted a revised Convention on the Protection of Maternity together with a supplementary Recommendation.

A report on problems of women's employment was prepared for discussion by the Textiles Committee in 1953. Studies were made of women's employment conditions in Asian countries. A report on vocational guidance and training and technical education for women was prepared and communicated to the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women.

p. WORKERS IN NON-METROPOLITAN AREAS

Preliminary papers on certain aspects of labour productivity and on workers' housing in non-metropolitan areas were laid before the United Nations Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

q. INDIGENOUS WORKERS IN INDEPENDENT COUNTRIES

The first stage of a joint technical assistance project to improve living conditions of the indigenous populations of the Andean High Plateau was completed. The project is being carried out jointly by ILO, the United Nations, UNESCO, FAO and WHO.

A study of indigenous populations in independent countries was completed with a view to publication in 1953.

r. FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION

ILO continued the investigation and conciliation of disputes arising out of allegations of the violation of the right of freedom of association. A large number of complaints containing such allegations were examined by a special committee of the Governing Body. The Governing Body dealt with 42 cases, reaching final conclusions in 32 of them.

In a number of cases the Governing Body suggested to governments measures to secure improved protection of trade union rights; some of its suggestions envisaged the liberalization of trade union legislation.

The General Conference adopted a declaration which asserted that "it is essential for the trade union movement in each country to preserve its freedom and independence so as to be in a position to carry forward its economic and social mission regardless of political changes." The declaration stated a number of principles designed to ensure the independence of the unions.

s. FORCED LABOUR

The United Nations-ILO Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labour held two sessions during the year.⁹

t. PUBLICATIONS

Notable among the volumes produced was a new edition of The International Labour Code, a codified and annotated compilation of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference through 1951.

Studies published, in addition to those mentioned above, included Textiles Wages, Labour

⁹ See p. 455.

Policies in the West Indies, and Conditions of Work in the Fishing Industry.

Various periodicals continued to be published, including the monthly International Labour Review, the semi-monthly Industry and Labour, the quarterly Occupational Health and Safety, the Legislative Series, and the annual Report to the United Nations and the Year Book of Labour Statistics.

4. Budget

The budget of ILO is approved by a two-thirds vote of the General Conference. The 35th session of the Conference in 1952 approved a budget totalling $6,223,368 to cover expenses of ILO during 1953. The main details of the expenditures covered by this budget follow (in U.S. dollars):

B. The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO)¹

1. Introduction

The Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations was the first of the permanent United Nations organizations to be launched after the war. At the United Nations Conference on Food and Agriculture, in May 1943, at Hot Springs, Virginia, 44 nations agreed to work together to banish hunger and establish a stable world agriculture. At the recommendation of the Conference, the United Nations Interim Commission on Food and Agriculture was set up in July 1943 to plan a permanent organization concerned with food and agriculture, and forestry and fisheries as well. The Commission prepared a Constitution² for FAO and submitted it to governments.

FAO officially came into being with the signing of its Constitution on 16 October 1945, at the first session of its Conference, in Quebec. On 14 December 1946, FAO was formally brought into relationship with the United Nations as a specialized agency, with the approval of an Agreement³ between the two organizations by the United Nations General Assembly.

The preamble to the Constitution of FAO states that the aim of the nations accepting the Constitution is to promote the common welfare by furthering separate and collective action for the purposes of:

"raising levels of nutrition and standards of living of the peoples under their respective jurisdictions,

"securing improvements in the efficiency of the production and distribution of all food and agricultural products,

"bettering the condition of rural populations,

"and thus contributing toward an expanding world economy".

In so far as its detailed functions are concerned, FAO is first charged, in article 1 of its Constitution,⁴ with the collection, analysis, interpretation and dissemination of information relating to nutrition, food and agriculture. FAO further promotes and recommends national and international action which it considers necessary to attain: the increase of production in agriculture, fisheries and forestry; the improvement of education and administration in those fields; the improvement of processing, marketing and distribution of the products of agriculture, fisheries and forestry; the conservation of natural resources; the adoption of policies for the provision of adequate agricultural credit and of international policies with respect to agricultural commodity arrangements.

Finally, on request, FAO furnishes technical assistance to Members to help them bring new land under cultivation, improve the yields of lands already cultivated, reduce the costs of production, improve the efficiency of international distribution, raise levels of consumption, and better the living conditions in rural areas.

2. Organization

FAO consists of a Conference, a Council, and a staff headed by a Director-General. The Conference, composed of one representative from each Member nation, is the policy-making body of FAO, in which each nation has one vote. At its annual session in 1949, the Conference decided that in the future it would normally meet once every two years. The Conference reviews FAO's work, determines its policy and approves the budget; it reviews the food and agriculture situation and the programmes and plans of Member Governments, and recommends national and international action. Decisions of the Conference are taken by a simple majority vote, except in instances such as the admission of new Members, when a two-thirds majority of all Members of the organization is required.

Between sessions of the Conference, the Council of FAO, comprising representatives of eighteen Member nations and an independent chairman elected by the Conference, exercises powers delegated to it. Normally meeting twice a year, the Council keeps the world food and agriculture situation under constant review and makes recommendations to Member Governments, international commodity authorities and other international agencies.

The Director-General of FAO, elected by the Conference, has full power and authority to direct the work of the organization, guided by the general recommendations of the Conference and the Council.

Panels of experts on agriculture, economics and statistics, fisheries, forestry and forest products, nutrition and rural welfare have been established by FAO. These panels can be drawn upon for expert advice, and the Director-General may convene ad hoc meetings of small numbers of experts selected from these panels as the need arises.

In problems of co-ordination of technical programmes, the Director-General is advised by a Co-ordinating Committee of seven members. The Committee on Financial Control advises on budgetary and administrative questions. There is also a continuing committee on relations with international organizations and one on commodity problems.

National FAO Committees, established in 51 Member countries, serve as contacts between FAO and governmental and non-governmental agencies. The permanent headquarters of FAO is established at Rome.

3. Activities during 1952

The membership of FAO decreased from 69 to 68 during 1952. The withdrawal of Hungary and China became effective in January and July, respectively, but Peru ratified the FAO Constitution in June.

In accordance with its decision of 1949 to meet every two years, the FAO Conference held no session during the year. The FAO Council held its fifteenth and sixteenth sessions, from 9 to 14 June and from 17 to 28 November. At its sixteenth session the Council agreed to recommend to the next Conference that the number of Council members should be raised to one third of the number of Member Governments, with a maximum of 24.

a. AGRICULTURE

One of FAO's principal achievements during the year was the establishment of the International Plant Protection Convention, signed by 39 countries, which came into operation officially in May 1952. This Convention is designed to simplify and rationalize procedures intended to prevent the spread of plant diseases and pests. For example, the Netherlands had hitherto had to issue 80 different kinds of certificates for sending bulbs to other countries; now, one type of certificate is accepted by all countries subscribing to the Convention. Another purpose of the Convention is to facilitate co-operation in fighting pests and diseases which sweep across continents and countries, regardless of national boundaries. The Convention also requires FAO to establish and run a "world reporting service on plant pests and diseases". As part of this service, FAO in September began publishing a new periodical, Plant Protection Bulletin, which includes, among other features, information on the occurrence of plant diseases and pests and plant quarantine announcements. Another publication, the Digest of Plant Quarantine Regulations, was also issued to assist the operation of the Convention.

In 1952, a programme initiated earlier through FAO to co-ordinate national and international control measures against the desert locust in the Middle East met its first test. The FAO Technical Advisory Committee on Desert Locust Control first met in Rome in March 1952, considered the locust threat, and planned for concerted efforts against the plague. Thereafter, when national control measures were insufficient, equipment and materials (planes, vehicles, sprayers and dusters, insecticides and bran for bait) and expert assistance were provided from neighbouring countries, and from other countries through such agencies as the U.S. Point Four programme and the Desert Locust Control (Nairobi); the Anti-Locust Research Centre (London) provided technical advice and information. In addition to its work of co-ordinating such efforts, FAO contributed $500,000 of technical assistance funds towards the campaign. In November 1952 the Technical Advisory Committee reviewed the season's work and assessed the needs of 1953. Serious crop damage had been prevented, but it was expected that in 1953 further efforts would be needed against locusts escaping from some of the areas affected in 1952. The FAO Council, at its sixteenth session, commended the development of this co-ordinating activity and recommended that FAO extend its co-operation with international committees in Central and South America against locust plagues.

As regards livestock production, successful vaccination campaigns to wipe out rinderpest were being carried out during 1952 in Afghanistan, Ethiopia and Thailand; in the last two countries vaccine production facilities had previously been set up with FAO assistance and in Afghanistan the FAO team manufactured vaccines on the spot. Efforts to control foot-and-mouth disease were also made during the year. A draft agreement providing for the establishment of a European Commission to combat this disease on an international basis was drawn up, for submission to Member Governments, by a conference of seventeen European nations held at Rome in December. This Commission would co-ordinate activities and assist countries in the control of the disease. The establishment of such a commission in Latin America was also suggested by the second Inter-American Meeting on Livestock Production, held near Sao Paulo, Brazil, during December. This meeting witnessed an enormously increased interest by Latin-American countries in the question of livestock production as a whole. In addition to providing a forum for the discussion of mutual problems, it directed increased attention to problems of livestock at high altitudes, especially important in the Andean region.

A programme for improving grasslands, the main source of fodder and the chief means of maintaining or restoring soil productivity, was initiated by a meeting of representatives from eleven countries and territories in the Mediterranean area. In addition to its agricultural study, Improving the World's Grasslands, published to encourage grassland development, FAO began compiling a World Catalogue of Tropical and Sub-Tropical Forage Plants in order to make available the necessary information concerning the characteristics of plants and the conditions under which they grow. It also sent seeds of legumes, grasses and forage crops to interested countries for experimental autumn plantings.

The International Rice Commission held its third session at Bandung, Indonesia, in May, just after sessions of its two working parties, on Rice Breeding and on Fertilizers. A meeting on rice storage was held in December. Efforts to overcome the rice shortage included the establishment, at the Central Rice Research Institute at Cut-tack, India, of a Training Centre on Rice Breeding, to help Asian countries to improve production and to develop disease-resistant strains of rice. Other activities concerned with plant breeding included the fifth of the series of hybrid maize meetings, held in Zurich, Switzerland, in February, and a conference on wheat breeding for Near Eastern countries, at Istanbul, Turkey, in June. The hybrid maize programme expanded to such an extent that in some countries a severe strain was put on the breeding services because of the rapidly expanding production of seed. Increased yields were also evident through the use of improved varieties; in Italy, for example, where in 1951 only 5 per cent of the country's entire maize area was planted in hybrids, production increased by at least 100,000 tons.

As regards basic agricultural problems, FAO began studying the intricate problems relating to agrarian reform. FAO, the United Nations, ILO and UNESCO, meeting for the first time on this subject, exchanged views on land reform problems. Related questions concerning the establishment or extension of agricultural credit, particularly in Latin America, were also examined during 1952, and FAO assisted governments in the Near East, the Far East and South America in the development of agricultural extension and co-operation. As in previous years, FAO co-operated with other agencies, especially UNESCO, for example by providing the agricultural component of missions or teams, notably at fundamental education centres at Patzcuaro, Mexico, and in Liberia.

b. ECONOMICS

During 1952 FAO's field work in economics consisted largely in the operation of training centres and seminars. Much of this work began under FAO's regular programme, but the training centres have subsequently been operated under the Expanded Programme of technical assistance, and requests for such facilities have shown a marked increase. Examples of such training centres and seminars held during 1952 were the Centre for Application of Agricultural Statistical Techniques, held at Quito, Ecuador, from July to October, the Seminar on Production and Price Statistics, held at Beirut, Lebanon, in July and the Indo-Pacific Fisheries Statistics Training Centre, held at Bangkok, Thailand, in July.

FAO continued to issue its series of Agricultural Statistical Yearbooks, covering trade and production of every agricultural commodity with which the Organization is concerned. It also continued its series on Forest Products Statistics and, in The State of Food and Agriculture, 1952 reviewed the whole field against the background of the general world economic situation. The FAO monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Economics and Statistics (formerly the Bulletin of Food and Agricultural Statistics) was published in a new and enlarged form, beginning in May.

A working party of experts from food-importing and food-exporting countries explored the practical problems arising from proposals for the establishment of an Emergency Famine Reserve to supply food to countries stricken by such natural calamities as crop failure, drought and flood. A further export group was established to deal with some of the other outstanding problems, particularly the financial aspects involved. These reports are to be considered by the seventh session of the Conference in November 1953.

The Committee on Commodity Problems held three meetings during 1952. It reviewed developments in connexion with a number of commodities, and paid particular attention to the world rice shortage and means of stimulating consumption of milk and milk solids. It also studied some aspects of trends in world food trade, and the broader problems affecting agricultural commodities, such as obstacles to trade, national marketing and price policies, and price stabilization, including the potential role of long-term contracts and intergovernmental commodity agreements.

c. FISHERIES

As regards FAO's work in fisheries, a comprehensive fisheries training centre was held at Valparaiso, Chile, in January. Attended by representatives of seven Latin American countries, it covered the whole subject from biology to commercial processing, statistics and fisheries administration. A seminar on freshwater fish culture in South East Asia was held at Djarkarta, Indonesia, during May and June, and a six-week training course on the subject was inaugurated in September in Thailand. During 1952 it became apparent that FAO's work to encourage freshwater fish culture in areas, ranging from South East Asia to Haiti, where there were serious deficiencies in animal protein, had proved successful.

The success of the Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council led during 1952 to the establishment of a General Fisheries Council for the Mediterranean, whose first meeting was held at Rhodes, in July. In May a meeting of fifteen countries held at Copenhagen, Denmark, discussed the improvement of fisheries statistics in general, a matter of importance to all countries having a fishing industry.

d. FORESTRY

Several of FAO's most important activities in forestry in 1952 took the form of training courses, such as that in timber grading centred at Kuala Lumpur, Malaya, during January and February, at which eight Asian countries were represented. Later in the year, a course in mechanical logging opened in the Philippines, some 40 trainees attending. Timber production and conservation in the Near East was considered at a meeting held in Amman, Jordan, in December. The meeting reviewed special techniques of afforestation and reforestation, including the afforestation of high-altitude areas and sand dune fixation, tree planting on village lands, the establishment of windbreaks, shelterbelts and village fuel areas, and the role of fast-growing species, such as eucalyptus and poplar, in rebuilding eroded land and producing timber and wood products. FAO's Asian-Pacific Forestry Commission, during its second session in Singapore in December, reviewed forestry problems of tropical countries and studied questions relating to rain forests, mangrove forests and afforestation in low-rainfall areas, methods of increasing pulp production in the Far East, and the use of aerial photography for making inventories of tropical forests.

Other work in forestry included a study on timber trends in Europe, undertaken in co-operation with the Economic Commission for Europe (ECE), a study on forest policies of various nations and a survey, undertaken at the request of the United Nations Economic and Social Council, of alternative sources of pulp and paper. In connexion with this last survey, a meeting of some 25 of the world's leading pulp and paper technologists was held in Rome in December; it examined the world supply situation and initiated a scheme for comparative tests of possible new raw materials in laboratories in many different parts of the world. This work on pulp and paper was supplemented by a series of surveys, undertaken under the Expanded Programme of technical assistance, in the most important tropical areas.

e. NUTRITION

In its work on nutrition, FAO continued during 1952 to co-operate with other organizations and with United Nations agencies, especially with United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF) and the World Health Organization (WHO). A course was held at Marseilles, France, for French-speaking nutritionists, jointly with WHO, and a conference on home economics and nutrition education was held at Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, jointly with the Caribbean Commission. This conference was attended by representatives from eleven countries or territories and by observers from sixteen other interested governmental or international organizations. In Africa, two meetings on malnutrition in mothers, infants and young children were held during November in Gambia, one sponsored by the Commission for Technical Co-operation South of the Sahara, the other concerned with the same problems on a world basis. These meetings were part of the work being done over a wide area by FAO and WHO in combating the serious nutritional disease of children known as kwashiorkor.

During 1952, increased interest in home economics was especially evident in the Near East, where an FAO staff expert made a prolonged tour to obtain first-hand information on some of the region's problems.

f. ACTIVITIES UNDER THE EXPANDED PROGRAMME OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

During 1952 there was a considerable expansion of FAO's activities under this Programme of which FAO's share is approximately 29 per cent of the total funds available. By the end of 1952, for example, experts of 48 nationalities were at work in some 55 countries, the comparable figures for the end of 1951 being 38 and 35; in all, 315 experts, as compared with 171 at the end of 1951, were actually at work in the field as of 31 December 1952, and, by that date, 295 assignments had been completed since the inception of the Programme in 1950. Over 900 requests for assistance had been received by the end of the year. During 1952 experts were selected increasingly from the countries receiving assistance.

Besides individual projects covering all FAO's various fields of interest, a number of highly important major operations were under way in certain countries during the year. Some projects have already been referred to above. The large-scale operations were the major development projects, often concerned with the development of millions of acres, in Ceylon, Honduras, Iran and Pakistan. Such projects, which may entail complete development of unused areas, or the reclamation and re-development of those in which cultivation has lapsed, as in India, require usually a large team of experts. Agronomists, land and water engineers and foresters are especially in demand. Their work has often followed that of one or more economists responsible for the over-all planning. At the same time, especially where a complete new social system is being evolved in the developed area, extension and rural welfare of this nature also entail full co-operation with other agencies, as for example with the International Bank in the initial planning stage and with WHO and UNESCO when the health, nutritional and educational aspects come under consideration. To ensure correlation of efforts, as well as to help eliminate duplication, FAO during 1952 appointed a number of experts as Mission Chiefs in countries where individual experts were working on different, but inter-related, problems and where other agencies such as the Point Four Administration also had teams in the field.

The following are a few examples of individual projects on which FAO experts worked during 1952. In Pakistan, an expert examined and reported on the incidence of liver fluke, a parasite especially of sheep, well known in many other parts of the world. In India, low-cost food preservation methods were demonstrated by a food technologist. In Iraq, following recommendations made by a French physician and nutritionist sent by FAO, the Government was taking steps to provide children with a better balanced diet. Dairy technicians and nutrition experts were also working in several Latin American countries. India, Ethiopia and Libya received assistance from experts on hides and skins. A date culture expert worked in Saudi Arabia to improve that country's date output to a point where it could be a valuable source of external revenue. In Afghanistan, a silk-worm expert from China showed how to improve the country's silk industry and produced the first autumn-crop silk cocoons ever seen in that country. Experiments in material for tropical housing resulted from the work of a German timber technologist in Burma, originally sent on a logging mission. He sent specimens of the local hardwoods back to Germany, where they were broken down into small chips, treated with a special resin and rebuilt into boards. From these, pre-fabricated houses were built and, after laboratory tests, at the end of the year were sent back to Burma for prolonged tests under local conditions.

The training centres and fellowship programmes, also conducted under the Expanded Programme, increased during 1952. Some training centres were run as study tours. For example, a group of 30 technicians from twenty countries toured eucalyptus natural forests and plantations in Australia and visited industrial installations and research laboratories working with this versatile genus. Eucalyptus trees are considered promising for afforestation and reforestation purposes and have already been tried with some success in the arid countries of North Africa and the Near East. The study tour enabled the participants to obtain information for use in their home countries on the silviculture, nursery and plantation practices, seed exchange and wood utilization methods observed in Australia, the native habitat of the eucalyptus.

Under FAO's fellowship programme, by the end of 1952, 67 fellows had completed their training and an additional 200 had been appointed and were either already studying abroad or about to begin doing so; this compared with a total of 95 fellows appointed by the end of 1951.

Progress was also made during the year with a number of regional projects. Many of these had in effect taken over work initiated under FAO's regular programme such as: the work on desert locust control; the rice hybridization project, centred in India, but effective for the whole Far Eastern region; and the project, begun in 1952, for surveying the possibilities of improving supplies of raw materials for pulp and paper, or finding new raw materials.

g. PUBLICATIONS⁵

FAO publications appear in English, French and Spanish editions and are available in depository libraries and through sales agents in various countries. In many cases FAO sales agents are the same as those of the United Nations. A Catalogue of Publications, 1945-1951, in three separate editions, was published in 1952, and kept up to date through periodical lists and publications bulletins. This catalogue incorporated all the available titles of the former International Institute of Agriculture which was absorbed into FAO in 1946.

FAO regular series include agricultural studies, nutrition, forestry and fisheries studies, statistics bulletins and commodity bulletins and studies. Yearbooks of food and agriculture, fisheries and forestry, and a growing list of directories of institutions, research stations and schools, as well as of such commodities as wheel-and-track type tractors and mechanical saws, are produced annually or biennially.

A number of FAO technical publications were reprinted during 1952, including: Soil Conservation: an International Study; The Efficient Use of Fertilizers (in Spanish); Weed Control by Growth Regulating Substances; Nutritional Deficiencies in Livestock; Using Salty Land; Teaching Better Nutrition (in Spanish); Food Composition Tables for International Use; and an economic survey of the Progress and Economic Problems of Farm Mechanization.

Among the new publications issued in 1952 were fourteen titles in the Agriculture Development Papers, including Land Utilization in Tropical Areas, Communal Land Tenure and Cereal Breeding Procedures.

Added to FAO's nutrition list were Kwashiorkor in Africa (a joint WHO/FAO survey), and Maize and Maize Diets.

Three important titles were added to the series of forestry studies: Forest and Range Management, Tropical Woods and Agricultural Residues as Alternative Sources of Wood Pulp and the report of the 1952 wood pulp meeting.

In the Commodity Series and the briefer and more frequent Commodity Reports, up-to-date reports were issued on the situation of all the most important agricultural commodities, and a new series of economic policy studies was begun, the first three titles being A Reconsideration of the Economics of the International Wheat Agreement, The Long-term Contract, and a Survey of National Measures for Controlling Farm Prices in Western European Countries.

In addition to the periodical publications mentioned above in connexion with FAO's activities, the Organization published the World Fisheries Abstracts; the quarterly of forestry, Unasylva, and the ECE/FAO Timber Statistics; a monthly Memo, for general distribution and as a special service for non-governmental international organizations collaborating with FAO. A Director-General's Monthly Letter was issued to collaborators in FAO's work.

C. The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO)¹

1. Introduction

The Conference for the establishment of an Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization of the United Nations, convened by the Government of the United Kingdom in association with the Government of France, met in London from 1 to 16 November 1945. It was attended by representatives of 44 governments and by observers from a number of international organizations. The Conference drew up the Constitution of UNESCO.² It also established a Preparatory Educational, Scientific and Cultural Commission to function until UNESCO came into being.

The Preparatory Commission, during its one year of existence, prepared a programme for submission to the first session of the General Conference of UNESCO. It also took steps to meet some of the most urgent needs of educational, scientific and cultural reconstruction in war-devastated areas.

UNESCO came into being on 4 November 1946, when the Instrument of Acceptance of twenty signatories of its Constitution had been deposited with the Government of the United Kingdom.

The first session of the Central Conference was held in Paris in November 1946. The Conference approved the Agreement establishing the relationship between the United Nations and UNESCO. This Agreement came into force on 14 December 1946, with its approval by the General Assembly of the United Nations.³

² For text of UNESCO's Constitution, see Y.U.N., 1946-47, pp. 712-17.

³ For text of Agreement, see Y.U.N., 1946-47, pp. 717-21.

The purpose of UNESCO, as stated in its Constitution, is:

"to contribute to peace and security by promoting collaboration among the nations through education, science and culture in order to further universal respect for justice, for the rule of law and for the human rights and fundamental freedoms which are affirmed for the peoples of the world, without distinction of race, sex, language or religion, by the Charter of the United Nations."

To achieve its purpose, it is provided, UNESCO is:

(1) to collaborate in advancing the mutual knowledge and understanding of peoples through all means of mass communication; (2) to give fresh impulse to popular education and to the spread of culture; and (3) to maintain, increase and diffuse knowledge.⁴

During the first three years of work, in order to carry out this purpose, the programme of UNESCO became stabilized in seven main areas of activity: education, natural sciences, social sciences, cultural activities, exchange of persons, mass communication and relief assistance services. In 1950 an eighth field was added: that of technical assistance for economic development.

Special methods were devised to deal with certain situations—for example, the "Coupon Scheme" which enables institutions and individuals in soft currency countries to obtain books, scientific equipment and educational film materials from hard currency countries.

As a means of ensuring the dissemination of scientific information, science co-operation offices were set up in Uruguay, Egypt, Turkey, India, Indonesia and the Philippines.

To enable scientists, educators and men of letters to meet and exchange views, subventions were granted to the main international educational, scientific and cultural associations.

Some examples of UNESCO's work during the first five years of its existence follow.

Seminars on such subjects as education for international understanding, teaching about the United Nations, illiteracy in the Americas, public libraries and adult education, the teaching of geography and improvements of school text books, were held in France, the United States, Brazil, Sweden, Canada and Belgium. In the Marbial Valley (Haiti), a pilot project in fundamental education was begun early in 1948. Educational missions were sent to the Philippines, Thailand, Afghanistan and Bolivia. International conferences were called on adult education (Denmark, 1949), vagrant children (France, 1949), the establishment of an international federation of children's communities (Switzerland, 1948) and the creation of an international universities' bureau (Netherlands, 1948). A long-term programme for the improvement of text-books and teaching materials was begun in 1947, and a model plan was sent to Member States in 1948 to assist them to make a critical analysis of such material.

To further international co-operation in the natural sciences, UNESCO made grants totalling $1,027,592 up to 31 December 1951 to international scientific and technological organizations. UNESCO took steps to establish new international non-governmental organizations: the International Union for the Protection of Nature, the Council for the Co-ordination of International Congresses of Medical Sciences (together with WHO) and the Union of International Engineering Organizations.

In the social sciences, international relations were fostered by the creation of the International Political Science Association, the International Sociological Association and the International Economic Association, non-governmental organizations in whose formation UNESCO assisted. The social tensions programme resulted in the publication of Tensions Affecting International Understanding. A major publication completed in 1950 was Contemporary Political Science, a survey of methods, research and teaching in 23 countries and areas.

Three new international organizations in the cultural field were established with UNESCO assistance: the International Theatre Institute, the International Music Council and the International Council for Philosophy and Humanistic Studies. In 1948 work was started on the framing of a Universal Copyright Convention to unify the international legal systems now in force. At the request of the United Nations Economic and Social Council, a project was begun in 1947 on the translations of classics. Significant publications included two catalogues of colour reproductions: the first of paintings from 1860 to the present day, the second of paintings prior to 1860. In 1950, an international commission was constituted to take charge of the preparation of a Scientific and Cultural History of Mankind.

Surveys of technical facilities in press, radio and film in war-devastated and certain underdeveloped countries were begun in 1947. They were terminated by the end of 1951, by which time 157 countries and territories had been surveyed. In 1948, an agreement to facilitate the international circulation of visual and auditory materials was opened for signature at the United Nations Headquarters. The agreement provides for the abolition, under prescribed conditions, of customs duties, quotas and import licences on educational films and other audio-visual materials. In 1950, a second agreement for the importation of educational, scientific and cultural materials was approved by the General Conference and opened for signature at the United Nations Headquarters.

2. Organization

UNESCO consists of a General Conference, an Executive Board and a Secretariat.

The General Conference, which meets at least every two years, is composed of representatives of the Member States of UNESCO. It determines the policies and the main lines of work of the Organization, and it may summon international conferences on education, the sciences and humanities and the dissemination of knowledge.

Each Member is entitled to one vote in the Conference. Decisions of the Conference are made by a majority of the Members present and voting, except in cases in which the Constitution requires a two-thirds majority. The adoption by the Conference of international conventions, or of amendments to the Constitution, for example, requires a two-thirds majority vote.

New Members may be admitted into UNESCO, if they are Members of the United Nations, by signing the Constitution and depositing an instrument of acceptance. Other States, to become Members, require, in addition, a favourable recommendation of the Executive Board and a two-thirds majority vote of the General Conference, and their applications are subject to the approval of the United Nations.

The Executive Board consists of twenty members elected for four-year terms by the General Conference from among the delegates appointed by Member States. The General Conference elects the members of the Board, endeavouring to select persons competent in the arts, humanities, sciences and education. The Board, which meets at least twice each year, is responsible for the execution of the programme adopted by the Conference and exercises any powers delegated to it by the Conference.

The Secretariat consists of the Director-General and the staff. The Director-General, appointed by the General Conference on the nomination of the Executive Board, is the chief administrative officer of UNESCO.

Under article 7 of UNESCO's Constitution, each Member State is required to make arrangements for the establishment of a National Commission or Co-operating Body. These National Commissions act in an advisory capacity to their respective delegations to the General Conference and serve as liaison groups between UNESCO and the educational, scientific and cultural life of their own countries.

3. Activities during 1952

During the year, the number of Member States rose to 65 with the admission of Nicaragua. The Seventh General Conference, held in Paris from 12 November to 11 December, voted to admit Spain, Nepal and Libya, but by the end of the year they had not yet deposited their instruments of acceptance of UNESCO's Constitution.

a. INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION BETWEEN SPECIALISTS

During the year UNESCO continued its policy of promoting co-operation among specialists, both through the grant of financial aid to facilitate the work of international non-governmental organizations and through the direct action of its science co-operation offices.

For example, aid was given to the International Bureau of Education, an intergovernmental organization, in connexion with the holding of the fifteenth International Conference on Public Education in Geneva in July. The Conference was chiefly concerned with the access of women to education and science teaching in secondary schools. Aid was also given to various non-governmental organizations in the education field, including the International Association of Universities and the International Association of University Professors and Lecturers, which were thereby enabled to continue their studies on the equivalence of diplomas or university degrees. The establishment at Copenhagen on 1 August 1952 of a World Confederation of the Teaching Profession, to which the International Federation of Teachers' Associations, the International Federation of Secondary School Teachers and the World Organization of the Teaching Profession, with a total membership of 2 million, announced their intention of affiliating themselves, was expected to assist UNESCO's work of co-ordination. In 1952 the World Braille Council was constituted; it is to continue and extend the task—pursued by UNESCO since 1949—of unifying Braille notation.

UNESCO also continued its assistance to the International Council of Scientific Unions, an organization with ten member Unions (as compared with seven in 1946). As a result of subventions from UNESCO distributed by the ICSU to its member Unions in October 1951, international meetings were held of scientists specializing in physics, mechanics, astronomy, chemistry, sciences of the earth and biology. Assistance was also given to the Council for International Organizations of Medical Sciences, the Union of International Engineering Organizations and the International Union for the Protection of Nature.

In the field of social sciences, UNESCO continued to assist the International Sociological and Political Science Association in Zurich, the International Economic Association in Monaco, and the International Committee of Comparative Law in Paris, all three of which had previously been established under its auspices. It also secured the co-operation of these organizations in carrying out its own programme, for example in collecting information and preparing reports on the teaching of the subjects within the respective fields of the organizations in various countries. At the end of the year, UNESCO was in process of forming a provisional International Social Science Council similar to those which exist for the natural sciences and cultural activities. UNESCO also assisted the International Statistical Institute to continue the work of the International Statistical Education Centre, set up under UNESCO's auspices in Calcutta in 1950.

Aid was likewise continued to the International Council for Philosophy and Humanistic Studies, set up under the auspices of UNESCO in 1949. By 1952 the membership of the Council had grown to twelve international associations and was expanding. The International Theatre Institute and the International Music Council were also expanding their membership and activities. International Theatre Weeks were, as in previous years, organized by the national centres of the ITI; in the United States during March 700 professional and amateur groups in 46 States of the Union participated.

In the sphere of the visual arts, one of the aims of the conference on the condition of artists, held in Venice in September, was to study the possibility of setting up a broadly representative organization, which would complete the network of international intellectual co-operation in cultural activities.

In 1947 and 1948 UNESCO set up science co-operation offices in the Middle East, South Asia, the Far East and Latin America, as part of its programme to promote international scientific co-operation. Though originally confined to the natural sciences, the action of these offices was subsequently extended in the Middle East and South Asia to the field of the social sciences.

b. STANDARDIZATION, COLLECTION AND DISSEMINATION OF SPECIALIZED DOCUMENTATION

In this field, UNESCO: (1) assists the national and international standardization, collection and dissemination of specialized documentation; and (2) assembles and distributes selected information on specialized documentation. Its most important indirect activity in this field is to promote the publication of bibliographies and abstracts.

In the natural sciences, following a Conference on Science Abstracting held in 1949, national and international committees were set up in each of the main branches of science to establish and develop organizations which would draw up bibliographies and abstracts. Certain publications are issued under special contract; for example, the first volume of the Index Bibliographicus, which was issued in 1952, was prepared by the International Federation for Documentation. In the social sciences, some of this work was entrusted to the Committee for the Co-ordination of Social Science Documentation, established in 1951, with which the international associations set up under UNESCO's auspices maintain close co-operation.

The provisional International Consultative Committee on Bibliography, set up in 1950, met in April 1952 to consider the task of bringing uniformity into bibliographical methods. The UNESCO secretariat continued certain bibliographical work and its publications during the year included the International Repertory of Social Science Documentation Centres and two quarterly periodicals: International Political Science Abstracts and Current Sociology, the latter being issued for the first time in 1952.

The third issue of the Index Translationum was also published during the year; it covers approximately 13,500 translations published in 34 countries in 1950. UNESCO continued its co-operation with the Committee on Terminology of the International Organization of Terminology in order to improve the quality of translations and, at the end of the year, a multilingual glossary of machine tools was in course of preparation as an experiment undertaken at the request of the Economic Commission for Europe.

Among the publications issued during 1952 by the documentation and information services of UNESCO were the following: World Handbook of Education Organizations and Statistics, which provides information on 57 countries, the quarterly fundamental and Adult Education Bulletin and the monthly Education Abstracts; Volume IV of Study Abroad, an international repertory of fellowships, scholarships and exchanges containing information from 90 States and territories concerning 39,000 awards as well as specialized supplements, Vacation Study Supplement, Workers Abroad, Teaching Abroad and Travel Abroad; the fifth volume of Press, Film, Radio, completing the results of the survey conducted in 157 States and territories of technical needs and media of mass communications as well as a catalogue of Films and Filmstrips about the Work of the United Nations and its Specialized Agencies, a catalogue of Films on Art and a study entitled The Entertainment Film for Juvenile Audiences. A programme for similar work in the field of television for 1953-54 was drawn up on the basis of the recommendations of a committee of experts meeting in April 1952.

c. FUNDAMENTAL EDUCATION

Considerable progress was made during the year in "fundamental education", a term used by UNESCO to explain its approach to mass education, whereby reading becomes primarily a tool by which people can learn to improve their health, their crops, and their standard of living.

The first fundamental education centre, inaugurated at Patzcuaro, Mexico, on 9 May 1951,⁵ developed rapidly and the first class of 50 students from nine Latin American countries graduated in December. By the spring of 1953 it was expected that twenty countries would be represented among the students. New educational materials, available to any government wishing to use them, included a simple new printing process which can be operated by a teacher and which reduces the cost of printing to little more than that of paper and ink.

Plans were completed for a second regional centre to open early in 1953 at Sirs-el-Layan (Egypt) for the Arab countries. Various projects for the establishment of national centres, particularly in Thailand and the Philippines, were also being considered at the end of the year.

An information network was established during 1951 for the exchange of experience of ideas on techniques in fundamental education among 46 national fundamental education projects in seventeen States and territories. In 1952 UNESCO began to give positive assistance to these projects, both by the dispatch of expert missions of varying duration and type and by the provision of material, free of charge, mainly through the UNESCO Gift Coupon Scheme. More than 150 projects in twenty countries have asked to be included in this scheme.

Research into the use of vernacular languages in fundamental education was undertaken in 1951 at the request of the United Nations Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. A committee of experts met in November 1952 at Jos (Nigeria) to consider the special problem of the use of vernacular languages in conjunction with English in the African countries where English is a recognized subsidiary language.

UNESCO also carried out experiments in Egypt, India and the Belgian Congo on the use of visual aids. Following a mission to Turkey in 1951, a national centre for educational films was established there. A survey was made of the Canadian Farm Forum (radio) project, covering a wide range of subjects including hygiene, domestic science, agriculture and civics as a guide to developing educational radio. A book entitled Visual Aids in Fundamental Education, published during the year, assesses the results of a number of typical experiments carried out in this field in various countries.

In addition to assistance under the Expanded Programme of technical assistance, UNESCO continued to offer its Member States the services of expert missions as part of its ordinary programme. Under these combined programmes, from 1 January 1951 to 1 August 1952, 54 experts sent by UNESCO were working in 22 countries to help them in developing fundamental education. These countries were: Africa: Liberia, Libya, Somaliland; America: Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, Jamaica, Haiti, Peru, Venezuela; Asia: Burma, Cambodia, Ceylon, China, Indonesia, Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand; Middle East: Afghanistan, Iraq, Syria, Turkey. In addition to the services of these experts, 42 fellowships were awarded.

d. THE EXTENSION OF EDUCATION

During 1952 experts sent by UNESCO were assisting in the expansion of primary and secondary education, including technical and vocational training in the following 22 countries: Africa: Liberia, Libya; Latin America: Bolivia, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Panama, Peru; Asia: Burma, Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos, Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand; Middle East: Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria. Between 1 January 1951 and 1 August 1952 these missions involved the dispatch of 103 experts, the award of 81 fellowships and the supply of material worth $74,434.

The General Conference of UNESCO, at its sixth session in 1951, decided that a series of regional conferences should be held to determine the best ways of implementing the recommendations for the development of compulsory free primary education made by the Fourteenth International Conference on Public Education, held jointly with the International Bureau of Education in July 1951. The first of these regional conferences was held in Bombay in December for South and Southeast Asia and the Pacific area. In preparation for the conference, UNESCO arranged for the preparation of a series of studies dealing with individual countries in the area.

In the field of adult education, a number of experiments were carried out during the year in connexion with workers' education. These included the experimental organization of an International Centre of Workers' Education, which was opened in June at La Brévière, near Compiègne, and lasted for three months. During the first six weeks, three seminars, of a fortnight each, were organized in turn by the International Federation of Free Trade Unions, the International Federation of Workers' Educational Associations and the International Co-operative Alliance, for the training of their own staff. Altogether, 200 persons took part in these seminars. During the second six-week period, a seminar was organized by UNESCO, which was attended by more than 100 specialists in workers' education from 26 countries.

In co-operation with the Government of the Dominican Republic, UNESCO organized a regional seminar on adult education, held at Ciudad Trujillo in October 1952 for the countries of Latin America. The UNESCO secretariat also helped to prepare a seminar on workers' education organized by the Jamaican authorities for countries in the Caribbean region, held at Kingston in September. Two national seminars were also held during the year to follow up the work of the international seminar organized by UNESCO in 1950 at Mondsee (Austria). The first was held in April at Marly-le-Roi, near Paris, on the initiative of the French National Commission for UNESCO, and the second, which met at Salzburg (Austria), was convened by the Austrian Association of People's Universities in co-operation with similar organizations in Germany, Italy and Switzerland. The object of the latter was to consider means of promoting international understanding through art and political education.

It was clear from the first statistics, covering 120 countries and territories, which the UNESCO secretariat communicated to the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women in March 1952, that the education of women lagged seriously behind that of men.

In agreement with the International Bureau of Education, UNESCO included the question in the agenda of the Fifteenth Conference on Public Education, held in Geneva in July 1952. Delegates from 51 States attended the Conference, which used documentation prepared on the basis of information supplied by 47 countries. This documentation was to be embodied in a publication entitled: The Access of Women to Education.

UNESCO's educational assistance for Palestine and Middle East refugees was developed in 1952 in accordance with the agreement between the Organization and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWAPRNE). During the school year 1951-52, the budget provided for this programme was $689,000, of which $88,000 was provided by UNESCO. In the same year, the number of UNRWAPRNE-UNESCO schools rose from 105 to 118, and the number of pupils from 42,991 to 50,958. Vocational training courses were also organized, and 40,000 adults learned to read and write.

An expert, seconded by UNESCO to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency at Pusan, drew up a preliminary list of the education needs of Korea. In June 1952 the Director of the Agency asked UNESCO to appoint five education specialists to join experts from other specialized agencies in drawing up a five-year plan for economic and social reconstruction in Korea.

e. HIGHER EDUCATION AND SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

In higher education, a scheme for UNESCO University Courses was launched in 1952 as an experiment. The project is to provide technical assistance for universities in process of expanding by offering them the aid of a party of foreign professors so chosen as to constitute a unit on one well-defined subject. One party of specialists in the social sciences was organized at the University of Dacca (Pakistan) and another in chemistry at the University of Caracas (Venezuela).

An inquiry into the teaching of the social sciences was carried out in eight typical countries, Egypt, France, India, Mexico, Sweden, the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia, by the International Sociological, Political Science and Economic Associations, and by the International Committee of Comparative Law. A committee of experts was held in September to assess the results of the survey, in co-operation with the secretariat.

The survey of research institutes was continued with the assistance of international specialist organizations. Here, UNESCO aims at: (1) co-ordinating the research programmes of existing national institutes to form an international network; and (2) promoting the establishment of international or regional research institutes, to be financed by the appropriate Member States.

Among the research programmes co-ordinated and assisted by UNESCO is the work relating to the arid zone. It is carried out under the authority of a permanent advisory committee of experts, with the assistance of panels of honorary consultants appointed by National Commissions for each special branch. Each year the Committee, which consists of scientists from Australia, Egypt, France, India, Israel, Mexico, Peru, the United Kingdom and the United States, proposes to the national institutes certain subjects for research. The two main subjects chosen for 1952 were hydrology, which had also been studied in 1951, and plant ecology. The ecological study concerned strains and species which could usefully be planted in desert areas to combat the encroachment of the desert. In co-operation with the Turkish Government, UNESCO organized a symposium in Ankara in April 1952 on arid zone hydrology, with particular reference to underground water. It also assisted financially the symposium organized in May by the Israel National Research Council at Jerusalem and Haifa.

Following preliminary studies undertaken by the UNESCO secretariat in 1951, with financial assistance from Belgium, France and Italy, a conference of twelve European Member States of UNESCO met in Paris in December 1951 and in February 1952 at Geneva to consider the establishment of the European Centre for Nuclear Research. At its February session, the conference adopted an agreement setting up a Council of State representatives, an independent body financed and administered by the participating States, to carry out scientific and technical studies preparatory to the establishment of a European Nuclear Research Laboratory. The agreement came into force on 5 May 1952 with its ratification by France, Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden and Yugoslavia, and shortly afterwards by Denmark and Switzerland.

The Council, which adopted the title of European Council for Nuclear Research, met in May at UNESCO headquarters and in June in Copenhagen. A work plan was adopted, to comprise certain theoretical studies and the preparation of a detailed project for the organization and equipment of a laboratory with a 600 million electron-volt synchrocyclotron and a more than 10 milliard electron-volt synchrotron. The headquarters of the Council are at Geneva, and its budget of $100,000 is provided by voluntary contributions from member States.

f. PROTECTION OF WRITERS, ARTISTS AND SCIENTISTS, AND PRESERVATION OF THE CULTURAL HERITAGE OF MANKIND

Following five years' preliminary work, the UNESCO-sponsored Universal Copyright Convention was approved at an intergovernmental conference, held in Geneva from 18 August to 6 September at the invitation of the Swiss Government. At the conclusion of the conference, the Convention was signed by representatives from 35 countries, including the United States; it will come into force three months after ratification by twelve countries. The Convention was conceived mainly as a bridge between the copyright system in force in the States signatories of the Berne Convention of 1886, and its subsequent revisions, and that provided by the various inter-American conventions. It is aimed at ensuring that authors and other copyright proprietors of literary and artistic works, including writings, musical and dramatic works and films, painting and sculpture, shall enjoy in every country the same protection and treatment as are afforded to nationals of that country.

Another conference was convened by UNESCO in Venice in September to consider the situation of the artist in the present-day world and the conditions which hamper or encourage creative art. All the branches of art and literature were represented at the conference by experts chosen by Member States.

UNESCO's work for the preservation of the cultural heritage of mankind has two main aspects—technical and legal. In both cases, there is close co-operation with the appropriate international organizations. On the technical side, expert missions are placed at the disposal of Member States at their request, to advise and assist them in the preservation and restoration of their monuments and archaeological and historic sites. In 1952 such a mission went to Lebanon and Syria.

On the basis of an Italian proposal to the fifth session of the UNESCO General Conference in 1950—that an international convention should be drawn up for the protection of cultural property in the event of armed conflict—and of a study made by the International Committee on Monuments, Artistic and Historical Sites and Archaeological Excavations, a preliminary draft convention was submitted by the UNESCO secretariat to a committee of governmental experts in July 1952. The committee, to which seventeen States sent delegates and four observers, drew up a draft convention. The UNESCO secretariat also continued to study a project for the establishment of international repositories for the safekeeping of microfilm reproductions of works of art and cultural property of world-wide interest.

g. DISSEMINATION OF SCIENCE AND CULTURE

During 1952 there was an increased demand from Member States for UNESCO assistance in the introduction of teaching modern science in schools. UNESCO prepared a series of ten handbooks, for publication in 1953, for elementary school teachers. One of the subjects discussed at the Fifteenth International Conference on Education in July was the teaching of natural sciences in secondary schools, and various recommendations were submitted by the Conference to the Ministries of Education of the various countries. Preparatory to the Conference, UNESCO published nine reports relating to various sciences.

To enable the ordinary citizen to understand the scientific changes taking place, UNESCO has sent out three travelling exhibitions, all of which were touring Member States during the year. One, on physics and astronomy, opened in 1950, was touring Latin America; the second, on "Our senses and a knowledge of the world", which opened in 1951, was being shown in the Far East; and the third, on the "New Materials" which science has made available to man, was opened in Paris in May 1952, after which it was being sent to Yugoslavia and Southeast Europe as well as to the Middle East.

UNESCO was also taking steps to encourage the creation, and stimulate the activities of national associations of writers and journalists specializing in the popularization of science, of associations for the advancement of science, and of science clubs. It continued the publication of its quarterly review, Impact, begun in 1950, the chief purpose of which is to draw attention to the social repercussions of scientific progress.

UNESCO also continued its programme for the furtherance of education in the arts. Preparations were being made by the International Music Council for a conference on musical education to be held in Brussels in 1953. In April the International Theatre Institute convened a meeting, which studied the situation and role of dramatic works written by adults for young people, and of creative dramatics by children and young people. A seminar, convened by UNESCO in Brooklyn, New York, in September 1952, assessed the first results of the Crusade for Museums campaign launched in 1949 by the International Council of Museums. The movement, which was started in France, spread rapidly to Belgium, the Netherlands, Sweden and Yugoslavia. The UNESCO seminar, which was attended by educators and museum officials from 26 countries, discussed ways in which museums could become an integral part of both fundamental and adult education.

The UNESCO secretariat has made available to Member States 44 travelling exhibitions of classical and modern painting, each of which consists of 50 colour reproductions. During 1951-52, they were shown in 33 countries in America, Asia, Africa, Europe and the Pacific region. For the 500th anniversary of the birth of Leonardo da Vinci, the secretariat prepared 45 exhibitions, each containing 150 reproductions of drawings.

A scientific documentation centre was opened in Mexico City in February 1952, under the Expanded Programme of technical assistance and in co-operation with the Mexican Government. Two model national documentation centres were being established in Rio de Janeiro and Montevideo, in collaboration with the Brazilian and Uruguayan Governments, respectively. During the year 220,000 books and periodicals were covered by the exchange of publications service provided by the Bulletin for Libraries, and 1,900 libraries were concerned.

h. FREE FLOW OF IDEAS

The Agreement on the importation of educational, scientific and cultural materials, adopted by the General Conference at its fifth session, entered into force on 21 May 1952, with the deposit of the tenth ratification. By the end of the year thirteen countries had ratified the Agreement, which eliminated customs duties on a wide range of educational, scientific and cultural materials.

The UNESCO Coupon Scheme, launched in 1948, was designed to overcome currency difficulties by enabling institutions and individuals in soft-currency countries to purchase in their national currency books and periodicals, educational films and scientific equipment, available generally in hard-currency countries. By the end of 1952, a total of 31 States were participating in the scheme. Coupons to the value of almost $3,000,000 had been issued since the scheme was launched. During 1952 the coupon scheme was extended to include the Gift Coupon Scheme which provides gifts of educational equipment from voluntary organizations to needy schools, primarily in the under-developed areas, in Member States. By the end of the year this plan was in full operation in eight donor countries: Australia, Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States. Thus, books, film strips, maps and scientific equipment were made available to schools and institutions in 22 countries.

STUDIES OF SOCIAL PROBLEMS LIKELY TO CREATE NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL TENSIONS

UNESCO issued in 1952 the second of its general studies summing up the results of various inquiries undertaken since 1948 into this question. The study, entitled Tensions that Cause Wars, was written from the standpoint of psychology. The Organization's programme during the year was aimed at: (1) stressing the basic problems most likely to lead to conflicts between people and nations; (2) directing research to practical ends so as to afford States positive assistance; and (3) fitting UNESCO's activities into specific projects undertaken by the United Nations and the specialized agencies rather than engaging in separate projects. In particular, its attention was concentrated on: the social implications of industrialization and technological change; population and migration; and racial questions and methods of international co-operation. Studies were published on the findings of research conducted into Education in a Technological Society and The Community Factor in Modern Technology.

The campaign against racial prejudice, begun in 1950, was systematically pursued. In addition to the publications issued on this problem, UNESCO in 1952 conducted or encouraged specific field inquiries designed to focus attention on spontaneous factors or governmental measures in certain countries that contribute towards an improvement of relations between the different races and, more generally, towards the integration of various ethnic groups in the national community. The most important of these studies, begun in 1951, was being conducted in several states of Brazil with the active co-operation of the authorities and scientific institutions. Others were being conducted in Mexico under the auspices of the Instituto Indigenista, in the French West Indies, Yugoslavia and Germany—in the last-mentioned country through the International Social Science Institute in Cologne.

j. EDUCATION FOR LIVING IN A WORLD COMMUNITY

During the year UNESCO continued its campaign in support of United Nations action for the promotion of human rights. In the intellectual sphere, for example, the International Council for Philosophy and Humanistic Studies at UNESCO's request engaged in a study of the concept of the rule of law as a fundamental factor in human co-operation in international affairs. A study was prepared by the UNESCO secretariat setting forth the different aspects of the problem involved in the interpretation and application of the article in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights concerning man's right "freely to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement and its benefits".

The campaign to propagate the principles embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was also continued. The exhibition inaugurated in Paris during the fourth session of the General Conference continued to be displayed in the principal towns of France and Belgium and copies of the Human Rights Album were distributed to National Commissions and appropriate international organizations, which used it for organizing exhibitions in schools, museums and libraries. The National Commissions also co-operated in the celebration of Human Rights Day. A seminar was held in August at Woudschoten, near Utrecht (Netherlands), to discuss teaching about the United Nations and Human Rights. It had before it reports requested from various international teachers' organizations, as well as two draft pamphlets for teachers, one giving educational guidance and the other containing a collection of texts bearing on the history of Human Rights.

The project of a Scientific and Cultural History of Mankind, which was approved by the General Conference at its sixth session in 1951, got under way in 1952. The aim of the project, which is being financed by UNESCO, is "to demonstrate the interdependence of nations and cultures and their respective contributions to the common heritage of mankind." The International Commission, set up to prepare the history, settled the lines of its work for 1953 and 1954; it appointed editors of most of the volumes planned and commissioned from 30 specialists various studies to be published in its Journals before being used for the final version of the work. In order that the project should be substantially international, the Commission secured the co-operation of 80 correspondents in 39 countries.

Following seminars organized by UNESCO in 1950 and 1951 on the teaching of history and geography, various countries, including Belgium, Denmark, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, joined in setting up bilateral or multilateral committees of historians and history teachers who are considering each other's textbooks so as to remove from them any distortions of truth prompted by prejudice. The experts who had previously attended UNESCO's seminars are playing a leading part in such committees as well as in study conferences organized in various countries to follow up the seminars.

UNESCO also continued its co-operation with youth movements. A seminar on Education for Living in a World Community, for leaders of youth movements in South and Southeast Asia, was held at Rangoon in October. The seminar was chiefly concerned with a study of youth activities in fundamental education: participation in the campaign against illiteracy, contribution to the development of rural hygiene, appropriate methods for bringing about a revival of local festivals and regional folklore and for stimulating interest in the arts in general. As for the international voluntary work camps movement, a conference attended by delegates and observers of 44 organizations took place in March, drew up plans for training courses for youth leaders and considered methods for increasing the educational value of work camps and ways in which camp techniques might be used in fundamental education. The 1952 campaign involved the opening of 950 work camps in 37 countries.

UNESCO organizes individual or collective travel and exchanges, on an experimental basis, for certain categories of persons; and it administers a number of grants for study abroad. In 1952 two experiments for the exchange of teachers were carried out, one between the Arab States and the other between six Member States of Latin America. Travel grants for workers were inaugurated in 1952. Through them, UNESCO enabled 760 persons from twelve countries to participate in group educational travel in countries other than their own. Representatives from the six international workers' organizations which co-operated with UNESCO in arranging these tours have reviewed the first year's operation and strongly recommended its expansion in 1953 and 1954. In addition, 40 travel grants were made to enable students to participate in international youth meetings.

Three types of fellowships are administered by the UNESCO secretariat:

(1) Those financed from the Organization's budget, 65 for 1952. They are distributed in relation to the main projects in UNESCO's programme and six fellowships are set aside each year for candidates who are natives of Non-Self-Governing or Trust Territories;

(2) Those awarded by governments or international or national organizations but administered by UNESCO. They are sometimes for a particular purpose but are always in line with UNESCO's programme. A total of 30 of these were awarded in 1951 and 1952; and

(3) Those awarded under the Expanded Programme of technical assistance. These numbered 130 in 1952.

4. Budget

The seventh session of the General Conference, meeting in November-December 1952, approved a budget of $18,712,964 to carry out the programme of activities for 1953 and 1954. The estimates for 1953 were $9,017,849 and for 1954 $9,695,115. The estimated distribution of funds for 1953 is as follows (in U. S. dollars):

Contributions to the budget are made by Members of UNESCO according to the scale adopted for the administrative budget of the United Nations, with adjustments to provide for the difference in membership of the two organizations. The scale of contributions for 1953-54, as approved for 66 Member States of UNESCO by the seventh session of the General Conference, is as follows:

D. The International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO)

1. Introduction

At the International Civil Aviation Conference, which met in Chicago from 1 November to 7 December 1944, representatives of 52 States adopted a Convention providing for the establishment of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO).² The Conference also drew up an Interim Agreement providing for a Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization (PICAO) to operate until the formal establishment of the permanent organization.

The aims and objectives of ICAO, as stated in the Convention, are:

"to develop the principles and techniques of international air navigation and to foster the planning and development of international air transport" so as, among other things, to: ensure the safe and orderly growth of international civil aviation; encourage aircraft design and operation and the development of airways, airports and air navigation facilities; ensure that the rights of Contracting States are fully respected; promote safety of flight in international air navigation; and promote generally the development of all aspects of international civil aeronautics.

PICAO came into being on 6 June 1945, after 26 States had adhered to the Interim Agreement. ICAO came formally into existence on 4 April 1947, 30 days after the Convention on International Civil Aviation had been ratified by the required 26 States. The Convention superseded, as between Contracting States, the provisions of two earlier agreements: the Paris Convention of 1919 establishing the International Commission for Air Navigation, and the Pan-American Convention on Commercial Aviation, drawn up in Havana in 1928.

An Agreement establishing the relationship between the United Nations and ICAO came into force on 13 May 1947 with its approval by the Assembly of ICAO.³ It had previously been approved by the United Nations General Assembly on 14 December 1946.

From 15 August 1945, when the PICAO Interim Council met for the first time, until the formal establishment of ICAO, the provisional organization secured concerted action from its members to provide and maintain the facilities and services necessary for air transport across national borders. Patterns for meteorological services, traffic control, communications, radio beacons and ranges, search and rescue organizations and other facilities required for safe international flight were developed. Much of PICAO's work involved the drafting of recommendations for standards, practices and procedures, designed to ensure the safety, regularity and efficiency of international air transport. One of the most important activities of the permanent organization in the technical field was the review of these recommendations with a view to the adoption by the ICAO Council of international standards and recommended practices to regulate civil aviation in Member States. By the end of 1951, fourteen sets of standards⁴ and recommended practices⁵ had been approved by the Council.

As required by article 38 of the Convention, Contracting States notified ICAO of the differences between their national regulations or practices and the international standards contained in the annexes adopted by the Council. The differences filed were communicated to all Contracting States and their implications were studied by ICAO's Air Navigation Commission.

PICAO and, later, ICAO held regional air navigation meetings to examine the air navigation requirements and specify particular procedures to be followed in each of the eight regions of the world in which a particular type of flying operation predominates.

ICAO arranged for the co-operative maintenance of other air transport, navigation and meteorological facilities required by aircraft flying over sparsely populated regions or regions of uncertain sovereignty. Accordingly, ocean weather stations have been maintained in the North Atlantic, Loran (long-range radio aid to navigation) stations at Vik, Iceland and the Faeroe Islands, weather reporting and forecasting stations, area traffic control and telecommunication networks in Iceland, and meteorological stations and communications facilities in Greenland.

The principal achievement of ICAO in the legal field up to the end of 1951 was the adoption by the Assembly of a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft, opened for signature on 19 June 1948.

Among other activities, ICAO began a number of long-term studies related to air transport and air navigation, as directed by various sessions of the Assembly.

2. Organization

The governing bodies of ICAO are the Assembly and the Council.

The Assembly, comprising representatives of Member States, is convened by the Council and meets annually. The Assembly determines its own rules of procedure and is responsible for the financial arrangements of the organization, including the approval of an annual budget. It examines and takes action on matters referred to it by the Council and may, at its discretion, refer to the Council specific matters for the consideration of the latter body. Finally, the Assembly deals with such other matters as come within the sphere of action of the Organization but are not specifically assigned to the Council.

Each Member State is entitled to one vote in the Assembly. Decisions of the Assembly and the Council are made, with few exceptions, by a simple majority of the votes cast. Exceptions include adoption by the Assembly of amendments to the Convention, and the adoption by the Council of international standards and recommended practices regulating air navigation, both of which require a two-thirds majority vote.

Members may be admitted into the organization, provided they are signatories to the Convention. Members of the United Nations or Allied States or States which remained neutral during the Second World War must notify adherence or deposit an instrument of ratification of the Convention. To become members of ICAO, former Axis States require an affirmative four-fifths vote by the ICAO Assembly, the assent of any State invaded or attacked by the State seeking admission, and approval by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

The Council, which meets in virtually continuous session, is the executive body of the organization and derives its powers and authority from the Assembly and from the Convention itself. It is composed of 21 Member States elected by the Assembly for a period of three years. In electing these States, the Assembly must give adequate representation to:

(1) those Member States of major importance in air transport; (2) those Member States not otherwise included which make the largest contribution to the provision of facilities for international civil air navigation; and (3) those Member States not otherwise included, the election of which will ensure that all major geographical areas of the world are represented.

⁵ A recommended practice, by definition of the first Assembly, is "any specification for physical characteristics, configuration, material, performance, personnel or procedure, the uniform application of which is recognized as desirable in the interest of safety, regularity or efficiency of international air navigation, and to which Member States will endeavour to conform in accordance with the Convention".

The Council adopts standards for international air navigation and collects, examines and publishes information concerning air navigation. It administers the finances of the organization and carries out the directives of the Assembly. It may conduct research into all aspects of air transport and air navigation which are of international importance. The Council may act as an arbiter between two or more Members of ICAO in any dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention and its Annexes and, when expressly requested by all the parties concerned, as an arbitral body in any dispute arising among Members relating to international civil aviation.

Among other duties, the Council is charged with providing for the establishment of subsidiary bodies and with supervising and co-ordinating their work. Three main bodies have been established: the Air Navigation Commission, the Air Transport Committee and the Legal Committee. The Air Navigation Commission assigns its technical work to the following divisions: Aerodromes, Air Routes and Ground Aids; Accident Investigation; Aeronautical Information Services; Airworthiness; Aeronautical Telecommunications; Aeronautical Maps and Charts; Meteorology; Operating Practices; Personnel Licensing; Rules of the Air and Air Traffic Control; and Search and Rescue. The Air Transport Committee is assisted by the Facilitation of International Air Transport Division and the Statistics Division. Two additional committees, the Committee on Joint Support of Air Navigation Services and the Finance Committee, are composed of representatives elected by the Council from its own members.

The Council elects its President and appoints the Secretary-General of ICAO. The President of the Council convenes and presides at meetings of the Council and acts as its permanent representative. The Secretary-General is the chief executive officer of the Organization. He is responsible to the Council for carrying out duties assigned to him by that body.

ICAO maintains five offices in the field to deal with the regional aspects of international civil aviation, particularly with air navigation problems: the North American Office, in Montreal; the European and African Office, in Paris; the South American Office, in Lima; the Middle East Office, in Cairo; and the Far East and Pacific Office, in Melbourne.

3. Activities during 1952

By 31 December 1952, the membership of the Organization had increased to 58 with the addition of the Republic of Korea.

At the end of April, India submitted to the Council, as a disagreement between itself and Pakistan relating to the interpretation and application of Articles 5, 6 and 9 of the Convention and the International Air Services Transit Agreement, a complaint concerning the refusal of Pakistan to permit Indian aircraft engaged in commercial air services between India and Afghanistan to fly over West Pakistan territory without landing or to land there for non-traffic purposes, on the ground that flights over an area which Pakistan had declared to be a prohibited area would be involved. In its communication India requested the Council to declare that its aircraft were entitled to operate scheduled air services between India and Afghanistan across West Punjab by the shortest practicable air route and to recommend to Pakistan not to impede in any manner the operation of scheduled international air services by Indian aircraft between Delhi and Kabul over the Delhi-Peshawar-Kabul route, on the route between Bombay and Ahmedabad and Kabul via Karachi-Zahidan and Kandahar, and by any other commercially feasible route. A copy of the Indian communication was immediately airmailed to Karachi for comments, which were received in May. This was the first dispute to be submitted by Contracting States to the ICAO Council.

In June the Council appointed a working group to consider what steps could properly be taken in the matter. The group consulted with the High Commissioners for India and Pakistan in Canada and both Governments were urged to enter into further direct negotiations as soon as possible, with a view to removing or at least limiting the outstanding issues. At the same time Afghanistan, which had cabled ICAO on 18 June supporting the Indian complaint, was informed of what had been done, the Council expressing the opinion that the action it had taken and intended to take on the Indian communication would dispose also of the questions raised by Afghanistan—an opinion in which Afghanistan subsequently concurred.

Further information was supplied by both countries and another working group of the Council met with the High Commissioners on 19 November. This working group concluded that the possibility of direct negotiation had not been exhausted and recommended that the two Governments be requested to continue their discussions and report to the Council no later than 15 January 1953.⁶

a. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

During the first year of ICAO participation in the Expanded Programme of technical assistance for economic development, expenditure amounted to some $300,000; expenditure on the programme in 1952 was $941,542. In May 1952 the ICAO Council approved projects involving expenditures of $1,447,000 for 1953. In December 1952, however, the Technical Assistance Board reduced the amount to be made available to ICAO to $1,054,000, or 4.4 per cent of the amount expected to be pledged at the Technical Assistance Conference scheduled to meet in February 1953.

In the course of 1952, requests for assistance were received from 22 countries,⁷ five of which—Chile, China (Taiwan), Costa Rica, India and Liberia—had not previously been applicants. Action on fourteen requests approved in 1951 continued into 1952, being completed on five of them during the year. Technical assistance agreements, supplementary agreements and annexes to existing agreements were signed with the Governments of twelve States⁸ and letters providing for the grant of fellowships were exchanged with an equal number. At the beginning of the year nineteen experts were in the field; at the end of it 68 were either on missions or had completed them, and five were about to leave for their duty stations.

Up to the end of 1952 ICAO had placed primary emphasis on the development of the ground services required by civil aviation, particularly air traffic control, communications and meteorological services. These services are essential to the safe operation of air transport; but in many areas air transport requires more direct promotion in order to make the fullest possible contribution to economic development, and a considerable proportion of ICAO's assistance has recently been directed to this end. For example, fellowships were granted for commercial pilot training; experts were sent to check out pilots employed by the airlines of certain under-developed countries and to give them guidance in improving their techniques where necessary; local personnel were being instructed in the repair and maintenance of aircraft engines, airframes and airborne equipment; and the problem of ensuring continuing review of pilot qualifications and inspection of aircraft overhauls was receiving increasing attention.

The technical assistance extended by ICAO has taken two main forms—expert advice and training.

Expert advice has been provided on practically every aspect of civil aviation except the manufacture of aircraft—the organization of government departments of civil aviation and the preparation of air laws and regulations; the conduct of an air transport survey; the establishment of statistical and accounting systems; airline organization and operation; the siting, construction and improvement of airports; and the organization and operation of air navigation facilities and services.

Assistance in training has been given in two ways—by providing experts to give basic training, followed by on-the-job training and supervision, in countries where civil aviation is in a comparatively early stage of development and the number of local personnel to be trained is large, and by granting fellowships in cases where personnel require advanced study or training to qualify them for supervisory duties or to enable them to act as instructors after they return to their homes, or where training facilities are not available locally.

Basic and on-the-job training has been mainly in air navigation services, although, as already indicated, it has been given in aero-engine and airframe maintenance and repair and in the perfection of commercial pilot techniques. Because of its cost, ab initio pilot training has not been included in the Organization's activities, but ground instruction was given in the case of Indonesia, which provided its own aircraft and pilot instructors. Supplies and equipment are provided as part of a training project. In 1952 approximately $110,000 was spent on tools, demonstration material, synthetic communications, air traffic control training devices, meteorological instruments, electrical test equipment and a variety of miscellaneous material which could not be supplied by the local governments. Among the most important and useful items in the latter category were training films.

In 1952, a total of 36 fellowships for study abroad were granted and 23 of the recipients began their training. Twenty more fellowship holders continued training begun in 1951. The largest number of fellowships were given in radio communications and in aeronautical meteorology.

⁷ Burma, Chile, China (Taiwan), Costa Rica, Cuba, El Salvador, Finland, Greece, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand, Turkey and Yugoslavia.

b. AIR NAVIGATION QUESTIONS

In the technical field major emphasis was placed in 1952 on the further development of the International Standards and Recommended Practices and the Procedures for Air Navigation Services; and on the implementation of approved regional plans for Air Navigation facilities and services. Of the fourteen International Standards and Recommended Practices (Annexes to the Convention on International Civil Aviation) approved by the Council, one-half were amended during 1952 to keep them up to date with the development of aviation. For example, amendments to Annex 6 (Operation of Aircraft) related to the emergency and survival equipment to be carried on board aeroplanes and to aeroplane navigation lights; the new requirements also have the effect, in most cases, of increasing the minimum fuel and oil reserve for long distance flights. Amendments to Annex 8 (Airworthiness of Aircraft) introduced new provisions on turbine installation, the testing and installation of auxilliary power units and water loads for sea planes. Amendments to Annex 10 (Aeronautical Telecommunications) made important detailed changes in the existing standards and introduced specifications dealing with equipment not previously covered; the Annex now includes specifications relative to all of the principal telecommunications facilities with the exception of long-range aids and certain types of radar equipment.

The new edition of the ICAO Procedures for Air Navigation Services—Rules of the Air and Air Traffic Services—came into force on 1 September 1952.

In 1952, as in 1951, the implementation of approved regional plans received high priority in the Organization's work programme. The second review of implementation in each of the ICAO air navigation regions (reduced in 1952 from ten to eight by consolidating the North and South Pacific regions in a single "Pacific" region and the South Atlantic and South American regions into another single region) was completed by the Air Navigation Commission shortly after the sixth session of the ICAO Assembly, held from 27 May to 12 June 1952. In the first two reviews the Commission directed its efforts toward isolating the most serious deficiencies which it thought warranted the special attention of the Council. The Commission's reports on serious deficiencies were complemented by reports from the Secretary-General on the progress made in eliminating these deficiencies; these reports indicated that the programme was effective and was achieving the purpose for which it was instituted.

The programme of technical meetings was lighter than in 1951, comprising three sessions of the Air Navigation Commission lasting a total of 26 weeks, three Divisional meetings, one full-scale regional air navigation meeting and three special meetings of limited scope. The third European-Mediterranean Regional Air Navigation Meeting, held in Paris from 26 February to 24 March, decided that the uniform altimeter setting procedures already in use in several ICAO regions should be adopted in the region on 1 May 1953. Recognizing the need for aviation to take the initiative in pressing for the removal of other services from radio frequency bands allotted for aeronautical use by the International Telecommunication Union (ITU), the Meeting prepared a provisional plan for the progressive occupation by aeronautical services of a number of channels in the new bands, which it hoped could be accepted by the governments concerned and implemented by mid-1953.

The communications work of the Meeting was supplemented by a special meeting held in Paris in November to co-ordinate implementation of the regional communications plans, particularly in respect of the high frequency mobile services and medium frequency navigational aids. This meeting agreed on detailed plans for VHF (very high frequency) communication facilities, for the transition from currently used HF (high frequency) Aeronautical Mobile frequencies to new frequencies that accord with ITU agreements, and for medium and low frequency radio navigation aids. The plans, in general, called for implementation to be completed at specified dates during 1953. The plan for transition from HF radio frequencies in current use called for precisely co-ordinated action by States and aircraft operators in four separate steps commencing 1 June and finishing 1 November 1953.

To solve the problem of the increasing congestion of the airspace, the plan for a comprehensive network of airways, developed by the Special Meeting on Co-ordination of Air Traffic in Western Europe in October 1951 and by subsequent conferences among Western European governments, was adopted by the Third European-Mediterranean Meeting with minor changes, and recommendations were made for the installation of additional VHF omni-directional ranges and other radio aids necessary for accurate navigation and adequate air traffic control on the airways. To work out the details of the airways plan and co-ordinate their implementation, the Meeting recommended the convening of a special Rules of the Air and Air Traffic Control Meeting for the region not later than 1 July 1952. This meeting was held in July and, in addition to achieving its primary purpose, developed additional procedures for the activation and operation of air traffic services and made some adjustments to the plan of radio aids serving the airways.

Because of the political situation in the Eastern Mediterranean, and the consequent absence of direct communication between some points, the Third European-Mediterranean Meeting was unable to find a completely satisfactory remedy for the defective flight information service currently existing there. With the object of improving the level of safety it recommended, among other measures, that the Council consider the establishment and operation by ICAO of an air traffic co-ordination centre whose primary function would be to assure that all air traffic services units would receive all the traffic information needed for their effective operation. This recommendation was approved by the Council in June, and a secretariat mission visited the countries principally concerned in August. After consultation with the governments of these countries, a detailed plan for establishing the centre was drawn up and submitted to the Air Navigation Commission. The plan was endorsed by the Commission, with minor amendments in certain technical details, and was approved in principle by the Council on 21 November. It was then submitted to potentially interested States, to discover their views on the feasibility of an international financing arrangement to cover the cost of operating such a centre and their own willingness to contribute towards it.

As a result of recommendations made by the Airworthiness and Operations Divisions at their fourth session in 1951, a small standing committee composed of specialists from Contracting States was formed, to meet at intervals of about six months, to continue the development of a new set of aircraft performance specifications for inclusion in Annexes 6 and 8 to the Convention on International Civil Aviation. This committee held two meetings in 1952 and it was anticipated that after one more meeting in 1953 it would be able to present to Contracting States firm recommendations for aircraft performance standards.

c. AIR TRANSPORT QUESTIONS

The most notable events of the year in the air transport field were:

(1) the adoption of the first series of amendments to the International Standards and Recommended Practices on Facilitation (Annex 9); (2) the convening of the second session of the Statistics Division; (3) the adoption of a definition of "scheduled international air service" and of an analysis of the rights conferred by Article 5 of the Convention; and (4) the completion by the Air Transport Committee of the first stage of its examination of the economic aspects of possible changes in the liability limits in the Warsaw Convention.

Draft amendments to Annex 9, prepared by the Air Transport Committee on the basis of recommendations made by the third session of the Facilitation Division, held during November and December 1951, were circulated to Contracting States for comment in April. These amendments, revised in the light of comments from the States, were submitted to the Council and adopted by it on 7 November as Amendment 1 to the Annex, to become effective 1 March 1953 unless disapproved by a majority of Contracting States, and to come into force on 1 July of that year. The amendments deal with such matters as: the standardization of facilitation (FAL) procedures for the conduct of international operations by private and non-scheduled aircraft; the establishment of an absolute maximum in the way of documentary requirements; the maintenance of international FAL procedures when several landings are to be made by an operator within one state; the establishment of procedures for the entry of aircraft equipment, spare parts, stores and ground equipment; the standardization of entrance visas for temporary visitors; and the improvement of arrangements for direct transit traffic.

During the year there was noticeable progress in the implementation of Annex 9, particularly in South America where a number of States issued decrees giving effect to the provisions of the Annex with only minor differences.

During 1952 the ICAO Council adopted the following definition of "scheduled international air service" for the guidance of Member States:

"A scheduled international air service is a series of flights that possesses all the following characteristics:

"(a) it passes through the airspace over the territory of more than one state;

"(b) it is performed by aircraft for the transport of passenger, mail or cargo for remuneration, in such a manner that each flight is open to use by members of the public;

"(c) it is operated, so as to serve traffic between the same two or more points, either: (i) according to a published time-table, or (ii) with flights so regular or frequent that they constitute a recognizably systematic series."

The second session of the Statistics Division was held in Montreal from 16 September to 6 October. Its principal tasks were to review the value of and need for factual data on various aspects of civil aviation and to re-examine the statistical reporting system developed at its first session in 1948. The Division agreed on ICAO's main requirement for statistical data.

Towards the end of 1951 the Council had asked the Air Transport Committee to examine the economic aspects of possible changes in the liability limits in the Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules relating to International Transportation by Air (The Warsaw Convention), currently under revision by the Legal Committee of the Organization. In preparation for this study a questionnaire was sent in March to Member States of the Council, to Switzerland, and to the International Union of Aviation Insurers, International Air Transport Association (IATA) and the Federation Internationale des Transports Aériens Privés. Documentation prepared by the secretariat during the summer was considered by the Air Transport Committee in October and November.

d. JOINT SUPPORT QUESTIONS

In this field the major part of ICAO's work was again concerned during 1952 with the administration of the financing arrangements involving the joint maintenance of ocean weather stations in the North Atlantic and the continuance of certain long-term studies. At the end of the year a number of cases in which international financing may prove necessary was under consideration.

Negotiations were continued during the year with the governments of states operating regular services across the North Atlantic but not yet parties to the joint financing arrangements—Colombia, Cuba, Israel, Italy, Spain and Venezuela—with the object of securing their adherence to the arrangements. Switzerland, although not adhering formally to the arrangements, contributed in 1952 as it had during the two previous years towards the cost of the services covered by them. In May, Iceland, which had previously been a party only to the arrangement covering certain air navigation services in its own territory, adhered to the North Atlantic Ocean Weather Stations Agreement, undertaking to contribute £1,000 towards the cost of the stations (beginning in 1951) and formally adhered to the arrangement for the financing of certain air navigation services in Greenland effective 1 January 1952, agreeing to contribute 50,000 Danish Kroner towards their cost in previous years.

The agreement on North Atlantic Ocean Weather Stations, concluded in 1949, was due to expire on 1 June 1953. On 28 May 1952, all states signatories to this agreement signed a protocol extending the agreement for one year (until 30 June 1954), providing that a conference to consider its revision and renewal should be convened by the ICAO Council in 1953. The Council subsequently decided to hold such a conference in Brighton, England, commencing 8 July 1953.

e. LEGAL QUESTIONS

The first plenipotentiary conference on private air law held since the Second World War took place under ICAO auspices in Rome from 9 September to 6 October 1952 and was attended by delegates and observers representing 32 states and seven international organizations. The conference revised the Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules Relating to Damage Caused by Aircraft to Third Parties on the Surface (Rome 1933) and the Insurance Protocol thereto (Brussels 1938).

The revised Convention retains the original Rome Convention system of absolute liability of the aircraft operator for damage caused to third parties on the surface, lightening the burden thus laid on the operators by placing a limitation on the amount of compensation that can be recovered by the victim. This limitation of the operator's liability is expressed in a scale calculated on the basis of the weight of the aircraft causing the damage. The limits established in the new convention are substantially higher than those in the old.

In lieu of the system of compulsory insurance found in the Rome Convention, the new one provides that any Contracting State may require the operator of an aircraft registered in another Contracting State, in respect of damage on the surface that might be caused by such aircraft, to be protected by means of insurance or some other security. The new Convention also differs from the old in providing, for the first time on a multilateral basis, for the compulsory recognition and execution of foreign judgments in lawsuits dealing with third party surface damage under the Convention. As of 31 December 1952, the new Convention had been signed by eighteen States—Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Egypt, France, Israel, Italy, Liberia, Luxembourg, Mexico, the Netherlands, the Philippines, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland and Thailand. It will remain open for signature until it comes into force, that is, 90 days after five of the signatory States have deposited their instruments of ratification.

Sixty-one agreements and arrangements were registered with ICAO during 1952, bringing the total number registered to 965. Forty-eight of them were bilateral agreements between States on air transport (40), radio-communications and facilities (3) and double taxation (5). Monthly lists of agreements registered were published throughout the year.

f. PUBLICATIONS

ICAO publishes complete documentation of its work.⁹ Included in the more important technical publications issued during the year were two sets of Procedures for Air Navigation Services—Rules of the Air and Air Traffic Services, and Instrument Approach to Land. A further series of Statistical Summaries, dealing with such matters as Traffic Flow, Scheduled Airline Operations, and Origin and Destination of Passengers, was published. Another publication of interest is the lexicon of terms used in connexion with international civil aviation; this is a vocabulary in English, French and Spanish which brings together terms relative to the work of ICAO.

Public Information material on ICAO available in English, French, and Spanish includes: Memorandum on ICAO, a complete summary of the aims, history and work of the organization; and the ICAO Bulletin, which provides a precise account of the activities of the organization with the addition of information of general interest to Contracting States and the aeronautical world.

4. Budget

A budget of $2,834,191 (Canadian) for the calendar year 1952 was approved by the fifth Assembly of ICAO, held in Montreal in June 1951. The sixth Assembly of ICAO approved a budget of $2,817,167 (Canadian) for the calendar year 1953 as follows:

PART I	Meetings	$ 149,502
PART II	Secretariat	2,651,512
PART III	General Services	416,770
PART IV	Equipment	35,600
PART V	Other budgetary provisions ..	6,000
		3,259,384
		Less: Casual revenue
		442,217

In apportioning the expenses of ICAO among Member States, the Assembly takes into consideration their relative capacity to pay, relative interest in international civil aviation and the war damage suffered. It follows the principle that in no case should contributions fall below a minimum or exceed a maximum percentage of the total budget. The sixth Assembly, with the agreement of the States concerned, fixed the scale of contributions for the 1953 budget in units as follows:

Member	Units
Austria, Bolivia, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Jordan, Lebanon, Liberia, Nicaragua, Paraguay	2
El Salvador, Guatemala, Iceland, Luxembourg, Syria	3
Afghanistan, Iraq	4
Burma, Ceylon	5
Ethiopia, Finland, Israel, Thailand	6

Argentina	36
Brazil	39
Italy	40
Netherlands	43
Australia, India	52
Canada	74
France	86

Between sessions of the Assembly, the Council, on the recommendation of its Finance Committee, fixes the amount of contribution of any new Member brought into the organization during that period, and the Council may increase the budget of the organization to the extent of that contribution.

E. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (Bank)¹

1. Introduction

The Articles of Agreement establishing the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (Bank) were drawn up at the United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference, held at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, in July 1944. The Bank came into existence on 27 December 1945 when its Articles of Agreement were signed by 28 governments in Washington, D. C.² At the inaugural meeting of the Bank's Board of Governors, held at Savannah, Georgia, in March 1946, the first Executive Directors were elected. The Bank officially began operations in Washington on 25 June 1946. The Agreement³ establishing the relationship between the Bank and the United Nations became effective on 15 November 1947, when it was approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

The Bank was established for the following purposes:⁴

(1) to assist in the reconstruction and development of its Member countries by facilitating the investment of capital for productive purposes, and thereby promote the long-range growth of international trade and the improvement of standards of living; (2) to promote private foreign investment by guarantees of and participation in loans and investments made by private investors; and (3) to make loans for productive purposes out of its own resources or funds borrowed by it when private capital is not available on reasonable terms.

The Bank's first loans were made in 1947 and helped finance the post-war reconstruction of France, the Netherlands, Denmark and Luxembourg. These loans were made before the European Recovery Programme was in operation and they assisted in the earlier phase of reconstruction in these countries. Since 1948 the Bank's financial and technical resources have been devoted primarily to the economic development of its Member countries. Loans have been made for: the development of electric power; transportation—railroads, roads, ports; communications; irrigation and flood control; grain storage; agriculture and forestry; industry; and in support of broad programmes of development covering an entire country or region.

By the end of 1951, the Bank had made 58 loans totalling $1,231,783,000 for reconstruction and development in 25 countries. These loans were made in Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Iceland, India, Iraq, Italy, Luxembourg, Mexico, the Netherlands, Nicaragua, Paraguay, the Union of South Africa, Thailand, Turkey, Uruguay and Yugoslavia.

A loan is made by the Bank only after a thorough investigation of all factors bearing on it. These factors include: the economic and financial condition of the country concerned, with emphasis on foreign exchange earnings from which service on the loan will be made; the technical feasibility of the project or projects to be financed; the ability of the borrower to complete, operate and manage the project, and to raise the local capital to meet local costs; and the urgency and value of the project in relation to the economic needs of the country where the project is located. Proceeds of Bank loans are disbursed when the borrower presents evidence, such as invoices and bills-of-lading, that the funds will be used in accordance with the loan agreement. The Bank also receives periodic reports from its borrowers and sends members of its staff to visit loan projects from time to time to see whether satisfactory progress is being made.

As a normal part of its lending operations, the Bank assists its Members in the preparation and execution of loan projects. In addition, at the request of Member countries, the Bank furnishes a wide variety of technical aid and assistance unrelated to immediate financial operations. The purpose of this assistance is to help Member countries in assessing their own resources, in working out long-range programmes for raising productivity and standards of living, in setting up priorities for projects within these programmes, and in dealing with development problems in particular fields.

The principal way in which the Bank has assisted Member countries in planning their development is through the general survey mission—a group of experts specially organized to make a first-hand study of a country's resources and formulate recommendations designed to serve as the basis of a long-term development programme. By the end of 1951, the Bank had sent general survey missions to Colombia, Guatemala, Turkey, Cuba, Iraq, Ceylon and Surinam. Similarly, a special representative of the Bank was stationed in Nicaragua for a period of eight months to work with the Government in the planning and initial execution of a broad development programme and to co-ordinate the work of other experts called in to advise on problems in their special fields. The reports of the general survey missions to Colombia, Guatemala, Turkey, and Cuba had been completed by the end of 1951 and presented to the Governments concerned.⁵

In size and composition these missions vary according to the needs of the individual country. Usually, they include advisers on public finance and general economics, industry, power, transportation, and agriculture. Members of the mission have been recruited internationally: some have been drawn from the Bank's staff; FAO has provided agricultural experts; specialists have been nominated by WHO and UNESCO; and other specialists have come from public and private organizations in various parts of the world.

A similar type of assistance is the special survey mission organized to make a first-hand study of a particular sector of a country's economy and make recommendations for its development. The Bank and FAO jointly sponsored special agricultural missions sent to Chile and Uruguay in 1951 to study and make recommendations for the agricultural development of these countries.

In addition to the general and special survey missions, the Bank has rendered assistance by providing staff members and nominating experts to advise on programming development and in working out specific development problems in agriculture, transportation, irrigation and flood control, telecommunications, fishing, textile production, power, fiscal policy, marketing, coal production, and banking. By the end of 1951 countries which had received assistance in some form included, in addition to those mentioned above, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Honduras, Iceland, Iran, Lebanon, Mexico, Pakistan, Panama, Peru and the Philippines.

2. Organization

The administrative organization of the Bank consists of a Board of Governors, Executive Directors, a President and a staff.

The Articles of Agreement of the Bank stipulate that all powers of the Bank be vested in the Board of Governors, consisting of one governor and one alternate appointed by each Member country. A new Member may be admitted to the Bank by approval of two thirds of the Board of Governors, provided that it accepts the conditions laid down by the Board and that it first becomes a Member of the International Monetary Fund.

The Board of Governors meets annually to review the Bank's operations and to adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary or appropriate to the conduct of the Bank's business.

The Board of Governors has delegated most of its powers to the Executive Directors who are responsible for the conduct of the general operations of the Bank. There are sixteen Executive Directors, each of whom has an alternate. Normally the Executive Directors meet once a month at the Bank's headquarters in Washington. Five of the Executive Directors are appointed by the five Members having the largest number of shares of stock (United States, United Kingdom, China, France and India), and eleven are elected by the Governors of the remaining Members. Each appointed Executive Director has the same total number of votes as the countries that appointed him, and each elected Executive Director has the same total number of votes as the countries that elected him. The votes of each Executive Director must be cast as a unit. Decisions of the Bank are made by a majority vote, except as otherwise provided by the Articles of Agreement.

The President of the Bank is selected by the Executive Directors and is the chief executive officer of the Bank. He is ex officio Chairman of the Executive Directors. Subject to their general direction on questions of policy, he is responsible for the conduct of the business of the Bank and for the organization of its staff. A loan is made only after the amount, terms and conditions of the loan have been recommended by the President to the Executive Directors and his recommendations have been approved by them.

The Bank's staff is organized into the following departments and offices: Department of Operations—Asia and Middle East; Europe, Africa and Australasia; the Western Hemisphere; Departments of Marketing, Technical Operations, Administration, and Treasurer; Offices of the General Counsel, the Secretary, Public Relations, Economic Staff, and Technical Assistance and Liaison Staff.

⁵ The reports of these missions are published by the Johns Hopkins Press of Baltimore, Maryland.

3. Activities during 1952

The Board of Governors of the Bank held its seventh annual meeting in Mexico City from 3 to 12 September 1952. The fourth regular election of Executive Directors was held at this meeting. Membership increased during the year to 54 with the admission of Burma on 3 January, Japan on 13 August, the Federal Republic of Germany on 14 August and the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan on 29 August.

a. LENDING OPERATIONS

During 1952 the Bank made sixteen loans totalling $292,483,464 in twelve countries, bringing to $1,524,266,464 the total lent by the Bank at the end of the year. A brief description of the loans made in 1952 is given below.

Australia received a $50 million loan on 8 July to finance the import of capital goods and equipment for development programmes undertaken by the Government in agriculture and land settlement, coal mining, iron and steel production, electric power, railways, road transport, the production of non-ferrous metals and industrial minerals, and manufacturing industries.

Two loans totalling $37,500,000 were made in Brazil on 27 June. A $25 million loan was made to the Comissão Estadual de Energia Electrica, a State-owned agency, to finance imported equipment for an electric power development programme in the State of Rio Grande de Sul. The loan was guaranteed by the Brazilian Government. A $12.5 million loan was made to the Government to purchase rolling stock and equipment for the Central do Brasil Railroad, Brazil's largest railway.

The Bank's first loan for the construction of a railroad was made to Colombia on 26 August. The $25 million loan will provide the foreign exchange costs of a railroad to be constructed in the Magdalena River Valley, and to build and equip railroad repair shops in Bogota. This rail line will connect the country's eastern and western rail networks, providing rail transport between the Bogota area and the Pacific coast and a reliable river-rail route between central Colombia and the Caribbean ports.

Two loans were made to the Bank of Finland. On 30 April a $20 million loan was made to finance the import of equipment to expand and modernize the wood-products industry; to increase the supply of electric power; and to improve farm lands and build forest roads. The Bank of Finland will re-lend the proceeds of the loan to both private and government-owned corporations. A loan of 18,000,000 Swedish kronor (approximately $3.5 million) was made to the Bank of Finland on 13 November to aid further to the modernization and expansion of Finland's wood-products industry. The Swedish kronor for this loan were made available to the Bank by the Swedish Government from the paid-in portion of Sweden's subscription to the Bank's capital. Both loans were guaranteed by the Government of Finland.

A loan in European currencies, equivalent to $854,000, was made to Iceland on 26 August to help finance the construction of a nitrogen fertilizer plant. The construction of the plant will enable Iceland to reduce substantially its foreign exchange expenditures for nitrogen fertilizer and meet its increasing domestic needs for this fertilizer. This was the third non-dollar loan made to Iceland by the Bank.

The Bank's first direct loan to a manufacturer was made to the Indian Iron and Steel Company, Ltd., on 19 December. The $31.5 million loan, guaranteed by the Indian Government, was made to help finance the Company's five-year plan to double its present annual output of iron and steel.

The Federal Electricity Commission and Nacional Financiera in Mexico received a $29.7 million loan on 11 January to finance import of equipment and materials needed to carry out seven major projects in its 1952-55 construction programme.

On 20 March a loan of $7 million, guaranteed by the Netherlands Government, was made to K.L.M. (Royal Dutch Airlines) to help finance a programme to replace part of its air fleet. The Chase National Bank of the City of New York participated in the loan to the extent of half the total amount.

Two loans were made to Pakistan. On 27 March a loan, equivalent to $27.2 million, was made for the rehabilitation, improvement and modernization of the railways in East and West Pakistan. For this loan the French Government agreed to make available the equivalent of $12 million in French francs from the paid-in portion of its subscription to the Bank's capital. The balance of the loan will be disbursed in dollars. The Bank's second loan to Pakistan, of $3,250,000, was made on 13 June to finance the import of tractors and other equipment to be used in reclaiming 660,000 acres of waste land of the Thal desert in West Pakistan.

Two loans were made to Peru. A loan of $2.5 million was made on 23 January to provide modern facilities for handling general cargo and for the unloading and storage of bulk grain at the port of Callao. These facilities, it is anticipated, will enable more efficient handling of 80 per cent of the cargo moving through the port, speed up the turn-around time of ships, eliminate losses of grain from spillage and effect a savings in Peru's foreign exchange. A second loan of $1.3 million was made on 8 July for the import of equipment to improve methods of agricultural production and to reclaim old and open new lands to cultivation. With the equipment financed under the second loan it is estimated that an additional 50,000 acres of land can be tilled and seeded each year in Peru.

A $28 million loan was made to Southern Rhodesia on 27 February to aid in carrying out the Government's four-year programme for economic development by helping finance imported equipment and materials to expand power production and distribution. The loan was guaranteed by the United Kingdom.

A $25.2 million loan was made to Turkey on 18 June to assist in the development of the Adana Plain, a productive agricultural and industrial area in south-central Turkey. The loan will finance the foreign exchange costs of a dam on the Seyhan River—to be used for flood control, irrigation and hydro-electric power—and of a power plant and related distribution facilities. These installations are a part of a comprehensive plan being carried out by the Turkish Government for the full control and utilization of the waters of the Seyhan River.

b. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

During 1952 the reports of five general survey missions—to Jamaica, Iraq, Surinam, Ceylon and Nicaragua—were completed and presented to the Governments concerned. In September 1952 the Bank was requested and agreed to send a general survey mission to British Guiana; at the end of the year the mission was preparing to make its field studies.

In a number of cases the Bank has been requested and has provided further assistance in adapting and carrying out the recommendations of the survey missions. During 1952 the Bank agreed to reassign a special representative and an assistant to Nicaragua to assist the Government in implementing the five-year development programme recommended by the earlier Bank mission. It sent representatives to Iraq and Cuba for discussions with government officials concerning steps being taken in carrying out recommendations of the general survey missions. The Bank also assigned two staff members and nominated specialists to work in Colombia with the Planning Board established by the Government to co-ordinate all development activities.

The report of a special agricultural mission, sent to Chile in 1951 under the joint sponsorship of the Bank and FAO, was completed and presented to the Chilean Government in 1952.

During the year the Bank continued to render a variety of technical assistance in other forms. In the summer of 1952, a Joint Bank-United Nations Technical Assistance Administration (TAA) mission visited Panama to discuss with the Government first steps to be taken toward the future economic development of the country as suggested in the report of an earlier Bank mission. In line with the programme of assistance then worked out, the TAA has undertaken to provide experts in fiscal and public administration and the Bank to provide advice on problems of fiscal policy and agricultural credit. In September 1952 the Bank arranged for an expert from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to advise on immediate fiscal problems and to study the fiscal and credit systems of the Social Security Fund.

In May 1952 a Bank mission visited the Dominican Republic to explore the Government's request for technical assistance in connexion with the development of hydro-electric power. Following this mission, the Bank furnished a list of engineering consultants to organize the collection of basic hydrologic and geologic data for a power survey and to make a market study. In December the Dominican Government engaged a consultant engineer nominated by the Bank to advise on the relations between the Government and private power industry.

In October 1952, at the request of the Icelandic Government, the Bank provided a staff member to review Iceland's agricultural development in relation to markets for the principal agricultural exports.

The Bank's Director of Marketing visited the Philippines in December, at the request of the Government, to advise on the development of a government bond market.

Two Bank officials visited Ceylon in November 1952 to explore, on behalf of the Bank and the TAA, the feasibility of establishing and sponsoring a technical research institute. The purpose of the institute, which was recommended by the Bank's general survey mission, would be to study local productive activities with a view to solving technical problems, improving production techniques, finding by-products, and instituting better methods of quality control. The Ceylonese Government confirmed its interest in having such an institute, and a formal request for assistance from the Bank and TAA in its organization was expected.

A series of conferences were arranged by the Bank in May and June for engineers from India and Pakistan. Together with Bank engineers, they studied the possible technical means of increasing the supply of water available from the Indus system of rivers for purposes of economic development. These conferences were continued in December in Karachi, Pakistan. Information obtained through field studies made between June and December was exchanged. It was decided that the engineers should meet again in September 1953 in Washington, D.C., to prepare a comprehensive plan for the development of the Indus Basin.

c. RESOURCES OF THE BANK AND MARKETING OPERATIONS

The authorized capital of the Bank is $10,000 million. This capital stock is divided into shares of $100,000 each, purchasable only by Members and transferable only to the Bank. As of 31 December 1952, the total subscribed capital amounted to the equivalent of $9,036,500,000. Of this amount 20 per cent is paid-in capital which is divided as follows: 2 per cent in gold or United States dollars which is immediately available for lending; and 18 per cent in the currencies of the various Member countries which can be used for lending only with the consent of the particular country. The remaining 80 per cent of subscribed capital is in the nature of a guarantee and may be called only when needed to meet the Bank's own obligations for funds borrowed or on loans guaranteed by it.

To augment its supply of loanable funds, the Bank depends on the sale of its own bonds in the money markets of the world and on the sale to private investors of securities held in its loan portfolio. During the year the Bank sold four issues of its bonds: two issues in the United States in a total amount of $110 million; an issue in Canada amounting to Canadian $15 million; and an issue in Switzerland in the amount of Sw. Fr. 50 million (the equivalent of approximately $11.6 million). On 31 December 1952 the Bank's direct obligations outstanding as a result of sale of its own bonds in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom and Switzerland totalled the equivalent of $567.5 million.

Sales of the obligations of the Bank's borrowers continued to increase. During the year the Bank sold the equivalent of $32,227,528 principal amount of borrowers' obligations, of which $17,686,401 carried the Bank's unconditional guarantee and $14,541,127 were sold without recourse to the Bank. Obligations of seventeen borrowers were sold either with or without the Bank's guarantee. Cumulative sales of the securities of borrowers from the Bank's portfolio to 31 December 1952, expressed in United States dollars, amounted to $65,669,908.

During the year there was an encouraging broadening of the market for the Bank's obligations, with more general acceptance of the bonds by large institutional investors in the United States and institutional and individual investors in other countries.

F. The International Monetary Fund (Fund)¹

1. Introduction

The Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund were drawn up at the United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference held at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, from 1 to 22 July 1944. The Fund came into existence on 27 December 1945 when 29 governments, representing 80 per cent of the quotas accepted at Bretton Woods, signed the Articles of Agreement in Washington, D. C.²

The purposes and functions of the Fund, as stated in the Articles of Agreement are, in brief: to promote international monetary co-operation and the expansion of international trade; to promote exchange stability, maintain orderly exchange arrangements among Members, and avoid competitive exchange depreciation; to assist in the establishment of a multilateral system of payments in respect of current transactions between Members and in the elimination of foreign exchange restrictions which hamper world trade.³

The inaugural meeting of the Fund's Board of Governors opened at Savannah, Georgia, on 8 March 1946 to adopt by-laws, select a headquarters site and elect a Board of Executive Directors.

The Fund's Executive Board held its first meeting on 6 May 1946. The Agreement establishing the relationship between the Fund and the United Nations became effective on 15 November 1947,⁴ with its approval by the United Nations General Assembly.

On 18 December 1946 the Fund announced its agreement to the establishment of par values in gold and U. S. dollars for the currencies of 32 Member countries. At the same time, the Fund indicated that these parities might require changes, but that this could be done in an orderly way through Fund procedures. It cautioned that premature revisions in response to abnormal conditions might stimulate further inflation.

In a first annual report, released in September 1947, the Fund saw inflation already undermining some par values. As post-war payments deficits persisted, the Fund in 1948 and 1949 advocated strong governmental efforts to increase exports to dollar markets, urging, in September 1949, that deficit countries should face the risks and difficulties of rate changes.

Up to this time only three countries—France, Colombia and Mexico—had proposed changes in their exchange parities. There began on 18 September 1949 a wave of devaluations that involved within a few months the currencies of 22 Fund Members and eight other countries. In a co-operative procedure which had not existed prior to the Fund's establishment, the Members' proposals were submitted for approval to the Fund's Executive Board, which discussed them against the background of earlier studies and in the light of their relationship to one another. Some further revisions have taken place in consultation with the Fund as Members adjusted their exchange systems to changing conditions.

In numerous instances the Fund has sent missions to confer with individual governments or to give them technical assistance.

In administering the Articles of Agreement, the Executive Board has been called upon by the Members to make decisions on questions of discriminatory restrictions, multiple exchange rates and other problems important to harmonious international monetary relations.

Foreign exchange transactions by the Fund are governed by the relevant provisions of the Articles of Agreement, as applied by the Executive Board.

It was agreed in April 1948 that Members receiving aid from the Economic Cooperation Administration should request a purchase of U. S. dollars only in exceptional or unforeseen circumstances. The agreement lapsed with the end of the E.C.A. programme in January 1952. Sales of currencies from the Fund's holdings to Member countries totalled the equivalent of $814,033,000 on 31 December 1951. By that date also, Members had paid $79,650,000 in gold and U. S. dollars to the Fund in repurchasing amounts of their own currencies. Approximately $768,580,000 of the transactions represented sales by the Fund of U. S. dollars, $11,408,000 were sales of Belgian francs and $34,045,000 were sales of British pounds sterling.

2. Organization

The Fund consists of a Board of Governors, Executive Directors and a Managing Director and staff.

All powers of the Fund are vested in the Board of Governors, consisting of one Governor and one alternate appointed by each Member. The Board of Governors has delegated most of its powers to the Executive Directors, retaining, as required by article XII, section 2, of the Articles of Agreement, certain specific powers.⁵

Each Member of the Fund has 250 votes plus one additional vote for each $100,000 of its quota.⁶ Each Governor casts as a unit all votes allotted to that Member State which he represents; a quorum of the Board of Governors consists of a majority of the Governors exercising at least two thirds of the total voting power.

Decisions of the Fund are made by a simple majority of the votes cast, except as otherwise provided by the Articles of Agreement. For example, to change the quota of a Member requires, in addition to the consent of that Member, approval by four fifths of the voting power of the Board of Governors; four fifths of the voting power is also required to increase the number of Executive Directors. Amendments to the Articles of Agreement may be adopted by three fifths of the Members having four fifths of the total voting power and, in a few instances, require acceptance by all Members. In voting on certain matters, such as the question of waiving conditions governing the use of the Fund's resources or declaring a Member ineligible to use the Fund's resources, the voting power of each Member is adjusted by the addition of one vote for each $400,000 of sales of its currency and by the subtraction of one vote for each $400,000 of its purchases of other currency.

The Executive Directors, meeting in continuous session, are responsible for the conduct of the general operations of the Fund and exercise powers delegated to them by the Board of Governors.

There are sixteen Executive Directors, five of whom are appointed by the five Members having the largest quotas. The remaining Executive Directors are elected by the Governors representing the other Members of the Fund, as follows: nine by Members other than the Latin American Republics, and two by the Latin American Republics. Each appointed Executive Director casts as a unit all the votes allotted to the Member which appointed him, and each elected Director casts as a unit the total number of votes allotted to those countries which elected him. A quorum of the Executive Directors consists of a majority of Directors representing at least one half of the total voting power.

The Managing Director of the Fund, who may not be a Governor or an Executive Director, is elected by the Executive Directors, and under their direction is responsible for the conduct of the ordinary business of the Fund, and for the organization, appointment and dismissal of its officers and staff. He also serves as Chairman of the Executive Directors, without the right to vote except in the case of a tie.

3. Resources of the Fund

To carry out its operations, the Fund uses the resources subscribed by its Member Governments. The quotas of those Members which attended the Bretton Woods Conference were fixed by the Articles of Agreement, but may be revised by the Fund. The quotas of other Members are fixed by the Board of Governors at the time of approval of their membership applications. Each of the original Members must pay in gold 25 per cent of its quota or 10 per cent of its net official gold and dollar holdings, whichever is the smaller; the gold contribution of new Members is fixed by the Board of Governors. The balance is paid in the Member's own currency, normally after the establishment of the par value for that currency. Non-negotiable, non-interest-bearing demand notes may be accepted from any Member whose currency is not needed for the Fund's operations in place of that Member's currency.

Total quotas in the Fund, as of 31 December 1952, amounted to $8,736.5 million. This included $1,691,900,000 in gold and $5,682,800,000 in various national currencies, including $1,288,100,000 in U. S. dollars and $225 million in Canadian dollars. Most of the balance in currencies was not yet due from Members whose par values had still to be agreed upon.

4. Activities during 1952

The membership of the Fund increased during the year from 50 to 54 with the admission of Burma, Japan, the Federal Republic of Germany and Jordan.

During 1952 the Fund carried forward its work in the field of international consultation and co-operation on the monetary and exchange problems of its Member countries. It conferred on questions of exchange rates, multiple currency practices, and exchange restrictions and discrimination as well as on the use of the Fund's resources. The staff collected and analysed statistical information on international trade and payments and monetary reserves; and training programmes on the work of the Fund, balance of payments techniques and general monetary and economic problems were conducted for staff members of central banks and ministries of finance.

The Fund's Articles of Agreement provided that five years after the date (1 March 1947) when the Fund began operations, and in each year thereafter, any Member still retaining any restrictions inconsistent with the Agreement should consult the Fund as to their further retention. The first series of consultations on the Members' restrictive practices started in March 1952, and continued to be a major activity of the Fund throughout the year.

There were no changes in Members' currency par values during 1952. An initial par value was established, however, for the Ceylonese rupee on 17 January. The Fund announced on 1 August that it had no objection to a number of changes proposed by the Government of Paraguay in its multiple rate system.

Fund transactions during 1952 represented sales of U. S. dollars as follows: Australia, $30 million; Brazil, $37,500,000; Finland, $4,500,000; Paraguay, $875,000; and Turkey, $10 million. These transactions brought total sales to 22 Members to the equivalent of approximately $897 million. The Fund received payments of gold or U. S. dollars in the following repurchases by Members of amounts of their own currencies held by the Fund: Brazil, $65,500,000; Chile, $3,679,000; Netherlands, $27,352,000; Peru, $3,097,000; Sweden, $7,999,000; Syria, $418,000; and Turkey, $4,998,000. By the end of the year, repurchases, by sixteen Members, amounted to $192,693,000.

The Fund's Board of Governors held its Seventh Annual Meeting in Mexico City from 3 to 12 September. The Board of Governors held the fourth regular election of Executive Directors, increasing the number elected by Members other than the Latin American Republics from seven to nine, thereby bringing the total number of Executive Directors from fourteen to a maximum of sixteen.

In its annual report to the Governors, the Fund's Executive Board referred to a decision on use of the Fund's resources which had been adopted on 13 February 1952. It provided that, as a general rule, "any increase in the Fund's holdings of a Member's currency originating from transactions by the Member should be reduced within a period not exceeding three to five years".

A further development relating to the use of the Fund's resources was embodied in a decision of 19 June which was made in response to a request from Belgium. This involved the Fund's first request for a standby arrangement, rather than a drawing. It was agreed that Belgium would have the right, for a period of six months, to purchase with Belgian francs on a revolving basis up to the equivalent of U. S. $50 million in currencies held by the Fund. The agreement was made renewable for subsequent six-monthly periods, unless either Belgium or the Fund determined that conditions had been basically altered so that the arrangement should be terminated.

The decision with respect to Belgium, was generalized on 1 October. The Fund told its Members that it was prepared to consider requests for standby arrangements limited to periods of six months, which might be renewed by decision of the Executive Board. In considering such requests, the Fund decided that it would apply the same policies applied to requests for immediate drawings.

In addition to its annual reports, of which there have been seven (1946-52), the Fund has published three annual reports on exchange restrictions (1950-51-52). Other publications include International Financial Statistics, a monthly statistical bulletin, International Financial News Survey (distributed weekly), Staff Papers (published two or three times a year) and a Balance of Payments Yearbook.

¹¹ The votes of Czechoslovakia may not be cast by any Executive Director as that State did not participate in the regular election of Executive Directors.

G. The World Health Organization (WHO)¹

1. Introduction

The Constitution providing for the establishment of a World Health Organization (WHO)² was adopted on 22 July 1946 by the International Health Conference, called for the purpose by the Economic and Social Council. There were 64 States, the Allied Control Authorities for Germany, Japan and Korea, respectively, and ten international organizations represented at the Conference, which met in New York from 19 June to 22 July 1946.

An Interim Commission, established by the Conference, held its first meeting on 19 July 1946 and for almost two years carried out preparatory work for the permanent World Health Organization, at the same time continuing the functions of former intergovernmental health agencies and rendering assistance to individual countries (especially the war-ravaged countries of Europe and the Far East) in the solution of their most urgent health problems.

The permanent World Health Organization came officially into being on 7 April 1948 (now observed annually in most Member countries as World Health Day), when 26 States Members of the United Nations had accepted its Constitution. The Interim Commission continued to function, however, until 31 August 1948, when it was dissolved in accordance with a resolution of the first World Health Assembly. WHO itself assumed the functions and assets of the Interim Commission and began operating on 1 September.

Among the decisions of the first World Health Assembly, held in Geneva from 24 June to 24 July 1948, was the approval, on 10 July, of the Agreement establishing WHO's relationship with the United Nations. This action brought the Agreement into force, since it had previously been approved by the United Nations General Assembly.³

The objective of WHO, as stated in article 1 of its Constitution, is:

"the attainment by all peoples of the highest possible level of health". Health is defined in the preamble to the Constitution as a "state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity". The functions or the organization necessary to attain this objective are enumerated in article 2 of the Constitution and include: that WHO should act as the directing and co-ordinating authority on international health work; that, on request, it should assist governments in strengthening health services and furnish them with appropriate technical assistance and also with aid in emergencies; that it should maintain the necessary administrative and technical services; and that it should promote the improvement of health in its various aspects, research in the field of health, and the development of health education and information.⁴

In the activities of the Interim Commission and, at first, of WHO itself, particular emphasis was placed on a group of priority subjects which included malaria, tuberculosis, venereal infections, maternal and child health, nutrition and environmental sanitation. Work begun by earlier international health agencies (for example, the League of Nations Health Organization, the Office international d'Hygiène publique, and the health services of UNRRA) was continued and, in many instances, considerably expanded.

With the growth of WHO and the application of its fundamental policy of decentralization to meet the differing health needs of different areas throughout the world, there has been a gradual shift in emphasis away from the so-called "priorities" in regard to the direct assistance which WHO renders to Member countries. Its aim has become that of providing for each country that type or those types of assistance which will help that country to take the next appropriate steps in the orderly development of its own medical and health services within the context of prevailing circumstances—cultural, social and economic.

2. Organization

The main organs of WHO, as provided in its Constitution, are the World Health Assembly, the Executive Board and the Secretariat.

The World Health Assembly, in which all Members may be represented, meets annually. It determines the broad policies of the Organization, fixes the annual budget, reviews the work already carried out and the details of programmes proposed for the future. It instructs the Executive Board in regard to matters upon which action, study, investigation or report may be considered desirable.

Among its other functions, the Assembly is empowered to adopt regulations, binding on Members except under certain clearly defined circumstances, with regard to international quarantine and sanitary measures, uniform standards and nomenclatures, and various other questions of international importance in relation to health.

Countries may be admitted into WHO, if they are Members of the United Nations, by formally accepting the Constitution. For other States to become Members, the approval of their membership applications by a simple majority vote of the Health Assembly is required. The Constitution also provides that territories or groups of territories not responsible for the conduct of their international relations may be admitted as Associate Members by the Health Assembly upon application by the appropriate authority.

The Executive Board consists of eighteen technically qualified persons designated by eighteen Member States elected by the Health Assembly. In electing them, the Assembly takes into account an equitable geographical distribution. States entitled to designate members of the Board are elected for a three-year period, and meetings of the Board take place at least twice a year. Its chief function is to implement decisions and policies of the Assembly, but it may also take emergency measures within the functions and financial resources of WHO in order to deal with urgent situations requiring immediate international action.

The Secretariat is headed by the Director-General, who is appointed by the Health Assembly on the nomination of the Executive Board. The Director-General, in turn, appoints the technical and administrative staff required and supervises the day-to-day work of the Organization in all its many phases.

Panels composed of experts in a wide range of medical and public-health subjects have been established in order to ensure that WHO shall have available, at all times, the latest scientific knowledge for use in planning and carrying out its work. The experts making up these panels may be asked for technical advice by correspondence. From the panels, appropriate specialists are drawn for each session of various expert committees, for which the membership varies according to the agenda of the session. Expert committees on the following subjects were convened during 1952: Bilharziasis, Biological Standardization, Drugs Liable to Produce Addiction, Hepatitis, Influenza, International Pharmacopoeia and Pharmaceutical Preparations (also Subcommittee on Non-proprietary Names), Leprosy, Mental Health, Plague, Trachoma, Professional and Technical Education of Medical and Auxiliary Personnel, Venereal Infections and Treponematoses, Joint FAO/WHO Expert Committees on Brucellosis and Nutrition, and a Joint ILO/WHO Expert Committee on Occupational Health.

The primary functions of WHO headquarters are to co-ordinate, to channel expert advice and opinion to the points where they are needed, and to carry out services (such as epidemiological intelligence or biological standardization) which can only, or most effectively, be performed on a world-wide basis and for the benefit of all countries, both Members and non-members of the Organization.

Regional Organizations have been established to serve the special needs of six areas throughout the world as delineated by the World Health Assembly. Each Regional Organization consists of a Regional Committee, which meets annually and is composed of representatives of all the members in the region, and a Regional Office. Headed by the Regional Director, the Regional Office is responsible for all the projects of assistance to governments in the region. Requests are passed by the Regional Offices to WHO headquarters where they are incorporated into the world-wide programme established in accordance with long-range plans, formulated and revised at intervals by the World Health Assembly.

3. Activities during 1952

During 1952 the membership of the World Health Organization was increased to 82 (79 full Members and three Associate Members) by the addition of the United Kingdom of Libya as a full Member, and Tunisia and the French Protectorate of Morocco as Associate Members.

The fifth World Health Assembly was held in Geneva from 5 to 22 May. Executive Board sessions took place during January and June. Among the decisions of the World Health Assembly was the adoption of a resolution as a result of which WHO is to undertake special measures to control leprosy.

Under the Expanded Programme of technical assistance for economic development, WHO had a balance of $1,645,527 remaining from 1951. The automatic allocations made during 1952 amounted to $4,259,313. In addition, a sum amounting to $1,512,662 from the Retained Contributions Account, was earmarked for WHO for specific projects approved by the Technical Assistance Board. As a result, WHO had the equivalent of $5,771,975 available during 1952, in cash or in kind, for activities under the Expanded Programme. Under this Programme, 167 projects were in operation at the end of 1952 as compared with 71 in 1951, while 22 others were completed during the year; 92 agreements were signed with governments for future projects and 220 experts were recruited for field operations. Progress was also made in education and training and 371 fellowships were awarded. A brief outline of the work of WHO during 1952, carried out in accordance with the decisions of the World Health Assembly, is given below.

During the year, the importance of WHO's role as Co-ordinator in international health work greatly increased. Joint projects with the United States Bilateral Organizations for Technical Assistance, such as the Technical Co-operation Administration (TCA), were started in 1952, particularly in the Southeast Asia and Western Pacific Regions. Some of the governments operating the Colombo Plan expressed a desire that WHO should participate in co-ordinating the aid being given under this Plan. The co-ordination of WHO's work with that of other agencies was also furthered by the establishment of an International Co-ordination Committee for Technical Assistance in three countries of the Western Pacific Region and in four out of the six countries in the South East Asia Region. WHO also acted to exercise its responsibility as a co-ordinating authority by appointing area representatives in most of the countries of the Southeast Asia Region to act as a link with the national administrations, other United Nations agencies and bilateral organizations.

An important event during the year was the coming into effect of the International Sanitary Regulations (replacing existing International Sanitary Conventions) which were prepared and are administered by WHO. Of the 89 countries informed of these Regulations, only 25 sent any reservations. On 1 October the Regulations went into effect for 58 Member States (53 without reservations, and five with reservations accepted by the fifth World Health Assembly); six Members are not bound by the Regulations, and the position of fifteen others (including Libya, which may submit reservations up to March 1953) was not defined.

All six WHO Regional Offices were in operation during the year, while the Regional Office for Africa moved from Geneva to Brazzaville (French Equatorial Africa) in October. Because the African continent presents a special problem because of its size, the lack of communications and outlets to the sea, the large number of languages (of which very few are written) and the diversity of its cultures, the African Regional Office has been established on a pattern slightly different from that of other regional offices. Particular attention is given not only to medicine, but also to cultural anthropology and further, in view of the imperative need for good water supplies, food and shelter, to environmental sanitation.

During the year WHO continued to direct and assist the programmes for medical relief and health protection of the Palestine Refugees in Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and the Gaza area through the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

a. CONTROL OF COMMUNICABLE DISEASES

(1) Malaria

WHO assisted governments with 20 anti-malaria projects in Afghanistan, Burma, Cambodia, the Dominican Republic, China (Taiwan), the French Cameroons, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Paraguay, the Philippines, Sarawak, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Vietnam and the Windward Islands, as part of the current world campaign of malaria control, which showed a marked increase in scope in 1952. In many countries, plans were made for large-scale or even nation-wide programmes for malaria control. The plan for India alone aims at giving protection in the course of a few years to an aggregate population of some 200 million. Epidemiological investigations, demonstrations of new techniques and the training of local personnel (either on the spot, or, through fellowships, abroad), which have formed a part of WHO-assisted projects, have facilitated the execution of long-range plans for malaria control and have enabled some countries to make effective use of substantial quantities of supplies granted to them by other international agencies for this purpose. WHO malariologists also assisted as consultants in preparing operations and planning long-term policies.

In many of the countries assisted by WHO, health staff were being trained in malaria control and in some countries, for example in Afghanistan and Iran, national training centres were being set up or expanded with personnel and supplies from WHO.

A new approach was adopted for the malaria pilot project to be undertaken in Liberia at the beginning of 1953. This project is to be combined with one for yaws control; the personnel of the two projects will work together, from the same headquarters and using the same technique of house-to-house visiting, at least twice a year. A similar approach was planned for a combined project for the control of bilharziasis and malaria in Syria.

In addition to providing training in field projects, awarding fellowships and travel grants in malariology and giving assistance to malaria institutes and training centres, WHO helped to organize two international malaria courses in 1952, one given in French in Portugal (at Aguas de Moura and Lisbon), the other in English in Lagos, Nigeria. During 1952 WHO staff members lectured on malaria and on WHO's work in malaria control in various institutions throughout the world. As in the previous year, regional malaria advisers closely co-operated in the WHO-assisted projects in three of the Regions (Southeast Asia, the Eastern Mediterranean and the Western Pacific).

Close liaison was maintained with UNICEF, which allocated large sums of money for malaria control in the Southeast Asia Region, in the Americas and, more recently, in the Eastern Mediterranean Region and in Africa. A joint WHO/UNICEF team, accompanied by a representative of the French Government, studied malaria in the Cameroons and Togoland under French administration and French West Africa, and assisted in drafting plans of operations for the international aid requested for its control.

(2) Tuberculosis

WHO's field work on tuberculosis has consisted largely in helping to establish demonstration and training centres. At the beginning of 1952 such centres were operating in Burma, Ceylon, Ecuador, El Salvador, India (Delhi and Trivandrum), Jamaica, Pakistan, Thailand and Turkey. During the year the projects in El Salvador and Turkey were terminated and new projects were started in Egypt, India (Patna), Indonesia and Syria.

Experience of these projects in 1952 confirmed the belief that many of the control measures and techniques used in the more developed countries cannot be successfully transplanted to other parts of the world, and that WHO's objective in the control of tuberculosis must be to assist each country to find the methods most suited to its own particular conditions, to demonstrate these methods and to train its national personnel accordingly.

Mass vaccination programmes with BCG were carried out or planned in Aden, Burma, Cambodia, China (Taiwan), Costa Rica, Egypt, El Salvador, Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand, Trinidad and Vietnam, whenever possible in close connexion with the tuberculosis-control projects. In these programmes governments were assisted by WHO and UNICEF jointly, the latter providing equipment and supplies and reimbursing WHO for the cost of certain personnel.

A conference of WHO tuberculosis experts was held at the Eastern Mediterranean Regional Office from 20 to 30 November. It was attended by representatives from all the six Regions except Africa, by team leaders and staff from field projects in Burma, Egypt, India, Iraq, Pakistan, Sarawak, Syria and Thailand, and by representatives from headquarters and from the Tuberculosis Research Office in Copenhagen.

In 1952 WHO granted both regional and inter-regional fellowships in tuberculosis, and many were awarded for work in connexion with WHO-assisted projects.

Following the signing, on 5 December 1951, of an agreement between the Danish Government and WHO for the establishment of a tuberculosis immunization research centre in Copenhagen, steps were taken to set up a supervisory committee, composed of two representatives from each of the co-operating parties, and the Director of the Centre as secretary, and to construct a laboratory unit of five rooms within the Statens Serum-institut, at a cost of approximately $40,000. WHO bought $20,000 worth of equipment for this laboratory, which started work in October 1952.

When the International Tuberculosis Campaign ended in June 1951, a total of 38 million children and adolescents had been tuberculin-tested and 18 million non-reactors vaccinated with BCG. This offered a unique opportunity for the worldwide collection of facts on tuberculin sensitivity.

At the outset of the campaign the responsible officials realized that the collection of statistical material and its preparation for publication could best be directed from a central office. This was one of the first responsibilities assumed by the Tuberculosis Research Office when it came into being early in 1949. By the end of 1952 nine reports on individual countries had been published—seven of them during the year—and two more were nearly ready for press.

(3) Venereal Diseases and Treponematoses

During 1952 progress continued in many areas in the control of venereal infections, particularly syphilis and gonorrhoea, and the reservoirs of non-venereal treponematoses, notably non-venereal endemic syphilis and yaws, were appreciably reduced. In the more developed areas, where antibiotic therapy is widely used, the incidence of syphilis and gonorrhoea appeared to be declining even more rapidly, while the efforts of health administrations to reduce the incidence of the non-venereal treponematoses were producing demonstrable results.

Projects for the control of non-venereal treponematoses were carried on during the year with the support of UNICEF. Projects for the control of yaws were continued in Haiti, Indonesia, the Philippines and Thailand, and new projects of the same type were started in Laos and South India. Projects for the control of bejel in Iraq and of non-venereal endemic syphilis in Yugoslavia reached the stage at which international assistance became less necessary. In the six larger mass campaigns against non-venereal treponematoses, approximately six million persons had been examined and two million treated with penicillin from the beginning of the programmes to July 1952.

WHO, in collaboration with the Government of Thailand, sponsored the first international symposium on yaws control, which was held in Bangkok from 14 to 30 March. At this meeting workers from over 30 countries discussed common problems.

In work on venereal infections, control projects to which WHO contributed advisers continued throughout the year in Afghanistan, Burma, Ceylon, Ecuador, Egypt, Guatemala and Paraguay, and new projects were started in Ethiopia, India, Iran, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. Of these, three were joint projects in venereal diseases and maternal and child health.

WHO continued with its special work in the control of venereal diseases among seafarers. In the port demonstration project at Rotterdam, study groups collected information and discussed various phases of maritime venereal-disease control. The international Anti-Venereal-Disease Commission of the Rhine, meeting again in 1952, called for continued co-operation by the countries bordering on this river. Two more Member States—Israel and Japan—adhered to the Brussels Agreement of 1924 to provide adequate treatment facilities for seafarers.

Two monographs on treponemal-disease control, and several articles written by members of the WHO Expert Advisory Panel on Venereal Infections and Treponematoses, were prepared in 1952 and published in the WHO Bulletin.

(4) Virus and Rickettsial Diseases

In 1952 WHO co-ordinated and promoted research on the incidence and manner of spread of virus diseases and immunological characteristics of prevalent viruses.

Since many virus diseases present common problems, WHO decided to combine several of the expert advisory panels on individual diseases into a single Expert Advisory Panel on Virus Diseases.

The Expert Committee on Influenza, at its first session in Geneva in September, considered the epidemiology of the disease, influenza vaccines, diagnostic procedures, the control of epidemics, and therapeutic measures. The Committee expressed the view that further development of the WHO influenza programme might make it possible to forecast epidemics and indicate the type of virus likely to be responsible. This might give time for the preparation of suitable vaccines, which, although still being developed, are considered to be the most promising means of control.

At the end of the year, the WHO-assisted project for the rehabilitation of handicapped children in Japan was being expanded to include the treatment of victims of poliomyelitis.

In 1952 smallpox control was added to the project for the control of ankylostomiasis in Paraguay and to the diphtheria-pertussis immunization programme in Colombia.

The Expert Committee on Trachoma met in Geneva from 3 to 8 March and studied the possibility of mass treatment with antibiotics (aureomycin, terramycin) and sulfonamides.

Pilot projects were started in China (Taiwan) and were planned for the French Protectorate of Morocco, and Tunisia, with supplies and equipment provided by UNICEF.

WHO and UNICEF continued to assist the Governments of Bolivia and Peru with projects to control typhus through the use of DDT dusting powder, and the campaign begun in 1950 in Afghanistan was extended.

The Expert Committee on Hepatitis held its first session in Liege, Belgium, in July, following the international conference on the same subject held by the International Society of Geographical Pathology. The Committee considered especially the virology, epidemiology and public-health aspects of infectious and serum hepatitis. It called attention to the need for more information on their incidence, the increasing importance of serum hepatitis, and the dangers attending transfusions of pooled plasma.

The Institute of Hygiene and Bacteriology of the University of Strasbourg and the Instituto de Medicina Tropical, Lisbon, were both approved for the carrying out of sero-protection tests required for the international certification of immunity against yellow fever. It was also arranged for an appropriate quantity of seed vaccine from the Rocky Mountain Laboratory of Hamilton, Montana, United States, to be supplied, free of charge, to the Central Research Institute at Kasauli, East Punjab, India, where yellow-fever vaccine is to be manufactured. Insect control projects, with particular attention to Aedes aegypti, have been carried on with continued assistance from WHO and UNICEF in nine countries in Central America and the Caribbean area. In Costa Rica and Ecuador combined projects for insect control and yellow-fever vaccination proceeded regularly.

(5) Bacterial and Parasitic Diseases

At a conference of heads of laboratories producing diphtheria and pertussis prophylactics, held in Yugoslavia in October, the biological products currently available were reviewed and their relative advantages discussed.

Combined immunization programmes were continued in several South American countries with technical advice from WHO and financial support from UNICEF, and it was decided to expand the one in Colombia to include smallpox. During the year a diphtheria immunization campaign was begun in Hong Kong, for which WHO gave technical advice to UNICEF.

The Philippine Government received help from WHO and UNICEF in producing diphtheria antigens.

In many parts of the world cerebrospinal meningitis has ceased to be a serious problem. In Central Africa, however, each year there are large epidemics with a considerable mortality. An epidemic in the Sudan in 1952 was particularly serious. A consultant was sent to the area, and a small trial of the prophylactic value of sulfonamides and penicillin (PAM) was undertaken.

A WHO team on cholera started to work in an endemic region (in East Pakistan) which many observers believe is a part of the original home of this disease. The team is making a thorough study of the epidemiology of cholera in the area with a view to finding effective and economical control methods by environmental sanitation.

Plague is a serious problem in the Uttar Pradesh, India: epidemics, evidently derived from endemic foci, flare up from time to time, involve wide areas and claim numerous victims. In 1952, an ecologist began to work in this area, with the object of delimiting the endemic areas and working out plans for effective control and prevention of epidemics.

A meeting of the WHO Expert Committee on Plague, held in Bombay from 5 to 10 December, studied the results of rodent surveys in Africa, examined modern methods of rat control, dealt with bacteriological and immunology problems and investigated the possibility of standardizing procedures for the treatment of plague. A consultant was sent to Indonesia to advise on control measures to be taken before the beginning of the plague season.

The Expert Committee on Leprosy met in November 1952, and dealt with the contagiousness of the various forms of leprosy, prophylaxis by BCG vaccination, control and treatment, the standardization of the lepromin test, and the classification of the disease. At the end of the year a survey was being made by a WHO consultant in Ethiopia.

A field project of bilharziasis control started in Egypt, where field trials with molluscocides were also undertaken. Bilharziasis surveys were conducted in certain countries of the East Mediterranean Region, in several territories in the African Region, and in the Philippines. The WHO Expert Committee on Bilharziasis met in October in Puerto Rico.

(6) Zoonoses

A seminar on the zoonoses, held in Vienna in November and attended by medical and veterinary officials of European countries, was jointly sponsored by FAO and WHO. It dealt with brucellosis, bovine tuberculosis, rabies, Q fever and leptospirosis.

During the year, on behalf of both WHO and FAO, a consultant on meat hygiene surveyed and advised on practices in twelve Latin American countries.

WHO sent consultants to Colombia, Ecuador and Israel to help these countries to develop veterinary public-health units as part of their government health services. Similar advice was also given to Ceylon, Peru, the Philippines, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

The second session of the Joint FAO/WHO Expert Committee on Brucellosis, held in Florence from 13 to 18 October, reviewed the results of research carried out by FAO/WHO centres and made recommendations on the standardization of laboratory procedures for identifying the Brucella species, on diagnosis, and on therapy for human beings and field control for animals.

To co-ordinate research sponsored by WHO and FAO, members of the headquarters staff were sent to Brazil, Greece, Israel, Mexico, Spain, Turkey and Yugoslavia. In close consultation with WHO, FAO veterinary consultants worked and advised on brucellosis and other problems in Burma, Ethiopia, Honduras, Iran, Iraq, Pakistan and Thailand. For two weeks, beginning on 1 December, WHO sponsored a meeting on brucellosis in Santiago, Chile, for medical and veterinary workers of ten South American countries. Through the FAO/WHO brucellosis centre established in Rijeka, Yugoslavia, in 1950 a vigorous campaign was carried out among infected animals in the district. By the end of 1952, brucellosis was eliminated from the animal population and was no longer found in human beings.

The most important item in WHO's work on rabies during the year was its sponsorship of a meeting held from 14 to 28 July in the Institut Pasteur at Coonoor, Southern India. This meeting was attended by 55 medical and veterinary workers in rabies from 23 countries.

Members of the headquarters staff went to Greece, India, Indonesia, Malaya, Mexico, Thailand and Yugoslavia to help these countries in the preparation of vaccines and in field control programmes.

b. MATERNAL AND CHILD HEALTH

During 1952 WHO's work for maternal and child health continued to expand. By the end of the year an adviser on the subject had been appointed to each regional office, except that for Africa. Altogether WHO, either with UNICEF or under the technical assistance programme, assisted governments with 40 different projects in maternal and child health in 1952. Fifteen of these were in Europe, where special projects, carried out jointly by WHO and UNICEF, included assistance to three countries in developing their programmes for the care of premature infants and to five countries in the rehabilitation of physically handicapped children.

WHO sent a short-term consultant to Lebanon and another to Japan to advise the Governments on co-ordinated programmes for the rehabilitation of physically handicapped children.

A meeting of experts was convened jointly by the United Nations and WHO to discuss the mental-health aspects of adoption. WHO also participated in a conference of experts which, at the request of the United Nations, was convened in Geneva by the International Union for Child Welfare to study the problem of adoption.

The reports of the Expert Committee on Maternity Care and of the Joint Expert Committee on the Physically Handicapped Child (convened by WHO with the participation of the United Nations, ILO and UNESCO) were published during the year.

WHO took part in the Technical Working Group on Long-Range Activities for Children, which was established to co-ordinate these activities and dealt with such subjects as child nutrition, the training of auxiliary personnel, and surveys of all services for children in three selected countries.

WHO also continued to co-operate with ILO on matters of common concern, including maternity protection, child labour, and the vocational training and placing in employment of handicapped young people.

c. ENVIRONMENTAL SANITATION

In view of the growing importance of environmental sanitation in its health programme, WHO, at the beginning of 1952, created a Division of Environmental Sanitation. Its programme included: advisory services in municipal and rural sanitation; milk and food sanitation; the control of insects, rodents and other vectors; housing and town planning; environmental aspects of occupational health; and education and training in environmental sanitation.

General sanitation advisers were assigned to Turkey, the Seychelles, Angola and El Salvador and training in sanitation was instituted in Afghanistan and Liberia by WHO staff. Sanitary engineers or sanitarians were assigned to malaria-control units in Burma, Cambodia, Colombia, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Liberia, Saudi Arabia, China (Taiwan) and Vietnam; to a cholera control project in Pakistan; and to projects for the control of bilharziasis in Syria and the Philippines.

At the end of the year a joint inter-secretariat committee on milk control was organized by WHO, FAO and UNICEF, and was entrusted with the responsibility for drafting a long-term co-operative plan on the technique of milk production, processing and distribution.

The third European seminar of sanitary engineers was organized in London in October in collaboration with the Government of the United Kingdom. The first two such seminars, held at The Hague in 1950 and at Rome in 1951 had already influenced developments in Europe and had led, among other things, to action to establish an international standard of drinking-water and international standard methods of water analysis.

A seminar, attended by representative sanitary engineers from the Central American countries, was held in November at Managua in collaboration with the Government of Nicaragua. Plans were made for organizing a similar meeting in the Eastern Mediterranean Region.

d. MENTAL HEALTH

WHO continued to provide to individual governments consultant services in mental health and short-term consultants visited six countries during 1952.

During the year inter-country activities in mental health were considerably expanded. In collaboration with WHO a seminar on child psychiatry was organized by the Norwegian Government for child guidance workers from the Scandinavian countries. WHO also assisted the World Federation for Mental Health in holding a seminar, at Chichester, England, for WHO Fellows on mental health and infant development, and collaborated in three United Nations seminars on social case-work. Preparations were begun for several mental-health seminars in 1953, including one in South America on alcoholism, one in Europe on the mental-hygiene aspects of public health, one in the Western Pacific Region on the mental-health aspects of paediatrics, and one in the Eastern Mediterranean Region on clinical and social psychiatry.

Two meetings of experts were held during the year: the third session of the Expert Committee on Mental Health which was devoted to a study of the role and organization of the community mental hospital; and the meeting already mentioned, on the mental-health aspects of adoption.

The following WHO reports on mental health were published during the year: the second report of the Alcoholism Sub-Committee of the Expert Committee on Mental Health; the report of the joint WHO/UNESCO expert meeting on mental hygiene in the nursery school, published by UNESCO; and the report of a WHO consultant on Rehabilitation in Psychiatry. WHO also began a review of legislation affecting psychiatric care and a survey of the literature on psychiatric disorders in Africans.

e. SOCIAL AND OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH

At its second session, held in October, the Joint ILO/WHO Committee on Occupational Health suggested practical ways of advancing the health of workers in industry and agriculture by general public-health measures; it drew up plans for comprehensive health services suitable for large and small industrial establishments and for agricultural enterprises, and considered the methods by which labour and public-health authorities could co-operate to promote such services.

WHO also sponsored a European seminar on occupational health at Leyden, the Netherlands, which considered ways in which ministries of health, ministries of labour, social security institutions and other agencies might work together to promote the health of workers. Advisers were sent to Egypt, Finland, Iran, Turkey and Yugoslavia to assist in the general organization of government supervisory services for occupational health.

During September and October a training course for rehabilitation workers in eight European countries, sponsored by WHO, the United Nations and ILO, was held in Scandinavia, emphasis being given to the various practical methods by which medical, vocational, educational and social-welfare agencies can work together for the rehabilitation of the handicapped. WHO provided a consultant for a team which conducted a survey of Latin American countries with a view to organizing a rehabilitation demonstration centre, and gave assistance to India and Israel in the organization of training centres for physiotherapists. Projects for rehabilitation centres in Lebanon, Yugoslavia and other countries were in various stages of development at the end of the year.

A consultant on the organization of hospital services went to Egypt; a training course for hospital-records librarians was organized in Peru; a consultant hospital architect was sent to Vietnam; and a specialist went to Ceylon to advise on the administration of a system of drugs and supplies for the whole country.

The organization helped with the training of many groups of students sent to Geneva with United Nations fellowships in social work; it gave technical advice on several United Nations training projects in social welfare, such as those in Iraq and Pakistan; and it provided a medical consultant to Burma for a nation-wide survey of social welfare begun by the United Nations.

WHO gave advice to Ceylon and Lebanon and is sending a consultant to assist in the reorganization of all medico-legal services in the former country. Advice on physiological and mental standards for drivers was provided to the Economic Commission for Europe, in connexion with work on the prevention of road accidents.

f. NUTRITION

The report published in 1951 on the survey of kwashiorkor carried out by WHO and FAO in Africa received wide recognition. During 1952 surveys of the same kind were made in Central America and Brazil, and demonstrated the extent of the problem in the countries surveyed.

WHO, in co-operation with FAO and UNICEF, began developing schemes in French Equatorial Africa, the Belgian Congo and Ruanda-Urundi for both immediate and long-term preventive measures against malnutrition.

The study of how the nutritional level of population groups can be assessed, a question considered by the joint FAO/WHO Expert Committee on Nutrition in 1951, was continued.

At the request of the Chief Medical Officer of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWAPRNE), representatives of WHO and FAO visited the Eastern Mediterranean Region, where they made a third survey of the state of nutrition and diet of the Arab refugees.

g. HEALTH EDUCATION OF THE PUBLIC

During 1952 a professor of health education was sent on a two-year assignment to the University of Malaya, Singapore, where medical officers, nurses, sanitarians and teachers-in-training are being instructed in health education. A health educator was also appointed to assist in training elementary school-teachers at Bau Lintang Training College in Kuching, Sarawak, and to advise the Government on the development of its health-education programme.

In co-operation with UNESCO and other specialized agencies, WHO continued to help countries with programmes in fundamental education, among them the Regional Centre for Fundamental Education in Latin America in Patzcuaro, Mexico, and another established in Egypt to serve the Arab countries of the Eastern Mediterranean Region.

Special short-term consultants were employed by the regional offices for the Americas and for Europe to assist in planning the regional conferences in health education proposed for these Regions in 1953; twenty countries were visited for preliminary discussions.

A headquarters staff member was assigned to UNRWAPRNE for two and a half months, to help in evaluating the existing services and in planning an expanded programme of health education for the Arab refugees. This assignment led to a request from UNRWAPRNE for assistance with a two-year health-education training programme as a part of its plans for rehabilitating the refugees.

Through the services of regional or headquarters consultants, eight countries in three Regions were helped to evaluate their health-education programmes and prepare plans for future developments. Health educators were stationed in four countries to advise governments and assist in developing country-wide programmes.

WHO helped the Egyptian Government in the publication of Health Education Pilot Project in Three Villages in Egypt, an account of health education in connexion with the work of a venereal-disease control team in Tanta. Material was also supplied for a complete issue of the UNESCO Quarterly Bulletin of Fundamental Education published during 1952.

b. NURSING

Seventeen nursing projects, started in 1950 and 1951, were continued during 1952; 22 new programmes were begun, and twelve others were planned for 1953. Altogether, 97 nurses were in the field. WHO advised and helped to widen the scope of national nursing programmes so as to include health education in the community as well as nursing care in hospitals and homes. Assistance both in nursing and in maternal and child health was given to midwifery schools and, where local circumstances called for it, midwifery was included in the education of the nurse. To prepare teachers of nursing and midwifery, WHO helped with intensive training courses carried out as an extension of school projects, as well as through the WHO fellowship programme.

A working conference on nursing education, convened by WHO in Geneva in March, brought together directors of nursing schools from ten countries, who, with the assistance of a social scientist, a hospital administrator and an expert in education, developed a system for nursing education based on experience in the hospital and the home. Conferences in South America and the Western Pacific Region during 1952 extended knowledge both of the function of nursing services in the control of communicable diseases and of the use and production of teaching aids for nursing.

With the assistance of a grant from WHO, the International Council of Nurses made an international study of facilities for training nurse teachers; this study will be available for distribution during 1953.

i. EDUCATION AND TRAINING

The Expert Committee on Professional and Technical Education of Medical and Auxiliary

Personnel held its second session in Nancy, France, from 3 to 9 December and studied the problem of integrating preventive and social aspects of medicine into the medical curriculum.

The development of this type of medical teaching was further considered at the European Study Conference on Undergraduate Training in Hygiene, Preventive Medicine and Social Medicine, also held at Nancy.

The problem of training auxiliary personnel received much attention in 1952, mainly in countries concentrating on a rapid development of their health services. Consultations on this problem were held with the authorities of several countries in the Southeast Asia and Western Pacific Regions, with the United Nations Department of Social Affairs and with UNICEF.

(1) Fellowships

During the year 1952, a total of 1,147 awards were made as against 662 for 1951 and an average of 342 for the five-year period 1947-51. Of the awards in 1952, 723 (or 63 per cent) were financed from the regular budget of WHO, 53 (or 5 per cent), were UNICEF fellowships administered by WHO and 371 (or 32 per cent, compared with 13 per cent in 1951) were financed with funds from the Expanded Programme of technical assistance.

(2) Exchange of Scientific Information

A visiting team of medical scientists (similar to the "medical teaching missions" that visited Israel and Iran in 1951) worked for two months in the Southeast Asia Region, mainly in Burma and Ceylon, and also spent several days in Calcutta. An inter-regional symposium on yaws control was held in Thailand.

Much scientific information on educational and research institutions—their teaching staffs, activities, special interests—was collected throughout 1952, and WHO started to compile, in particular, a file of catalogues and bulletins of the medical and public-health schools of the world, and another of national medical scientific societies of all countries.

j. EPIDEMIOLOGICAL AND STATISTICAL SERVICES

In 1952 no serious epidemic of quarantinable disease was recorded. During the first nine months of the year—up to the time of entry-into-force of the International Sanitary Regulations—WHO dealt with eleven disputes concerning the administration of the International Sanitary Conventions.

Information on the prevalence of some 40 communicable diseases in about 200 countries and territories was analysed and recorded. This information is extracted from approximately 6,800 reports received at weekly, ten-day, fort-nightly or quarterly intervals at headquarters. Additional information on major epidemics is received by cable and airmail, but no information is received from seven countries in Europe, five in the Americas, five in Asia and three in Africa.

Epidemiological intelligence is diffused over a world-wide system of radio broadcasts. Daily bulletins are transmitted which contain information on quarantinable diseases in ports and airports, quarantine measures and items relating to the prevalence of other communicable diseases of interest to international traffic.

The Weekly Epidemiological Record continued to appear regularly. It contains notifications made under international sanitary legislation and other information of value in international traffic. A total of 580 "Epidemiological Notes" on outbreaks of infectious diseases (chiefly cerebrospinal meningitis, influenza and poliomyelitis) have also appeared in this publication.

The results of work in health statistics were, for the most part, published in the Epidemiological and Vital Statistics Report, in which the following material appeared during the year: a fourth study on the "Evolution of Mortality in Europe during the Twentieth Century", dealing with cancer mortality and also including data on eight non-European countries; a "Study of the Influence of the Decline of Mortality on Growth of Population"; an article on "Prevalence of Leprosy in the World"; a study on "Natality, General Mortality, Infant and Neonatal Mortality in 1951"; statistical information on "Deaths by Cause, Sex and Age in Europe and in some non-European Countries". The Report also contained seven studies devoted to the epidemiology, prevalence and geographical distribution of cerebrospinal meningitis, cholera, diphtheria, measles, pertussis, poliomyelitis and scarlet fever, as well as 28 statistical tables giving the number of cases of, and deaths (by four-week periods or by months) from 21 quarantinable and non-quarantinable diseases.

A regional seminar and teaching course on vital and health statistics, sponsored jointly by WHO, the United Nations and the Government of Japan, was held in Tokyo from 4 August to 20 September.

WHO participated in the international seminar on statistical organization held in Ottawa in October for the discussion of national statistical problems and suitable ways for improving national statistics. It co-operated with the United Nations at the first session held at Geneva in November of a Preparatory Committee for the World Population Conference to be sponsored by the United Nations in 1954

k. BIOLOGICAL STANDARDIZATION

In 1952, 30 years after the adoption of the first international biological standard, there were 50 such standards and those in preparation would bring the number to 88. Out of 34 standards in 1945, only one was designed for diagnostic purposes, but the number of diagnostic standards has since been increasing so rapidly that they will represent nearly one-third of the 88 biological standards soon to be available.

i. DRUGS LIABLE TO PRODUCE ADDICTION

In January 1952 the Expert Committee on Drugs Liable to Produce Addiction held its third session in Geneva.

The inquiry on the use of and need for diacetylmorphine (heroin) proceeded during the year. By the end of the year, 53 Member States had declared themselves in favour of abolition of this drug and nine against.

Close collaboration with the Permanent Central Opium Board and the Drug Supervisory Body of the United Nations was maintained during the year, and advice was given on many questions.

Advice was also given to the Libyan Government on the testing of hashish preparations.

m. PHARMACEUTICAL STANDARDS AND NOMENCLATURE

Since the publication, in English and French, of Volume I of the first edition of the Pharmacopoea Internationalis at the end of 1951, WHO has concentrated much of its attention on the preparation of Volume II

Monographs prepared for Volume II deal with a number of antibiotics (benzylpenicillin, streptomycin, dihydrostreptomycin, aureomycin, chloramphenicol and terramycin), with biological preparations (including preparations of insulin) and with compressed tablets, injectable solutions, tinctures, and new synthetic organic chemicals. A total of 196 monographs and nine appendices were in proof at the end of 1952, and texts for 26 other monographs and eighteen appendices were in course of preparation.

A number of States and national pharmacopoeia commissions have already announced their intention of including the provisions of the Pharmacopoea Internationalis, either in whole or in part, in their official pharmacopoeias, and one Member is adopting it as its official pharmacopoeia.

Work was continued on the selection and introduction of international non-proprietary names for new therapeutic substances.

In the course of the year, 139 names for new drugs were selected.

n. LIBRARY SERVICE

The WHO Library Service was re-organized and a reading room established containing 7,000 reference works, standard textbooks, monographs and bound volumes of the most important periodicals, as well as current numbers of 1,000 periodicals. The WHO Library was reclassified on the Barnard system. The Library ordered 5,977 items of medical literature for governments, health institutions and field teams.

o. PUBLICATIONS

During 1953 WHO continued to issue its regular publications, including The Bulletin of the World Health Organization, The Chronicle of the World Health Organization, the Monograph Series, and the Technical Report Series. In addition, WHO published the International Digest of Health Legislation, The publication of Official Records was continued and a special volume, issued as Official Records No. 37, contains the proceedings of the Special Committee on the International Sanitary Regulations. A Handbook of Resolutions and Decisions of the World Health Assembly and Executive Board was also published and used for the first time at the Fifth World Health Assembly.

4. Budget

The fourth World Health Assembly approved the 1952 budget at $9,077,782, giving an effective working budget of $7,677,782 to be financed by casual income available for 1952 and assessments against active members. Supplemental estimates of $30,000 for 1952 to replace in the Working Capital Fund the sum withdrawn for emergency relief to India were approved by the fifth World Health Assembly. The fifth World Health Assembly also approved the withdrawal from the Working Capital Fund of an amount not to exceed $104,550 in 1952 to increase the Building Fund and authorized the Director-General to reimburse the Working Capital Fund to the above extent from any savings realized in the 1952 Budget.

For 1953 a budget of $9,832,754 was approved by the fifth World Health Assembly under the various appropriation parts and sections. The Executive Board at its eleventh session approved certain transfers between sections of the appropriation resolution which are reflected in the details given below. Notwithstanding this approval, the Director-General was instructed to limit the obligations to be incurred to parts I, II and III of this appropriation, making an effective working budget of $8,485,095.

H. The Universal Postal Union (UPU)¹

1. Introduction

The Postal Union was founded in 1874 by the first International Postal Congress held at Berne, before which international exchanges of mail had been regulated by numerous special agreements concluded between countries or groups of countries.

This first International Postal Treaty which entered into force in July 1875 considerably changed and simplified the existing state of affairs. It declared that the countries concluding the Treaty formed a single postal territory for the reciprocal exchange of mail between their post offices. This formulation of the aims of the Union remained substantially the same through successive revisions of the Treaty although it was somewhat elaborated by the Stockholm Congress of 1924 and the Paris Congress of 1947. The former added that it was also the aim of the Union "to provide for the organisation and improvement of the various international postal services" and the latter that it was "to promote the development of international collaboration in this sphere". For well-defined classes of mail (such as letters, post-cards and printed matter) addressed to any part of the territory of the Postal Union, the Berne

Treaty provided that each country was to charge uniform rates and all apportionment of charges between sender and receiver countries was abolished. Freedom of transit was guaranteed throughout the territory of the Union.

A congress of plenipotentiaries of the participating countries was to meet periodically with a view to perfecting the machinery of the Union, introducing necessary improvements, and discussing matters of common interest. Thirteen such congresses met up to the end of 1952. These congresses drew up the Acts by which the functions of the Union are determined. These Acts comprise:

(1) a main Convention laying down (a) the statute of the Union and (b) provisions governing the letter-post, which includes letters, postcards, printed matter, samples, commercial papers, small parcels and phonopost articles (for example, phonograph records);

(2) seven accessory agreements covering insured letters and boxes, parcel post, cash-on-delivery articles, money orders, collection orders, transfers to and from postal cheque accounts and subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals. (Special provisions annexed to the main Convention and the parcel post agreement govern the optional transport of these articles by air. Similarly, a supplement to the money order agreement regulates the optional exchange of travellers' orders.)

Accession to the main Convention is obligatory for all Members, but accession to the other agreements is optional. The performance of certain special services referred to in the Convention is therefore limited to arrangements between countries which have agreed to undertake them. The provisions of these Acts of the Union acquire the status of law in each country which ratifies them, and it is therefore the responsibility of each party to the Convention or to one of the agreements to ensure the application of the respective provisions. Each of these Acts is accompanied by executive regulations, which have also been adopted by the Congress but signed by representatives in the name of their respective postal administrations and not, as in the case of the Convention and the Agreements, in their capacity as plenipotentiaries of their governments.

In addition to the congresses, several conferences or committees of representatives of postal administrations met, under the Union's auspices, to examine and discuss special technical questions referred to them by congresses or to prepare for congresses.

Provisions for the admission of new Members were eased by the Paris Congress of 1878, which laid down that countries would be admitted to membership at their request without prior consultation among Members being required. The name of the Union was changed from General Postal Union to Universal Postal Union.

On 1 July 1948 the Universal Postal Convention as revised by the Paris Congress in 1947 entered into force. This Congress introduced a new article into the Convention providing that the Union would be brought into relationship with the United Nations in accordance with the terms of an Agreement, the text of which was annexed to the Convention.² As a result of this Agreement, and because of circumstances arising from the Second World War, the article relating to accession to the Convention was modified. Under the new terms, the Swiss Government has been required, since 1 July 1948, to submit each new request for admission to the Members of the Union, and the country concerned is considered admitted only if its request is approved by at least two thirds of the Members constituting the Union.

2. Organization

UPU is composed of the Universal Postal Congress, the Executive and Liaison Committee, and the International Bureau of the UPU. Special sessions of the Congress may be called at the request of at least two-thirds of the Members of the Union. Committees of a temporary character may be established by the Congress to study particular questions.

The Universal Postal Congress meets at the latest within five years from the date of entry into force of the Acts of the preceding Congress in order to revise these Acts or to complete them, if necessary. Each Member is represented at the Congress by one or more plenipotentiary representatives, who are given the necessary powers by their governments. A Member may also be represented by the delegation of another Member, although no delegation may represent more than one country other than its own. Each Member has one vote in the Congress. Every Congress fixes the place of meeting of the following Congress, which is convened, after consultation with the International Bureau, by the government of the country in which it is to meet. This government is also responsible for notifying all other Members of the Union of the decisions taken by the Congress.

The Executive and Liaison Committee is composed of twenty Member States elected by the Congress to function during the period between Congresses. At least half of the members of the Committee must be re-elected at each Congress, but no country can be elected by three successive Congresses. The Committee usually holds one session a year; it meets normally at Berne. Its functions include:

- (1) the maintenance of close relations with Members of the Union, with a view to improving the international postal service;
- (2) the study of technical questions affecting that service and the transmission of the results of such studies to the Members of the Union;
- (3) the establishment and maintenance of working relations with the United Nations, specialized agencies and other international organizations;
- (4) the control of activities of the International Bureau.³

The Committee elects from among its own members its President and four Vice-Presidents, and appoints, on the recommendation of the Swiss Government, the Director and other top-ranking personnel of the International Bureau.

The International Bureau of the UPU, operating at Berne under the supervision of the Swiss Supervisory Authority, serves as the organ of liaison, information and consultation for Members of the Union. In particular, it:

- (1) assembles, publishes and distributes information of all kinds which administrations have to communicate to one another in order to carry on the various international postal services;
- (2) gives opinions, at the request of the interested parties, on questions in dispute;
- (3) notifies Members of requests for amendments to the Acts of the Congress and of changes adopted;
- (4) makes the necessary preparations for congresses and conferences; and
- (5) in general, undertakes studies, consultations and other matters as requested by Members of the Union.

The Bureau also serves postal administrations as a clearing house for the settlement of postal accounts, especially those relating to transit payments and reply coupons.

3. Activities during 1952

With the admission of Laos and Libya by the 13th Universal Postal Congress, the membership of UPU increased to 93, excluding Germany, which is temporarily prevented by the Paris Convention of 1947 from adhering to the Convention and the Agreements of the Union.

The Union continued during the year to pursue its aim of assuring the organization and improvement of the various international postal services and of promoting the development of international collaboration in this sphere.

The most important event of the year was the meeting in Brussels of the 13th Universal Postal Congress from 14 May to 11 July, at which 91 of the Members of the Union were represented by plenipotentiaries. The principal tasks before the Congress were to amend the Universal Postal Convention of 1947, to receive the report of the Executive and Liaison Committee covering the activities of the Union since 1947 and to fix a budget ceiling for the next five years. It was provided that the Acts, signed at Brussels on 11 July 1952, would enter into force on 1 July 1953.

For the first time in the history of the Union, the Congress used a system of simultaneous interpretation. It was decided that English, Spanish and Russian as well as French might be used at future congresses, conferences, etc., and that the use of other languages would be permitted on request under certain conditions. French, however, was to remain the only official language of the Union.

Slightly over 1,700 proposals were submitted to the Congress by States Members of the Union. The following are some of the principal decisions taken by the Congress.

It increased the membership of the Executive and Liaison Committee from nineteen to twenty and stipulated that the Committee should be designated by the Congress on the basis of equitable geographical distribution. The Committee was empowered to submit to the Congress proposals resulting from studies undertaken by it on request of the Congress or resulting from its own activities. It was also empowered to examine, at the request of the originating country, any proposal transmitted to the International Bureau and to prepare comments on it which would be submitted with the proposal to Member Administrations by the Bureau. The Congress also re-elected the new members of the Committee.⁴

As regards the finances of the Union, the Congress decided to raise from 600,000 gold francs (of which 100,000 gold francs were for the Executive and Liaison Committee) to 1,300,000 gold francs the budgetary limit for the ordinary expenses of the Union. The change was to take effect on the date of the entry into force of the Brussels Convention (that is, on 1 July 1953). The two figures are, however, not comparable since the greater part of the rise in ordinary expenses is explained by the fact that in the future a large part of the expenses hitherto classed as "extraordinary expenses" will come under the heading of "ordinary expenses".

Since the Union has been in existence for more than three quarters of a century and the successive Postal Congresses have introduced in its Acts those improvements found to be necessary or desirable, the only changes remaining to be made are of a technical character. In this respect two important decisions were taken by the Brussels Congress involving (1) transit rates for surface mail and (2) the basic rates for airmail.

Under the 1947 and previous Conventions, different transit rates, that is, the rates paid by the Administrations of origin for the carriage of mail by intermediate Administrations, were applicable to letters and postcards and to other objects of correspondence. The Brussels Congress adopted a uniform scale of transit rates applicable to all objects of correspondence. It also adopted a more detailed scale of distances, with the corresponding transit rates, for both land and sea carriage.

As regards airmail rates, which had been the subject of extensive discussions and studies between the Union, the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) and the International Air Transport Association (IATA), the Congress took the following decisions after considerable discussion. It decided:

(1) that the maximum rate for the carriage of LC (letters and postcards) and assimilated objects of correspondence, such as money-orders, etc., should be fixed at three gold francs per ton-kilometre; (2) that this uniform rate would be increased to a maximum of four gold francs per ton-kilometre, for LC mail carried by air services for which the rate applied on 1 July 1952 was higher than three gold francs; (3) for other objects of correspondence, the maximum rate was fixed at 1.25 gold francs per ton-kilometre; (4) for periodicals and papers the maximum rate per ton-kilometre was fixed at one gold franc.

The Congress also stipulated that airmail surcharges should be closely related to transportation charges and, as a general rule, receipts from air postage surcharges should not on the whole exceed the cost of carriage of the airmail. It instructed the Executive and Liaison Committee to study airmail rates and report to the next Congress.

The scale of postage rates, units of weight, and weight and size limits for all objects of correspondence adopted by the Congress was, with very few exceptions, the same as that provided in the Paris Convention of 1947; the only significant change concerned the extension of postal franchise to Braille material. Under the provisions of the Final Protocol of the Convention of 1947, postal administrations were authorized to increase the rates fixed by the Convention by an amount up to 40 per cent or to reduce them by an amount up to 20 per cent. The Final Protocol of the new Convention provided that the rates may be increased by up to 60 per cent or reduced by up to 20 per cent.

The Congress also took the following, among other, decisions. It referred to the Executive and Liaison Committee the problem of the transport of dangerous goods, which had been raised by the United Nations in accordance with Economic and Social Council resolution 379 E (XIII);⁵ it further asked ICAO to study the problem of the transmission by airmail of substances liable to imperil aircraft. It adopted a resolution on the dispatch through the post of perishable biological material, providing for concerted action by the World Health Organization (WHO) and the Union. It referred to the Executive and Liaison Committee the question, raised by the United Nations, of what provisions relating to the shipment of narcotics should be included in the new single narcotics convention and what provisions in the Universal Postal Convention and Arrangements. It also adopted a resolution which, among other things, recognized from the postal point of view the establishment of the United Nations Postal Administration.⁶

Prior to the Congress the Executive and Liaison Committee held its annual meeting at Berne, Switzerland, from 21 to 28 January. Its discussions were concerned principally with the proposals to be presented by the Committee to the Brussels Congress and dealt, among other things, with: a revision of the Acts of Paris concerning parcel post; the textual revision of the Acts of Paris concerning insured letters and boxes; the redraft of the Acts of Paris concerning subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals; proposals for a postal franchise for prisoners and internees; and questions relating to airmail, particularly tariff questions.

The new Executive and Liaison Committee elected by the Congress held its first meeting on 12 July 1952 to elect its officers and fix the date of its next session.

Independently of its specialized activities, the UPU, through the medium of its International Bureau and in accordance with the terms of article 26 of the Universal Postal Convention of Paris, 1947, has served as the organ of liaison, information and consultation of the countries of the Union. Thus the Bureau published and sent to the Administrations in 1952 a total of 306 circulars, 119 bulletins, 12,009,500 international reply coupons, 155,375 postal identity cards and about 840 proposals for modifications of the Acts of the Union submitted by the Administrations for examination by the Brussels Congress. It also edited, or re-edited, and transmitted to the Administrations the following records, lists, documents, etc.: analytic report of the 1952 session of the Executive and Liaison Committee, general account of transit charges for 1951, general account of international reply coupons for 1951, the report of the work of the International Bureau for 1951, list of heads of Postal Administrations, compilation of addresses of Postal Administrations, record of the organization and internal services of the Administrations, record of postal rates of internal services, statistical summary of postal services for 1950, the review Union Postale and seven technical postal studies. In addition, the International Bureau distributed 2,623 kinds of postage stamps and printed and embossed stamps, comprising 2,180 postage stamps of all kinds, 29 blocks, 387 sheets and 27 printed and embossed stamps, bringing to 958,937 the total number of stamps distributed to the Administrations during 1952.

4. Budget

Each Congress fixes the maximum figure for the ordinary annual expenses of the International Bureau. These expenses, as well as extraordinary charges resulting from sessions of the Congress, conferences or committees, and the charges which arise from special work entrusted to the Bureau, are met in common by all the Members of the Union. These are divided, for this purpose, into seven classes, of which each contributes to the expenditures in the following proportion:

First class:	25 units
Second class:	20 units
Third class:	15 units
Fourth class:	10 units
Fifth class:	5 units
Sixth class:	3 units
Seventh class:	1 unit

In case of a new accession to the Convention, the Government of the Swiss Confederation determines, in agreement with the government of the Member concerned, the class to which it will belong from the point of view of contributing to the expenses of the Bureau.

Pursuant to the decision of the Paris Congress of 1947, the annual ordinary expenses of the International Bureau must not exceed 500,000 gold francs (equivalent to approximately 714,826 Swiss francs), and those of the Executive and Liaison Committee 100,000 gold francs (equivalent to approximately 142,857 Swiss francs). To these sums must be added the expenses resulting from the special work assigned to the Bureau (see above).

The Swiss Administration supervises the expenses of the International Bureau and advances the necessary funds. These sums must be repaid by the debtor administrations as quickly as possible and at the latest before the end of the year in which the account is rendered. If this time is exceeded, the sums due are charged interest at the rate of 5 per cent per year, from the date of the expiration of the period.

As of 31 December 1952, countries were classified as follows for the apportionment of contributions:

1st class: Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, France, Germany,⁷ India, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Pakistan, Spain, Union of South Africa, USSR, United Kingdom, United States

I. The International Telecommunication Union (ITU)¹

1. Introduction

The Convention establishing an International Telegraph Union was signed at Paris on 17 May 1865 by the plenipotentiaries of 20 founding States. In 1885, at Berlin, the first regulations relating to international telephone services were inserted in the Telegraph Regulations annexed to the Convention.

At the first International Radiotelegraph Conference, held at Berlin, 27 States signed the International Radiotelegraph Convention of 3 November 1906 establishing the principle of compulsory intercommunication between vessels at sea and the land.

In 1932, the International Telegraph Convention and the International Radiotelegraph Convention were merged to form the International Telecommunication Convention, which was signed at Madrid on 9 December 1932. Under this Convention, which came into force on 1 January 1934, the International Telecommunication Union replaced the International Telegraph Union.

From the outset, ITU was an agency which, by means of conferences meeting normally every five years (except during the two world wars), revised and kept up to date the basic Convention and the regulations governing international telegraph, telephone and radiocommunications. By means of a permanent secretariat, known as the Bureau of the Union, it circulated information furnished by Member countries as necessary for the smooth functioning of the international telecommunications services, and published a monthly journal. After the Second World War, in view of post-war political changes and of scientific advances, it became necessary to expand the structure of the organization. The Plenipotentiary Conference, held at Atlantic City in 1947, drafted a new Convention,² which was signed in October 1947 by 72 of the 78 States, territories or groups of territories which, according to Annex I of this Convention, can become Members of the Union with full rights upon signature and ratification of or accession to the Convention. The new Convention reorganized the Union and established new permanent organs, including the Administrative Council and the International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB).

The Atlantic City Convention came into effect on 1 January 1949 but certain of its provisions were applied beginning 1 January 1948. This Convention will remain in force until the end of 1953.

An Agreement established the relationship between ITU and the United Nations was also approved by the Atlantic City Plenipotentiary Conference and later approved, on 15 November 1947, by the United Nations General Assembly. The Agreement, annexed to the revised Convention, came into force on 1 January 1949 at the same time as the Convention.³

The Administrative Radio Conference, held concurrently with the Plenipotentiary Conference at Atlantic City in 1947, established a new table of frequency allocations, allocating the revised frequency bands to the various services, such as fixed, maritime, aeronautical and broadcasting. The Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference, held in Geneva in 1951, examined the work of the various Radio Conferences held since Atlantic City. The outcome was an Agreement signed by 63 Members of the Union which represented a major step in implementing the new table of frequency allocations.

The International Telegraph and Telephone Regulations, revised at Cairo in 1938, were amended by the International Administrative Telegraph and Telephone Conference, held in Paris from 20 May to 5 August 1949.

The main purpose of ITU is:

"to maintain and extend international co-operation for the improvement and rational use of telecommunications".⁴ ITU also promotes the development and most efficient operation of technical facilities. It allocates the radio frequency spectrum and registers radio frequency assignments to avoid harmful interference between radio stations of different countries, encourages the establishment of as low rates as possible and promotes the adoption of measures for ensuring safety of life through the co-operation of telecommunication service.⁵

2. Organization

As provided by the Atlantic City Convention, the structure of ITU consists of a Plenipotentiary Conference, Administrative Conferences and the permanent organs of the Union: the Administrative Council, the General Secretariat, the International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB), the International Telegraph Consultative Committee (CCIT), the International Telephone Consultative Committee (CCIF) and the International Radio Consultative Committee (CCIR).⁶

The supreme organ of the Union is the Plenipotentiary Conference, at which all Members of the Union may be represented. It considers the report of the Administrative Council on the activities of the Union; establishes the basis for the ITU budget for a five-year period; approves the accounts; elects the Members whose representatives constitute the Administrative Council; revises the Convention if it considers this necessary; enters into and revises formal agreements with other international bodies; and deals with such telecommunication questions as may be necessary. This Conference normally meets once every five years, at a place and date fixed by the preceding Conference. Each Member has one vote in the Union. Decisions on the admission of a new Member to ITU require a two-thirds majority vote. All other decisions of ITU are taken by majority vote.

Administrative Conferences, at which all Members may be represented, meet preferably at the same time and place as the Plenipotentiary Conference. The Administrative Telegraph and Telephone Conference and the Administrative Radio Conference revise the Administrative Regulations with which they are respectively concerned. The Administrative Radio Conference, moreover, elects the members of the IFRB and reviews its activities. Extraordinary administrative conferences may be convened by a decision of the Plenipotentiary Conference, or when at least twenty Members of the Union have made known to the Administrative Council their desire that such a conference shall be held to consider agenda proposed by them, or on the proposal of the Administrative Council. Regional administrative conferences and special international administrative conferences, to deal with special telecommunication questions, are also held.

The Administrative Council is composed of a representative of each of eighteen Members of the ITU elected by the Plenipotentiary Conference.

³ For text of the Agreement, see Y.U.N., 1947-48, pp. 949-54.

⁵ For fuller statements on purposes and functions of ITU, see Y.U.N., 1951, p. 943.

⁶ The official abbreviations, CCIT, CCIF and CCIR, derive from the French titles of these consultative committees: Comité consultatif international télégraphique, Comité consultatif international téléphonique and Comité consultatif international des radiocommunications.

The Council supervises the Union's administrative functions between sessions of the Plenipotentiary Conference, reviews and approves the annual budget, appoints the Secretary-General of the Union and the two Assistant Secretaries-General, and co-ordinates the work of ITU with that of other international organizations. The Council normally meets at the seat of the Union once a year and at such other times as it thinks necessary, or at the request of six of its Members. The Secretary General of the Union acts as Secretary of the Administrative Council.

In the organization decided on at Atlantic City, the General Secretariat succeeds the Bureau of the International Telecommunication Union, which had been located at Berne since 1868; Geneva was chosen by the Atlantic City Plenipotentiary Conference as the new headquarters of ITU, and the General Secretariat was officially transferred there on 26 October 1948. Under the direction of the Secretary-General of ITU, the General Secretariat carries out the secretariat work preparatory to and following conferences of the Union; it publishes the recommendations and principal reports of the permanent organs of the Union, international or regional telecommunication agreements, a journal of general information and documentation concerning telecommunication (Telecommunication Journal), general data and other official documents of the Union. The General Secretariat also prepares, for submission to the Administrative Council, an annual budget, and draws up an annual financial operating account.

The International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB) consists of eleven persons, appointed by as many Members of the ITU elected on a regional basis by the Administrative Radio Conference. Each regular session of the Administrative Radio Conference determines the number of persons of the IFRB. The Atlantic City Radio Conference elected the first persons who were confirmed in their duties by the Plenipotentiary Conference of Buenos Aires, 1952. Members serve, as stated in article 6 of the Convention, not as representatives of their countries, or of a region, but "as custodians of an international public trust". The IFRB records all frequency assignments and furnishes advice to Members of ITU with a view to the operation of the maximum practicable number of radio channels in those portions of the spectrum where harmful interference may occur.

The International Telegraph Consultative Committee (CCIT) studies technical, operating and tariff questions relating to telegraphy and facsimile,⁷ and issues recommendations on them. The International Telephone Consultative Committee (CCIF) has the same duties in relation to telephony. The International Radio Consultative Committee (CCIR) studies and issues recommendations concerning technical and operating questions relating to radio, the solution of which depends principally on considerations of a technical radio character. The work of each consultative committee is reviewed by its Plenary Assembly, which normally meets once every two years. The Plenary Assembly appoints the director of the consultative committee concerned and establishes study groups to deal with particular questions. The CCIR has a vice-director who is a specialist in the technical aspects of broadcasting. Each committee is served by a specialized secretariat and may have the use of a laboratory and of technical installations. In 1952, however, the CCIF was the only consultative committee with a laboratory.

3. Activities during 1952

According to article 1 of the Atlantic City Convention, the 72 signatories listed in Annex I to the Convention could become Members of ITU upon ratification of the Convention; the other six countries listed in Annex I, being non-signatories, could become Members upon accession to the Convention. States not listed in Annex I could become Members, if they were Members of the United Nations or if their applications were approved by two thirds of the Members of ITU, by acceding to the Convention.

During 1952 the Philippines deposited its instruments of ratification of the Convention. This brought up to 69 the number of signatories which had deposited their instruments of ratification with the General Secretariat, which, since 1948, has been the depository of the instruments of ratification and accession. Korea, Laos, Cambodia and the Federal Republic of Germany, which were not included in Annex I, became Members by acceding to the Convention. In addition, British West Africa and British East Africa became Associate Members.

Certain countries or territories listed in Annex I had not ratified or acceded to the Convention by the time of the Administrative Council's fifth session. In the interest of the universality of the telecommunication services, the Council resolved that, pending a decision by the forthcoming Plenipotentiary Conference, all countries and territories listed in Annex I, whether Members or not, could participate on equal terms in administrative conferences or consultative committee meetings and in reaching decisions on any questions, with one exception—that only Members, i.e., parties to the Convention by ratification or accession, could vote on the admission of new Members.

The seventh session of the Administrative Council, held from 21 April to 6 June 1952, was devoted mainly to preparation for the Plenipotentiary Conference. It drew up a report for presentation to the Conference, covering the whole field of the activities of the Union since 1947. It decided on ITU participation in the Expanded Programme of technical assistance. In regard to the convocation of the Ordinary Radio Conference, the Council decided that no immediate action was necessary at that time and delayed any further consideration of the matter until its 1953 session. It considered numerous other questions, such as finances, personnel, the activities of the permanent organs of ITU, the relations with the United Nations, the specialized agencies, and other international organizations. An extraordinary session of the Council was held during the Plenipotentiary Conference.

The most important event for the Union in 1952 was the Plenipotentiary Conference which opened at Buenos Aires in October and closed on 22 December. The Conference revised the Atlantic City Convention of 1947 but made no radical change in the organization of the Union as outlined above, apart from proposing that the Plenary Assemblies of the CCIF and the CCIT should study an amalgamation of these two committees. It reaffirmed the decisions of the Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference (EARC) held at Geneva in 1951, and authorized an increase in the maximum of ordinary expenditure of the Union from 4 million Swiss francs a year fixed at Atlantic City to 6 million Swiss francs for each of the years from 1954 to 1958. It ratified the action taken by the Administrative Council in the matter of participation of the Union in the Expanded Programme of technical assistance. A recommendation to Members and Associate Members "to facilitate the unrestricted transmissions of news by telecommunication services" was adopted. The Convention, as revised at Buenos Aires, will enter into force on 1 January 1954.

a. INTERNATIONAL CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEES

(1) International Telegraph Consultative Committee (CCIT)

CCIT studies were carried forward actively in 1952, in view of the VIIth Plenary Meeting of the CCIT to be held in Arnhem (Netherlands) from 26 May to 14 June 1953.

Two Study Groups (Study Group I and Study Group VI) met in Geneva in October to study telegraph distortion questions and matters relating to the international telegraph vocabulary.

(2) International Telephone Consultative Committee (CCIF)

The CCIF Committee for the revision of the "Instructions" met in Geneva from 25 March to 3 April. This meeting was attended, apart from members of the CCIF, by representatives of the following international organizations: International Telegraph Consultative Committee (CCIT), International Conference of Major Electrical Networks (CIGRE), International Union of Producers and Distributors of Electrical Energy (UNPEDE) and International Railway Union (UNIC).

The Committee drew up a new version of the directives for protection of telecommunication lines against the deleterious effect of industrial power lines, by including, in the 1938 edition, all changes made appropriate by technical advances—changes agreed to in principle (from 1938 to 1951) by the CCIF. This document enables telecommunication lines (both telegraph and telephone) and industrial power lines or electrified railway lines to exist in harmony side by side.

The Permanent Maintenance Sub-Committee met in Geneva from 18 to 28 June and drew up a "Programme for the Periodical Maintenance of European International Circuits". This document specifies, for the period from 1 September 1952 to 31 December 1953, for every international circuit in Europe, the days on which electrical measurements have to be effected in order to ensure that the circuit in question is in perfect condition, and in order to make further adjustments if necessary. This programme ensures co-operation between the control station, responsible for transmission over the whole of any particular circuit, and the sub-control stations located in the various countries traversed by the circuit, each sub-control station being called upon to see that the section of the circuit situated within that particular country is accurately adjusted.

At this meeting the Permanent Maintenance Sub-Committee made arrangements for providing each CCIF Plenary Assembly with a general picture of the reliability of service in the European international telephone network. This would be based on a systematic analysis of the breakdown statistics periodically drawn up by the upkeep authorities, and of the statistics for non-utilization of circuits, periodically prepared by the telephone departments in the various European countries.

The international operating team in the CCIF Laboratory during the year completed a tenth series of experiments during which the commercial telephone systems of the following countries were studied in accordance with a new technique: the Federal Republic of Germany, Belgium, Chile, France, the United Kingdom, Italy, Mexico, Norway, the Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland and Czechoslovakia. This new technique, known, in French, as that of "affaiblissements équivalents au point de vue de la netteté", provides an accurate picture of the behaviour of telephones and telephone equipment not only from the point of view of the energy transmitted (which was all that had been measured by the old "reference equivalent" technique), but also from that of the clarity of the vocal sounds received (the combined effect, that is, of all those factors which influence the transmission and reception of the human voice in the international telephone service).

The Laboratory also calibrated national calibration systems in relation to the SFERT (European master telephone transmission reference system).

(3) International Radio Consultative Committee (CCIR)

There was no plenary assembly of the CCIR during 1952 (under the Regulations annexed to the Atlantic City Convention the plenary assembly meets every other year, while under the new Buenos Aires Convention it will normally meet every third year), but six of the fourteen study groups met during the year.

Study Groups I, III and VI (concerned, respectively, with radio transmitters, complete radio systems employed by the different services and ionospheric propagation) were engaged primarily on interim reports on CCIR questions considered urgent by the Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference (EARC) held in 1951. These questions all had a bearing on methods of economizing the use of frequencies in the different radio services. These Study Groups placed special emphasis on the possibilities of reducing the bandwidth occupied by and interference caused to radiotelegraph and radiotelephone services, by the use of suitable coding, specialized equipment and the proper utilization of operating channels.

Study Groups V and XI (concerned, respectively, with tropospheric propagation and television) met immediately before the European Regional Broadcasting Conference in Stockholm, to examine the use of the frequency bands between 41 and 216 Mc/s (7.3 and 1.4 metres) allotted to television and VHF sound broadcasting. The Study Groups considered and made available to this Conference the latest technical data on propagation of electromagnetic waves in the troposphere and on the ratio of wanted to unwanted signals in television and VHF sound broadcasting.

Study Group X (concerned with broadcasting) met in Geneva in August to prepare an interim report concerning the use of more than one frequency for one broadcast programme to one reception area, a matter considered urgent by the EARC; it also endeavoured to reach agreement on an international standardization of characteristics of recording systems, for both disc and magnetic tape, used in the international exchange of broadcasting programmes. Agreement was reached for disc recording, and near agreement for magnetic tape, although further work was considered necessary.

The specialized secretariat was also engaged during the year in preparing for the VIIth Plenary Assembly of the CCIR due to take place in London during September and October, 1953.

b. PREPARATION OF THE NEW INTERNATIONAL FREQUENCY LIST

Immediately after the EARC, in December 1951, the International Frequency Registration Board (IFRB) began the work of implementing the relevant provisions of the Atlantic City Radio Regulations, together with the provisions relative to procedures and additional tasks set forth in the EARC Agreement which came into force on March 1952.

The Board's immediate task was the preparation of the Master Radio Frequency Record, comprising all frequency assignments in the radio frequency spectrum dealt with in the Atlantic City Frequency Allocation Table.

To this end, the EARC Agreement laid down that the Master Radio Frequency Record should be compiled from the assignments appearing in the plans and lists adopted by the EARC, and from information supplied by Administrations to the IFRB on the current use of frequencies by their various services. In November 1952 the preparation of the Master Radio Frequency Record was completed; it contained particulars of some 200,000 assignments, and was published shortly thereafter through the Secretary-General of the Union, as the first edition of the Radio Frequency Record. The Master Record constitutes the official record of ITU of all the frequency assignments which Administrations use, or will have to use, for all services. It represents, in short, a compendium of radio-communications of the entire world.

One of the Board's essential duties is to effect, in the Master Record, in accordance with the procedure for notification and recording as defined in article 11 of the Radio Regulations and the EARC Agreement, an orderly recording of frequency assignments made by the different countries of the world, so as to establish the date, purpose and technical characteristics of each assignment with a view to ensuring its formal international recognition. The Board thus keeps this Master Record up to date, and new editions or supplements of the Radio Frequency Record are periodically published, so that Administrations have at their disposal a reference document enabling them to assess the probable use of the radio spectrum.

Programmes were drawn up during the year which, it was planned, would become effective in 1953 for implementing certain specific frequency bands prescribed for the maritime mobile and aeronautical mobile services in the EARC plans, in the bands exclusively reserved for those services between 2,850 and 27,500 kc/s. The co-ordinated action that Administrations will have to take to this end, in consultation with the IFRB, will constitute the first major step in a collective attempt towards the objective of implementing the Atlantic City Frequency Allocation Table.

In connexion with the preparation of draft plans for the high-frequency broadcasting services, the Board assembled, in the latter half of 1952, the requirements supplied by Administrations for their high-frequency broadcasting services. As prescribed by the EARC, these requirements were published in a volume distributed to all Administrations. In the meantime the Board began working on technical standards, based on studies effected by the various broadcasting conferences, which will enable it to embark on the preparation of draft assignment plans.

Preparations were made in 1952 for the assembling and periodical publication in summary form of monitoring data to be supplied by Administrations. The system set up is planned to deal with some half million monitoring observations per year.

c. PUBLICATIONS

During 1952, in addition to the documentation of conferences and meetings held by the Union, of the seventh session of the Administrative Council, and the Secretary-General's annual report, the General Secretariat issued, generally in separate English, French and Spanish editions, a large number of publications. These included:

The documents issued by the CCIR were: Volume H of the Documents of the VIth Plenary Assembly of the CCIR, Geneva, 1951; Volume III of the CCIR (Minutes of the VIth Plenary Assembly, Geneva, 1951). The ITU also publishes regularly a tri-lingual monthly Telecommunication Journal containing general information and documentation on telecommunication.

4. Budget

The ordinary expenses of the Union include the expenses pertaining to: the meetings of the Administrative Council; the salaries of the staff; and other ordinary expenses of the General Secretariat, the International Frequency Registration Board, the International Consultative Committees, and the laboratories and technical installations created by the Union. These expenses are borne by all Members.

The extraordinary expenses include all expenses pertaining to plenipotentiary conferences, administrative conferences, and meetings of the international consultative committees. They are borne by the Members which have agreed to participate in these conferences and meetings. Private operating agencies and international organizations contribute to the extraordinary expenses of the administrative conferences and the meetings of the international consultative committees in which they participate, in proportion to the number of units corresponding to the class chosen by them. The Administrative Council may, nevertheless, excuse certain international organizations from contributing to these expenses.

The Atlantic City Plenipotentiary Conference authorized the Administrative Council to approve, for the period 1949 to 1952, inclusive, annual provisions for ordinary expenses up to 4 million Swiss francs per annum, contributory shares not to exceed this figure. Excess expenditure may be authorized after having been approved by the majority of the Members of the Union.

At its seventh session, held in Geneva beginning 21 April 1952, the Council adopted the following revised budget for 1952 (in Swiss francs):

Ordinary budget	Swiss francs

J. The World Meteorological Organization (WMO)

1. Introduction

The World Meteorological Organization (WMO) came formally into being on 4 April 1951 as an international body, the Members of which are States or territories.¹

The new Organization has the benefit of over 70 years of experience which its predecessor, the International Meteorological Organization (IMO),² had gleaned in the field of international co-operation in meteorology and its application throughout the world.

As early as 1853, an international conference held in Brussels dealt with a programme for collecting meteorological observations made by ships at sea. During the next 25 years additional conferences on other meteorological subjects were convened at Leipzig, Vienna, Utrecht and London, and in 1878 at a conference at Utrecht, the Netherlands, the International Meteorological Organization was established. Its members were the directors of the meteorological services of the various countries and territories throughout the world; as such it did not have the full official backing of governments but, nevertheless, pursued ambitious programmes of perfecting and standardizing meteorological activities, especially the services to maritime navigation, agriculture, and, increasingly, to aviation.

IMO expanded its plans for technical improvements and services in these fields and, at its Conference of Directors held at Washington, D. C., in September to October 1947, drew up the World Meteorological Convention which provided for the transformation of the IMO into the World Meteorological Organization.

On 23 March 1950—30 days after the 30th instrument of ratification or accession had been deposited with the United States Secretary of State—the Convention of WMO came into force.

The Convention stated the purposes of WMO as:

"(a) To facilitate worldwide co-operation in the establishment of networks of stations for the making of meteorological observations or other geophysical observations related to meteorology and to promote the establishment and maintenance of meteorological centres charged with the provision of meteorological services;

"(b) To promote the establishment and maintenance of systems for the rapid exchange of weather information;

"(c) To promote standardization of meteorological observations and to ensure the uniform publication of observations and statistics;

"(d) To further the application of meteorology to aviation, shipping, agriculture, and other human activities; and

"(e) To encourage research and training in meteorology and to assist in co-ordinating the international aspects of such research and training."

One year later, in March 1951, the last Conference of Directors met in Paris, where it transferred the functions, activities, assets and obligations of the IMO to WMO and completed arrangements for both the opening of the first Congress of WMO and for its own dissolution.

The Agreement establishing the relationship between the United Nations and WMO was approved by the first session of the WMO Congress in March and April 1951 and by the United Nations General Assembly on 20 December 1951. It came into force on that day.³

The First Congress also approved the General Regulations, the Financial Regulations and the Staff Regulations of WMO. It adopted the Budget of WMO for the first financial period, namely, until 31 December 1955.⁴

2. Organization

As provided by the Convention, WMO consists of a World Meteorological Congress, an Executive Committee, Regional Associations and Technical Commissions set up by the Congress, and a permanent secretariat under the direction of a Secretary-General. The Organization is headed by a President and two Vice-Presidents, who are the President and Vice-Presidents of the Congress and the Executive Committee.

The World Meteorological Congress, in which all Members are represented, meets at least once every four years. Each Member designates as its principal delegate to the Congress the director of its meteorological service. The Congress is the policy-making body of the organization. It adopts technical regulations covering meteorological practices and procedures, and determines the general policies for the fulfilment of the organization's purposes. Decisions of the Congress are taken by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast, except that in the election of officers of the Organization a simple majority is sufficient. Only Members which are States are entitled to vote on certain categories of questions, such as amendments to the Convention, membership in the organization or relations with the United Nations.

The Executive Committee is composed of the presidents of Regional Associations and an equal number of directors of the meteorological services of Members, in addition to the President and Vice-Presidents of WMO. It meets at least once a year. As the executive body of the Organization, the Committee supervises the carrying out of Congress resolutions. Among its duties, the Executive Committee makes studies and recommendations and provides Members with technical information, counsel and assistance in the field of meteorology. It has established two consultative committees, on administrative and financial questions, and programme and technical questions.

The Regional Associations, established by the Congress, are composed of Members of WMO whose networks lie in or extend into the respective regions. The geographic limits of the various regions are defined by the Congress. Meeting as often as necessary, the Regional Associations promote the execution of Congress and Executive Committee resolutions in their respective regions. They consider and make recommendations to the Congress and the Executive Committee on matters of general meteorological interest, and co-ordinate meteorological and associated activities in their respective regions.

Six Regional Associations were established under WMO as follows: (I) Africa; (II) Asia; (III) South America; (IV) North and Central America; (V) South West Pacific; and (VI) Europe. The new Regional Associations differ slightly from the former six regional commissions of IMO in that they now include ocean as well as land areas.

Eight Technical Commissions were established by the Congress and are composed of experts throughout the world who handle specific technical problems. They study and make recommendations in their respective fields to the Congress and the Executive Committee. The Technical Commissions are: Aerology (CAe); Aeronautical Meteorology (CAeM); Agricultural Meteorology (CAgM); Bibliography and Publications (CBP); Climatology (CC1); Instruments and Methods of Observation (CIMO); Maritime Meteorology (CMM); and Synoptic Meteorology (CSM).

The WMO Secretariat is located in Geneva and consists of two divisions, one administrative and the other technical. The Secretariat serves as the administrative, documentary and information centre of the Organization, carries out technical studies and organizes and performs secretariat duties at sessions of the Congress and the Executive Committee. It prepares or edits and arranges for publication and distribution the approved publications of the organization, carries out the routine procedures of maintaining records and files, prepares correspondence and manages the finances of the organization.

3. Activities during 1952

On 31 December 1952, there were 79 Members of WMO. Of this number, 56 Members are States and 23 are territories.⁵ During 1952, Bulgaria, Cuba, Guatemala, Luxembourg, and Syria became Members.

On 8 October, Japan applied for membership. The application was circulated to Members on 13 November.⁶

On 24 July the United Kingdom, on behalf of the combined British Caribbean Territories, applied for membership. After further exchange of correspondence between the secretariat of WMO and the Foreign Office of the United Kingdom, the application was circulated to Members on 19 January 1953.

During 1952 Members were also invited to submit lists of non-member countries with which they considered co-operation to be necessary.

Numerous applications for admission to the regional associations of WMO were received during 1952.

Although no meeting of the WMO Congress took place during 1952, the following sessions of WMO's constituent bodies were held: the third session of the Executive Committee, in Geneva, from 9 to 27 September; the first session of Regional Association VI (Europe), in Zurich, from 26 May to 8 June; and the first session of the Commission for Maritime Meteorology, in London, from 14 to 29 July.

a. TECHNICAL ACTIVITIES

(1) WMO Technical Regulations

The First Congress decided that new Technical Regulations intended to correct the incomplete and disorganized state of resolutions adopted by IMO should be prepared for approval by the next Congress. At the same time, it authorized the Executive Committee to develop and implement Provisional Technical Regulations.⁷

During 1952, work on these resolutions was carried out by the secretariat. Lists of "Resolutions in Force" were distributed and served as a basis for future work. Presidents of the commissions were asked to arrange for small working groups to prepare Draft Provisional Technical Regulations for each commission.

The Commission for Maritime Meteorology (CMM) completed its Draft Provisional Technical Regulations at its first session, in July, and the Executive Committee decided, at its third session in September, that this Draft and any further Draft Provisional Technical Regulations proposed by the other commissions should be distributed, as they became available, to the Permanent Representatives, the technical commissions and the Presidents of regional associations for study and comments. The Executive Committee urged that all such Drafts, as well as the definite plan for the presentation of the Technical Regulations, to be worked out by the secretariat, be available at the end of 1953.

(2) Cloud Atlas

The Working Group on Clouds and Hydrometers, entrusted with the responsibility of preparing the International Cloud Atlas, held its fifth meeting in August, in Paris.

The new Cloud Atlas will be published in several volumes, including a Reduced Atlas and an Album.

At its third session in September, the Executive Committee decided that the production of the Atlas should go forward as quickly as possible and a panel was established to consider, in collaboration with the Secretary-General, detailed arrangements.

(3) World Maps of Thunderstorm Activity

During 1952, the Technical Division of the WMO secretariat received statistical data from meteorological services in reply to requests in accordance with resolutions adopted by the Executive Committee at its second and third sessions, in 1951 and 1952. These requests were for charts showing the frequency of thunderstorms and for other statistical data, which would be assembled by the secretariat.

(4) Arid Zone Research and Development

In accordance with resolutions of the First Congress and the second and third sessions of the Executive Committee, the President of WMO appointed a panel of experts to study questions referred to WMO by the United Nations and specialized agencies, concerning research, development and planning related to arid zones. The panel is to propose a programme for WMO in studying climatic conditions, knowledge of which would contribute to improving living conditions in arid and semi-arid regions. The work of the panel will be co-ordinated by the secretariat, which undertook preparatory work during the last months of 1952.

In 1951, Professor Peveril Meigs, of the International Union of Geographical Sciences, prepared world-wide hemoclimatic maps for UNESCO, as a basis for the definition and location of the main arid and semi-arid regions of the earth. These maps were submitted to WMO for comments and were being studied by experts.

At the second session of the standing Advisory Committee on Arid Zone Research of UNESCO, established in November 1950, UNESCO consulted WMO regarding the possibilities of artificial precipitations as a means of improving arid and semi-arid climatic conditions. A provisional reply was drafted by the Technical Division of the secretariat and sent to UNESCO. A more complete report was also being prepared.

Dealing with the question of human labour conditions in arid areas, the UNESCO Committee drew the attention of WMO, ILO and other interested organizations to the need for more data on human activities of a type that could be related to climatic factors. The WMO secretariat made a preliminary approach to the International Labour Office in Geneva, and the question was included on the agenda for the first session of the Commission for Climatology.

(5) International Geophysical Year

WMO decided to participate in the International Geophysical Year 1957-1958, organized by the International Council of Scientific Unions (ICSU) to make more intensive studies of the meteorological and other geophysical elements with which ICSU is concerned. WMO appointed a representative to the special committee preparing the programme. At its third session, the Executive Committee agreed that the meteorological programme should be to investigate one or more specific problems offering promise of early solution. A small working group was established to consider the programme and to report to the Executive Committee at its fourth session. A letter was also sent to presidents of regional associations and technical commissions, inviting their suggestions for the programme. Their suggestions and other proposals were studied by the working group for report to the ICSU Special Committee in 1953.

(6) World Days of Upper Air Research

Proposals by the Joint Commission on Upper Air Research Stations regarding the establishment of World Days for the observation of the upper atmosphere were adopted by the International Union for Geodesy and Geophysics (IUGG) in 1951. The programme will be based upon the collection of observations and analyses of data obtained on fixed dates. Special days of observation were to be arranged to coincide with important natural phenomena, such as eclipses and the main meteor showers, or with artificial phenomena, such as the launching of rockets.

The Executive Committee of WMO agreed at its second session in 1951 to collaborate in this programme. The President of the Commission for Aerology studied aspects of the scheme during 1952 and the Commission was expected to consider the question at its meeting in September 1953.

(7) Bibliography and Publications

The Commission for Bibliography and Publications (CBP) was given the responsibility for preparing a meteorological vocabulary; for dealing with questions relating to the classification of meteorological subjects; for the general form of meteorological documents; for cataloguing, preserving and filing meteorological documents; and for encouraging the issue of technical and scientific documents for training, information and research.

During 1952, the draft of the "Manual for documentation, classification and library work" was awaiting certain general decisions on questions which come under the terms of reference of the International Federation for Documentation and of the International Organization for Standardization.

The commission was also preparing a working paper on a Meteorological Lexicon and Polygot Vocabulary.

Annual volumes of the "International Meteorological Bibliography" were published by the French Meteorological Service up to 1945. Work on volumes for 1940, 1941 and 1943 continued.

Quarterly volumes were published by the French Meteorological Service from 1946 to 1951. The drafts of the first three volumes of 1952 were prepared, to be printed by the WMO secretariat.

(8) Instruments and Methods of Observation

The Commission for Instruments and Methods of Observation (CIMO) is primarily responsible for all questions relating to instruments for the measurement of surface conditions on land and at sea, and of conditions in the free atmosphere. The commission is also responsible for recommendations on methods of observation and for most questions relating to radiation. During 1952, most of the technical work was carried out by Working Groups.

The Working Group on Actinometry, in cooperation with IUGG, prepared recommendations regarding radiation measurements within meteorological networks, instruments to be used and observations that should be made with respect to radiation in order to satisfy the needs of biological, medical, agricultural and industrial activities.

The Working Group on Atmospheric Optics studied the problem of visibility and accumulated enough experimental results to show that existing methods of estimating visibility were unsatisfactory. The Working Group experimented on methods which used as a criterion detection instead of recognition.

The Working Group on Station Instrumentation and Exposure studied, among other things, the problems of measuring cloud heights and sea water temperatures.

The Working Group on Barometry continued its study of "Reduction of barometer readings to sea level or to constant pressure surface". In response to a circular of August 1952, information on the various methods of "pressure reduction" used by about 50 services was received by the Secretariat. This information was to be studied by CIMO at its following session. Another important subject under consideration was the question of international standardization of barometric conventions.

The Working Group on Experimental Aerology made a number of recommendations which were referred for study and report to the technical commissions by the Executive Committee, which approved a proposal to carry out a second international comparison of radiosondes at Payerne in 1955.

(9) Aerology

The Commission for Aerology (CAe) is primarily responsible for promoting and co-ordinating meteorological research and for endeavouring to meet the needs of research workers.

During 1952, three new projects were launched by the secretariat and initial preparations were made for sessions of the Working Group on Radioelectrical Meteorology and of the full commission.

Publication of Aerological Data: In October 1952, the secretariat requested all Services to send in examples of the form in which they publish their aerological data; these would be studied prior to making recommendations as to the form in which such data should be published. Replies from nearly 50 Services were being analysed.

Aerological Diagrams: Since 1938, many new aerological diagrams had been introduced and the Commission for Aerology was authorized to prepare an up-to-date reference work on the subject. In response to a request of November 1952, samples of most of the current diagrams were received by the secretariat and arrangements were being made to prepare a report for the first session of the commission.

Radiation Errors of Radiosondes: A radiosonde sent aloft during the daytime is exposed to solar radiation which may prevent the thermometer from indicating the true air temperature. The resulting errors and their effects on the applications of the observations were investigated in several countries, and in some cases corrections are applied to the readings. In November 1952, the Secretariat began collecting information about the results of these investigations and is preparing a report on the subject for consideration by the Commission for Aerology and the Commission for Instruments and Methods of Observation.

Radio-electrical Meteorology: Arrangements were made by the chairman of the Working Group on radio-electric meteorology for a "World Symposium on Atmospheric" to be held in Zurich in March 1953. The main object of the meeting is to discuss the practical significance of the observations of atmospheric made by a number of Services in recent years. The merits of various instrumental techniques will also be compared. The International Civil Aviation Organization expressed interest in this work.

(10) Climatology

The Commission for Climatology (CC1) is primarily responsible for meteorological observations and networks required for climatological investigations of surface and upper air conditions. It is also responsible for the application of climatological data to forecasting, as well as to human activity. The Commission therefore considers not only the interests and needs of the Weather Services but also those of other groups interested in climatology. Among these are: forestry, soil conservation, irrigation, town and country planning, geography and industry.

The establishment of new working groups was to be considered at the first meeting of the Commission, in March 1953. Reports on the progress of climatology in various countries during the last few years, made following a request of August 1952, by the President of the commission, were also to be considered.

(11) Agricultural Meteorology

The President of the Commission on Agricultural Meteorology (CAGM) had prepared a comprehensive programme of work for the study of all problems within the terms of reference of the commission. This study, it is expected, should lead to the adoption of rules and instructions to guide not only Meteorological Services in their daily work of interpreting meteorological knowledge and of applying it to agriculture, but also any person or institution requiring meteorological information for the development of any kind of agricultural work. The main features of this programme are studies on:

- (1) the atmospheric elements affecting plant and animal life; instruments and methods for their observation and measurement; the synoptic and climatological aspects of these elements, including standard forms for the issue and publication of meteorological advices and climatological summaries;
- (2) plant bioclimatology;
- (3) problems and techniques in animal bioclimatology;
- (4) meteorological and climatological aspects of plant and animal phenology; and
- (5) artificial influences on weather and climate as they may affect agriculture.

Details of the outlined programme will be developed by working groups composed of a few qualified experts in each field, who will study and prepare the proposals to be discussed and approved by the full commission.

The Chairman of the Working Group on Phenology submitted a preliminary report which resulted from an inquiry among the Directors of the Meteorological Services of the world, calling for the preparation of lists of plants and migratory animals common to vast areas, any atlas of international scope, and the establishment of a network of phenological stations sufficiently dense to be representative of the territory covered by the respective Services.

After careful analysis of the replies to the inquiry, the chairman arrived at the following conclusions: (1) present ecological knowledge does not permit the final preparation of one international phenological catalogue, even limited to a very small number of plants and animals to be observed; (2) similarly, the publication of a phenological atlas for international use is considered premature.

(12) Maritime Meteorology

The Commission for Maritime Meteorology (CMM) held its first session in London during July, when it approved its Draft Provisional Technical Regulations and decided to establish four working groups for continued study of the most important problems. Among the major developments arising out of the Commission's session were:

International Ice Nomenclature: As a result of the studies made by a working group of ice experts since 1947, a new International Ice Nomenclature was prepared and recommended for adoption.

The recommended Nomenclature was referred by the Executive Committee to the Presidents of regional associations, some of whom circulated it to their members, and to the President of the Commission for Synoptic Meteorology, which was to discuss it at the next meeting.

Confidential position code for use of whaling ships: The need for every available radio weather message from shipping in the southern hemisphere makes the recruitment of whaling ships as selected ships very desirable. Whaling ships are reluctant to give their position away to their rivals, so their position in the weather messages has to be sent in cipher. The South African Meteorological Service volunteered to prepare the ciphers, to arrange for their issue to the ships and to collect and re-issue the messages using a position decipher, for all countries in the southern hemisphere and the commission recommended that this plan be put into effect. The Executive Committee authorized the use of a confidential code for this purpose and requested the President of the CMM to introduce the proposed scheme in collaboration with the secretariat. Action was taken in October, and the scheme came into operation during the 1952-1953 whaling season.

Inadequacy in the number of observing ships: One of the main tasks of the session of the Executive Committee was to study the existing ocean network and consider areas where improvements were practicable and necessary. A composite world map was prepared showing the density of weather reporting ships over the oceans and it was made clear that the network of observations in many ocean areas is still deficient.

It was recommended that each Member be informed of the urgency of recruiting further observing ships and be asked to state whether it was able and willing to do so, particularly amongst vessels plying in the areas in which the number of ship reports is inadequate. The Executive Committee approved the recommendation and directed the Secretary-General to notify the Members of the decision.

Waiving of charges on ships' weather messages: On a recommendation of the Maritime Commission, the Executive Committee agreed that the elimination of charges on ships' weather messages was of great importance for the improvement of the world-wide system of transmitting weather messages to and from ships. Further, it decided to send a representative to the next appropriate conference of the International Telecommunication Union, and requested the President of the Commission for Maritime Meteorology to prepare a brief for the guidance of the Organization's representative at that conference.

(13) Synoptic Meteorology

The terms of reference of the Commission for Synoptic Meteorology (CSM) are extremely broad. The commission is responsible for the formulation of observational requirements for synoptic meteorology, the preparation of codes, questions relating to networks of stations and for telecommunications problems. The President of the commission established five working groups to continue the work started by the corresponding sub-commissions of the IMO.

Code Questions: A new international code for reporting data obtained by meteorological reconnaissance flights (RECOO Code) was prepared and was being tried out by the United States Weather Bureau prior to final adoption. This formed part of a large project on the revision of aeronautical meteorological codes, initiated by the IMO Commission for Aeronautical Meteorology and the Meteorological Division of ICAO. The International Air Transport Association had suggested some modifications to some of these proposed codes. It was planned that the whole question would be reviewed at the forthcoming session of the Commission for Synoptic Meteorology in 1953.

Several code problems were discussed at the first meeting of Regional Association VI in May and June 1952. Special attention was given to the code for upper air reports (TEMP-Code) and the association recommended that the Commission for Synoptic Meteorology should urgently consider the question of devising a TEMP form of code suitable for universal adoption, taking into consideration the proposals made by the USSR and France. The Executive Committee referred this recommendation to the CSM.

Telecommunication problems: The whole system of meteorological telecommunications was under review at the end of the year, particular attention being given to the reorganization of teleprinter networks and broadcasts with a view to securing the greatest efficiency and economy. The development of facsimile apparatus for the transmission of surface and upper-air charts was also being considered. A working group of meteorological transmissions in Europe was set up by Regional Association VI at its first session and the problems were to be discussed on a universal basis at the session of the Commission for Synoptic Meteorology.

Radiosonde/Radio-Wind stations: Regional Association VI discussed during its first meeting the problem of optimum density of radiosonde and radio-wind stations and also the question of specifying the definite time, hour and minute for the launching of balloons at such stations. The recommendations on these items were referred to the appropriate technical commissions by the Executive Committee.

(14) Aeronautical Meteorology

Observing Manual for Air-Crews: A second draft of the observing manual for air-crews was distributed to members of the working group on this subject. In its current form, the manual deals with the procedures for observing and reporting meteorological elements and phenomena aboard aircraft and the instruments to be used. The section on cloud observations would be closely related to the corresponding section of the new International Cloud Atlas. Comments on the first draft of the manual were received from members of the Commission for Aeronautical Meteorology, who will be responsible for final approval of the publication.

Climatological Summaries: The WMO Joint Working Group on Climatological Summaries, attached to the Commission for Aeronautical Meteorology, is the continuation of the former IMO joint sub-commission on this subject. This sub-commission prepared a report proposing a number of models for climatological summaries, to be considered by the Commission for Climatology during its first session.

First Session of the Commission for Aeronautical Meteorology: A provisional draft agenda for the first session of this commission was issued by its President. Among the items to be discussed are: aircraft icing, turbulence, utilization of the jet-stream in air navigation, present status of pressure pattern flying, review of knowledge of the atmosphere and forecasting for operations above 25,000 feet.

(15) Publications and Library

WMO Bulletin: Since April 1952, the WMO Bulletin was issued quarterly. Separate English and French editions are published. The Bulletin provides a summary of the work of the Organization and of developments in international meteorology. In addition to reports of meetings and other activities of the various constituent bodies, it contains articles on recent scientific developments in meteorology. To ensure a wide distribution in scientific and political circles a free copy of each issue is sent to interested governmental departments, technical journals, the main university libraries and departments of meteorology and the main interested scientific societies in each country.

Publications:⁸ In 1952 priority was given to the printing in several languages of resolutions of the first WMO Congress, the last IMO Conference of Directors and the resolution of the sessions of the Executive Committee, held until that date.

The Russian version of the "Specifications for Meteorological Services for International Air Navigation" was completed, thus terminating the last edition of the four languages (English, French, Russian, Spanish).

A new publication "Composition of the WMO" was produced (WMO—No. 5), containing full information on the Members of WMO, with the names of their permanent representatives, lists of countries represented in the WMO regional associations and lists of members of technical commissions. This publication is kept up to date by the issue of supplements. Former IMO Publication No. 2, "Offices Météorologiques du Monde", taken over by the WMO, is also kept up-to-date by means of supplements. The edition of frequent and often very substantial supplements to the former IMO Publication No. 9 "Synoptic Weather Messages—4 Volumes" was continued.

Work on the new edition of Fascicule II, Publication No. 9, is well advanced and is expected to be finished in May 1953.

In addition to the printed publications, some reports were produced as "Mimeographed publications". A new category of mimeographed reports was introduced—the "Abridged Final Reports" of technical commissions of WMO and of its regional associations. English and French versions of the Abridged Final Report of the first session of the Commission for Maritime Meteorology in London, July 1952, were published (WMO—No. 10.R.P.2). At the end of 1952, work on the Abridged Final Report of the first session of Regional Association VI (Europe), held in Zurich from 26 May to 8 June 1952, was well under way.

Technical Library: In May 1952 Members were asked to request Services to contribute any available copies of technical books and other publications to the secretariat library. A great number of replies were received and many useful and valuable publications were sent to the secretariat. Standard text-books and sets of back numbers of some of the more important journals were also obtained and subscriptions were placed for the principal meteorological periodicals. Work was begun at the end of 1952 on the complete reclassification on the decimal system of the books and other publications contained in the library.

b. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

(1) WMO Status in the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance

As WMO did not exist as a specialized agency of the United Nations until after the allocation between the participating agencies of the fixed percentages of the funds of the Expanded Programme of technical assistance, approval was given by the Technical Assistance Board for WMO to draw on the appropriation of the United Nations for the financing of its projects. A working arrangement for 1952 concluded between WMO and TAA provided essentially that whereas WMO would be entirely responsible for all the technical aspects of its technical assistance programmes, TAA would handle all the non-technical aspects. TAA would make available to WMO for 1952 a sum of U. S. $200,000, adjustable in accordance with the volume of technical assistance to be given.

(2) Firm Projects

Among the technical assistance projects on which WMO aid was given were:

Israel: Technical assistance of a specialist nature was requested on a short-term basis in four branches of meteorology. A two months' mission in microclimatology was completed. A nomination was made for a mission in indoor climate as affecting the siting of buildings, to take place in the summer of 1953 and another for a mission in synoptic meteorology in the winter season 1953-54. Arrangements were also begun for the award of a fellowship in instruments, tenable in Canada, Sweden and the United Kingdom and of another in theoretical and synoptic meteorology in the Netherlands, Sweden and the United Kingdom.

Libya: A fact-finding survey of the meteorological requirements of Libya was completed and negotiations were taking place for the appointment of a senior meteorologist on a long-term basis to organize and temporarily direct a national meteorological service. One of the first tasks of this expert would be the recommendation of Libyan nationals for training for all professional posts in the service. Another expert was expected to train observers.

Yugoslavia: Technical assistance of a specialist nature was requested in six branches of meteorology, together with equipment and publications. A fact-finding survey in meteorology was completed and a mission in hydrology was being considered. The nomination of an expert in synoptic meteorology was accepted for a mission in the autumn of 1953 and a nomination was put forward of an expert in agro-meteorology for the summer of 1953. Negotiations were in hand for the release from his own service of an expert on instruments. Arrangements were being made for the awards of single fellowships in organization and communications, agricultural meteorology and instruments, tenable in Western Europe.

In the case of both Israel and Yugoslavia, implementation of requests for technical assistance in radiosonde had to be delayed, although experts were available, due to non-availability of equipment in the countries. The Expanded Programme is not a supply programme, but attempts were being made to purchase or hire equipment on a demonstration basis so that the technical assistance can be provided.

(3) Outlook

Discussions were taking place, and requests had been received, for the granting of technical assistance in the form of experts or fellowships to the following countries: Afghanistan, Bolivia, China, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Indonesia, Iran, Jordan, Mexico, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Southern Rhodesia, Thailand and Turkey.

Exploratory missions were concluded in 1952 in the Dominican Republic and Haiti.

WMO was arranging to provide technical assistance for the organization of meteorological services in countries where none exist and for the specialist advance of others in the sphere of economic development.

c. EXTERNAL RELATIONS OF THE ORGANIZATION

(1) Relationship with the United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Various agreements and arrangements were adopted during 1952 with a view to consolidating the relationship between WMO and other international agencies.

A working arrangement was approved between WMO and the Technical Assistance Administration of the United Nations. WMO became affiliated with the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund and other social and medical services of the United Nations. It also participated in common services established by the European Office of the United Nations and the specialized agencies whose headquarters are in Geneva. A working arrangement was also concluded with WHO and approved by both agencies. It provided that the two organizations should keep one another informed of programmes and all other activities of common interest. An informal arrangement for mutual representation and consultation was entered into with FAO. Negotiations were being conducted with UNESCO, ICAO and the International Union of Geodesy and Geophysics (a non-governmental scientific international union).

During 1952 WMO was represented at a considerable number of international meetings related to its work.

(2) General Information Service

The secretariat prepared a number of press releases which were distributed by the Information Centre of the European Office of the United Nations. An extensive exchange of information was initiated with the other specialized agencies interested in the specialized work of the organization. The secretariat also availed itself of other opportunities to make the work of WMO, its aims and its operation, well known in conformity with the spirit of the general policy of WMO.

(3) Administration of the Secretariat

During 1952 the technical work of the secretariat and the responsibilities allotted to it expanded considerably and the staff more than doubled its size within the year. At the end of 1952, the total number of established posts filled was 31. The corresponding increase in current work which also took place during the same year necessitated employing temporary staff for fairly long periods.

The Technical Division, the Technical Assistance Unit and the External Relations Section were established during the year.

4. Budget

A maximum figure of $1,273,000 was adopted for the expenditures of WMO during the first financial period, 4 April 1951 to 31 December 1955. A working fund was established with the maximum limited to 10 per cent of the expenditures voted. The scale of contributions which was agreed upon by the Members is given below.

The budget for the first financial year (the period 4 April to 31 December 1951) amounted to $190,000. For the full second financial year 1952 (1 January to 31 December 1952) the budget was adopted at $272,379. At its third session in September 1952, the Executive Committee approved the following budget in the amount of $359,881 for the third financial period (1 January to 31 December 1953):

K. The Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO)¹

(Not Yet Established)

The United Nations Maritime Conference, called at the request of the Economic and Social Council, met in Geneva from 19 February to 6 March 1948. It drew up and opened for signature and acceptance on 6 March 1948 the Convention on the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO).²

As provided by the Convention, Members of the United Nations and other States invited to the Conference may become Members of IMCO by becoming parties to the Convention. States other than these may become Members, subject to the prior approval of their application by two thirds of the States members of IMCO. Territories or groups of territories may, under certain conditions, become associate members of the Organization.

IMCO will come into being when 21 States, of which seven must each have a total tonnage of at least one million gross tons of shipping, have become parties to the Convention. As of 31 December 1952, eleven acceptances of the Convention had been received from Australia, Belgium, Burma, Canada, France, Greece, Ireland, Israel, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States. Six of these States have at least one million tons of shipping.

As provided by its Convention, IMCO will comprise an Assembly, a Council, a Maritime Safety Committee, such subsidiary organs as are considered necessary and a Secretariat.

To make the necessary preparations for the first session of the Assembly of IMCO, the Conference established a Preparatory Committee, which will cease to exist upon resolution of the first session of that Assembly.

The Preparatory Committee of IMCO held its first session on 6 March 1948 and its second on 30 November and 1 December 1948. It drew up a provisional agenda for the first session of the IMCO Assembly and prepared a proposed budget for the first two years of IMCO.

An agreement to establish the relationship between the United Nations and IMCO was approved by the General Assembly on 18 November 1948; to become effective it now requires the approval of the IMCO Assembly.³

The purposes and functions of IMCO are laid down in parts I and II of the Convention. Briefly, the organization is to:

(1) provide machinery for co-operation among governments in the field of the governmental regulation and practices relating to technical matters, including those concerning safety at sea;

(2) encourage the removal of discriminatory action and of unnecessary restrictions by governments;

(3) consider matters concerning unfair restrictive practices by shipping concerns;

(4) consider any matters concerning shipping that might be referred to it by any organ or specialized agency of the United Nations;

(5) provide for the exchange of information among governments on matters under consideration by the organization.

IMCO is also to provide for the drafting of conventions and agreements, to recommend these to governments and to intergovernmental organizations, and to convene such conferences as may be necessary. The organization is to function in a consultative and advisory capacity.

L. The International Trade Organization (ITO)

(Not Yet Established)

On 18 February 1946, the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations resolved to convene an International Conference on Trade and Employment to devise ways and means for the expansion of the production, exchange and consumption of goods. The Council, at the same time, established a Preparatory Committee to prepare for the consideration of the Conference an agenda and a draft convention for an international trade organization.

The Preparatory Committee held its first session in London from 15 October to 26 November 1946, and prepared a first draft Charter for an International Trade Organization (ITO).

Following further work on the draft by a drafting committee and by the Preparatory Committee at its second session held in Geneva from 10 April to 22 August 1947, a draft Charter was adopted by the Preparatory Committee. This draft formed the basis for the work of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment (Havana Conference). The Conference, which met in Havana from 21 November 1947 to 24 March 1948, drew up a Charter for an International Trade Organization (to be officially known as the Havana Charter) to be submitted to the 56 governments represented, authenticated the text of the Charter in a Final Act, and adopted a resolution establishing an Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization.

The Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization (IC. ITO), composed of 52 countries which approved the resolution establishing it, held its first meeting in Havana on 20 March 1948 and elected and delegated its powers to an Executive Committee of eighteen members. The Executive Committee met in Havana on 24 March 1948, and again at its seat in Geneva from 25 August to 15 September 1948.

The main task of the Interim Commission was to prepare the ground for the first session of ITO, including a plan of work for the first year of the Organization, the budget, the site for ITO headquarters, relations with the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations. The bulk of this task—so far as events could be foreseen—was completed in 1949, and since that time the Secretariat of IC. ITO has been almost entirely occupied with the performance of duties for the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT).

In view of the delay in receiving acceptances of the Havana Charter the Executive Committee, at a special session held at Annecy, France, in August 1949, agreed to postpone its third meeting, scheduled for September 1949, until a date when the entry into force of the Charter and the holding of the first ITO Conference were more imminent. At that meeting a proposal was made by the United Kingdom to bring into operation Chapter VI of the Havana Charter in advance of the Charter as a whole. This proposal was referred to the fourth session of the Contracting Parties to GATT, but found no support and was withdrawn.

By the end of 1950 the Havana Charter had been accepted by Liberia and—conditional upon acceptances by the United Kingdom and the United States—by Australia. The Swedish Riksdag authorized Sweden's adherence at the discretion of the Foreign Minister. No acceptances had been deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations. On 6 December 1950 the United States Department of State issued a statement of policy indicating that the Havana Charter would not be submitted again to the United States Congress. It subsequently became evident that the establishment of ITO would be indefinitely postponed. There were no further developments in 1952.

On 13 September 1951, at its thirteenth session, the Economic and Social Council established an ad hoc Committee on Restrictive Business Practices to prepare proposals on methods for implementing the principles set forth in Chapter V of the Havana Charter. The Committee has held three sessions and is expected to present its recommendations to the sixteenth session of the Council, in 1953.

THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE (GATT)

While the Charter for ITO was in course of preparation, the members of the Preparatory Committee decided to proceed with tariff negotiations among themselves instead of waiting for the Organization to come into existence, thereby promoting one of the most important objectives of ITO. The Preparatory Committee also sponsored the discussions which led to the formulation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). The tariff negotiations were held at Geneva from 10 April to 30 October 1947 when the 23 participating countries signed a Final Act which authenticated the text of GATT.

The countries which completed tariff negotiations at Geneva in 1947 and subsequently became contracting parties to GATT were: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Ceylon, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, France, India, Lebanon, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Southern Rhodesia, Syria, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States. Although Pakistan, Syria, Burma, Ceylon and Southern Rhodesia were not members of the Preparatory Committee, these countries participated in the tariff negotiations owing to their close economic connexion with certain members of the Committee. In the tariff negotiations, Benelux (Belgium, Netherlands, Luxembourg) took part as a Customs Union, as did also Lebanon-Syria.

The Geneva tariff conference was the first of three, the two others taking place in 1949 at Annecy, France, and in 1950-51 at Torquay, England.

1. Tariff Conferences and Accessions to GATT

In the first series of tariff negotiations at Geneva in 1947, a total of 123 bilateral sets of negotiations were completed among the 23 participating countries. They covered more than 45,000 tariff items. The second series of tariff negotiations, held at Annecy from 11 April to 27 August 1949, was on a smaller scale and resulted in the completion of 147 bilateral agreements covering some 5,000 items and the accession to GATT during 1950 of a further nine countries: Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Finland, Greece, Haiti, Italy, Liberia, Nicaragua and Sweden.

The third series of tariff negotiations held at Torquay from 28 September 1950 to 21 April 1951 followed the same pattern, except that in addition to negotiations between the Contracting Parties and the six acceding governments (Austria, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Republic of Korea, Peru, the Philippines and Turkey) there were also renewed negotiations among the contracting parties for additional concessions. Some 8,700 concessions were negotiated at Torquay.

By the end of 1952 the above countries had acceded except Korea and the Philippines. Uruguay, which negotiated at Annecy but did not subsequently accede, had also not acceded by the end of 1952.

During 1950, Indonesia became a Contracting Party in its own right; the National Government of China notified its withdrawal effective 5 May 1950; the Central People's Government of China has not yet defined its position. Lebanon and Syria notified withdrawals on 25 February and 6 August 1951, respectively.

In addition to negotiating further concessions at Torquay, the Contracting Parties renewed until 1 January 1954 the firm validity of the Geneva and Annecy concessions, which were "bound" only until 1 January 1951, thus stabilizing until 1954 more than 55,000 tariff rates, covering a very large part of world trade.

2. Structure and Functions of GATT

GATT is an international trade agreement. The tariff concessions resulting from the three tariff conferences are incorporated in the Schedules of GATT. The Agreement contains provisions to protect the tariff concessions: that is, for preventing them from being nullified by trade restrictions imposed by governments to protect their national trade and payments. These provisions include rules regulating the use by the parties to the Agreement of quantitative import and export restrictions, internal taxes and so on, as well as arrangements for consultation and for joint dis-discussion and settlement of differences arising out of the administration of the Agreement. The obligations accepted by the Contracting Parties to the Agreement provide an agreed set of rules governing their commercial relations, and the sessions attended by their representatives provide a forum for the discussion and settlement of complaints and other problems in the commercial field.

The governments which have become Contracting Parties are applying the Agreement provisionally either under the Protocol of Provisional Application or under the Annecy Protocol or the Torquay Protocol. These legal instruments have enabled the Contracting Parties to bring the new tariff rates into effect, to establish most-favoured-nation treatment among themselves, and to follow the commercial policy rules laid down in the general provisions of the Agreement. Contracting Parties which apply the Agreement provisionally are not required to amend existing legislation or to promulgate new legislation in order to adhere more closely to the Agreement. They are expected, however, not to enact any new legislation that is inconsistent with it. In signing the Protocol of Provisional Application, or the Annecy or Torquay Protocols, a Contracting Party accepts a commitment to apply Part II of the Agreement (which represents approximately the commercial policy chapter of the Havana Charter) "to the fullest extent not inconsistent with existing legislation" and, in addition, undertakes to observe the principles of the Havana Charter "to the fullest extent of its executive authority".

From time to time the Contracting Parties have amended GATT by means of Protocols, designed primarily to bring the commercial policy and economic development articles of the Agreement into line with the text of the Havana Charter. The Contracting Parties have also adopted Protocols of Rectifications, containing detailed changes in the Schedules of tariff rates necessitated by such factors as inaccurate descriptions of products or inadvertent errors, and Protocols of Modifications, comprising renegotiations among certain contracting parties.

3. Sessions of the Contracting Parties

The Agreement requires representatives of the Contracting Parties to meet from time to time to give effect to those provisions which require joint action. Seven sessions of the Contracting Parties had been held up to the end of 1952. The first session took place at Havana in March 1948, during the closing weeks of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment; the second session at Geneva from 16 August to 14 September 1948; the third session at Annecy from 8 April to 13 August 1949; the fourth session at Geneva from 23 February to 3 April 1950; the fifth session at Torquay from 2 November to 16 December 1950; the sixth session at Geneva from 17 September to 26 October 1951; and the seventh session at Geneva from 2 October to 10 November 1952.

In addition to their regular annual sessions, the Contracting Parties have made inter-sessional arrangements by which committees can be convened to consider urgent questions, to prepare the business of the sessions or to undertake specific tasks such as the study of schemes for the general reduction of tariff levels.

The main work of the Contracting Parties to GATT during 1952 was undertaken during the seventh session, held at Geneva from 2 October to 10 November. Earlier in the year the Inter-sessional Committee met in January, to consider the import restrictions imposed by the United Kingdom in November 1951. The Committee met again in February to consider import restrictions imposed by France, Southern Rhodesia and the United Kingdom and also Belgian restrictions on imports from the dollar area. In July the Government of Japan expressed the wish to enter into negotiations with a view to acceding to GATT.

The work of the seventh session, like that of previous sessions, can be roughly divided into items which arose from the operation of the Agreement and items proposed by governments and non-governmental agencies. Under the terms of the Agreement the Contracting Parties held consultations on the import restrictions applied by them to safeguard their balances of payments and monetary reserves. The request of Japan for permission to negotiate for accession was discussed and was referred to an Inter-sessional Committee.¹ The Contracting Parties: (1) reviewed the status of the South Africa-Southern Rhodesia Customs Union and the Nicaragua-El Salvador Free-Trade Area; (2) granted permission to Ceylon to extend its protection for domestic industries; and (3) extended the time-limits for Brazil, Nicaragua, Korea and the Philippines to sign the Torquay Protocols and for Uruguay to sign the Annecy and Torquay Protocols.

At the seventh session new machinery for the settlement of differences was tried out; it consisted of a Panel on Complaints, a small group of neutral assessors which heard both parties. Most of the differences brought before the Contracting Parties were satisfactorily settled: for instance, the complaint about the protective effect of the United Kingdom system of purchase tax was fully met in 1952 by the complete revision of the system. Among the most important complaints which remained unsolved at the end of the year was the infringement of GATT by the United States in its restrictions on imports of dairy products. This case drew much hostile criticism and an affected Government, the Government of the Netherlands, received permission to retaliate by reducing in 1953 her purchase of wheat flour from the United States.

Among other decisions taken at the seventh session were: (1) the waiver from certain GATT obligations granted to the six countries which comprise the European Coal and Steel Community; (2) the completion of a convention for the importation of samples and advertising material duty free;² and (3) a series of recommendations to governments designed to simplify formalities for importers and exporters. At the close of the session the French Government presented a plan that tariffs should be lowered by 30 per cent on a world-wide basis in three yearly stages of 10 per cent. It was agreed that the plan would be discussed by a special Working Party early in 1953.

4. Publications

During 1952 a third report on the operation of GATT entitled GATT in Action, was published in February 1952. This includes a twelve page outline of the provisions of GATT, explaining the salient points of each Article. (GATT/1952-2). The Contracting Parties published the third Report on the Discriminatory Application of Import Restriction, incorporating a Report on the Consultations in 1952 on the Continuance of Discrimination. In December 1952 the secretariat published two leaflets: Standard Practices for Documentary Requirements for the Importation of Goods and Standard Practices for Consular Formalities.

Two volumes containing a compilation of documentary material were published by the secretariat in May 1952. Volume I, entitled Text of the Agreement and Other Instruments and Procedures, contains the texts of the General Agreement, the Annecy and Torquay Protocols, the Protocol of Provisional Application, and the Final Acts of Geneva and Torquay. It also contains the rules of procedure for sessions of the Contracting Parties (including procedures for inter-sessional meetings), procedures for tariff negotiations, and lists of all the Protocols and the signatories thereto. Volume II contains selected decisions, declarations, resolutions, rulings and reports of the Contracting Parties, as well as reports of working parties. (GATT/1952-3 and 4 respectively.)

5. Financial Arrangements

The Interim Commission for ITO (IC. ITO) was financed from 1948 through 1950 by advances from the Working Capital Fund of the United Nations. These advances, which were authorized from time to time by resolutions of the General Assembly, amounted to $346,490. IC. ITO has transferred to the United Nations all income derived from various sources for the repayment of such loans. As at 31 December 1952 the amount still outstanding was $216,773.87. ICITO has advised the Secretary-General of the United Nations that it will repay the amount of $180,000 in the course of 1953.

In accordance with the arrangements made with the Contracting Parties to GATT, the Secretariat of IC. ITO is acting as a secretariat of this group of governments on a reimbursable basis. The governments parties to GATT participate in the repayment of IC. ITO in accordance with the scale of contributions which are assessed on their share of foreign trade. The scale of contributions is divided into seven categories.

The scale of contributions for 1952 is as follows (in U. S. dollars):

Category A	United Kingdom, United States	each $53,385.—
Category B	None
Category C	France	$18,684.75
Category D	Canada	$13,346.25
Category E	Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Federal Republic of Germany, India, Italy, Netherlands, Sweden, Union of South Africa. . .	each $10,677.—
Category F	Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, New Zealand, Norway	each $ 5,338.50
Category G	Austria, Burma, Ceylon, Chile, Dominican Republic, Finland, Greece, Haiti, Indonesia, Liberia, Luxembourg, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Peru, Southern Rhodesia, Turkey. . .	each $ 2,699.25

² This was opened for signature on 1 February 1953.
